By not utilizing this act, are the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Prime Minister saying to us that these are normal times, that what we saw this summer were normal times? I hope not, and I assure you that I and my party will continue to work very hard to ensure that this is not seen as normal times.

Clearly, these were extraordinary times and required the measures that were provided for in this act.

I underline the term in this act that says: "subject to the supervision of Parliament". The language is perfectly clear.

Instead, the Government of Canada, the Government of Quebec and the Liberal premier of Quebec chose to use Section 281 of the Defence Act.

Finally, we have an opportunity now to debate this issue. This motion certainly does not begin to deal with the issue in any substantial way.

[Translation]

And now we are finally here, and if there is anything that illustrates the failure of this government's policies or its lack of policies, it is the fact that the crisis still continues, months after it started. I don't think anyone in this House will disagree with me if I say that this summer was one of the saddest Canada has known. It was a summer of hostility, violence and confrontation, and I believe it has completely changed our concept of Canada.

I was talking recently to a friend who went to Europe this summer. He told me it was the first time in his life that he did not have a feeling of national pride upon returning to his country. For the first time, he wondered whether this country was really more humane, was really a better place to live and bring up children.

[English]

Today, Canadians are questioning the very character of our nation, and they are finding some of those answers very disquieting.

The crisis at Kanesatake and Kahnawake has deep roots of injustice which have been buried and therefore are easy for many of us to ignore.

The crisis at Kanesatake and Kahnawake is about justice, as the Minister of Indian Affairs says. It is about fair treatment for aboriginal people. It is about hope and dignity, and it is about fundamental human rights.

The experience of Canada's first nations is the experience of a denial of constitutional recognition and the refusal of governments to live up to past agreements.

I remind the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that agreements are the rule of law as well. With that agreement, we have a responsibility to our people.

An hon. member: Right on.

Ms. McLaughlin: But agreements have been broken. Promises have been broken. How could we have expected aboriginal people to have faith in the political system when during the Meech Lake debate, the Prime Minister of Canada promised aboriginal people that he would have a package for them that would address their issues. Once the Meech Lake Accord was defeated, no more was said about that package.

If the injustices remained, then, if a package was necessary to address them and two weeks later it was not there, how could people have faith in the political system?

• (1240)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: Aboriginal people for centuries have had the experience of seeing their resources taken away, their land, water and air polluted without their involvement in any of that and their health and livelihood threatened.

The 1763 Royal Proclamation talked about treaties that endured so long as the sun rises and the river flows. Well, Madam Speaker, I remind the Minister of Indian Affairs that treaties are law and those are laws that should be respected.

About 120 years after the Royal Proclamation, Chief Piapot, of the Cree described the situation as follows, and I quote: "In order to become the sole masters of our land they relegated us to small reservations as big as my hand and made us long promises, as long as my arm. But next year the promises were shorter and got shorter every year until they are the length of my finger".

That is the history of Canadian respect for the law.

Listening to the government's eloquent speeches, we must not forget this is the same government that cut back financing for native newspapers by 100 per cent. This government has stifled the voice of our native people.

That same government also cut financing for native broadcasting services. It has undermined the media that help native people preserve their language and culture. That same government also made substantial cuts in funding for organizations that represent native people and it capped funding for native postsecondary education. It is a decision that is hard to understand if we consider the importance of education for the individual, the community and society as a whole.

[English]

Finally, Madam Speaker, it is this government along with successive Conservative and Liberal governments and provincial governments that excluded Canada's First Nations from participation in the constitutional reform process. They were shut out just as the territories of the Yukon and Northwest Territories were shut out. Those are areas where indigenous Canadians make up a sizeable percentage of the population.

Consequently, aboriginal concerns and rights were often ignored or put off to some future date.

Elijah Harper and the First Nations movement in Canada said that would not do. Empty promises were not enough. Real commitments were required and that real and immediate action on aboriginal issues had to take place.

I would say that Mr. Harper has also said that aboriginal peoples speak loudest when they speak with the voice of peace and the voice of peace with justice.

I would say that there are probably very few of us in this Chamber, if any, who condone the use of violence. But I also believe that if the rights of Canadian aboriginal people continue to be ignored, our collective rights as a nation will be diminished and our country cannot be whole. It is time to recognize that the future of Canada cannot be separated from the future of Canada's first peoples.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, the crisis this summer, to which this motion refers, stems from the frustration of Canada's first peoples who have had their political and constitutional objectives and efforts ignored or obstructed and who have tried to negotiate with governments that are unwilling to negotiate. The role of the Sûreté du Québec and the role of the province of Quebec has only added to the problem. That is very sad because it seems to me that the people of the province of Quebec who themselves have been victims of oppression concerning language in their history and of exploitation very often by people from another culture, should be the first people to understand the aspirations of aboriginal people who simply have the same aspirations to some autonomy over their own affairs, to the right to their language and their culture. I think that is a very sad statement for all Canadians.

There are many events that occurred this summer, too many to go into, but I think that too will be one of the scars on the soul of our nation. I have often said that there are three areas that distinguish in many ways Canada from other countries: our vast north land, our territories and northern parts of our provinces; the history of Canada's first people, the aboriginal people; and the fact that we have within Canada, Quebec, with a rich culture, a rich language, and a rich history from which all of us benefit. If we look at our history and indeed if we look at constitutional development, it is exactly in those three areas where we continually fail. We have a chance not to fail.

Today we are discussing a motion, a superficial motion, which does not deal with the roots of one of those three major characteristics of Canada by which we define ourselves as Canadians. Let's not lose that chance. Let's take that chance and say now we are going to do something, we are going to do something noble, we are going to do something just, and we are going to do it now.

There were many events this summer and this fall.

[Translation]

There have been a number of events since then, which I will not describe in detail.

However, we saw provincial police withhold food, water and medical supplies from the Mohawks of Kahnesatake.

There were a number of horrifying incidents involving people from Châteauguay and Mohawks at the Mercier Bridge. The Canadian Forces were brought in. We saw a number of tense face-offs between the military and the Mohawk warriors. There were weapons on both sides. Negotiations were broken off. Three thousand soldiers moved forward and dismantled the barricades. There were a number of violent confrontations between the army and the Mohawks last week in Kahnawake, during which tear gas was used.

[English]

We still see food supplies withheld from Mohawk men, women, and children who are behind the barricades. It seems to me that by supplying people with the basic necessities of life we are not necessarily saying that we condone the use of arms. Where is the humanity in this? Surely in Canada we can have negotiations. We do not have to accept the actions of the use of arms and of the use of violence, but at the same time governments have to set an example that we are above that, that we do not deprive people of food, and that we will continue to negotiate.

The fundamental question in all of this in every Canadian's mind is: Who is in control and where has the federal government been? Sadly the answer seems to be that no one is in control.

The Prime Minister, instead of taking a leadership role in trying to find a solution, instead of acknowledging federal constitutional responsibility for aboriginal affairs and for the Armed Forces, has done nothing. I think it has come as a great surprise to Canadians to learn that under the National Defence Act a premier can call in the Armed Forces against Canadian citizens without the involvement of Parliament, without the involvement seemingly of the Prime Minister, and that after that both the Prime Minister and the Liberal premier of Quebec can wash their hands of the situation and say that all of the decisions are now in the hands of the army. We elect politicians; we do not elect the army.

The minister spoke today as well about negotiations. There are many proposals on the table for negotiation, proposals which do not circumvent the Canadian law, and the minister is well aware of this. Minister Ciaccia from Quebec has worked, and I would say has worked nobly, in trying to reach an agreement. Sometimes it seems he has worked, because his feels so fundamentally about the issue, not necessarily under the direction of the premier of that province. Here is a man who obviously wants to find a solution, who wants to find a negotiation, who has put forth a proposal, and this government refuses to listen and says no.

People who are watching this debate have to understand that this proposal does not say and does not in any way intimate that the people involved in the treatment centre, those people who have illegal arms, would be outside Canadian law. The proposal does not say that at all, yet this government says that we will not negotiate.

Having gone to Oka on several occasions myself, having met with Indian chiefs across Canada, I have tried as well to make a number of concrete proposals, as have many, many other people: constitutional experts, legal experts. We have had Bishop Tutu here. Jesse Jackson was here yesterday. Of course as a journalist his freedom of the press was cut off and he was not able to do his job, as Canadians journalists cannot do either. I would say that there are people who have put forward in good faith, not in a partisan way, proposals to end this situation.

I have made a number of those concrete proposals this summer to get negotiations going again, to establish a relationship between first nations and our commitments based on dignity and respect, not based on the desire for humiliation of people who feel that they as Canada's first nations are defending their land. I proposed among other things an aboriginal land claims commission, which clearly in the long term must be considered, a land claims commission that takes it out of the bureaucracy of the Department of Indian Affairs, a commission subject to federal statute and accountable to Parliament. If we have seen anything this summer, we have learned that we must have Parliament involved in all of these issues and not simply within one ministry.

We must find a solution to the land claims issue. I would add that land claims, as they have done in other agreements, include issues of self–government. We must find a mechanism for co–operation and consultation instead of conflict and violence. We can do this.

I have had a number of other recommendations which I will mention very briefly. First, I have asked the Prime Minister to order the army immediately to restore food and basic necessities to the people in the treatment centre, to restore communications to the journalists on site, and to continue negotiations.

Second, I have also asked that an all–party committee be dispatched to Kanesatake and Kahnawake to investigate the situation and also for politicians to show that we are interested. I am sure the people of Canada must be wondering: Are politicians even interested? For our leaders to come out and say it is all in the hands of the army must be very curious to Canadian citizens. We have to take that responsibility.

Third, I have asked for a public inquiry, not a judicial inquiry, that should be struck immediately to investigate how this crisis has been created and how it has been handled.

Finally, I believe that the government could indeed demonstrate some good faith by restoring funding to the aboriginal programs, funding that was cut in the last budget. It is probably very ironic to those organizations that we have spent ten times the amount of money on the army, on the police, than would have been needed simply to restore the funding to those programs.

The political process must be responsive to the needs and the aspirations of Canada's aboriginal people or it will be rejected by them. We must create real hope for peaceful change. We must have real change for peace and hope.

Today I want to close by reminding the House that the year 1992 marks the 500th anniversary of contact between Europeans and the first peoples of North America. It also marks the 125th anniversary of Confederation. I believe we should look at the year 1992 as a target date for resolution of conflicts between first nations and peoples who have settled there.

The motion put forward by the government is cynical. It does not deal with the root of the problem. As you know, Madam Speaker, I am only allowed to amend the amendment put forward by the Liberals, but I would have to say that if I had the opportunity I would have wanted to change the first part of the motion as well.

The Liberal Party has accepted to commend the exemplary conduct of the men and women of the Canadian forces at Oka and Chateauguay. I am not against the Armed Forces at Oka and Chateauguay, but the forces work under the direction of the politicians. Once again this clause which the Liberal Party has accepted and I cannot amend takes away the responsibility of the government.

I would say that it is not a question in my mind of the conduct of anyone in this situation, except the conduct of the federal government and the Government of Quebec. However, given those limitations, I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the words "this House condemns the complete failure of the government" and replacing them with:
> "this House condemns the complete failure of the current and past governments".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will start by putting to the House the amendment presented by the hon. member for Western Arctic and the subamendment by the hon. member for Yukon.

On a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, once again the House is faced with a debate that is significant and important to all members.

As a result we had several discussions among the three parties and other members of the House regarding extension of hours to allow more members to participate freely in the debate today.

I believe, Madam Speaker, that you will find consent for the following motion:

> That this House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment, notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House, and continue consideration of the business now before it provided that when no further member rises in debate the Speaker will deem the debate concluded, a division demanded, which division will be deemed deferred until three o'clock p.m. Wednesday, September 26, 1990, and thereupon the Speaker will adjourn the House until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m. pursuant to Standing Orders and provided that dilatory motions or calls to have the House counted will not be received by the Chair after such ordinary hour of daily adjournment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, we are happy to make this accommodation to permit an extended debate on the motion before the House and, indeed, there have been discussions and we agree to the terms.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, we are certainly prepared to consider this favourably. Of course the understanding would be that while the debate of the evening will focus exclusively on the amendment put forward by the leader of the New Democratic Party that further discussion will take place in days forthcoming on the Liberal amendment as well as the main motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is a motion, an amendment, and a subamendment before the House so we will be debating everything that are before the House.

There will be a period of questions and answers following Question Period.

Is there consent for the special order? I understood that there was.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As it is one o'clock I will now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

BILL C-21

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, over the summer months it has become very clear that the Liberal Senate does not respect the elected will of the people of Canada. It seems that the Liberal Senators are looking to redefine Canadian democracy.

There are a number of government initiatives that are being stalled in the red chamber. For their own political reasons the Liberals are playing with bills such as C-28 and the GST legislation.

One of the most serious bills that they have chosen to block is the UI reforms. Across northern Ontario this is causing many hardships. From Elliot Lake, Red Lake, Kirkland Lake, men and women are being denied the benefits of these reforms.

Three hundred and fifty million dollars in job training funding of workers has been on hold. The senators have placed in jeopardy additional training and employment programs including the fine work of Community Futures groups. Labour force development and family benefit changes have all been affected by the Liberals actions.

I say it is time that the unelected, over-paid, and self-serving Liberal senators stop playing with the lives of the needy Canadians. Pass the UI reforms.

ELECTION IN MANITOBA

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues in the Manitoba New Democratic Party are to be commended for their showing in the recent provincial election, but particularly, from my point of view, for having nominated and elected four excellent aboriginal members to the legislative assembly, 20 per cent of our caucus.

That includes Greg Dewar of Selkirk riding, a Métis member, long-time chief Oscar Lathlin who now represents The Pas, Inuit member advocate George Hickes who represents the riding of Point Douglas, and those people join the incumbent MLA for Rupertsland, Elijah Harper, who joins Chris McCormick at the Native Council of Canada in our gallery today.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the World Summit for Children Week in Winnipeg started yesterday and ends this weekend when the actual summit begins in New York. The week-long observance aims to focus the attention of Canadians to the plight of all children, to guarantee their basic rights to food, shelter, good health and education, and to secure their active role in society.

The Winnipeg Free Press recently headlined the lamentable story that slightly over half a million Canadian children turn to food banks every year; that "in Winnipeg the number of hungry who are turning to food banks to feed themselves and their families has swelled by 30 per cent in the last year."

We cannot long afford to fail them. We cannot long endure their continued loss to hunger, illness, ignorance and abuse.

The country will pay the price if we in Parliament who can act fail to act now.

I therefore urge Parliament and this government to give top priority to development of strategies that would eliminate or significantly minimize poverty within this decade.

A war on poverty on behalf of the children of Canada and of the world is a war worth our effort.

THE SENATE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it appears that the remnants of the last government in the other place have taken it upon themselves to dictate to Canada's duly-elected government.

We live in an era where democracy is flourishing. The Berlin Wall has come crumbling down and new democracies are springing up all over the world. Today we in Canada are faced with the spectre of reversing the process where the appointed become the self-appointed. What other country in the world would put up with this type of situation?

Almost nine years ago the British House of Lords had their authority to veto government financial bills removed. Clearly Canada is overdue in doing the same thing. It is time that Canada reformed its upper House.

Until that time I call upon the members of the other House to respect the longstanding principles of parliamentary democracy. Pass the legislation that has been approved by the democratically elected members of Canada.

Otherwise Canadians must resign themselves to being governed by an appointed House just as they were in the days before Baldwin, Lafontaine and Joseph Howe.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the World Summit for Children scheduled to be held in New York this weekend has been hailed by this government as a vehicle to advance the causes of children everywhere in the world. The summit will be chaired by our very own Prime Minister and is to bring to the forefront of world leaders' minds the plight of children.

So what is the government's solution to helping the children of Canada and the world? It is to produce a document entitled, Children of Canada, Children of the World at a cost of $72,000 which contains nothing but statistics published elsewhere, yet more uninformative rhetoric about concern for children and a huge glossy photograph of the Prime Minister. This is only one of the costs of the summit and there will be many other costs.

Could this money have been spent better? Several organizations who are in a position to know certainly say so. For example, the World Health Organization estimated that four million children under the age of five will die this year as a result of gastro enteritis when a simple ten-cent package of sugar and salt would save them. Mr. Speaker, $72,000 could have saved 720,000 lives of young children in this world.

Another 2.8 million children will die this year as a result of vaccine-preventable diseases. If the Canadian government really wanted to give a shot in the arm to the world's children, they could have spent $72,000 giving shots in the arm to 7,200 children and in the process saving their lives.

THE SENATE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am not well known for my love of the Senate. In fact, I have been known to have said some rather harsh things about the other place.

My disillusionment with the function of the other place is confirmed daily when I see people, appointed on the basis of political affiliation, obstructing the will of the democratically elected representatives of the people of Canada. Their irresponsible, politically motivated actions, unprecedented in the history of Canada, will do nothing but bring greater dishonour to the other place and further disillusionment to the people of Canada for the political process.

Their actions will cost billions of dollars in the future as well as do irreparable damage to Canadian political life. I implore the senators to do the right thing and pass all of the vital legislation that they are delaying at this time.

LABOUR DISPUTES

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, during the last number of weeks some 2,400 Cape Breton coal miners were engaged in a work stoppage. This stoppage crippled the local economy.

Even though there have been difficulties for the union, management has demonstrated a complete lack of ability in terms of exercising their responsibilities. Management had a responsibility to resolve this particular dispute and to effectuate good labour management policies.

We simply do not have the economic base to avoid the negative economic spin-offs that this type of labour dispute generates. I hope that in the future we will not see this type of action again. The minister responsible for this Crown corporation has promised to undertake a study that would focus on labour relations at Devco.

I urge the minister to have this study in place and to have it in place forthwith. I also urge the minister to act upon a request which has been made by the United Mineworkers of America and every labour organization on Cape Breton Island, that is, to appoint labour representatives to the Crown corporation, its board of directors, in order to effectuate and see, in reality, good management labour relations.

THE SENATE

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, Parliament is experiencing a very serious power snuggle. The Liberal Senate is flouting custom and tradition by opposing a number of bills passed by the elected members of this House. This is intolerable! The general feeling is now one of apprehension and malaise.

The Liberal majority in the Senate is a burden, and an expensive one. It is costing the people of this country a fortune. They are systematically and maliciously obstructing bills initiated by the elected representatives of this House. They disregard and literally undermine decisions made by the elected representatives of this country. The Liberal senators are having a ball at taxpayers' expense, and they are costing us a fortune. This is the kind of partisan sham that the people of my riding refuse to support. Enough is enough!

The federal Liberals never cared about people. They could not care less, and it is high time they were called to order. The people of Beauce and the people of Quebec are shocked to see Liberal senators, with their more than ample salaries, thumb their noses at the elected representatives of this country. This Senate is not effective.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 31 to point out that the Canadian government's actions have undermined their claims that they are negotiating at the GATT to strengthen Article XI to protect our dairy and poultry sectors.

In early July the Canadian government endorsed the GATT agriculture chairman deZeeuw's position paper and accepted it as the negotiating framework to reform world agriculture trade in spite of the fact that the paper failed even to mention Article XI.

When this government went to the Houston meeting of the G–7, they failed to include the strengthening of Article XI in the statement of their main objectives. This government helped draft and endorsed a resulting statement that failed to make any reference to strengthening of Article XI. At the end of August the Canadian government failed to table documents to further outline Canada's position. Only Japan and Switzerland tabled positions.

On October 1, the government has the opportunity to indicate through its actions that it is committed to maintaining and strengthening Article XI by not including our system of orderly marketing on that list of tariff equivalents that it will table at the GATT, clearly stating that they are not tariff equivalents. This will ensure that they are not on the sacrificial list to be tabled October 15.

It is time this government showed with its actions, not its hollow words, that it is committed to strengthening Article XI to allow our dairy and poultry sectors an equitable return for our Canadian farmers.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, during the summer of very complicated and emotional issues, the constituents of my high unemployment riding have been most affected by the stalling of Bill C–21 in the Senate.

People have actually rearranged their lives and disrupted their families to improve themselves and upgrade their education by using the benefits of Bill C–21, only to have their hopes and dreams dashed at the very last moment when funding was denied. It is incredible to me that my constituents who want to get off unemployment insurance and social benefits and better themselves are denied this opportunity by callous and uncaring political ploys of the Senate.

Bill C–21 has been in the Senate since November 1989. It is high time that the Liberals in the Senate stopped playing political games on the backs of Canada's unemployed.

S. O. 31

THE SENATE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, in keeping with the long NDP tradition of pointing out the corporate welfare bums in our society, today I would like to point out another dimension of the corporate welfare ethic that demoralizes and undermines the work ethic in this country.

Sometimes, particularly when new senators are needed to push through a tax that will hurt working Canadians the most, members of the corporate elite are rewarded with the greatest corporate welfare package of them all, an appointment to the Senate.

For showing leadership, in helping Brascan make $700 million in 1988–89, with an effective tax rate of 0.07 per cent, for helping Brascade to make $221 million in 1988–89 and pay no taxes, and Edper Corporation to make $129 million in 1988–89 and pay nothing in taxes, while some of these corporations gave thousands to the Liberals and Conservatives. Trevor Eyton has been recruited to help tax ordinary Canadians to death, along with Claude Castonguay, Chief Executive Officer of the Laurentian Life Corporation which made $8.1 million and paid no taxes in 1988–89.

THE BLOC QUÉBÉCOIS

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, allow me to point out, on behalf of the Bloc Québécois, the advent of this new group in the House of Commons.

A few members would probably prefer not to be reminded of the painful circumstances which lead to the creation of this movement. Let them be reminded, Mr. Speaker, that we are here today precisely to ensure that those events not be forgotten.

Following three constitutional setbacks in less than twenty years, Quebec can not be criticized for reconsidering forming part of Canada. It is in that context that we have decided to focus exclusively on the interests of Quebec.

Unlike the so-called "official" Opposition and the other opposition parties, we have no intention of filibustering every single government initiative. Our sole objective will be to defend and promote the interest of the province of Quebec in Ottawa until Quebec has become fully sovereign.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the events of this past summer at Kanesatake and Kahnawake, along with the rail and road blockades which sprang up across the country, are proof positive that the government's specific land claims policy does not work.

The Minister of Indian Affairs continues to make promises that he will speed up the land claims process to ensure that all outstanding land claims are settled by the end of the decade.

We do not want to be too cynical. However, until such time as the minister gives aboriginal leaders and members of this House some specific information on how he plans to proceed, then I am afraid he will continue to lose face.

The Canadian people watched in horror as the government called in the army against our citizens. Our reputation worldwide has been sullied as charges of human rights violations made world headlines. All of this because of policies which do not work.

I believe it is time for the government to establish, in consultation with aboriginal peoples, an independent and impartial land claims commission which will be responsible for the negotiation and settlement of all outstanding land claims.

Without concrete and positive action on the part of the government, I firmly believe we have not seen the end of events such as we have seen this past summer.

THE SENATE

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, do not be too quick to judge the Liberal senators harshly. They may not be the self-serving, partisan narcissists they appear to be. It may all just be a charade, another deceitful bluff. Not even the fiscally irresponsible Liberal senators can really oppose the GST, for surely anyone who has studied it as carefully as they have, at an additional cost to the Canadian taxpayers of over $1 million, will know by now of its benefit to Canada.

No, my guess is when it comes to a vote the Liberals will come up short while protesting to the end. They will, at the same time, ensure the country will not be denied the stable tax base necessary to reduce the national debt they, while in government, created.

THE SENATE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, students of history know that delusions of grandeur prefaced the downfall of empires and emperors from ancient Rome to modern Romania.

If one wants to see delusions of grandeur in action in Canada today, look at the Liberal side of the Canadian Senate. It is hard to believe that Senators like Allan MacEachen and political gadflies like Michael Kirby would have the colossal gall to pretend an interest in the financial welfare of Canadians.

Senator MacEachen, as Minister of Finance, single-handedly orchestrated the physical collapse of the Trudeau government with his tax reforms of 1981. Senator Kirby chose Machiavelli as his model in setting the strategy for the Trudeau constitutional changes that have kept Canadians in an uproar since 1982. Now partisan political rejects want to help Canadians by thwarting the democratic process with the co-operation and connivance of their colleagues in the Senate.

Hypocrisy is an unparliamentary expression, Mr. Speaker, but can you think of any other word to describe Liberal Senators?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday I asked the Prime Minister to establish immediately a royal commission on aboriginal questions to develop better and quicker solutions to the many concerns of our aboriginal peoples across the country. The Prime Minister gave no answer whatsoever to that request, even though in the past he has talked favourably about creating such a royal commission.

I ask the Prime Minister once again if he will today establish such a royal commission to develop these better and quicker solutions to the real concerns of our aboriginal people?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to my hon. friend yesterday that, as soon as the matter was peacefully resolved at Oka, we would be announcing a number of initiatives that would be constructive and beneficial for native peoples. Moreover, there is a debate that is ongoing in which I propose to participate this afternoon. Some of the government's plans and intentions will be indicated at that time.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, our aboriginal peoples and Canadians generally, will not be satisfied that the Prime Minister uses the ongoing situation at Oka as an excuse for inaction. The problems of our aboriginal peoples existed long before the Oka situation and they exist all across our country on the part of people thousands of miles from Oka.

On the weekend the Prime Minister is going to be the co-chair of the World Summit on Children at the United Nations. How he can have the nerve even to go to that summit meeting when he has allowed our native children to exist in the harshest social, economic, and health conditions of any children in the country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is an absolutely disgraceful statement to be made by the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

There is no correlation whatsoever to the situation that originated at Oka, not because of the Mohawk people whose peaceful traditions are well known to all Canadians, but because a small group of warriors have hijacked that situation. Many of them are from the United States and have tried to intimidate the people of Canada with guns. I am telling the Leader of the Opposition, in case he does not know, that it will not work with the Government of Canada. Our policy is not to let the warriors go now to try to catch them later.

The participation of the Government of Canada in respect of the World Summit on Children is important for members of all parties and for all Canadians. I did not think that it was one that my hon. friend would want to take an easy or cheap political shot at.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, when it comes to taking cheap political shots, nothing matches the efforts of the Prime Minister of trying to use Oka as an excuse for ignoring the needs of our native children thousands of miles from Oka.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1420)

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development how he can possibly let the Prime Minister leave for this world summit at a time when he has no program to meet the serious needs of our native children.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, however much affection and respect I may have for the authority of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, neither the Leader of the Opposition nor I need his permission to attend an important convention.

Yesterday's debate was highlighted by the significant and remarkable intervention of the member for Winnipeg South Centre. He spoke eloquently about the importance of the United Nations' summit this weekend and, unless I am mistaken, he did offer to co-operate fully with the government to support and promote approaches designed to help children in Canada and around the world. Having said clearly that I would indeed put to good use this outstanding gesture of leadership on the part of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, I am amazed to see that the Leader of the Opposition should fail to draw inspiration from such leadership.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

We all know that the children of Canada are the jewels in our crown and our pride and joy. In the aboriginal community, they are our sacred trust and our future investment. Having said that, this summer, Liberal members heard the testimony of members of the Oka defence fund who stated that restrictions on food impeded the free access of baby formula, resulting in children being fed sugar water.

Is it government policy to force unarmed children to go hungry? Is it government policy to make children pay the price for this minister's incompetence?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, certainly this is not government policy. We certainly all respect the needs of children. I have written a number of times and spoken with the responsible ministers in the Government of Quebec to ensure that, at all times, food was allowed through the barricades when there were barricades up. I would say to the warriors that, if they were to allow the women and children to come out—who are completely free to come out—then all of their needs could be assured.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe a minister of the government who spouts the principle of democracy and does not allow people the right to choose what action they want to take.

If the minister does not agree with the statements just made, can he explain why the Canadian Human Rights Commission and the Human Rights Institute of Canada sent letters to the minister citing the need to prevent human rights abuses? Will the minister do the proper thing and resign?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member speaks of freedom of choice. The children and women—who in a way are providing a screen for the armed warriors—are free to leave and to seek the full benefits and comforts of Canadian citizenship.

I find it surprising that the hon. member would advocate having children sitting at the knee of armed warriors, learning how to clean a revolver.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It is not much wonder that Canadians have become cynical about the old style politics and have totally lost confidence in this government. Now, of course, we see the spectacle of the patronage Senate, with Liberals and Tories announcing their intention to do what this government should have done a year ago, and that is kill the GST.

What does the Prime Minister intend to do now? Will the Prime Minister, instead of going on another binge of political and patronage appointments, kill the GST now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what it is about the NDP. It may be biological, but they are opposed to patronage appointments until one is offered.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I was a bit taken aback by the Prime Minister's answer. I did not realize that he was being a stand-up comic and I was waiting for the answer.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. leader could put her question.

[Translation]

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the Prime Minister that he once said "You had a choice". The choice is simple: continue handing out patronage appointments at an unprecedented rate, or drop this tax and present to the House a real tax reform which would put the interests of families and workers ahead of those of the rich and mighty.

Here is my question: will the Prime Minister take the right direction, drop this tax, and give Canadians a real tax reform?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is a well-known fact that the idea of political appointments is repugnant to the New Democrats. Still, another principle is involved. Generations of New Democrats have adamantly insisted that the Senate has no moral authority whatsoever to kill a legislative measure from the House of Commons where members are duly elected by the people of Canada. Whether one accepts or not the outcome of the last elections, the fact remains that the Canadian voters had been made fully aware of the GST, the free trade agreement and the other political programs, and they chose this government and its programs, rightly or wrongly. Under our system, after it has been elected the Canadian government has the right to be heard and to implement its program once it has been accepted by the elected members. New Democrats may find political appointments repugnant, but we find repugnant any attempt at undermining the moral authority of the elected House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

The Prime Minister does not need to go to the boardroom for the country to get a vote on the GST. What he can do is either kill the tax himself or do the honourable thing, call an election, and let the people decide—

• (1430)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: Call an election.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, just in case there is any doubt in my hon. friend's mind, I just want to reassure her that I did learn that a majority government term is five years, not three.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): That is too bad, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Today at the Canadian Bar Association meeting Roy McMurtry, the former High Commissioner to Great Britain, a very distinguished diplomat and jurist, said the following:

> My deep concern is that Canada's role in the international community is being diminished by internal difficulties at Oka. We face a depressing spectacle. We are really on the verge of tarnishing our image in the world which will be very difficult to refurbish unless we get our act together.

Taking those important words of Roy McMurtry and supported by other members of the Canadian Bar Association, I want to ask the Prime Minister this. How can we go ahead on the world stage and argue for the protection of civil rights for other people when we are denying civil rights to our native people here in Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, 20 years ago next month the government of which my friend was a member invoked the War Measures Act and threw almost 600 citizens of the province of Quebec into jail without trial and that has been forgotten by my hon. friend and somehow—

Mr. Marchi: Where did you stand on it?

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will know that there is considerable contest in this Chamber for time in the Question Period. I would ask hon. members to keep that in mind. The right hon. Prime Minister will complete his answer.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend was a supporter of that government and information was supposed to be provided to the House of Commons with regard to that particular act. It never was and yet, somehow, the Government of Canada of the day and subsequent governments conducted themselves in such a way as to ensure that there was no dishonour brought to Canada's reputation internationally.

From time to time governments are confronted with difficult situations. This one here is a difficult situation. At Oka, following events that took place in May, for reasons that have a lot to do with the internal control of matters ranging from the illegal trafficking in arms, to cigarettes and to illegal gambling. There were two killings that took place on the Akwesasne reserve in the late spring. This was followed subsequently by the murder of a young member of the Sûreté du Québec.

Ms. Blondin: Murder?

Mr. Mulroney: This is deeply regretted and deeply deplored by all—

Ms. Blondin: Are you the judge?

Mr. Tobin: Judge and jury.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, there was one of the members of the Sûreté du Québec who was killed in the line of duty. The responsibility of the Government of Canada is to deal with this. We have sought to do so in a manner which ensures the ongoing respect for the rule of law, even if it means from time to time that we have got to get a black eye internationally in some fora. We will not accept that people will dominate this country at the point of a gun because that is alien to everything that Canadians stand for.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will not take the supplementary to debate all the points but I would remind the Prime Minister that he has colleagues, including the gentleman sitting next to him, who also voted for that same act in 1970.

I want to ask this question: While it may be important to defend law and order, it is equally important to recognize fundamental human rights and fundamental civil liberties. Those are being denied to the people at the treatment centre on the reserve and this government has not moved to deal with the issues that are providing so much frustration and sense of grievance to native people.

Today, we are asking in Parliament: Why not set up a parliamentary inquiry or a royal commission? Why not show native people that we are prepared to deal with them fairly? Then you will get them to listen.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend should not be exercised to that extent.

I have already indicated, as has the minister, our intention to join with him and other members of the House of all parties in devising and in setting out programs and policies that will bring a much greater degree of social justice and fairness to the native peoples across Canada.

An hon. member: With greater consultation.

Mr. Mulroney: Indeed, with greater consultation.

My hon. friend is quite right: indeed, with a greater degree of consultation. I think that my hon. friend from Winnipeg would acknowledge the fact that before these matters can begin, it would be very important that those people who have hijacked an otherwise very peaceful group of native peoples near Montreal put down their guns and abide by Canadian law. Then we can get on with business.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister refused to give us the names of Canadian native leaders with whom he has met to resolve the issue at Oka.

When are the Prime Minister and this government going to stop hiding behind a band of armed warriors just to ignore their responsibilities to all Canadian native people? When is the Prime Minister going to sit down and start meeting with Canadian native leaders?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would offer the observation that the hon. member has it quite wrong.

It is the masked warriors who are hiding behind a barricade of razor wire from the justice system which all Canadians must abide by.

I will continue to meet aboriginal leaders, Grand Chief George Erasmus and the leaders of the various provincial first nations across Canada, as I have been doing for many months to help to address the important, social and economic needs of their people.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister has not been successful so far.

We want the Prime Minister involved. It should be the top person in government.

The Minister knows that the native children are faced with higher rates of poverty, illiteracy, malnutrition, disease and death than other Canadian children.

Considering such a deplorable situation, how can he justify to the Canadians and to the United Nations Summit on Children the fact that he has completely abolished the $60 million program for native children?

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member could check the estimates. I can provide him with another copy of the vital information that I circulated to all members in June.

I will provide him with clear evidence of our increased commitment to the needs of aboriginal children. Certainly we recognize there are special social problems and higher than acceptable levels of difficulty in relation to child welfare, child sexual crimes and other matters. We are working on a new set of initiatives to address these in co-operation with the provinces.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister said:

> The Government of Canada responded to a—request from the Government of Quebec pursuant to the National Defence Act to provide the Canadian army for peacekeeping purposes—

However, at a news conference on August 8 to announce the decision, the Prime Minister contradicted his friend, the Liberal premier of Quebec, and said that it would be inappropriate and misleading to describe the army's role at Oka as one of peacekeeping. Can the Prime Minister explain to the House on which occasion he was telling the truth?

• (1440)

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, rather than play on words, I think it is more important that the NDP recognize that the Canadian forces have been requisitioned under the National Defence Act in the aid to the civil power. It is a provision in the act that is available to every province in Canada when they need assistance because they cannot enforce civil law, have peace and security for their people, by either the municipal policing authorities, their provincial policing authorities or, in this case, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The Canadian forces were called in, have responded and, to the greatest extent possible, carried out their responsibilities with diligence, patience and understanding that I think even the hon. member would recognize.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, given that the army has been accused of provoking hostility, withholding food, denying human rights and trampling freedom of the press, why does the Prime Minister, with his Minister of Indian Affairs, continue to hide behind the army and why will he not take the responsibility now and commit himself to finding a political solution to this three-month-old conflict?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this government has been committed to finding a political solution to these matters for at least three years. I would like, because it is important, with the indulgence of the House, to read a short paragraph from a letter I wrote to Grand Chief George Martin and Mayor Jean Ouellet on June 28, a full two weeks before the tragedy occurred at Oka.

The letter reads:

> Over the course of the past week I have met with both of you, and your councils, to discuss the current situation in Oka and the long term needs of your respective communities.
> With respect to the former, I understand that the Village of Oka's application for an injunction to remove the blockade of the Chemin du Mille is to be heard on Friday, June 29, 1990. Regardless of the outcome, I urge you both to meet, immediately following the court's decision, to discuss ways of diffusing the tensions that exist and restoring a climate of harmony until long term solutions can be found.
> I am prepared to offer the services of Mr. Yves Desilets to assist you in these discussions. I am confident—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. minister has read the appropriate parts.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, in a letter to John Ralston Saul, Chairman of the Pen Club International, a writers' association, the Defence Department stated, and I quote: "Material and films belonging to journalists can go through military barricades and we will allow journalists to receive food supplies." The Minister refuses to respect those commitments.

I ask the Minister of National Defence why he refuses to admit that these rights are absolutely fundamental in a democratic society?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has to understand that there are basic rights in a democratic society. The first right is that of respect of law. There are suspected law-breakers in the treatment centre at this time. The Canadian forces are acting as peacemakers and peace officers in this instance. With regard to food, I can tell the hon. member that we estimate there are some 53 people in the treatment centre. We are providing rations for 60 people. The other day we provided four eggs per person, some 240 eggs. They were so desperate for food that the warriors threw them at the army.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKnight: Now, if the hon. member believes there is a shortage of food, she should take a further look at it.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like the minister to tell us what laws the journalists have broken.

Second, I would like the minister to tell us whether or not he believes that the public's right to know the real story at Oka, Kanesatake and the treatment centre is not a fundamental right.

Does the minister think that stopping access to films and tapes and the filing of stories is an absolute abridgement of fundamental rights in this democracy, that it is censorship?

An hon. member: Censorship.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should recognize that there are suspected law-breakers in the treatment centre.

Mr. Gauthier: Journalists?

Mr. McKnight: If that is recognized by the hon. member then she, I believe, will concur with the actions that have been taken by the Canadian forces to limit inflow. There has been no limit to reporters wanting to leave. If reporters wish to leave, the door is open. If anyone wishes to leave, the door is open.

I ask the hon. member to understand that this is not a public event. These are actions that have taken place by people suspected of breaking the law. The Canadian forces are acting as peace officers under the jurisdiction of Canada. Perhaps the member will understand that these are not equals: one is enforcing law and the other is attempt to break law. We are making every effort possible to make sure there is a peaceful resolution.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the Minister of Finance's statement that the economic slowdown in this country will be good for Canadians, could the Prime Minister tell us just how many bankruptcies and jobs lost the government and the Prime Minister will need before bringing in a revised budget which reflects the true economic reality of this country.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Acadie—Bathurst on his confirmation as his party's financial critic.

May I remind him that in our most recent budget, we had indicated that the economy was under pressure following seven years of record growth and that it would require some slowdown in order better to adjust. Of course, we are now in this transition period and we certainly are quite concerned about the many bankruptcies, but the hon. member should recognize that there is a reduction in the number of businesses compared with an unprecedented high in Canada.

A look at some figures will show that nearly 150,000 new jobs per year have been created over the past ten years. Compared with 1982 when we had a Liberal government—admittedly a very difficult period—there are fewer bankruptcies today; there were then nearly 800,000 businesses, while there are now 1,600,000 businesses with the same number of bankruptcies. It is therefore a difficult and necessary situation which we monitor very closely in our efforts to avert inflation.

[English]

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, my point in asking the Prime Minister the question is that the high interest rates we are suffering were not foreseen by the Minister of Finance. The deficit which the finance minister predicted is not at all in line with what it is going to be. Inflation is going to be fuelled by the GST. That is being confirmed by, for example, the IMF. These are all prime indicators that would require any thinking person to recognize that we must have a revised budget in this country that reflects economic reality.

I ask the Prime Minister: Is it not time to recognize the kind of damage his government is doing to the economy and to ask his finance minister to bring in a budget that reflects economic realities in Canada?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that we are fully committed to deficit reduction. If we look at the situation last year when interest rates were high, we succeeded in coming in $1 billion below our projection.

If I look at the Liberal performance in 1982–1983, a projected deficit of $10 billion; performance, $27.8 billion; a difference of practically $17 billion.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Canadian grain farmers are in a crisis position as far as cash flow is concerned. They have lots of grain but are unable to move it off the farm at any price. For a variety of reasons, among them the embargo against Iraq, prices have fallen and no grain is moving at all, which means the producers are virtually without any income.

Will the government now provide some immediate cash flow to grain farmers by providing them with an interest-free advance on this year's harvest?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member and other members of the House that I am very much aware of the serious cash flow situation in which the farmers find themselves.

I should also tell the hon. member that deliveries, notwithstanding his suggestion, are somewhat higher this year over last year in the first six weeks of this particular crop year. Having said that, we all know that with the record crop, a serious slump in sales and the low prices that situation will deteriorate further still down the road.

We are looking at some options. As a matter of fact, the deputy ministers of agriculture are meeting in Toronto at this particular time. I think the hon. member would agree with me that what is in the best interest of agriculture is to provide some form of improved long-term safety net and stabilization program.

We are actively working on that, and I hope I can count on the hon. member's support in pursuing that objective.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

The crisis in cash flow is right now. When can the farmers expect some payment, either by payment for cash in the bin or deficiency payment for crops that will be sold to the Wheat Board later on? When can they expect some cash in hand?

I know the Saskatchewan election is on hold. Does that—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has put his question. Does the minister wish to reply?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the federal government did provide some $500 million in the form of an emergency payment, which I understand is still in the process of being distributed, so there are funds that are being distributed right now.

I can only say to him as well that had the provinces matched that contribution on a dollar-for-dollar basis, it would have certainly covered a much broader range to meet the current situation in which we find ourselves in western Canada.

I can only assure the hon. member that I am very much aware of the current situation. We are working at it, and I will certainly keep him informed as to the success of the discussions that are taking place.

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Last week, the Minister of Finance practically admitted Canada was again on the brink of a recession. I have the following question for the Prime Minister. Since according to the Economic Council of Canada, the GST will aggravate the so-called slowdown or recession we are seeing now in Canada, is the Prime Minister prepared to join the members of the Senate of this country who want to kill the GST?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member forgot to mention, and her party certainly has not mentioned it either, that the GST has some very definite advantages—I am thinking of the role it will play in enhancing our exports—and will help inject into the Canadian economy $9 billion worth of additional activities in the course of one year. That is something we should not forget.

Meanwhile, I may add that our policies are working if we consider that during the last few weeks and months there has been a gradual drop in interest rates. We find this very reassuring.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, maybe the minister has not heard the predictions of the Economic Council of Canada, but the Economic Council of Canada is predicting that there will be a 2 per cent inflationary result caused by the GST. Eighty per cent of Canadians know that the Liberal senators are right when they say "kill the GST".

Will the Prime Minister either relieve the Minister of Finance of his obsession with the GST or will he admit that the Canadian people are right, that the respect of Parliament lies in making sure the wishes of the Canadian people are met, and will the Prime Minister show some leadership and kill the GST?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend raises very important questions about the structural problems in the Canadian economy.

A statement was made, and I quote it to my hon. friend: "It worries me that serious structural problems have been identified in the manufacturers' sales tax. To name just a few, in some cases its burden falls less heavily upon imported goods than on domestic goods. It falls unevenly upon competing goods which are marketed at different trade levels. It does not currently permit a meaningful appeal system. These problem areas in the law cannot be tolerated indefinitely—Before long, I will have to assess the merits of all opinions and make a decision on the best course for the government to follow."

That was a statement by the Minister of Finance, Jean Chrétien, on November 22, 1977.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Hundreds of people in my riding have rearranged their lives and disrupted their families to upgrade themselves by taking advantage of the new training programs offered by Bill C–21, only to have their hopes and dreams dashed by the refusal to pass the bill in the other place. They have made their grandstand play but my people are suffering.

My question is: What can regular people do to get access to these programs that they need so much? When can we expect the other place to appreciate the real heartache and disappointment experienced by my constituents and pass Bill C–21?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear that someone is taking an interest in something that is of great concern not just to members of the hon. member's constituency but to Canadians across Canada.

There is considerable difficulty for people who do not meet the current entrance requirements, for young parents having new families without qualifying for the new parental benefits, and for unemployed workers who are seeking training.

The minister of social services in Newfoundland has said publicly that he would like to see Bill C–21 passed through the Senate, and in a recent letter the chairman of the Saskatchewan Indian Training Assessment Group calls for the Senate to pass Bill C–21 so that we can provide relief to the hon. member's constituents and to many other Canadians.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and it concerns the agreement that was to be concluded by the Quebec government and the federal government in this area.

Press reports indicated this summer that we could very shortly expect an agreement to be concluded that would transfer most federal powers and responsibilities with respect to immigration to the Government of Quebec.

However, in an article that appeared recently in Le Devoir, we read that the negotiations had fallen through. Now for my question.

What is the status of these negotiations now? Are they deadlocked? If so why?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, negotiations with the provinces on immigration were part of the Meech Lake Accord. Of course, we have had the Cullen–Couture Agreement since 1976, and there are also other agreements with the other provinces. If there is any change in this situation involving Canada and Quebec or the other provinces, I will inform the House immediately.

ENERGY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it relates to recent sharp increases in oil prices at the pumps in practically all Canadian cities.

The minister knows full well that there is no real market to regulate those prices. And he knows as well that the higher–priced oil resulting from the Gulf crisis has not yet arrived in Canada. Given those facts, does the minister feel that the increases are justified?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, concerning the prices at the pumps presently, I remind the hon. member that in the last quarter of 1988 and the first quarter of 1989, the price of oil per barrel western WTI was $15 on average.

If one takes a look at the price of oil before the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, the average price in Canada as well as worldwide for WTI was about $20. Prior to August 2 the benchmark was around $21 to $23.

The Government of Canada moved away from the National Energy Program which did not keep prices down and moved toward a market orientation. If the hon. member looks at the price at the pumps he will see the increased cost of energy from the first quarter of 1989 to prior to August 2.

POINT OF ORDER

TABLING OF LETTER

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, during Question Period I read extracts from a letter I had written on June 28, 1990 to the Grand Chief and Council of the Mohawks of Kanesatake and to the Mayor and Council of the village of Oka.

I would like to table the letter, if it be the House will, for the record.

REMARKS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a point of order. I see the Minister of Justice in the House and I would ask her, if she has the chance, to pay attention to the point of order.

During the course of Question Period the Prime Minister, in answer to a question, talked about the murder of an officer of the Sûreté du Québec. Later he clarified, after some heckling, that the officer was killed in the line of duty. He then went on to say that we must respect the rule of law. The greatest respect of the rule of law means getting a fair trial. In my view, there is the possibility of jeopardizing fair trials for people in the Oka situation.

I think it is very dangerous and out of order for the Prime Minister to use terms like this. He should have learned from the Douglas Small case. He is going to inflame the situation further in Oka and that is the last thing we need.

I ask the Speaker to rule on this matter and to warn the Prime Minister and other members in this House that we cannot use terms like this when there are probably going to be trials arising from this situation.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. During Question Period the Prime Minister referred to the killing as a murder. In effect, he is pre-judging the death of that particular police officer was caused deliberately, and is a breach of the Criminal Code of Canada.

As the Prime Minister of Canada, it is inappropriate—

Mr. Marchi: Who are you, God?

Mr. Nunziata: —and would be tantamount to an obstruction of justice to pre-judge an activity that has not been investigated yet.

I would ask, Madam Speaker, that you direct the Prime Minister of Canada to indicate to the House what evidence he has to suggest that a criminal act took place and, if he has no evidence that there was a breach of the—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think both hon. members are now getting into debate. At a later occasion they may want to ask questions of the Prime Minister. He is not here at the moment so I really cannot see that this would be a point of order even though the hon. member may have a very valid point.

It is not for me to judge but it is certainly not a point of order.

On a different point, the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Justice is in the House today and she is responsible for the administration of justice in this particular case.

I would like the minister to stand up and indicate to the Parliament of Canada what the status of—

Some hon. members: Order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is the same point of order really, just put in a different way. This is a question that certainly could be put to the Minister of Justice during the next Question Period.

Mr. Waddell: Point of order, Madam Speaker. I am not going to reiterate the argument, but I think we are entitled to a ruling. Either we have a point of order or we do not have a point of order. If the Deputy Speaker wishes to reserve on the point I have no objection to that but I would like to hear the Speaker of the House comment with respect—

Mr. Andre: Order, order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Deputy Speaker does not wish to reserve on this. This is not a point of order. I do not see under what rule or regulation of the House the hon. member would put his point of order now. This is not a point of order and I cannot accept it as such.

Point of privilege, the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: You have ruled and I accept your ruling that it is not a point of order. I would like to raise it as a point of privilege and if the Speaker is not in a position to rule today, to defer judgment. I am required—

An hon. member: Get on with it.

Mr. Nunziata: If you would keep your yap shut and listen a moment—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It is impossible for the Speaker even to hear what a member is saying in the House and I would be very grateful if all members allowed me the possibility to hear. It would then be much easier to make a ruling of any kind. The hon. member.

Mr. Nunziata: I am suggesting to you that my privileges and the privileges of each member in the House have been affected by the comments of the Prime Minister.

During Question Period, the Prime Minister referred to the death of a police officer earlier this summer as a murder—

Mr. Andre: Shut up, for crying out loud.

Mr. Nunziata: Murder is clearly defined in the Criminal Code of Canada.

Mr. Andre: Finally, after five minutes.

An hon. member: Zip it up, Harvie.

Mr. Nunziata: The Prime Minister, by referring to the death as a murder, in effect has pre-judged the criminal investigation into this particular death. Charges might very well be laid in this particular incident.

Here we have the Prime Minister of Canada already concluding that in fact the Criminal Code of Canada has been breached, that a murder took place. The privilege is—would you like to listen?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, we are elected representatives in this House. It is essential as a very basic fundamental principle of our criminal justice system that individuals are presumed innocent until proven guilty by a court of law.

It is also a fundamental principle of democracy in the administration of justice that politicians, and especially the Prime Minister of Canada, not in any way affect the fairness of the trial—

• (1510)

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for York South—Weston has now changed what we thought earlier was a point of order into a question of privilege. Even though the hon. member may have a valid grievance, I cannot see how this does anything against his privileges as a member. This is not a question of privilege and I must rule it not receivable at this time.

A point of order, the hon. member.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I had wanted to make a submission on your ruling on the presumption of innocence affecting us here as a point of privilege, but you have made the ruling and I am therefore not entitled to do so.

However, on a point of order, I really do not like and I object strongly to watching the Government House Leader, who does not get up and speak but screams and appears to be directing the Chair. That is not the way the House of Commons should work and the Chair should not accept that. If he wants to get up and speak and make a point, he should get up and speak like we do.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member will realize that with the amount of noise there is in the House right now that the only person that the Speaker can hear through the earphone is the person in front of whom there is a microphone. All I hear, except for the person who really has the floor, is a lot of noise.

I have a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I think it is very clear that a point of order or a point of privilege is not to be used as a vehicle for debate. We have now listened for something like 12 minutes to various points of order, various points of privilege which are essentially nothing more than a thinly disguised debate.

The leader of the NDP finished her remarks at about one o'clock and there was to be a period of questions and comments. All of us are interested in that 10-minute time frame. Why do we not get on with it?

Madam Deputy Speaker: A point of order, the hon. member.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I think I am entitled to reply to that point of order. The Prime Minister mentioned a murder of a police officer which is—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

An hon. member: That is not a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair has listened very attentively to the points made by the hon. member, by the hon. member for York South—Weston and by the parliamentary secretary as the Speaker should. I think it is now time that we returned to the business of the House.

A point of privilege, the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, with the greatest respect, you just indicated that I had had an opportunity to present my case, but it was the Government House Leader continuing to heckle which caused you to rise. I had not finished my submissions with respect to my point of privilege. You proceeded to rule on the point of privilege without me completing my submissions, without hearing from other hon. members that might want to make submissions on the same point.

It is an important point of privilege when the Prime Minister of Canada calls an action a criminal action. We would have thought that the Prime Minister would have learned when he called the Doug Small actions criminal. It is important to the administration of justice in this country that the Prime Minister withdraw his comments that a murder took place. It is up to a criminal court of law to determine and conclude that—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that the Government House Leader making any kind of remark would not cause me to rise or stop any member from expressing his or her views. The hon. member went from a point of order which was ruled not a point of order into the same point making it a point of privilege and that is not acceptable either. This is the only I interrupted the hon. member.

SITUATION AT OKA AND CHÂTEAUGUAY

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Siddon (p. 13271).

Madam Deputy Speaker: When the House rose at one o'clock, the hon. member for Yukon had completed her speech. The question and comment period following the hon. member's speech is now available to members. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg South.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, we are back to the very important business of the day. Prior to the recess, we listened to the hon. Leader of the NDP make a very important intervention. I was very interested to hear what she had to say.

I know that the hon. member has a great concern for people of native extraction, Indians and Inuit, many of whom live in her riding, and I know she has a very deep and underlying concern about the condition of these people. She mentioned a lot in her talk about justice and fair play in Canada, and I heard that with a great deal of sympathy, as I am sure many other Canadians did as well.

The hon. member talked about how Canadians view themselves and this very special idea that we have about what we are like. We are tolerant, fine, fair-minded people who have a sense of social justice, who want to reach out to help their neighbours and each other. We certainly want to deal with the many injustices that we both feel Indian people have suffered over the centuries, certainly in the 120-odd years of Confederation.

The hon. member also pointed out that Canadians view themselves as a peace loving people. There was some dichotomy in what I heard because, if we are a peace loving society, how can we then assume that might is right and that he who carries a gun somehow has the moral authority to command special attention? Yet, the hon. member was espousing that very idea. If someone has a weapon combined with a just cause, that somehow gives him or her some special authority to get attention that we would normally not accord to anybody in our society who took up arms against any other sector or segment of society.

Is the hon. member saying that when anybody wheels a gun, he or she deserves special consideration for his or her particular interest? Does this mean that anybody who feels he or she has a just cause can take up arms and then get some sort of special consideration? Should we sit down and negotiate the terms of the particular problem that that interest group might have at the point of a gun? If that is so, I find it difficult to put together in my mind with what the hon. member said about the just society, the way Canadians see themselves and how we deal with the perception, even internationally, that other people have of us.

It seems to me that there are many peace loving, law biding Mohawks and other Indians out there who do not condone the use of guns. In fact, Mohawk warriors are hiding behind the very legitimate concerns of the Indian people in the rest of Canada.

How does the hon. member condone the use of force and the use of guns? Does she believe that people who pick up arms should be given food because he or she points a gun in a certain direction? I wonder if the hon. member condones the use of guns.

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, no, I have never condoned the use of guns. It is for that reason that I did not support the actions of the Sûreté du Québec when it went in in a very violent way and, sadly, a young Canadian lost his life over this.

The hon. member across the way referred to these people, the aboriginal people. These people are Canadians and we cannot lose sight of this. Not only are they the people who the previous speaker refers to as "these people", but they are the first people of this country. There are many treaties that have not been honoured.

No, I do not condone the use of violence. I support Elijah Harper who has said that aboriginal people speak loudest when they speak with peace. No, I do not condone the actions of others who have also undertaken violent actions against aboriginal people, or indeed when aboriginal people do the same thing. But we cannot avoid a discussion of the root causes of this issue simply by focusing on it and talking only about guns.

We are avoiding the issue of aboriginal rights and the acceptance of aboriginal rights in this country. By dealing only with the issue of guns and by pointing out that it is necessary to deal with the historical obligations of Canada and the historical and constitutional justice of aboriginal rights that are in our Constitution, and, indeed, rights to self-government that reports commissioned by the House have developed, we are simply avoiding the root issue.

No, I do not condone the use of violence. But I do not condone it by residents of Châteauguay, I do not condone it by the Mohawks, I do not condone it by the police, and I do not condone it by the army. The member across the way, of all people, should think that there is a different way to do things. Why do we always have to use the old way and, if I dare say, the macho way? Maybe it is time we started to sit down to negotiate and to deal with some of these issues properly.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, my question for the Leader of the New Democratic Party is one that concerns not only this issue, but a larger issue of which this is a microcosm, that is, the disrespect for the political process that we have seen this summer.

We have seen the abdication of political responsibility at both the federal and provincial level. As a leader of a major political party in Canada, how does she see this tragedy?

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands raises a very good point. It really is not the time to point blame at one group or another, but to look at what we are going to do collectively using good common sense in the House so that we are never faced with this kind of debate again. Is this not what we should be doing?

If the government had had respect for all of the members of the House, they would have recalled the House this summer to discuss the situation. This is an extraordinary situation. None of the aspects of the situation are happy, not for Quebecers, not for Canadians, and not for aboriginal people. It is not a situation we all wanted, but surely it was a time for the government to show leadership and to recall Parliament so that everyone in the House could offer their solutions for this crisis.

The kind of leadership needed in the country is leadership that listens to all the solutions. We cannot afford any more to only look at things from one perspective. If we have learned anything this summer, surely we must have learned that it is necessary to listen to all the voices in Canada. There are very legitimate concerns in Quebec after the failure of the Meech Lake Accord. There are very legitimate concerns of aboriginal people. There are very legitimate concerns of the people who, as we did in the debate yesterday, raised questions about our role in the Middle East.

Surely, it is the time to show some real statesperson-ship, to have people together to debate and discuss these issues. It takes everyone. Real leadership and government that cares about Canadians to ensure that that takes place.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the citizens of a region of my riding, particularly the residents of Oka–Kanesatake, Saint–Placide and Saint–Benoît, have lived through a summer of fear and terror. The nightmarish nights of women and children who were ordered out of their houses at gun point by masked Warriors on July 11, 1990 is an image which these peaceful people will never forget.

This is why I thank the House for this opportunity to express what I have been living through since 1984, and to shed some light on incidents of which members and Canadians alike have a right to be aware.

I was told during the 1984 election campaign that native people did not vote. At the time the chiefs asked me to leave Kanesatake. I was surprised because I believed that native people were Canadians like all others and that they ought to exercise their right to vote.

After the elections I had many meetings with the residents of this Mohawk community who did not agree with the system under which the chiefs and the grand chief are elected by the clan mothers. Next came the compilation of duly signed petitions from 85 per cent of the people of Kanesatake urging the government to intervene.

In 1987 we asked for a referendum and the case was referred to the courts by then chief Alex Montour. The case is still pending and should be heard in the near future.

Right now, Madam Speaker, however well–intentioned, nobody—Conservative, Liberal, New Democrat, it does not matter—can negotiate with the Kanesatake Mohawk community. I would suggest there are too many chiefs and not enough Indians.

Six chiefs have held power since 1984. Only the highly–paid lawyers are interested in maintaining the existing system. The Mohawks must change this practice, for their future in Oka depends on it. Moderate Mohawks want to elect their leaders—I am talking on behalf of 85 per cent of the people of Kanesatake—for a term of at least three years and achieve the kind of political stability which, we are sure, will lead to economic stability. I agree with them and I am behind them all the way.

The government will have to deal with me if it seeks to negotiate the after–crisis and the land claim settlement within the current system and with chief George Martin who left his people in the dark when he fled from the reserve during the hostilities. He no longer speaks for the majority of his people. Perhaps I will antagonize some, but I certainly urge him to resign.

I urge the clan mothers not to insult their people by appointing another chief; the next chief has to be elected by the band majority, for only then will they have a strong voice which will make it possible for the government to settle the issue and bring the prosperity which the people of Kanesatake deserve and to which they are entitled.

I think that the unbelievable crisis we are experiencing could have been avoided. Tensions have gone up a few notches since the incident at the treatment centre where the Warriors are holed up. I hope the centre will not be ransacked as were the homes of white people, I hope they have enough honour left to restore the building to its original condition so that native people who suffer from alcoholism may be treated. The centre had been the subject of controversy and we had to resort to various measures to make sure it would be built.

Then Jean-Roch Simon, a Kanesatake Indian who lives in the village and who has no use for municipal by-laws, decided he would build an eight-unit apartment building on his federal land. That is one of the problems at Oka. It is like a checkerboard, Madam Speaker, white land next to native land, and that makes for shaky relations between the two communities. And now we have all heard about the famous golf course. Does that case give a handful of armed warriors the right to hold a whole population hostage?

In passing, I might say that women and children who are victims of violence would be quite justified to ask the armed dissidents to protect them against their violent mates who seek them out in shelter homes. We are the laughing stock and this charade has lasted long enough! We must take drastic measures if that is the only way to force the fifteen-odd Warriors out of the centre so they will face Canadian courts.

Madam Speaker, after the Akwesasne incidents of last May I personally told the authorities and my caucus that the ongoing crisis out there was nothing compared to what was brewing in Oka. Arms have been piling up in Oka since last April. A couple of Warriors used their guns to intimidate ordinary citizens. There have been many blunders. I will mention first of all the hasty statements which Mr. Caccia made at the very beginning and which were challenged by the municipal authorities. I am not here to say whether the municipality was right or wrong concerning the golf course affair. Mayor Jean Ouellet did not nothing but carry out an injunction from the Superior Court ordering these Warriors not to block a public road.

At the time, Sam Elkas, the Quebec Minister of Public Safety, stated that he would not send the Sûreté du Québec to act as cowboys in Oka. Well, on July 11, 1990, he sent the members of his Sûreté to behave like Rambos, with the tragic consequences we all know.

Yves Désilets, a Federal negotiator, was sent to convince the Warriors to lay down their arms. The negotiation process he used at the time was wrong. I can really say objectively that this man was both arrogant and incompetent. I can understand that he may have been tired, but that is no reason for being incompetent, and he should have resigned at the very beginning and asked the Department to appoint somebody else to replace him. An investigation will show clearly the decisive influence he had, because the citizens from Oka got together as a group to defend their rights. It should be said also that the Kanesatake Mohawk people did not find in Mr. Désilets a worthwhile negotiator.

The whole staff of the Quebec Department of Indian Affairs should be fired and replace with new blood to manage the after crisis. Madam Speaker, how could we compensate our fellow citizens whose houses were broken in, wrecked and spattered with human feces and especially the older people who suffered enormously? Moreover, in their statements, the leaders of human right associations never mentioned the hard times the white people and the moderate Mohawks lived through behind the barricades. For the media, only the Warriors existed! I denounce misinformation. Has this been said? People should know that during the crisis, some reporters went swimming in the swimming pool of one of the evacuated citizens. That is unacceptable, Madam Speaker! The right of property was seriously infringed upon. How do you think the people in my region feel towards these Warriors? They call them savages! These people who ruined the reputation of the Mohawk nation should be damned! Canada and the rest of the world were in a state of shock when they heard that a man with a single semi-automatic rifle had terrorized and killed a group of young women at the Montreal Polytechnical School. In contrast, these Warriors with an enormous quantity of scary weapons were allowed to roam as they pleased. Yes, the Army did a magnificent job. They should have been sent for at the very beginning. Such an action would have spared millions of dollars which could have been spent improving the quality of life for the Mohawks in Kanesatake and the white people in the area.

Madam Speaker, I must admit I was filled with shame when the Ministers signed an agreement in the presence of an armed Warrior. I was also humiliated when some white people stoned Mohawks who were leaving the Kanhawake reserve and when Mohawks stoned soldiers who had been ordered not to reply in kind. I am proud of our soldier's sense of duty, self-control and proper behaviour. This crisis has at least made it possible for us to know the Canadian Army better.

Madam Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party mentioned a while ago a seven year old Mohawk boy who, following the crisis, was looking at a white reporter with hatred in his eyes. I can tell her that I saw the same hatred in the eyes of white boys looking at Mohawks. How unfair this is!

I have no objection to the setting-up of a Parliamentary Commission which the two Opposition Parties are seeking to look into the Oka and Kanetasake events to make sure that they will never happen again and that the guilty people will pay. I want to remind the House that a Royal Commission would help shed light on all the claims made by Indians in Canada to see whether or not they are realistic and reasonable.

Finally, I want to give the people in my riding the assurance that we will do everything that is necessary to restore a climate of trust in Oka-Kahnesatake. To do this, everyone will have to give a little. I want to say to those fifty or so people who do not want to go back to their homes that they will get all the attention and compassion they deserve. There will be a special project for the entire region which has already been proposed by the Regional Municipality of Deux Montagnes and I am sure it will be endorsed by the new leaders in Kahnesatake.

People who will not be eligible for unemployment insurance this winter because they simply were unable to work will receive special attention from the government.

The Mohawks must redefine their relationship to the Warrior society. The Mohawks must choose their leaders and put an end to fruitless discussion. The white community must negotiate with them to decide on the territory they are to have, so that peace and harmony will return to this area. Stop the scare tactics and decide once and for all: a reserve or no reserve! The talks should be public. White people and Mohawks should discuss their future together and do so in public. In Oka-Kahnesatake the situation is different because it is not a reserve and because these two communities have been living together, are living together now and will have to live together in the future.

We will have to investigate the role played by reporters. I feel that instead of informing the public, they often helped to increase tension. There should be an inquiry into the proliferation of arms in reserves, and we must find out why the Canadian Security Intelligence Service was unable to inform the authorities in time of these stores of weapons in Akwesasne, Kahnawake and Kahnesatake. The Quebec and Canadian departments must find a way to either act as one or at least agree on policy in order to avoid duplication and confusion in native affairs in Quebec.

Although he signed the document in Oka it was probably a trap, Madam Speaker—in the presence of armed warriors, I would like to congratulate Minister Tom Siddon who in spite of everything, and as Minister of Indian Affairs during a very difficult and unusual period, stood firm before the native leaders when he denounced violence and the use of weapons.

Madam Speaker, there will have to be a lot of love and friendship on both sides if we are to restore the trust and respect the two communities have always enjoyed in Oka-Kahnesatake. We must make sure that Canada will never again have another crisis like the one experienced by the moderate Mohawks, and this is very important, Madam Speaker, because in Kahnesatake there is a serious leadership problem. For six years we have been unable to negotiate what they were entitled to, which was a more uniform territory. Every time we were close to an agreement, they changed chiefs. Of course, the Mohawks could say that we on this side changed ministers of Indian Affairs, and they would be right.

The fact remains that it is a very difficult situation, because the Mohawk community in Kahnesatake no longer recognizes its present leaders, and the community insists there should be a referendum on the electoral process. Only after a referendum is held and proper elections have taken place—this is not what I want but what they are asking— I say we must ensure this request gets the attention it deserves because we will never be able to negotiate any kind of agreement or settlement that will restore peace to Oka-Kahnesatake unless Mohawks and White people can talk to each other and sign lasting agreements, Madam Speaker.

On the weekend, Chief Martin who was outside—these are moderate Mohawks who signed an agreement with the Quebec Provincial Police to have native people act as security officers. The next day, the agreement was defeated by other Indians by a vote of 45 to 42.

So you see, Madam Speaker, this is a very divided community, and so it is very difficult, almost impossible to conclude agreements. That is why I want to say to our various governments, to my own Prime Minister and the Minister of Indian Affairs and to the Premier of Quebec and Mr. Ciaccia, Minister of Native Affairs and to the Minister of Public Safety that as soon as there is a surrender in Oka, involving the Warriors, and as soon as peace is restored, a referendum must be held before we start negotiations that will ensure that, in the future, Mohawks and white people will continue to live together and that fairness and justice will prevail.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity to thank all members for speaking to this very complicated and very sensitive issue.

I would like to ask the hon. member her view as to a body of opinion from Queen's University, a group of 20 scholars headed by Richard Spaulding and the Dean of Law, John Whyte, who indicate three points.

"(1) That there are legal arguments in favour of the Mohawk's assertion that their aboriginal and treaty rights entitle them to exclusive policing authority over Mohawk people.

The 1664 Treaty of Fort Albany under which the Mohawks first confirmed their relationship with the British Crown contains specific undertakings on this question.

(2) The actions of the federal and provincial governments and of the agents acting under their authority are unconstitutional if they interfere with aboriginal or treaty rights and cannot be justified on the basis of both the purposes they serve and the methods they employ. (See the Crown v. Sparrow).

(3) Governments bear the burden of persuading the courts that actions which violate aboriginal or treaty rights are justified. Statements that the rule of law must be applied or that there is only one law for all "Canadians" will not suffice as legal justifications for actions which infringe on aboriginal or treaty rights".

These are comments that came from Queen's University. Since these people do not vote, how does the member feel about representing these people who believe they are sovereign and should be dealt with on a nation-to-nation basis?

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member's question would be best answered by a royal commission of inquiry that would establish once and for all how Canada's native community should live with a new situation that has developed as a result of land claims. I think 20 academics— she mentioned 20 scholars from Queen's. Perhaps 20 scholars from the University of Montreal would have a different opinion. That is the problem, and I am convinced that these matters should be dealt with by a royal commission of inquiry, and I am sure that is what the hon. member wants as well.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I was listening to the comments made by the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau who is also a Parliamentary Secretary, and I must say it is very disturbing for a member to hear an admission of defeat from a colleague who is sensitive to the needs of her riding.

During the past few weeks, I heard the hon. member being interviewed on the radio. In fact, she was trying to warn her government through the media, since the House was not sitting. Today, I find it very disturbing to hear a government member say the army should have been there from the very beginning, that she was ashamed of her ministers, that heads must roll and that people don't understand what happened, and especially when we realize that for quite some time the hon. member had been raising these concerns with her government. Today, the hon. member had to rise in the House and practically apologize for the fact that her government had ignored a situation she had most certainly brought to the attention of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development—in an interview I heard her say she had been after the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, day after day to tell him that a crisis was brewing in this area. That is the very essence of Parliament. Today, we see a member who despite her convictions and arguments was unable to get the government to act, and who now has to admit defeat.

Madam Speaker, I think that today's debate has borne out the hon. member's concerns. I want to say to the hon. member that we heard her this summer, and that when she said it would take a lot of love and friendship, we knew she must have spent her entire vacation working on this problem. I want to say to the hon. member that if her government had shown the same sensitivity to these issues, there would have been no crisis.

While applauding the hon. member's efforts, I also want to tell this government it is a disgrace that the local member should have to come before the House today with this admission of defeat.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, of course everybody in my riding, like all Canadians, felt it was disgraceful for ministers and a Quebec Superior Court judge to sign an agreement with a masked and armed person. I am only echoing what I have been hearing all summer. That image is imprinted in the minds of my constituents and in that of all Canadians, I am sure.

Madam Speaker, I say this, but I believe I also mentioned having been fully consulted by the Minister of Indian Affairs through the course of the summer. I was in constant contact with him through the phone. He never expected, as no one would have, the day would come when fifteen or so people would make a whole nation shake at gunpoint and could hold out against the Quebec Police Force and even the Canadian Army.

What I have said is that the time to act was in early April, when there were only two or three armed Warriors. Then was the time to prevent the situation from deteriorating and turn into a national or international conflict, as it turned out, over a golf course. That is absolutely incredible!

However, I want to assure the member that the government has always considered Indians to be peace-loving people and still does. But the government never expected that there would be such people among the Indians, and among the Canadian population for that matter—We have seen Hell's Angels with guns too. Let's face it, the White people are not faultless!

An hon. member: But they were apprehended!

Mrs. Bourgault: That's right, they were apprehended. So, Madam Speaker, the minister never expected, and neither did the government, that the Warriors would pursue their action and that the native leaders would keep almost condoning there use of guns.

[English]

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the government member.

I too am appalled at the use of arms to try to resolve situations, but what are native people to do when as young natives they are facing a 60 per cent to 70 per cent unemployment rate and they are not even acknowledged in the Constitution as being a founding people? It should come as no surprise that some native people have resorted to violence. The real surprise is that it has not happened sooner.

I would like to ask the member who represents this area what her thoughts were when the Prime Minister was selecting cabinet ministers. Four cabinet ministers have been replaced in the last six years in the Department of Indian Affairs which represents natives from all across Canada. To have a government majority of this size and to have to change ministers four times in five years shows the priorities of this government. Did the hon. member speak out against that and for a stronger selection of representation for the native people?

Madam Deputy Speaker: A brief comment from the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): At the outset, may I say it must feel quite safe, in circumstances as complex and unbelievable as the ones we have lived through, to be sitting on the opposition benches.

Madam Speaker, Mohawks and other aboriginal people in Canada most certainly have other means of pressuring the government than calling upon the Warriors society. There are other peaceful means which would be quite as effective.

In that regard, I must congratulate the hon. member, although I disapprove of his action in killing the Meech Lake Accord which would have finally allowed the premiers to hold a constitutional conference on aboriginal rights. I will never forgive him for killing the Meech Lake Accord, but on the other hand, he was the first to declare that the use of violence by aboriginal people was wrong and should be condemned.

There are all kinds of pressure tactics other than arms.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time allocated for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Nunatsiaq.

[English]

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I would just like to make a short comment. I believe I just heard the hon. member saying that she will never forgive—and I do not know who she meant—somebody for the failure of Meech Lake. Is it the aboriginal people?

However, I would now like to begin my speech. It is with great sadness and disappointment that I rise to speak on the motion of the government regarding the Oka crisis. How can the hon. minister move a motion commending the army when the standoff is still in progress, when Parliament does not yet have all the facts and when things still may happen? It is like jumping before looking.

I would also like to comment on some things that have been mentioned by hon. members across the way about how heavy the Mohawk artillery is. We have to make it quite clear that never have we said at any point that we condone violence. However, I would just like to point out that various members from the government side have referred to the arms, the arsenal, or the artillery in the Mohawk camp.

While this may be true, it does not excuse the fact that the army moved in with tanks, with machine guns, and with I do not know what else—with more arms—but it moved in with 3,000 to 4,000 army personnel against a group of something in the neighbourhood of 50 Mohawks, of which a number were warriors. I would say that is overkill. It is like sending the three frigates that we just sent over to the Persian Gulf against a canoe or a kayak.

It is important for everyone in this debate to rise above the actions of particular individuals and to focus on the broad issues which underlie this summer's tragedy. We risk missing the forest for the trees if we do not focus on principles.

Throughout this crisis Canadians have experienced a range of emotional highs and lows—shock, horror, disbelief, sympathy, compassion, anger, confusion, fear, sadness, frustration, helplessness, et cetera. I feel in particular for the children of this dispute, those who have been trapped in it from the beginning physically and emotionally, but also for all Canadian children who have seen or heard the events. What legacy is this crisis leaving them? What memories of fear, sorrow and horror have been inflicted upon them? What emotional scars will they carry with them for the rest of their lives? Surely it is obvious that once again history has repeated itself and the sins of the fathers are being visited upon the children. As the innocent world of these children has been shattered, so too has the Canadian innocence been lost. Canadians have witnessed ugly episodes of racism and hatred. We have seen a dark side of this country that we wish we had never seen and we will never be the same for it.

This is a complex situation. This is a unique situation. It cannot be seen in terms of black and white. There are many grey areas which I believe most Canadians sense intuitively. Certain means and methods may be condemned, but we cannot deny the justness of the cause.

That is why I have problems with this government's resolution. Canadians have experienced a summer of sorrow. Canadians have suffered throughout this ordeal. Canadians have been hurt. Canadians feel betrayed by their governments and they know they deserve better.

The government's motion, however, shows that it does not understand these emotions. The motion shows that the government does not understand the issues confronting it or the people it is dealing with. This government's approach is simplistic. It is one sided. It is misleading. It is not conducive to a positive and just resolution of the issues involved.

We all want this crisis resolved peacefully and with good will. The Armed Forces at Kanesatake and Kahnawake should not be there. The families of these soldiers should not be in the positions they are in now of worrying about their husbands, fathers, sons, and brothers or sisters. The people in Kahnawake and Kanesatake and Oka should not be in the positions they are in now of worrying about their families. All Canadians should not be in the positions they have been put in of worrying about the safety of all involved and praying for no loss of life.

It has been said before, many times this summer, but it needs repeating: it should never have come to this. This crisis should not have occurred.

I want to express my deep regret and sorrow, as well as that of the rest of the members of the House of Commons, over the death of Corporal Lemay. All Canadians and all aboriginal people regret this unnecessary loss of life.

At times this crisis has seemed unreal: a nightmare. How many times did Canadians ask themselves: "Can this really be happening? Is this Canada? What has happened to us? What went wrong?"

These are questions we will be asking for a long time. The answers will not be easily arrived at. We will have to search within ourselves and not be afraid of what we may find in either our past or our present. This we must do if we want a future in which such a situation will never happen again.

Federal government ministers have made much in recent weeks of the necessity of having the rule of law apply and the government's resolution today says the laws of Canada must apply on all Canadian territory. While on the surface this is all very well and good, the government's definition and interpretation of the law is very selective.

Basic freedoms in this country—freedom of association, freedom of communication, freedom of movement, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press—are being violated in Kanesatake as we speak, but the government does nothing about these violations. It is, therefore, truly hypocritical for politicians to accuse aboriginal people of being selective about which laws apply to them. These politicians are truly speaking with forked tongues.

In addition to permitting violations of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the government does not tell the Canadian people about the obligations it has toward aboriginal people which it is ignoring. It does not tell the Canadian people that it is in violation of its own laws all across the country when it comes to aboriginal people. The government's motion does not tell the Canadian people that Indian lands already have a unique status in this country.

Provincial laws do not apply on Indian lands and there are existing arrangements within this country where some federal laws do not apply to some Indian land. In addition, recent court decisions have thrown into question the application of certain other federal laws such as federal fish and game laws to Indian people.

The Constitution of Canada, the highest law of this land, recognizes and affirms aboriginal and treaty rights. This is not an empty affirmation. The past week the weight of the the highest court of this land, the Supreme Court of Canada, in a recent case known as the Sparrow case, confirmed that aboriginal and treaty rights have significant and contemporary meaning.

The court also issued a set of guidelines to the government on how it should conduct itself in its relations with aboriginal people. The court confirmed that the relationship of the federal government to aboriginal people is fiduciary—it is a trust relationship. The federal government has a constitutional obligation to protect aboriginal rights and interests, it said, and furthermore the government is obliged to justify any regulation, law or action which infringes upon and denies aboriginal rights.

The court said that the honour of the Crown is at stake in all of its dealings with aboriginal people. The special trust relationship and the responsibility of the government to aboriginal people must be the first consideration in assessing federal actions.

The Supreme Court has served notice to the federal government. The federal government is in breach of trust if it does not protect aboriginal rights from unjustified interference and infringement.

I suggest that the government has breached that trust and has failed the Supreme Court's test on numerous occasions since it took office. The tragedy of Oka is simply the most recent and glaring example of government failure.

Throughout this country, aboriginal rights have been, and continue to be, ignored and trampled upon. Justice has been delayed and denied, over and over again. Lands claimed by aboriginal people continue to be alienated by the government even while negotiations are proceeding. Exploration and development rights have been issued by the government to private companies on the traditional lands of aboriginal people with whom settlements have never been reached. Logging, mining, and other forms of resource development are allowed to continue on lands which still belong to aboriginal people.

Towns and cities have been built upon lands which have never been given up by aboriginal people. On the prairies many Indian bands are still owed lands that were promised to them a hundred years ago in treaties they signed. For over a hundred years these people have waited for what is rightfully theirs and they still do not have what was promised to them and are legally entitled to.

Across Canada aboriginal people continue to be harassed in the exercise of their aboriginal hunting, fishing, and trapping rights, despite court decisions in their favour, and the recognition of those rights in the Constitution of Canada.

When the 1987 constitutional conference on aboriginal rights failed, this federal government refused to re-establish aboriginal constitutional negotiations. In fact the Prime Minister shut down the 1987 conference several hours before it was scheduled to end. He threw up his hands and walked away from the table and then his government cut off constitutional funding to the aboriginal organizations.

As well it is this government that cut back post-secondary education funding for aboriginal students and denied native students the opportunity to pursue a higher education because the budget was capped.

It is this government which terminated funding to aboriginal communications societies and political organizations. It is this government which decided to increase the freight rates on food items shipped to northern and remote communities and now northern people are paying almost $6 for one litre of milk.

All this happened under the Prime Minister who, in a public statement in April 1985, said that the special relationship between Canada and the aboriginal peoples should be strengthened. Aboriginal rights, especially the right of self-government, he said, should have constitutional protections.

The same Prime Minister went on to say that the current funding levels of programs designed to correct the serious inequities which exist for native people and native communities will be maintained. He added that policies regarding aboriginal people will be made after open, public consultation, especially at the grassroots level.

Is it any wonder that aboriginal people are frustrated and angry? Aboriginal people have seen their traditional lands and resources alienated; given away and sold without their consent and without, for the most part, any benefit to them. When there are some benefits, they are minimal and given grudgingly and only because the aboriginal people fought hard for them.

The land claims process in this country is not working well. The current comprehensive claims policy requires aboriginal people to extinguish their rights. The current policy does not allow for constitutional protection of self-government. How can the government justify requiring aboriginal people to extinguish their rights which, since 1982, have been recognized and affirmed in the Canadian Constitution?

The government has not taken any action to reconcile its policy with what the Constitution says. It is not prepared to recognize that self-government is an inherent right; that this right of aboriginal self-government does not come from this federal government or any other non-aboriginal government. It is inherent in aboriginal people and needs only to be acknowledged and recognized by the federal government.

These are issues which are causing much concern to aboriginal people. The government knows that if these issues are not resolved to the satisfaction of the aboriginal people, final settlements in the north may not be achieved.

In addition to the limited number of claims the government is currently negotiating, there are hundreds of specific claims which remain unresolved and numerous comprehensive claims, most from British Columbia, which have never even made it to the negotiating table because the government refuses to deal with more than six claims at a time.

In many ways, I am bothered by the term "claims". I reject the implication or suggestion that aboriginal people are clamouring for something which the government may, in its generosity, give to us. We are not claiming anything from Canada. We are asserting what is rightfully ours; what belongs to us and what we are entitled to.

This government must understand that it is not doing us any favours when it enters into negotiations. It is we who are doing the government a favour by agreeing to sit down with them and determine how we will share with Canada, our land and our resources.

Most people in this country do not understand the land claims process. The government, in these negotiations, tries to keep the most it can. It gives up the least it has to. And it, for the most part, has held the big stick in these negotiations.

Many land claims negotiations have taken place under the threat of imminent resource development. Often settlements have been reached many years after developments have taken place and what the people have fought for has largely been turned over to someone else.

At times, the government has cut off negotiation funding or threatened to cut off funding when negotiations are not going its way. It has also threatened to stop negotiating altogether. In the negotiation of land claims, the aboriginal people have always been subjected to federal threats, intimidation and power plays.

Aboriginal people are saying "enough". We are standing on the power of our rights; rights which are affirmed in the Constitution of this country and which the Supreme Court has upheld. We have the power of the law on our side and the Government of Canada is subject to this law. Who determined that the Arctic was Canadian land? Were the Inuit ever asked? Where did the King of France get the right to give Mohawk land to Sulpician priests? These are the kinds of questions that Canadians must ask themselves. How would anyone feel, seeing the land you have lived and made your home on, sold to others without your consent? How would you feel being squeezed onto smaller and smaller portions of land?

These kinds of expropriations without compensation have gone in this country since the arrival of the first Europeans. Last March, I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a question in the House of Commons about the reports of the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

In 1988, the commission referred to the situation of the aboriginal people in this country as a national tragedy. In 1989, it said it had no reason to alter that judgment. I asked the minister at the time what immediate action the government was prepared to take to turn this tragedy around.

The minister gave the usual government response referring to how much money the government has spent, but at the same time agreeing with the human rights commissioner that the situation confronting the aboriginal people in this country needs to be vastly improved.

What has the government done to improve matters since I asked that question? Nothing, absolutely nothing. What the government has done is send in the army, between 3,000 and 4,000, to battle a group of 50 or less warriors.

From the beginning of the Oka crisis, the government tried to distance itself. It tried to absolve itself of any culpability and refused to accept any responsibility. An initial conflict over a golf course, a cemetery and sacred land escalated into a military confrontation the likes of which had never been seen in this country and which we hope will never be seen again.

The government's mismanagement of the Oka crisis has brought aboriginal people together in an unprecedented way.

In conclusion, we have all been shamed and diminished by the events in this summer of sorrow. But let us learn a lesson from this bitter experience. Force and violence solve nothing. They only breed more force and violence.

We need an independent commission of inquiry into the events at Oka, Kanesatake and Kahnawake established immediately. Its structure and mandate should be determined in consultation with aboriginal people.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in his speech this morning made the most astonishing claim about the Canadian justice system. He said that our system of justice was the most fair and honourable system of justice known to mankind. I would like to ask the minister whether he asked Donald Marshall that question.

Has the minister not read the Marshall inquiry report which said that the legal system failed Donald Marshall at every turn? Does the minister not understand that the Canadian justice system of which he boasted this morning condemned a man to 11 years in prison for a crime he did not commit, because he was an Indian? If that is the rule of law the government wants aboriginal people to submit to, then we say: No thanks.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member from Nunatsiaq with a great deal of interest because we have many times stood in this House and had an opportunity to share some of our mutual concerns about native people across this vast land of ours.

I heard what he said about the Arctic and the land claims there. He asked the question: "Who gave permission for this land to be used?" But I wonder if he could tell us how he feels about the situation we are actually faced with today. In fact, in Canada we do have more than one peoples living in this land, and we do have treaties in many of the areas of the country.

I believe the member was talking about comprehensive claims rather than specific land claims having to do with certain treaties and certain parcels of land. How does he put that together in his own mind? How do we solve these issues that have to do with conflict of opinion over who owns what land when there are treaties involved and when there are people currently occupying these lands.

Perhaps the member could give us the benefit of his very valid advice on this matter.

Mr. Anawak: I am sorry I did not hear the entire question.

One point I would like to make which I mentioned earlier in this presentation, as I think the hon. member mentioned, is that there are no treaties in the eastern Arctic—absolutely none. No land has ever been given by the Inuit to any European or any other group of people other than the Inuit. As far as we are concerned, we live on that land, know the land, and own that land. If the government wants to negotiate with the people about who owns that land, then it should sit down on the basis that at this moment no other body owns that land, rather than saying: "We have one and a half million square miles of land and we would like to give you some."

All I am saying is that the attitude has been that somebody else owns the land and that we should claim back some of it.

In terms of treaty rights and treaties, we must remember that the Europeans came over, I think, starting in 1492. I must also remind the hon. member that while she can record history in Canada by hundreds of years, we can record ours in thousands and tens of thousands of years.

When the Europeans came over they had in mind that this land was to be claimed for the Europeans. The people in North America, who had no concept of privately owning land and who shared the land at all times, were willing to share that land with the people who came over. There was a miscarriage of justice when the European people who were making those treaties were at an advantage. I have heard of treaties being signed with an x. Where is the justice if the treaties that were signed by people who did not understand what was in those treaties?

On the other hand, some of those treaties have not been honoured. I think the hon. member would be well advised to talk to the various aboriginal leaders and ask them what can we do to correct the situation? What can we do to correct the injustice that has been done to the aboriginal people?

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the member from Nunatsiaq. I think it does this place good to listen to somebody speak from a firsthand knowledge of the plight of native Canadians, the original Canadians, the first nations.

The member alluded in his comments to a statement made earlier today by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development concerning the justice system in the country.

I am from Nova Scotia and anybody who has lived in Nova Scotia or can read newspapers has read with great horror the findings of the Marshall commission of inquiry about the administration of justice in Nova Scotia. Madam Speaker, I do not know if you or other members of the House have read that document, but if they have not, they should. It is a stinging indictment of the justice system in Nova Scotia and a stinging indictment against systemic racism in the justice system right across the country.

I know that the issue of Oka is sometimes hard to separate when dealing with native issues, fundamental rights, weapons, the army, and all the other things, but there is one thing that is clear. It is clear that successive governments have asked the native community to live by our laws and told them that our way is a better way than their way. In doing that we have destroyed their language, we have assisted in destroying their culture, and we have almost destroyed the entire first nations of the country.

There is a double standard when we talk about justice and why the natives have to put down their arms because the law of the country must be supreme. The Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs is nodding. He knows that in Nova Scotia the Micmac community took the Government of Nova Scotia to court on the Treaty of 1752. The court affirmed the native rights when it went to the Supreme Court. Yet the Province of Nova Scotia, a province of the country and a sovereign government, has still denied the native community the rights the Supreme Court said they had subsequent to the Treaty of 1752. So, what we have is a double standard.

It is very, very easy to talk about upholding the law, but at the same time successive governments of Canada—Liberal and Conservative—and New Democratic governments in provincial jurisdictions have absolutely refused to honour the treaties they have with native peoples. The rights of everybody in this country—native and non-native—have been treated with a double standard.

I want to ask the member specifically about the UN Charter of the Rights of the Child. The Prime Minister is off this weekend to participate in the international conference and I hope he is listening. One of the articles deals with the right of children everywhere to be educated in their own language and their own culture. Yet, when the sub-committee travelled, it found that one of the number one concerns of the native community was that no resources were provided by the government to ensure the development of native curriculum and that languages of the native communities across the country were maintained.

I would like him to make a comment on that.

Mr. Anawak: Madam Speaker, it is very true that we are suffering from either a lack of funds or the way the funds are allocated within the education system in terms of our aboriginal languages curriculum.

Today in the Northwest Territories we have eight official languages, of which six are aboriginal languages. They also include French and English. I would hope that both the Government of Canada and the Government of the Northwest Territories would recognize the need to implement programs instituting or introducing aboriginal languages as a full part of that curriculum as we have down here with French and English. I must admit that in certain parts of the territory it has to be that way. In the eastern Arctic they should implement a full Inuktitut program. In some parts of the western Arctic they should implement some other languages.

I would hope that the Government of Canada and, through them, the Government of the Northwest Territories will recognize the need to put as much money as possible into language programs or reallocate the funds to them.

Very briefly, I would also hope that the Government of Canada would reconsider the post-secondary funding to the aboriginal people.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time allocated for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate. The Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, since July, television has been bringing into Canadian homes alien images of barricades and masks and assault rifles. A dispute that began in Oka over land was hijacked by a group of heavily armed people, motivated by ideology and seeking to protect illegal commerce. Their tactics have been the tactics of terrorists. High-powered weapons, threats against the authorities, trade in contraband goods, intimidation of law-abiding Mohawks, interruption of transportation, and destruction of property disqualified any claim the Warriors had to represent the grievances of law-abiding Indians.

What is taking place at Oka is not civil disobedience; it is violent activity that no community should be expected to tolerate. The ostensible reason for the conflict at Oka— and I do not in any way wish to downgrade major historic land claims by Native people, and I will get back to this later—was long ago removed when in July, the federal government acquired the disputed land, before the incidents took place, for the Mohawks of Kanesatake. This step, incidentally, is in keeping with the goals of the framework agreement concluded a year ago this month between the Mohawks of Kanesatake, the town of Oka and the federal and provincial governments, an agreement that unfortunately was repudiated in March by a number of Mohawk leaders.

[English]

What has been at issue these past weeks is not the land, rather the warriors acting against all of the peaceful and noble traditions of Canada's Mohawks. The warriors, advised by foreign legal counsel, have been seeking recognition that their communities are independent and that the laws of Canada do not apply to their lands and to their activities which in the past have included smuggling and gambling on a very large scale. They have sought by various means to circumvent the Canadian justice system.

The warriors' demands are not simply ideas on which reasonable people can agree or simply agree to disagree. They strike at the very heart of what Canada is all about.

The warriors have been acting as if the concept of native self-government means national independence. I want to be very clear on this point. Native self-government is something that can bring great honour, great accomplishment, and great justice to native peoples and, indeed, it shall. But it does not and cannot ever mean sovereign independence within Canadian territory. Mohawk lands are part of Canadian territory and Canadian law must and does apply to us all. Everyone in Canada—members of this House, members of every house, warriors included—is subject to the Criminal Code of Canada. If exceptions to the Criminal Code were made on the basis of colour, race, or creed, where could the line be drawn in a country as diverse and as complex as Canada? What could be more repugnant in a democracy than a legal system based on birth rather than equality?

There are many non-violent avenues, political and judicial, open to people in the country to promote change. In fact, the traditions of Canada's native peoples have been peaceful and noble down through the decades, often under great assault and under great personal challenge. Any student of history, I am sure, would have wondered at the forbearance and the generosity of native peoples given some of the matters to which I will come very shortly. But the warriors opted for firearms and violence, concepts that are fundamentally alien to Canada and to the interests of all native peoples.

Two Mohawks were killed in a dispute over gambling at the Akwesasne reserve last Spring. Corporal Marcel Lemay of the Sûreté du Québec was killed in the police assault on the barricades last July. These are the consequences when people decide that the law does not apply to them.

Conferring on the claims of the Warriors the legitimacy of the grievances of Canada's aboriginal peoples does the later's cause an enormous disservice. And glorifying violence and romanticising those who have recourse to it does democracy, itself, a terrible wrong. Masks and guns make compelling pictures and raise ratings and circulation. But they don't equate to noble purpose.

The armed forces have brought the barricades down and are gradually turning their responsibilities over to the Sûreté du Québec. As this phase-out begins, I think all members would agree that perhaps the most edifying aspect of this whole tragic episode has been the professionalism of the Canadian Armed Forces.

The Canadian Forces, from General de Chastelain to Lieutenant-General Foster to Brigadier-General Roy are to be commended for the level of professionalism that has been evident throughout.

Mr. Lapierre: It isn't over yet!

Mr. Mulroney: No, it isn't over yet. The hon. member is right. However, they still deserve the respect and gratitude of Canadians for the truly outstanding way in which they carried out this difficult mission.

Lieutenant Colonel Robin Gagnon, Major Alain Tremblay, Private Patrick Cloutier—the young soldier who stood his ground coolly in a face to face challenge—and all the other personnel of 5 Brigade showed great courage and almost superhuman self-control in the face of extraordinary provocation.

There are no plans to attack the centre. No one is being interned there—least of all the innocent children who should be in school. They are welcome to leave at any time.

[English]

The armed people, behind the razor wire, can lay down their weapons and accept the offer of the Canadian forces to be placed in custody, and they should, they must. If they persist in staying there and they want to stay there themselves, let the children go. The children should be released; they should be in school.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Otherwise they can confine themselves to the detoxification centre indefinitely. Either way, the ultimate result is going to be the same. They will have to submit themselves, as all Canadians must, to the Canadian criminal justice system. Members of this House have an opportunity today to speak with one voice in calling upon the warriors to lay down their arms and submit themselves now to one of the finest justice systems in the world, the justice system of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Once the guns are down—

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Aboriginal exceptions.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend is quite right. There are very tragic exceptions to this and I will be happy not only to—

An hon. member: Aboriginal exceptions.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, indeed, and I will be very happy to deal with it because the fact that we have an excellent justice system which stands up admirably in comparison to any other in the world does not mean that there have not been serious errors and serious abuses. As long as those errors and injustices arise, and they have in recent times affected particularly native peoples, that is a special tragedy and that is one that all members of the House want to correct.

Once the guns are down, we will be in a position to hand over the disputed land to the people of Kanesatake. There will also be freedom to explore new ways to resolve their historical land claims. In the meantime, there is much to do and many legitimate grievances to address there and elsewhere in Canada.

Over the past year, we have quietly discussed an agenda with native leaders to address issues of concern to all of Canada's native peoples. It is time to begin to put this agenda into operation. Canada's original peoples deserve a special place in this country as our first citizens based on the aboriginal and treaty rights recognized in the Constitution. Those realities have often been denied over decades and centuries in Canada and it is time that we began the process of making up this injustice.

Our agenda will be anchored in reality. It is no myth that native leaders have too often been treated insensitively, unfairly and often times illegally since the days that the first Europeans set foot on this continent. Canadian history records that Indian decency was too often met with cynicism and that Indian generosity was too often repaid with exploitation.

The cultures of Canada's native peoples have been poorly understood and little valued. Many people still remember Indian children being punished at school for speaking their own languages.

The first Canadians, our first Canadians, were denied freedom of speech in their own land.

Thanks to the Indian Act of 1876, people who had never known national boundaries found that they could not even leave reserves—pitiful, mediocre reserves—without a pass. In fact, only in 1960—to show the dimensions of both the tardiness and the enormity of the tragedy—were Canadian Indians fully enfranchised. And I may say, because I will be unveiling a statue of the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson tomorrow, that this particular act was done while he was in the House and when the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker was the Prime Minister of Canada, and it was roundly supported by all political parties.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: The ultimate irony is that the first Canadians were the last to get the vote, and it is a further reality that contemporary Canadians do not have to scour their history books for examples of the racism, paternalism and dependency that have been so destructive of native peoples' welfare and self-respect.

There is ample evidence that things remain seriously wrong to this very day, for example and most recently, the injustice done to Donald Marshall Jr., the Micmac Indian from Nova Scotia. I suppose that of all the tragedies of recent times that this one stands out for its poignancy. It is a tribute to Mr. Marshall and, indirectly I suppose, to all Canadians that even though it took that time, it was eventually corrected. My hope, as Prime Minister of Canada, is that that evil will never again be repeated against Indian people.

These failings sully our reputation and stain our history. If progress requires that we acknowledge historical realities, it also demands that we acknowledge contemporary realities as well. One of these realities is that Canada's aboriginal peoples benefit, as all Canadians benefit, from being part of a socially progressive and economically prosperous country.

Canada's native people enjoy the same rights as all Canadians under the Constitution even though you would sometimes have serious questions about understanding the application of those rights, and they are supposed to enjoy special rights available only to them, although those too are sometimes placed in jeopardy. In recent years Canada's aboriginal peoples have made progress. Consider the following excerpts from a statement by George Erasmus, national chief of the Assembly of First Nations, in his annual report to his fellow chiefs meetings in Whitehorse this past May. I quote:

> In the past twenty years, the landscape has changed a lot for us—
> I can sum it up by saying that we have taken a good deal of control over our lives and affairs as First Nations persons.
> Just look at where we were in 1970: all funding in 1970 was controlled by the federal government through the Department of Indian Affairs (DIAND); now, twenty years later, we're managing the bulk of our finances.
> In Education, there's a tremendous number of schools now under our control; twenty years ago, either Ottawa, the bureaucracy, DIAND or the churches were in total charge.
> In 1970, we didn't have as many as 1,000 post-secondary students; today, there are nearly 17,000!

In fact, our figures show 18,500.

> On-reserve housing continues to be a major concern but even here there has also been improvement in the past couple of decades.

Chief Erasmus is right that despite the poverty that is too prevalent on too many reserves, progress is being made. More than 30 per cent of the current Indian housing stock has been built since 1984 and a further 35 per cent has been extensively renovated since then.

There has been progress in other spheres as well. For example, in 1960 the life expectancy of status Indians was 60; by this year it reached 70.

In 1960, the infant mortality rate was 82 per thousand live births; this year it has reached 13. These figures are either encouraging or depressing, depending on how one wants to look at them. But, I believe that if you place them in the context of what George Erasmus was saying, progress is often incremental, progress is often difficult to achieve. I agree with Chief Erasmus that when Canadians of good will combine and harness their activities with those of aboriginal peoples, solid and tangible progress can and has been made in Canada. I view the future for native peoples with optimism, provided we can maintain that degree of co-operation. I know that all members of all parties in this House of Commons are pledged to achieving precisely that.

It is also encouraging to note that while there were very few Indian-owned business on reserves in 1960, there are over 5,000 today.

Progress by Canada's native peoples in persuading the courts to endorse their aboriginal rights to the land has been substantial. In 1973, following the rejection by the natives people of the then government's white paper, the Supreme Court's Calder decision led to a re-evaluation of policy with respect to land claims. Substantial progress has been made since then in resolving comprehensive land claims.

I am referring to a series of agreements reached on claims with the Conseil Attikamek-Montagnais in June 1988, with the Nisga Tribal Council in July 1989, with the Council of Yukon Indians in March 1990, with the Dene-Métis in April 1990, although some Dene have subsequently sought some changes, and with the Inuit of the Eastern Arctic in April 1990.

The Arctic claims, by way of illustration, just the Arctic claims, if ratified by all concerned, will put 575,000 square kilometres of land firmly and irrevocably under Indian and Inuit ownership and transfer more than $1.3 billion to them. Together, the land area passing into Indian and Inuit ownership is more than the combined area of the four Atlantic provinces and will make the northern natives the largest land-owners in North America. This I believe is not a miracle, but it is solid progress and it is an indication of what Canada can accomplish when all parties and all of us work together.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: So, progress is being made working within the law. On the constitutional agenda, progress on aboriginal issues, as on other issues, has proved more difficult. Neither proposals the federal government made on aboriginal self-government nor others made by provincial governments and aboriginal groups have been able to attract sufficient support to result in a constitutional amendment. And this summer, the planned series of First Ministers Conferences dedicated to matters of interest to aboriginal peoples died with the failure of the Meech Lake Accord. These setbacks aside, the Constitution, and the growing body of case law based on it, have strengthened the right of aboriginal Canadians.

Nevertheless, no one doubts that we still have a very long way to go.

[English]

I would like to outline very briefly, perhaps in a summary manner, the course of some of our government's plans to preserve the special place of our first citizens in this country based on their aboriginal and treaty rights recognized in the Constitution.

The agenda I believe we ought to be addressing will have four main pillars: land claims, the economic and social conditions on reserves, the relationship between aboriginal peoples and governments, and concerns of Canada's aboriginal peoples in contemporary Canadian life.

Consultation with aboriginal peoples respecting the fiduciary responsibilities of the Crown toward them will be built into the process from the very start, but we intend to go far beyond the status quo. On no issue is action more urgent than on land claims.

We intend to take three parallel initiatives. The first will be to accelerate the settlement of specific claims, that is those claims that result from past government non-performance or malfeasance with respect to existing treaties and to the Indian Act. We recognize that increased resources will be essential to make good on this undertaking, and they will be provided.

The second initiative that we propose to take is to ensure that the legal undertakings regarding land transfers to treaty Indians, given in some cases as much as a century ago, will finally be honoured. We have already reached agreement with the Government of Saskatchewan and with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations to begin negotiations. We are eager to initiate the same process in Alberta and Manitoba. I believe that once undertaken and once pursued with vigour by the federal government and encouraged by all parties in the federal Parliament, this will bring about major and historic beneficial results for Canada's aboriginal people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Third, we will accelerate negotiations on modern treaties, the comprehensive claims which until now have had to be limited to six at any one time.

Comprehensive claims are negotiated where aboriginal title has never been legally ceded to the Crown, thus clouding land title for natives and non-natives alike.

Most of the outstanding claims, certainly thus far, are in British Columbia. In July Premier Vander Zalm reversed a decades-old British Columbia policy pursued by both NDP and Social Credit governments opposing provincial participation in such claims negotiations. That policy was wrong, and I want to salute Premier Vander Zalm for reversing a policy that should have been reversed a long time ago.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: To accelerate claims settlements the federal government will no longer limit itself to handling six claims at any one time. We will consider other innovations such as regional or province-wide negotiations.

• (1650)

The second dimension of the government's agenda will be addressed to improving living conditions on Indian reserves. We are prepared to work jointly with Indian leadership and with provincial governments on a range of improvements in basic community programs and services such as water and sewage facilities so urgently required in so many areas across Canada.

We will expect those native communities with the resources to take on increasing responsibility for financing enhanced services and economic development.

Ensuring that all native Canadians have opportunities comparable to those of other Canadians to participate in the growth and prosperity of a country of this size is not an easy task.

I know there has been a contest in some quarters about the numbers, but it is a fact of life that federal and provincial governments already spend far more money on native programs than any other country in the world. The federal budget alone contains over $4 billion a year and still, in spite of these enormous expenditures, terrible problems persist.

The money has been spent. God knows we have the bureaucrats to prove it. Some of them are excellent and have done tremendous jobs, but the fact of the matter is that the problems are terrible. Unacceptable social problems persist from unemployment to problems with drugs, alcoholism, and abuse. All of these issues cannot be solved overnight.

An hon. member: What about education?

Mr. Mulroney: And education. I know that throwing money at it is not alone the solution, but certainly all Canadians recognize that we can do a lot better in Canada than we have done in the past.

Progress requires more than money. Progress will only be made if the degrading, antiquated and wasteful statutory relationship between Indian peoples and the government is changed.

The Indian Act is largely unchanged since the Victorian age. It fosters Indian dependency on the state, frustrates Indian self-sufficiency and undermines Indian self-respect. It deminishes Indians and non-Indians alike.

In the new year, building on work that is going on now with Indian leadership, we will bring in the first of many changes to the Indian Act. Consultation, and respect for the fiduciary responsibilities of the Crown toward aboriginal peoples, will be built into the process from the start.

But we intend to go far beyond the status quo. The objective will be the enlargment of aboriginal capacity for self-government, within the framework of the Canadian Constitution. While it is not perfect, the Constitution is sufficiently flexible to afford aboriginal people ample opportunity to develop their communities, enhence their social and education systems and build their economies—in short, to live their lives according to their own cultures. For example, this government will find practical ways to ensure that aboriginal communities can exercise greater control over the administration of justice.

Self-government can mean a new relationship between aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians based on human dignity, trust and respect, all within Canada's Constitution and protected by Canada's laws.

[English]

Building such a relationship requires the understanding and the support of all Canadians. That is why later this autumn we intend as part of a broader initiative on Canadian unity to seek a thorough review of the fundamental place and the role of aboriginal peoples in contemporary Canada.

The agenda I have outlined is, I believe, very far-reaching. Its goal is to create a new relationship between aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians. There is no guarantee of success. There is ample precedent of failure over decades to indicate to all of us how difficult and how challenging it will be and, once we embark upon it, how important the responsibility that we all accept. It will take creativity and perseverance.

I believe that it will take the courage to see things as they are, the honesty to acknowledge them for what they have become, and the common resolve to correct them for future generations. Most of all, it will take sustained and firm leadership on the part both of governments and of aboriginal peoples, but with native and non-native

Canadians working together and with all members of the House of Commons co-operating on this vital dimension of our national life it can be done. I give Canadians the assurance of the Government of Canada that every effort will be deployed to ensure that it will be done.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would it be possible to ask a few questions of the Prime Minister? He is the main spokesman for the government and the main guardian of aboriginal peoples. I hope I can demonstrate that it can be done in a very co-operative and non-confrontational manner, which I am sure he will not deny.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Our rules do not provide for a period of question and comments when the orator has had unlimited time. Of course I am a servant of the House and I would need unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the Prime Minister for taking the opportunity to address this very important question.

It has been a very difficult summer for all of us and things have become rather heated at times. I understand the onerous burden it is to deal with the specific problems facing the aboriginal people and the government at this point in time.

I appeal to the Prime Minister through a question. Why is it that through a series of moves over the last six months, Bill C-269, an act to establish an aboriginal language foundation, was denied? It would have helped to guarantee the linguistic and cultural rights, to some extent, of aboriginal peoples. I needed unanimous consent and the NDP agreed, but the government did not.

Why could we not have the suggestions of the Charest committee considered in our constitutional debate over the last six months? Why could we not get two sentences in the Constitution to recognize the specific wording the aboriginal people wanted to recognize them as a fundamental characteristic? Why is it that we have undergone some severe cutbacks in native programming like native communications?

I say this to the Prime Minister because there is a real element of mistrust. I say to the Prime Minister in all sincerity that trust seems to be the problem here. The aboriginal community does not feel the element of trust is there. It does not feel that the efforts to negotiate a peaceful and honourable disengagement honestly, sincerely and genuinely have been exhausted, that all possibilities have been exhausted.

Can the Prime Minister assure the aboriginal people of Canada, including all Mohawks, that in fact what has happened is not an attempt to humiliate the aboriginal community because of Meech Lake and for other reasons?

• (1700)

Mr. Mulroney: Normally, I would not dignify that last part with a comment because I think my hon. friend knows full well that we undertook the Meech Lake Accord with a view to seeking a specific agenda. It failed, notwithstanding the very strong support it received from the Liberal Party in the House, the NDP and the Conservatives. At an appropriate time history alone will judge whether it was a beneficial attempt to bring about a degree of harmony and unity in Canada.

I would like to give the member an illustration of why I thought it was important. One of the duties that I inherited when I became Prime Minister was the responsibility of chairing meetings under the 1982 Constitutional Accord, seeking to bring about a constitutional amendment for aboriginal self-government. I believe I chaired two of those first ministers' meetings.

We came within a hair of securing an historic constitutional amendment that would have provided fundamental justice and a very beneficial change for the aboriginal communities across Canada. I do not know where it would have led but I had this strong view—and it was the view of the aboriginal leadership—that it had all of the earmarks of making a fundamental difference in the lives, eventually, of aboriginal peoples.

That constitutional amendment failed in 1985 and in 1986, because when it came time to go around the table to count heads, we were short one, and that was Quebec. Quebec was not participating at that time because in 1982 it felt that its own concerns, for reasons we will not go into here today, were not met. Therefore, to achieve greater justice for aboriginal peoples it was necessary, in my view, to bring Quebec back, willingly, into the constitutional fold so that they could be there to vote in favour of aboriginal self justice.

Among my many regrets about Meech Lake—and as I say, we will let history look at it for all of us—is that I firmly believed the bringing back of Quebec to the constitutional table would bring about an affirmative position by the Government of Quebec and provide justice for the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

In response to the comment, I would like to tell my hon. friend that while no one gets everything he or she wants entirely, what I would want most of all in Canada, would be equality, fairness and justice for the native peoples of this country. Their denial and the denial of these fundamentals are something that one sees on a daily basis.

This is one of the problems that often occurs, for example, in an adversarial system in this House of Commons. Mention was made of the fact that there were cutbacks. That is true. What is not mentioned is that in the same time frame, there was an increase of $200 million to the aboriginal peoples of Canada in areas such as education and health and welfare. We decided in co-operation with others that it was better to take $20 million out of a given area and put $200 million into another.

An hon. member: It was a mistake.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says it was a mistake.

Mrs. Finestone: I said it was from communications.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend from Mount Royal reminds me, and she is right. We took it out of communications and we put it into health and welfare and we increased it tenfold and I think that was a good decision for native people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

May I just conclude with an observation in regard to how I, as Prime Minister of Canada, view our fundamental obligations. We were able to conclude—I was there in the Northwest Territories and the then minister was there—a large number of new treaties on comprehensive land claims. I am not suggesting that they are perfect.

Ms. Blondin: The people are divided.

Mr. Mulroney: I realized that. I realize that ex post facto there is a difference of opinion as to whether this particular treaty is good. That happens not infrequently. However, we were able to conclude an extraordinary land claim arrangement with the native peoples in the territories. Such a huge tract of land, such a huge amount of money that was invested, that is there. I think this has the elements of bringing together and providing the native peoples with what I believe they always wanted; land, a degree of control and the money to ensure that they become self-sufficient, because self-sufficiency for the native peoples means dignity.

What the native peoples want most of all and what I am committed to working towards is dignity for the native peoples of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we have gone through a ten minute period of questions and answers.

A point of order, the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister would agree that in fairness that he also have a question from this side of the House. I think it is important that we be fair about this.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is after five o'clock and we should be going to Private Members' Business. But if there is unanimous consent to take one more question from the other party, I am the servant of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not have unanimous consent.

It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' business as listed on today's Order Paper.

COMPETITION ACT

CONCENTRATION OF CORPORATE OWNERSHIP

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House the government should amend the Competition Act so that the Director of Investigations and Research shall consider, when reviewing a proposed merger, the extent to which concentration of corporate ownership is in the public interest, avoids conflict of interest between merged financial and non-financial commercial operations and promises lower prices, innovation, employment and other public benefits.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure that hon. members could continue their conversations in the appropriate lobbies so that the Chair can hear the hon. member at the end of the House.

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, the House will be aware of the ruling in April of this year by the Quebec Superior Court that the Competition Act is unconstitutional. It seems to me that that was a clear signal to review the Competition Act and M-58 aims to do exactly that. M-58 proposes to look at the Competition Act, which has been in place since 1986, and with which we have had three year's experience. I think the time has come to look at our experience with the new Competition Act of 1986.

Much has happened in the last four years. We have had three record breaking years in terms of mergers and acquisitions with takeovers worth close to $30 billion in each year from 1987 to 1989.

This is a major restructuring of ownership in this country. It seems to me it is on a scale rarely seen in Canadian economic history. Many of us are very familiar with some of these major changes; Molson's acquisition of O'Keefe, PWA buying Wardair, the Amaco-Dome deal, Imperial Oil's takeover of Texaco Canada to name just a few.

M-58 aims to deal with one aspect of the Competition Act that is a source of concern. The fact is that mergers may be approved if "efficiency gains" can be seen as emerging from a proposed merger. I believe that this criterion is too vague when assessing the major restructuring that we are now witnessing in the Canadian economy. It seems to me it gives too much discretionary power to the director of investigations and research at the competition bureau.

My motion's aim is to give greater guidance and direction to the director when assessing whether a proposed merger should or should not be approved. M-58 would ask the Competition Act to consider whether a proposed merger would lead to higher levels of corporate concentration and whether these higher levels would impact negatively on the Canadian economy.

Canada is one of the few countries where competition legislation does not take into consideration levels of market share in assessing mergers, for example, in comparable industrial economies in the industrialized world. German legislation limits markets shared to 40 per cent for a single firm for a particular industry. The limit is only 25 per cent if a conglomerate is involved.

Britain and the United States also have size criteria aimed at limiting corporate concentration. In any case, it is highly unlikely that these countries would allow a situation where two companies would control over 90 per cent of the beer market.

In Great Britain, for example, Elders who owned O'Keefe, were prevented three times from taking over another brewery because it would lessen competition. Our competition legislation makes no specific provision to ensure that a proposed merger will guarantee employment levels, or indeed, lead to increases in jobs. Surely, achieving higher levels of employment can be considered as "efficiency gains". It should be specified as such.

Another consideration is that of innovation. Our competition legislation should guarantee that innovative and dynamic firms are not stifled by larger firms more concerned about shutting out competition than with developing new products and new technologies. M-58 aims simply to make the Competition Act more specific in describing efficiency gains.

It seems to me quite a paradox that in a society where the corporate world stresses the marketplace and competition that we have even to consider legislation that forces them to compete.

The key principle of this Motion M-58 is that smarter, not bigger is better. It is an important principle if we are to develop a dynamic, competitive economy.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nickel Belt has asked the House to consider legislative amendment to the Competition Act to allow the Director of Investigations and Research to consider the extent to which concentration of corporate ownership is in the public interest when reviewing a proposed merger and whether the proposed transaction promises lower prices, innovation, employment, and other public benefits. However, the act already requires consideration of a number of these issues. Hence, there is no need for the House to consider further legislative reform.

Around the world, there has been an increased recognition of the desirability of market-driven approaches to foster economic growth and structural change. This is evidenced by the greater reliance on market mechanisms in a wide range of countries, both developed and developing. This trend reflects the numerous benefits of competitive markets.

From the perspective of consumers, including those who are less affluent, competition is a force that generates considerable savings and increased disposable income. It keeps industries sharp and efficient, characteristics which are of increasing importance in the more global trading environment.

Competition constrains the unilateral or collusive exercise of market power. It preserves a place for small businesses, providing opportunities for new enterprises and rewarding innovation. Moreover, freely competitive forces simultaneously preserve the democratic nature of Canada's political and social institutions. Thus, it is clear that competition is not promoted as an end in itself but, rather, as a means of enhancing society's welfare.

In Canada, the Competition Act is the principal piece of framework legislation which exists to protect and promote fair competition. The act is a general law of general application. To the extent the competition policy protects the forces of competition, it results in the movement of prices to levels which more accurately reflect demand and cost conditions, facilitating the flow of resources toward their most productive use. By promoting the efficient use of resources, competition policy lessens the need for alternative, more interventionist forms of control such as regulations and public ownership.

In principle, it should only be necessary to ensure that market structure and conduct are such as to provide an acceptable degree of competition. The attainment of efficient industry performance can then be left to market forces without the need for detailed government intervention. To this end, Canadian competition legislation has consistently sought to prohibit certain practices in restraint of trade which serve to prevent the nation's scarce resources from being most effectively utilized.

The objectives of today's competition policy, as embodied in the purpose clause of the Competition Act, reflect these concerns and I quote:

> The purpose of this Act is to maintain and encourage competition in Canada in order to promote the efficiency and adaptability of the Canadian economy, in order to expand opportunities for Canadian participation in world markets while at the same time recognizing the role of foreign competition in Canada, in order to ensure that small and medium-sized enterprises have an equitable opportunity to participate in the Canadian economy, and in order to provide consumers with competitive prices and product choices.

Merger review under the Competition Act is governed by this statement. Furthermore, the question of providing consumers with competitive prices and product choices is central to the notion of merger review. Mergers which are likely to substantially prevent or lessen competition in Canada, that is those which are likely to result in an increase in prices or decreased quality, et cetera, may be subject to an order of the tribunal except where there are offsetting efficiency gains. Clearly, consumers' interest in lower prices is protected by the existing legislation.

By forcing the movement of prices to levels which more accurately reflect demand and cost conditions, competition policy facilitates the flow of resources toward their most productive use. This in turn allows the Canadian economy to employ fully its labour force in those industries where we have a comparative advantage from a trading perspective and so the issue of employment is implicitly addressed.

The extent to which a proposed merger will affect research and development and innovative activity is specifically outlined by the act for consideration in merger review. Subsection 93(g) instructs the competition tribunal and the director of investigation and research to consider the nature and extent of change and innovation in a relevant market when determining whether or not a proposed merger is likely to prevent or lessen competition substantially. The amendment which the hon. member seeks relating to innovation is a factor already explicitly contemplated by the existing legislation.

Finally, the act instructs consideration of "any other factor that is relevant to competition in a market that is or would be affected by the merger or proposed merger" when making the substantial prevention or lessening of competition assessment. I have complete confidence that the director of investigation and research is competently addressing the issues of lower prices, innovation and others when making merger assessments as the legislation instructs. Consequently, there is no need to legislatively amend the Competition Act as suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague from Sudbury on bringing this matter to the attention of the House. It is certainly apropos, as will be seen in a few moments when I try to outline the effects of the Competition Act, how it affects Canadians and how it affects workers, contrary to what we have just heard from a member on the government side of the House.

I also want to compliment my colleague from Sudbury for being so perceptive in 1989 and bringing this matter to the House today. As I progress in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, you will see why it is apropos of the situation that we have before us.

We are talking today about the Competition Act. It is interesting because the Competition Act has to do with the economy of the country. Although we are all interested in other matters of great importance before the House, such as what is happening in Oka and the Middle East, we must always remember that there are other Canadians who are concerned about the economic conditions as they affect rural and small-town Canada: their livelihood, what is happening in the workplace, lay-offs and terminations. I am so pleased today to be able to speak on behalf of those people and how this Competition Act is affecting those people in rural and small-town Canada.

Perhaps I should talk about the failure of the Competition Act, the failure of its terms but perhaps more so the failure of the way the director of the Bureau of Competition Policy and the bureau itself to interpret properly the terms and the statutory obligations outlined within this act. Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, as I carry on with this prime example of what this act is all about, that the interpretation of this act will be challenged in a tribunal other than this. It will certainly be up to the deputy directors who are entrusted with the administration of the act, the Bureau of Competition Policy itself, and even the Minister of Corporate and Consumer Affairs, who have to start applying this act, and the terms of this act, in the best interest of the Canadian citizen and the Canadian worker in the market-place.

The facts that I am going to relate are fairly simple and have to do with this act. There are two companies, two mega-giants in the food industry, Beatrice Foods and Palm Dairies. Beatrice Foods is a food producer across the country and Palm Dairies is a milk producer in western Canada.

Beatrice made an application to buy out Palm. It came to the Bureau of Competition Policy and it was approved. When Beatrice bought out Palm it was approved across all the centres in western Canada, including Thunder Bay. What happened in Thunder Bay? At that time there were only two milk producers in the city of Thunder Bay, Beatrice Foods and Palm Dairies. There are no other milk producers in the whole district.

Now that went to the Bureau of Competition Policy and the director of the bureau act to conduct an in-depth investigation into the affairs of how the elimination of competition in that market-place would affect the consumer. It was my understanding—and I am sure the understanding of all Canadians, particularly the people in Thunder Bay, the area I represent—that we would be protected by this act and the people who are charged with the responsibility of dealing with this act.

On August 28 there was no longer any competition in the milk industry in Thunder Bay. The director who was entrusted with completing an in-depth investigation into the affairs of the Beatrice-Palm sale issued a proclamation that after having reviewed the substance of this transaction he would not stop the sale of Palm Dairies to Beatrice Foods.

He stated in his reasons for making that decision that we were afforded the protection of the Competition Act. In that decision he stated that he would not stop the sale and that, even though there was a substantial lessening of competition, he would monitor the effects of the sale for the next three years to ensure that the consumer in the market-place was protected.

Now we all know that you cannot monitor situations on an ongoing basis in competitive industry. You either have competition or you do not have competition.

When the director chose to ignore that there would be a substantial lessening of competition in the most basic of industries, the milk industry—a basic food industry in the country—he chose to ignore the wishes of the people of that area and said that he would allow the sale of Palm Dairies to the Beatrice interests to go forward. There was no substantial lessening of competition. There was no threat of a lessening of competition.

In allowing that transaction to go through he completely eliminated any competition in that most basic of industries, the milk industry, thereby affecting almost every citizen in that community, especially young families.

He conducted what he said was an investigation as to how it would affect the market-place but in our conversations he said that we were conducting our own investigation.

Mr. Speaker, let me tell you just what we did so that the director could make an informed decision, we thought, with proper information.

When we found out that Beatrice and Palm were going to amalgamate, when Palm was going to be eliminated from the market-place, we went out into the market-place to the independent grocery stores and independent merchants. People signed petitions and in a period of two days we got the signatures of over 2,000 people on a petition which stated that the people of Thunder Bay did not want Palm Dairies to be consolidated with Beatrice Foods because it would be a substantial lessening of competition. There are over 200 independent merchants in that particular area. We have over 200 petitions from those independent merchants exclusively which state that they do not want the elimination of competition by Palm Dairies selling out to Beatrice Foods.

The Corporation of the City of Thunder Bay, the city council of Thunder Bay, realizing the import of this decision on the citizens of Thunder Bay, passed a resolution imploring the Board of Competition Policy not to proceed with allowing the sale of Palm Dairies to Beatrice Foods. That was followed by many of the other small communities: Nipigon, Red Rock, Hurkett, Dorion, Murillo, and other small centres that said they would be affected, and implored the director of the bureau to stop the sale of Palm to Beatrice.

Given all of that information, they still made the decision to allow Palm to be sold to Beatrice in the community, which eliminated all competition. Just to bring it into focus, because I know my time is short, let me just read a press release on the results of that sale and let me put it down in perspective as to what this Competition Act truly means to the Canadian consumer when the terms of that act are not used in the best interest to protect the citizens of this country. This is dated today: "Beatrice Foods announced today that it plans to consolidate its Thunder Bay operations. This facility will undergo a major expansion of $1 million over the next 18 months to provide Thunder Bay with a modern processing plant."

Part of the consolidation plan—and their consolidation plan means closing the Palm Dairies plant, which is the newest and the most modern in the area and using the older one—is closing the Balmoral station, closing of the current Palm Dairies plant on Balmoral Street. With the move, approximately 20 people will be offered employment at the Beatrice plant and 35 people will be laid off effective tomorrow.

What this means, and this is an actual fact of what we are talking about here today, is that the Competition Act in this country is not being applied for the best use and the best interest of the average Canadian citizen. That is the result of what we are doing. We have got to stop it. We should not allow it.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nickel Belt has suggested that the government should amend the Competition Act so that the Director of Investigations and Research shall consider, when reviewing a proposed merger, the extent to which concentration of corporate ownership is in the public interest, avoids conflict of interest between merged financial and non-financial commercial operations and promises lower prices, innovation, employment and other public benefits.

Mr. Speaker, the concentration of corporate ownership is a complex phenomenon which cannot be attributed to a single factor. It is the result of various corporate decisions, dealing for instance with expansion projects aimed at greater efficiency and diversification.

The hon. member's suggestion seems to be based on the notion that concentration of corporate ownership is on the rise. As a matter of fact, since 1984, there has been a slight reduction in the number of concentrations generally and in the total assets, sales and benefits recorded by the top 25 companies in the economy. The level of global concentration among the top 1,000 corporations has remained the same since 1976. Therefore, I urge all hon. members to be careful when they interprete statistical data.

These matters are not so important as the impact of corporate concentration on the Canadian economy. It may have a positive impact such as the growth of Canadian corporations and the improvement of their position with respect to exports and world competition.

Just the same, Mr. Speaker, concentration of corporate ownership can give rise to a number of problems. The tools already exist to remedy them and we have shown that we are prepared to use them.

We showed we were ready to use them.

The government adopted a Competition Act whose deterrent effect on anti-competitive mergers have been proven. The Act enables the Director of Investigations and Research to prohibit mergers which prevent or substantially impede competition or will probably have that effect. Since the Act was passed in 1986, over 600 mergers and takeovers have been subjected to scrutiny. In more than 20 cases, changes were made or the case was simply dropped.

The federal government is presently reviewing the Canada Business Corporations Act to make sure that it protects efficiently the minority shareholders' rights in the context of increasingly important and complex public offers.

Investment Canada reviews takeovers by foreign interests and approves only those that directly benefit Canadians.

There are also governmental programs to help workers who lose their job for some reason, such as retraining programs and mobility incentive programs.

Mr. Speaker, business concentration also causes concerns because of the concentration of wealth in Canada. I believe that the question is not so much to know who owns what, but to determine if the Canadian economy is growing and prospering. In fact, Mr. Speaker, our economy has grown by 16 percent since 1984. Between 1984 and 1987, the growth rate of the economy was higher in Canada than in any other OECD country.

Mr. Speaker, let us not be blind to the fact that concentration of corporate ownership also raises issues concerning the profitability and growth potential of smaller businesses in Canada's modern economy.

Canadian small business is indeed responsible for creating most new jobs and for an important part of the commercial growth, innovation and trade leadership. This sector has been very prosperous in the past five years, Mr. Speaker, and small businesses have held their own against larger companies over the last ten years.

Our government has launched a number of familiarization programs designed to promote the growth of small business. They include new tax incentives to encourage the management of retirement funds to invest in eligible small- and medium-sized businesses, not to mention other incentives like access to small business which makes it easier for them to land government contracts. Madam Speaker, these programs enable small businesses to take every advantage of opportunities flowing from freer trade and world-wide market expansion.

Madam Speaker, the increase in the number of takeovers and mergers in most countries—this is not restricted to Canada—points clearly to the need for a greater number of multinationals to be more competitive on world markets. This situation can easily prove to be a boon for small businesses that act as suppliers, which is a good thing, and in many cases the partners of the larger concerns they supply, for they gain better access to world markets and new research and development opportunities.

Given the complexity of problems created by the concentration of businesses and its links with other fields of economic policy, the government has chosen a many-faceted approach instead of relying on only one legislative lever as advocated in the motion introduced by the member for Nickel Belt.

• (1740)

[English]

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Madam Speaker, thank you for the privilege of saying a few words on this private members' motion of the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

I congratulate him for throwing into the public mill a private members' motion that draws attention of members of the House, and more particularly Canadians, to problems as different people perceive them. We might have a little different perspective as to whether it is a serious problem at this moment, but nonetheless the extent to which governments permit the concentration of power in any one industry has always been a problem in every nation.

Of course, people are notorious for abusing their monopoly positions. It does not matter whether it is private business or people with too much power in public or private life. It tends to be abused, so the secret and magic of our society is to try to keep power dissipated so no one gets too much over anyone else.

For example, in the hon. member's home town of Nickel Belt, I suppose Inco is a very powerful player. I do not know even under the existing law whether Inco would have been permitted to become so big and powerful in Canada because, as he knows, for I guess 70 years the Competition Act was never changed. The merger test required the proof of criminal intent.

I think over the whole 70 years there was something like one conviction, many years ago. Successive governments had a chance to change that, including 1972 to 1974 when the NDP were really directing the Liberal Party and could have got it. None of us took time to do it when we had power, except 1984.

There are a host of other major problems that this country should have faced and solved 10, 15 or 20 years ago, whether it was the growth of government per se becoming a monopoly, whether it was the lack of intellectual property protection, whether it was drugs or private breeders' rights or the Integrated Circuits Topography Act. There were all sorts of things that this country should have faced in the last 15 years but did not. The Prime Minister did take them on.

Free trade was done. The privatization of some Crown corporations was done, although there are still many Crown corporations. As a policy, the Conservative government agrees that there is a role for Crown corporations in this mixed economy of Canada. We have set some up. We will set more up.

One was the Competition Act. We came out with a whole new statute that took this criminal test on mergers, under which you could never get a conviction, and changed it to a civil test; the balance of probabilities. Under that, if my recollection is correct, there are at least four—I think there might even be up to six—mergers that have been absolutely prohibited. That is just one part of it, but it is significant in itself when there had not been any for 50 years.

The real point is that a host of proposed mergers were refused by the director, unless they made certain changes. For example, in western Canada, Safeway bought out a competitor and the director demanded that they sell certain stores in certain towns and cities. That has worked very well.

I think that is the type of power you need to have because each merger in each industry has to be assessed from a different perspective.

Every merger creates an opportunity. These firms have to compete not only in Canada, but on a global scale. I wonder if Inco would have amounted to the company it is and I wonder if Inco would be able to pay the tremendous salaries it pays now to my hon. friend and his constituents, because if it could not have operated around the world, it might have just gone right out of business.

What I am pointing out is that this thing is not just simple, but that does not take away from the spirit of the motion that my hon. friend from Nickel Belt has put in the House.

I can assure the member that this motion has been looked at very carefully by officials in the policy part of the department and in the directorate to see whether some ideas could be added to the statute. I want to tell him not to write this off if it does not get through today. He might take it back and refine it a bit after talking with people and hearing members in the House give examples. He might well be able to come up with a motion for the next session that is much more appropriate and indeed will be accepted.

Another thing has happened, for those of us who have been around for a while. Private members' motions were never accepted in this House, but since we have become the government the Prime Minister and our government have accepted more private members' motions than ever before in the entire history of Parliament from 1867. There is a host of private members' bills. It has made life much more satisfying for us as individuals, because of course we come here thinking we have some ideas that are important for the private and public spheres.

I wanted to say in a more specific way what these merger tests involve. The issue of corporate concentration is best dealt with once one distinguishes three distinct areas of concern. There is concentration of markets, there is concentration of power, and there is concentration of ownership. We need to note that while any one of these three forms of concentration may coexist with another, the presence of one form does not necessarily imply the presence of another. Concentration of markets refers to the share of an industry's total output that is accounted for by a small number of firms. Typically this form of concentration is accentuated by horizontal mergers. Market concentration necessarily affects competition and thus possibly prices, but concentration of power and ownership in and of themselves do not do that.

This government has responded, as I have said, to concerns about the impact of market concentration on the Canadian economy by passing the Competition Act. Merger review in Canada has always considered the existing and prospective levels of market concentration when assessing the likelihood that a proposed merger will result in a substantial prevention or lessening of competition.

The legislation stipulates that this assessment is not make solely on the basis of market share or concentration figures. Other characteristics of market structure, such as levels of foreign competition, product substitutability, barriers to entry, and whether effective and vigorous competition remains post-merger must also be addressed. The law also provides for consideration of efficiency gains or cost savings arising from the transaction. The Competition Act, by being designed to maintain and encourage competition while promoting efficiency and adaptability of the Canadian economy, has addressed market concentration concerns. There is no need for further legislative review.

That is the official position at the moment, but again I encourage my friend not to forget about his motion. If he feels that strongly about it, he should change some of the words and he will very likely have a successful motion when he brings it back the next time.

Concentration of power refers to the ability of a firm or a group of firms to influence regulators, legislators or other institutions. The government has taken action to ensure that large corporations do not have undue political influence. To ensure that the government's dealings with the private sector are open we passed the Lobbyist Registration Act, a statute that we should have had for years and years but just did not get done because of other priorities of other governments.

This legislation is intended to foster greater openness in the process of policy formation by allowing all Canadians to see who is lobbying and for what purpose. Canadians are then able to judge for themselves whether any particular group has undue influence.

The Competition Act also provides another example of open and arm's length dealings with business. The Director of Investigation and Research is statutorily independent of government policy makers and hence is free from government interference in matters subject to the Competition Act, including merger review. Moreover, the courts and competition tribunal, an independent, quasi-judicial body, perform all adjudicatory functions related to the legislation. In establishing the competition tribunal Parliament sought to combine the important element of judicial process with expertise in the fields of business and economics. I think it was a wise decision to go that way even though there have been some problems in the courts.

I appreciate that my time has expired. I know there are other members who wish to speak to this motion, so I will sit down now.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak in support of my colleague's motion before this House, the member for Nickel Belt. The matter which he raises is an extremely important one and an extremely timely one.

As I know the House has already been informed, a company that now is the sole operator of a dairy concern in Thunder Bay and northwestern Ontario advised the media this morning that it was closing a plant it had just purchased, putting out of work 35 employees and affecting their families. This is all a direct result of the lack of a federal Competition Act which takes into consideration the needs of the smaller as well as the larger communities, the small as well as the large companies.

Let me elaborate, Madam Speaker. Earlier this year Palm Dairies, a company based in western Canada, owned by Peter Pocklington, decided that it wanted to find a buyer. What happened is very interesting because the initial purchaser–to–be was a western based co–op which the federal authorities deemed to be an inappropriate purchaser, because in their words the acquisition of Palm Dairies by this western based co–op would lessen competition so they ordered Palm Dairies to find someone else to purchase them.

They went to Beatrice Foods, a very large company which had already acquired one family owned and operated dairy in Thunder Bay a number of years ago. They agreed to purchase the assets of Palm Dairies in order to prevent a lessening of competition as decreed by the federal bureaucracy.

That was all well and good. I do not want to pass judgment on the impact on competition in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, but one thing that became eminently clear to us in Thunder Bay and in the Thunder Bay milk market was that the acquisition of Palm Dairies by Beatrice Foods would lessen competition in terms of fluid milk and, some of us believed, would eliminate competition in terms of fluid milk or what we call milk at the corner store.

We had already seen indications of that lessening of competition as store operators were advised that under the new hierarchy the dairy would no longer come in and stock the shelves or rotate the stock. Over time it was suggested that the free freezers and the free refrigerators that were provided as part of a marketing plan by both Beatrice and Palm would no longer be provided. In fact the retailer would have to purchase those or find his or her own. Then we knew, based on what happened elsewhere in the country when an unregulated monopoly situation occurred, that prices would go up.

I take us back to Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario a number of years ago when it found itself in a monopoly situation for fluid milk. In a very short period of time that city by itself became the highest priced city in Ontario for the purchase of milk at the retail level. There was no competition. In the outlying communities such as Wawa and other areas around Sault Ste. Marie the price was even higher.

The only reason today that milk prices are lower in Sault Ste. Marie is the reality of American competition with a very high Canadian dollar that attracts Canadians across the border to pick up groceries like milk. That is the only reason that prices are depressed in Sault Ste. Marie. Because of this merger and because of the permission of the competition bureau, Thunder Bay and the area from White River to Upsala will now be in a virtual monopoly situation.

What did the competition bureau decide after literally hundreds of people from Thunder Bay, from Atikokan, and from along the north shore sent in comments and evidence indicating that they were concerned about the impact on them as retailers, as consumers, and as producers of milk? The bureau ruled that it could go ahead and they would monitor it over three years, as required under the Competition Act.

There is no longer going to be three years, because the moment that Beatrice closes Palm Dairies there is nothing to restart. The assets will be sold. The people will be moved out of town and will find other employment.

It just shows what kind of a farce is the existing act, the prime component in terms of which there is no appeal process. A bureaucrat in this national capital region makes an arbitrary decision based on confidential information provided to that person by the companies involved, and not to be released to any of us who have raised concerns about this matter. He and he alone has the decision–making authority. We cannot even appeal to the minister because under the act he does not have the ability to overrule that decision.

This means that for the 35 employees who were told sometime today, I am told—or perhaps they are not even going to be told until tomorrow that they are out of a job—the company will try to find them employment elsewhere in their system, perhaps in Sault Ste. Marie or in western Canada. However, that is 35 less jobs in the community of Thunder Bay and on the routes that they service. It may in the long term lead to a reduction in the production of milk because, as we know, when the price of a commodity goes up the volume goes down, so there may be a direct impact on the milk producers in the Thunder Bay area.

We need motions like that of my colleague. We need a change in the act to change both the amendments made by the current Conservative government and the original bases for the act which are part of the appeal mechanism I was talking about that was put in by the former government, because it is unfair to see men and women put out of work just for the sake of corporate concentration.

We need a different way in this country. We need a better way. We need legislation, policies, and a government that cares about people first, not about the corporations.

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Beauport–Montmorency–Orléans): Madam Speaker, I always enjoy listening to the hon. member for Nickel Belt who, eloquent and knowledgeable as he is, can get his parliamentary colleagues interested in various kinds of measures designed to make life easier for Canadians.

Unfortunately I believe that in fact the member for Nickel Belt is suggesting that the Competition Act, now enforced by the Bureau of Competition Policy, should be expanded into a domestic investment review legislation closely patterned—in spirit and scope—after the Foreign Investment Review Act of the previous administration in office before 1984.

The way I see it, widening the scope of the Competition Act to make it into a Domestic Investment Review Act would be a useless and unwise move.

Useless because the necessary mecanisms required to deal with the potential negative impact of a merger are already available to the Canadian government.

Some mergers may give rise to questions concerning the competition policy and have a negative impact on consumer prices and consumer options. The Competition Act which was amended by this government in 1986 has proved to be a very effective legislative tool to deal with all major mergers in all sectors of the economy.

Since the legislation was passed in 1986 more than 600 mergers and take–overs have been reviewed and in more than 20 cases they did not go through or they had to be changed because according to the Director of Investigation and Research they might have an impact on competition and consumption. If we compare the impact of this legislation with that of the former Combines Investigation Act, our conclusion must be that the latter failed to deliver a single conviction with respect to a merger. Other sections of the Competition Act, such as those dealing with abuse of dominant position and the refusal to sell, provide ways to deal with anti–competitive behaviour by larger corporations after a merger has taken place.

The merger provisions of the Competition Act apply both to foreign mergers involving Canadian assets and to purely Canadian mergers. Furthermore, Investment Canada is responsible for examining foreign investments to ensure that they contribute to economic growth and enhance employment opportunities in this country.

Some people are concerned that certain mergers may cause a loss of jobs. The enhanced competitive position of Canadian companies has increased employment opportunities. Since 1984, there has been a large number of mergers and takeovers in Canada. During this time, Canada has ranked first among OECD countries on number of jobs created. If they need assistance, workers who lose their jobs for whatever reason have access to a wide range of manpower adjustment programs that provide financial support while they look for another job, and also offer training and assistance in moving to another location.

As pointed out by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, mergers also raise concerns about conflict of interest, links between financial and non–financial corporations and corporate power. I repeat, the instruments we need to deal with these matters are already in place. The Canada Business Corporations Act has been effective in providing shareholders with a mechanism to protect their right to fair treatment and adequate disclosure of financial information. Furthermore, the government recently passed the Lobbyists Registration Act to promote openness of relations between lobbyists and the public sector. The government's policy on business ownership is incorporated in new regulations for the financial sector in the form of legislation that will soon be tabled in Parliament.

Clearly the government already has a number of instruments to deal with any situation in which a given transaction raises or appears to raise concerns, and with any matter related to mergers in general. That is why I feel that the wide reaching legislation proposed by the hon. member for Nickel Belt to examine domestic investment is unnecessary.

If I may draw a parallel with the Foreign Investment Review Agency, abolished by the present government and replaced by Investment Canada, it is my firm belief that turning the director's office into a domestic investment review agency, to be established by amending the Competition Act in order to create business and employment opportunities for Canada, would in fact discourage Canadians from investing in their own country and thus lead to a substantial loss of investment.

[English]

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, this is the first time I have had the opportunity to rise on this side of the House. In spite of the fact that I am still with the same government, it is a geographical change.

Mr. Peterson: Shame! Come on over.

Mr. Schneider: I crossed the floor and no one made an issue of it. I cannot understand that. The trouble with being a mere five foot eight is that when you undertake something like this it is hardly noticeable. So to my taller friends across the way, my sympathies to you because you cannot do anything without being recognized, whereas those of us who go about busily enduring the work of the day, we get little credit for it, but at the end of the day, when we put our heads on the pillow, we know that, indeed, the job has in fact been well done.

With that preamble to the matter before us, Madam Speaker, I would like to tell you and the hon. member that presented the motion before us this evening that I, too, desire competition. I desire competition for it has very many beneficial effects on the entire consumer economy. There were several examples this evening that I would like to offer some comment on that are particularly related to the experience at Thunder Bay as it relates to Beatrice Foods and Palm Dairies.

The city of Regina, where I come from, had a similar situation that happened in reverse. Dairy producers made a bid to purchase Palm Dairies but they were unable to do that because of the competition laws or the manner in which the competitive laws in this country were applied. As a result of that we do not have this monopoly that was anticipated but instead, Regina will see competition provided by Beatrice Foods.

I would suspect too that the same situation could prevail in the operation of the diary in Thunder Bay. There would be room for some competition. We need no government regulations and in fact, we could see that void would be filled very rapidly. I say that from experience because in the city of Regina a similar situation happened. As was mentioned, in Alberta Safeways had purchased several other grocery stores and were ordered to sell some of these grocery stores. What happened in Regina is that this provided an opportunity for the smaller business sector to become involved through the private ownership of IGA grocery stores. They have picked up some of the slack that was left when Safeways was forced to sell some of these stores.

One might say that big Safeways operating alone with just the smaller independents really would not experience the presence of competition. That, in fact, may have been so, except for the fact that that void was filled very ably by Westfair Foods Superstore, which in turn has provided the greatest spirit of competition that our city has ever seen.

Madam Speaker, these matters seemingly serve as problems on the surface but in the end, if the market is such, these voids will be filled by those seeking the bottom line, the profit picture, or that which provides wages for employment.

Another example that I have had in our community is that in the restaurant business.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, I will have to interrupt the hon. member.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

THE SITUATION IN OKA AND CHÂTEAUGUAY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Siddon:

That this House commends the exemplary conduct of the men and women of the Canadian Forces at Oka and Châteauguay;

That, in the opinion of this House, the laws of Canada must apply on all Canadian territory, including Kahnawake, and that all persons currently at the Kanesatake Treatment Centre should lay down their arms and submit to the processes of Canada's judicial system, thereby encouraging the creation of a constructive climate for discussions between governments and the Mohawk people on land claims and other issues; and

That, upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, today, we are confronted with a so-called Indian crisis, but strictly speaking, it is a crisis concerning relations between different groups of Canadians. The basis of that crisis can undoubtedly be traced back over 400 years of Canadian history. That crisis was aggravated by the government's inaction in the last six years, it has become an inextricable mess because in mid-july that government chose to let things degenerate.

[English]

Madam Speaker, Oka was no accident. This House needs no reminder of the tragedy that lies before us. Infant mortality rates simply stagger the mind. These people have a reduced life expectancy by 10 years of the average Canadian citizen. Those of you, and I, who have visited and spent much time on reserves, know that we are looking at a people uprooted, a people decimated. We are looking at each individual aspect of their lives. Whether it be housing or their traditional economic way of life, we as a society have left a blight upon this nation's landscape. The government must now move to demonstrate that it understands the historical injustices that have been perpetrated on the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

This afternoon the Prime Minister indicated that finally he understands that a different approach is required. I would say that far more than that, the government must now be prepared to endorse fundamental and deep-rooted change. The government must stop the pablum. The government must now get specific. The time for pious wishes and promises without follow-up is over.

What must we do? Certainly, the first thing is we must recognize the absolute necessity of entrenching in the charter aboriginal self-government. Self-government is not something that you give to a people who have governed themselves for 15,000 years before the first white man or women arrived on these shores. Self-government is not something that needs detailed definition any more than freedom of association did. It is part of our system to establish concepts and let them evolve. Self-government is the culmination, the aspirations and the hope of a people who want to build and make for themselves a life comparable to those who live around them, and indeed in the terms of the exploitation and development of their own culture want to demonstrate that they can stand proud with anyone in the world.

Second, we must enhance the participation of aboriginal peoples in federal decision-making. Federal governments have consistently violated the fiduciary relationship which they have with the aboriginal peoples. You cannot consistently go to court with those with whom you have a trust relationship and expect that trust relationship to be valid any longer in law. As a result, I believe that the government should move immediately to establish a joint committee of ministers and aboriginal leaders to oversee the transition away from the Department of Indian Affairs, to oversee the development and the ultimate implantation of aboriginal self-government.

Third, we have land claims. The government should appoint a minister whose sole responsibility is to deal with the task of concluding comprehensive land claims. This should be done in consultation with aboriginal leadership.

Fourth, the government should move to establish a specific claims tribunal. There are over 500 specific claims that remain unsolved, and the number is growing. Indeed, they are a profound source of friction and disaffection and that cancer must be removed.

Fifth, the government should rectify the injustice caused by constant broken treaty promises. It should establish a treaty commission whose sole purpose is to recognize explicitly that you do not solve the problems and the developing interpretation required of treaties by constantly going to court and engaging in litigation. It must be done by a body that understands the cultural background in which both treaties were signed historically and the modern needs of a modern nation.

Sixth, the government should take the lead in working with urban aboriginal Canadians. It must establish support of political, cultural, social and economic institutions so that those aboriginals living in large and small urban centres are not simply put on the dung heap of some suburb.

In the city of Winnipeg there are 600,000 aboriginal Canadians. We are talking about cities within cities, and as of yet this government has not even begun to recognize the nature of the problem.

I would join the Canadian Bar Association in the seventh and final recommendation. The government should accept its responsibility for Canada's Métis people. The Métis people of this country have been a ping pong ball between the federal and the provincial governments since Confederation. If you go into the urban cities that I have just described you see what the result is. It is politically immoral for the two levels of government who normally engage in fights over which has the jurisdiction to engage in fights over which should have the jurisdiction trying to put off their responsibility.

What I have recommended is not all that earth-shaking. What indeed is earth-shaking is that what I am recommending has never been done. We in the House sit here and debate many issues. They are important issues. In not all of these issues, however, does the world simply stop and take note of our debates. In not all of these issues do we have it within our power to totally affect the world. But there are certain areas of human endeavour where we in the House can make a fundamental change in the way the world regards certain aspects of its policy. There are others where only those of us in the House can bring about fundamental change.

The problems of aboriginal Canadians is a Canadian problem. It is one that we must solve within this House. If there is any reason for any man or woman having gone into public life in this country, it is to make sure that in the course of the next decade we make sure that we leave a legacy so that never again must Canadians look upon armed standoffs on Canadian soil. Never again must we see Canadian soldiers putting barbed wire around other Canadians who are holding arms. Never again must we see the terrible sight of Canadians throwing stones at each other or bridges barricaded. We have our chance within this decade, within the hands of the men and women in this House. We have an opportunity to make an historical legacy not given to very many. We must not miss this chance.

There is one last point that I would like to raise within the context of this debate.

[Translation]

One month ago, the Quebec Government announced an indemnisation plan for the people of Oka and Châteauguay affected by that so-called Indian crisis. But really, we are talking about a matter that comes under federal jurisdiction. Yesterday, I asked the following question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, without getting an answer, I must say: Is the federal government ready to share the tax burden with the Quebec government? I asked at the same time: Is the federal Government ready to fully idemnify the residents of the South Shore, Lasalle, Émard, and the South West of Montreal who have received no compensation? I repeat because I think that it is capital, if we want to resolve the crisis currently affecting my province:

[English]

Reconciliation will not be attained if a group of people who should not have borne the brunt of this crisis feel that because of the historical injustices that have been meted out to the aboriginal Canadian that they are asked solely to bear the financial burden. I believe that it is the responsibility of the federal government to share in the compensation for the southwest portion of Montreal, the south shore, and indeed for the inhabitants of Kanesatake and Kahnawake. I believe that we have an opportunity now as Canadians to do something that very few have had before. But we will not grasp that nettle if the only thing that we do in the House is engage in empty rhetoric; if the only thing that we do in this House is make more vague promises; if the only thing we do in the House is talk, as opposed to laying down specific goals, objectives, and targets. If for the first time we say that the time for talk is over, the time for action is now. If we do that, then we will have justified our existence. Thank you.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I listened to my hon. friend with a great deal of interest because I thought I was hearing an echo. Many of the things that he has suggested this evening have already been suggested in the House just a very short while ago when the Prime Minister spoke.

If you will just bear with me for a moment, Madam Speaker, I will repeat some of the agenda that the Prime Minister very briefly shared with us this afternoon. He said, first, that consultation with aboriginal peoples and respect for the fiduciary responsibilities of the Crown toward them will be built into the process of negotiation from the start. The second initiative is that legal undertakings regarding land transfers to treaty Indians given as much as century ago will finally be honoured. Third, he said that we will accelerate negotiations on modern treaties—the comprehensive claims, in other words—which until now have been limited to six and, to accelerate claims settlements, the government will no longer limit itself to handling only six at a time. We will consider other innovations, such as regional or province-wide negotiations.

He said that the second dimension of the government's agenda would be addressed to improving living conditions on Indian reserves.

I will not get into all the specific details, but further he said that one of the very important objectives of the government would be the enlargement of aboriginal capacity for self-government within the framework of the Canadian Constitution.

I heard many of those things mentioned by my hon. friend opposite. Since as part of his government in power for so many years he had a wonderful opportunity to stop some of the inequities that he spoke about from ever happening in the first place, will he now be willing to stand when some of these these issues come before the House, to vote with the government as we pursue this very comprehensive and very positive agenda for the betterment of the Indian people in Canada?

Mr. Martin: Madam Speaker, I was delighted to learn of the Prime Minister's speech in the House this afternoon. If what I said tonight bears some resemblance to his speech, perhaps it is because what I said today is a summary of the speech that I gave this summer in Yellowknife. My great delight was not so much hearing the concepts coming from the Prime Minister's mouth but the recognition that the Prime Minister read the speech which I sent him.

Mr. Crawford: Robbed again, Paul.

Mr. Martin: That is what happens. Plagiarism, Madam Speaker.

I would certainly like to tell the hon. member a couple of things. In my speech this summer, and indeed in the speech which I just made, I did not use the words "consider", "examine", "reflect upon", or "think upon"—all those words which our Prime Minister uses when he wants to make a fancy speech but does not want to come to grips with the issues.

The Prime Minister has talked about improving living conditions. Did it really take barricades on a bridge in Montreal in order to bring the government to the point where it recognized that it has to improve living conditions on reserves? Is it only within the last two weeks that 600,000 urban aboriginals moved into Winnipeg to live in conditions that no one should have to live in?

Mrs. Dobbie: You've got that one wrong.

Mr. Martin: The member used the words "the enlargement of the word self-government". The Prime Minister talked about enlarging self-government within the context of the Canadian Constitution. If the member understood the concept of self-government, she would not talk about enlarging upon a notion which is already as large as the sky itself. Self-government, as I mentioned before, is the hopes and the aspirations of a people. You do not enlarge upon something that had been given and that a people had before we got here.

I must say that words are important because they demonstrate, certainly in the Prime Minister's speech, and certainly as reflected in the hon. member's comments, a lack of understanding of what I am trying to deal with here. Self-government is giving a people the means of lifting themselves out of a problem which they are in. You do not talk about enlarging on a concept any more than you talk about enlarging upon the basic freedoms. You have them because that is what it is to live in this country. You have self-government on the same basis.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member who just spoke. On a couple of occasions both in his speech and in his recent questions he talked about 600,000 aboriginal people in Winnipeg. That is the population of Winnipeg. I assume he must mean 60,000, or something like that, which is closer to reality.

I am not trying to be cute here, but I could listen to the kind of speech we just heard if it came from the hon. member from Western Arctic, who probably ten years ago was not a mover and shaker in the Liberal party, but I know that the hon. member who just spoke has been a mover and shaker in the Liberal party for long time before he reached the House. In that context, I remember the effort made by the NDP caucus in 1980 to have aboriginal rights included in the Constitution. We had to bargain very, very hard, threatening to withdraw our support for the constitutional initiative of former Prime Minister Trudeau, in order to even have that considered. Then, in the end, in the final document when it came out after the last First Ministers' Conference, many of us were tricked by the Liberal Government of the day when, instead of having aboriginal rights recognized, we had the word "existing" injected into the final document, at which time there was very little that anybody could do about it. We either had to vote for that or risk having the whole thing collapse.

So, to listen to the hon. member go on quite eloquently about self-government and about aboriginal rights, knowing full well from my own personal experience how we got hoodwinked at the last by a government of which he was a supporter and probably a fund raiser, is pretty hard to swallow.

Mr. Martin: Madam Speaker, many years before I had any idea of getting involved in political life, I was involved with aboriginal affairs in the Northwest Territories where I worked. I was a founding director some ten or twelve years ago of the Canadian Council of Native Business, and I will not take a back seat to anybody in terms of my own involvement and interest in this particular area.

Mr. Blaikie: But admit what happened in 1980.

Mr. Martin: Just a second. The one thing I will accept from the member is the correction in terms of the numbers. The member is correct, I added one more zero. I have obviously been away from business too long.

The one thing, however, I would like to say is that I have an enormous amount of respect for this particular member. I am somewhat appalled to see him engage in base political partisan finger-pointing on this particular issue. This is an issue that no federal or provincial government can really take great pride in. I think that ought to be recognized.

I was involved in a housing project in Manitoba when there was a NDP government in power and I had a terrible time getting them to come to grips with it. I know the history of the CCF and the NDP governments in Saskatchewan. In terms of aboriginal matters, they were no more enlightened than any other government. I do not say this with any degree to attack and I certainly do not say it with pride. Every single government, federal, provincial, and, indeed, municipal, has very little to be proud of in this area. I do not think we should be pointing fingers. We should be doing something about the problem.

Madam Deputy Speaker: A very short question from the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, first, I want to thank my colleague from LaSalle—Émard for being very constructive and taking the high road in this debate. I believe that is what the people of Canada want us to do. They know there is a complex issue here and they do not want us to be self righteous. They want us to take the high road. I think he came up with some good ideas.

I also want to salute my colleague on his new appointment as critic for the Environment for the Liberal Party of Canada.

Specifically, I want to ask him a very short question about some of the most serious problems that natives have in the country. I cite Barrière Lake and the Algonquins which we talked about a year ago, the James Bay second phase with the Cree, and the Athabasca situation with the pulp and paper mills.

Could the hon. member take a couple of minutes to talk about how important the preservation of wildlife preserves and so on, are to native peoples? Quite often that causes a lot of the frustration that leads to the sort of condition we have in Oka.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is very limited time for the hon. member from LaSalle—Émard.

• (1830)

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): I will respond as briefly as I possibly can, Madam Speaker.

First of all, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. This member has tremendous credentials in terms of the environment. Indeed, the question could not have come from a better source.

I think that the most succinct way of putting this is that one of the questions that is often asked in terms of aboriginal matters is, are they going to lose their culture when they come into the cities, as they develop? I think that the real answer to that is, let us hope, over time, that there is a merging of cultures and not that the aboriginal Canadians lose their cultures but that we in fact begin to imbibe the richness that they have to bring. No greater area is that than in terms of the environment. There are no people who are at one with the ecosystem as the aboriginal Canadians. There are no people on this earth who understand the need for preservation.

Madam Speaker, I am being cut off. Let me simply say that I hope, in the process of acculturation that we, in this society and in this House understand the tremendous contribution to the environment of aboriginal Canadians.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments has now expired.

A point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The Chair and I have engaged in this discussion before, but the Chair continues, in my view, to violate the spirit of the question and answer period by recognizing people who are of the same party as the member who spoke when there are people of parties, other than the person who is to be questioned, rising at the same time.

If you read the McGrath report, which I have urged you to do I do not know how many times, you will see that the purpose of it is to permit members of other parties—if members of other parties are not rising, then someone can get up and have a kissy, kissy type question like they just had now. But the purpose is to have real questions, not the kind we just had.

Madam Deputy Speaker: A point of order, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I want to try and be very specific on this. The hon. member put his question forward. Our colleague answered it, but it does not preclude us from participating in the question and answer period on this debate.

I take exception to your tone because I believe that the question that I asked was relevant and specific to the debate that we were talking about.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think if anyone should take exception it should be the Speaker. I do know that the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has made this remark on a few occasions and we have discussed it in a very friendly way. I will make him notice that I did recognize people from other parties. First, there were two minutes left, the hon. member had been asking for a question and I thought it would be proper.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, Quebec lived through difficult times this summer. And as this debate is going on in the House of Commons, it is worth mentionning that this crisis has not yet been settled and that the Canadian Army is still on Quebec soil.

This Summer 1990 had begun with the failure of the Meech Lake Accord: the rejection by English Canada of an agreement considered by all in Quebec as a very strict minimum and by many as not enough. This failure was deeply hardly felt as a rejection of Quebec by English Canada.

It must be made clear that Elijah Harper blocked passage of the Meech Lake Accord because the national rights of aboriginal peoples were not recognized in it, whereas English Canada opposed Meech because they refused to recognize Quebec distinctiveness.

Following this rejection, this failure, thousands of Quebecers got together in the streets of Montreal last June 25 with a sense of pride and quiet confidence in their future. Quebecers never considered the problems in Oka as a revenge against the aboriginal peoples.

The aboriginal crisis broke out in a context where a majority of Quebecers were coming out in favour of Quebec sovereignty. And I want to say right away that we cannot but recognize, as the Quebec National Assembly did on March 20, 1985, the existence of aboriginal nations and that, yes, we have to speak in terms of self-government as Gil Rémillard, the Minister of Justice for Quebec, said the Government of Quebec was ready to do without waiting for the federal.

According to some public opinion polls, there was in English Canada, unqualified support both for the Warriors and the aboriginal peoples themselves. This prompted a response from some chiefs asking that a distinction be made.

Moreover, these public opinion trends and others have been completely unfair toward Quebec and Quebecers on the subject of land claims. We must then set the record straight.

To begin with, I want to say that the inalienable rights of the native peoples do not justify the actions of the Warriors and that the unacceptable actions of the Warriors must not let us forget the historic and present rights of the native peoples.

We must also say that the governement of Quebec has not waited for this crisis to occur in order to do something. Indeed, the 20th of March 1985, the governement of Quebec, then led by René Lévesque, made the following statement recognizing ten native peoples on his territory, and took tangible measures designed to make real progress on the subject of the recognition of these peoples' rights. I will now read this resolution of the Quebec National Assembly:

> That this Assembly recognizes the existence in Quebec of the following nations: Abenaki, Algonquin, Attikamek, Cree, Huron, Micmac, Mohawk, Montagnais, Naskapi, Inuit.
> That it recognizes their existent ancestral rights and their rights which are written in the Conventions of James Bay, the North of Quebec and the North-East of Quebec.
> That it considers that these Conventions, together with any other convention or future agreement of the same nature have the value of treaties.
> That it subscribes to the negotiations entered into by the government with the native peoples in order to further recognize et clarify their rights, that process being based on historical legitimacy and on the importance for the society of Quebec to establish with natives peoples harmonious relations based on mutual trust and the respect of everyone's rights.
> Urges the government to continue its negotiations with the native people on the basis, but not exclusively, of the 15 principles which were approved on February 9, 1983, in response to the proposals which it had received on November 30, 1982, and to make, with the nations which so wish or any of their communities agreements guaranteeing them:
> a) the right to self-government within Quebec;
> b) the right to their own culture, language and traditions;
> c) the right to own and control lands;
> d) the right to hunt, fish, trap, gather, and participate in the management of wildlife resources;
> e) the right to get involved in the economic development of Quebec and benefit from it, in order to develop as distinct nations having their own identity and exercising their own rights within Quebec;
> Declares that native rights apply equally to men and women;
> Affirms its determination to protect in its legislation the rights resulting from agreements with the native people of Quebec; and
> Agrees that a permanent parliamentary forum should be set-up for native people to express their rights, aspirations and needs.

Moreover, since 1986, the year the policy statement of 1973 was amended, following therefore the adoption of this global land claim policy, the Federal government, according to an information bulletin published by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in August 1990, signed four territorial agreements with native groups, including three in Quebec and one with the Inuit in Northwest Canada.

Also, I wish to remind the House that the Quebec Government signed in 1975 the James Bay Agreement with the Crees and Inuit in Northern Quebec, as well as an agreement with the Naskapis Indians in Northern Quebec in 1978. In the same information bulletin, the Department indicated its satisfaction at the positive attitude and spirit of co-operation demonstrated by the Quebec Government in its negotiations within the framework of the amended legislation of 1986.

It would be interesting to hear the Minister inform the House of the level of co-operation demonstrated by the other provinces with respect to land claims, because we know that, except for the Yukon and Northwest Territories, the provinces must be involved in the negotiation of land claims if these negotiations are to result in negotiated settlements within a reasonable time frame, which is not the case now.

Besides, at the moment, five agreements are being discussed, and two of them will soon be reached. Moreover, according to the same department, nineteen other land claims are pending, most of which are in British Columbia.

Could the minister tell the House what means he plans to use to accelerate the settlement of those land claims in order to do justice to the legitimate claims of the native peoples and to avoid that situations similar to the case experienced at Oka, which was known for quite some time, deteriorate into crisis situations, as has been the case in Oka this summer?

Everyone recongnize that the limit of six land claims established by the government is absolutely unnaceptable, and that would result in the native peoples having to wait practically a hundred years before all of their land claims are settled.

Prime minister Mulroney announced he would improve this, but did not say how. If he means increasing the number of claims from six to seven, or reducing the deadline from 100 to 95 years, that does not solve anything.

In these circumstances, how can this government say that it has tried in every possible way and in good faith to avoid the Oka crisis which has still not been settled?

In this context, how can we not understand the legitimate frustrations of the native peoples which have grown over the years and which explain the explosion of violence that we all deplore, condemn, including the native chiefs themselves?

In this context where this government and his predecessors have so obviously dragged their feet without regard to the possible consequences of what is in fact a blockade of native claims, how, Madam Speaker, can this government put forward such a simplistic motion calling for the House to congratulate our soldiers, and merely reaffirm the primacy of law everywhere in Canada without uttering a single word on the core of the matter, the native issue?

I also noticed this morning that both opposition parties, the Liberals and the New Democrats, saw fit to join the government in congratulating the Armed Forces for their intervention.

Of course, in Oka, the military played its role and intervened at the request of the government. That is and was its role. Now, regarding the motion before this House, I think it would be better if the hon. members waited for the results of a public inquiry before handing out condemnations and congratulations. It seems to me that, at this time, such an approach is the most logical and respectful to the prerogatives of the public and members alike, based on complete information on the management and development of this crisis.

I would have liked to amend the government motion, but I am not allowed to. The amendment would have read as follows:

> Replace the first paragraph and add the following after "That the House—":
> That the House recognize the basic rights of native peoples as the Quebec legislative assembly did in a resolution dated March 20, 1985;
> And that, in the opinion of the House, violence and arms will not constitute acceptable means of solving this conflict.

However, the procedure does not allow me to make such an amendment. I maintain nonetheless that, under the circumstances that we know of, that is to say the present faceoff between armed Warriors and Canadian Armed Forces soldiers in Oka, near Montreal, the contribution of this House would have been much more credible in the eye of Quebecers and natives had the House reaffirmed the following. First, the recognition of the national rights of native people in Canada.

Second, the commitment of the government to speeding up the settlement process concerning the native land claims through legal procedures and negociations to allow the peaceful resolution of this dispute. Third, the fact that provinces must take part in this negociation process in order to speed up the settlement of the claims. And fourth, to hold a public inquiry into the management and the causes of this crisis.

I think that, had it used such an approach, the government would have been more credible and would have contributed more to rebuilding the thrust and confidence needed to bring about the laying of arms without amnisty for the Warriors and to open negociations on the root of the problem.

The rights of some must not infringe upon that of others. While recognizing the validity of the native claims and condemning the armed violence of the Warriors as well as acts of agression against natives by protesters in the Chateauguay area, it must be realized that the citizens of Oka and Chateauguay had and still have to put up with major inconveniences because of a crisis in which they are merely helpless hostages. If expressions of intolerance such as the ones we have witnessed are to be avoided, and if we want and really have our heart set on rekindling the brotherly relations, neighbourly terms and mutual respect between the white communities, the Quebecers, and the native people, governments must assume their responsibities regarding the losses suffered by thousands of people. Otherwise, fine words and good intentions will again have resulted in nothing concrete. And results is what we need in the very short term if we are to restore good relationships between the native people and residents of Oka. I therefore ask the government to agree as soon as possible to Quebec's request to share in the financial compensation program and other measures taken by the government of Quebec.

The government must fulfill its responsibilities to all parties involved, natives as well as Quebekers.

Finally, I want to remind the House that, following the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, Quebecers have undertaken, under the authority of their National Assembly, and through a Committee on its Constitutional Future, a process supported by more than 60 percent of Quebec citizens who long for Quebec's sovereignty, as shown by the polls.

The crisis in Oka demonstrates how important it is for Quebec to recover its full sovereignty so that it can, on its own territory, carry out the decisions taken in March 1985 by its own National Assembly and recognize the native people and their rights. I am sure Quebecers are prepared to give the natives the place they are entitled to on their territory and wish to see their nation establish good relationships with the native nation.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments. The hon. member for Outremont.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Madam Speaker, I want to take a few moments to put a question to our colleague on the other side of the House. I want to ask him if he might make what I would call a useful contribution. Given his long professional experience and his knowledge of the ins and outs of negotiations, I wonder whether he would make a useful contribution through a number of known regular channels instead of advocating in the House that some form of censure be applied and urging that positions be made clear. Perforce, he has been very theoretical because he admitted himself that if he had been able and if it had been possible—he does use the conditional tense—on one hand would it be useful to assist the whole House and all parties if we could take a better approach along the lines of his position and his input— On the other hand, Madam Speaker, how would he explain to me or to the House the fact that in his remarks he sought to depoliticize a situation, and yet almost in the same breath he ended up with a statement which to me, a French Canadian from Quebec, seems to be highly politicized? I would suggest that the ongoing situation at Oka—and this goes for Châteauguay as well but it is more obvious at Oka—must be depoliticized in this House. Having the opportunity to express his views, the hon. member should try to explain to us why he should want to politicize the whole thing by opening up a second front which has nothing to do with the issue under consideration.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, I must say, first, that I was a bit suprised to be asked why we are bringing politics into those issues. I would have thought that the House was the right place to discuss politics and I am rather suprised by that question. That is a suprising question. And I say "politics" in the true sense of the word! I am not talking about petty politics.

Second, I did ask to meet the leaders of the native nations of Quebec and that meeting will take place in a few days. I hope to better identify the issues with them. Since you mentioned my past experience in the labour movement. I have also decided to meet with union representives who are actually preparing briefs on that question. Both native leaders and officials from Châteaugay and Oka have been invited to that meeting.

• (1850)

Contacts have already been made. I was explaining in my speech that I could not propose any amendment now since the Standing Orders do not allow me to do so, one amendment and one amendment to the amendment having already been tabled. But I say to the hon. member that that does not preclude anybody from proposing new ideas even if amendments are out of the question.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the member who just spoke.

How can he reconcile the statements made by his leader in the House who said it is evident that it is necessary to refuse sovereignty to the aboriginal people of Quebec and was speaking of the courage and the strength to say that it is not possible to have more than one sovereignty over one territory? I wonder how he reconciles that with what he said about the charter recently passed in the Quebec National Assembly. Is it possible for Quebec, as he perceives a sovereign Quebec, to allow sovereignty to native people within Quebec as those native people are requesting?

Furthermore, I would like to ask the member a question on the committee that was established to look into the constitutional future of Quebec by the Quebec National Assembly. Are there any aboriginal representatives on that committee in order to convey the aboriginal view?

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member is refering to the speech made by Lucien Bouchard, to things which were saw but not reported. I should know because I was the one who provided Mr. Bouchard with notes, and it is precisely—

Mrs. Deputy Speaker: I will have to interrupt the Hon. Member. I know that he is making his maiden speech, and I understand a bit what is going on. I just want to remind him that he should refer to his colleague as the Hon. Member for Lac Saint Jean and to address the Chair when answering questions put by member. That would make things easier for everybody. The Hon. Member for Laurier–Sainte Marie.

Mr. Duceppe: So, I start all over again. I suggest we should refer to the statement I made earlier taking all points into account. Mention is made of self–government and not sovereignty. It is there in so many letters. Therefore, there is no contradiction.

Also, when I examine their claims, nowhere do I find that Native people refer to sovereignty, always self–government. It seems to me rather curious that some people should be more Indians than the Indians themselves. We must read their statements. They insist on self–government for reasons based on economic and political realities, while the Quebec nation has a sovereignty project which was developed on the basis of historic conditions of economic and political development. I suggest that within a sovereign Quebec, it will be possible to get along perfectly, and the evidence of that is that Quebec was the only province ever to sign agreements with them.

Under the NDP Government led by Premier Barrett who now sits in this House, no agreement was ever signed with the Natives although this is where the problem is the most crucial.

Let us remember the facts. On the commission established by the Quebec Government, we, of the Quebecois Bloc, insisted on the presence of Natives, among others. We insisted also on the presence of cultural and ethnic minorities, as well as women. Therefore, I fully agree that there should have been Natives sitting on that commission.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have a very short question, but first of all I would like to welcome the new member for Laurier—Sainte Marie to the Parliament of Canada. I listened very carefully last Sunday at the ceremony in Hull to his views. I hope over time that there will be changes made in the House so that his view of fighting for a sovereign Quebec will change. I hope over time all of us can work together so that his view will change.

My question is very specific because I tried hard to understand the feeling for sovereignty. If I were a Cree elected in the region of James Bay to the Parliament of Canada and I decided that I wanted sovereignty for my peoples in northern Quebec, I would like to ask the hon. member from the Bloc Quebecois what his view of such an action would be?

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): First of all, Madam Speaker, I see that we will be understood when the time comes for us to negotiate Quebec sovereignty with English Canada.

Also, I suggest that we must take into account the wishes of the Crees in Northern Quebec. They insist on self-government over their territory and they do not insist on ruling over so much land—which would mean 17 countries within British Columbia—would English Canada be prepared to accept that? That is not what the Natives want.

I am beeing asked hypothetical questions about the potential claims of the Crees in Northern Quebec while that is not what they are asking for at all.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): But do you not agree?

Mr. Duceppe: Listen, I will continue. I saw the negotiations in Quebec and that is not what they are asking for. Under the circumstances, why wonder about that?

This would be an hypothetical situation. Native leaders in Quebec mentioned self-government, control over their territory, and creation of police forces in Lorette-ville under Quebec legislation. That is the kind of requests they make and which were negotiated. Never to this day have I heard them ask for sovereignty, creating countries within Quebec or any other province.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been some consultations among all sides and corners of this House. As members will know, we are into extended sitting tonight and a number of members from all three parties have indicated a desire to speak tonight.

I think you would find, Madam Speaker, unanimous consent to allow individual members to indicate whether they wish to speak for the 20 minutes or to split their block of time for 10 minutes plus a 5-minute question and answer period with another member of their own party.

Just so it is very clear, Madam Speaker, should this be accepted, it will not change the rotation between parties and members will have to indicate at the outset, on rising, whether they intend to speak for 10 or 20 minutes so that the Chair as well as other members are familiar with what is going to happen.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion made by the hon. member. Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. member: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I hear one dissenting voice. I would like to make things very clear. The hon. member has suggested that members who wish to speak for only 10 minutes could do so and anybody who wants to use the full 20 minutes could do so. The only caveat would be to advise the Speaker. If someone uses the 10 minutes, those 10 minutes would be followed by a 5-minute question period. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Is the hon. member seeking consent as we do our rotation to have our party, if the speaker so wishes, split its 20 minutes into two 10-minute segments or just to speak for 10 minutes or 20 minutes? I would just like that clarified.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, the intention is that the normal half-hour block of time in rotation for each party will be used as each party sees fit.

If they decide on a full 20 minutes followed by a 10-minute question and answer period, that is their choice, or they can decide on a 10-minute speech with 5-minute question and comment period and another 10-minute speech with a 5-minute question and comment period for their half-hour block.

• (1900)

Mr. Rocheleau: Madam Speaker, we agree that those members who wish to divide their time should be allowed to do so. However, since this debate on the situation at Châteauguay and Oka is a very important one, could you tell me, Madam Speaker, if the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will be in the House in the next few minutes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer has been in politics for a very long time. He sat in other legislative assemblies and he knows full well that it is not appropriate to comment on the absence or the presence of a member or a minister in the House of Commons. I think it is wrong to presume that someone who is not present in the House does not hear or follow what is going on. I cannot answer the hon. member's question and I hope that this type of question will not be asked too often to the Chair.

Mr. Mills: Where is Lucien Bouchard?

Mr. Lapierre: He is no longer a minister!

Mr. Rocheleau: Madam Speaker, you are certainly right and I apologize. You were also right to say that I sat in other legislative assemblies and, usually, the minister was present when matters relating to his department were discussed.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The hon. member for Comox—Alberni.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, regardless of what I feel about the motion on the Order Paper, I think it is worth while to have this debate to hear the range of views and understanding and information that members have on this important issue critical to Canada. It seems that some people have extremely different and diverse views as to what aboriginal people in this country are seeking and what has even been presented to this body or to politicians over the years. It is worth while to have this kind of debate in the House.

However, I want to say that I am completely opposed to the motion presented by the government at the opening of this session. The motion is an absolutely feeble excuse to explain the government's failure to deal with the issues at Oka and those issues which led to the erection of the Mohawk barricades and ultimately led to the police attack on the barricades at Oka with the tragic loss of the life of Corporal Lemay and finally with the calling in of the army. It is a failure of the Conservative Party's leadership that has led to the situation we face today after 70 some days of a siege at Oka and Kahnawake.

Evident through the whole process was the failure of leadership on the part of this federal government. The failure of the Minister of Indian Affairs to become involved to the full extent of his jurisdiction, as the person who has under our Constitution jurisdiction over, as the Constitution says: "Indians and lands relating to Indians". The minister has through proclamations dating back to 1763 and through court decisions as recently as Sparrow, a trust responsibility to the native Indian people regardless of where they live in Canada. That trust responsibility was abandoned and that minister's jurisdiction over Indians and lands reserved for Indians, as spelled out in the Constitution, was abandoned. That is a shameful abandonment of leadership and jurisdiction and trust responsibility on the part of the federal government, including the Minister of Justice.

Where was the Minister of Justice when international human rights agencies as well as human rights agencies here in Canada indicated to the Canadian public that human rights violations were taking place? The Minister of Justice, who is responsible for reporting on issues of human rights to this House, was absolutely silent during the whole event. Not a single comment came from that Minister of Justice on the human rights abuses and what action she should take in order to correct those abuses.

Where was the Prime Minister of Canada, the man who came into this House claiming as his credentials and pointing to his resumé as a man who was a skilled labour negotiator, a man capable of bringing people together and resolving problems between groups in conflict. During this whole situation, the people who have a leadership responsibility and a constitutional responsibility to deal with it were nowhere to be seen.

That is why we are dealing with a problem that is some 70 days old, that has become an embarrassment to Canadians, both in this country and overseas. It is why this Parliament is now dealing with this slippery resolution, to try to excuse the government from its responsibility to do what is constitutionally and morally required under its trust arrangements with the native people—that is to face this issue and use every effort it can to resolve it peacefully.

This is not the first time that violence has been resorted to in Canada. Rather than putting this in the very narrow perspective of what the parties are asking for at Oka, I think we should put this into a broader perspective and relate it to other conflicts that have taken place in this country dating as far back as 1837.

It is strange that when you look through the history books the same words are repeated over and over again, the same principles are repeated.

You will recall, Madam Speaker, the days of the—you will not recall because you were too young—Château clique and the Family Compact, and the rebellion of 1837. At that time people were interested in responsible government in Canada and in giving people the power of the purse and having elected parliaments—the kind of political freedoms we enjoy today. The Government of Canada of the day labelled those people as the Château clique and the Family Compact. They were labelled as dangerous terrorists, as criminals, as people who threatened and ignored the law of Canada that governs all of us and that before which we are all treated equally. Those people were labelled in very much the same way that the Mohawk people at Kanesatake and Kahnawake are labelled today. And this was back in 1837.

Madam Speaker, I think you will find that history has been much fairer to the people who took up arms against the Château clique and the Family Compact in favour of elected legislatures, of responsible government, and of turning over the power of the purse to the people—people like William Lyon Mackenzie who gave his name to one of our Prime Ministers in Canada and who later became a member of this body—than on those who stood in a chamber like this and insisted that people who took up arms against the country were terrorists and criminals and should face the full weight of Canadian justice. People have looked far more favourably on William Lyon Mackenzie than they have on the forgotten people who called them criminals and terrorists.

It is surprising how often Canada repeats the same mistakes over and over again. In what is called the North-West Rebellion of 1870, headed by one Louis Riel, and another rebellion in 1885 on the banks of the Saskatchewan River in the Northwest Territory at the time, Riel and the Métis and a number of the aboriginal groups pulled together to attempt to have some government established in that territory that would recognize their rights and their role in the Northwest Territory or in the Manitoba territory of the day.

Again, it was a government of Canada headed by the same political party—John A. Macdonald was the Prime Minister then, and since he is departed from this room I can use his name rather than his riding. John A. Macdonald was the Prime Minister and I can recall him saying—I was too young myself at the time, Madam Speaker, but I can recall reading in Hansard about John A. Macdonald standing up in this House and calling Riel and his cohorts a band of criminals who defied the law of Canada and who were willing to take up arms against the legitimately constituted Government of Canada which, of course, treats all of its citizens equally.

Of course we all know the outcome of the North-West Rebellion and the Red River Rebellion of 1870. Louis Riel was hanged. But history has treated Louis Riel a little more favourably than some of the people who had him hanged.

Louis Riel is now considered a late Father of Confederation, one of the founders of the province of Manitoba and one of the leaders of the Métis and aboriginal people on the prairies who sought justice from the central government in Ottawa. I think that history has looked more favourably on Louis Riel and continues to do so than it does on those who said that nobody has the right to take up arms against this country and that blind obedience to bad law is the requirement of the day. I think history has looked favourably on those people.

None of us like to see Canadians being forced into the position of taking up arms against the government. None of us in this House would condone that kind of action on the part of any individual in this country. However, I think all of us understand that when a people is driven to the point of frustration, when they are constantly put down, when they are constantly treated like second class citizens, when they are constantly treated like colonial people, then the frustration builds, and builds, and builds to the point where those within the group who suggest a recourse to violence or to arms often obtain more credibility than those who wish to negotiate their grievances and their concerns in good faith. I think that is what has happened at Oka and at Kahnawake.

I do not like the Mohawk Warrior Society and do not respect its objectives if they believe in using violence against the people of Canada. I do not like those objectives but I can understand them. If Canada drives those people to the point of frustration then the message that is carried by the Mohawk Warrior Society is going to gain a great deal of credibility among the Mohawk people because all other routes have failed. Recourse to the law of Canada has failed. Recourse to lobbying politicians has failed. Recourse to the media to demonstrate the conditions that they are suffering under and living under has failed. Recourse to local government to try to get them to stop, whether it is building a golf course on what is perceived to be Indian land or claimed to be Indian land, has failed. What are they expected to do? To simply submit. Madam Speaker, there are voices among the Mohawks which said that they were not prepared to submit and that they were prepared to take up arms against Canada and that is precisely what happened.

I do not think it is the fault of this government exclusively. It is the fault of people in this House of Commons, it is the fault of past governments, it is our fault because we as non-aboriginal people, have not recognized what aboriginal people are asking for and in fact, how moderate, how legitimate and how supportable are their demands. It is amazing that we have not listened to those people over the years.

We all come from various backgrounds where these kinds of demands were made in the countries from which we originated. One of the few things that I confess to is that I share in common with the Prime Minister of Canada that our ancestors came from the same country. That country is Ireland.

The conquest of Ireland by Britain began shortly after 1066. In fact, a small territory was set up in Ireland called the pale where the English were safe to live and beyond the pale—that is where the word comes from—was where all those savage, wild Irish like the Prime Minister's ancestors and my ancestors came from. It was not until the 14th, 15th and 16th centuries that England finally conquered Ireland and made it a part of England. But when they did so, they could not understand why those Irish people did not consider themselves as British as every other Englishman; why they did not consider Ireland, to use the Prime Minister's own words, an integral part of the country over which another sovereignty could not survive.

Yet, in every single generation, from the time of conquest of Ireland, Irish people rose up in arms against the government, with their pipe poles and their declarations, demanded sovereignty over Ireland and, ultimately, in 1921 they gained it. Now, on what was considered an integral part of British soil, is a republic. As the old song went in Ireland, a nation once again and that was what the Irish people were seeking.

I do not think you could find a country that is more friendly with Great Britain than the Republic of Ireland, but all they wanted was the right to govern themselves within what they perceived to be their own territory and to co-operate with Britain as equals.

When native people in Canada talk about sovereignty, they are talking about nationhood. They are talking about being recognized as separate, legitimate nations. After all, they say, how could Britain and France come to North America and enter into treaties with those nations? One does not enter into treaties with dependants. One enters into treaties with nations who have the sovereign right as nations to enter into treaties with one and which are considered equal to one.

We are talking to people who have those kinds of treaties with Britain and with its successor, Canada. Those people consider themselves and have the legal documents to describe themselves as sovereign nations within Canada.

The world is changing dramatically and we cannot say any more that it is possible for a country to exist without recognizing the aspirations of the founding peoples within it. It is absolutely impossible.

When I look at what is happening in Europe or the Soviet Union today precisely the same thing is happening. The Soviet Union attempted to retain hundreds of nationalities, hundreds of separate countries within its own boundaries, and to control them from Moscow as if they were Russian people. Now the system has broken down and the nationality and the aspirations of those people have come out again and they are demanding to be nations once again.

The people and the nations of the world looking at the process going on in the Soviet Union are excited about it. They are excited about the prospect of these, what were called nationalities in the Soviet Union, now seeking their freedom, now exercising their autonomy, and now becoming, as the Irish did in 1921, nations once again.

If we in Canada look at eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, see that these kinds of things are happening in those areas of the world and support it saying it is a good thing, then I am certain, in order to be consistent, we have to look at what the aspirations of the aboriginal people are in this country, because what they want to be are nations once again.

Going into this new world that is being described by what is happening in Europe in 1991, in eastern Europe, and in the Soviet Union, Canada has a tremendous opportunity, to go into this world of the future, recognizing the sovereign peoples within the country and developing a method of negotiating with those people and making settlements and treaties with those people. Rather than having what Lord Durham, in 1839, called "two nations warring in the bosom of a single state" or what could be today compounded with the aboriginal question, "many nations warring in the bosom of a single state", Canada has an opportunity to establish a model for the world as to how one state can recognize the sovereign aspirations of its individual members to become even more powerful and strong and even more of a teacher to the world than Canada is today. Unfortunately, what has happened at Oka has set us back as being a teacher to the world a decade or a century.

I was hoping that when we came into this Parliament for this fall session the Prime Minister in some way would have relented and in the resolution he presented to the House he would have recognized the faults in leadership that were made during the summer and the faults in interpreting the Mohawks demands, which the Prime Minister characterized as bizarre in the same way the British characterized the sovereign ambitions of his ancestors when they were revolting against the British crown.

I would have hoped that the Prime Minister of Canada in this fall session would have presented to us a mechanism which would have allowed for the honourable disengagement of the conflict at Oka so that there would be a basis for friendly, open, and productive negotiations between Canada and Quebec and the Mohawk people at Kanesatake and Kahnawake, and so that we could recognize some of their sovereign aspirations and work out ways of realizing some those aspirations while keeping this nation strong and united.

I remind the House that the country from which the Prime Minister's family originated is now one of the greatest supporters and allies of the country that it formerly opposed and rose up in arms against. There is a possibility of solution in this situation. Unfortunately, I cannot see any possibility in the current resolution, other than carrying on and making the dispute worse.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I am especially concerned and interested in the government's resolution which is before the House because of the great concern that has existed in the many Indian reserves which are located in the Algoma constituency. I know that the hon. member for Comox—Alberni who has just spoken represents bands in British Columbia. One of the special features about the whole situation which has existed this past summer is that right across the country, with bands from east to west, people are very concerned about what has happened.

The problems have arisen primarily because the government failed to act and resolve the issues with regard to land claims during the spring and summer months and the whole situation has deteriorated into one of the worst crises that I think we have seen. It has not only hurt us abroad, it has hurt relationships between with aboriginal peoples within our own country. I just hope that the efforts which are being made for negotiations will be enhanced and increased. I believe that there is concern and frustration building that will cause an incredible explosion among aboriginal peoples and Canadians generally if the matter is not resolved peacefully.

Our representative here in the House has called for a royal commission to look into the problems and difficulties that have arisen. A similar motion was passed by the Massey Town Council calling for a royal commission during this situation this past couple of months. To the credit of the bands in the Algoma district and Manitoulin district, there were a number of demonstrations along Highway 17, at Massey and at Garden River by the Garden River Band, the Spanish River Band and the Wikwemikong Band, and they were all very peaceful. They were done on the basis of expressing the concern which aboriginal peoples felt with the situation as it has developed in Oka and in the way it was allowed to deteriorate.

We got a lot of wise advice from bands such as the Wikwemikong band where they were pleading that the Armed Forces not be used against First Nations. They were calling for negotiations to settle the underlying treaty and aboriginal claims problems, that the Sûreté du Québec be kept at bay, and that the frustrations that were there be dealt with on a peaceful basis.

As the hon. member for Comox—Alberni has outlined in his speech, I think this is a very serious matter that requires negotiation and a peaceful settlement so that we can get on with solving the underlying problems that have caused great anxiety and frustration among aboriginal peoples throughout the country—not just in Oka and Kanesatake and the bands in and around Montreal, but right across the country, including my own districts of Algoma and Manitoulin.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there a comment from the hon. member from Comox—Alberni?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I am not sure there is a question there, but certainly I have a response to the comment.

I think different aboriginal nations approach dealings with the government in different ways and there certainly are concerns among different nations as to what is happening in the Montreal area.

The Mohawks come from a very unique and different tradition. The incidents that have taken place very much reflect the tradition from which those people come and very much reflect the strong belief that they have based on treaties going back into the mists of time that recognized, on the part of the British crown, their sovereignty and ability to operate as a nation, to make war, and to conclude peace. One has to recognize that what is happening in Montreal is part of a unique Mohawk tradition.

There are other traditions across Canada and, in fact, many of the native nations in my province have preferred a route that does not involve the use of arms but the use of negotiation by sitting down and concluding treaties in that way.

However, I have to suggest that there is a frustration developing among the people in British Columbia that the longer the government delays, the more problems there will be for people to negotiate settlements at the negotiating table. More and more people will see the alternative taken by the Mohawk warriors as the way to go.

The Prime Minister's statement today—and I take him at his word—might lead to some breaking of the log-jam and hopefully some possibility, if the government lives up to its promises, of settling aboriginal claims against the Crown more quickly and more effectively.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, since the House reconvened we have spent some time discussing the situation at Oka, but what we have not done is taken affirmative action to find a peaceful solution to the problem.

Canada has been viewed traditionally as a leading force in promoting and defending human rights. We have earned a fine reputation at the international level, so we cannot continue to ignore our problems at home. We must address the plight of our native people, not just at Oka, but throughout Canada.

This issue has a far-reaching effect. Natives and non-native Canadians alike have voiced their concerns, and the eyes of the world are watching with interest to see how we resolve this crisis. At a time when many of the world's so-called closed countries are opening up, it is vital that we restore Canada's image as a diplomatic and caring nation. We must address the concerns of our native people and put fair and workable solutions ahead of taking arms in our hands.

We are traditionally a peaceful nation and must prove, not just to the world, but to ourselves that we can put aside our differences and negotiate.

Madam Speaker, the government must take positive steps to deal with native issues. We cannot afford to ignore justice, fairness and recognition of our native rights. I call on the Prime Minister to get involved and find a peaceful solution and I call on the government to take affirmative action now and set up this royal commission which my colleague has been calling for.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I actually have a question for my colleague, the member for Comox—Alberni.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will have a conversation with his colleague from Winnipeg—Transcona. It does happen that someone from the same party does ask a question.

Mr. Angus: You could not resist, Madam Speaker, could you. I will have a discussion with my colleague.

My question for my colleague from Comox—Alberni deals with the underlying issue of land claims. I heard the hon. member speak at a meeting on Manitoulin Island this spring of the northern council of the NDP. At that time he explained the economic impact on the region of a completed land claim.

I wonder if he might inform members of the House as well as those people watching of the positive aspects of why we as a society should finally deal with our aboriginal peoples and settle these outstanding land claims, some of which go back as long as this country has existed and even before.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I was interested in a statement made earlier today by the member for Nunatsiaq, discussing what actually happens during a land claim. When the Prime Minister was making his speech, he indicated that land was being given to the Indians. In fact, when a land claim is settled Canada takes land from the Indians, gives them a bit of the remnant over which they have control and compensates them for the balance. So Canada is always the greatest beneficiary in a land claim settlement, or what the Prime Minister referred to as a modern treaty. Canada reaps the greatest benefit.

I would also like to point out that if you read the details of the framework agreement of the treaty for the Council of Yukon Indians, you will find that over the ten-year period that the Indians have agreed to take compensation, they have also agreed to phase out all of the exemptions from taxes that they enjoyed as a result of the previous arrangement they had with the federal government when the land claims were unsettled. That is an advantage to the Canadian people.

Another thing that happens and is clearly evident, for example in northern settlements, is that in the past forest and mining companies and oil companies have gone into the north, taken resources, taken profits and taken them to Montreal, New York or elsewhere in the world and discapitalized the area.

By settling land claims you are giving an opportunity for people who have lived in those areas from 8,000 to 13,000 years and are unlikely ever to move away, to spend that capital in the area in which they live so that it has the effect of recapitalizing areas that were previously discapitalized under the old system of Canadian economics.

We now see that native corporations own things like First Air and Air Quebec. They are forming their own transportation agencies, corporations, mining companies and trading agencies. Those things benefit all Canadians from the point of view of income, as well as from employment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Châteauguay.

Mr. Ricardo Lopez (Châteauguay): Madam Speaker, before I start, I would like to mention that I intend to take the full 20 minutes to which I am entitled, although this would hardly be enough if I were to talk about all the issues and all the pain and suffering the people of Châteauguay had to endure during the long so-called Amerindian conflict.

First of all, Madam Speaker, I would like to situate the riding of Châteauguay. It contains the largest and most heavily populated Mohawk Indian reserve in Canada. As you know, it is located southwest of the city of Montreal, just across the Mercier Bridge, where they set up one of the biggest barricades. The riding continues along the St. Lawrence in a westerly direction. This is a particularly beautiful and picturesque spot, a lovely contrast to the rest of the riding. I am not saying this because I happen to have the honour of representing Châteauguay but this riding is one of the most beautiful in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lopez: Now I would like to speak more directly to the subject at hand. So far, I was very surprised at the way my colleagues handled this topic. One after the other, they made some very eloquent and well-structured speeches, and I realize I have a lot to learn before I reach that level. Of course most of these speeches were probably written by someone else, but in any case, they were very eloquent.

Everybody is talking about rights this evening, but not a word about duties. In our society, we have rights, and I think that is a very good thing, but we also have duties. And we tend to forget we cannot have one without the other. We are kidding ourselves if we claim we have certain rights and don't recognize the fact we have duties as well.

Speaking of rights, some Indians have been vigorously demanding the right to free movement—free movement of goods, persons, and so forth. Oddly enough, the same people who talk about free movement set up those blockades on bridges and highways. It seems to me they do not always practise what they preach. There is a very clear contradiction here.

If they want free movement, it seems to me that setting up barricades is not the way to go about it, and the people I have the honour to represent in Châteauguay and the general area realize that. These people have not been able to move freely for over two months. There seems to be a double standard here.

Madam Speaker, I want to say that I have absolutely nothing against the Indians or the Mohawks who live in my riding. Far from it! I am proud to represent them and I am proud to be of service to them now and then. Even though this may sound contradictory, every week in my riding office I see more than fifty of them who ask for information and every kind of services. Rest assured that they are always and will always be welcome in my riding office.

But unfortunately another small group has infiltrated this group of Mohawks, most of them law-abiding citizens. I must say that perhaps—I am even sure of that—all these people are not even Indians residing in Canada. As you know the unfortunate reality is that we have to import a good many things, but we could probably have done without this kind of trouble.

I have another comment to make. The previous speaker dealt very briefly with the matter, namely the fact that our international reputation has been hard hit, tarnished, and perhaps it is no longer as good as it once was. This would be very unfortunate if it were to be true.

I come from a country called Spain which is in Europe but which is now part of what is now known as the European Parliament. A few days ago in this European Parliament they voted on a resolution condemning Canada and singling us out for badly treating our minorities. Madam Speaker, unequivocally and unhesitantly I could tell you that Canada does not have to take a lesson from anybody whatsoever, not even Europeans.

I visited all the European countries, Madam Speaker, and lived in fifty-odd countries.

I should know. I can tell you that there is not a single country in the world that can compare with Canada, not one which has so much respect for its minorities and grant them so many privileges. It seems today that for people to belong to a minority is almost like having a certified cheque in their pockets, because everybody has rights. They only have to mention that they belong to a minority for the authorities to get on the defensive, for fear of being accused of racism, even when it is not the case.

During the so-called Native crisis in Châteauguay, I heard a number of reporters in the media accusing some Châteauguay citizens, if not all of them, of racism. But let us look at the facts. How could the Châteauguay people be accused of racism when they chose to elect as their representative a member of a minority. It is impossible! Nobody can be accused of racism in Châteauguay, in the whole area which I have the honour to represent or in its vicinity. Otherwise, I would not be here talking to you. I just cannot understand how some people could come to the conclusion that the peole in Châteauguay are racists.

In all this situation which was quite above me, something happened which I did not like at all. It was the day when some Ville LaSalle people, near Châteauguay, displayed quite an unfortunate behaviour. They were reported having thrown rocks at Natives leaving the reserve.

Madam Speaker, it is clear that violence must be condemned, no matter where it originates. I do not condone the actions of these people. But we should be realistic and understand the situation. Why did these people behave that way? It was somewhat in response to another action. You know that it is very easy to condemn the majority by calling it all sorts of names. But in all logic and fairness, we must then also condemn the other side and ask for an investigation because Indians also threw stones, in fact not just stones, but projectiles.

They caused irreparable damage to property as well as to human beings. So, to be consistent I agree that there should be an investigation, of course, and that those responsible for such disgraceful behaviour should be tried and punihed. I fail to see how we could justify being so tough with a group of people whose actions were much less serious than those of others but who are singled out while everything else is forgotten.

I find it very hard, Madam Speaker, to accept that type of justice which really borders on injustice. Sad to say but what can we do. There is no escaping reality.

Anyone acting as did some of the Mohawks in Kahnawake who held a whole community hostage, who put up barricades on bridges and highways, should not realistically expect to be welcomed with open arms. That is unthinkable. There is no doubt that of all the people in the world, none are more calm, patient and tolerant than Quebecers. I should know. To put up with me sure takes a lot of patience! Yet, they elected me once in 1984, reelected me in 1988 and will elect me again in 1993 and so on, at least I hope so.

Our people have suffered enormously. I have urged our government to try and help them with some compensation for all or part of the losses they have suffered. Throughout this crisis, businesses and plants of all kinds had to close up. Let us mention only the case of a Châteauguay restaurant called Le restaurant rustique. It is well known across Canada and even the whole of North America, if I am not mistaken. The staff was reduced from 100 to 15. Imagine, 85 jobs were lost in a single restaurant. That means 85 families suffering the consequences of the crisis. There are farmers, carriers—

In the riding of Châteauguay, and more particularly in the city of Châteauguay, nearly half of the population goes to work in Montreal. These people commute via the Mercier bridge morning and night. To a large extent, they have been deprived of their work. Some have lost their job. So, I hope that my government will listen to the people of Châteauguay who are requesting financial assistance for the area, by way of grants or whatever, because it is well know that many companies starting up request at the same time grants from the government. In this case, the government should say: "Your request will be considered, but you must settle in Chateauguay." The government usually tries to help when disaster strikes here or there. Well, I think that is our country I am talking about here. So we should be given the same consideration.

The truth is that, whatever our efforts to help people "recover" and to compensate for the losses they have suffered, it will never be enough. Their losses are too great and, in some instances, can not be quantified. For instances, there was a time when developers may have wanted to buy land here for industries. Well, they will prefer to look elsewhere. They probably went elsewhere. That lack of confidence can not be quantified, and there is no way of knowing how many jobs or millions of dollars were lost because of that. We know full well that we have lost a lot, and the hardship will persist for a long time in the population once the crisis is over.

I have a message for the Indian leaders. The chiefs have always advocated peaceful solutions, conciliation and good example. I would like to ask them this. If, in fact, you wish to remain credible, why not tell right now the Warriors behind the barricades to surrender immediately and to face the justice system. It seems to me that, by that action—despite the fact that some chiefs have already lost some credibility, but they may regain it at least partially—, they could put a stop to all that madness, I call it "madness of the century". There are also women and children behind the barricades, children who could go back to school and start leading a normal life again. And we too, as Canadian taxpayers, would stop paying for a totally irrational thing. Some estimate the total cost of the dammages in the billions of dollars. We cannot do that; we cannot afford it.

I appreciated what the prime minister said today, namely that they have to face justice. I agree with that. In our country, there should be only one justice. As long as it is enforced; otherwise, it is nothing but a sieve. I do not believe that our population deserves being harassed as injustly as this. Land claims I understand. But others claims are made as well. I have heard about requests for a new reservation in Oka. I am very reluctant to agree with that.

To my mind, reservations are synonymous in many cases with ghettos. This is a solution which can create problems, as we have seen it. Creating a new reservation would amount to creating a new problem, and we already have enough problems. I quite agree that Indians should be treated fairly, the same as anybody else, but creating reservations around cities can only lead to problems for the future.

I hope the government will not fall into that trap which to me would be a serious mistake. I agree that Indians should be treated fairly. But to create problems in an attempt to solve other issues would be a mistake, Madam Speaker. No problem is solved by the creation of another. I thank you for your patient attention, Madam Speaker. I also hope also that my government will listen to me and take the matter under consideration, once the crisis is over. We cannot look back. However there is one thing the government could do now is to give some sort of compensation to the people who have been a victimized through no fault of theirs.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would first of all like to salute the member. His speech tonight was obviously based on his first-hand experience this summer. I am sure it was very tough for him and his constituents.

I must tell the hon. member that there are many things he said this evening that I agreed with. No one in this country wanted to see a community go through frustration and inconvenience. Many people in my riding would phone every day and they could not understand what was going on. They could not figure out why there was so much tension.

It concerned me as well, Madam Speaker, and I must tell you that last week I went to Oka. I listened to some residents of Oka who were Mohawks. For someone living in Toronto the obvious question is: How did this all get started?

I was told by friendly Mohawks, not warriors with armed guns; I believe in the rule of law—about the background of the frustrations that were going on vis-à-vis the golf course, the 94 acres, and the municipality proceeding and totally ignoring some of the warnings that were given by members of this House.

Then I was told about how these barricades were set up near Oka and that on a particular day a group of mothers and children from the reservation were at a prayer ceremony and were confronted by the Sûreté du Québec. How it happened or why it happened, obviously none of us in this Chamber want to judge right now, but shots were fired and to the great regret of everyone in this Chamber and in this nation a police officer lost his life. In the process of that experience everyone became frightened. The native community became frightened, the people of the area became frightened, and everyone got their backs up.

In no way, shape or form am I condoning ignoring the rule of law here, but I must tell you, Madam Speaker—and this is where I am heading with my question—that I went there last week to seek answers to questions to find out what was going on.

I was invited by two Mohawk residents of Oka to come into the community. As the cars approached the barricade by the Trappist Monastery, there were many people who got through the barricade. The press got through the barricade. I went there and I was stopped because I did not live in the community.

I was very polite to the police officer of the Sûreté du Québec and I said with humility: "I am a parliamentarian. I have hundreds of constituents who are asking me: 'Are you asking questions? Are you getting answers? What is the point of view?'" I must say that I felt great tension and resentment from the people manning those barricades, not our Armed Forces. I found the Canadian Armed Forces to be very positive in their attitude and accommodating. That part of the Prime Minister's resolution I support, but there is some mystery here why the Prime Minister does not mention the other forces that are involved.

I personally encountered a very rough experience with the police force. We talk about decency and rule of law. What about the men who are holding those positions? The Prime Minister talked about masked men and guns today, but sometimes when we ask a person who is masked why he is masked, we find out that he is masked because he is afraid and he does not want to be intimidated or caught or whatever.

Do you know, Madam Speaker, that I asked the officers of the Sûreté du Québec if they would give me their numbers and they refused to do it? This is true. I am not trying to be difficult here. This is an absolute truth. Thank God I had cameras because I took their pictures. The law has to go both ways. These men refused. Their attitude promoted tension.

The hon. member mentioned development, tourism and other things that are important to the economic health of this country and that we must have galvanized communities. Does he not think that there is room for improvement in the attitude of the Sûreté du Québec and those people who come into contact with them in relation to this crisis?

Mr. Ricardo Lopez (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, there are several aspects to the question of my colleague and I will try to deal with them as best I can.

I deplore the fact that a parliamentarian cannot have access to what is going on on the other side of the barricades while a lot of other people do get through. In my opinion parliamentarians are just as good as any spiritual leader or any of the journalists. I am really sorry he could not go behind the barricades and see for himself what was going on so he could keep his constituents well informed.

It is quite deplorable. But you know, at times throughout this crisis the Quebec Provincial Police behaved impeccably, but they did act irresponsibly now and then. I am referring to the incident on the Saint-Louis-de-Gonzague bridge when a group of citizens blockaded the bridge and were rather savagely man handled by the police. Worse still, after the police ordered them off the site the people obeyed but the officers continued to hit them from behind and did some damage to their cars. I thought they acted like barbarians and savages.

But I can tell you that during the Indian crisis, as it is called, during these two months most of the time the QPP did an outstanding job. I want to thank them and pay tribute to them.

However you know that in the QPP as in any other police force there are good officers and others who are not so good. The experience you had was truly unfortunate and I deplore the situation as much as you do, but we should not blame every single QPP officer.

I want to say a few words about the other authority on the site, namely the Canadian Army. My hat is off to them! I knew that Canadian soldiers were highly competent, very human, well disciplined, but never to that extent. I think that just as I am doing all my fellow citizens and all Canadians will have to pay tribute to the Canadian Army.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Well, Mr. Speaker, I was in my office listening to my colleague on television, but some of the comments he made prompted me to come back here to ask him some questions.

Mr. Speaker, my riding is right next door to that of my colleague from Châteauguay. I believe there are always two sides to a story. The question I want to ask him specifically refers to what the hon. member has just said, namely that everybody got his hands dirty in this case. We agree on that, everybody, the government, perhaps all political parties, I do not rule any of them out, all political parties to a certain extent, we all have somewhat dirty hands. Nobody is perfect. Perhaps I might make my colleague from Châteauguay understand that it is true, we did make some progress, and that is my first point. Secondly, I would ask him very quickly: Is it not true that at one time the member for Châteauguay said that the best solution for the native people would be to send them all to Labrador? One last thing that my colleague said was that he agreed with the statement made by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Della Noce) who said in the middle of the Indian crisis that the Conservative Party and members were never told what was going on by their own government? Can he answer these questions?

Mr. Ricardo Lopez (Châteauguay): With pleasure, Mr. Speaker. If I had more time, I could elaborate further. Of course, I will gladly reply to these questions.

To the first question which stated that everybody has dirty hands, I reply that mine are clean enough, thank you. I do not think they are dirty. I do not know whether you were looking in the mirror when you said that, but my own hands are clean.

When he makes other allegations as to what I think of other comments, I must tell him that remarks should not be interpreted out of their context. I do not believe that in the speech I have just made, I ever mentioned Labrador or the Hon. Member for Duvernay. Therefore, his comments are entirely out of context, as usual, like most of his NDP colleagues! He should wake up, because never once in my speech did I refer to Labrador, the Hon. Member for Duvernay whom I hold in high esteem, or anything else. If he insist on asking questions about what I said, I will reply gladly, but he should not get lost. Please, come back down to earth and stick to reality, as we do on this side of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time allocated for questions and comments has now expired. The Hon. Member for Restigouche—Chaleur has the floor.

[English]

Point of order.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I have been here all day and tried to ask a question. I wish to congratulate my colleague for the speech he made but this time my name was mentioned when my hon. colleague spoke about Duvernay.

I do not think this was in his speech. The only reason he came here was because there was no NDP member present during the speech of my colleague. I would like to congratulate him for taking the lead. What I said during the time of this crisis was that I was not informed enough as an MP. I did not have any trouble getting through the barricades. I went to Oka where my people have suffered all summer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is debate, I am sorry. On the same point of order.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I understood with the intervention of the last speaker, that under no circumstances, whether you have been here just a few days or a few years, should you make reference to whether people are present or absent in the House. I would like you, Sir, to let me know if that rule still holds or if it just holds for people of other parties.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That rule holds but I believe he was expressing his own feelings. It was debate, it was not a point of order and I think we should carry on with debate.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to the motion of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In this motion the House is urged to commend the exemplary conduct of the men and women of the Canadian Forces at Oka and Châteauguay.

The motion also mentions "That, in the opinion of this House, the laws of Canada must apply on all Canadian territory, including Kahnawake, and that all persons currently at the Kanesatake Treatment Centre should lay down their arms and submit to the processes of Canada's judicial system, thereby encouraging the creation of a constructive climate for discussions between governments and the Moḥawk people on land claims and other issues;"

I am pleased to see the government has decided to have a debate on this important matter. However, I seriously question the government's refusal this summer to recall Parliament to discuss the conflict. It was high time the government woke up.

Mr. Speaker, what is particularly shocking about this whole affair is the government's inertia, its failure to act. It is clear the Conservatives have made a complete hash of the situation. They tried to ignore the conflict, hoping it would just go away. Unfortunately, problems that are ignored tend to get worse. In any case, the native blockade is a very complex matter and will take a lot of effort and imagination if it is to be resolved in the best interests of all parties.

Native people do not live in very fortunate circumstances. Just look at the statistics.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I will just quote a few statistics. Reserve Indians have the lowest average personal income in Canada. Unemployment rates hover around 70 per cent and on some reserves the rate is as high as 90 per cent. Infant mortality rates for Indians are double the Canadian rates. Thirty-eight per cent of Indian homes on reserves have no central heating. The life expectancy of male and female Indians, aboriginals, is much lower than other Canadians. These statistics tell us a sad story. As the member for Western Arctic explained this morning in her eloquent speech, the native people of Canada do not need tear gas to make them cry.

The government has said that it wished to commend the exemplary work of the Canadian forces. That is fine, but how do we know that this is so because there is now a new blockade that has been set up that not many people have talked about today. That new blockade—just add an

"s" to the word "new" and you have a "news" blockade and that is where the problem is right now. I believe that this motion we are dealing with today does not deal with all of the issues and that one issue is very important.

What are the implications of a news blockade? Need I remind everyone present and those viewing that freedom of the press is one of the pillars upon which our society rests. This situation, this news blockade, undermines the public's right to know. How can we be expected to treat this situation rationally if we are denied the basic facts which are provided to us by the media? Censorship in any form is reprehensible. It undermines the foundation of democracy and, sad to say, paves the way to dictatorship. In fact, the media have a role to play and it should be unfettered.

What is truly amazing, Mr. Speaker, is that every time the Prime Minister is confronted by a crisis he tries to shift the blame. It is always someone else's fault. You will agree that this is a singular demonstration of lack of leadership. He has even had the gall to blame our party and even our leader. I want to make it clear that the Hon. Jean Chrétien has done a great deal more about this situation than the Prime Minister will ever hope to do.

Let me outline just a few of those things. On July 20, Mr. Chrétien went to Oka. He got in and he spoke to the Mohawks. Did the Prime Minister go? No. I do not know whether the Prime Minister has any intention of going.

On July 25, the Hon. Jean Chrétien called together a special caucus committee to hear witnesses, to hear the concerns and try to find solutions that would come from consensus and understanding.

He also announced that the Senate committee on aboriginal peoples would meet and hear witnesses. Again, the Liberal Party was acting immediately. Mr. Chrétien also called a national press conference on August 7. So that has all been done. He has been active on this issue.

The Liberal Party made numerous requests throughout the summer for the recall of Parliament. Many MPs have written to the Prime Minister asking for that recall.

I wrote a letter. I asked for a royal commission to be appointed and that a mediator be appointed. I said: "By failing to act on this matter the government has allowed the crisis to spread to other parts of the country and as a result fuelled an already volatile climate of intolerance". That was July 20.

I want to mention other actions taken by our members. On July 29, the Hon. Herb Gray and our critic for aboriginal affairs, the member from Western Arctic, also visited Oka to get a firsthand view. Did our Prime Minister go? No.

I believe that the Prime Minister has to start taking some responsibility. He tends to blame everyone else. The Prime Minister has to get out of his cocoon and stop playing hide and seek with these issues. I know his advisers have probably advised him that his poll ratings are so low he should keep a low profile, take a break for the summer. My gosh, he took them at their word. It is about time that the Prime Minister met his responsibilities.

I like to give a little bit of credit where it is due also. I was glad to see the Prime Minister enter the debate this afternoon. He made some comments in regard to what some of the actions will be on behalf of his government. I hope that he can come up with more specific solutions to the problems at Oka and Chateauguay.

I would also like to talk a little bit about my riding. Although the Oka crisis has monopolized a great deal of the media's attention, it is only the tip of the iceberg. In fact, there have been many demonstrations held by natives right across Canada over the last little while. Obviously they are a direct result of the federal government's failure to address the settlement of land claims and the demands of aboriginal organizations for self-government.

In my riding of Restigouche–Chaleur, the Micmacs at the Eel River Bar Reserve blockaded Route 134 near the town of Dalhousie, New Brunswick in late July. They did this in order to manifest a solidarity and sympathy to the Mohawks. Although their original purpose was a show of solidarity, Micmacs decided to exert a little more pressure for some of the outstanding claims and grievances that they had which were mostly with the provincial government. These grievances included the loss of fishing, water rights, as well as the employment question.

While speaking of the employment question, I would like to say that since unemployment is so pervasive among local natives, one of the things that they would like to see is more flexibility in the training programs, and in employment and immigration programs. I would like to see more flexibility with that and I would hope that the Minister of Employment and Immigration would note that.

There was a problem in my riding. They were trying to put pressure on the provincial government. What did the provincial government do? Unlike the federal government, the New Brunswick Government stepped in to help find a quick and peaceful solution to the blockade. They sent four ministers on site to meet with the Eel River Band Council and with those who were involved with the blockade—right on site. Four ministers went right in there and cleared it up. The aboriginal people were satisfied with the commitments they received from the New Brunswick government. Obviously the federal government should take some lessons on crisis management from the New Brunswick government.

I would like to congratulate the RCMP who handled the situation in my area in an excellent manner, the Micmacs of the Eel River Reserve, the band council, the chief, the local population for their patience and understanding, and certainly the provincial ministers who went in there to alleviate the situation as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, the conflict in Oka and other demonstrations held by native people across Canada are a direct result of the federal government's failure to deal with land claims and requests for autonomous government by native organizations.

The Mohawks in Oka have tried, unsuccessfully, to obtain recognition of their claims. The government says the Mohawks do not have title since time immemorial to the lands around Oka and that the King of France granted these lands to the Seminary of Saint-Sulpice, thus extinguishing the rights of the Mohawks.

The Mohawks and their legal advisors believe that recent judgments by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Sparrow and Sioui cases might provide new ways to support their land claims. According to these judgments, the courts are to apply a broad interpretation of subsection 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, and reject exception of so-called legal severance which has proved a stumbling block for many comprehensive claims.

The federal government has neglected to amend its land claims policy to reflect the recommendations of its own task force on comprehensive land claims, and it has refused to acknowledge the precedents created by recent court judgments on these matters, hence the conflict at Oka.

Already guilty by omission, the federal government, as a result of its complete failure to act, made matters in Oka and Châteauguay far worse.

Finally, when it was obliged to intervene, the federal government purchased the land in question from Oka and declared that it would resume negotiations with the Mohawks as soon as they took down the barricades and laid down their weapons. It also approved Quebec's request for bringing in the army, thus showing that it preferred to endanger lives instead of negotiating.

The actions of the federal government show that it is weak and that it will not resume negotiations unless threatened with a confrontation. It will not adjust its policies to reflect recent court decisions.

[English]

It is very important that the government realizes that it is a serious affair we are facing. It is important that it takes action. It is nice to put a nice motion on the floor here, but it is only a motion. We need action. I would only hope that the Prime Minister in his speech this afternoon was more than sincere and can convey a type of trust, not only the Mohawk people, but to all Canadians because Canadians are very concerned.

• (2020)

In conclusion, I would again call upon the government if at all possible to appoint a royal commission on aboriginal affairs to look at the whole question right across Canada once and for all to see if we can come up with some solid solutions that would be acceptable to everyone.

I would also think that a public enquiry is a necessity. It is a necessity because there are so many unanswered questions. There are so many Canadians out there who are asking the questions: How did this happen? How did it happen in Canada?

As an immediate step in the right direction, I would hope that the Prime Minister would appoint a group of parliamentarians to go to the treatment centre to explain to some of the movement the government is planning, if it is planning any and to discuss with them their continuing concerns. An all-party group of parliamentarians must be sent to Oka to visit the treatment centre to help to resolve this conflict in a peaceful and acceptable fashion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments. The hon. member for Manicouagan.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Having listened with considerable interest to the comments he has just made, Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell my colleague the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur that I followed the events in Oka and Kahnawake all summer long because, like him, I have within my riding Native communities whose leaders and inhabitants were quite concerned about the goings on in Oka.

Having had the opportunity to talk several times with the elected leaders of the Montagnais communities within my riding, I can say that they found the situation very difficult because these hardworking and peaceloving people had managed over the past few years to implement a whole series of programs and set up various organizations which allowed them to assume their own shelter, educational and economic developments. If they were concerned about the action taken by a number of people within the Kanesatake and Kahnawake communities, it is because they feared they might lose the trust and credibility they enjoy within the other North Shore communities.

I am sure that, just like I did, he followed the development of this very difficult situation with considerable interest and that he was concerned about its possible consequences.

I have two questions for my colleague the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur. This afternoon, our colleague from Western Arctic referred to the Federal Government's fiduciary role with respect to the Native people of Canada. Although he certainly agrees, as I do, about the fact that the Federal Government plays a fiduciary role with respect to our First Nations and that it is responsible for ensuring their welfare, development and security, would he admit that this fiduciary role does not entail condoning actions such as those taken by the Warriors in Oka over the past summer? I fully agree that the federal Government is responsible for ensuring their security, welfare and development in every respect, as well as their full participation in Canadian life, of Canada, but I think it is going a little too far to suggest that the government of Canada condones such actions as those taken this year in Oka. So, I would like him to comment on that.

My second question to my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur is this. He praised earlier the actions of his leader, the leader of the Liberal Party, during the summer. I would like to know if he agrees with the statement made by his leader to the effect that the Warriors should be free to leave, so they can be recaptured two days later.

Those were my two questions, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): I thank you for that question, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, it is the responsibility of the federal government, as fiduciary, to protect the interests of the natives. I can tell you that I have disliked actions from both sides in Oka and Châteauguay in some instances, but I will not be the judge of that.

The other question deals with the policy concerning the 20 Warriors at the treatment center. There were 200 Warriors. So, where are the others? The Quebec government has let them run away. The federal government, your government, let them go. There are only 20 left. Where are all the others?

You have already implemented the same policy, a policy of carelessness.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Mount Royal. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood will have a question and then I will recognize the hon. member for Laval-Est.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I acceded my spot to my hon. colleague from Broadview—Greenwood but I would like to take this opportunity to thank my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur, first, for a very interesting speech and, second, for raising the issue of the news media black-out.

If anything could define a modern democratic society in today's world, it is, among other things, the freedom of association, the freedom of the press, and the kinds of institutions that allow full disclosure. I was very pleased to see him note that.

I was wondering how the hon. member reacted in Question Period today when the Minister of National Defence in a sense let us feel that the journalists who are on the scene essentially are part of the problem and not part of the people who could enable a better understanding and promote goodwill between people.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I must thank my colleague for her question and her kind words. As I mentioned before, that new blockade that was set up, the news blockade, is certainly a problem. It has created a mistrust out there. It has created a situation in which some of the people behind the barricade are afraid in a sense that the information that is getting out from there might be a little different than what actually the facts are. There are a lot of things.

I happened to see a couple of news programs one day when some of the media were throwing their films to try get them out. There seemed to be a mad scuttle there to try to get them. In fact, in one case I saw the film taken away from someone who was trying to pick it up. It seemed to be someone in a uniform, so I wonder what we have to hide.

Some of the communication that is going on between the Armed Forces and the warriors in the treatment centre is by a sort of an educated mode, I guess. They use rocks. They tie their letter to a rock and throw it in. They throw it back and forth. It is not the way to act.

If we want a peaceful settlement, we must develop an air of confidence, of trust and I really think—

We should send a parliamentary committee in Oka to talk to the Mohawks, review their situation in Oka and see if they are ready to disengage under reasonable terms.

•(2030)

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur.

He mentioned in his closing remarks how trust is really a key issue here.

I get many letters from my constituents. Today, I received one where the constituent talked about the fact that the native way of life was probably the original example of a sustainable society. Those of us who profess to be environmentalists are uttering words not worth a hill of beans if you do not immediately start to resolve native land claims issues. Probably many in this House do not realize but our member from Restigouche—Chaleur when he was working on Bill C-39, the forestry issue, forced the members of that committee to come up with the first definition of sustainable development that any act related to the environment in this Parliament of Canada has had, and I salute him for that.

My question is very specific. In keeping with his focused attention on sustainable development, does he not agree with those constituents who are saying that we in this chamber really cannot profess to be serious about the environment unless we begin looking after Canada's first environmentalists. I would like him to respond to that.

Mr. Arseneault: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me a chance to reply to this question. I must thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for the first question and his kind comments as well. I might hire him as a publicity agent to do some promotion.

I must say that it is true without going overboard with it. I think if we look at the state of our environment, not only here in Canada but around the world, we will find that it is a precarious state. I think if we turn back a leaf and look to our aboriginal people we will see how they managed the environment. They did not necessarily manage, but their attitude is so different. Attitude is one of the biggest environmental problems in the world, not only of a politician, but of normal everyday people who are not willing to have their life styles change. They are not willing to make sacrifices. I think we can take many examples, not only from our own aboriginals here but from other peoples and other countries. I think it is very important that we use and take advantage of that situation while we can. As I mentioned, the environment is in a precarious position.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will start with one of my questions. I will give ask the hon. member the second question and I hope he will answer very briefly. I know when you are last to ask a question, there is not much time.

My colleague just said we should have a committee go to Oka to speak with the Mohawks. Well, I have been here all day and I have been listening to the speeches. Everyone spoke about the Indians and the Mohawks. I have the proper respect for that, but not one person spoke about the white people, those who lost their homes and belongings. I have been there. I had no problem going through the barricades. I have friends there.

Mr. Mills: What's your point?

Mr. Della Noce: My point is that when we talk and we try to solve a problem, we have two kinds of peoples to solve it. There is the respect we have when we speak. I saw Miss Gabriel speaking on TV. We have to respect our fundamental rights. Yes, but what about mine? What about my people who are there who lost everything? I do not think the committee should be there.

[Translation]

I would have another question, Mr. Speaker. Quebec had, and it still has, a great poet called Felix Leclerc, who said: "The surest way to kill someone is to pay him to do nothing". It is true that Canada is the fiduciary. We give money. That is very well, but there comes a time when you wonder if it would not be better to give responsibilities and dignity. So, if a committee is to go to Oka to solve the problem, I would want the basic rights of the people on both sides of the barricade to be respected. What good does talking do? People I know there told me they do not want to go back to their homes. There is a problem: The most beautiful village in Quebec was destroyed. This is what the problem is: We can see only one side at a time. I therefore want my colleague to tell me if the government will continue providing money and nothing but money, not dignity for instance? Shall a word be put in for the other people whose houses were damaged? I would like to hear what my colleague has to say on that.

[English]

Mr. Arsenault: Mr. Speaker, to answer the first question with regard to not only listening to the Mohawks, we must listen to all Canadians, I think that is important. I think that is being done in each riding on that issue and I would hope that this all-party committee would also listen to the concerns of the other side, if we can call it the other side.

The hon. member stated that no one has talked about that. I must point out that my hon. colleague and friend, the member for LaSalle—Émard, in Question Period asked about money to compensate the people who were put out because of the Chateauguay issue and Oka issue and residents on both sides of the river, all around the whole region, including natives and non-natives. He addressed that issue quite well and I must congratulate him on that.

[Translation]

I also want to tell you that I agree with you. We cannot keep on spending money without accounting for our actions but it is important that responsible programs be developed. Different programs are tested here and there. There are training programs. I have talked about those in my speech: We need training programs but training programs that are a little more flexible for aboriginal people. That would certainly be a start.

[English]

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address this House on a motion respecting the situation in Oka and Chateauguay. This situation, with all its unpleasant and very serious threats to life, at times threats to innocent lives, happened for a reason.

If we put aside all the bad and negative feelings, what was the purpose and, indeed, what have we learned?

It is easy to point fingers and criticize. It is easy to look back and complain. What I think we ought to do though, is look ahead and ask ourselves, what is it that we must do now to heal the bad relations that have developed? What is it that we can do to seek positive solutions?

In retrospect, let us review the Kanesatake and Kahnawake situations. As one who has been involved directly with the advancement of native rights, seeking to do it positvely, I think I know and appreciate the frustration that my native leaders have felt. It is, nevertheless, unfortunate and sad that it has led to the taking up of arms.

The positive signal that this summer, difficult as it was, has sent to Indian country is that national unity and support behind a common cause is possible, just imagine what can be accomplished if the same energy can be expended toward positive goals.

An equally important result from this summer's incidents is that Indian issues are now on the national forefront. Before I propose some recommendations, as other members have done, may I remind the House of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and its second report. In that report, having heard witnesses, including National Indian Leadership, what the committee identified is an agenda for the 1990s. I quote from the report:

> The committee invites all Canadians to become aware of the issues that face aboriginal Canadians, because these issues do not affect aboriginal Canadians alone. These issues affect all Canadians. They affect the future strength, prosperity, sense of fairness and tolerance that allows all Canadians to define themselves.
> The committee also invites all Canadians to participate, each in their own way, to advance these issues. Awareness of aboriginal issues and challenges is a necessary first step.

• (2040)

I am very encouraged by the Prime Minister's statement a few minutes ago and I quote in part that: "It is time to put the Indian agenda into operation—one anchored in reality". One that will bring back the native dignity the Prime Minister referred to in his address and other colleagues who referred to it a few minutes ago as well.

Let me briefly look at what to me is a very serious negative message that has been sent to the aboriginal communities. The media coverage, although there have been recent comments in its defence, could have in my opinion been better in some reporting because the message that was being encouraged to the native youth across Canada is that "if you have a problem, take up a gun. If you disagree", the youth is now encouraged "to take up a machine gun or mount an armoured tank". That is not the kind of Canada I want.

Another negative aspect is the disrespect of leadership. Leaders in any community deserve more than to get beaten up in their own homes. When a chief is beaten up in his own home, there is a loss for everyone because such action does not solve the problems. On the other hand, neither is it right that provocative actions by soldiers be taken against unarmed women and children, be they native or not, particularly in a traditional longhouse.

I have throughout this crisis maintained that violence is not the answer. I called on my own people, as I do now, to give tolerance and patience another chance. Continue the dialogue. I along with members from the Western Arctic and Nunatsiaq have perhaps one of the most unique opportunities in this House. As one of our most respected elders Chief Dan George wrote, and I remind the members: "I am a chief, but my power to make war is gone, and the only weapon left to me is speech. It is only with tongue and speech that I can fight my people's war".

But what about the future? I am being told by my own councils to get in there and do something about Oka. Mohawk spokespersons said: "No, you stay away from here". When I had the opportunity to work with an ad hoc committee of cabinet ministers for many hours, other constituents said: "You are spending too much time on Indian issues". Amid all of this I met with Indian leaders to ask them: "We have all had a very challenging summer, now what do we do to bring both sides back together". I indicated to them some of the not too pleasant comments and calls that my staff and I received in our offices. During my constituency tour last week, virtually everyone we spoke with wanted an immediate peaceful solution to the Oka situation.

Importantly, however, Mr. Speaker, we have to regain the positive work that was underway and is underway across Indian country. Mr. Speaker, allow me to give you and the House four suggested recommendations which I have received from my own Indian leadership.

First, review immediately the land claims process with a view of considering an independent body or tribunal. The original problem, as I understand it, that sparked the Oka incident was the land claim. There have been many criticisms of the process, there have been many supportive blockades across Canada. We do not need any more evidence to encourage us to change. What is seen as a one-sided unfair process can be changed for improvement and I am pleased the Prime Minister addressed that this afternoon.

Second, consider immediately a new round of discussions or meetings similar to the First Ministers Conference. What is being suggested, however, is that the federal government meet with national aboriginal leadership bilaterally to discuss our future relations. I do not have to add the constitutional, legal and other obligations previous members of these Chambers have referred to in support of this proposition.

Third, I think for the first time the aboriginal leadership is calling on government to replace the Indian Act. Let us look at the alternatives for a new, positive relationship. We need to restore Indian dignity and pride. I encourage the Prime Minister's initiative for changes in the new year which he has just announced.

Fourth, as others have called for a royal commission, a public inquiry or whatever the name, what is needed urgently is a complete and comprehensive review of Indian affairs at all levels including the management by Indian leadership. I believe we will find the rightful place of aboriginals in Canada with this kind of effort.

In conclusion, I urge both sides in the Oka crisis, their leadership in particular, to begin new deliberations. They should put aside the hurt feelings, painful though that may be, and put down the weapons on both sides. This is a beautiful country and peaceful co-existence is possible in such a vast land. I believe we can continue to share. I believe we can continue to live together. Indeed we must.

To my colleagues, through you, Mr. Speaker, let me say that this is not an issue upon which we play political gamesmanship. This is not a matter on which we put blame. This is a time for us to work together. It is possible to come up with one mind, as the Prime Minister said, when Canadians of good will decide. It is possible to work side by side to continue to build a stronger, more united Canada. As one native person in this Chamber, that is all I ask.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend my hon. colleague who has just given such an eloquent speech and to talk about the way we should be viewing the questions that have arisen in this House this evening.

My hon. colleague mentioned four things that he had in mind as being very positive initiatives. Some of those have been spoken to earlier today by the Prime Minister. He thought there was a very positive initiative to replace the Indian Act. I am wondering what sort of model he sees in terms of dealing with this issue.

The Indian Act has been around for a long time. There have been many attempts to try to change it, but it seems to me that it has always been changed in a top down way where somebody who is white and perhaps does not have very much knowledge of what life is like on a reserve makes decisions for people who have to live them out. I wonder if my hon. colleague would perhaps expand on this point just a little.

Mr. Littlechild: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for her question.

It is a question that we have tried to deal with over the years to counter what has been the process in the past to which she referred, that top down change. We have some experience where a committee can be struck, one that represents the Indian leadership, one that represents justice, one that represents Indian affairs. We can work away at legislative amendment together and do it in a way where changes can be hammered out in a room that affect all sides and, indeed, have input from all sides. Although we have heated discussions in such a process, once that kind of procedure is established the legislative amendment that comes forward from that process has always been accepted by all sides because all sides have had input. I would encourage that kind of forum be undertaken for any proposed legislative amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, the hon. member for Scarborough—Agincourt, and the hon. member for Western Arctic, in that order.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I too join with my colleagues on the other side to compliment the previous speaker, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. Many times in this House we are torn between loyalties and the greatest loyalty that we can have, of course, is to Canada. In so saying, I know that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin had quite a burden to carry this summer, along with many other people in the House.

My question to him is quite straightforward. Does the hon. member believe that if we had acted more quickly at the beginning of the crisis, if the federal government as well as the provincial government had moved to alleviate the crisis earlier, might not all of this have indeed been put behind us so that what he is talking about, a return to dignity, would not have been necessary and that the people there would have kept their dignity throughout this whole crisis?

Mr. Littlechild: Mr. Speaker, hindsight being perfect, when I look back, I suppose one could say that, yes, it would have been better had we acted faster. At the same time, as my colleagues have said, nobody knew what was going to happen. I think that everyone in their own way suggested remedies to deal with the issue but no one knew, for example, that over the past many months, at least from what I understand, people had been preparing with arms for such an event and just waited for the timing to be right. When I look back, sure I could have said yes. We could have dealt with it earlier.

I think the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs even tried in its attempts to air out such issues during the past year. As I said, I find it very unfortunate and sad that we have had to get this far where both sides have taken up arms. I can only hope and pray that in the future we do not do this again.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I too want to say that I found speech of the member for Wetaskiwin to be very sensitive and genuine. I know he has been in a tough spot. I totally agree with him, as I think do all members of this House, that violence is not the answer.

I gather that at first he did condemn the use of the army. Perhaps he could clarify that.

The first part of the government's resolution starts right away by commending the exemplary conduct of the army at Oka and Chateauguay. I gather from the content of his speech when he talked about some of the things that went on there that he feels like us, a little uncomfortable that the government proceeded right away on its motion with sort of the law and order approach rather than proceed with what he did in his speech, talking about where do we go from here and what are the positive measures like moving on land claims that we could do. I would like to ask him to clarify that.

The second matter I want to ask him about is if he is aware of the report on Indian self-government by the 1983 Penner committee wherein the committee recommended that the federal government establish a new relationship with the Indian first nations and that an essential element in this relationship be the recognition of Indian self-government. The committee also recommended that the right of Indian peoples to self-government should be explicitly stated and entrenched in the Canadian Constitution, that the surest way to achieve permanent fundamental change in the relationship between Indian people and the federal government was by means of a constitutional amendment, and that Indian first nation governments would form a distinct order of government in Canada with their jurisdiction defined.

Could the member say whether he agrees with the Indian self-government? I know he talked briefly about it. Does he see that to be in any way contradictory to what the Prime Minister has been talking about when he is saying that all the laws of Canada must apply equally?

I do not think the Prime Minister has reached the stage, quite frankly, where he has in his own mind to recognize we need a really new deal with the native people which may mean recognizing, as the Americans have, a form of distinct aboriginal government.

Mr. Littlechild: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question and the opportunity to clarify what I said about the army's role. I did not condemn bringing in the army because as I understand it the initial request or the purpose for calling in of the army was to have it act as a peacekeeper or a mediator between the animosities on both sides: the Quebec police and the Mohawks.

When a joint request came forward for the army to be present I agreed with it. I condemned specific actions that I disagreed with, actions taken against unarmed women and children in a spiritual place like the longhouse. That is what I do not agree with. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that you or any member would appreciate such actions being taken by anyone in a spiritual place. I could not agree with that.

With respect to the report on self-government, if I may give a very personal opinion, it is necessary to recognize, perhaps in legislation, the existence of Indian government. I hear, of course, the proposition that there is only one law in Canada. In the Criminal Code there is one law, but the native people also have a criminal code and a criminal law, a code that is not written. Sadly it is one that is not recognized either. I do not think in my society, under our laws at home, that if a person commits a crime he can expect to get away with it. I do not think that is what is being requested.

Yes, we do have an Indian government, but we lack recognition. Perhaps a constitutional amendment recognizing that would be a simple step forward.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for his comments and I share with him the soul and the toughness of his position.

When the crisis broke I was overseas—and I have travelled extensively—and as soon as people talked to me they realized that I was from North America and asked me: "Are you from Canada or are you from the United States?" Every time I said that I was from Canada, there was a smile on people's faces. However, when I told them I was from Canada, I hesitated to continue by saying that I am a parliamentarian because I knew the next question to follow would be: "Why are you not in Canada? Why are you not dealing with the problem of your first citizens?"

The member for Chateauguay said that we have a duty and a right. Is it one of our duties as parliamentarians to have immediately recalled Parliament? Is one of our duties to our first citizens to look after them? Should we have recalled Parliament? Should the member's boss, the Prime Minister, have acted immediately without any hesitation?

Mr. Littlechild: Mr. Speaker, I too was overseas throughout parts of the summer and throughout parts of the crisis. In fact I was at the United Nations in Geneva where some of the Mohawk leaders were and I had an opportunity to deal with them. This unfortunate incident did not only happen domestically. The story was carried elsewhere.

In retrospect, again I suppose it is easy to say that Parliament could have been recalled, but as was stated earlier in Question Period in response to similar questions, every request that came forward to reconvene was not accompanied by a purpose for reconvening.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I want to take the opportunity to thank my hon. colleague, the member for Wetaskiwin, for his speech. It is a very difficult position in party politics for aboriginal people in all jurisdictions. A very, very tough question that we have to deal with is this. Although we deal with a group of people who have taken up arms, there is the bigger question that the Mohawk Confederacy wants dealt with. that is the question of jurisdiction and sovereignty. I know his legal expertise and I respect his mind when it comes to these matters. I would like to ask him this. How does he feel we can grapple with this very difficult question which relates to law and order which the government is very concerned about and which Canadian citizens are very concerned about? How do we deal with the issue of sovereignty? As he advises his government, what would his advice be to the government on dealing with the issue of sovereignty and the Mohawk Confederacy?

Mr. Littlechild: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Western Arctic says, it is a tough question. If I can relate back to my constituents, the second recommendation that they have presented was to consider immediately a new round of meetings similar to the first ministers' conferences. They did not set an agenda for those particular meetings but I am sure from previous and recent discussions one of those would definitely be to address areas of jurisdiction and sovereignty. I believe there are some areas where it is possible to delineate the responsibility and jurisdiction of one area, to delineate the jurisdiction and responsibility of another, just as we do now with the federal and provincial governments under the British North America Act.

In those new discussions it might be just possible that discussions could lead to areas of shared jurisdiction. Maybe it is possible to recognize that there is in fact a third order of government. It is possible to use the word "sovereignty", although it is hated, in that kind of a context.

We have examples all over where it is possible for a smaller nation to be within a larger nation and yet not have to give up its jurisdiction. If we look south, for example, in the United States, some of the islands where they have their own governments have sovereignty yet use the United States currency, defence, and jurisdiction in a lot of other areas. In other words, they share areas of jurisdiction but yet they feel that they are sovereign. The Vatican, as I understand it, is sovereign in Italy but yet it has its own jurisdiction. Therefore, I think there are models elsewhere that we can use that would bring about this kind of possibility in a new round of meetings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Outremont, a very short question, please.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to put a question to my colleague and at the same time offer my sincere thanks for having the honour and the privilege of hearing what I just heard.

Since the start of this debate, positions have been taken and statements made which I would qualify as partisan. This afternoon, after the Prime Minister's speech, we heard a member on the other side of the House open her heart to the Prime Minister and talk about issues that came straight from the heart. I felt that was very moving. On the other hand, another member of this House who belongs to a non-party made a number of comments that I did not appreciate at all, and I am getting to my question, Mr. Speaker, but I thought it would be useful to make these introductory remarks.

Our colleague spoke from the heart, he talked about his people, not in an intellectual way but with great feeling and integrity. Could I ask the hon. member, who is part of this cultural reality—I imagine his answer will be affirmative, but I don't want to prejudge what he is going to say—whether if perhaps here in this House we could raise the level of debate to that achieved earlier by our two colleagues, does he think that this House will be able to protect and enhance this cultural integrity Canada so desperately needs and which may provide the answer for other groups, including the one to which I belong?

[English]

Mr. Littlechild: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. But, as his remarks are prefaced that it would be an affirmative one, yes, I see this House being able to protect all rights of Canadians.

I think sometimes of an analogy that could be used. It is not a melting pot but a salad, and within the contents of a salad the lettuce is able to stay as lettuce. If we can use that kind of analogy, I think as all Canadians, we can all be protected.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to enter the debate this evening. First of all, I would like to make a few points clear about the motion.

The motion, unfortunately, does not deal with the issue. The motion has been made very specific for reasons that are hard to understand when you first look at the situation we are dealing with.

For background information for those of the House who are here, the riding I represent has 46 aboriginal communities. This issue was debated very heavily over and over all summer. It was probably the worst summer I, as a politician, have ever had to face simply because I did not have an answer for the people I represented. The questions that were being asked over and over again were what does this all mean? When will this all end? And, just where do we go from here?

I would like to deal with where we have been and perhaps if time allows talk a little about where we should go. I would like to use an analogy that has probably been used often in the House in this issue. It relates to a lost generation of aboriginal people. That lost generation, for those of you who are not quite aware of the history of Indian Affairs, are the people who were put into residential schools in the 1940s and 1950s, and until the early 1960s when they were done away with. That is what the aboriginal people call the lost generation. That was a time when non-native governments tried to force their will on aboriginal people, and by doing that were attempting to assimilate and do away with the race. As you know, that situation did not occur. It did not work.

I use that analogy in relation to Oka. The only thing that we achieved in Oka is we have attempted to break the spirit of one whole community. All the people who are alive today in that particular community will never forget this episode. We, as politicians might forget if we get carried away in discussing other issues of national importance, but the small village of Oka will remember this particular crisis and episode. That is really what this issue is about, the scars that are left after something that should never have reached a crisis situation becomes a crisis.

I use that analogy, Mr. Speaker, because that is about all we are going to get from the Oka affair when it is all said and done. We have affected and hurt a generation. We could never replace that hurt by handouts, money, or land. What is done is done.

I want to go back to what should have been and to what possibly members of this House should have paid close attention. Maybe I am naive but as a young politician who is very new in this place, I am very sensitive to what people tell me on the street. When I go up north I listen very intently to the 46 chiefs that I represent, their band councils, the elders and the people who are there.

When I was first elected in 1988 I went on a tour, as I am sure all members do in ridings as large as mine, to listen to the people. I came back to the House with this message and fortunately or possibly unfortunately, depending on how you look at it, the leader of our party gave me the responsibility of associate critic on aboriginal affairs. Therefore, I was on the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs.

One of the first things I suggested at committee was that a problem that I could easily see, that I was very sensitive to, was that was the leaders were telling me it was becoming more and more difficult to control their own people. The potential young radicals, a term I suppose is being used a lot in the media these days, are people who are no longer willing to wait 40 to 50 years for governments to act. The chiefs and councils and elders told me very bluntly that we have to start putting those words that they hear from politicians at every election into action.

I came back to the House and I went to the standing committee to speak to my Conservative colleagues and my NDP colleagues. Of course, Ethel, being a member of that committee, knows very well what I am talking about. I said that we had better get moving very quickly because it is becoming very, very difficult out there for the leadership of the native community to control their own people.

Lo and behold, Mr. Speaker, nobody paid attention. What is so often sad in this House is that governments tend not to listen to opposition members. Why should they? They have a majority. What a waste of time. It is a lot of rhetoric, is it not? But there are some members who might have something to say, who have a little bit of sensitivity about this beautiful country of ours. So far I have not seen that sensitivity and that is why we are in this situation.

It would be nice to have had this debate a year ago to hear the types of very good suggestions that are being made today.

Some people have difficulty articulating the issue because they are not familiar with aboriginal people or their situation. Mr. Speaker, that is perfectly acceptable and understandable because aboriginal issues are not very high on the agenda of many politicians. There are those who, I am sad to say, have never been to a reserve and would not know one if they ran over it. They probably drive through one often because there are close to 600 reserves in this country.

The sad part of this whole debate is that we have come to the point of having to call the army into a situation that got out of control. Whether it is right or wrong, Mr. Speaker, we will not solve here tonight. As other colleagues have said we have to ask where we go from here.

First, that depends on whether members in this chamber really understand what we are talking about tonight.

I know we are not supposed to talk about what happens in caucus. I get a big kick out of this.

I listen to my colleague, the hon. member for Western Arctic, talk quite often about aboriginal affairs in caucus. We get these guys and gals and their heads are nodding up and down, indicating: "Yes, I understand what you are talking about." But do they really know what this is all about? Do they know how complex specific land claims policy is and how complex the comprehensive land claims policy is and the political will it will take for us as parliamentarians to resolve that issue?

I suggest that more colleagues should stop nodding their heads when aboriginal people speak and start saying: "No, I do not understand." I suggest that they do not.

I represent a riding that has 14,000 aboriginal people and I say very frankly that a lot of my non-native constituents do not understand the issue. They think the specific land claims policy is a land-grab by aboriginal people wanting more.

Simply, it is trying to right a wrong that we as non-natives created a long time ago. Yes, we put in the Indian Act. Yes, we put in the Indian agents. Then we let the Indian agent have all sorts of powers. In those days the communications were not as good and the education level of our First Nations was not as exceptional as it is in some cases today. What happened was that pieces of their land were sold off. In some cases the land guaranteed to them in the treaties was never given. Do you know that there are 165 specific land claims in Ontario alone?

Today I listened very intently to what the Prime Minister said. I had waited a long time in the House for some indication of what my constituents in the aboriginal community call trust and honesty.

The aboriginal people are very difficult in the sense that they are not easily fooled. When you look them in the eye they will tell you right away, very quickly, in their own sophisticated method, whether you are full of it. I use that because it is probably the most parliamentary expression I can use referring to whether one was being just a simple politician or one truly means and understands what they are saying.

I have been through that process and this summer when I looked into those eyes up north it was very, very difficult. I said to myself: "Bob, you had better go back and tell your colleagues just how bad it really is for the 100th time. Just possibly they will listen this time or maybe they might understand."

As I have said in my press releases, letters I have sent to the minister, the request to the Speaker for emergency debate and the request to the House Leader to recall Parliament, if we do not deal with this issue in a very comprehensive way, what we have seen over the summer is the tip of the iceberg. The young aboriginal leaders are not prepared to wait any longer.

The request of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin for people to be patient and continue with dialogue has come to an end. Aboriginal people have been dialoguing and speaking to non-natives for so long now that they just do not know what to say any more. They meet with the minister and members of Parliament and the heads keep nodding up and down: "Yes, yes, we understand what you are saying". The chiefs and the council go back to their community. A year goes by, two years go by, three years go by—nothing.

I want to bring into the debate a specific example. Here is one that belongs to my constituents. Here are six bands and I will name them for you: Kee-Way-Win, MacDowell Lake, New Slate Falls, Saugeen Nation and Wawakapewin. These six communities were given band status in 1985 by the present government. At that time, when they gave these six bands the hope of having their own community, it said: "Very soon we will give you reserve status." For those who do not know, reserve status means that they get a land base, something to work with, some hope of creating their own community and being independent to a certain extent. I know how much all people in Canada cherish their independence.

Well, it is five years later and this report here states: "Six Bands Five Years Later". That is the title. Lo and behold, there is no reserve status for these six communities. They live in total poverty.

One community lives exactly one mile away from a great big power line and it is not hooked up to the community. What do they do? Every winter they have little generators and little propane stoves and lights. It is an embarrassment to be a Canadian. But it is so far out of the way that these people here might never see that community in their whole lives. If they went there they would be ashamed. They would want to move away.

That is what we are talking about here, the understanding of the issue. People cannot continue—and I talk about parliamentarians and politicians—to talk and not act. That is why I am very sceptical about what the Prime Minister said today. In his discussion and in his speech there was absolutely no detail of where we are going and no emphasis on timetable. Where will we be five years from now? Where will we be 10 years from now?

Give the aboriginal people a goal to set for themselves and something to work towards. Show them what we mean by improved infrastructure.

Of the 46 reserves I represent, a total of four have sewers and water. The Prime Minister said that we are going to start speeding up sewer and water situations and housing. This is a rough guess and a very conservative one, if you do not mind me saying, but there are at least 500 homes are needed in those 46 communities. There are two and three families living in a little home that we would probably call our garage. And we sit here and nod our heads. Oh, we understand, but do we really, really understand?

We presented a motion in standing committee that we do cross-country hearings. We also debated and discussed very heavily in the aboriginal standing committee about having—can you believe this, Mr. Speaker—cameras in our committee meetings. The ruling was, oh no, you cannot do that. We might say something that would embarrass the government. Good God, it is too late for that. We have embarrassed ourselves already. Look at what has happened.

What we want to do is we want to open the process up and, hopefully, through that we will educate non-natives who do not understand the issue. I do not say that to belittle anyone. If one does not live in that culture or in that world, one might not understand and that is perfectly acceptable. But if we do not turn the lights on, it will always be dark. As one leader said, I am getting tired of screaming in the forest. Do you know how many people hear you in the middle of northern Ontario, thousands of miles from anybody, when you scream in the bush? Absolutely no one. And that is exactly what is happening here.

I asked the members just for once—and I say that more specifically to the government who have a very important responsibility at this present time—to listen to members who might have something concrete to say. There have been many, many suggestions made in the House and those suggestions are for a land claims commission which would allow for a non-biased, non-partisan approach, a resolution of these land claims issues which have to be sped up at a phenomenal rate with resources applied to it. Otherwise we will never, in my lifetime, go through them all.

Also, I think it is high time that we did look at a royal commission. At first, I disapproved of a royal commission and I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. There are so many reports like this one. There are hundreds of reports that are collecting dust on peoples' desks. Keith Penner's report in 1983 was very comprehensive and it cost the government millions of dollars to put it through. It would have showed us the way to change our approach to aboriginal affairs.

The reason I did not want to go along with this royal commission is simply this. It was another delay tactic, another way of stopping what should start immediately and that is to get into the very, very nuts and bolts of the issue. Now, I think maybe it would be good to air this whole issue nation wide. By doing that, maybe someone will learn something about aboriginal affairs.

I say this because I have learned a lot from my colleague who happens to be sitting behind me. Any member who really wants to learn something about aboriginal people, should come and talk to Ethel or to Jack. They will tell them what it is like. Or they should go and spend a few weekends of their precious time, as Dennis Mills did, up on a reserve in northern Quebec and they will find out what it is all about. Once we get to that point, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you we will, as parliamentarians, have done truly something exceptional. Until then, we will just stand up here and spin our wheels. Hopefully I will not have to do that.

Unfortunately, not being a pessimist but in this case having seen it before, we are in for a difficult time if these people here do not listen.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few comments and ask some questions to my colleague who has just spoken.

I can understand his deception to a certain extent. Mr. Speaker, it is often true that when we are confronted with problems in caucus or in meetings we have a tendency to shake our heads and say: "Yes, yes, I understand."

I come from Beauharnois—Salaberry. For the benefit of those who do not know, Beauharnois—Salaberry is just after Châteauguay on the road which leads to the Akwesasne reserve. The Akwesasne reserve is in my riding and I might add a little detail which may seem meaningless. When I want to go on the Akwesasne reserve, and I go there regularly to visit the residents of the reserve, I have to go through the United States and Ontario and come back through the reserve. That is a small detail which goes to show to what extent they are sometimes badly treated.

But I want to say to my colleague who has just spoken that in the end the House of Commons may be a reflection of society. We really come to grips with problems when they are staring at us in the face. Three or four months ago when everything was going so bad on the Akwesasne reserve we did not have a great debate. We were saying: We will try to find a solution to the problem, we asked a few question and that was the end of it. But what was going on at Akwesasne? Akwesasne is where the traffic goes through. My colleague says he visits the reserves. Well, so do I, I visit the reserve located in my riding. I was in touch with reserve chief Mike Mitchell for whom I have the greatest of respect. He said to me: "Mr. Hudon, one of these days you will see things blowing up elsewhere because traffic interruptions here will have repercussions elsewhere". And we did have them this summer.

But we were all there, in the image of society. Nobody in Châteauguay or Beauharnois—and I said this to the people of Beauharnois and Melocheville during the meetings this summer—nobody among you has been unduly concerned about what was going on at Akwesasne. The situation was very serious. They had some problems in British Columbia, they had a very serious problem there as well.

But like we do they just stand there and wait. We say we will solve the problem whenever it comes up, in a more practical way, and then— But there is something I want to say. We have been here for two days. Yesterday we talked about Iraq. We had to put an end to the debate at 7 o'clock last night because there was no unanimous consent in the House. It is a good thing we did stop at 7 o'clock, for otherwise we might have found a solution to the conflict in the Gulf!

This is not the place where solutions are found. It is now 9.30 p.m.

We have been talking about the Oka stand-off for a number of hours and we could talk about it for many more. We are a reflection of what goes on in society. What the other guy just said is all wrong. The hon. member is perfectly right about that. People don't listen. They always say: he missed the point. That's not the right answer. The Prime Minister spoke and he didn't say the right thing. Well, I think tonight maybe we should start negotiating. I can hear people say: That doesn't make sense. It won't work here. I agree. The Prime Minister of Canada said that he was willing to accelerate the process. Unfortunately, today, the solution is not up to the House of Commons, although I am a firm believer in the parliamentary process and I think everybody should have his say. If we were really honest, maybe just a little more so than our society tends to be, and if we were also a little less hostile, we could all find a solution. However, we always disagree with what the other guy said.

I must say that I agree with the hon. member. Another member said we should have sent a group of parliamentarians. What is that supposed to do? How is sending in a group of parliamentarians supposed to settle the conflict? You didn't say that, it was one of your colleagues who spoke just before you rose, the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

Now let me see, this happened about two years ago on the Mercier Bridge. The bridge was blocked because the RCMP had seized cigarettes which it wanted to give to the Quebec Provincial Police. The politician arrived on the scene and just made matters worse. People were arrested with their cigarettes and the drugs they had at the time, but that was not the answer.

I think that if we were willing to sit down together without looking at the negative side of things, without necessarily—

Mr. Waddell: Question!

Mr. Hudon: You want to keep me from talking?

Mr. Waddell: You are making a speech.

Mr. Hudon: This isn't a speech, although what I have to say is quite interesting—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I know the hon. member is making his comment. He is coming to his question.

Mr. Hudon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for calling me to order.

However, there is one thing I cannot accept in this particular society and something society does not accept either and that is hold-ups. If you really think the Prime Minister or this evening's motion really missed the boat, does this mean you do not condemn the terrorist actions of the Warriors today? Come out and say it! Say whether you approve or condemn this their actions! Say whether you approve of terrorist action and tell the House whether people who consider themselves above the law are exempt from criminal prosecution. As a Canadian, I don't believe that.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have put my question.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think he put his question too. The hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River. I will recognize the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, the hon. member for Dartmouth and the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, and that will be it.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for getting involved in the debate. I am not quite sure how to answer that question or to make a comment on his comments.

First of all, I would like to go back to what I talked about in the speech and that is that this issue is a lot larger than the reserve that he speaks of that is in his community. Yes, it is unfortunate that there are some situations there that have dictated the unfortunate scenes we have seen this summer, the one where we saw the young soldier, eye to eye with a Mohawk. But I would never stand in my place and say some of the things that this member has just said about people without a fair trial and having the judicial system rule on what in essence has gone on there. The reason I did not get into the debate about Oka the way possibly I would have if I were parked there on the doorstep is because I am not from there. If I were to speak on what I saw on TV over the summer, I would have got a very slanted view.

I have been told by my French colleagues that the French media has reported much differently than the English media on what took place there. In order for us as parliamentarians to know exactly what did take place in this unfortunate incident, why don't we have a true inquiry so then we will know? I do not like to be dictated by the French or English media because I do not really know what their mandate is. Is it to sell newspapers? Is it to sell time on TV or is it to report to me the true facts and sensitivities of the Canadian people?

An hon. member: An excellent point.

Mr. Nault I suggest to you that because of that reason I stayed away from Oka. Maybe the member has some inside information that we as members do not have. I wished we would have pressed his Prime Minister to let us have this debate two months ago. I would have loved to come in the 1st of June or early July and talk about this before all—

Ms. Blondin: Over a year ago.

Mr. Nault: —hell broke loose, if I could use that terminology, Mr. Speaker. I do not know if that is acceptable or not. That is exactly what we waited for and now we are paying for it. I say to him, if he has information that is a lot different than what we have seen, please share it with us because I think we all would like to learn from that.

An hon. member: Well done.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Thank you. Just a brief comment and then a question. Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member's speech with interest. He raised the matter of a royal commission. At first he did not think much of a royal commission on native issues. Now he feels that perhaps it would be a good idea. I, too, think it would be a good idea.

I think it would be important for two reasons. One is to educate the public in these issues. That was done in a quick way with the Oka crisis this summer. Native issues have been on the back burner in spite of the horrible situation of native people in this country. It has always been on the back burner, even in this House of Commons.

The royal commission could do another thing. I believe it could define what we are looking for, the answer to a problem. The Mohawks talked about full sovereignty. The government cannot give that. The Prime Minister is talking about the status quo. He is not prepared to give anything on that. We have to get somewhere in between.

The royal commission, in my view, has to define self government. It is something less than full sovereignty but something more than the status quo. That is what I think the royal commission could do.

My question to the hon. member is this. I hesitate to be partisan here. Not ever being partisan, I always find Liberals sort of like jelly, trying to nail them to the wall. You know they sort of stand for this and then this and it is hard to pin them down.

Was the Liberal Party in favour of sending the army into Oka or not? Yes or no? It appeared from one member, the Whip I believe, that they wanted the army sent in. It appeared in Question Period today the Liberal Party was against the army being sent in. I ask the hon. member representing the Liberal Party, is it yes or no?

Mr. Nault: Let me answer the last question first. The answer is no. Anybody in their right mind who would suggest that allowing the army to go into any community to defend the interests of our society, be it judicial or not, because when you do that, it means that the ability to police yourself has completely fallen apart. I suggest to you, not being a lawyer and you being a lawyer, and you should know better, that under that scenario, not anyone in this House should have been in favour of the army going in. What I have said in the speech, and I thought I made myself very clear, is that the reason why I never talked about that situation was because you cannot right a wrong that has already been wronged. It has already been done. It has been dealt with. Let us look at where we go from there.

I want to talk a little bit about what I talked about before. This member should pay very close attention to this and not talk when I am speaking. I want to tell him a little bit about something he asked me which shows his lack of knowledge about aboriginal affairs.

He talked about the royal commission and the fact that it should define self-government. Any individual in this House who understands aboriginal affairs will tell you that you cannot define self-government. They are all different in every individual community in this country. That is why it has never been done before. Have you ever asked a chief or council to tell you what their concept of self-government is? You get an interesting stare because it is very, very difficult. That is like defining distinct society. If you can define distinct society, I will define self-government. I tell you, it is impossible. That is why it is very, very important for this member to know that the reason we are having these debates is because you learn something. Tonight he learned something.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Dartmouth and then a short question from the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. I think both of you could put the questions and the hon. member will answer.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, my friend from Kenora—Rainy River, has put some sense into the debate tonight and has taken most of the partisanship out of the debate.

This truly is an issue where every member from every side of the House has to feel something deep down in their guts. We are talking about an injustice that has been allowed to go on for much too long and has caused the situation to develop at Oka. Now the government would like very dearly not to talk about the problems that have caused the confrontation at Oka. They want to talk in a very sterile environment.

I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, if you look at the history of the civil rights movement in the United States, the blacks in the United States did not break laws in the United States through civil disobedience because they were law-breakers. They broke those laws to try to bring to the attention of the American people injustices that were perpetrated upon them, rights that they did not enjoy that the white population did enjoy. It was a final step to say to the larger society "For God's sake, wake up. I am human, too". That is exactly what has been happening in the native community in this country.

Miss Dobbie: Are you making a speech?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The Prime Minister said it earlier—

If I want to make a speech, I will. If you do not want to listen to it, that is fine. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, great thinker she is.

The Prime Minister said it earlier, and I commend him for it. He said that the native people in this country are a gentle people. That is their history. They are not savages, contrary to what most of our schooling has taught in racist textbooks. They are not beasts, but enjoy a long and deep, rich cultural history.

What has driven a particular community out of that rich tradition to the problems that we see in Oka? It is a government and a society that does not want to deal with the fundamental problems in the native community.

I want to ask the member for Kenora—Rainy River this. Earlier the Prime Minister of Canada offered some possible solutions. I do not want to put the Prime Minister's intentions up to any scrutiny. I think he was honest this evening in wanting to do something. But, there is a problem here. The native community needs a sign of good faith by this government. It needs a sign of good faith. I am going to ask him, is this the type of thing that might lead to some movement, that might lead to restoring some of the trust that this government has destroyed with the native community if they went and did something simple, such as reinstate the funding that was cut through the Secretary of State for native newspapers in this country? Something simple like that.

In Nova Scotia, the Micmac community has lost its only form of communication among that minority community because the Secretary of State, through government cutbacks and government policies, has silenced the voice of the native community. Is this the type of thing I ask the member that the government could do to show their bona fides and to reinstate some good faith in the negotiations between the Government of Canada and our aboriginal peoples?

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer that question simply by saying that this afternoon I listened very intently to what the Prime Minister had to say. The reason I did so was that I was looking for some sort of clue as to whether indeed the trust factor which has been eroded so severely over the years would possibly spark a bit of life back into the unfriendliness created over the past few years I have had the opportunity of being a member of Parliament.

To start off the debate properly and to turn the environment around somewhat on aboriginal issues, one of the nicest gestures that one could make is a small one when one talks about $4 billion. The Prime Minister is very quick to tell us how much it costs. He is forever telling us how much it costs. I think it would be a very nice gesture if put back in place the funds cut from native communication societies in this country.

I was the recipient of one of those major cuts in Kenora—Rainy River at Wawaté which my colleague and I visited. The damage it did to those people who use that radio station, the newspaper, and the bush radios which are there for the trappers was beyond description in this House, at least for me.

A little gesture like that would go a long way toward showing that we are on the right track. If the Prime Minister were serious about what he said this afternoon, he would start to implement this process or this new agenda very quickly. If he does not, it shows that he does not really have an agenda and that what he said today was a lot of rhetoric to get people off his back for a while.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my comment will be very short.

Yesterday, on the opening day of the Parliament of Canada, most of the country had a pent-up expectation. Later on in the afternoon after Question Period, my office on the Hill received two irate phone calls from high school teachers who had organized their classes to watch Question Period. They called and echoed their disgust at what happened in this Chamber: the bantering back and forth and not listening to each other.

Today's debate in the House of Commons has been one of the most productive, positive, high-road debates that we have ever had. I would like to thank especially my colleague today from Kenora—Rainy River who pushed for a whole new level and tone toward working together and solving very serious issues. We should have a heck of a lot more of it in this House because I think it is basically what the people of Canada want.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Speaker, I wish to report to my colleagues and, through them, to all Canadians, on the way our military forces carried out the mandate they had received from the province of Quebec following the breaking down of negotiations aimed at ending the Oka and Kahanawake crisis.

Everywhere in the world, Canada enjoys a tremendous reputation for respecting human rights and assuming peace keeping duties internationally. But now that I am personally involved with defence, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that the reputation we have abroad is somewhat different from that we enjoy within our borders. That is the reason many countries were watching us, wondering sometimes with scepticism how our Armed Forces were going to end a conflict which threatened to pitch brothers against brothers. As in many family quarrels, there comes a time when people loose sight of the real reasons behind the conflict.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to recall briefly the events which forced the Quebec Government to send for our Armed Forces. Over the past few years, through its Department of Indian Affairs, the Federal Government has worked diligently with the Mohawk tribe in Oka, in Kahnesatake, to formally establish a reserve. Considerable progress has been made. The government has bought lands from individuals to turn them over to native leaders. Early in May, the Municipal Council of Oka announced its intention to purchase the land next to their city's golf course in order to extend it. Following this announcement, the Mohawks set up barricades closing access to the contentious land. Because they had failed to obey to court injunctions, the Sûreté du Québec received the order to dismantle the barricades. On July 11, this police force were confronted with heavily armed opponents, saw one of their men lose his life and incurred various material losses. To demonstrate their support for the Mohawks in Oka, the Mohawks in Kanesatake set up barricades to stop traffic on the Mercier bridge between the Southshore and the Montreal Island.

Following these tragic events, the province of Quebec, under Part XI of the National Defence Act, sent General John de Chastelain, Chief of the Defence Staff, a request to help the civilian power.

Armed assistance consists in providing Armed Forces personnel pursuant to a request received from civilian authorities requesting help to enforce Canadian laws. Therefore, armed assistance necessarily implies a violent situation or threat of violence.

In our country, the concept of armed assistance is based on several principles that form integral part of our judicial system. The most basic of these principles is probably that any form of martial law is unacceptable; civil power remains the supreme authority and shall not be replaced. It ensues that troops can be called in to assist the civilian authorities. The Armed Forces are called in as a last resort, only when everything else failed to maintain or restore peace and order.

When armed assistance is requested, it is assumed that the civilian authorities at all levels have already done all they could to bring back to normal a situation that has deteriorated to the point of being very serious.

Provincial authorities can requisition—hear "demand" rather than "ask for"—troups from the Armed Forces in order to have them at their disposal when needed. Pursuant to the National Defence Act, the requests are made to the highest military authority, that is the Chief of Defence Staff, rather that to a minister of the federal government or to a political authority.

The following day, that is on July 12, after consulting the Quebec minister of Public Security, the Chief of the Defence staff asked the commanding officer of the Mobile Command to provide the Sûreté du Québec with support equipment and personnel, such as armoured vehicles and their drivers, bulletproof vests, rifles, and also night-vision equipment. The troops were authorized to fire their weapons only in self-defence. The same day, July 12, 96 troops were dispatched from the Longue Pointe base, in eastern Montreal.

On August 6, negotiations between native people and representatives of the federal and provincial governments broke down. Therefore, under the provisions of the National Defence Act, the province of Quebec requested that Canadian Forces be called out in aid of the civil power to assist civilian authorities to restore law and order in Oka and Kahnawake.

When he invoked the National Defence Act, the Premier of Quebec, Mr. Robert Bourassa, conferred upon the Canadian Forces the mandate to remove the barricades at Oka and Kahnawake, to ensure the free movement of vehicles on the roads and bridges, to take control of the fortified posts and to restore the normal conditions essential to general welfare and public security.

When he instructed Lieutenant–General Foster to realize this mandate, General de Chastelain publicly committed himself to the peaceful dismantling of the barricades.

He said Canadian troops would not use force unless obliged to by the Warriors. Echoing the words of the Chief of the Defence Staff, the Mobile Command Commander also expressed his intention of proceeding without violence, but remaining ready to face any situation, confronted with Warriors equipped with military–type arms and entrenched behind fortifications that did not look the work of amateurs.

From the beginning of the crisis to its conclusion, which appears imminent, through the most recent tribulations of this conflict which are but too fresh to our memories to need to be recalled, our military maintained their quiet strength, inspired by their chief, a good balance of determination and calm. If a picture is worth a thousand words, the one of the terrible face to face of soldier Patrick Cloutier with a Warrior was shown everywhere around the world.

The step–by–step dismantling, without bloodshed, of the fortified road blocks, first in Kahnawake, then in Kanesatake, testifies to the impressive competence of the Canadian armed forces in peacekeeping operations. Our soldiers were able to combine some psychology, good sense and courage. They overcame with success several handicaps; those of having different ways of thinking, a different language and culture from those they were facing.

For many of our fellow citizens, the key role the army played in reducing tensions with aboriginal people, between aboriginal people and the people in the neighbourhood of the reserves, was a revelation. The media, particularly those of Quebec, generally conveyed with objectivity the positive contribution of the Canadian forces involved in the conflict I also experience as the member of a riding that includes the area of Châteauguay.

A few days ago I heard a sociologist on the radio discussing the possible after effects of the conflict and whether there would be any harmful and lasting impact on relations between the Mohawks and their neighbours. Mr. Speaker, I think we should make a very clear distinction between the legitimate aspirations of native people and the attitude of the Warriors, which is intolerable in a democracy. I am referring to these would–be soldiers, some of whom, in fact quite a number, were from outside Canada.

With the Canadian people, whose interests it reflects, the government has recognized the advantages of a quick and fair settlement of legitimate native land claims, but it had no intention of doing so at the point of a gun. Violence as a political tool or a pressure tactic was entirely unacceptable in a democratic system. Arbitrary actions can only generate fleeting successes and victories that are morally devastating. A democratic system like ours guarantees fair treatment for all citizens of Canada, as brothers who are equal before the law.

The Warriors' threats of violence will merely have postponed negotiations and as a result delayed solutions to problems such as settling the land claims of the Mohawks in Kanesatake and the transfer of 97 acres of land the federal government has purchased in the municipality of Oka.

The fact that dialogue is again possible today, Mr. Speaker, despite the pain and suffering on both sides of the barricades, the fact that there are no longer any barricades between men, women and children who share a common destiny which is to build this country, our country, is largely thanks to the fair, courageous and judicious action of the Canadian Forces. Justice, bravery and wisdom are, as we all know, platonic virtues, and I would like to take this opportunity to offer our congratulations and thanks on behalf of all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Saint–Boniface.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Saint–Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member's speech. Although I appreciated part of what he said, some of his comments I found rather alarming. If I understood correctly, he referred to a situation that had degenerated. He then tried to explain why.

It seems to me that there has been a quite extraordinary attempt to deny or to evade certain facts. What facts?

• (2200)

[English]

Is it not true that the Oka situation is in large part because of the failures of successive governments to respond sensitively and sensibly to the needs of our aboriginal peoples? Is it not true that this government's actions with regard to the capping of education funding, to the various budget cut-backs that we have discussed frequently in this House, to the unresolved land claims, to our collective inability to respond to their desire for self-government, to the lack of hope that our native brothers and sisters have in fact because of this series of broken promises, to this lots of talk and no action mentality and this series of broken promises, is it not all of this that is the real reason for what has happened in Oka?

I would ask whether or not my colleague would publicly in this House accept that this Oka situation at the very, very least is in large part a result of these failures.

[Translation]

Are you prepared to accept these facts? Are you prepared to condemn sending in the troops against our own brothers and sisters, against fellow Canadians?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before the hon. member answers the question, I will recognize the hon. member for Victoria and then the hon. member for Nepean on a short question or comment.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the hon. member's question because I believe he expects a reply. I think we must put the Oka situation into context. Oka is not and was not a reserve. So when the town of Oka decided to expand its golf course onto land that belonged to a resident of France, don't tell me this was not a legitimate request. A municipal council may, within certain limits, take certain initiatives. Two court injunctions authorized the town council to do so and to oblige people to take down the barricades. Previously, in the past year, the federal government had purchased several other properties to form a real reserve. Everything was fine. It is no more than natural for a municipality to want to add to property it already has, in a legitimate manner. People in other countries were joking about the whole thing. I heard the news on French television and they said there was a major dispute in Canada between Indians and White people about a golf course. I think that is an exaggeration.

As for his comments on education funding, I think we shouldn't always think in terms of dollars and cents. I agree it is important. When we talk about cuts in education, as far as I know I don't have all my notes with me the cuts introduced last year do not mean, and I think Canadians should realize this and that you should realize it as well, do not deny native people access to university.

I am all for paying somebody's courses, their room and board and their books. More power to them. But, when they are enrolled in law school and the course takes four years, four years is all they are allowed. If the chancellor of the university says it takes an extra preparatory year, that will be paid for as well. That makes five years. After five years, no more. That is not what I call cutting off funding. It is just obliging people to observe a certain timeframe and do what you and I had to do when we were getting an education. These were constraints we had to live with.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on the member's speech and on the situation in Oka and to use this opportunity to do so. What we have seen this summer is a terrible tragedy for Canada. I was listening this afternoon when the Prime Minister decided, in answering a question, to score a point on the basis of the violence that is being taught to young children behind the barricades in Oka, and the Conservative benches roared with laughter at the great score that he had made. This came across to me really as a form of racism, which underlies our whole reaction in Canada to what we have been seeing in Oka and to the real tragedy that has been happening there. Because the violence that we are seeing there behind the lines is really a product of the violence of our society and the terrible violence that we, in Canada, have wrought over hundreds of years on the aboriginal native populations in this country. The rape that happens to women, the sexual assault on children, the suicides of young Indians, the pain and agony that has come from the high populations in our jails, are all products of our violence against native people. And somehow this government keeps persisting in blaming the victims of the violence that has been wrought. It is time that this House understood that we have to speak of reconciliation, of trying to come together to build a more just society.

Let me speak briefly about what this has done to the army. My new role in this House is as critic for our party on defence matters. I see what has happened to the army. The individual soldiers who are there have shown great personal courage but the government has put them and the army in a position in which its authority and its image in this country is slowly eroding. It puts them in a position where they are beginning to trample on the civil liberties of Canadians by denying communications and the right to communications to the press. The rights of journalists in Iraq are greater than the rights of journalists in the Oka area and behind the barricades.

The army is now imposing increased pressure on the people who are there. The image of the army is slowly eroding. The opportunity that it has to risk serious violence on the people there is a daily feature of the situation which this government's neglect has caused. I would ask the member if he would not concede that the time has come in this country for reconciliation and for resolving this matter, not with more violence but with peace and justice.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Sure enough it is ingratiating. But there is a very simple way to initiate reconciliation. As long as armed people remain behind barricades and refuse to come out the process cannot begin.

That is not the way negotiations will get under way because if we begin to negotiate now I can tell you that the first item up for negotiation will not be the territorial claims, they will begin by negotiating safe-conducts for those peole.

They say that those people are traditionalists. I said a moment ago that I had visited the Akwesasne reserve in my riding, I got a book about the traditional values of the Mohawks as a present from chief Mike Mitchell because I had attended the opening of a housing project. I did not see any Mohawk warriors who had to be protected by women and children and move about with a rag over their face to avoid recognition! I did not see that.

A real Mohawk is someone who stood proud and was prepared to face the enemy. They are the ones we have always known and with whom we have always negotiated. They are not in Oka now. They are the ones who suffered in Châteauguay. A moment earlier you said something about suffering—we do not want to be racists and that is precisely what will prevent us from being so—when I consider what is going on in Châteauguay right now, with the solidarity committee which has been established in an effort to fight against such attitudes, because the effects of racism can be felt on both sides—

The real warriors are the people of Châteauguay and the native people who show respect for certain values and who, like you and I, have been taken hostage, just like the people of Melocheville or Beauharnois. Those are also Canadian values.

• (2210)

The negotiations were going well. No one likes the army. I said so in my speech. I had said that before in Haiti, when I was Chairman of the Parliamentary Commission on Haiti: In Canada, we feel towards military governments the way we feel towards hives. We do not like them. Nobody does. The purpose of my comment was to show that the army had behaved professionally. The first series of phone calls I got was for the army to come in and kill them all. That is not what we wanted them to do. De Chastelain, Foster, and Brigadier General Roy assumed their responsibilities and did so as gentlemen. They acted correctly, without violence. If there is still some violence today, let me tell you that we could put an end to it very easily. I could even call the Warriors tomorrow morning and tell them to lay down their arms and face their responsibilities.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Nepean on a question or comment.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, a comment first and then a question to the parliamentary secretary.

The recent clash and subsequent stand-off between the provincial police officers, the Canadian army and the Mohawk Indians is both tragic and unnecessary.

This government turned its back on an issue that is clearly theirs and one that it could have resolved in the first week of the crisis. This is a national tragedy and one that every member in this House should be thoroughly ashamed of. Canada's armed service men and women are being used as fall guys for a government that has been incapable of acting to end the tragic circumstances in Kanesatake. None of us condone armed intervention. None of us condone violence. But I can partly understand it. When one consistently has one's back to the wall, when one's rights are consistently being trampled on, when one watches the federal government bend over backwards to accommodate a distinct society within that particular province, but does not include its native peoples in that accommodation, when one sees a federal government that does not appreciate or understand the national aspirations of its first citizens, then I understand their frustration.

A closer look at the crisis and its implications gives me cause to be concerned that the fundamental guarantee to basic human rights are not being met.

Amnesty International has the Oka situation under investigation at this very moment. They are in the process of collecting affidavits from those who have documented human rights abuses. Our international reputation as a strong human rights nation has been sullied by our government's failure to limit the many human rights abuses in this crisis. The United Nations has been asked to intervene and the UN Working Group on Indigenous Peoples has listed representations about the specific situation that we are debating today. Surely, if these international organizations are actively looking into the situation, there must be some legitimate concerns.

Does the parliamentary secretary believe that these concerns bear further examination? Does he think that they can only be given the attention they deserve through a full royal commission and judicial enquiry?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to bring to the attention of the hon. members that we will have to keep this question and answer period within the 10 minutes, otherwise we are going to stay here until three o'clock in the morning. That is fine, if you would like to stay here until three I am willing to stay. I think that I have been very kind, but let us try to get questions very succinct and to the point.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Human rights were trampled on. I should like to know by whom? By our Armed Forces? By the Canadian Government? I do not think so. Some rights were effectively trampled on. At some point during the negotiations, the Commission on International Rights was made up of 24 members. If these people keep quiet now, it is because they understand the situation better.

I must tell you, Madam Speaker, that if you try to make out of the problem in Oka and Châteauguay, a problem of a distinct society, you should pay a visit to my county where a bunch of people are doing exactly that. I received three kinds of phone calls as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence. The first series, until the army arrived came from people who wanted us to send in the army to kill them all! The second series was from the Pacifists. As soon as the army arrived, they were worried about our international reputation. I was afraid too. The third series was from people like you. You refuse the natives the right to a distinct society while you yourselves, as Quebec separatists, are demanding it for Quebecers. I can tell you there is a major difference between a distinct society and a distinct nation. As soon as Quebec has a referendum and a government bent on separation, then they will want a distinct society. I do not agree with that, Madam. But that is the difference between the two.

The legislation we amended in this House was different from the War Measures Act.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are terminated. The next speech is for 10 minutes with five minutes for questions and comments. The hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, that, indeed, is my constituency and I do plan to speak for 10 minutes, followed by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

I am very pleased to be able finally to participate in this long overdue debate. The events that we have seen this summer of Canadians are ones which will be seared in our memories probably forever. They are shocking events: razor wire, dogs, search lights, women and children being stoned in their cars, and food being withheld. Images that we, as Canadians, never thought we would see in this peaceful country of ours. A level of violence that ill-becomes us and is in no way part of our national identity, or so we thought.

Like the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, I, too, spent a good part of my summer touring Indian communities in my constituency. There are 13 and approximately 15,000 treaty Indian people in my constituency. My heart bled more than once at what I saw, especially among the young people, as they asked each other: "Are we prepared to die? Are we prepared to be like the people in Oka and Kanesatake? Are we prepared to die for our people if it should come to that?" And beyond that, the level of anger. In fact, that became perhaps even an attractive option, even to go so far as to think about taking life and becoming violent themselves.

I could understand the deep frustration of the Indian leadership in those communities and the sorrow of their elders as they saw the young people pick up that kind of thinking and those kinds of attitudes on the basis of what they saw over the summer.

We saw, too, the total abdication of leadership in the country and at the level that is probably unprecedented in our constitutional history when it comes to Indian people. Our Constitution is clear when it comes to the trust relationship which the federal government has towards the Indian people. We saw the Minister of Indian Affairs who hid. We saw a Prime Minister who hid.

At the same time, we were virtually in a situation of civil war between Indian people and our own military forces. We had a situation where Indian people were being denied food and medicine. Whole Indian communities were feeling themselves threatened and, in fact, Indian people across the country felt in the position where they needed to mobilize themselves to take action and we had a Minister of Indian Affairs who decided to hide behind the army and the police and a Prime Minister who decided to hide as well.

Therefore, I, like many other Canadians, was waiting very anxiously to see what the government's response would be when it got here to Parliament. What did we see? It was like a bad western movie. What we see here is talk about law and order. We see it repeated over and over again, a vilification of the warriors. Nobody condones the actions that some of the warriors have undertaken. Certainly nobody condones violence. But for the government to focus its attack exclusively on vilification of the warriors and justifying its actions on that very narrow basis, I think is an insult to thousands of Canadians. It is an insult to the thousands of Canadians who marched peaceably, to the thousands of Canadians who participated in peace camps, who attempted to get involved in the situation, who went to Oka, who went to Kanesatake to try to become personally involved in a constructive kind of way and were shunted away and driven away.

It is an insult to the Indian leadership who kept the situation very much under control throughout the country. It is an insult to those Canadians who made all kinds of efforts to become involved and to become informed, many of them for the first time, about the situation which in fact confronts Indian people in the country, the historical situation that we have allowed to evolve, and the situation of the lives of Indian men and women in Indian communities across the country. It is an insult to those Canadians who took this issue seriously for the government to turn around now and say that these are just lunatics that it had to look after. That is the sum total of the government's response.

I guess what sticks in my craw further to that is all this sanctimonious talk about the sacredness of the law and that the government's sole effort here, their sole motivation is to uphold that law. If it is so concerned about the sacredness of the law, why are groups like Amnesty International or the human rights commissions—100 of them from Quebec alone—investigating the situation there and coming up with condemnations one after the other of what they have seen happen? Why have we seen food used as a weapon? That is something we decry internationally when it happens, yet we have done it ourselves.

If the government is so concerned about the rule of the law, why do we see the muzzling of the press and the cutting off of communications? If it is so concerned about the rule of law, why did they use the National Defence Act which holds very little recourse by way of public accountability, as opposed to the Emergencies Act which would require Parliament to be called within seven days and require a public inquiry to be held when all the events had transpired so that there would be a full accountability to the Canadian public? If it was so concerned about the rule of law, why did the government not use that mechanism?

Then we heard the Prime Minister this afternoon talk about how the warriors should give themselves up because they would only be giving themselves up to the finest legal system in the world, a legal system that they could have total confidence in because it is the same law for all. In fact, we have had a lot of talk about being the same law for all and there cannot be any exceptions and so on. Does the Prime Minister remember the Donald Marshall case? Does he remember the Manitoba justice inquiry? Does he realize that in my own province of Saskatchewan 80 per cent of the people incarcerated in that province are of native ancestry, although they make up only about 10 per cent of the population?

Does the Prime Minister not know that Indian people have a deep sense of laws being broken ever since 1763, the Royal Proclamation that said that they should not be disturbed at their hunting until treaties are concluded? We are still disturbing the Innu at their hunting without a treaty being concluded.

In my own constituency the Peter Ballantine Band has waited for 100 years now for 240,000 acres of land that are owing them. That is the law. The treaty is the law. They are to get that land. Yet, the Prime Minister says this legal system is something that is the finest in the world, that the same law applies to all and that the Indian people can have total confidence in the law.

Having said that, I would like to conclude by saying that I do agree that it is time for healing in the country. This has gone on for too long. We must reconcile the present situation immediately and the suggestion that a group of parliamentarians intervene immediately is a very good one. It would bring both public scrutiny and a sense of confidence that in fact the political process is working.

Second, I think we need to be honestly critical here. It is not acceptable for the Minister of Indian Affairs to stand up in the House and simply say that the government has nothing to apologize for. It has. Previous governments have things to apologize for and the Canadian people have things to apologize for. I think we need to be honestly self-critical if there is to be understanding and reconciliation come out of all this.

We have to explore some useful ideas, and I give the Prime Minister credit for standing in the House this afternoon. I hope he was sincere. He floated some very useful ideas and I think it underlined again why we should have had this debate a long time ago. If the Prime Minister had come forward with some of the ideas he presented today six weeks ago, it could very likely be possible that a lot of events which have transpired since then would not, in fact, have occurred.

In that context, I also hope he takes very seriously our leader's suggestion for an aboriginal claims commission because I think that is an idea that is long overdue.

In closing, I would like to say that we need to go beyond what we can do as parliamentarians in the sense of law and the things we do as parliamentarians and develop a new sense of partnership between people, a sense of brotherhood and sisterhood to overcome the racism we see in our society, the distrust, and the sense that our children will grow up being each other's enemies. We need to bring peace, justice and love, not only in what we talk about and do, but in the way we conduct our lives so that, as our leader so eloquently put it today, we can turn a rebellion of despair into a revolution of hope.

Miss Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend makes a very eloquent, albeit inflammatory and totally political speech full of all kinds of points that really do not get to the point at all.

The point we are dealing with here is one that is very serious, and most members in the House this evening have tried to stay away from political rhetoric. It has elevated the tone of this debate a great deal and it is a matter appreciated by many members of our listening audience across the country.

My question to the hon. member is very simple. How can the hon. member condone the taking of a life in the promotion of a cause, no matter how good that cause may seem to the people who are espousing that cause? Does the member believe that masked warriors dressed in full battle regalia, carrying weapons that one sees only in movies about full-fledged war, promote the interests of the Indian people that he speaks so eloquently about?

The warriors are armed. We know that they were prepared to use those arms. I do not understand, and perhaps the member can tell me, how that kind of activity can do anything at all to promote the very just and legitimate cause of many of the Indian people who have very just and legitimate causes to be promoted across the country. How can he condone the use of armed force in the promotion of an idea?

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I would have to start by saying that I think the hon. member misunderstood the point of my speech completely and that may well be my fault. I was trying to pack in a lot of ideas in a very short time.

In no way do I condone the taking of a life and what has happened here. I have been a life-long advocate of non-violent solutions to problems, including involvement in the civil rights movements in the United States and the anti-Vietnam movement where I personally have always advocated non-violence. I have done so as well in the Indian communities in which I move and take every step that I can to advocate peaceful, non-violent solutions to problems. In no way do I condone the fact that there has been an escalation of violence here.

The point that I am making, however, is that it is hypocritical—and I do not mean that in the partisan sense—to say that the violence is that of only a small group of people, the warrior society at Oka. I think the violence that has expressed itself has much wider origins than that and finds much wider expression than that. In fact, what is so tragic is that we did not respond to that situation at an early point in its evolution. What were we doing here? It struck me, are we so crazy that we are going to have a civil war in this country because somebody wants to build a golf course on a burial ground? The whole series of events that evolved have shown that certainly the Warriors Society has its way of doing things that I do not personally agree with but, as well, the government's response to that has been one, I think, of machismo as well in that you do not negotiate at the point of a gun and you keep ratcheting up the level of confrontation with lights and depriving a community of food until the whole country is anxious and up tight and in a tinder-box kind of situation. Therefore, I would say that I very much believe and hope that this can be resolved peacefully and, in fact, that this will be a lesson to all of us and one that will not be repeated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. For the other half of that 20 minutes, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I concur wholeheartedly with the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River, who has been a life-long pacifist and has fought hard for the cause of pacificists and the cause of peace. I see the Minister of Justice in the House and I am hoping she will take some notes and reply to some of my comments.

I want to say right off the bat, let us make it quite clear, Canadians are against violence but they feel very strongly that this government has bungled this situation. That is what you get everywhere. As a matter of fact, I think the country would like to see the Tories and their politics out of Oman, out of Oka and out of office as soon as possible. I want to raise some legal questions tonight and, as I said, I would like the Minister of Justice to respond.

The first question is: who is in charge here, who is running the show? Is it the federal government, the provincial government, the army, who? Surely Canadians are entitled to know that. As part of that, how did this thing happen in Canada? How did we get to this horrible situation in Canada? I think you have to look at the political situation at the time this happened. You had a Prime Minister who was angry and wounded over Meech Lake and did not know what to do. He delegated the situation to a premier, Premier Bourassa, who was also angry and arrogant toward the native people and malevolent toward the native people, holding them up as the cause of the destruction of Meech Lake. I think that was the real politics and someone should say that and I have just said it. I think that is what happened. At the time, the Prime Minister delegated to Premier Bourassa, the Sûreté operation was bungled. If there ever was a police force in need of reform, it is the Sûreté du Québec and it was bungled by the Quebec government which is the political master of the Sûreté and which is responsible.

Then the Prime Minister of Canada and this government used the Defence Act, not the Emergency Measures Act, the Defence Act. In my view that was unconstitutional and illegal. The Defence Act was not made for that purpose. The Defence Act, in my view, is made for a riot or a disturbance where the provincial premier could call in the army for a short period. Why else would it say in the act that the province is responsible but the federal government pays all the bills? Would Parliament leave that open ended? There is provision for a report to the Secretary of State, after seven days. Where is the report? I ask the Minister of Justice to show us that report here tonight.

Why did the government not use the Emergency Measures Act which is the reform of the War Measures Act, which is surely for an insurrection or something like this that happened in Oka? Why did the government not use that? Because they would have to recall Parliament and because there are certain civil liberties protections. I challenge the minister tonight to get up in this House and again justify the shameful conduct that is being applied as it relates to Canadian journalists. It is a clear violation of the Charter of Rights and it is a clear violation of freedom of the press in this country and an example of a bungling government and an example of the price that we are paying for this Oka situation. This is something that we have to look into when this motion goes to committee, the act that was used, the civil liberties violations and so on.

The resolution of the government is bad. The Prime Minister is hanging onto a law and order motion. Everybody, of course, is in favour of law and order but this crisis goes deeper. The Prime Minister is wrong in one aspect. He is in fact saying the law has to apply to all Canadians. There is a principle, of course, of equality under the law. But there are different laws for different Canadians. It is in our law and the Prime Minister fails to grasp this. For example, Quebec is treated differently. They have the Napoleonic code, civil law, a different language protection and different educational rights protection. Natives are distinct in many ways in our law; the fiduciary relationship with the federal government; hunting, fishing and so on and rights that have been recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada. The Prime Minister is wrong when he proceeds on this premise and the resolution is wrong when it proceeds on this premise.

The reason we need a royal commission, and it has to be an active royal commission and it has to go somewhere in defining between what the Mohawks have asked for, which is sovereignty, which no Canadian government can really recognize and, on the other hand, the status quo, which the Prime Minister wants to see. We must find some way in the middle where there can be self government that can be defined. It is already in our law; it is already possible. The government is not grasping this and that is why this is a misleading resolution. The Prime Minister bungled the situation, retreated and handed it to the Premier of Quebec who bungled it malevolently, and then comes back in this House and wraps himself in the cloak of law and order. It is disgusting. As soon as the Canadian electorate can go to the polls, they are going to vote this government out of office.

I would like to end with a couple of other matters. It has been called the summer of discontent in Canada by my leader, and we all agree with that. When we saw the native and the old people being stoned at Châteauguay, it was a shame, it was the dark side of racism. But we should remember that that can happen anywhere in Canada. If the Lion's Gate Bridge in B.C. was blockaded, I am ashamed to say that you might see some similar conduct. Let us not just blame the people of Quebec because we all have that dark side to us in Canada. It is still a dark side and we should condemn it.

The second aspect of that is the Warriors. I am speaking for myself, Mr. Speaker, and I say this to many progressive people in Canada: do not be naive. We are against guns, we are against this kind of American conduct that the Warriors adopted. I see it as an almost fascistic takeover of a part of the Mohawk nation by a very, very ultra right-wing group that has been mixed up in some very questionable activities, and I think one has to say that. Having said that, where do we go from here? It is almost like, you know, it is the right cause. It is the cause and people understand the cause, but it is the wrong way to go about the cause. We have a choice in Canada; we can have more violence across Canada or we can tackle the legitimate claims of the native people.

You heard the member for Prince Albert say 80 per cent of the people in jail in Saskatchewan are native people. We must change that. We need to have a new relationship with native people in this country. I call upon the Minister of Justice tonight to begin by ending the Oka crisis. I heard them on television tonight. Call for an independent Crown attorney now. Is that really too great a thing to ask, and some protection from the army when they put down their weapons. I say put down the weapons now. I say that the government agree to an independent Crown attorney and take charge. Don't just let Bourassa and the Quebec government deal with the whole thing. The Minister of Justice has a responsibility. You must give these people in there, whatever you think of them, a little bit of honour to get out of there because that honour will go on to the native people in this country who are looking for a little bit of honour.

Let me end on a positive note and I look forward to the Minister of Justice replying to my remarks. We all felt great, did we not, when the army and the natives got together and started pulling those barricades down on the bridge. We felt wonderful as Canadians, that was from the Canadian spirit, that was as a peaceful country. Let us get back to that. We are only going to get back to that by this Prime Minister cutting out the phoniness, facing the issue straight on and we, as a people, getting a new relationship with the native people and the federal government, through the Minister of Justice tonight taking over control of what is going on in Oka and negotiating at the last minute a settlement with honour.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have an idea that my colleague is not terribly familiar with the Emergencies Act or if he was, then perhaps he would realize that there are three types of emergency: there is public order, there is public welfare and there is international emergency. In the case of the two that have to do with the domestic problem, there is no need to recall Parliament. Having said that, I want to refer to his comment that in the very outset that the government had bungled the situation. He used the word 'bungled'. In hindsight, as we heard from one of my colleagues this evening, I think that is a very serious mistake in terms because in fact the government has not bungled the situation.

How can the hon. member even suggest such a thing when the barricades have been removed? He alluded to this a moment ago and the good feeling that people had when the barricades were removed without incident and without any loss of life. How can he say that this government has bungled the situation when the volatility of something that was very, very iffy, very touchy, was removed with cool-headed, capable, competent, calm action? How can he say that the situation has been bungled when in fact over 77 long days that were very trying and very emotional for all of us, not a single life was lost since the very beginning of the incident? How can the hon. member say that the government has bungled the situation? The government has shown the kind of leadership that was necessary to get through a difficult situation with honour, with integrity and without loss of life.

Mr. Waddell: I think to get through the situation, in many respects it was the army and its their public conduct. There was some violence there. It was not exemplary, but the conduct got the government through and got us through. We are not through it yet. We are almost through it. The government should take some action tonight as I have suggested. It bungled it from the beginning. In my speech I suggested how in the beginning it bungled the matter. I suggest you ask any Canadian citizen out there. They will tell you they think the government has bungled the matter. The government is even worse, it is even more sleazy. It is now the Prime Minister who comes before the House and tries to wrap himself in this law and order stance. I am sure he has gone to Allan Gregg and looked at the polls. Well, Canadians like law and order. All right, we will go with law and order. You can see it. You can smell it from the man when he speaks. Where was he in the beginning of the crisis? Where was he hiding? Where was his minister? That is how the government bungled the situation because it was not there in the beginning. It could have made it a lot shorter.

With respect to the Emergency Act, I suggest the member read it. I ask the member to comment on my suggestion. Does she really believe that Parliament really intended to turn over a situation like this to a provincial premier and then let him run up the bills? We have to pay all the bills in this. I don't know if Canadians understand that. It is at the beck and call of a provincial premier. At some point he even said that he was not sure he was running. I call that bungling and I call that the wrong act. I think that the government has to respond to this when we get the committee.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very pleased tonight to rise in this debate. I am just watching my time here because I would like to respond to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam which I think are highly uncalled for. The hon. member is a lawyer and a lawyer of some skill. He knows. He has read the Constitution. I have great respect for the hon. member as a lawyer. He is, in fact, a fine and distinguished member of the British Columbia bar and has practised with some distinction. Notwithstanding that my father occasionally used to whip his butt in the courtroom, he is highly regarded by the Campbell lawyers.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Ms. Campbell: Whip his writ. When he refers to the notion of the Prime Minister delegating this to the premier of Quebec, the hon. member knows the Constitution. He knows who has the constitutional responsibility for law enforcement. The Government of Canada worked very hard this summer to try and do what was ever within our constitutional power to contain the situation at Oka and to ensure that it was resolved in a way that did not result in loss of life. It was something that we agonized over. I would say to the hon. member that his comments about the warriors and what kind of people they are I find very welcome. They were pretty scarce in the early days, and I recall a time during this conflict, about the middle of July, when the Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development described the warriors in an unattractive way as criminals and thugs and was denounced roundly from one end of the country to the other.

Interestingly enough, about a week later in The Globe and Mail the story came out: "Mohawk chiefs decry paramilitary warriors, group called gang of criminals". Barbara Barnes, a spokesman for the chiefs' council did not mince words about the members of the Mohawk Warrior Society: "I agree with Harry Swayne 100 per cent, the warriors are a gang of criminals".

However, the fact of the matter is that this summer the government was doing a great deal, but it was doing it in the face of a very uninformed public opinion which in fact seemed to think that the warriors were heroes and could not make the distinction between a group of armed warriors who had a particular interest that they wanted to defend and the legitimate aspirations of Indian people across this country.

I have talked to Indian people across this country who are themselves feeling disillusioned about the late arrival of people like Grand Chief Georges Erasmus on the scene to talk about what they really think of the warriors. Across this country there was a lot of confusion as to who these people were and an enormous amount of strained and torn loyalties among Indian peoples themselves as to how they should respond to the warriors.

I think it has been an enormously difficult situation because we had a group of very unpleasant people, many of whose chief victims have been members of their own community, who have been glamorized and idealized and set up as the champions of a cause in which they are not even faintly interested except in so far as it suits their own particular needs. I think to say that the government did not care, was not involved, bungled or delegated is completely wrong.

It would have been very nice if the Government of Canada had the constitutional jurisdiction to reinforce the law. It does not have it in Quebec. It does not have it in British Columbia. It does not have it in Ontario, which is why all of those situations which occurred this summer were dealt with by provincial authorities.

Once again, when we talk about the question of the honour to get out, the army made a very fair and straightforward offer to the warriors who are now in the treatment centre. I think this whole question of what is a fair and honourable denouement has a great deal to do with how one characterizes the warriors and who they are. I think a lot of people have lost sight of just who they are and what they represent.

I must say as Minister of Justice that I find it hard to answer the questions of people who say to me in my own riding and other parts of the country that if we appeared in masks carrying AK–47s, we would not be treated the way the warriors have been in Kanesatake. If a Chinese youth gang in Vancouver made a little trouble and appeared on the scene with masks and AK–47s, would they have been treated with that kind of patience? What about a group of young blacks in downtown Toronto or Haitians in Montreal?

It is a pretty tough question to answer, and frankly as Minister of Justice I am very troubled about that. I think the situation is not helped by people here fudging who and what the warriors are. I appreciate the hon. member's unambiguous statements that they should be the foundation of a reanalysis and a rethinking of the rest of things he said in this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to rise today on the motion presented by my honorable colleague the minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

In that motion, the House is invited to commend the Canadian Armed Forces for their conduct.

I am sure that all the hon. members in this House will agree to say that our soldiers have demonstrated both courage and restraint in extremely difficult circumstances, as well as professionalism and discipline in emotionally packed moments and under very trying conditions.

Their exemplary conduct is worthy of the proudest Canadian traditions and of the Canadian Armed Forces.

[English]

The motion today goes on to call for the persons behind the barricades to lay down their arms and to submit to the processes of our nation's judicial system. This motion speaks to some of the most cherished of our democratic rights and freedoms.

My first career before I became a lawyer was as a political scientist specializing in the government and politics of the Soviet Union. My thesis adviser at the London School of Economics was a renowned scholar, Professor Leonard Shapiro, whose career was a mirror image of my own, since he went from the practice of law to academia, while I did the reverse. I believe that his distinguished career at the British bar provided the philosophical foundation for his later academic work. When he died in 1983 he was recognized as one of the great authorities on the Soviet Union.

One of the most important criteria by which he judged a society was whether or not it was governed by the rule of law. Sadly, during Professor Shapiro's lifetime that claim could not be made for the U.S.S.R., although recent changes have been dramatic.

My study of the Soviet Union in the pre-Glasnost era in my three months there in 1972 as well as travels elsewhere in the world have enabled me to gain some perspective on a concept which is taken for granted in Canada: the notion of the rule of law. It is the foundation stone of all our other values because it provides the rules of the game by which we reconcile the differences of interest, value, and opinion that are inevitable in human society. The challenge faced by democratic societies is to recognize that our values are often in conflict with each other.

When I taught political philosophy one of the most fascinating areas for my students was an examination of how different thinkers and different ideological schools of thought deal with the conflict between the values of equality and liberty. Societies cannot maximize either value without some cost to the other and an equilibrium struck in one era may not be acceptable to the priorities of another era.

How do we manage the conflicts in values and priorities in a manner which does not tear society apart? We do it through process which are enshrined in our law. Those processes and laws are themselves subject to change, but the confidence that the rules of the game will be observed is the foundation of our civility.

If one has never been in a country which is not a democracy, one perhaps cannot appreciate the significance of the orderly transition of governments based on electoral results. Notwithstanding the rhetoric that is frequently heard in this House, no one here is under any doubt as to the commitment of all members here to those fundamental rules, even if if occasionally we purport to think that the views of pollsters should substitute for a proper electoral mandate.

Even before but especially since the Charter of Rights and Freedoms became a part of our law, part of our rules of the game, courts have struck down the legislation of this House. However we may regard those decisions, it is unthinkable that we would not abide by their findings. Thus even those who made the rules are subject to constitutional limitations. These limitations and rules are not unchangeable. Sometimes we find them outdated or inappropriate and we seek to revise them, but by working with and through the law and democratic processes we make changes that are accepted as legiti-mate, even by those who do not like them, because they been made according to the accepted rules.

The rule of law which binds governments as well as citizens is a call to an adherence to a reasoned and balanced process of law making in accordance with our Constitution. Fundamental to the principle and the process is the rejection of the arbitrary use of force, a rejection of violence.

We can review how the native leaders, governments and such and such locality responded to events in Oka and Châteauguay–Kahnawake.

We can discuss the wisdom of a specific line of conduct and the merits of the stand adopted by the Warriors. However, this debate must have for framework the fundamental principles of our society.

My colleague the minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development gave an excellent overview of the programs the government has implemented with the participation of the native leaders to protect the interests of the native peoples.

[English]

We know that we have a long way to go to ensure a rightful and fair place for aboriginal peoples in our country. We also know that a necessary precondition is the acceptance by all Canadians, without exception, of the rule of law. In the final analysis our primary concern must be to see that justice is served. The people of Canada, both native and non–native, demand it.

In current circumstances certain warriors have taken up arms and are resisting the enforcement of the law. Certain aboriginal leaders argue that peace officers should not search for illegal weapons on Indian lands because these lands are sovereign territory, not subject to the law of Canada.

The Government of Canada rejects the use of force by those with no authority under Canadian law. We reject any contention that the criminal law of Canada does not apply from coast to coast on public and private property, on Indian lands, or on land devoted for the use of some other group.

Justice must be applied to those who have consciously and wilfully resisted legitimate authority in the application of the law. We must not undermine the principle that everyone is subject to the law. We must not send a signal that laws can be ignored to suit individual circumstance.

Mr. Peterson: Nobody said they should be.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): The rule of law is the only assurance we have of justice for the private citizen in order for the community—

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Treaties are law.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): The rule of law is the necessary precondition for a society in which our values can flourish. It enables us to weigh our actions, consider the consequences and know what to expect. We cannot pick and choose when we want to apply the law and we cannot pick and choose which laws we want to obey.

If one indulges in crime or civil disobedience, one does so with the assurance that actions have consequences. By the same principle, Canadians have the assurance that if legal consequences apply to them each Canadian enjoys the same guarantee of due process, the right to a fair trial, and the right to be heard.

Canadians have been shocked and deeply moved by the tragic events at Oka and Chateauguay—Kahnawake. Canadians have a deep sympathy for the grievances of native people, but one distinction must be kept crystal clear: we must not confuse the legitimate concerns of native people with the resistance to the rule of law by armed warriors at Oka.

I categorically refuse to equate the confrontation in Oka to pure and simple civil disobedience.

Weapons are not the tools of civil disobedience. Violence, effective or threatened, profits nobody. It makes innocent people suffer losses and gets in the way of rational discussions.

Violence cannot and will not be tolerated.

I also refuse to believe that the situation in Oka relates to land claims. That question was settled.

On the 27th of August, my colleague, the minister for Indian Affairs and Northen Development, announced that his department had accepted to acquire 60 residential lots covering an area totalling 30 acres.

The lots in question at Oka will never be used for a golf course.

The government of Canada acquired them with the intention to negotiate their transfer to the relevant Mohawks authorities, as soon as all threats of violence will cease.

No, Mr. Speaker, the primacy of law is the question at stake.

The people concerned used very powerful arms to resist to the polices. A police officer was killed. Many innocent victims were threatened. Certain Mohawks were badly beaten.

Houses were broken into and vandalized.

That explains why, on August 27th, Premier Robert Bourassa, in accordance with the powers conferred on the provinces by the National Defence Act, asked the Armed Forces to remove the barricades, store the circulation on all streets and bridges, bring down all centres of resistance and store normal conditions of public order and security.

[English]

Under Canadian law, the Armed Forces are obliged to assist in the enforcement of the law when provincial law enforcement agencies are unable to prevent, suppress or control riots, insurrections or other disturbances of the peace. The Canadian forces have been called upon to do their duty and they will remain at Oka until such time as order is restored or the premier of Quebec requests their withdrawal.

I would like to remind hon. members that the Government of Canada has conscientiously avoided jeopardizing the efforts of the Government of Quebec to negotiate a solution to the situation at Oka. At the same time we have used our best efforts to assist in the negotiations.

Throughout the government has sought a peaceful resolution. We share the concern of many Canadians for the safety of the warriors now surrounded at Oka, but we would not agree with a decision to grant amnesty for their actions. No government can or should negotiate whether the law should be respected. No government can or should be expected to negotiate anything under the threat of weapons or violence. We do not accept that the warriors are legitimate representatives of their people. The citizens of Kanesatake and Kahnawake do not accept them as such.

The Oka warriors will be given all the protection of the due process of law, for this too is fundamental to the rule of law. We will not invite a lasting disrespect for a system of justice that has served Canadians well, and we will not invite prospect of future violence against Canadians.

If the Warriors do accept the offer made by the Canadian Armed Forces to guarantee their safety, we will have to decide if criminal charges will be laid against them.

Individuals facing no charges will be released. Those who are will be entitled to a fair trial and the full protection of the Charter, the law and the courts.

In Canada, justice and fairness start with the rule of law. According to this principle, the government of Canada will continue to work with the native people to achieve their legitimate aspirations.

[English]

The government respects and honours all legitimate Indian leaders who come forward peacefully. The government welcomes the opportunity to sit down and discuss reforms to the justice system with these leaders but not with warriors with guns in their hands. We are prepared to move on many fronts. Last June, for example, I requested that the Law Reform Commission of Canada study the Criminal Code and related laws to ensure that any provision of the law that might impair the accessibility and fairness of the criminal law for aboriginal people be identified. I expect to receive their report in the summer of 1991.

• (2300)

The Government of Canada and the provincial governments are working toward reform of the justice system in native affairs. A recent meeting of federal, provincial and territorial Ministers of Justice agreed to hold a conference as proposed by my colleague, the Minister of Justice for the Yukon, on native justice issues in 1991 as an opportunity for governments and aboriginal leaders from all regions to discuss aboriginal aspirations for the justice system.

What have native communities asked for? Greater control of local police, new systems of dispute adjudica– tion, tribal courts, community involvement in sentencing. Most of these demands are not unreasonable.

In looking at them the government is resolved to remain flexible and innovative. We are willing to consider alternatives to the present system, but these must respect the constitutional integrity of Canada and inviolability of the rule of law.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, all members of this House believe in a future where native people will feel confortable with the Canadian justice system.

I am convinced that by working together, we will make changes that will show our flexibility and our understanding and urge the native people to trust a justice system which really meet their legitimate aspirations.

We have a rather long way to go to deal with all the grievances that have been filed, but we have already made some headway.

[English]

We will continue to work with native people to accelerate programs for aboriginal self-government and resolution of land disputes. We will continue to examine alternatives to the justice system. We have learned the painful lessons taught by the Marshall inquiry in Nova Scotia, the testimony in the Manitoba inquiry and the Blood Indian policing inquiry in Alberta.

Even as we resolve to be flexible and innovative in the creation of our system of justice, we must renew our commitment to the basic human rights of all Canadians. Let us recognize once again that particular efforts may be required to ensure that universal standards are available to certain vulnerable individuals and groups.

Let's commit ourselves to implement a justice system that will take into acount our collective values, and suppress from our statutes all form of bias, and from the enforcement of the law, all form of discrimination.

Again, we have to try and establish a justice system that Canadians can continue to rely on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments.

[English]

Questions and comments. First I will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North, then the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam and the hon. member for Mount Royal.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have several questions for the minister. Why did the government present this particular motion? Why is the conduct of the army on trial in Parliament and not the political marching order that was given by this government? I submit that what we should be debating is the political marching order given to the army and not the conduct of the army per se. I think this motion is misplaced and I would like the minister's comments on that.

The motion speaks about the applicability of Canadian laws on all Canadian lands and is asking the opinion of this House. This is most unusual. Is this an admission of failure on the part of this government? Is it an admission of the absence of federal leadership?

The motion also asks all of the people at the Kanesatake Treatment Centre to lay down their arms. If this motion is passed and there are no peaceful negotiations in that area and the Indian people do not leave the centre, is the minister and this government then telling the Canadian people that it is creating another offence for the Indian people, that is contempt of Parliament? I think this is serious. This government is creating another potential offence for the aboriginal people of our country.

It is also repugnant to the principle of law. No ex post facto must be enacted. Here they are cornered by the army and now they are being forced to surrender and lose their dignity. If they do not do that, they can potentially be in contempt of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, while the minister speaks of the rule of law that rejects violence, which I agree with, I would like the minister to also address the issue of where there is a conflict between the rule of law and the supremacy of justice. The minister knows that justice is the underpinning of any law. Even President Lincoln refused to handle a client's case when he was being asked to collect from the very rich, which legally was right but unjust. Mr. Speaker, those are my questions to the minister.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief although there are quite a number of questions there.

First of all, the hon. member asks why this particular motion? This is the government's motion. If the hon. member wishes to bring forward a different motion to the House, he is free to do so. The motion is very broad and allows quite a considerable scope for debate. The point is, it does provide an opportunity for the members of this House to express themselves on an issue of very considerable public importance and I am sorry if the hon. member feels constrained by this motion and if he does feel constrained, then he can perhaps move his own. The wording of this motion is simply making a declaration on the part of Parliament.

The notion of contempt of Parliament if they do not surrender is totally misplaced. This House, on many occasions, calls on people to do things, calls on people to support something and the notion that somebody who refuses to yield to the call is in contempt of Parliament is totally ridiculous. I think it is perfectly appropriate for Parliament to make that call.

The member talks about the conflict between justice and the law. I would be the last person in the world to say that the law is always right. What I tried to point out in my speech was that there is a framework in which we try to change these things and I am not saying that it would never, ever be the case that dramatic events would not be required, perhaps to get attention. But we have in this country an enormous number of opportunities and processes through which people can attempt to change the law. That does not just mean the democratic process in Parliament, it means the ability to express one's self, to demonstrate, to vote, to mobilize, to organize, and to form associations. There is an enormous amount of leverage in the hands of people in order to influence the form that the law takes.

What I think was so important, and what I tried to draw attention to in my remarks in response to the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam is that part of the problem with this issue this summer has been the confusion as to how to characterize it. This is not, in my view, an issue where people are required to go to extraordinary lengths to get justice. The issue which stimulated the putting up of the barricades and the taking up of arms, arms that are prohibited for Canadians, was an issue having to do with land and where the negotiations were ended by Chief George Martin in March of 1990. In August of 1989, the federal government met with the Kanesatake band council, the province of Quebec and the municipalities of Oka village and Oka parish to establish a committee to draft a framework agreement aimed at developing a unified land base for Kanesatake.

When I became Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development in January of 1989, one of the first issues I was briefed on was the land problem at Oka because the lands were dispersed and there was a need to develop an consolidated land base for more housing and community development. The efforts to try to purchase that land long predate this particular issue.

I think it is very important to understand that what was going on there was not a situation in which people were driven to extremes in order to achieve justice. From time to time, even some members of the Mohawk community have themselves been quite considerably intimidated, I think, by the presence of Mohawk warriors have spoken up. And what has distressed me is, who is listening to them? Who is listening to those who are saying, "We want them out of our community". Even Georges Erasmus is saying it now. Georges Erasmus was not to be heard in the early days of this particular confrontation but some people, with considerable courage, spoke up and said, "We want them out of our community". They went to my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs, and said, "Get these people out of our community". The chief and his son were beaten by warriors because they tried to stop them from vandalizing the house of the local veterinarian. The warriors will not be rebuilding the community relationship between the veterinarian and the other Indians. They will buzz off. They are not even from that community.

If you have been listening to what has been going on you hear the cries of the people who are in the community who are distressed that their community is being torn out by the roots, by warriors coming in with weapons and creating an atmosphere of violence and creating a division between the native and non-native community. They will not be around to heal. On the contrary, it will be left to others to heal. The actions they have committed have been in breach of the criminal law of Canada and they should be held accountable before the criminal justice system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have on my list the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. I would hope that they would be more succinct. We have only four minutes left to divide.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to be succinct. The hon. member for Macleod wishes me luck.

I know that the minister's speech was a real mouthful. I want to congratulate her, though. I have not seen her since last June because Parliament has not been sitting all that time. I understand that her legal talents have now been recognized by her former mentor, the Premier of British Columbia, who has made her one of Her Majesty's counsel, learned in the law, and I wanted to pass on my compliments on this elevation for her. It is a distinction that I am sure is richly deserved as the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam will be able to attest, being a solicitor in her own province. I congratulate the minister on that.

With respect to her speech I had some difficulty because it certainly was full of a lot of—if I may put it politely—platitudes which sort of surprised me because when I heard the minister was going to intervene in this debate I was expecting some real pearls of wisdom.

One of the statements she made was: "We are prepared to move on many fronts". Well, today during the speech by my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Western Arctic, she referred to a proposal that had been sent by some professors at Queen's University. I do not know whether the minister had had the advantage of seeing the set of proposals that was addressed to her. I was sent a copy by the group of 22 professors who signed this particular document.

The paper suggested that one of the difficulties in the two Indian reserves where there are problems today was that the rule of law in Canada involved more than the Criminal Code, as the minister has been stressing throughout her speech. She seemed to suggest that there had been a breach of the criminal law and therefore the law had to be applied with all its vigour and force, arrests made, charges laid, and so on.

The suggestion of these professors was that in fact Canadian constitutional law was involved. The law of aboriginal rights was involved. The law of the treaties that had been signed was involved. And international law was also involved.

I suggest to the minister that given the suggestion of these professors that perhaps it is not a simple, straightforward matter of criminal law. I invite her to look at the situation in that light.

Would she not agree with them that perhaps the reasonable solution and one of the movements she might make on one of the fronts that she might consider, is the appointment of the legal commission that they recommended, consisting of a group of distinguished jurists, aboriginal people, and others who could look at the situation and advise the minister with respect to how the matter could be handled, on the understanding that the natives who are behind the barricade, contained in the encampment at the moment, could be released and their fate determined based on the findings of the legal commission. It could decide how prosecutions, if any, were to be proceeded with. It could be determined whether or not they were subject to all the rigors of Canadian criminal law as the minister is suggesting.

It seems to be a way to avoid further bloodshed and to bring the matter to a peaceable conclusion. I think the suggestion was put forward by this distinguished group of men and women who are professors at the law school with the best of intentions and to assist the minister in the current difficulty. I wonder if she would comment on whether or not she is prepared to entertain that request and appoint a legal commission as suggested in the letter dated September 24.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Do I have unanimous consent to carry on for another few minutes?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, the proposal that the hon. member refers to is one that I have not seen so I cannot comment on the creation of a legal commission. But obviously as Minister of Justice I hope that it has probably been sent to me and actually has not come across my desk yet.

The hon. member makes reference to three particular areas of law that the learned scholars refer to: the law of aboriginal rights, treaty law, and international law. I know of no law under any of those rubrics that would in fact exempt the people who are now in the treatment centre at Kanesatake from the application of the criminal law of Canada.

I have done a fair amount of work on the question of aboriginal rights going back to my days as a policy adviser in the office of the Premier of British Columbia and I know of no interpretation or implication of any of the jurisprudence on aboriginal rights or aboriginal title that would serve to exempt Indian people from the application of the criminal law of Canada. I know of no treaty that would do so. It has been alleged that perhaps the Jay treaty provides that. I would respectfully suggest that is not the case in Canada, nor do I know of any provision of international law or any convention that we are signatory to that would be binding in Canada which would exempt them from the application of the criminal law.

The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam will perhaps smile when I say it, but no matter which direction one goes—one can go up or down or side ways—wherever one goes, one comes face to face with the law. It does not fly.

All these things are very interesting, but once again it gets back to characterizing where one is there and who these people are. I do not see that any of these things would in fact exempt any of those people from the application of the criminal law.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Briefly, Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister is referring to a case that I had with her father. He was a Crown attorney and I was defence counsel and I made a brilliant argument. He stood up and said: "No matter where my young friend goes, he goes up and down and around, and everywhere he runs into the law". He sat down and the judge convicted my client. So, that is where the phrase comes from.

By the way I would not cite my experience in Bill Bennett's government which did not recognize, as I recall, aboriginal rights. It is one of the reasons why we have so many problems with native questions in Canada. They were dragging their heels on that.

I do not want to ask the minister about her travelogue in the Soviet Union or her learned dissertation on the political science scene of the rule of law. She must be aware that the one of the officers of the Sûreté du Québec filed an affidavit to get an injunction to interfere with the freedom of the press. One of the allegations in the affidavit was that the Lion's Gate Bridge which is in her riding in Vancouver, was blockaded. Absurd and yet they got the interim injunction and cut off press freedoms for a short period in Canada. How does she feel about that? Does she feel any responsibility for that area? How is she involved in this situation? Does she have any responsibility at all for the army down there or for the police?

My final question is this. What is the matter with trying to move in herself on the final negotiation and allowing these people to get out of there? Whatever we want to argue about the warriors, the fact is that other native people all across the country are looking and they feel humiliated. How about letting them out of there with a little honour and accepting some of the reasonable propositions, to wit, a trial under Canadian law, which I agree with, proper charges, proper defence counsel, a fair prosecutor, and some guarantee from the army that they will have some safety?

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not know the specific terms of whatever is on the table in front of the parties, but I remind the hon. member again that the prosecutions under the Criminal Code of Canada are not the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice.

If they were, I could barge in and do all sorts of things. They are not. They are the constitutional prerogative of the provincial governments. They are jealously guarded prerogatives, I am sure he is aware, given the fact of other federal statutes where the Government of Canada has wanted to prosecute the prosecutorial power has been seriously contested.

With respect to his comment about my providing advice in Bill Bennett's government, unfortunately when I was asked to get into the whole issue of aboriginal rights, titles and advice to the Premier, before I had a chance to give him my advice he decided to retire. So, I left his office with a head full of all sorts of no doubt confused and erroneous ideas, but none of which I have been able to give the benefit of to the Premier.

With respect to the situation with the journalists, and I have read the reports about the affidavit, it is not for me to determine whether that allegation is fatal to the request for the injunction itself. That is for a court to determine and I do not think it is appropriate for me to comment on it. But the point is that there is recourse. That issue is before the courts now and the newspapers have challenged that decision. The only comment that I have made on this, which I made in the House and it appeared to create enormous discomfort among people, was I simply confirmed that the jurisprudence with respect to the right of freedom of the press as is in the Charter of Rights has indicated that the courts will, from time to time, recognize that it may be appropriate to limit the access of journalists to certain kinds of information.

But, once again, we have to think of what we are dealing with. We are dealing with a situation which is analogous to one where a group of people perform certain acts. They are in possession of prohibited weapons. They block public highways and destroy property. The police are attempting to arrest them. They take refuge in a building or a basement and they are armed. Therefore, the police are trying to determine how to arrest these people without loss of life for the suspects or for themselves. That is exactly the analogy of what we have in Kanesatake. I am not aware of any similar kind of circumstances where the press are allowed free access in and out and where this becomes a great public event.

The army is trying to conduct this law enforcement operation. It makes certain decisions, as does any kind of police department, about how it is going to do it and it is putting pressure on people there to surrender, exactly as one would if people were hold up in a basement somewhere or in a house or whatever trying to avoid arrest. I mean, one would not cater their meals and send out their laundry. We have to keep in mind what we are dealing with there and it is very difficult. None of us wants to see any injury and none of us wants to see loss of lives. No matter what offences may or may not have been committed, no one as yet has been convicted and we do not have capital punishment in Canada, so shooting people is a bit extreme no matter what they have done and we do not want that to happen.

Those who are enforcing the law are trying to use as much patience as possible to get people to surrender. It is that context that you have to bear in mind. There is recourse in the law if the army has overstepped the Charter of Rights of members of the press and they will be held to account for it. When they go under under the civil power, they are each one of those members of the Armed Forces liable under the Criminal Code of Canada for what they do. It is a very accountable situation. That is all that would be appropriate to say. But people are seeking legal recourse.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, we are debating, as the Minister well knows, the role of the army and a whole series of issues that was placed on the Order Paper which I believe to be somewhat of a smoke-screen, notwithstanding her point of view which differs from mine.

One of the things which has been said in the House is the great deal of pride and sense of pride that one has had when we saw the picture of that young soldier standing there so well disciplined, face to face with this Mohawk. We sensed, in that one picture, the kind of role that the army was playing. There were errors and there were other things but, in a sense, good discipline.

We also were somewhat outraged by the picture of two ministers and a judge signing an accord with a Mohawk flag. There was no Quebec flag, no Canadian flag, but that picture will remain etched in the memories of a lot of us.

We also are well aware of what happened when the army rolled in. The photographers, the newspaper people, everyone has had a role to play in the media that has been very constructive. It has educated this society. There was that wonderful picture that was taken by Shaney Comolanen. She is still in that treatment centre. What was her crime and why was she deprived of both the entrance of food and equipment? Where was the Minister's role in speaking out with respect to the Charter and the abolition of human rights under that Charter? I believe the minister has something to tell this House with respect to her responsibilities for the media, for the telephones, for access to film material and the right to file their stories. Not to throw it out by—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. Minister of Justice.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, no one is stopping people from filing their stories. The point I was trying to make before is that when the journalists go in there and are with the people whom the army is trying to get to surrender, how does one distinguish between them? How does one provide all the comforts of home for the journalists when trying to make life uncomfortable so that people will surrender? No one is being detained in the treatment centre. Anyone can leave. It is an unpleasant situation, but it is an unpleasant situation to have someone with an AK–47. It is an unpleasant situation when people build barricades.

Mrs. Finestone: The journalists do not have AK–47s.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): The journalists can leave that centre any time. They are not being treated as criminals. But they cannot have all of the amenities they would like without undermining the attempts of the Armed Forces to resolve the situation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard perhaps one of the most chilling speeches that have been given in the House of Commons in a long time. It is especially frightening coming from a minister who has taken an oath of office to protect justice in Canada. It is apparent that justice is not part of the vocabulary or lexicon of this minister.

The description, as she went through her long dissertation, of the rule of law being the foundation of society shows that she does not know her political science very well. There are others in the Chamber who have also had the occasion from time to time to teach political science and we know that a rule of law is not the basis of a civilized society, it is a question justice. It is a question of sharing power. It is a question of having a kind of society which recognizes individual rights and out of that one develops a rule of law around those basic concepts. Dictators and tyrants can use the rule of law as effectively as anybody in a democracy can. Oftentimes the rule of law is used by democracies to suppress the rights of minorities.

How would you think, Madam Minister, wherever you have gone, if you were part of a minority which for the past three or four hundred years that has not been treated with any justice; who has signed treaties with all expectation of being treated honestly and fairly and had your land and hunting rights taken away? How would you like to be part of a minority where your leader in Manitoba was hung because of a question of law and order, even though he is defending the rights of the Métis people of Manitoba. We put Louis Riel on the gallows, saying that was a question of law and order.

At Duck Lake, we had the army once again go after the native people who had their lands and their rights taken away. Afterward, in the words of the then Conservative Prime Minister, John A. Macdonald: "We will then come down and settle your grievances once you have laid down your arms."

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, how do you talk about having a trust and confidence in a system of justice and this rule of law that the minister so patently described as the basis and foundation, when you have gone through the Donald Marshall case in recent history, or the Betty Osborne case in Manitoba, or the J.J. Harper case, where clearly law and order was not on your side? How do you develop a belief and a confidence?

Even in the Oka case, you find yourself being overtaken on a sacred burial ground by a group of municipal politicians who want to build a golf course. You protested that and the judge gives an injunction which allows the police to come in and take down your right to defend that sacred ground. Do you call that a system of law and order? A system of justice and fair treatment? Surely to goodness in this country of ours the concept of justice means that you recognize that there is an element of mercy, compassion, and distinction in that and that it is not some kind of rigid tool to be employed by the courts or the police or a blind Minister of Justice, to secure political ends. That is the real issue, because we are talking about a group of people who for hundreds of years have been powerless in this society to get the kind of laws that would treat them fairly. They have not had the political power. The laws have been made in this Parliament often without the consideration, consultation, or participation of native people. They have been dependent. They have been inferior. They have been treated as second-class citizens. We have a Minister of Justice who says "All is perfect, forget it all. The rule of law is all that counts". What absolute nonsense. What a disgrace to have a Minister of Justice who uses that kind of language in this kind of circumstance.

• (2330)

It is no wonder the Canadian people are crying in sorrow this summer about what is going on when we see the country turn in this direction. This is not the country that we have known. We have a Minister of Justice who shows no sign of compassion or understanding, or caring, or sensitivity to those basic minority rights, and then gets up in the House and defends this. What is going on in this country when we have a minister like that?

Mrs. Finestone: It is pretty frightening, that's for sure.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It is frightening and chilling, I say to you, Mr. Speaker. She talks about visiting Indians. I visited Indian country this summer, like many of my colleagues. I went in a canoe, travelled the old voyageur routes and visited 15 reserves. I spent time on the reserves and the Oka incident was happening at that time. I had to sit around the campfire with band council members who, when they looked upon what was happening, gave up and rushed off to Oka to find out what was going on. I can tell you what the reaction was in The Pas Indian Friendship Centre when the Prime Minister of Canada came on TV with his speech about this is by law and order. I will tell you the look of 30 or 40 native people in the friendship centre. They began to give up on this country. They realized that there was no one in Ottawa on the government side who cared about their interests. They were surrendering.

The real issue that is going on in this country today as we speak is a fight for the kind of moderation that has been shown by our Indian leadership, by the Phil Fontaines and the Georges Erasmuses of this world. How long can they hold to a moderate leadership when they do not have anyone responsive on the other side?

I visited those reserves. I will tell you there are hundreds of Okas waiting to happen in this country. I can talk about going to The Pas reserve and having the fishermen from that reserve talk about when the Saskatchewan government built a dam upriver on the South Saskatchewan and never paid them compensation. Their livelihood disappeared and no one paid them a cent. It just disappeared.

I can tell you what happened at the Fairford reserve where 800 people are denied their right to vote because no one in this government has got around to passing an order-in-council to give them a new piece of land that was given in compensation for a new dam. So they have lived in a no-man's land for the last five or six years and treated as non-citizens.

I could tell you about a small fishing village up on Lake Winnipeg that had its hatchery closed down by the provincial government and therefore had the livelihood of 90 people knocked out in one fell swoop because some bureaucrat or Minister of Finance on Broadway Avenue in Winnipeg said that was a budget matter. So, you take away the livelihood. They have been writing letters to the Minister of Indian Affairs for the past two years saying help us, get the hatchery open. They have not been given a reply.

This is no different than the transgression of a burial ground at Oka. In its own way, it is a small incident that could explode in their face. And we have a Minister of Justice who said "We're really going to get them. We're going to make sure that all those bad guys are arrested". Well, I will raise a challenge to the government: Let's have an inquiry and find out what the real truth is. Let's find out who was responsible, who was inciting the problems, who was there with the weapons, who was using force. Let's get to the bottom of it. Let's not have this kind of manipulation that we see coming from across the floor, the attempt to do as they have done on the GST and on every other issue, to distort the truth and the facts, to try to manipulate public opinion, because that is what is going on.

Of course, there are people there with weapons. But, the government knew they had weapons two or three years ago. This is not news. They have been on the reserves, the RCMP were there, and they did nothing about it. If they were so concerned about that, where was the federal government and the Quebec government doing something about the law and order at that point in time? Well, it was too big a problem and they just let it slide by. It didn't touch it at all. We have in this country an incredible gap of trust. It is a growing chasm of confidence among the most oppressed minority of any civilized country. I say that with all the shame that every member of this House should share in saying that.

I posed the issue to the Prime Minister this afternoon in Question Period. How can we have the nerve to lecture to other countries about peaceful resolutions of conflict, about recognition of individual rights, about the whole belief in the idea of civil rights and civil liberties when we so blatantly disregard them in our own country when the occasion arises? The Prime Minister and others have said: Well, we had no choice, we were called in and we had to use the force.

Internal observers who were in attendance at the initial negotiation said they did not understand why the negotiations were broken off. Discussion was taking place, sides were being presented. The international observers had no axe to grind. They were not political parties. They were outside the country. People who had witnessed for many other kinds of situations the same kind of problems, said: Hey, it was beginning to happen. All of a sudden the federal government and the Quebec government pull out and say: No negotiations, sorry. They are not negotiating in good faith. Who do you believe? The negotiation was only allowed to get started for two or three days. My goodness, the Prime Minister used to sit across the table from labour leaders for months and prides himself on his skill and ability to work out a deal.

An hon. member: Supposed.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Why was the skill all of a sudden absent? Where did it disappear? Where did it evaporate into air, this incredible skill to get a deal and to negotiate? The great believer, the gentleman who ran on the ticket of national reconciliation, all of a sudden finds that those talents that he had provided free of charge to the Canadian people for so long all of a sudden disappeared this summer. Where did they go?

We did not give negotiation a chance. I think we were stampeded by a certain public opinion that said use force, solve the problem. Goodness knows it was coming apart, but I have to say to you it was not just the fault of the natives that it was coming apart. I want you to take a good hard look at the responsibility of the provincial government of Quebec in this case because that kind of stoning that we saw which was a shame on this nation was not stopped by those who were standing around watching it happen.

An hon. member: You are right on, Lloyd.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not hear any condemnation of law and order in this case. I am prepared to say it because I am embarrassed as a Canadian to have watched my country changing before my eyes and watching that kind of distortion take place. Mr. Speaker, I say to you and to members opposite, if you are going to base your case solely and exclusively on the fact that there was a group of armed warriors who took over the Indians nations, who took over the Mohawks and were the manipulators of them, then let us find out. What are you scared of? Let's have an inquiry, whether it is parliamentary or independent, but let's get to the facts of the case because until we get to the truth there will be no rebuilding our confidence or trust among the aboriginal people in this country. The truth is the mother of trust and as long as the truth is being distorted or hidden or being manipulated, there will not be any rebuilding. I do not care if the Prime Minister comes before this House and says that he is going to accelerate some land grants. You cannot buy off aboriginal people anymore. That is what happened this summer. The country can never be the same.

Mr. Della Noce: That's what you did.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): We did not buy them off. In 1984 we brought in a bill to provide them with self-government and your government refused to pass it. You stood aside. There was a bill on the order paper in this Chamber offering self-government so that native people could find the self-sufficiency to handle their own affairs, and your government cancelled it out.

Mr. Caccia: Bill C-52.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): That is what happened. Before you start talking, learn your history and learn your facts. Don't get confused simply by your opinions.

Mr. Della Noce: You don't even know where Oka is.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I have been there, my friend, and I will tell you something. Every other Canadian knows where it is because it is at the very heart of what is sick and what is wrong with this government and with what is happening in this country and the way it is handled. My friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam said that it was bungling. It wasn't bungling, Mr. Speaker, it was worse than that. It was sheer, unmitigated malevolence in this case. They were standing by and letting it happen. That great vacuum of leadership that everybody talks about, that perception is no accident because Canadians expected better from this Parliament and from any government. They expect people to approach the problems with some semblance of sensitivity and honesty and truthfulness, and they have received none of that up until now.

I can say that if you want to be challenged by members opposite, it is very easy to do. Open it up. Let us find out what really went on. Let us not try to hide it. Let us not try to box it in. Let us not try to turn on the old machine and get the public relations teams rolling. Let us get to the truth. Let us really find out. Do you have the guts to do that? I doubt it. You have not done it before but maybe you will have it in the future. This issue goes way beyond the life of one government or the life of one Parliament. It really goes down to some fundamental characteristics of what we are making this country.

Mrs. Dobbie: It started with your government.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hear from my good friend from Winnipeg South, the neighbouring constituency. It started with the government, sure. We share responsibility in that. Every party does. I will not deny that. I think we were all sort of guilty. I do say that in 1984, as the member may know or should know, and if not go back into the records, there was a bill brought forward by the then Minister of Indian Affairs to provide for the beginning of self-government. Our government also began the constitutional recognition of aboriginal rights in the Constitution, none of which was honoured by the successive government to which that members belongs. Those are issues that I think are very, very crucial. I am not saying that we began, but what happened this summer perhaps may be an opportunity. Maybe that is the way we should really say to them that rather than coming down with the storm boots like we heard tonight from the Minister of Justice, maybe we should start using it as an opportunity to open a few doors. One would be to get to the truth, the other would be to take the Prime Minister not in his hazy promises but a timetable. If you want to use this Parliament for getting down to the serious business, fine. Members opposite, the member from Western Arctic has talked about it. My friend from Kenora-Rainy River has talked about it. Let us begin to show that we mean business.

When we talk about an independent commission on land claims, we mean one that is accountable to Parliament that will not be subject to the whims and caprices of the justice lawyers and the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs. We have a Human Rights Commission that is accountable to this Parliament once a year and must report and is independent. We want an independent commission with a budget. That way we can begin dismantling and devolving the Department of Indian Affairs. How do you think any aboriginal person can deal with that department with any sense of responsibility when you have the deputy minister using the whips this summer. It is impossible to restore it. You are going to have to make major, fundamental, far reaching changes. We, members of Parliament, must take our accountability and our responsibility. The way we do it is to say we will set up, accountable to this Parliament, a commission and hold it accountable so that different bands can come forward with their land proposals and their self-government proposals and say: there it is, let us work it out. There will be a clearer timetable, you have five years to work these things out and here is your budget for it. If they do not do it, they are going to be in front of this Parliament every year being asked why.

That begins to make sense. If the government wants to show good faith, there is a way of showing good faith.

I think what we have to come to grips with is that this summer has brought about in this country for all of us, every single Canadian, a journey that we do not like. It has opened up inside us something that we did not like to see about ourselves as a people and as a nation. Now that we see it and now that it is exposed, let us do something about cleaning it up and changing it. Let us come grips finally. Let us turn this session of Parliament, beginning in the fall of 1990, into the Parliament of aboriginal rights. Let us go to work and get various bills done on the land claims issue, on the health issue. Let us not wait until the future. No mananas. Let us do it now. Let us at least say that we have learned those kinds of lessons.

We do not have much time. If we allow the prejudice and the handicaps of the past to hold us back, as well as that underlying sort of nastiness we saw exposed so badly this summer, all of us will be guilty, all members of Parliament on all sides, of enormous failure of trust and confidence.

There is an opportunity. There is a small door open as long as we can retain the confidence of that Indian leadership which up to now has shown great restraint and moderation. If we do not act now and act with some courage and some imagination, that moderate leadership will be replaced and we will have hundreds of Okas across this country and this country will never be the same.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I must say that my hon. colleague just gave quite a performance. I think it was one of his finest hours. I have often heard him speak with a great deal of eloquence and fire. He certainly had that this evening, and I guess he needed it because there was not a lot behind what he was saying.

It seems to me that my hon. friend speaks about injustices and natives as if they just started occurring yesterday. He admits that they did not, that they began quite a long time ago, and that they began to be built up over the years of Liberal government. I think those were the years when all these specific claims that we hear so much about were created out of betrayal, out of breach of trust, out of giving land to people and then taking it away, and out of making and breaking promises.

My hon. friend knows all about those things, but he expects us to believe that he can stand up here and say: "Oh, yes, I am sorry. Gee, we made a mistake. We were guilty, but we have changed our ways and from now on we are going to be the champion of native rights and we are going to be the ones with the pure white banner". I am afraid that I have a great deal of difficulty with that.

An hon. member: Mr. Clean.

Mrs. Dobbie: Let me tell the member something. His current leader who brags about being the Minister of Indian Affairs for six years had a great opportunity to take control of some of these injustices that were built up by previous regimes and do something about them. What did he do?

My colleague says that they were about to pass a bill that would give us the beginning of self-government. My government has just quietly gone ahead and done it. We have started to create self-government throughout the country. There are native bands all across this land that have benefited from the policies of this government since 1984. We did not make promises. We went out there and we did the things that the Liberals never even thought of doing until we came into government and started getting them actually into action.

You know, Mr. Speaker, that I am a very calm, cool, collected person. I really did not mean to get into the rhetoric, but my hon. friend across the way has a habit of getting my goat a bit and of getting me riled up once in a while. I will get to the question because I know you would like me to do that, Mr. Speaker.

What I would like to ask the hon. member is really very simple. It only requires a yes or no, if that is possible, just a simple yes or no. Does the hon. member support smuggling, violence, beatings? I want the hon. member to answer very clearly yes or no, just to answer the question with a yes or no. Does he support violence as a way to promote the better condition of the native people throughout this country? If he does not then he should say not. If he does then he should say he does and explain himself.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am going to disappoint the hon. member. I am not going to say yes or no. I am going to tell her a few things first and then I will give her the answer.

First, when I described the past I did not start with Liberal regimes. I started with Sir John A. Macdonald, the first Prime Minister of this country, who sent the troops in as well to justify the taking away of Indian land. His regime was responsible for hanging Louis Riel because of a belief in law and order in Canada. Since then we have learned, to our great sense of chagrin and embarrassment, just how wrong they all were.

• (2350)

I simply remind her of that because I would suggest that the speeches given by the justice minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, were about the same as the one we heard from the justice minister tonight. I am afraid that I do not want this country 120 years from now to be still trying to learn the lesson of just how wrong we were then.

I would also like to give her a small lesson in history, and that is that the Liberal government of which I was a part brought in a new Constitution in 1982 which gave aboriginals their first recognition in the Constitution. We set forward a process that would give them further recognition until her government did not carry through.

We established the Penner commission which probably made the most far-sighted, insightful, useful recommendations dealing with the question of land claims and self-government. One of the direct results of that was a bill that was brought into this House in 1984 which set the framework of self-government, not small pieces of devolution, which again was not fulfilled.

I do not claim that is a perfect record, but I will tell you one thing, Mr. Speaker: a Liberal government would never have allowed an Oka to develop. We would never have allowed the kind of suppression of civil rights and civil liberties we have seen over the last 75 days. That is not the way we do things.

We would have had a justice minister who understood the real meaning of justice. We would have had an Indian affairs minister who cared enough about his portfolio enough to come back the first day from his summer vacation and do something about it. We would have had a Prime Minister who did not abdicate responsibility for two months. That would have made the big difference. We would have had Parliament back in session as a way of using this House to develop some understanding and consensus among members. That is the way we would have done it differently.

There are different ways of handling a crisis. There are different ways of coming to grips with issues.

The member once again throws out the question of smuggling of arms. Of course I do not support that, but I wonder where the federal government was all those previous months and years when it knew that was going on. Where was the Minister of Justice then when that was taking place? Did the member not believe in it then? Has she just discovered that that was taking place? Did it just occur to her this July that those things were taking place?

I have just finished reading a book by one of the experts that has a chapter on it. I would be glad to send it to the member. It was printed before Oka took place, and he describes it in his own book. The government itself had reports on it, but it did absolutely nothing about it. It did not anticipate the crisis. It did not deal with it. It simply ignored it.

The deputy minister was anxious to run to the media for a backgrounder come mid-July about the problems in Oka. He knew all about it. Where was he?

That is why I say there is no trust or confidence in that deputy minister or that department any more. As the parliamentary secretary, perhaps the most important contribution she could make to this debate would be to go to her minister in cabinet and say: "Look it, we had better make a fundamental change. We had better do something that will turn some real power sharing over to the bands and their councils because that department no longer enjoys any trust or confidence with them".

Those are the kinds of changes that will have to take place immediately.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, and I have to say that I agreed in large part with everything that he had to say. I share the outrage I think he feels like so many other Canadians about events of this summer.

However, I think in response to the questions he would have done better to have maintained the humility with which he began in talking about the culpability of all parties and all governments. I regretted that he cited the example of the Constitution of 1981. I remember only too well the bargaining that the NDP caucus had to do at that time because aboriginal rights were not in the original proposal made by the Liberal government of the time. I remember only too well our having to threaten withdrawal of our support for the patriation package in order to make sure that aboriginal rights were in there.

To make a long story short, of course, the final draft came out after the reference to the Supreme Court and the final First Ministers' Conference in the fall of 1981, and we all thought that aboriginal rights were there. When no more was to be done or could be done, the word "existing" had been slipped into the document, which seriously curtailed and contained the whole notion of aboriginal rights.

I am not interested in getting into a contest about who committed what sins against the aboriginal people. I think the New Democratic provincial governments—we have not had a federal one—through various megaprojects and resource development projects have also been involved in all this. I wanted to agree with the member when he adopted the appropriate confessional tone, but the minute he cited the constitution matter in 1981, I just wanted to remind him how events actually unfolded.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Is there unanimous consent to extend the period a few minutes? The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would like to reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I take the admonition in terms of the proper confessional tone from my theological friend. He is always both willing and able to provide us with the proper and, I think in this case, correct admonition that we hold true to the code.

I pay tribute to members of the New Democratic caucus at that time. I only wish that Mr. Blakeney, the New Democratic colleague in Saskatchewan, had been as equally interested because it was the provincial premiers who were very adamant against those kinds of measures being included. I think we all have to share a certain confessional in this case.

I think that one—and I rose to my feet to make this case—important event which really lead to the Oka incident was the breakdown of the constitutional talks with aboriginal people and the kind of rejection of their position that took place in that period. There was an enormous sense of frustration and disappointment that the recognition was not there. It would seem to me that is something else which must be part of the agenda of this Parliament—not some future Parliament but this Parliament—to address very quickly because I think that would be one of the areas where we could show our good faith.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move away from the mutual confessions of my three colleagues from Winnipeg and move on to other issues.

I am delighted to seize the opportunity to speak tonight because I think today we are finally beginning on the road back from a disheartening summer of discontent, despair and disunity.

I suggest that we are on the road back to Canadian common sense, in part because of a series of commitments made earlier today by the Prime Minister in his remarks on this motion. I believe these commitments, and I say this recognizing the substantial efforts of the past, particularly the recent past. I believe these commitments represent a change, a shift in perspective and commitment by the Government of Canada and the people of Canada.

I speak as a Canadian with a strong commitment to building understanding between native Canadians and non-native Canadians. That is one of the reasons when elected to serve in this House I asked to serve on the aboriginal affairs committee.

During the past year while I had the privilege and the challenge to chair that committee, I was proud of the efforts and accomplishments of all members of that committee from all sides of the House, from all three parties. We have toiled long and hard. I know it has not always been easy because the patience and the tolerance of all members have been tested. We have been tested because the more we learned and the more evidence we heard, the more we realized how much more work needed to be done. At times I felt—and I am sure the same is true for other members—that as we learned more, the greater became the weight of the task before us. The size of the task is overwhelming. I commend to all members and to Canadians in general the second report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs published this spring entitled: Unfinished Business, An Agenda for all Canadians in the 1990's.

We undertook this study. We consulted with native leadership from across Canada and we found that there was a multitude of issues that native leadership in this country felt that we, as a committee, should consider. Let me just run through some of them as an example of the depth and the breadth of the kinds of issues that we have had to deal with and the kinds of issues that I believe we have to deal with in this Parliament over the next decade. I will just go through some of the items in the Table of Contents.

Under the title "The Self-government Agenda", there is a list of issues including "Land Claims", "Other Land and Resource Issues", "Constitutional Issues", "Treaty Rights and Relations with Treaty Nations", "INAC's Self-Government Negotiations Policy", "Scope of Federal Activity Under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867", "Indian Act Amendments and the Role and Mandate of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development", the DIAND's Lands, Revenues and Trusts Review", "Implementation and Impact of the 1985 Amendment to the Indian Act", Bill C-31, the question of "Traditional and Elective Systems of Government", "The Trust Relationship", "Fiscal Arrangements", "Justice", "International Treaties Affecting Aboriginal Rights", the "Aboriginal Affairs Policy Development Process" and questions dealing with "Organizations Representing Aboriginal Peoples". That is just half of the list of the kinds of issues that we face. Some of the others include "Education", "Aboriginal Language Retention", "Childcare and Child Welfare", "Health", "Human Rights Issues", "Circumpolar Issues", "Northern Issues", "Housing", "Environmental Issues", "Off-Reserve Issues" "Aboriginal Women's Issues", "Economic Development Issues" and "Literacy". It is a very, very challenging area in which to work and I think it is also very rewarding for members of the committee who have worked on it and I look forward to continuing work in this area.

The committee, after completing this report in the spring also went on to do a study on literacy, the impact of possible changes in the field of aboriginal literacy and we held hearings across the country and it was very interesting. We expect to have a study to report to the House in the next few weeks. I think that that will be very instructive for the government as well. We look forward to making that report.

Last March, at the time that we decided to proceed with the literacy study, we also announced that we were going to be doing a study on land claims because we felt at that point that land claims was the most important issue, after literacy, that a committee of the House could deal with. That will be initiated as well this fall. It will consist of an examination of the process by which specific and comprehensive land claims are negotiated and settled and will be undertaken, obviously, without any intent to have any prejudice toward any existing claims negotiations. The analysis will include self-government issues, as they relate to comprehensive claims and public hearings on the subject of specific claims negotiations process will begin this fall.

I would like to highlight some of the points made by the Prime Minister earlier today because I think they are worthy of review. Judged in perspective, I believe this path offers some leadership, offers a direction for all of us to work together as Canadians. The first point is that consultation has been going on over the past year and it is time now, after that consultation, to put this agenda into operation. Consultation was one of the issues that we heard a great deal about in our study on post-secondary education over a year ago. There was a great concern that there had not been enough consultation at that time.

The agenda that the government is going to institute will have four main pillars and I think they all hit at basic fundamental issues important to the aboriginal community in Canada. The first one is land claims; the second one is economic and social conditions on reserves; the third issue is the relationship between aboriginal peoples and governments; and the fourth one concerns Canada's aboriginal peoples in respect of the fiduciary responsibilities of the Crown toward them. The Prime Minister noted today, as our committee had noted in the spring, that no issue is more important or requires urgent action more than land claims. The government intends to take three parallel initiatives. The first initiative is to accelerate the settlement of specific claims and I am sure the committee will have important observations on how that is to be done.

The second is to ensure that the legal undertakings regarding land transfers to treaty Indians will finally be honoured. The third one is to accelerate negotiations on the comprehensive claims, or the so-called modern treaties. Most of those are in British Columbia.

The government has made a significant commitment to expand its resources in this area and to expand the rate in which it deals with issues in this area.

A second dimension will be to look at ways to improve living conditions on Indian reserves, including such basic community programs and services as water and sewage facilities.

A third area of importance is taking some important looks, some important reviews of the Indian Act itself. The Prime Minister made a commitment to undertake that, in consultation that is currently ongoing with Indian and native leadership, to bring in some changes in the new year to the Indian Act.

Consultation and respect for the fiduciary responsibilities of the federal government are essential elements of that process.

The government will also go far beyond the status quo to ensure that there are practical ways that aboriginal communities can exercise greater control over the administration of justice. I think this is an important element of self-government and I think that that is an important step forward.

We also have to look at the relationship between non-native and native Canadians, and that is an area in which I have found myself working hard, particularly over the summer, but also prior to that.

The Prime Minister indicated today that this fall the government intends to undertake a broader initiative on Canadian unity where the aboriginal peoples in contemporary Canada will have a full role. I think that is important. I do not think we can look at these issues in isolation and pretend that they are not connected. I think the agenda that was announced today by the Prime Minister is indeed far-reaching. I think it has gotten the ball rolling and I encourage all members in the House to get behind these initiatives to help ensure that they are not blocked by the lack of will in any sector of government. I encourage all members to take up the cause and to get involved in these issues.

It is obviously going to take creativity and it is going to take perseverance and it is going to take commitment, the kind of commitment that, I believe, was shown by members of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs, but also the kind of commitment and perseverance shown by the moderate and modern native leadership who, over the summer, worked so hard to save the progress that they had achieved over recent decades. I speak here of the progress in terms of understandings held by all Canadians of aboriginal issues and aboriginal concerns. I think that is something that we all have to cherish.

I would also like to make an appeal to all Canadians both native and non-native. We faced a very difficult summer of discord and discontent and I think this, unfortunately, has stressed the bonds of relations between many groups of Canadians. So I appeal for moderation and common sense to prevail and I deplore the intolerance which has flared up over the course of the summer at various times and any developments which have led to that kind of intolerance in the abuse of innocent individuals.

I call on all Canadians to reflect on what has happened this summer and what has led to heightened tensions across Canada between native Canadians and non-native Canadians. I think we have to reflect on that. Why has this come about? What is it that is behind these issues and what can we learn from this?

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre spoke of opportunity and I think we do have opportunities now, but to achieve the opportunity that is there, I think all parties have to work together.

I think we have to reflect on what we have learned about ourselves as Canadians over the summer. We have to be prepared to tone down our rhetoric and renew our commitment to reasonable common sense means of resolving differences. We have seen some progress, I think. In particular, I do commend the efforts of moderate native leadership in seeking a peaceful, reasoned resolution to these disputes.

I think we would all agree that Canada has a long way to go to balance social justice in this country. All Canadians need to work together in this regard.

Unfortunate incidents such as the stoning of a car cavalcade of innocent women, children and elders in Chateauguay are repugnant, unacceptable and are categorically rejected by all Canadians. There have been other repugnant developments in Canada over the summer. But we are all Canadians who have to live together and find ways to live together in peace. This is important, not only for those of us who live here in Canada today, it is also important for our children and our grandchildren and it is fundamental to establishing long-term solutions to long-term challenges. This is particularly important because of the tone it sets for the children and the grandchildren of all residents of Canada.

We need to set a new tone. Let us learn from this summer of discontent. Let us work together, native Canadians, non-native Canadians, parliamentarians and Canadians elsewhere, to start rebuilding a country that respects all individuals for whom they are and the potential they can offer to build a fair, secure and prosperous future for all Canadians.

One of the questions that I have had asked of me frequently over the summer is who will pay? How can Canada pay for the settlement of land claims and other outstanding issues? Well my friends, that is not the question we should ask. The question we should ask is: Who pays if we as a nation do not get our act together? The answer is shockingly apparent. Those who pay as a result of Canada not addressing these questions are those who are least able to pay; the children and the youth of aboriginal communities across this country, that 50 per cent of native population which is currently under the age of 23. It is hard to argue in this country that we cannot afford social justice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments. The hon. member for Western Arctic.

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member who is the chairman of our aboriginal standing committee for his speech. He made reference in his speech to the fiduciary responsibility that the government holds for aboriginal people. I would like to suggest to him the ideas and the advice that was brought to me from legal advisers, that one of the violations of the fiduciary responsibility is the extinguishment of aboriginal rights in the process of completing a land claims agreement.

In the Northwest Territories where I come from we have a major land claims agreement which the Prime Minister referred to, which is in jeopardy right now. He said it covered $500 million and 70,000 square miles. We have an agreement that has been signed but not finalized. We are afraid that this particular land claim is in jeopardy because the land claims policy is outdated.

The two key priorities these people want addressed are to negotiate self-government but a more serious priority for them is that they will have to extinguish their rights in exchange for the settlement of this land claim. This will disallow them from ever having to make the government accountable by way of litigation in revisiting any of their rights after settling the land claim.

I ask the hon. member across the way if he feels that it is clearly a breach of the fiduciary responsibility of the government when they have to use the extinguishment clause during the negotiation of the land claims.

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the very thoughtful and penetrating question that my hon. colleague has asked. As she knows the question of the fiduciary responsibility is a question that has both legal ramifications and other ramifications. There is a great deal of debate in the legal community about what exactly the fiduciary responsibility implies or means.

I travelled to the hon. member's constituency over the course of the summer and visited a number of communities and I am aware that there is some genuine second thought about this particular claim. I think that is perfectly legitimate. It is in their hands to decide what is acceptable and what is not acceptable. I think my hon. colleague is in essence asking for a legal opinion. She knows I am not a lawyer and I am very thankful for the fact that I am not a lawyer.

Some of these questions are going to be resolved in other fora other than here in the House tonight. I thank her for her thoughtful question and look forward to working with her down the road on these important questions.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I must say I enjoyed a very thoughtful presentation and I have just learned through my colleague from Western Arctic that the hon. member chaired the standing committee. I think they were very fortunate to have someone who seems to have a sense of compassion, understanding, and a great sense of interest which has been aroused in the general Canadian society, thanks to the role of the media. The criticism that perhaps there were some excesses on all sides, including that of the media, may be a worthwhile criticism. On the other hand, at least the media allowed us to hear and learn and sensitized us to the tremendous needs that are out there.

I can recall doing the revisions to the Indian Act for the 12(1)(b) clause in the Canadian Constitution so that Indian women would be acknowledged rights and be reintegrated with their rightful status. There were many women and children who, therefore, under Bill C-31 earned, re-earned or were reaccorded—I think is the right word—it certainly was not a case of earning because we had taken it away from them—their status.

I heard the hon. member in the sense of creative approach, perseverance, and trust that we need to rebuild. I heard the hon. member with the sense of goodwill and the fact that we have all these issues some of which he addressed, others which he listed in his speech which are all very interesting. However, we have just gone through this summer of disenchantment, the summer of intolerance, and what I consider to be the summer of lack of governance in an adequate measure. I wonder if those thoughtful studies that he has undertaken and plans to undertake are going to fall on open ears and a Treasury Board prepared to put the kind of money that is required to bring these goodwill wishes and practical facts that will attack literacy, that will enable education and therefore reduce the number of people on social assistance, et cetera.

Just as a very practical question to indicate whether or not the government has been a government of goodwill, the five-year review clause of Bill C-31 must be coming up very shortly. I have been given to understand over the course of discussing with women's groups that we have not seen the kind of money that supposedly was promised for housing, for education, and for the relocation of these families back on to their tribal grounds. Could the hon. member tell me where that stands and if he has had any effective impact. If not, how does he expect those children to be productive people of the future, rather than the delinquents that many of them have become, not always by their own fault?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has three minutes to complete his answer. The hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. Hughes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. member for her interest and her question and also for her kind compliments. I am deeply honoured by her compliments.

On the question of Bill C-31—I am speaking in my role currently as chairman of the committee—we have not had the opportunity yet to review the five-year review of Bill C-31. There is a lot of interest I believe on the committee in pursuing it and looking at that question because we want to see exactly what the impact has been. I think that the studies of the impact of Bill C-31 that have been undertaken through aboriginal groups and aboriginal women's groups across the country have been very instructive. They have shown that there was a far larger number of people turned up than was anticipated I believe. I think that is fair to say from evidence that I have heard so far. It is important that we look at this and see whether there are other weaknesses to the implementation of Bill C-31 that we should apply additional resources to.

My colleague knows as well as anybody else in the House that I cannot speak for the Treasury Board. I am sure though that, given the current climate in this country and the tone that was set by the Prime Minister today, to be fair, I think that there is a renewed commitment to deal with some of these issues and to provide the resources that need to be provided to address them. Obviously we are playing catch-up in a lot of areas. We have come a long, long way on a lot of these issues. We have a long way to go on a lot of them, too.

I do not know that I need to give credit to the media because they have their own resources to give credit to themselves. I think that circumstances this summer have led to an enlightenment and an awareness being created among Canadians. In fact, I would be critical of the media in many cases for not going beyond the dramatic affair and the drama of the instant seven-second clip and for not getting into the substance of the issues. I think a lot of Canadians still have not been provided with the opportunity to learn about the substance of these issues, the real guts of these issues. I see that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that I have to cut off the hon. member, but his time has expired. On debate, the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate this evening. I will try to be brief with my comments.

I understand the Prime Minister made a very forthcoming speech in the House earlier today that pledged the government to a serious effort finally to begin to address the fundamental concerns of the native people in Canada, the concerns which underlie the current crisis. Unfortunately I missed the speech but I look forward to reviewing it in Hansard. I sincerely hope that it signals a new attitude on the part of the government and that it will be followed up by concrete actions.

I am at a relatively early age in my education on the native experience in Canada and I watched for the most part the events of this summer from my constituency in Cape Breton Highlands—Canso where the weather was splendid, the parades were colourful, the square dances were lively, and the hospitality was second to none, as some members who came down had the privilege of experiencing.

What clouded this tapestry was the day-to-day barrage of news reports from Oka, Kahnawake, Kanesatake, and elsewhere in Canada that showed the deteriorating relationship between native people and other Canadians. They showed the escalating violence and the spirit of violence in the standoff between the Mohawk warriors, the government, the police in Quebec and later on the Canadian Army, and the general feeling which we saw in our part of the country that Ottawa was paralyzed, out of control and unable to deal with this situation. We saw with growing dismay the increasing expressions of racism and intolerance in various parts of Canada, and a sense that the whole country and the society was falling apart around this crisis.

There was a growing sense of frustration and despair among those people in Nova Scotia with whom I came in contact at what was happening to the relationship between aboriginal Canadians and other Canadians as we observed the events at Oka.

During the crisis I had an opportunity to spend an evening with someone who is a member of the traditional Mohawk leadership at Kahnawake who had come down to visit a friend on one of the reserves in my riding. The discussion was very illuminating with this very wise individual, whose name I will not mention.

He was a peaceful person and he did not condone the blockades and the violence of the warriors. Equally so, he condemned the response of both the Quebec and the federal governments, which was really to ignore the leadership and the concerns expressed by the traditional and moderate leadership of the native people and to focus their attention solely on the warriors and their weapons.

He, himself, was ignored, even though he had spoken out time and time again on native rights on his reserve and against the violence that was occurring. He despaired of the message that was going out to native people across the country. The moderate, reasonable native people he knew who were being bypassed, who as a result of the government's handling of the crisis were receiving the message that the only way to get the government's ear, the only way to get their attention is put up blockades and to take up arms. It was a very disturbing message that was being sent out to the people across the country as the crisis evolved. There was a cry of despair from him at this message, what he was seeing and what it meant for the relationship and our ability in the country to come to a reasonable dialogue.

The Prime Minister was largely absent throughout the crisis. We never saw him, but he emerged to defend the efforts of his government on behalf of native peoples in Canada. I do not remember exactly how he phrased it, but essentially he claimed that each Indian in Canada receives something like $13,000 in government programs. Of course, that claim lead to a war of statistics and figures about whether, in fact, this was really finding its way to the native people or whether it was actually gobbled up by the bureaucracy that was delivering these programs. There were counter-claims that, in fact, only $2,000 eventually reached the destination and the rest of it was lost in bureaucratic overhead.

What was disturbing about this whole argument was the fact that the Prime Minister of Canada would attempt to justify his government's treatment of native people in terms of the dollars that were sent to them. Whatever the amount is, the whole argument missed a very fundamental point and betrayed something about the misunderstanding we have had in terms of our relationship with native people in the country. I think it is a tragic reflection of a kind of paternalism, a kind of paternalistic attitude that is at the root of our relationship with native people today. I think that it is this paternalism which is translating itself into a total loss of dignity and self-esteem and is translating itself into the dismal life which is so characteristic of our native communities and which manifests itself, as we all know, in the sub-standard housing, in social decay, in high suicide rates, rates that are multiples of what the rates are elsewhere in Canada, in family violence, in the whole litany of social conditions which characterize our native communities.

These conditions of life are present on the reserves in my riding, the reserves of Whycocomagh, Wagmatcook and Afton which too often are depressing and completely unacceptable by any contemporary standards, particularly in a country such as Canada, and where the official unemployment rate hovers between 75 per cent and 85 per cent and where many live in sub-standard housing with no plumbing and inadequate sewer and water and where alcohol and drug abuse is all too often rampant and where most of the natives spend their lives either on welfare or fighting through a maze of bureaucratic inertia in order to acquire the basic amenities of life, a job, housing, food, shelter or education. That is the situation in which all too often they find themselves. I believe that at the root of all of this is a kind of paternalistic attitude which characterizes our relationship with native people and which is symptomized by the statements of the Prime Minister this summer.

Nobody condones the taking up of arms or the use of violence to achieve political ends, be it by Mohawk warriors or by anybody else. I do not want to comment on whether or not the army should or should not have been sent into Oka or how best the standoff should be brought to a conclusion. That has been debated by others more qualified than I this evening. I want to make one point about that. It seems to me that there is a curious irony here and there is a curious irony in the government's insistence that Mohawks and other native people respect law and order, do not resort to blockades and do this as a precondition to being able to discuss what are fundamental questions about their basic human rights, questions which relate fundamentally to a litany of broken treaties, treaties which we have broken in our relationship with them and which have resulted, all too often, in their being pigeon-holed into reserves, having lost the basic elements of their livelihoods and having been forced into situations which are, by any standard, intolerable.

As I said before, I am at a relatively early stage in my education on the native experience in Canada, but I suspect that we can learn a great deal from them. We already have discovered through, I believe, the concern for the environment how the native relationship with the environment, the land and other creatures has in many ways enriched our understanding of our environment, those of us who have grown up with the Judeo-Christian tradition or other traditions who have, in a sense, not understood that relationship which aboriginal peoples in Canada and elsewhere around the world have with the land and with other creatures who share the land with us. I think we have started to learn a little about the profound lesson that they have to teach us in that area.

Another area that I have personally begun to learn a little bit about is the law and the way in which we organize our society. I was reading about some of the ways in which the Micmacs have understood their treaties and their relationships with the British who came here two or three centuries before.

I would like to read a couple of brief quotes from a book called The Micmac Treaty Handbook. The Micmacs are the native people who live in Nova Scotia. I find it quite interesting to read what they have to say about treaties and the relationships that they have developed with Europeans.

The first two paragraphs read as follows: "Well before the arrival of Europeans, formal agreements equivalent to treaties were negotiated between sovereign nations of North America. The meaning and effect of these arrangements were not limited by a few words on paper as are present day business contracts. Rather, these treaties were living and evolving relationships among various indigenous nations. Like the members of a family, representatives of the nations that had entered into a treaty met from time to time to exchange gifts, to forgive one another and to renew their friendship. We, the Micmacs, related to Europeans the same way.

The 18th century agreements between the Micmac nation and Britain were and still are regarded by us as a form of brotherhood. When there was some injury or threat of conflict, we met to exchange reassurances and renew our engagements. That is why over several decades one finds half a dozen or more seemingly separate treaties between the Micmac and British Crown. The surviving documents are often incomplete summaries of meetings that typically required many days and were repeated every few years as necessary. By themselves the documents are fragments. Considered together, they constitute a great chain of agreement. In other words, the treaty documents that appear later in this book should be seen not as distinct treaties but as stages and renewals of a larger agreement or pact that developed during the 1700s between the Micmacs and the British".

One of these treaties was a treaty of 1752, which essentially stated the relationships between the Micmacs and the British in Nova Scotia at that time. Successive governments have tried to wiggle their way out of this treaty and deny their importance and deny the validity of that particular treaty until the Supreme Court, in a decision in 1985, confirmed that particular treaty as a basis for the relationship between the Micmacs and Nova Scotians. In a meeting I had with the leadership of the reserves in my riding on Saturday, we discussed an agreement that they had just entered into with the Nova Scotia government on hunting rights. It is related to the quote I just read.

I found it quite interesting to see that this agreement, which essentially spelled out the number of moose that the Micmacs could hunt, where they could hunt, when they could hunt and a whole range of particulars related to hunting and fishing on and off the reserves in Cape Breton, spelled it all out in terms of saying what the Micmacs would agree to in terms of their obligations pertaining to those hunts. I found that particular agreement interesting because they showed it to me as an example of what was possible if the governments would be prepared to sit down and work out agreements with native people as equal partners, as people who were adults and capable of taking their own responsibilities and managing their own affairs, rather than treating them in some way as inferior citizens. I think that fundamentally, at least from what I have learned so far about this, that has to underlie whatever new relationship we engage in with native peoples in this country. What I have seen just from reading these two documents and that small experience is that really we have a lot less to be scared of in terms of entering into agreements with native people than perhaps we have had in the past.

Whatever relationship evolves out of this crisis, which I hope will be resolved very soon, I think it has to start with an acceptance by us non-natives in Canada that maybe over a long period of time we have been on the wrong track and maybe we have to accept a certain difference, a willingness to see things differently and to look and see the reality of life, perhaps not from our own eyes, but maybe from the perspective that our native people have there to teach us. I think that has to be the basis of whatever new relationship, be it through the mechanism of a royal commission or whatever we enter into in this country. That is, in a sense, what I have learned from this and what I would like to contribute in this debate this evening.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso. I think it is much more sensible and practicable and much more knowledgeable, and I would not have been here this evening had I not heard the Minister speak earlier because this previous speaker, in contrast with the minister, made sense. The only reason I am down here is because the minister spoke. It showed a great deal of naivety. It was a treatise in law and order. It simplified a very complex issue. It is unbelievable that the minister of this government would speak in that way. I could not believe my ears.

I am not a lawyer and perhaps I am thankful for that. With the naivety that the minister expressed in her speech I could not believe my ears. I am glad it was a late hour because Canadians probably did not hear her either. John Wayne and GI Joe and the Prime Minister of this country, that kind of statement may be popular in the polls, but it is totally impractical, totally impractical. These are people who are grasping for any straw that might gain them some popularity with the Canadian public, but it will not wash. It cannot wash.

The reason that these people cannot speak with any sensitivity, I believe, is because they do not understand. They have not communicated with people on the other side of the issue. They say, "I have been to this reserve and I have been to that reserve", but I do not think they have communicated yet because their words belie their actions. There is no sensitivity in what they have said.

We may have Oka incident 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 25 unless we have some comprehensive ideas. This government saw the situation. It saw the problem before and let it fester and fester. In fact, it has festered for hundreds of years. But this particular situation had festered to a point where it broke out into what we saw this summer. After seven weeks, the Prime Minister comes to his senses and says, I am the white knight, here to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I hope the hon. member has a question for the hon. member.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, this is questions and comments. I already indicated to the previous speaker that he did a super job.

The motion that the army is in charge and they have shown exemplary conduct, we agree with that, but the crux of the matter—and I will conclude, Mr. Speaker—is who is in charge? Should the army be in charge? Should the premier of Quebec be in charge? Should the minister be in charge? The Prime Minister should be in charge and where was he? No one knows.

It is a question of leadership and the country knows it. The leader of this country should have been there in the first two or three days and should have taken action. Sometimes if the action or decision is incorrect, at least it was action. Inaction spoke louder than words. To say bungling is an understatement. It is more than bungling.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Would the hon. member like to rebut?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): I cannot rebut, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to thank the member for his compliment regarding my remarks. I may use it in my next householder.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I also appreciate the opportunity this evening to participate in this historic debate.

I participated to some extent this summer in the impact of the Oka and Kahnawake confrontations as expressed indirectly in my own riding where there are three Indian reservations: St. Mary's, Kingsclear, and Oromocto. These reservations are comprised of members of the Malecite nation who have inhabited the Saint John River area for many centuries. On the other side of New Brunswick, in the Miramichi watershed on the eastern coast of New Brunswick, the Micmacs have inhabited that section of our province for centuries.

I feel a great sense of responsibility to the citizens of those reservations as their representative in Ottawa, even those among them who do not feel that I am officially their representative. Certainly there are, as we know, many native Indians in Canada who do not consider themselves to be Canadians in the legal sense and who proclaim their own sovereignty. I must say that I have made a major effort to communicate with the citizens of those reserves and I have had, by and large, a good rapport. I would like to tell the House a bit about the events of the summer because I think there is a lesson to be learned from it.

I would also like to say that many of the soldiers who have been at the Oka confrontation and at Kahnawake also come from my riding which comprises CFB Base Gagetown. I would have to say that I do share the words of the motion which commend the discipline and conduct of our Armed Forces. I think they have distinguished themselves with the cool and calm manner in which this situation has been handled from their point of view.

With respect to this motion, I would have preferred to see this resolution lead with a commitment to a comprehensive national inquiry into Indian affairs. I am very pleased to note that the Prime Minister has followed the motion today in his remarks with a commitment to an ongoing agenda, one that will be thorough and one that will be based on four major pillars, as he has termed them. The agenda points to land claims, economic and social living conditions on reserves, the relationship of aboriginals and government, and the relationship of aboriginals in contemporary Canadian society.

I support the other two conditions of the motion, the second one being that the laws of Canada must apply in all Canadian territories including Kahnawake and Oka. Also I support the call to the Indians at Oka to lay down their arms and to create the preconditions for real progress to higher ground and to the kind of challenging settlement or addressing of their concerns. Hopefully there will be new horizons in the creation of our Canadian society.

As I have said publicly in my own riding, in a circumstance where many of my fellow members got great glee when I was on public television with the talking feather, I was asked at that time to hold the feather and speak from the heart. I held the feather. I was honoured to have it and I did speak from the heart. I said that I felt the prayers should be extended to both sides of the barricades, that violence could only be avoided for sure if the natives on their side of the barricades laid down their arms and the army was to disengage on the basis of that.

I stated that I did not believe that we could practise democracy in Canada at the point of a gun, and I still believe that. I also said that I believed that the native mandate which had been established so dramatically well by Elijah Harper was at risk of being diminished and damaged by the events of Oka and Kahnawake.

As many of my colleagues observed with considerable glee, the feather was removed from my hand by one of the elders and there was a sequel to that. About a week later I was invited to attend an Indian meeting around a camp fire in a large tepee in my riding in which a prayer vigil was held.

That feather was returned to me and I repeated the statements I had made in public. This time they were accepted with the dignity, the tolerance, and the patience that the process of the prayer vigil entails for Indian people.

In effect I took that as a statement of amends. In fact there was great glee that night in the tent when I decided in a lighter moment to comment that they had restored my dignity because—and this was said with great good will and was received with great humour—a bird without a feather was a very bald bird indeed.

I must say in that spirit that I have since met with the representatives of those reserves. In fact last week I met with the executive members of the Union of New Brunswick Indians. I said to them that I disagreed with their position in many areas of detail and that I could not support, even in principle, all of their demands. For example, I do not believe that we will ever be able to reconcile the idea of one country and one society of Canadians with separate societies of any kind, including native Indian societies as separate nations on an international sovereignty basis.

I said that notwithstanding those areas of disagreement I wanted to be their representative. I wanted to try to ensure that the process of communication, the process of dialogue, was always open. I must say that after a long, hard summer where the ripple effect of Oka and Kahnawake expressed itself in the Fredericton area, I feel encouraged that the lines of communication do remain open and that dialogue is taking place. I believe it is from that kind of base in every constituency in this country that we can move forward to the kind of higher ground that will bring resolution to many of the historic injustices and grievances which legitimately have been expressed and which certainly must be resolved.

Another thing I did this summer in the course of these tensions was to try to understand a little more fully the background of the native Indian point of view. I engaged a distinguished teacher and gentlemen, a Malecite Indian who is a professor of Indian studies at St. Thomas University. After some hours with him I did have a new understanding of the aspirations of native Indians and of the complexities of the land claims issues, both the specific claims and the comprehensive claims. I had a better understanding of the deep spiritual roots which comprise the native way of life for many of their people; I would say the vast majority of their people. I was particularly impressed with their convictions about land, about the concept of mother earth and how it is really not there in their ownership but it is there in their trust.

I would urge all members of the House who have not had the opportunity to do so to examine those kinds of issues with native people. We are privileged in this House to have three, all in their own rights distinguished, who I am sure would be quite willing to enlighten those of us who are not conversant with the background of native Indian affairs. From that kind of dialogue, even on a quasi-partisan basis, I believe that much progress can be made.

I would like to say that I am willing and anxious. I would like my constituents on the reservations at home to know that I am committed to do everything I can to advance the legitimate native issues to which they aspire and which they hold but not under the practice or the threat of violence. Fortunately the native people of New Brunswick respect the rule of law. I am confident that we can and will work very well together.

Earlier this year I was privileged to serve on the special Meech Lake committee along with native members from Western Arctic and Nunatsiaq. We heard representations from all points in Canada about native concerns and native aspirations. This ended in the demonstration of democracy by Elijah Harper as he exercised his judgment, his courage, and his dignity in formally ending the Meech Lake process. While I disagreed and continue to disagree strongly with his judgment on that issue, I respect greatly his democratic and lawful demonstration of responsible representation. I believe that all natives and all Canadians could justly share the mantle of his performance, even those of us who found his decision very difficult to accept. Accept his decision we must, and we will seek new horizons and we will find new horizons to unify and build this country.

However at Oka it was a different situation. Oka was a situation of violence. It was a tragedy. It was disgraceful. It was a situation that should never be tolerated again and should never be repeated again in this country.

I do not know how much time I have left, but I would like to move just very quickly to commend the government, as my hon. friend from Macleod has described to us, on the significant progress which is being made in terms of community dialogue in the direction of self-government. I again commit to my constituents and to the government my best efforts to ensure that that process and that concept are advanced and engendered in every way that I can.

In closing, I guess I would merely like to echo the call of my colleague from Macleod to let us look to the future, all Canadians, with a commitment to work constructively and in good faith to create a society in which all may find their place in this country in dignity, in prosperity, and in peace.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona and the hon. member for Chambly are going to split the next 20 minutes into 10 minutes each with 5 minutes each for questions and comments.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I was just informed by the hon. member for Chambly that something may have happened at Oka, that events may have changed, and that there might have been either a settlement reached or something which has led to a change in the situation there but, until we find out more about it, I do not think it would make any sense to comment on it.

I wanted to try to place some of what has happened this summer in a certain historical perspective. I have listened to a lot of fine speeches this evening on both sides of the House, but I want to say that nevertheless the government motion itself contributes to and is part of the problem which led to the situation we find ourselves in. By this I mean that violence is often a response to the failure of the political process. By this I mean that violence is often a response to the failure of the political process. What we see in the government motion is an example of the failure of the political process. Instead of putting before the House a motion which might have brought people together and which might have enabled us to do something constructive, instead the government did today, with respect to Oka what it did yesterday with respect to the Persian Gulf, and that is they put a motion in which they are trying to catch or trick the opposition and put it into a difficult position. It is this kind of political game playing that I think simply makes matters worse, instead of providing the opportunity for constructive debate.

I would like to go back to 1977, at a time when I was just coming out of seminary. It was the time of the final report of the Berger inquiry into the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. I think that was a culmination of a process that began in the early seventies. Out of that report came a new appreciation for the nature of the situation that native peoples found themselves in, the whole question of land claims. It was a time of great hope, not just for a moratorium on the Mackenzie Valley pipeline but also for a new era of recognition for native rights. Many of the current leadership of the native people in Canada came out of that experience and out of that time. At that time, without being too specific, a lot of them were in their twenties and a lot of them are pushing forty now, like myself.

They spent the mid to late seventies and all the eighties believing that the political process, duly invested in, would produce results. It did not produce results. What I think Canadians understand better than the government is that what you see in part and why there is so much solidarity with the action of the Mohawks at Oka, despite people's objection to the use of guns and arms is an expression of solidarity with this frustration that native people rightly feel about the failure of the political process over the last 15 years to respond to their needs. People feel that frustration for native people and it has enabled them and many Canadians—and I knocked on a lot of doors this summer because of the Manitoba election—not to completely put aside but to put in perspective their own objection to the taking up of arms, as has happened in this situation.

I think that many Canadians are able to hear in their own minds how hollow it must sound to the native mind to have people get up and talk about the rule of law when they know that the situation that so many native people find themselves in, is a situation that exists because there has been no respect for the rule of law, that is to say, the rule of the treaties that were entered into between native people and the British Crown or, for that matter, the Government of Canada over the years. How hollow it must sound to native people to hear speeches by the Minister of Justice and others, as we have heard them tonight, talking about the rule of law when they know that the law has been broken, that agreements and treaties have been broken time and time again. It is in that perspective that we have to see what has happened at Oka and not be caught up just on the technicalities of the law although we need to obviously hold the law in great respect but we must hold it in respect in all of its dimensions and not just when it suits us.

The other thing I would like to say because I do have such limited time is that what we see here is the solidarity that I think a lot of Canadians feel with the Mohawks at Oka. It is no coincidence that this is over a golf course, or not over a golf course, but over trees. I think you will see that in the next decade, in the coming years, there will be more and more actions, perhaps not violent, perhaps not taking up of arms but civil disobedience in other forms of demonstration in which people are going to draw the line. They are going to say, no more. Unless they feel that the political process can save the environment, we are going to see these kinds of actions developing, not just with respect to aboriginal rights, but also with respect to the environment. Of course, the two are related because so many times it is aboriginal people who are called upon to defend the last vestiges of the natural environment, but it also will be non-natives. So there is solidarity between non-natives who are environmentalists and aboriginals who, by their very nature, are environmentalists. What we see here is a foreshadowing of the kind of events we may well see more of if the government does not get down to addressing some of the hard questions, not just with respect to aboriginal rights, but also with respect to the environment.

If people like David Suzuki are right—and he keeps saying these kinds of things—we have only got 10 years to save the planet. More and more people are going to say: "If we have only 10 or 15 or 20 years to save the planet, maybe it is about time I put myself on the line here". More and more people will do that, whether it is stopping logging or whatever the case may be. That is the point I would like to make.

I would also like to say that there is another dimension to the solidarity that a lot of Canadians feel with aboriginal people. They realize that in many respects, not necessarily in Oka, but elsewhere, the reason that native Canadians have been denied their aboriginal rights and denied the kind of control they would like over their own resources and their own land is because that kind of control runs contrary to the corporate agenda in this country. Corporations do not want native people, or for that matter anyone else, to have control over oil, gas, minerals, land and water or whatever the case may be. They want to have unimpeded access to those resources so they can develop them for a profit, so that they can do their thing with planet earth.

In that sense there is a solidarity between the workers in my riding who are also victims of the corporate agenda and native people across the country who have been denied their rights by successive governments because those governments have been influenced by that same corporate agenda.

There were people in my riding who not only could not get to work easily like some of the people who had to go around the Mercier Bridge. There were people in my riding, not many but enough, who lost work altogether because of the cancellation of trains due to a blockade related to the Oka situation and who lost income. Some were not able to get to their cottages because they could only get to them by train.

I received very little complaint from these people, very little animosity. They called up to say that it was a problem, but at the same time I think they realized that the stake in how the government deals with native people is in some way related to their own future and how the government relates to them.

I call upon non-native people who are thinking about this to see the struggle of native people to control their own lives, the struggle of all of us to control our own lives in a context that is increasingly dominated by the corporate agenda, now a North American corporate agenda through the free trade agreement.

I recall the words of a chief in Manitoba who said before the standing committee on external affairs that was looking at the elements of the agreement in Winnipeg: "Free trade will make Indians of us all". Unless all Canadians can regain control of our own lives—not to be too facetious about it, there may come a time when we will all be interested in reclaiming our country from the control of other powers and principalities, those people who have an interest in seeing that none of us, native or non-native control our own destinies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments. Debate. The hon. member for Chambly. You are both taking up ten minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As you said, I am the Member for Chambly, and I am probably one of the few people who are going to speak here this evening whose home is on the South Shore and who lived through those months, a very hurtful experience. And when I use the word "hurtful" I am speaking of the experience of the native people, of the people of Oka and of Châteauguay, and of the people of Quebec as a community, because in Quebec we have always treated native people with a certain respect. In 1985, as my colleague the Honourable Member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie remarked earlier, the Parti Québécois recognized the autonomy, the existence of a distinct aboriginal society, if I can venture to use the expression now. Personally I am proud of that, but I am not proud of what happened this summer. I'm not proud at all. I'm not proud of the fact that our Premier, following the collapse of the Meech Lake Accord, held the native peoples of Canada collectively responsible.

• (0110)

I saw that, it was very clear, and I'm going to cite you the example of the federal government, which made a proposal just before the Meech Lake collapse, really a series of proposals, which I find progressive. They were good proposals. But once Meech Lake failed, the federal government said, "Tough, you were against Meech, so too bad, we're withdrawing our offer, and you can just wait, all you native people, and we'll get around to your grievances one of these days". I don't want to blame just the federal government for this. Even the provincial government, even Premier Bourassa, when he met with Mr. Sioui a few days after the Meech Lake failure, he said to him, "I hope the people of Quebec are going to understand you, Mr. Sioui". It was as if Mr. Sioui had been responsible for Elijah Harper, who was responsible for stopping the Meech Lake Accord.

As a journalist who knows what a powerful impact television images have, when it started appearing on television I felt how important it was, because I saw there a certain spirit.

[English]

I saw a certain spirit, a nasty spirit, a spirit which is un-Canadian, a spirit which is unnecessary, a spirit which is provocative. When you have this type of spirit from Quebec and you have the same meanness coming out of the federal government, I imagine if I were a native person, how would I react when I see the Sûreté du Québec coming into where I call home, firing tear gas, heavily armed and trying to take away the peaceful barricades that we had up until that time? Quite frankly, I am ashamed that, in Quebec, 80 per cent of people who had been polled before this crisis had said that they were in favour of the land claims of the aboriginal people. Gosh, today that is almost as many people in Quebec who are against the GST but they were in favour of the land claims and I believe they still are. But what I find extremely hard to take is, when we are looking at the settlement of this controversy, we find a government wrapping itself in a cloak of law and order.

I am a former military man. I spent three years in the army. I believe in law and order, but I also believe in fairness. Here these concepts of fairness and equity are not present. There is provocation, meanness, and a minority of people turning towards the only defence they have, as warriors. I agree that the approach that the warriors took was wrong and I am going to emphasize that.

Armed struggle in a democracy, where one has the right to change the government through voting and through lawful dissidence, is wrong. I know of what I speak because, being an American by birth, I have worked with Martin Luther King. I never knew Martin Luther King to pick up an AK-47. I never knew Martin Luther King to have been masked. I understand how this could have occurred because of the feeling of weakness and of powerlessness of a minority. I do not think it is right to use these images to say that because of that we should permit ourselves to go in, shoot it out, take no prisoners, and get over with this entire situation. I do not think it is right.

I think what we need to do now—what the government has not done—is to come clean with the voters, with the people of Canada, and say that it was wrong and should have presented a series of propositions to our first peoples of Canada, whether Meech Lake passed or did not pass. It had no relevance to Meech at the time. It was used as a bargaining chip and we know that. But that is the way this government operates. Our Prime Minister, who likes to roll the dice, in this case decided to roll dice which were fixed. It wasn't fair. It wasn't honest. I think right now what is encumbent upon us after this controversy, after this conflict which has caused so many people to be inconvenienced, injured, and caused one death, that we learn from the tragedy—and I call that tragedy of Oka—that aboriginal people have got to be put on the front burner of our approach to this challenge of recognizing their basic rights.

If we talk about sovereignty for Quebec or sovereignty association, we have to also apply that to our nation's first people. If we missed this lesson, as we have missed so many lessons in the past as parliamentarians, then tonight at 1.20 in the morning we have missed this entire day and this entire Parliament in getting the message of what Oka has given us. That message is that it is time now, once and for all, to address the concerns of Canada's original peoples.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start off by congratulating my collegues on this side of the House, my colleagues from Châteauguay and Argenteuil, who have come through some difficult times this summer—I was in contact with them.

I listened to my colleague, the honourable member for Chambly, whose summer was probably just as busy. I don't know if people telephoned him to express their displeasure, but I am certain that if they did, they didn't all say the same things he has just said.

Mr. Speaker, this evening we have heard some emotional speeches. We have all lived through a long hot summer, that's for sure. I know Oka personally, because I have many friends there; many of my constituents have summer homes there, and many pleasure boaters make a habit of using the marine there, which this year, unfortunately, couldn't operate. And I had to go there myself to see certain things with my own eyes so that I could contribute to the discussion.

This evening there have been people who told us how they visited reserves, they did this and that, but I think this evening we also ought to talk about the fact that cases like Oka, or Châteauguay, or Chambly, they don't happen every day. It was very hard for people.

Mr. Speaker, this year Laval is celebrating its 25th anniversary, 25 years of love and friendship. Oka is in the process of destroying itself, and the crisis has destroyed the prettiest village in Qubec, where I spent my summers when I was a student. They were wonderful summers. But this has been an Indian summer, and a bitter one.

The proverb has it, Mr. Speaker, that not all truths should be told. But one day the truth has to be faced. And the things I saw when I took my family on a few days of vacation, mainly in the United States, those things hurt me. When I saw cars, on television or in the daily paper of USA Today, a paper that sells 2.5 million copies every day, the first photo where there was a picture of a Sûreté du Québec car with a Warrior and a sub-machine gun in his hands, people said, "Things are going badly in Quebec. The Warriors are holding a whole community hostage. A policeman has been wounded." That's what informed people were saying. There were other sources that were less informed: in Le Monde, from France, we read that it was an Indian who had been killed.

Mr. Jesse Jackson, who has forgotten the noble words of Martin Luther King—my colleague referred to him also, one would think he had read my notes—Martin Luther King never picked up a machine gun. He defended people's rights. Jesse Jackson arrives here, a fledgling journalist—recently recycled into American talk show journalism—and he says, "Two people have been killed here. Where are they?" Doesn't he even have a researcher, this guy? That's what has affected our morale, these international observers.

There was Archbishop Tutu as well, who wanted to come and talk to the Prime Minister at a time when 450 people in his own country were busy killing one another, the Zulus. We saw some others like that, these international observers my colleague the Honourable Member for Winnipeg–North–Centre was mentioning earlier. He has left, which is too bad, as I would have liked to respond to him.

That's the truth. My pride as a Quebecer visiting the United States took quite a blow, I can tell you. I felt humiliated; the people of Quebec were being humiliated. To see the Sûreté du Québec, a car overturned, Warriors with sub–machine guns, whether they call themselves Lasagna or Pizza or whatever— They made fun of us with masks, and people said, " You're maltreating the Amerindians." Well, isn't that dreadful!

I have a list of all the benefits we give them. There isn't a country in the world that treats its aboriginal people as well as Canada does—in any event I've never seen the figures that would prove it. And the village has been destroyed.

Earlier I spoke with the Mayor of Oka, who's a friend of mine. He's the one who managed to keep his cool and keep his townspeople within the law, too. No stones were thrown in Oka. Everyone came and went without making a fuss.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there are problems in Oka. There is good news this morning: everybody has come back to Oka; but there is bad news, too: there are people who don't have houses any more. There are people the law hasn't protected. Their houses have been destroyed, their goods stolen. Ask to see the houses that belonged to the Lemays, the Mongeons, the Imbeaus, the Legaults, the Dubés—what has become of their houses? Nothing remains but the four walls. Where is the law?

People thought the problem we were facing was the golf course. I hope we're not that naive! The problem is much more than that. The little bit of land wanted for the golf course (and it's a swamp, I know it very well), that wasn't the problem.

There has been a problem for the 14 months that they've been negotiating for the land. Before that they negotiated for four years. Every time there was an agreement, they changed chiefs. There are serious problems. There's no more investment at Oka. There was a hotel that was supposed to be built there, a $9–million hotel, an open–air resort, because in that part of the country that's what there is: sports, the great outdoors, it's scenic, it attracts tourists. But that's all changed. There were houses that were sold—the buyers came wanting their deposits back. Nobody wants those houses any more, and why would they? I believe my colleague will have a chance to speak later. In the meantime, may I suggest that he do as I did, and listen? He might learn something.

The resort project: $8 million. The proposed marina at Pointe–aux–Anglais, is that going to go ahead? And there will be other surprises in the future, I'm sure. You know, Mr. Speaker, everyone has spoken, and rightly, about the native people, the Mohawks. Certainly the proposal before us must be discussed.

But I would just like to touch on the other side of the story, because I've spoken with the people on the spot. They are whites, non–Indians. You know, there was a poet in Quebec named Félix Leclerc, and he always said, "If you want to kill someone, pay him for doing nothing." So today, as in the past, it's a continuation of the past, the evil continues. We hand out money and more money and still more money, but money isn't always the answer. We are not giving these people the dignity they seek. We don't give them responsibilities, we give them money. Perhaps the Indians want some dignity. Perhaps they want to be self–sufficient. When someone earlier referred my colleague to the Vatican, I saw him smile, because the Vatican is independent, that's true. It would be quite something to see the Vatican, the same system they have for the independence of the Vatican, here.

You will tell me that the Canadian Constitution isn't perfect, and I agree. I may never be perfect. But all we are asking, all I want, all I would ask them if by chance someone is listening is: Lay down your arms. Nothing can be won with weapons. If there are people who think they're going to win with weapons, my regrets.

I listened to our Prime Minister this afternoon, I listened to his positive approach, and I retained something in particular from his speech:

[English]

Let the children go to school. That is where they belong now.

[Translation]

We see the Warriors, Lasagna and company, huddling close to children, families, women. That looks good, makes it easy to aim. And they call them "braves"! Personally, if I had something to settle, I wouldn't bring my children along, ever. I would confront the other person. They're putting children in danger. Why don't they put down their guns? Why don't our leaders—. Just now someone spoke of Mr. Sioui and of someone else. I'm not satisfied with the way the chiefs operate. I'm not satisfied when I see that people are being paid to do nothing behind all this. My colleague the Honourable Member for Chambly spoke of Mr. Sioui just now. I heard that too. Maybe I thought it was a threat too. I did think so. But if my honourable colleague is following the whole matter, he knows there is more to it. I could mention George Erasmus, who said,

[English]

We have never encouraged picking up the guns so that there would be bloodshed, but we have strongly defended our right to do everything possible peacefully to defend our rights.

[Translation]

I agree with him. George Erasmus, Grand Chief—

[English]

Georges Erasmus, Grand Chief, said this on July 12 on Newsworld. Later, I saw him on TV say: "Indian people are not going to sit back and have their people butchered. What we are strategizing for is how to bring this country to its knees if it is not going to negotiate.

But in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, those are threats.

Yesterday I listened to George Erasmus, who has received $2 million in grants, who earns in the neighbourhood of $110,000 a year, and he came before Parliament to say, "It's not enough. You're going to have other Kahnawakes, you're going to have other Okas." Threats—And he doesn't pay income tax on his $110,000. He lives on a reserve. He says that the public, the MPs here, who earn $65,000 a year, are paid too much—and they pay income tax, too, which doesn't leave a lot.

So when someone bites the hand that feeds him, instead of finding a solution, because there must be a solution— Everybody talks about solutions. If one of them is a good one, let's run with that one! I'm not saying, "He's the one with the solution, or she is, or someone else is", but there must be a solution. But no, they criticize, they make threats. George Erasmus, Sioui. They don't want to respect the law, but they want the benefits of the law. And benefits the law certainly gives them.

It's true that the federal government has been under attack. It's easy for the opposition, it's easy to criticize those in power. It's easy to criticize the Prime Minister. He's to blame, he did it, they all dit it. It's government-bashing time. It's like playing hockey, Mr. Speaker, and getting a 10-minute misconduct penalty when you weren't even on the ice. The Prime Minister has a 10-minute misconduct penalty, the Ministers of Justice and of Indian and Northern Affairs have also been given 10-minute penalties, and they weren't even on the ice, because the provincial government was there. But it's time they did get out on the ice. But there are laws, there are constitutions to respect. My colleague says No—he knows everything about Quebec. Probably he's never even been there. Bourassa, for him, doesn't count. For us, he's a Premier, elected as democratically as my colleague. Yes. But that probably doesn't matter to my colleague.

So, misconducts. And if you're in the opposition, it's so easy to criticize! And when they were in power? God save the country! You're so wonderful, but have you forgotten October of 1970, when you sent the army into Quebec? You're so wonderful, but you put Italians in prison, minorities, and why? They were interned because they were Italian. Minorities!

[English]

No respect for minorities and you tonight, like the member for Winnipeg South Centre, make a big speech with no content. He is an actor. I have content. I am going to give you proof of what you did, so do not give us any lessons. Go back in history, go back 20 or 30 years to what you did. You have no respect for minorities. We have.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I see people enlisted in this cause. One day they are egging the young people on, the next they're saying, "Hold it, hold it, no problem." One day they stir them up, the next day they calm them down. When is it going to stop? The people of Oka have returned home. They're eager for a peaceful solution. They're eager for everything to return to normal. They have lost a summer. They have lost their homes. They have lost personal property. And their eyes are smiling but not their mouths. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I say—

[English]

It is about time we got peace because these people did not ask for that problem. Non-Indian people there are suffering too. Nobody cares. We have everything on this side and we have nothing on the other side. I care for them. They are good people too.

Ms. Blondin: Is that a vote for me?

Mr. Della Noce: That is not a vote. They do not vote all for me, but I have got some friends that I respect very much. We were friends before politics and I hope we will stay friends. You see friends when you have problems. I went to visit and sympathize with them and tried to explain. Do you know what they asked me? They asked me, what would happen to me if I would go out with a machine gun? You would be arrested or shot, it is up to you. What would you like to do?

Even my kids said, "Dad, it is impossible that you guys cannot do anything about it". On TV I saw Lasagna playing the guitar with a big M-50 machine gun and then try to play with the arrow. Do you call that fun? Do you call that fun when kids are watching TV? Do you call that freedom of the press? Oh, the poor press, they suffer a lot. They show that almost live on TV. Playing the guitar with a machine gun in Canada when some poor taxpayers cannot even go through a red light without being put in jail.

Mr. Keyes: Freedom of the press.

Mr. Della Noce: Yes, freedom of the press. One law with some exceptions. I do not know what the Liberals have to say. I would like to ask some questions of them but time does not permit, and I respect that. I would like to know if a lot of people here have the same solution as Mr. Chrétien: let them go, catch them later. That is not what the people say in my area.

I met with all the people who have asked me to meet them on this issue. Why are we doing this? Why do I not have these benefits? Why do I have a special law? Why? What did we do wrong? We want to go to work. Ask the people at Chateauguay who have to go around. Nobody gave them anything free. Okay, now we will find some money, not too much, 10 cents a kilometre. When you drive a car it costs 36 cents a kilometre—41 now, my colleagues knows about it. It will be a present. My colleague from Chambly will understand that.

I did fight, too. I fought all my life for the consumer. We made a strike together. We had no guns and we won exactly what we wanted. I have a witness here. Thank God he is here to witness. We had no guns and we won. We won everything. Of course, there were some bad words going around. It is part of negotiations. We had something going on, but we did not have any machine-guns, thank God. We did not have any. What did we have? We had some friends who stuck together and we worked and tried to understand. When the minister called me and said we are ready to negotiate, I said, "Hey, boys, let's go back to work. These guys are serious". This was in the PQ time. He was there and saw what I did. We had 7,000 members on the road and everybody respected the law. If my people did not respect the law, we would not be here today.

I would like to finish with some—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Della Noce: These guys do not like the truth. These guys only like to criticize the government. But they have no solution. The only solution they have is to let them go. We will catch them later. Try to explain that to my people.

What I saw yesterday on TV was a real disgrace. Jesse Jackson came in and tried to play the new star on TV, just for the new talk shows in the United States. The researcher did not even tell him where Oka was. Somebody had to drive him there because he did not understand anything in this area. Thank God, he is not the President of the United States today because he would be playing golf the wrong way.

I was very surprised and shocked to see the international people who tried to give us lessons such as le journal le Monde en France. They do not understand this issue. They do not know what the hell is going on here. They do not know anything because on their first page they wrote that an Indian was killed in Oka. It is not true. It was a Quebecer who was killed. He was a human being, too. Corporal Lemay was killed. Try to explain that to his wife, try to explain that to his kids. He did not even have the benefit of this person to rest in peace.

The respectful defenders of international human virtue did their usual turn, Mr. Speaker. The Right Honourable Joe Clark put it very well when he said that the observers tried to comment and find solutions when they had no idea what was happening. No idea! I was on the barricades one day, and the international observers came and they said, "How terrible", and then left. They didn't even go to the other side of the barricades. And at that point the army wasn't even there.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the people affected that I sympathize with them very much. I know their problems and I was there to help. I hope the two levels of government are going to do something to help them and also to restore some economic vitality to the town of Oka. I want to congratulate the Mayor of Oka, and extraordinary major who did extraordinary work, because he managed to keep the peace. And all his townspeople displayed extraordinary strength. They didn't criticize; they didn't act like the people of Châteauguay. Maybe they should have.

Mr. Speaker, I spoke to Mayor Ouellet earlier and told him that I would convey this message to the House. I congratulate him on his good work and I hope the government will do something to save this town, the prettiest village in Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I guess I am in a strange position having had my colleague, the hon. member for Laval-Est, put me in the same boat as he in the past. One thing that I have noticed with my colleague, the hon. member for Laval-Est, is that he has proven to me that anyone can become a member of Parliament regardless of creed, race or ability to understand a debate.

I think that what my colleague has said has been a mixture of insults to native people and an apology for the government. Unfortunately, I do not believe that he has really come clean in the sense of what he said publicly to the press. Before coming into the House today, he said publicly, and he had promised me that he would be saying that again today in the House, that he, as a member of Parliament, was very much upset by the way that his own government handled the native issue and that the members of his own party were not consulted and were left out and he felt very badly because of this situation. I see my colleague saying, yes, that is true and, at the same time I see other members of the caucus of the Conservative Party saying, no, that is not true. I think that is indicative of the fact that they were not able to get their act together before and they are not able to get their act together now.

To speak in terms of Mr. Erasmus, I do not agree with what Mr. Erasmus has said. I believe that he has been tendentious but I agree that the government has been equally tendentious, has been arrogant, has been wrong and has been provocative. To say that here is a man, a respected native leader and that we give him his food, to me, makes me feel dirty, it really does. It is not the appropriate kind of remark that we should make in Parliament about people who are Canada's original people.

I think that this entire debate has led itself to excesses on both sides and for one member of Parliament, my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Laval-Est to say that we have forgotten the other side, I do not think that is true. I have listened today. It is now almost two o'clock in the morning. I have listened because I figured I could make a better intervention if I heard what other people had to say, and I have heard, repeatedly, members from all the parties of this House saying that there has been a collective tragedy here on both sides. There have been people murdered—I am sorry, I must retract that—there has been one person killed, there have been people inconvenienced, there have been people injured, but I do not believe that we can put the blame on one side. I do believe that the government, as I said before must learn, and I wish that my colleague would learn, that this is a collective tragedy and that we should come out of this with the renewed desire to sincerely deal with native problems across the country.

One thing I would like to ask of my colleague and that is this: does he stand by the remarks he made outside of these halls, outside of Parliament, to the effect that the members of the Conservative Party—and I see him being coached right now by one of his colleagues and I understand he may need coaching but I would like the member for Laval-Est to answer on his own because he does that very well—did he not feel that the Conservative Party was running away from its elected members and it was really out of touch with native peoples?

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, what I did tonight was try to explain that there are two sides to the story. The majority of our members tonight spoke about the Mohawk Indians. That was their right. I tried to touch on the other side a little, because these people need to be heard too. They are responsible people, good Canadians. They are taxpayers, and I have a lot of respect for them. I am a minority myself. I will not let anybody insult a minority in this House, even if my colleague tried a couple of times tonight.

The fact is that I was not informed. I said it and I will not hide it. There was a lack of information at the beginning. Of course nobody knew at the beginning where the story was going. I did inform my minister and we had some talks. I can tell the House that right after I was spoiled with information. There was a misunderstanding and some papers were sent to the wrong place. I accept that. I stand on what I said. On such an important issue people call their members of Parliament every day, people who were on both sides of the fence. At Oka and Châteauguay I have some people working there too who had lost their jobs. It is normal to be informed.

I did say that I was not well enough informed. I must say that after they did some research. Something happened and it was corrected, and after that I was spoiled with information. I must admit that I did not have very much time during the summer to read everything. I just wanted some important information about where we stood on the issue.

My hon. colleague from Chambly who asked me the question did not say a word in his speech about his constituents in Chambly. I met some people who were angry. I met some people who were not too happy about the crisis. They did not like the idea that they had to turn around and travel an extra 10 kilometres to 50 kilometres per day.

People called me from Ville La Salle. Maybe that is not exactly in the centre of Chambly, but I understand people called me because they knew me personally. Of course I am not their member of Parliament but I can still talk to these Canadians. They were unhappy. They did not like the idea, but that was the situation.

Of course they would like to have the situation changed after a phone call. I do not think anybody here has the right key for doing that. I hope that people understand that we try to do our best. We tried to work with everybody on both sides of the House and on both sides of the issue. I worked with the mayor, I worked with the people, and I think we did a hell of job.

I know my colleague from Argenteuil—Papineau spent many days there. I saw her on both sides, but most of the time she was on the other side of the barricade. I did not go on the other side very much. I was not allowed to go really. I stayed on this side of the barricade, and she was briefing me once a week.

The situation was not funny. We did not think for a minute that this thing would go on for 70 days or more, and the people sleeping in the homes at Oka tonight are not very secure. I understand that very well. If people here know Oka with the mountains, the golf courses and all the trees, they will know that they do not like that, but we assured them and the army assured them that there would be no problem. I am very happy that they went back to their homes tonight. I received that news at ten o'clock tonight.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on an issue of great importance and urgency to our country and indeed of great interest to the people of Haldimand—Norfolk.

This summer our country's own Armed Forces have been deployed against its own citizens. This summer shots were fired and a Canadian lost his life. Several hundred Canadians have experienced violations of their basic rights. We have seen footage and heard reports of police harassing Canadians and Canadians attacking police. Canadians have attacked one another with names and sticks and rocks. Our mood has become one of confusion, of anger, and of vengeance. Canadians know shame as a nation that they have never known before. The cause of this shame is our inability to deal peacefully and justly with the native people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that a great deal of the shame must rest with with government and its inaction to deal with this situation.

In my time as a member of Parliament I have never seen such complete lack of confidence, such lack of understanding, and such lack of leadership as I have seen on this issue. In its souless, gutless manner we have seen throughout, the government is now trying to shift the blame away from its own inadequacies, away from its own lack of leadership, to a whole different issue.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development would rather talk about the conduct of our Armed Forces than to address the real issue, the real needs of our native Canadians. The Canadian Armed Forces are just that: they are Armed Forces. They were called into the communities at Kahnawake and Kanesatake and given a mandate in our society. They acted with discipline and efficiency, but the fact that the Armed Forces were called out at all was an admission of failure on the part of both this government and the provincial Government of Quebec, because arms are only taken up by people when they feel that all else has failed, when they feel that their governments have failed them.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development seeks to condemn the Indian people in their use of arms. These arms were taken up rightly or wrongly after decades of attempts to deal and negotiate a settlement with the Government of Canada. How long did the federal government wait to send in its Armed Forces? How hard did the minister and the Prime Minister try to negotiate before sending in the Armed Forces?

The minister could not negotiate because he was far too busy trying to dodge cameras and to figure out how he could twist the situation and how he could tell the people of Canada that it was not his responsibility, that it was not the responsibility of this government. I tell the minister that Canadians are not buying it.

From the early stages of this crisis the only information we got from the government, the only word that came from the government, was that it was a police matter and out of its jurisdiction. There has been no leadership shown at all. It has completely abdicated the responsibility for first peoples.

That same point was made in a letter, of which I have a copy, to the Right Hon. Prime Minister from the Six Nations Council, from Chief Bill Montour. I want to quote a little from this letter because I think it is important:

> The Six Nations of the Grand River are alarmed to be informed by Six Nations negotiators in the Kanesatake territory that the federal government and the province of Quebec negotiators are unwilling to negotiate or entertain even serious discussions concerning the situation at Oka.

Later it says:

> We feel your government has shown a total lack of responsibility and sound judgment, passing the situation off as a police action of the province of Quebec. Your inaction will only serve to regress the social relationship between this divergent cultural group and the aboriginal peoples in Canada to that of 100 years ago.
> The Six Nations of the Grand River believe that it is your responsibility to take control of negotiations by defusing the trouble spots and negotiating a peaceful settlement with the Mohawks of the Kanesatake. Rather than allowing the bureaucracy to have total responsibility to uphold the honour of the Crown, we respectively demand that you recall Parliament to deal with the transgression by the province of Quebec.
> May our creator guide your thoughts.

That was sent to the Prime Minister by Chief Bill Montour of the Six Nations, and with no response.

By abdicating its responsibility I believe this government has guaranteed, as my colleague from Rainy River said, that the threat of violence could continue. By abdicating its responsibility for aboriginal peoples and for the policies concerning land claims, this government has told Canadians that they are an instrument of choice when it comes to a crisis requiring leadership.

"Forget leadership, forget Parliament, forget serious negotiations, because I have always got the police. I have always got the army to bring in." That is the message from this government to Canadians. Then the government has the audacity to tell first peoples and to tell Canadians about this magical rule of law. This is the same government that stood by while food and medical attention were denied Canadians, the same government that is now trying to justify the violation of the freedom of the press, the same government that manipulates jurisdictions and legislation just to hide from this difficulty, the same government that on numerous occasions has shown complete and utter contempt for this House. Now it wants to tell Canadians about the rule of law.

Let us talk about that point for a second. I am not a lawyer, but I did have the opportunity to contact the Library of Parliament to find out what exactly its definition of the rule of law is. They gave me a quote of the rule of law taken from the Oxford Companion which it reads:

> The concept of the rule of law implies the subordination of all authorities, legislative, executive, judicial and other to certain principles—these principles such as the fundamental principles of justice, moral principles, fairness and due process. It implies respect for the supreme value and dignity of the individual. In any legal system, it implies limitations on legislative power, safeguards against the abuse of the executive power—

We all know—and even the government would admit it—that the treatment of aboriginal peoples throughout history on this continent has not been compatible with the fundamental principles of justice. The land dispute which gave rise to the blockades at Oka has its roots in the unjust allocation of land which arose when our society imposed concepts of land ownership and of land exploitation which were foreign and indeed caused conflict in this situation.

The rule of law implies supremacy of the moral principles and respect for the supreme value and dignity of the individual. Do we consider it morally right to deny food and medical attention to children? Do we abide by the violation of fundamental rights and freedoms?

All these things happened this summer and they are continuing to happen. Has this government done anything to solve these problems? Now government members opposite stand here before us and attempt to pass themselves off as defenders of this rule of law. What about the rule of law safeguarding abuse against executive power?

We on this side of the House demanded that the government recall Parliament so that representatives of Canadians from across this country could participate in a debate and that we could express to this government the anger and the outrage of many Canadians over this government's failure to act in this situation.

This government failed to commit the political will necessary to bring about a peaceful negotiated settlement to the situation and to preserve the dignity of all the individuals involved. This government refused to heed our call despite the fact that it had recalled Parliament to deal with events which while important were no more important than this situation. Members opposite like to talk about the rule of law and order, knowing that they are sacred cows which no one would dare contradict.

Let me express the perspective exposed by Ovide Mercredi, Manitoba Vice-Chief of the Assembly of First Nations. It is one I share with him. This government talks about law and order and what they do not seem to understand is that law and order is based on justice. Our population is law abiding because it believes in the justness of the law and the judicial system and where it does not agree with the law, it has confidence that the system will protect them and that it can be amended. We know that our judicial system, our police system and government have not treated aboriginals fairly or justly. How is it we expect unending patience, unending law and order from a group that we have endlessly abused and discriminated against? Does that mean that I think picking up a gun is a way to solve a problem? No, I do not.

What it means is that I believe it is abundantly clear that the current land claims system is a failure. It has little political legitimacy remaining and is in desperate need of reform. It is unacceptable that this government is trumpeting law and order and the rule of law as a new-found excuse to ignore and dismiss legitimate Indian demands. In fact, this government has violated the rule of law in almost every way imaginable in the last few months.

Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to participate last Sunday in Simcoe at a rally by constituents of Haldimand—Norfolk. It was pouring rain and there were hundreds out there. They signed a petition which I have here and I want to read it because I think it is important. It says to the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of the province of Quebec and all those who may be concerned:

"We citizens of the Haldimand—Norfolk area of Ontario gathered in Simcoe September 23, remind our federal and provincial governments of the meaningful aboriginal status of the native people of Canada, of the important contacts with land and community which has sustained them in such symbols as the Mohawk tree of peace, of the privation and suffering which Canadian and American policies continue to cause them, of the need in Canada today for generous and neighbourly treatment of all citizens including native people. We earnestly request our governments to address at once the many outstanding land claims of the native people of Canada, to recognize and respect all treaty rights of native people, to support the native people of this country in their search for a meaningful degree of self-government, to accept due responsibility for the deterioration of the quality of life in many reserves and to take appropriate steps to correct it. Finally, we request the federal government to establish an aboriginal rights commission to push these developments.

At this moment of confrontation at Kanesatake and Kahnawake in the province of Quebec, we think it essential that the federal government exercise its authority to cause a withdrawal from the scene of the Quebec police and after that of the Canadian military personnel who are at present on the scene and enter into meaningful discussion with the native councils of these communities with a goal of peace and the well-being of their people and in demonstration of our sincerity in these matters, we have gathered food and money to aid the people at Kanesatake and Kahnawake and signed our names to this petition."

This petition is clearly the feeling of a great number of Canadians. I know my time is up so in closing, let me return again, to the Oxford Companion's discussion of the rule of law. I believe that these words serve as a very useful commentary on the government's reaction to the Oka crisis and in particular to aboriginal issues in this country. It says, "The rule of law means more than that the government maintains and enforces law and order but that the government is, in itself, subject to the rule of law and cannot itself disregard the law or remake it to suit itself".

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, you caught me unawares as I thought there might be some questions. I take part in this debate this evening, or this morning, and I look at the resolution that we are debating, that this House commends the exemplary conduct of the men and women of the Canadian Forces at Oka and Châteauguay. We saw the TV coverage, particularly of the young soldiers who were pressed into something that I am sure that they did not enjoy, and the cool and patient way they approached a very tough issue facing Canada.

The second part of the motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the laws of Canada must apply on all Canadian territory, including Kahnawake, and that all persons currently at the Kanesatake Treatment Centre should lay down their arms and submit to the process of Canada's judicial system, thereby encouraging the creation of a constructive climate for discussions between governments and the Mohawk people on land claims and other issues.

I do not think there are many people in Canada who would not agree that the laws of Canada should be obeyed.

The last part of the motion reads:

> That upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

If I may take a few moments, I would like to point out something that I think has been missing in the debate that I have heard here today. I think it has degenerated into a situation of blame back and forth which I do not think that really helps the House of Commons. It is very important that we in the House of Commons try to examine the issue and maybe even try and come up with some constructive ideas on the way to resolve a very difficult situation.

I think one of the things that has been overlooked repeatedly, not only in the debate here but in the news media in the past month or so, is the difference between the warriors, the Warriors Society and the Mohawk people. I would like to just briefly read an article which was printed July 4, 1990 by the Herald Journal of Syracuse, N.Y. after an interview. It is by M.C. Burns, who is a staff writer:

> Louis Hall lives in an isolated trailer with battered typewriter he used to pound out his manifesto. Over the last 10 years, that document has inspired a divisive, militant resurgence in the Iroquois nation and fostered a rebirth of a warriors movement from Canada to Wisconsin.
> When masked Mohawks with assault rifles blocked entrance to the St. Regis Reservation a year ago, Louis Hall was behind them—not physically, but his words put them there.
> Those gunmen, members of the well-armed Warriors' Society at the reservation in New York and Canada, idolized Lewis Hall. Today, they are key players in the violence and the uneasy peace that exists in the place Mohawks call Akwesasne.

> Halls writing, produced by slender figures rattling his Olympia, is outrageous, vehement and angry. "There will come a day", he wrote recently, "when the Indian will put the white man in a boat and send him back to Europe where he belongs and keep him there".
> The manifesto reinterprets the Great Law Peace, the constitution of the Iroquois, and gives some Native Americans the rationale they need to carry weapons. In it, Hall asks, "What can the warriors societies do?
> He answers: Dump bridges into rivers—which are now sewers—and into seaway, cancelling all traffic, knock out powerhouses, high-tension power lines, punch holes in the reactors of nuclear power houses.

He urges young Iroquois to reject the peace-oriented teachings of the traditional chiefs, including those who sit on the Grand Council of the Six Nations of Iroquois.

> He believes that some traditional chiefs—including all of the ones who sit at the Onondaga Nation—have betrayed the Great Law, and for that they should be executed, Mafia-style, by Mafia hit men, if possible.
> Hall is not kidding.
> "They should be executing the traitors," he said in an interview. "But they would have to do it the way the Mafia do it—in secret and never see the victim again. No body. No case."
> Some Warriors agree with him and do not question his teachings, even concerning executions.
> "Yes, they should be executed," said Francis Boots, war chief of the Warriors Society of Akwesasne. "It's the law."
>
> Boots usually has a copy of Hall's manifesto close by.
> "But it is his actual presence that inspires us," Boots said. "He has the message, and he knows how to articulate it."

There is more that goes on and points out where the Warriors Society is coming from.

This is not supported by the Mohawk Council of Akwesasne. Let me show you a kit that I got from the Mohawk Council and I would like to point out just a few things. It is a chronology of violence and it basically states: "From Petty Offences to Multi-Million Dollar Crime". It is a brief history of events leading to the 1990 campaign of violence by the Mohawk Sovereignty Security Force (the Warriors) and the pro-gamblers.

In Akwesasne, May 1, 1990, ordinary people live in fear. Armed thugs rule the land. Gambling, narcotics, smuggling, beatings, and automatic weapons fire are everyday activities. Police protection exists only in some sectors and where it exists, it is overwhelmed by criminals. A ghetto in an American city? The Sicilian countryside? Life in Columbia? Not in this case.

The above description is of Akwesasne, a Mohawk Indian reservation with a population of about 9,500 located near Cornwall, Ontario, Canada and Massena, New York, in the U.S.A. It lies partially in Canada and partially in the U.S.A. How did a normally peaceful and law-abiding community become a war-zone reminiscent of Belfast or Beirut?

These are comments made by the Mohawk Council of Akwesasne. They wrote it. Jack Shields did not write it. This government did not write it. It is the Mohawk Council of Akwesasne who wrote this article.

From 1979 to 1980, the first step was smuggling cigarettes. They started out with petty crime. In 1981, a law enforcement vacuum—the bingo boom begins. A law enforcement vacuum was created on the American side of the reservation when the population disbanded the Tribal Police Force—that was on the American side—after charges of abuse and fraud. A high stakes bingo operator, partially funded by the smugglers and partially from outside sources, was allowed to set up under regulation of the Tribe. But he took advantage of the legal and enforcement vacuum to disregard the elected leadership and the deal that was signed with the Tribe.

In 1984, 1985, and 1986, speakeasies flourished; slot machines are added. As they accumulated wealth, the smugglers diversified into after-hours sales of alcohol and slot machines. Community objections increased after 19 people were killed in alcohol related car accidents as they left the speakeasies. Low skill jobs in the bingo halls and casinos attracted many young people away from continued studies. Community anger grew every day. Protests and attempts to have the illegal operations closed increased. The three Mohawk governments separately and then jointly attempted unsuccessfully to close them down. All of this supported by, not the Mohawks whom everyone talks about, but very clearly by this Warrior Society which was operating illegally among their own people, redefining what the Warrior Society was, following the teachings or the manifesto of Louis Hall.

In 1987, a chief of the longhouse, or the traditional government of the Mohawk people, is dehorned. He is relieved of his authority and position for refusing to cease his involvement in the lucrative trade. He subsequently organized groups of young, unemployed men and boys to be runners or paid employees to help operate the business.

In 1987, the runners or foot soldiers of the smugglers received paramilitary training, bought sophisticated weapons and communications equipment, and emerged as the Warrior Society, later to become known as the Mohawk Sovereignty Security Force, MSSF or the warriors. They adapted and corrupted a tradition of the warriors which for centuries had meant societies which ensured protection of the nation, among other things. Traditionally, these societies were accountable to the traditional chiefs who call upon their services when needed.

In 1987, the MSSF claimed that their existence became necessary because the nation had been systematically attacked and rendered nearly powerless despite Mohawk protests. In reality, they emerged to protect the lucrative economic interests under the guise of Mohawk sovereignty because Canadian and U.S. officials and the good Mohawk people were becoming an impediment to business.

Again, I am saying, and I underline this, this is being written by the Mohawk council of Akwesasne. They are the ones who are saying this, not people in the House.

In 1988, 1989, and 1990, the warriors began to threaten and intimidate anyone who opposed the slots and bingos. Narcotics, especially cocaine and crack, became an increasing problem. Many people reported that warriors were dealing while others were often high while patrolling and handling their automatic weapons. Arrests were made of some warriors for attempting to take concealed weapons across the border. The State Police raided some casinos and confiscated slot machines but the operators replaced them and resumed full operations within twenty-four hours. Warriors began to run people off the road and ram vehicles. In Canada, you say?

In 1990, warrior violence increased. Beatings, threats, and shootings increased in frequency. Personal property such as homes and cars were damaged. Months of intensive efforts were made in vain to resolve the disputes through negotiation. The people, tired of federal and state inaction and wishing to stop their growth and eradicate the illegal activities, set up road blockades to stop the flow of clients to the casinos. That is the Mohawk people doing this. Warriors' reaction was to shoot at Mohawk people with automatic weapons and to destroy the barricades.

Warrior spokespeople appeared on television claiming to protect the nation from outside forces and promising to do away with any opposition. The warriors developed a hit list of Akwesasne Mohawks who opposed them.

In April, 1990, warriors declared war on their own people. Hundreds of Mohawks fled the reservation to escape the "civil war" atmosphere. Why have we not heard about that in the debate tonight? Why has it only been an angry outburst of emotion saying that Canadians or the government is not interested in the plight of native people and land claims?

On May 1, 1990, two young Mohawk men were killed in gun battles. The non-Mohawk police finally moved in to back up the Mohawk police on the Canadian side. Mohawks on the American side saw law enforcement officials on the territory for the first time in a decade. In other words, the New York police were, for the first time in a decade, on the reserve.

In June and July of 1990, tensions persisted as the police forces from Canada, Ontario and Quebec and New York State came to Akwesasne to help Mohawk police maintain peace. Warrior spokesmen declare publicly their intention to take over control of all Indian reservations in northeastern North America through undermining means.

There is no doubt that in the past years since our forefathers came to this country native people were shunted off into reserves. There is no doubt in our minds that many of the land claims settlements have not been done. We have tried a number of things and other governments have tried a number of things. One of the things that I experienced was to throw money at the problem. We saw 10 or 15 years of throwing money at the problem and nothing happened. There is a clash in the way we look at it and it is a misunderstanding, many times, of what native people want and what Canadians see.

One of the things that I think is very important is that the young generation growing to be citizens of this country, native people, must recognize that there is not much future on a reserve. Our whole society in Canada is built on the idea that if you work hard, you accumulate your worth or your wealth, you are able to own your home and you are able to pass on some of these things to your children. It is not so on a reserve. A reserve is communally owned. People living on the reserve do not own their own homes, it is a band house. We have passed the economic development to try to get the economy of the reserves moving to the band rather than to individuals. It has always been my contention that we should be looking more at individuals and saying to individuals on reserves: "Look, you, too, can prosper. You, too, can take part in this Canadian idea of getting into business, owning property, and profiting from your sweat, your work and the hard things that happen when you get into business or when you work."

The other thing that is a problem, and I have seen this time and time again, is when natives do become educated, become doctors, lawyers, and dentists and get into other professions or end up living not on the reserve but in a city, working at a steady job such as the oil sands, for example, in my area Syncrude and Suncor, the other natives on the reserve soon refer to them as Indian white men. The drag-down system starts because the whole philosophy on a reserve is that everyone should be equal. Everyone owns, in a communal way, everything on that reserve. It is run by a band chief and council.

I want to take one more minute, Mr. Speaker, if you will just give me another minute.

It must be totally devastating to a native man who is raising a family and does not have a job. He wants basically the same things that we do. He wants security for his family, he wants to see his family educated, and he wants them to be healthy and happy. That is not happening today. We, in this government, are committed to see that it does happen and that we become more involved through the consultative process to bring natives to the standard of living equal to anyone else in Canada.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I see that you are signalling me to stop.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired. On debate, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of sadness that I enter this important debate at this late hour.

I say with a great deal of sadness because, despite the many excellent and constructive proposals made by members of the House and by individuals and groups including aboriginal groups across the country, proposals to peacefully settle this long-standing dispute, members of the government continue to justify the insensitive and irresponsible actions that we saw throughout the summer. They continue to support this fraudulent, dishonest and demeaning motion which is before the House.

I am sad not only for what this motion says to the people at Kanesatake and Kahnawake, and not only for what it says to all aboriginal people in Canada, but also for what it says to Canadians and about Canadians.

During the last week of August and the first week of September, I was at an international conference in Geneva. Day after day in the news, in Switzerland and in Germany, Canada was portrayed as a banana republic denying basic rights to aboriginal people and using military might to force them into submission.

I refer to the resolution before the House as dishonest and fraudulent. Let me illustrate.

The resolution starts by commending the conduct of the Canadian Armed Forces. The issue that should be before the House is the conduct of the government. Why did the government not have the guts, the intestinal fortitude, to put a resolution to the House which would have addressed the real issue, which is the conduct of the Prime Minister and the Minister for Indian Affairs? That is what we should be debating. What a smoke-screen this resolution is. What a fraud this resolution is. It is an attempt to whitewash the irresponsible actions of the government.

The Canadian Armed Forces, of course, have long experience in peacekeeping. Nobody condemns them for what they do under direction of the government. They are a professional armed force. They follow the direction and the laws laid down by the government. The problem we are faced with is caused by the government and, if the government had any gumption, any guts, it would have put a resolution to the House dealing with its conduct, and it did not do it. It is a shame for the House and for the country that it failed to do so.

Let us look at the second paragraph of this resolution.

That in the opinion of this House, the laws of Canada must apply on all Canadian territory—

The implication of that particular paragraph is that all laws apply everywhere in Canada and that these Mohawks are wild, irresponsible people for suggesting otherwise. What is the government trying to say in that particular sentence? Does it not realize that the Indian Act, to start with, does not apply everywhere in Canada? The Indian Act itself applies to very particular people on very particular pieces of land, reservations and so on.

The government recognizing that Indian people were different in different parts of the country passed the Sechelt legislation a few years ago, whereby the Sechelt people in British Columbia were given a certain form of self-government and were exempted from the Indian Act.

• (0230)

If we look at the James Bay agreement, the James Bay legislation, there are provisions for those people living in northern Quebec which are quite different than the provisions under the Indian Act.

Many laws do not apply everywhere, and others that do should not in some cases, if we address them in a more critical fashion than we have in the past.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, the whole resolution is a fraud. What does the government mean by that particular statement that the laws of Canada must apply in all Canadian territory. It certainly does not mean the Indian Act, or the Sechelt Act, or the James Bay and Northern Quebec Cree Act. Maybe they are referring to the Criminal Code. Maybe they are implying that the Mohawk people, the Indian people, feel they should not be covered by the Criminal Code.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, one might ask if the Criminal Code was applied equally to Donald Marshall, and one might examine the criminal justice system and how it applies to Indians and non-Indians in this country.

I listened to the hon. member for Athabasca reading a long list of accusations against the Warrior Society. No one is suggesting that if there are any crimes against individuals or any crimes that are to be charged against individuals, they should not be charged with those crimes.

What I find is happening when I listen to the hon. member and others on the other side of the House is that they are trying to brand with a wide brush all aboriginal people and all Mohawks, including all those in the treatment centre, as being criminals and warriors, terrorists, and so on, following the lead of the Deputy Minister for Indian affairs who, in the month of August, more or less said that the people who were causing the trouble were criminals.

The fact of the matter is that there are many examples in this country of special laws for special peoples, depending on their circumstances. For many years in this country the aboriginal people have argued that many of the laws that apply to them were drafted and passed without their participation in a repressive, unjust, paternalistic and colonialistic fashion, and that their past, history, culture and backgrounds were never taken into consideration with the passage of those laws.

Sometimes, Mr. Speaker, this Parliament needs to recognize that. We recognize that to a certain extent in the James Bay settlement. We recognize that to a certain extent in the Sechelt Act. Some people will disagree with the Sechelt Act and say it is not really an act dealing with self-government, but despite that the Sechelt people were willing to accept it. So was the government and they made special provisions.

If we look at certain Indian nations in this country, they do have their own courts. They do have their own police officers. They do have their own probation and parole officers who understand their people and who apply their laws and customs in conjunction with the laws in Canada.

This conflict at Kanesatake and Kahnawake was a disaster from the beginning. It is a conflict that need not have happened. It should not have happened if the government had acted responsibly and correctly in the situation.

When I was Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs, if there was land under claim by an aboriginal group, we put a freeze on that land until the claim was totally settled. We would not allow oil and gas development. We would not allow mining. We would not allow the construction of roads on that land while it was under claim.

Here we have the mayor of a small community deciding to expand a golf course and for that reason we have this dispute. If the minister and the government had been acting as they should have been, as trustees for the aboriginal people in this country, as they are supposed to do under the Indian Act and under our constitutional laws, and according to a recent decision of the Supreme Court, they would have immediately intervened and said it is irresponsible to move ahead with a golf course when this land is under claim. If they had done that, if the minister and the Prime Minister and the government had not been totally asleep with their heads in the sand, none of this would have happened.

However, here we are before this House debating a fraudulent, camouflage resolution about the conduct of the Armed Forces. Here we have this despicable conduct of the government, of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Indian Affairs and they have not even got the courage to put that to the House as they should have.

The conduct of this government in this matter from beginning to end was an abdication of responsibility. After the first incident of violence on July 11, we did not even hear from the minister or the Prime Minister for weeks on end. One wondered what had happened to the minister and to the Prime Minister. We heard from the Minister of Indian Affairs of Quebec, Mr. Ciaccia, we heard from Mr. Rémillard, also with the Quebec government, we heard from Mr. Bourassa. There was a total abdication of federal jurisdiction over Indian affairs to the Quebec government. That was bad enough but once the Armed Forces were brought in, this same government abdicated responsibility and jurisdiction over important decision making to the army, and I will illustrate that in a few minutes.

Decisions that were political decisions and should have been made by the government through negotiation and through intervention were left to the Armed Forces, which are not equipped and should not be involved in political decision making or in key decisions which will affect the political results between two peoples, as we saw in Oka and in Kahnawake.

In the resolution they talk about the laying down of arms. They ask that the people in the treatment centre at Kanesatake lay down their arms and submit to the processes of Canada's judicial system. There have been several proposals agreed upon by the Mohawks and by the Iroquois Confederacy to do that, but it also involves some obligations on the other side. But these were not taken seriously by the Bourassa government nor by this government.

There was a very complete proposal to dispose of the arms under supervision and so on and if people were to be charged, let them be charged. Let us go through the process, even though the process has been very unfair to aboriginal people over the years. I have already referred to the Donald Marshall case and there are others as well.

I heard about the situation last week where John Ciaccia, the Minister for Indian Affairs in Quebec, was in Toronto and worked out an agreement with the Iroquois Confederacy to settle both the short term and the long term issues in dispute, a settlement that I understand dealt with the laying down of arms and dealt with the Warrior Society. The hon. member for Athabasca was pretending I suppose that we suggested that those who committed wrong or committed criminal offences should go free. Not at all. Nor did the proposed settlement of the Iroquois Confederacy and Mr. Ciaccia do that at all.

What happened with that agreement? Once concluded, one of the representatives of the confederacy was to discuss it with people in the treatment centre to see if it was acceptable to them. When he arrived in Oka to gain entry to the treatment centre, he was denied entrance by the Armed Forces. That was not a decision to be made by the Armed Forces. Here we have a potential solution to the standoff, to the problem which has existed for several months, and the man cannot even get inside to discuss it with the people involved.

The representative of the confederacy then went to Ottawa to speak to people in a higher position in the Armed Forces. At that time he was told that this is a political matter and he should discuss it with the political authorities, so he goes to the political authorities. What did they say? "This is a military matter, go back to the Armed Forces".

Talk about sticking your head in the sand and avoiding your responsibilities. That is what we should be debating today, the conduct of the government. It is not up to the Armed Forces to make key political decisions that would have led to a settlement in this particular case. The Armed Forces is a professional organization, as I said, and they follow the orders of the government, the direction of the government, and the law laid down by this Parliament. They are not meant to make key political decisions involved in the dispute.

That proposal, as I understand it, dealt with the short-term and long-term issues that are before us. The short-term, of course, deal with the standoff at the treatment centre and the long-term issues, the claim policy, the policy that the government has for settling claims and matters of self-government and sovereignty.

With respect to the longer term issues, they will have to be dealt with because if they are not dealt with, we will continue to have problems and trouble in this country. They have been looked at over and over again. I was a member of the special committee on Indian self-government called the Penner committee. We travelled throughout this country for nearly two years and made a report which made serious recommendations to deal with these issues.

We had the Coolican report which recommended changes to the claims policy, which recommended the end of the extinguishment policy and the end to the policy of superseding by law legitimate rights. That is the problem with our claims policy. Indians go before the courts. They go before commissions and bodies and say "Here are our rights. We want them recognized". People in government keep saying "Well, those rights were extinguished by a law passed in 1905". They were extinguished by a law passed in 1917. They are superseded by law. But, many of those laws are unjust laws and that should not be an excuse.

At one time in our history we had laws on slavery. At one time in our history we did not allow women to vote. We got rid of those laws. It is time to get rid of a lot of other laws that affect our aboriginal people.

Mr. Caccia: And laws on child labour, too.

Mr. Allmand: Child labour, as my colleague mentions. There are all sorts of laws in our past history which were unjust and unfair. Thank God we recognize that. But, we have not done it with respect to aboriginal people. We keep citing precedents of courts and saying that is what must govern. We keep citing precedents of laws that go back to a period when people did not have the same understanding they have today, or should have today.

Mr. Speaker, you are giving me the signal that my time is coming to an end.

In conclusion, I want to plead with the government to show a little humanity, a little compassion and a little understanding. They should try to put themselves in the shoes of the aboriginal people in Canada and try to understand how they feel in this particular situation.

I ask the government to forget this ridiculous resolution that is before us and get down to serious negotiation for a just, fair and peaceful settlement. For God's sake, Mr. Speaker, let's see some leadership.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I just thought that perhaps it would be a good time to set the record straight about the story of the land at Oka because there seems to be some question in the minds of the members opposite about what the facts are.

I will go through it very briefly. It is a comment. It does not really require any response. This issue started, as some hon. members may know, back in 1717 when the seminary of St. Soltice acquired a tract of land from the King of France and set up a religious order there. They then brought some Indians with them from Montreal and included, not just Mohawks who are the ancestors of the present Indians, the group included Nipissing and Algonquins as well.

After a time, of course, the land was broken up. The religious order left and there was a dispute over whether or not the land that had been used by the Indians since 1717 was, in fact, theirs.

There have been numerous references to courts and to various methods of settling the dispute over the years, but I will just go quickly through some of the highlights. In 1851, in order to settle this dispute, a reserve was provided at Maniwaki and many of the Algonquins who were moving from Oka moved to this location, but many of the Mohawks stayed at Oka.

The dispute sort of continued. In 1881 there was another dispute and the Indians at Oka did not prevail. Finally in 1912 the judicial council of the Privy Council, at that time the highest court in Canada, ruled on this particular item and held at that time that the Indians at Oka had no title or right to control the administration of the land. At that time the highest court in Canada had decided that the interest in that land was not vested in the Indian people. It was vested in the other people who had been living there.

These claims continued. The hon. gentleman mentioned that if they were in power there would not be an opportunity to do anything on a piece of land that was under claim. Even though it had been finally settled by the the highest court in the land, the Mohawks submitted another claim, a specific claim, in June 1977 which was ultimately rejected in 1986. At that time the minister of the day, when he advised the Indians that their claim was rejected, told them however that he was willing to consider a proposal for an alternate means of redressing their grievance.

At that time they sat down and negotiated a framework agreement. We have heard much about it. It was initialled in September 1989. The rest is history. The leadership of the band changed and the land issue was once more in dispute.

It is important that hon. members recognize that this is a very unusual case. They should not ignore the facts.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware of that history. It only confirms the points I was trying to make.

The hon. member, for example, referred to court decisions which said that the claim was not justified because according to the laws of the land at the time another owner had the right to the land. In other words, laws superseded what were real rights, rights that had existed for a long time. Although it is true that band of people had moved from one place to another, promises had been made and for one reason or another the dispute carried on for years and years, sometimes with more visibility and more aggressiveness and at other times much more quietly.

If we examine what happened in a chronological way—and I have this record here before me—the negotiations this summer and spring were moving quite well, until once again there was a turndown of offer by the band due to changes in the band administration and so on.

It was at that point that mistakes started being made. When the town of Oka decided to move ahead with the golf course, it was at that point, I submit, that the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs should have acted as a trustee for the Indian people and said: "Do not go ahead with that golf course, because this land is still under claim. There is no basis for proceeding with that golf course". It was that incident and the lack of action and involvement by the minister and by the government which led to all these problems.

The minister should have intervened at that point and said to the Quebec government and to the mayor of Oka: "Under no circumstances should you proceed with that golf course while this thing is still being negotiated". It is true that the negotiations had broken down, but with mediators and with conciliation they could have got going again, and they will go ahead again with good faith on both sides.

I blame the government for not taking action at that time, for withdrawing from the scene and for leaving it entirely to the Quebec government; then bringing in the army and leaving entirely to the army when the army should have been given more direction and when decisions that were made by the army should have been made by the government. I could list a whole raft of inactions which should have been discussed and blamed on the government.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join in this debate. I cannot think of any other issue which has caused so much anguish among Canadians, so much lack of certainty about the purpose of their country, so much lack of generosity toward people who need some generosity and spirit from government, and some concern for their lifestyles and the peril they find themselves in.

I know that in Winnipeg North Centre, where close to 30,000 or 40,000 people of aboriginal descent live, this issue has been the one that caused the most anxiety this summer and the greatest number of phone calls, letters and demands for public action.

I ask myself why is it that in the organization of the business of the House of Commons such an important issue is being debated at 2.50 in the morning? I will tell the House why. It is because the government wishes to bury this issue. It wishes it to disappear. It wishes it to be discussed in the darkness of night so that Canadians do not have to hear exactly what has been going on.

I can tell every member of the government sitting over there that we are not going to let this issue die, that we are going to keep fighting, that we are going to bring this to the public's attention, and that we are going to keep demanding a public inquiry because we have to get to the bottom of it and we have to stop treating aboriginal people as second-class citizens.

Mr. Speaker, tonight you have heard several times that the rule of law is the issue. The Prime Minister, in response to questions in Question Period, says that it is the rule of law, that we must have order. I used to be a political science professor before I took on this new task in life. I decided to go back to the textbooks and look up this concept of the rule of law. Apparently the Prime Minister did the same thing because in a speech given earlier tonight or late yesterday, depending on how one wants to count it, he too talked about the same writer, R. MacGregor Dawson, as he tried to justify why he is going to start appointing extra senators to beat back the Liberals in the Senate over the GST.

R. MacGregor Dawson wrote the book The Government of Canada, which is a basic text on understanding the Canadian government. I promise you, Mr. Speaker, that even though these quotations are long they are real eye-openers and you will enjoy listening to them.

Listen to what Mr. Dawson had to say, and I quote:

> —Canadian inheritance which is closely identified with some of these fundamental rights of the citizen is the rule of supremacy of law, a long-established principle of the British constitution. The exact meaning and implications of this principle are not readily stated, but its essence is the restriction on arbitrary authority in government and the necessity for all acts of government to be authorized by "reasonably precise" laws as applied and interpreted by the courts.

When we talk about the rule of law here, we are not talking about the actions of the Mohawks. We are talking about the actions of the government.

When referring to this provision, for example, in the old American Constitution, he wrote:

> —that "this shall be a government of laws and not of men" was clearly a vain hope, but it was an endeavour to state in one phrase substantially the same idea—the certainty of legal procedures, the absence of untrammelled official power, the protection of the citizen against unknown and unpredictable authority. The increasing complexity of modern government, the growing emphasis on the social rather than the individual good, and the resulting need for government intervention in almost all fields of human endeavour have inevitably resulted in far wider discretionary powers being given to executive and administrative officials, accompanied by a consequent narrowing of the rule of law. Thus the sweeping accountability of officials to the courts of law when the legality of their acts was in question has had its scope somewhat diminished by the grant of wider and more general legal powers, and this has tended to a limited degree to remove the acts of the officials from judicial scrutiny. Despite this modification, the rule of law remains a cardinal principle of the Canadian constitution and a sturdy bulwark against abuse of power.

The heart of the rule of law is not what the citizen is doing but is maintaining control over government. What have we seen in the last two months: that very concept, the essence of Canadian democracy, turned against Canadians and making them feel guilty about what they are doing.

Mrs. Finestone: Send it to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Walker: Well, send it to the Minister of Justice. She does not read as carefully as the rest of us.

The second quotation is equally interesting. It is by Richard Van Loon and Michael Whittington. For the record, members might wish to know that these are people have been advisers to the government in Indian affairs and other matters related to that. They also talk about the rule of law. What is the rule of law according to these writers? It reads as follows:

> The manifest function of any constitution is to define the relationship between the citizen and the state, and, to the extent that the relationship can be defined at all, every country can be said to have some form of constitution.
> The principle of rule of law in the British and Canadian tradition asserts that any interference with the freedom of any individual must be performed only according to the legal process and carried out by legitimate authorities. No one is exempt from the law, neither citizens nor officials of the government, and no one can interfere with the rights of any individual, except through the legal process. Finally, the principle of the rule of law means, as well, equality before the law for all members of a political community. But if we grant that the Constitution of Canada is built on the principle of the rule of law, we must also ask why the rule of law is so important. The function of the rule of law is, briefly, to protect us, the citizens, from the arbitrary interference of government, or of government officials, in our everyday lives. The relationship of the individual to the political system becomes, to some extent, fixed and impartial.

By contrast, the rule of the most benevolent dictators—

And here I include the Prime Minister:

—could conceivably deteriorate to rule by whim and caprice, for even benevolent dictators once in a while get out of bed on the wrong side, and so forth. The law, on the other hand, is presumed to be impersonal, predictable and coldly rational rather than emotional or moody.

I understand that is a very dry way to get ourselves involved with such an emotional topic, but if we stop and think about how this issue has been portrayed to Canadians, that the actions on behalf of the people in these communities has been wrong by definition in the eyes of the government, hence the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Indian Affairs refused to negotiate. The heart of the matter is that they have deliberately, forcefully, and wilfully misinterpreted what is going on in order to satisfy their own political agenda.

The second point I would like to raise on this issue, which I think is important, is the great grief that it has brought to Canadians in the eyes of the world. One of the most memorable images that I have of democracy in the world was the site last June in Tiananmen Square in Beijing, China. There we had the sight of one man standing in front of a tank; the tank moves one way, he moves the same way, the tank moves the other way, he moves the other way, and there was a standoff.

I challenge the government to tell me what is the difference between that standoff and the standoff that we watched on Newsworld a few weeks ago between a Mohawk warrior and a Canadian army official? What is the difference? If you are sitting in China and it was the reverse than what it was last June, what would you think of the Canadian government? What would you think of that confrontation?

Or, I am drawn to remember in May when I visited Romania on behalf of the Speaker that outside of one of those major hotels, the Intercontinental in downtown Bucharest, there was a nightly demonstration of people talking about what it would be like to be in a democratic society. There was a second-floor balcony from which a student spoke and other members of the community. The crowd was of all ages and from all walks of life.

This summer I visited several times the peace village which aboriginal leaders in Manitoba erected on the legislative grounds to discuss the evolution of a democratic society in Canada, to discuss with political leaders such as members of Parliament and anybody else who would come forward to talk with them what it was that they were looking for. Everyone was peaceful. The leadership agreed to disband the camp during this week, the first week of Parliament, because they thought their point was made, and I agree with them.

Again, when the troops moved in in Bucharest we expressed shock and dismay that any government would turn on its people, but yet we do not even think about the peaceful demonstration taking place in Winnipeg. When I went there the leaders who are nationally known looked at me and said: "What do you think the Prime Minister is thinking? What do you think the government is trying to do to us? What do you think their ideas about us really are?" I stood there in silence because I could not explain to them what it was that the government was thinking. I could not explain to them why they were being treated that way.

However this has created a great unity among Canadians. Perhaps we are beginning to tie together different issues such as the environment and how we treat our land, because aboriginal people can tell us much about how not to spoil property, how to live for generation after generation. We should think of the changes to the lands of people who live in northern Quebec, and think of the way that people have changed their lives in northern Manitoba because of the northern flood agreement. We should think of all these changes and think of people who wandered through those areas and made their lives for generation after generation, and in two or three generations of Canadians we have managed to ruin that.

The peace movement which formerly looked outside of Canada for its issues now turns its attention to what is happening in our own country because we are on the battlefront. We can no longer take for granted the peace and security of our own citizens.

In Manitoba the peace community joined in at the Peace Village and this is why, in their own words: "We support the Mohawk nation and their struggle with the Federal government, Quebec government, Canadian Army and Sûreté du Quebec, the Aboriginal people of Manitoba have established a Peace Village on the front lawn of the Manitoba Legislature" as a result of these events. In particular, we object to the Prime Minister who is responsible for this "by taking military action against the Mohawk nation. The Prime Minister has imposed a military solution where a political solution is required. This is a dangerous precedent, the security of all Canadians is at risk. The Mohawk people remain under siege with daily violations of their basic human rights."

Hopefully from news that we heard earlier this evening this is ending. "Children have been denied food and medicine, women have been assaulted and hospitalized, support and aid have been blocked by the army and the Sûreté du Quebec under the direct leadership of" the Quebec government. "The aboriginal people of Manitoba do not condone violence." They ask for our "continued support—to ensure that bloodshed is avoided and justice secured in this time of crisis." All Manitobans were welcomed to join in this Peace Village to show their solidarity. Many came bringing candles and tents and they joined in daily vigils and sunrise ceremonies.

I bring this to your attention and to the attention of the House to help us understand that although the House can fight over the specifics and disagree on the specifics, there is something at stake here which goes beyond the House. It is the transformation taking place in Canadian society. We can sit here and debate it all night, as we are doing today, because of the strong interest shown by this caucus in this issue or we can put our heads in the sand and pretend that if we ignore this or if the Oka crisis is settled this week that for somehow or another the whole issue will go away. In province after province, region after region, town after town and community after community this is going to be repeated until the basic injustices are settled.

It is up to us, members of all parties in this House, to work together with aboriginal leaders, with the support of the public who wish to no longer have to live through this nightmare, who wish to no longer hear about land claims not being settled, who wish no longer to hear about the poverty in urban Canada, who wish no longer to hear about malnutrition on the reserves, who wish to hear some good news based on facts about improved conditions due to a commitment on the part of parliamentarians that they wish to see some recognition on the part of government that there is a commitment to improve conditions. Once that happens, then all parliamentarians can take pride in this institution. Until then there is a black spot on this institution, there is a black spot on this country and it remains for the government to take action and to get us going again.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, roughly 10 hours ago we heard a deathbed repentance on the part of the Prime Minister of Canada when he spoke in this Chamber. He delivered his commitment as to what he is prepared now to do. After having imposed financial cut-backs on native communications, after the post-secondary education fiasco last year, after having imposed cuts on friendship centres, after having imposed cuts to grants for native organizations, after withdrawing from past commitments, after having demonstrated to the country that not six months, not one year, not eighteen months but two years after the last election this government has not been able to introduce one piece of legislation that deals with the native and aboriginal people, after having failed to introduce measures in the light of what the nation learned about the Donald Marshall case on the application of justice when it comes to the aboriginal people.

In the environment we have seen month after month since the last election provocations and injustices and sheer follies. We have heard about the Cree Indians from James Bay who had to make their point by coming down by canoe, by demonstrating in front of the House of Commons, and then by way of the Richelieu River making their way down to New York in order to demonstrate their rejection of the James Bay II project to the United Nations.

We have heard for the past 20 months in Question Period the issue of the Oldman River dam and how the Peigan tribe is fighting against all odds in order to bring the white community to reason.

We have heard about the Algonquin of Barrier Lake and their frustration in getting the white society to accept some sensible principles of forest management.

We have heard about the Akwasasne reserve people who have to struggle with pollution in the St. Lawrence.

Many times we have heard colleagues in this House raising the issue of the Walpole Island native people and the water contamination that forces them to draw water from a distant region.

Everybody knows about the Wabagoon River and mercury pollution and what the native people have experienced over the last three decades.

We are now at the beginning of another saga in relation to the ALPAC development in northern Alberta where we are giving away the forests and the land on which the native people depend with potential serious contamination of waterways.

We all know and have heard about the Lubicon Indians and their struggle. It is very revealing to read what a writer in St. Bruno, Quebec, Marjorie Marc, writes about the Cree people in northern Quebec. I would like to quote a passage from her study where she says:

[Translation]

To deal with the problem of mercury contamination suffered by the First Nations, in particular the Cree of Northern Quebec, the Quebec government is encouraging them to change their eating habits. So far so good. But it happens that their eating habits are based on a way of life that goes back hundreds, perhaps thousands, of years, the fundamental pillars of which are hunting and fishing. In addition, native people's restricted incomes make it hard for them to obtain products from the South, which are more expensive for them than for us because of the great distances they have to be transported. Insisting that they eat tinned food means not only changing and limiting their way of life, but also putting their mental and physical health at risk. It is not by chance that Amerindians have a high alcoholism rate and the highest suicide rate in the world.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it is not only with the environment that our native people have been increasingly fighting the establishment. When it comes to conflicts, a brief piece appeared in the Toronto Star of September 1 which encapsules the plight of the Innu of Labrador who are, according to the writer from the Canadian Press historically, a peaceful, nomadic group which in recent years has repeatedly gathered at Canadian Forces Base Goose Bay to protest the low-level flying of NATO jets over their traditional hunting grounds.

You have the Micmac, traditional fishermen and hunters. During the 1950s their lives were disrupted by forest relocation. In the fall and winter of 1988 the Micmac in Nova Scotia protested provincial limits to moose hunting by hunting above the limits.

You know the saga in Temagami where after several years of protesting the extension of a nearby logging road this spring, the Indians won a say over the administration of part of the Temagami forest.

You have the Sarcee in your region, Mr. Speaker. In mid-August they marched on to the Canadian Forces Base in Calgary and claimed a large chunk of it saying the federal government stole it from them nearly 40 years ago.

• (0310)

You have the Peigan tribe, and I referred to them a moment ago when referring to the Oldman River dam. You have the Mohawks who are the subject and object of this particular debate today. It is worth while noting how, in the Toronto Star, Gerald Utting describes this history of Oka where reference is made to the fact that, and I quote:

> The Mohawks say they have been provoked to taking action after years of keeping the peace despite continual (and undeniable) land grabbing by the white man. Mohawks lived at Oka before the British took Canada from the French in 1759.

These are historical facts that cannot be easily brushed aside. It is against this background of interference, conflicts and injustices that we read in the Order Paper, and we will debate today, the great vision of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. This vision is reflected by the motion that we are debating tonight in which he proposed that the House commend the exemplary conduct of the men and women of the Canadian Forces at Oka and Châteauguay, that in the opinion of this House, the laws of Canada must apply on all Canadian territory, including Kahnawake, and that all persons currently at the Kahnawake Treatment Centre should lay down their arms and submit to the process of Canada's judicial system thereby encouraging the creation, and so on and so forth.

What a vision on the part of a minister of the Crown whose task, whose assignment, whose mandate is that of speaking on behalf of the aboriginal people at the cabinet table, at the inner sanctum of power, federally speaking, and who takes this tack in this House, virtually abandoning the substance, the very essence of his political mandate as minister of the Crown in charge of aboriginal affairs.

For these reasons, and against the broader background that I have attempted to outline for you, Canadians have been asking questions all summer as to what is going on in this country. All of a sudden, why are we getting such bad press in virtually every country of the world. What is happening to our high reputation in international fora on human rights that we should all of a sudden, not only have a black eye but also be considered to be in a stage that we never thought we would be ascribed, namely, of neanderthalers?

We in the opposition have been restless all summer. We started urging the government to recall Parliament in July. There was a letter from the Leader of the Opposition on July 17 to the Prime Minister. We had a demonstration on the steps of Parliament to make the point with the help of the media to recall Parliament. Then, on August 22, the opposition House Leader, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier followed up that intervention with a letter of his own to the Prime Minister without avail, of course, as you know, Mr. Speaker.

Unfortunately, this debate has tended to polarize because except for some very rare exceptions this afternoon and this evening, the government back-benchers have been the champions of the law and order theme. It indicates no sensibility for the basic fundamental principles of justice, and have left the opposition to occupy the much broader territory, the much broader issue that endeavours to indicate that, because of historical facts and because of the fact that the law is meaningless and empty unless it is based on principles of justice, the approach of law and order in the context of what has happened this summer, and against the background of what has happened over centuries, does not make sense. But this is the kind of intellectual bankruptcy that we have to face more and more in this Parliament with this intellectually bankrupt government.

We actually do not have to go back very far to refresh our collective memories. We can go back just to 1983 and look at the Penner report on Indian self-government. I will just use a minute to go over the conclusions of that report because it is as valid today as it was then.

An all-party committee of the House in the Thirty-Second Parliament, three parliaments ago, said in the conclusion on page 148 of the Penner report:

> As Indian First Nation governments exercise control over their own affairs, the committee strongly recommends that the programs of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development relating to Indian people be phased out. This process should be completed within five years. This recommendation does not affect the Department's mandate for northern development.
> The committee believes that the best way to promote Indian rights is through Indian self-government and not by special representation for First Nations in Parliament. Nevertheless, the situation of Indian peoples will change with self-government, and special representation in Parliament might in future offer benefits that cannot now be anticipated.

Finally, this observation:

> The committee has concluded that the implementation of this report in its entirety, legislatively and constitutionally, is the best means of satisfying international standards in relation to Indian First Nations.

I look forward to the Parliamentary Secretary getting up when I finish to indicate to me what has been implemented of this report of 1983, which is the most recent document produced parliamentarily in terms of a well thought out effort on the part of members of all three parties to launch a process. This was in October 1983.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention the fact that in June 1984, Bill C-52 was introduced, an act relating to self-government for Indian nations. I would welcome an intervention by the Parliamentary Secretary to tell us what has happened since November 1984 in terms of introducing legislation in the House on self-government for Indian nations, apart from the legislation to which my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce referred to earlier. What has happened to the substantial body of legislative proposals that the Conservative Government found when it came to power in the fall of 1984?

I would also like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, a paragraph which struck me as being indicative of the depths of thought and wisdom of the native people, produced on September 20, 1990, five days ago, by the Six Nation Iroquois Confederacy. It is a fairly long document and I will read only one paragraph, because it is very relevant to the situation we are facing today. I quote:

> Restricting negotiations at this delicate time to a military demand for an absolute surrender is, we feel, sadly short-sighted. We feel > our draft agreement with Mr. Ciaccia bears a real hope for a more lasting peace. Since Mr. Bourassa has announced his desire to negotiate with the Confederacy, and since Mr. Mulroney has stated his desire for a peaceful negotiated settlement, we hope they will agree to support this accord and join us in peacemaking, both for this immediate crisis and for the coming generations.

Time will tell whether this advice and this invitation will fall on receptive ears.

I must say that I felt deeply distressed by the wording of the motion proposed by the Minister of Indian Affairs. It strikes me as a motion that avoids the real issue before us. It almost brings back memories of Louis Riel, who also was described as being outside the law. It ignores the fundamental principles of justice and it reveals an attitude of a government that has to rely on the army because it has no other instrument at its disposal in dealing with a profoundly complex social issue that has been screaming for attention and screaming to heaven for so many decades and for so many centuries.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise in debate at this early morning hour of 3.22 a.m. to add my voice to the consensus of my colleagues, the hundreds of constituents in my riding of Hamilton West and, I dare say, the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who agree that it has been a dark summer that has produced suppression, political interference, inaction and a failure of leadership and statesmanship on the part of our Prime Minister.

Even in the motion put forward by the Minister of Indian Affairs there is a degree of cynicism and political manipulation which I am sure all Canadians recognize and deplore. I draw the attention of the House to the first sentence in the government motion. It reads:

> That this House commends the exemplary conduct of the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces at Oka.

How can I support such a sentence in this motion when I do not have the full story? In fact, what I have are newspaper articles, reports from the scene, such as that given by The Globe and Mail reporter, Jeff York, who last Saturday walked out of the alcohol treatment centre where he and 11 other journalists have been cooped up by the military since one week ago Monday. York angrily disputed claims by the army that it has been acting in a disciplined and professional manner. York, in fact, says that the soldiers set off smoke-bombs, that they come behind the wire when they say they will not and they taunt the Mohawks by throwing rocks, trying to provoke violence.

In my experience prior to being elected in November 1988 of 16 years as a news journalist, I always followed that unspoken code of the news journalist. That code says that you must tell the truth, that that truth must be verifiable, that we must present a balanced story, both sides of the story, and, of course, that we do not say anything that is libellous. What we have seen is a gag on the media on this issue; in essence, a violation of the Charter of Rights. On my office wall here in Ottawa and in the constituency office, there hang framed parchments of the Charter of Rights. Under the heading of fundamental freedoms, number 2(b), is freedom of the press and other media of communication.

Tonight in my office I took a call from a constituent who passed along this comment. He said: "Stan, the Mulroney government has dealt more gingerly with Saddam Hussein than it has with Canada's native people. The media is permitted to report back from the deck of HMCS Protecteur in the Persian Gulf, but not from behind the razor wire at Oka."

Maybe what the Prime Minister fears most is the video image. It can be very strong, very powerful. There is the image, you can recall it, of women, children, and elderly people leaving Oka, and having stones thrown at them. There is the image of natives kicking and punching soldiers, and soldiers kicking and punching and using their gunbutts against the head of natives.

What this government is telling the Canadian people is that it does not trust news journalists because, in this situation, it realizes it cannot manipulate the media. The government has branded the Mohawks as terrorists and will not allow them to negotiate before surrendering. In its opinion, the Mohawks are guilty. The journalists have attempted to give them a fair trial, but have been cut off from presenting their case by the Minister of Defence who is in essence managing the news by eliminating coverage of the events. As the Ottawa Sun reported just yesterday: "No court has declared them—the Mohawks—criminals. They want to negotiate with the province and the federal government but the army won't let them".

Here is the evidence. The letter is from the Six Nations Iroquois Confederacy and dated September 20, 1990. It states that "representatives of the Grand Council of the Iroquois Confederacy arrived at a draft agreement to end the crisis at Kanesatake and Kahnawake with Quebec's Minister of Native Affairs, John Ciaccia. Mr. Ciaccia was acting in his personal capacity and had no mandate from his government, but we, the Iroquois Confederacy felt that the proposed agreement represented a real opportunity for peace, not merely a temporary solution to the present situation".

It would have resolved the issues that must be dealt with immediately, but the Iroquois found out that there was virtually no co-operation from the federal, provincial, or military authorities. Both Canada and Quebec have said that the negotiating mandate has been given to the Armed Forces. Military authorities say that their mandate is limited to negotiating an absolute surrender.

Instant deadlock, Mr. Speaker. Even tonight the Iroquois Confederacy proposed that the laying down of arms could be carried out within hours if the government agreed and accepted its final offer which included a demand for an independent Crown Attorney. We have just heard from the Quebec government. It has rejected that proposal. All of it begs the question: Who is in charge? Is it the Quebec government? Is it the Canadian army? It should be neither. It should be this place. It should be the House of Commons. It should be the federal government.

What it all boils down to is two issues, land and the withdrawal of the Armed Forces. There are not many Canadians or I dare say many members of the House who understand fully the relationship that native people have with the land.

I have had the good fortune to attend many information sessions in my riding of Hamilton West and here in Ottawa and I have come to the conclusion that to the natives, the land is sacred. It provides and nourishes. One native person told me: "The land gives us life and it is to the land we shall return when we die." So it becomes increasingly clear when, in the case of Oka, the dispute originated over the expansion of a golf course, for pity sakes, the Mohawks finally decided to stand up for their rights, to speak in unison with indigenous peoples in Canada and around the world who have spoken out wherever oppression exists. Elsewhere in the world we applaud their efforts and in some cases, we even send aid. But here in Canada the Prime Minister calls the Mohawks terrorists and convicts and refuses to act unless they first submit.

Now, maybe as fond as he is of the American way, perhaps the Prime Minister would like to hear what the great statesman and a founding father of the United States, Thomas Jefferson, had to say on individual liberty: "The nation that tries to suppress liberty in the name of law and order inevitably loses both; liberty and law and order."

However the Conservative government, and in particular the Minister of Justice whom we heard from tonight, has hidden behind this notion of law and order and in the process has sent our peacekeeping army. The army we so proudly present as the bringer of harmony and peace in times of conflict, we have put up against a people begging and now demanding to be understood and treated with dignity. Instead, this government has dealt ruthlessly, arrogantly and with force, rather than leadership. Their philosophy is quite clear: that might is right.

Mr. Speaker, this is a power that cannot remain unchecked, for as John Stewart Mill noted in his book On Liberty: "The people may desire to oppress a part of their number and the precautions are as much needed against this as against any other abuse of power. In political speculations, the tyranny of the majority is now generally included among the evils against which society requires to be on its guard."

The real irony of this notion as applied to the situation we are faced with at Oka is that while the government is the tyranny with the majority, it is apparent to me that the majority of Canadians do not side with the government and are in fact angry and frustrated with our "prime misleader".

The government claims that it has advanced the cause of native Canadians, but the record will show that we are talking about a government that has persistently delayed the aspirations of aboriginal Canadians. Only when Canadians are armed with the facts will they have a better understanding of the anger and frustrations of Canada's indigenous peoples.

I draw your attention to the "Budget in Grief". It was presented to the Assembly of First Nations on March 15, 1990. It tells us a few of these facts. The two-year federal reduction of $100 million is deceptively buried in the 1990-91 Main Estimates and the budget papers. Twenty-six million dollars was cut from approved levels for capital facilities and community services; $15 million from band management; $7 million from welfare services; $2 million from economic development for each of the two years.

With a crippled economic base and no tax base, just where do native people find the finances to offset lost federal revenue? First Nations have been trying to do so, but each year it drives them more into debt. To make up for the shortfall of federal budgets since 1985, over $333 million would have to be added to the 1990-91 Indian and Inuit Affairs program budget to compensate fully for inflation and extremely high population growth.

All this resulted in some appalling statistics. In 1989, 70 per cent of the reserve Indian population had become institutionally dependent on government social assistance, 164,000 reserve Indians lived on social assistance, 120,000 Indians living away from reserves received social assistance. It means that 61 per cent of them are on social assistance. That is greater than the combination of all four Atlantic provinces. There is only one business for every 30 Canadians but only one native business for every 100 native people. Life expectancy of male and female Indians will be over eight years lower than their non-aboriginal counterparts in 1991. Infant mortality rates are more than double the Canadian rate, 17.2 per cent compared to 7.9 per cent for 1,000 babies. It goes on, Mr. Speaker.

What native people have been telling me is that they are no longer interested in handouts, what they want is a helping hand. Canadians see the trail of broken promises, of suppressed culture, of deprived economies. And while we must all take some responsibility for this tragic line of Canadian history, no government has ever been more blatant and more callous in its indifference, in its suppression of the needs of its indigenous peoples.

I want to conclude my remarks with a native myth, Mr. Speaker, the Indian myth about a tribe starving, unable to track the mighty buffalo herds. Two children brought the hunters' robes, made of coyote skins, begging that they wear them. Some of the hunters laughed, some were angry with the children's interference. But two elderly wise members of the tribe agreed to put on the coyote robes and, in doing so, found they had the vision of the coyote and were able to direct their people to the buffalo. Many stories of the great medicine wheel teach an important lesson that the government should learn and apply to the native crisis. To live in harmony and well-being we must see with the eyes of others, hear with the ears of others, speak with the tongue of others. I appeal to the government to put on the robes of the native people, to see and hear and thereby understand their hopes and their dreams.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly) A comment, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to refer to my hon. colleague's remarkable and very well researched discourse on the present problem with the native peoples of Canada. I listened with great interest and I find that from his research he was able to give us a very good general sense of from where we have come and where we are right now with the native peoples, particularly in regard to Oka. I would like to make a comment and also follow it with a question.

I have learned tonight from a Canadian Press reporter, at this late hour, it is almost four o'clock in the morning, that there has been a declaration from the Mohawk warriors at Oka that they are prepared to surrender. They are prepared to unconditionally leave the detoxification centre as of Thursday or Friday next. If this declaration is followed by them, it would mean then that this entire controversy, which has taken up so much of our time and concentrated our efforts on looking for a way to resolve the issue, will have resulted in finally an end to a major conflict, I believe, between Canada's aboriginal peoples and the government, as well as the citizens. We have heard others say how much the citizens in the immediate area of both Oka and Châteauguay were affected this summer. We have come to an end which is not a peaceful end. It has not been without a considerable amount of distress, inconvenience, even law breaking. We have to admit that. I am asking myself at the moment, are we going to be foolish enough, and I am speaking to my colleagues on the other side of this House, to feel that this is the end and that there is no more efforts that we must deploy in order to make sure that the conditions that bred this type of conflict no longer exist. Are we going to take this as the end of a conflict and that we do not have to turn attention to these problems? I certainly hope not.

If the Mohawks do surrender at Oka, and we have heard the government's promises, that it really wants to deal with the problems which are behind the grievances, initially of what the natives have brought to our attention so vividly through images, I trust and I hope the government will carry through with some of the comments and some of the promises it has made once again. However, understand we are in an area where the government has made many, many promises and that our native peoples have learned quite justifiably to be very suspicious.

What I would like to do in directing my question to my hon. colleague, and once again I would like to compliment him for a well researched job and very well presented, is ask him, in light of this new information, what concern he would have or whether he would share the same concerns that I have for the safety of the Mohawks in surrendering and the chances of having a fair trial. Finally, how does he see the next step for the government in light of perhaps—if what we hear right now at close to four o'clock in the morning is true—what he sees as the responsibility of us as parliamentarians. He has mentioned the ball is in our court and has to stay in our court. What is the responsibility of us as parliamentarians and on the government side? What is it in the very near future?

Mr. Keyes: I want to thank the hon. member for his compliments and the question. The end, of course, might have been reached much earlier had the government acted responsibly in the beginning. The answer is probably simply this. The actions at Oka obviously loosened the grip of the Prime Minister enough to force him to make the slew of promises that he made earlier tonight.

Yes, we heard the Prime Minister speak of the overhaul of native policies and changes to the Indian Act and speedier resolution of land claims, but you will have to excuse my scepticism if I say I have heard time and time again the right hon. member give us a record, be long on the promises but very short in the accomplishments.

Now I bring myself to putting aside the partisanship of the issue. We have made our point. We must act now together, as I explained earlier, to try to put ourselves in the position of our native peoples. We realize that may be an impossible goal but we must try to do that. Being able to see through their eyes and hear with their ears and speak with their tongues puts us in a better position to understand their problems, their uniqueness and their understanding and appreciation of the land. Therefore, we can work together, try to reach that goal and do what is right for our native peoples.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Thank you, Mr. Speaker for allowing me to speak and for your tremendous forbearance and an excellent job of chairing this House tonight.

To me this is a critical debate, not just in terms of what it means to Canada's native people, but what it means to all of us in Canada in terms of two very different systems of justice which are on trial before us. I am talking first of all about the type of judicial law-making system which is represented by this government's stand. Every one of the members from the Minister of Justice to the Prime Minister, to everyone who has spoken from that side, has spoken about law and order. Yes, this is one system of justice according to the principles of jurisprudence that is available in the western world and in all judicial systems throughout the world. The system of law and order in terms of jurisprudence is described generally as legal positivism or legal realism. It is represented by scholars such as Austin, Kelston and is maybe best expressed by the Swedish legal realist Lundsted, who said: "The assertion that law-makers and courts should be guided by ideals of justice, is completely useless".

In other words, the positives say if the law is properly passed, it must apply regardless. That is the government's position. That is their jurisprudential position. There is in jurisprudence one other position at least, and it is the one which is represented by persons such as Plato, Aristotle, Herbert Spencer, Lester Ward and W.R. Sorley. These are scholars who talked about the necessity for law, not just to be obeyed regardless, but the necessity for the law to encompass equality and*or freedom.*

A more recent scholar in this area has been H.A.L. Hart. We go back to the Jeffersonian principles which he brought to the Declaration of Independence which again embodied the ideal that law is not right just because it is law. Law must satisfy the test of justice, and those tests for justice have often been the concepts, depending on the emphasis, of equality and*or freedom.*

I quote:

> This latter school embraces the philosophy that no philosophical or sociological treatment of the law which refuses to face the question of the goodness of the law, in addition to that of its formal validity and technical organization can provide us with an adequate insight into legal reality.

For the Minister of Justice to have stood up tonight and done nothing to recognize that there are other schools of legal philosophy, other schools of jurisprudence other than legal positivism was, I do not believe, an attempt to mislead this House. I believe it was based on ignorance, an ignorance which has led to the type of crisis we are facing in Oka today and which, if blindly followed, is going to lead us to many more crises across this land.

If laws do not meet the test of justice, equality, and freedom, we have seen in the past how it is impossible for any elected or self-appointed government to deal with the civil disobedience that will inevitably arise. It was Ghandi who asked the people simply to make their own salt from the sea rather than capitulate to the monopolies of the capitalists, and he had a nation marching with him in peace.

We know that it is even a part of modern day law that if there is a patently unjust law on the books, it is a crime to follow it. That was the decision of the Nuremberg trials.

Even the United States Supreme Court has introduced these new principles, not illogical, legal positivisms, through Mr. Justice Holmes, in Brown v Louisiana when five blacks disobeyed a law which said they could not go to a public library and the court finally acquitted them. Even though they disobeyed that law the court said the law was not right.

We do have higher laws in this land than just the laws passed by Parliament. There are other laws. There is the Constitution with its Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provides an override for all the laws which may be passed.

We have other laws too: treaties, which are laws. We have the laws of reason, of justice, and of equality.

When we come to consider what has happened—and I hope the standoff at Oka is over—how are we going to assess the roles of all the people involved: legislators, native Canadians, police, army? How are we going to assess that unless we have a full inquiry into the facts that led to the resolution of what has been a blight on Canada's national reputation and has caused us great anguish in the international councils of the world?

I want this government to order an inquiry starting say last January and following right through. If it does not we are not going to be able to show people that justice was done or not done. It is not for us to prejudge it. We do not have all the facts. Facts coming out of that place are censured now. We cannot even get in to determine things.

Native Canadians cannot even get in to propose earlier resolutions to that conflict. We need an inquiry into all the facts called immediately.

When we are dealing in the future with this question of whether we are going to be legal positivists or whether we are going to have a broader social view of law, it is critical that we remind ourselves of the plight of Canada's native people.

In Canada we have 466,000 status Indians, 308,000 of whom live on reserves. Their income levels are atrocious: 61 per cent of all reserve and non-reserve Indians depend on social assistance. Their income is only 54 per cent of the national average. Their unemployment level is 70 per cent. Illiteracy among our native Canadians is 45 per cent versus 17 per cent among Canadians as a whole. Only 20 per cent of our Indian children have completed high school; it is 75 per cent throughout our population. Life expectancy is eight years less than for other Canadians. Infant mortality is two times as high. In their homes the overcrowding rate is 16 times as high as in all Canadian homes and 38 per cent of native homes have no central heating.

Native Canadians constitute 2 per cent of our population. However, they constitute 10 per cent of our federal penitentiary population. If that is not bad enough, look at native children. Four times as many native children are under child care agencies, and seven times as many native children commit suicide as other Canadians.

Today in this House of Commons the Minister of Indian Affairs talked about increases in spending on native programs. Since 1985, Canada's Indian and Inuit population has increased almost 34 per cent, the spending for them in real dollars over that period has declined by 11 per cent.

We know that money is not everything. Surely we have learned some lessons from Oka. We cannot tolerate this government hiding behind a few warriors in the treatment centre as an excuse for giving up on all of its responsibilities to Canada's native people.

What did this government do to resolve the issue more quickly? If it was a question of law and order, because some of these natives have guns, the government knew about it years ago. Did it step in then on the basis of law and order to deal with the issue? No, it was only when the barricades went up.

The barricades went up on March 11. According to the chronology in the minister's own communiqué on federal actions taken at Oka, the barricades went up on March 11—the first federal initiative is July 17. "Minister Tom Siddon issues statement explaining profile of federal government". That was six days after the Sûreté du Québec went to the barricades, and the tragic death of one police officer. Where was the minister? Where was the federal government?

The Prime Minister admitted that he had not met with one native leader.

In the summer of 1985, 174 refugees were put ashore by boat in Canada. This House was called back because of that crisis and yet this government would not call back this House to deal with the plight of our own native Canadians as epitomized by Oka.

We needed more negotiations and less force. Is it not ironic that at Oka we have deployed 3,300 armed forces? Heck, this government sent only 2,000 to the Middle East.

I hope we have learned from Oka. I hope we have learned that there is more than one concept of jurisprudence and that the modern concept, the concept that justice, meaning equality and freedom, must also be components of an orderly, legal system. I hope that we have learned that that was critical to all of our future deliberations in this House.

If one good thing has come out of Oka it has shown Canadian people the plight of many of our native Canadians. We must not let it die here. We must have a public inquiry as to the events leading up to Oka. We must have a royal commission to investigate the plight of natives in Canada. We must speed up land treaty negotiations. We must bring about conditions of economic and social justice for all of our native Canadians. Surely by now we realize that they have a claim on the conscience of all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sure there are no questions or comments.

Before I call it an evening, I would like to congratulate all members for keeping the debate on such a high plane this afternoon, this evening, and this morning.

There being no further members seeking the floor for debate, pursuant to order made on Tuesday, September 25, 1990 the debate is deemed concluded, the question being put and a division being demanded and deferred until three o'clock p.m. this day.

It being four o'clock a.m., pursuant to order made on Tuesday, September 25, 1990, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock p.m. this day pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 4 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BOARD OF INTERNAL ECONOMY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Hon. Harvie Andre, member for the electoral district of Calgary Centre, the Hon. Gilles Loiselle, member for the electoral district of Quebec, have been appointed as members of the Board of Internal Economy for the purposes and under the provisions of Chapter 42, first supplement of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, entitled "An Act to Amend the Parliament of Canada Act".

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to a special ceremony which will take place on the lawns of Parliament this afternoon around 3.30, the unveiling of the statue of Lester B. Pearson, our former Prime Minister and the member of Parliament for Algoma East for some 20 years.

I hope every member of Parliament will be able to attend this special ceremony to honour the memory of a truly great Canadian who was the leader of a government with great vision, a government which gave us many of the social programs that we enjoy today, such as medicare, the Canada Pension Plan, and the Canada Assistance Plan. He also gave us our distinctive Canadian flag.

A choir from Central Avenue Public School in Elliot Lake, Ontario, under the direction of Lorraine Liss will sing at this afternoon's ceremony. This choir is an appropriate part of this special occasion because Mr. Pearson, during his lifetime, was a great inspiration to tens of thousands of young Canadians as he represented us as a Secretary of State for External Affairs at the United Nations, as the winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, as the Leader of the Opposition and finally as the Prime Minister of Canada from 1963 to 1968.

The legacy he left us as we entered our second century as a nation in 1968 was stronger, more compassionate and united nation after his many years of service to Canada.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, the government is encouraging price gouging by drug companies at the expense of Canadians suffering from arthritis.

Lederle Cyanamid sells the same drug under two different names, Methotrexate and Rhumetrex. Methotrexate is sold to hospitals for 59 cents a tablet. Rhumetrex, the same drug, is sold to pharmacies for $2.32 a tablet.

This government knows consumers are being cheated but it is doing nothing about it. The Canadian Association of Rhumatologists voted last week to censure Lederle for this practice. Did the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs respond? Not a word, Mr. Speaker. The Conseil consultatif de pharmacologie du Québec and the Ordre des pharmaciens du Québec have both denounced this scam. I call on the consumer and corporate affairs committee to order the minister and this drug company to appear before it to explain this flagrant and repugnant pricing abuse.

THE SENATE

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, this government was re-elected in 1988 because Canadians recognized that we had a plan for economic renewal. We told Canadians that we would build on the successful foundation that we laid in our first term.

Canadians were aware of our program and gave us the mandate and legitimacy to proceed. And proceed we did.

We introduced UI reforms to improve the system and save $2 billion a year. We introduced a large corporation tax to ensure fairness and save another $2 billion a year. These bills have been in the Senate 205 and 173 days and counting. We introduced the goods and services tax to reform an archaic and decrepit system and improve the Canadian economy. We have acted on our pledge, yet at each turn, a foot dragging Senate is thwarting the legitimate and responsibly elected government. Obstructionism in the Senate is adding billions to the deficit. The Senate blatantly brags that it will kill the GST. Such contempt for a responsibly-elected government and its electors is astounding.

To quote Stephen Lewis, "Either we have a parliamentary democracy, or we don't". Reason must prevail. The people of Canada and their responsibly-elected government will not be so easily duped.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, in a ceremony later this afternoon the statue of the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, Canada's only Nobel Peace Prize winning Prime Minister will be unveiled.

I would like to read a short excerpt from the second volume of his memoirs, and I quote:

> My own experience has given me a great respect for those who discharge their political responsibility by working for the party of their choice, and especially for those who do so by serving, or seeking to serve, in Parliament or in other legislative bodies. There can be no prouder achievement than to be chosen by one's fellow citizens to speak and work for them in a freely elected assembly.

Those are values that all members of this House share, I am sure. It is a challenge for all of us to instil these values in all of the Canadian public.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, today we will honour the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson by unveiling a statue in his honour. A remarkable Canadian, Mr. Pearson's became well known for his peace initiatives and for promoting dialogue between nations. So far, he is the only Prime Minister to have received the Nobel Peace Prize. Bravo, Mike!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo–Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, this summer Canadians learned much of blockades.

Throughout the summer months my riding of Cariboo–Chilcotin was no stranger to the native blockades that affected many of Canada's small towns. I am sure all members of the House agree that while many of the aboriginal demands are legitimate, the use of illegal blockades are not the means by which they are to be realized.

On a national scale, we have been witness to a small group of masked insurgents holding our justice system hostage, a group who do not represent the legitimate concerns or aspirations of the native people.

More insidious than this, down the hall from this very House, another blockade has been put in place, a blockade erected by a group of misguided Liberal senators. Being held hostage behind this blockade is the Canadian democratic parliamentary system that we know and enjoy.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, let us take a minute to look at the summer's events in agriculture.

A farm aid package to help boost disastrous farm incomes provided half measures. Over a billion was needed, but $500,000 came.

To meet current needs, another $1.25 billion for grain growers is needed now because of a drop in initial Canadian Wheat Board prices at prairie elevators of 22 per cent on August 1, and increases to the export subsidy program used by Europeans and Americans. The Americans are now over $55 U.S. a tonne and have effectively pushed the world price well below initial prices.

At the GATT, our government is negotiating Article XI. At issue is whether supply management for agriculture production can survive. The system eliminates wastage and overproduction, and assures consumers a secure supply of product in return for a fair price to producers.

Cabinet must direct our negotiators at GATT to reject the aggregate measure of support concept that assumes that when a marketing board's prices are above a so-called world price, then the difference be construed as a subsidy. We must strengthen Article XI and maintain the viability of our dairy, poultry and egg farms.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, last week Patricia Wong came to see me at my office in Bridgewater. She was eligible for the fee payer program of the Canadian Jobs Strategy and she was accepted into the cosmetology course at the Nova Scotia Community college.

But Patricia Wong and many like her have been disappointed and let down because the funding for that program has been cut off by the actions of the other place down the hall. The Government of Canada believes that the Patricia Wongs of this country deserve a fair break, and a reasonable chance.

I urge the Liberal leaders of the other place to give Patricia Wong and others like her their just due, and to respect the long standing principles of Canadian parliamentary democracy. Pass Bill C-21.

Either we have parliamentary democracy or we do not.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): The Minister of Justice is hosting a meeting on Vancouver Island next month entitled "Women Towards the Millennium", the purpose of which is, according to the Minister, "to explore the position of women in Canadian society."

We do know that 60 women have been invited to this meeting, but who these women are remains a mystery. We also know that neither the Liberal or the NDP critics for the status of women have been put on the list.

Indeed, in speaking with representatives of national women's groups, I could find none who had been invited. Does it not seem unusual that such a meeting is being held without representation of the major women's groups in this country? Is it not equally unusual that not one female member of Parliament from this side of the House has been invited?

I think it is time for the minister to come clean with Canadian women and tell us what this meeting is really about, who is invited to it and why so many who work through their national organizations for gender equity are not on the minister's list.

THE SENATE

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, thousands of Canadians are angry, and rightly so. A group of Liberal senators, supported by Liberal Leader Jean Chrétien, has betrayed them by ignoring the democratic choice they made by electing a majority government in 1988. Thousands of women are unable to take advantage of the benefits of Bill C-21, including maternity leave, because Liberal senators and Jean Chrétien decided otherwise.

Thousands of unemployed workers have no hope of returning to work because Liberal senators and Jean Chrétien are denying them the right to training. Thousands of Canadian men and women can no longer hope that reducing the deficit will put this country on the road to economic recovery because Jean Chrétien and his senators have decided otherwise.

Canadians ought to know that the unwarranted action taken by the Liberal senators and Jean Chrétien will increase the deficit by $8 billion.

Canadians ought to know that all our social programs and our economic future are being compromised by the unwarranted action of the Senate.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, Parliament has proven to be extremely poor in responding pro-actively to environmental crises. The warning about zebra mussels fell on deaf ears and now the Great Lakes and its tributaries face contamination.

A few days ago Norwegian MPs appeared before Canada's environment committee and warned of the crisis facing Norway. Due to a major outbreak of parasitic disease, Norway has begun a program to kill all life in 70 rivers. Combined with the destructive effects of genetic pollution from salmon escaping from fish farms, Norway's wild salmon and rivers face extinction.

Let me quote the MPs from Norway, "This is maybe the main ecological problem in Norway, the most concrete we are facing" and "We cannot sit around tables debating while the salmon just die in the rivers." Further quotes are: "In the end the politicians gave in and the import occurred against the advice of the best informed scientists in the country" and "Some of the fish farmers went to Canada. They said we want bigger fish farms, we can do as we like."

Mr. Speaker, Norway is intentionally killing all life in 70 rivers. Failure to act here in Canada beginning today would be a crime. No Canadian river deserves a death warrant due to political negligence.

MISSING CHILDREN'S NETWORK

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, in light of the forthcoming World Summit on Children, I rise today to bring to the attention of the House the plight of thousands of families across Canada who have suffered the disappearance of a child. It is our responsibility, as representatives of the people of Canada, to ensure that we offer protection and support to the victims and families of this crime.

We must support organizations such as the Missing Children's Network that works tirelessly for the protection of our youth.

[Translation]

Thanks to the perseverance of the Missing Children's Netword, dozens of children have been able to get back to their families. We must help organizations like these respond to the needs of those people in our communities who are confronted with the disappearance of a child.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, this morning we read in the papers that the Quebec Chamber of Commerce has rejected the constitutional status quo and wants the Quebec Government to ask Canada, in no uncertain terms, for all the powers it needs for its political, social and economic development.

This group of 60,000 business people feels Quebec has no choice. It must be able to act independently in the following areas: education, culture, communications, employment, manpower, unemployment insurance, regional development, financial institutions, health care, social and urban affairs, and recreation.

Mr. Jean Lambert, president of the Chamber of Commerce and former president of the "No" Committee in Quebec in 1980, made it clear these were minimum demands. I would advise the Mulroney government to reconsider the new approach it seems to have taken to Quebec as a result of pressures, namely from Ontario.

Taking a hard line will be useless. The Mulroney government's refusal to negotiate on a government-to-government basis with Quebec will merely stiffen the resolve of all Quebecers to get rid of a form of federalism that is no longer worthwhile.

The failure of the administrative agreement on immigration and Mrs. McDougall's announcement that she intends to create unilaterally a national occupational training commission, with no regard for Quebec's demands, and considering the failure to renew agreements.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to invite everyone in this House to participate in the unveiling ceremony of the Lester B. Pearson statue this afternoon.

As every member of this House will agree, this tribute is an occasion of honour and distinction. While the monument will remind us of Mr. Pearson's achievements, it should also serve to reinforce our responsibilities as parliamentarians. Mr. Pearson's conduct in the House serves as a model for us all. We should also take heed of his respect for parliamentary procedure, responsibility and tradition.

The current tactics undertaken by unelected senators with respect to passing government legislation would surely be frowned upon by Mr. Pearson. This monument, then, is not only an occasion of remembrance but it is also an echo from the past at a time when the integrity and responsibilities of the elected Parliament are hampered by the unaccountable Senate.

I know all Canadians will join with us in remembering and paying tribute to such a distinguished citizen and respected statesman. The thought, the emotion and the artistic energy expressed by the artist, will form a fitting tribute to the late Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson and we, as parliamentarians, can share with family, friends and colleagues in honouring "Mike" who contributed so greatly to Canada and Canada's stature in the world.

THE SENATE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I would like every Canadian to ask themselves three questions.

One, should the unelected and unaccountable be the ultimate power in Canada over the elected and the accountable? Two, is this a desperate Senate action by Trudeau cronies to slow down the plunging popularity of Liberal Leader Jean Chrétien, the shadow man? And thirdly, why has Jean Chrétien consistently refused to state any alternative to the GST?

Again, all Canadians must reflect on the words of Stephen Lewis who is opposed to the GST but said: "Do we want a Parliamentary democracy or not?" The time to choose is now.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Last night the Prime Minister said he would not hesitate to stack the Senate with eight additional Conservatives in order to ram through the goods and services tax.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): The Prime Minister said this even though millions of Canadians have made representations to parliamentarians saying they do not want this unfair, regressive and damaging tax. In fact, Mr. Speaker, every measure of public opinion shows that the majority, the overwhelming majority of Canadians do not want this tax.

Instead of trying to stack the Senate, why will the Prime Minister not listen to Canadians for a change and scrap the GST?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows as well as I do that all tax measures tend to be unpopular and he indicates that public opinion is against the GST.

Public opinion is invariably against any new tax measure introduced by any government. But to run a government, looking out for the interests of the nation five, ten and twenty years from now, you cannot do so the way you run a hotline show and make fiscal policy based on the number of telephone calls you receive in the morning. We were elected with a mandate and we hope to have an opportunity to execute it.

I draw to my hon. friend's attention an editorial in one of Canada's leading newspapers, The Toronto Star, this morning. It stated:

> In fact, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney won a parliamentary majority two years ago on a platform that included the GST—
> Like a sepia-toned photograph of Liberal governments long dead, the lingering Liberal majority in the Upper House still has enough bodies and votes to defeat the tax. Regardless of the merits of the GST, or what happens to it, one thing is clear: Canadians need one government in Ottawa—not two.

That is the parliamentary government. That is what we have and that is what—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister is so interested in newspaper articles, why does he not look at the The Wall Street Journal that says: "Canada's Mulroney is leading the pack for title of the most unpopular leader of the western world"?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the proposed goods and services tax of the government is considered so unfair and damaging that three provincial governments, one of them a Conservative government, intend to challenge the GST itself in court, and intend to challenge the right of the Prime Minister to swamp the Senate with eight additional senators.

In 1981 when provinces went to court to challenge the way the then government was proceeding to amend the Constitution and bring it back to Canada, the government of the day withheld its activities and did not proceed until the court challenges were completed.

Why will the Prime Minister not follow this precedent and wait until the court challenges are decided before trying to stack the Senate with eight more GST-loving Tories?

• (1420)

Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has let the House in on a kind of an embarrassing secret that, in fact, I have become unpopular. I am embarrassed by that, but I am somewhat comforted by the view that so far my unpopularity lasts during the term but it changes quickly during an election campaign when the votes are counted.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Right Hon. Prime Minister could answer the question.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the last time they asked me to call an election they did not like the results.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we could have another try.

Mr. Mulroney: All right, Mr. Speaker. In a final try, let me tell my hon. friends who are crying for an election that we are discussing the Constitution and one of the most important things I learned as a student of constitutional law is that a term in Canada is five years, not three.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that for two days in a row the Prime Minister insists he will not call an early election. He knows exactly the same thing that Canadians know, that whenever he calls an election he will not be there after that election.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, again I ask the Prime Minister why he does not wait for the court rulings before appointing eight additional senators. Why does he not respect precedents, as previous governments did in the past. This is the same position as the one taken in 1981 by the Leader of the Opposition who is now his Secretary of State for External Affairs and who chose not to proceed until the courts had ruled?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): What a joker, Mr. Speaker!

The Leader of the Opposition is urging us to respect precedents, yet his political allies in the Senate refuse to respect the most elementary precedent, namely that the members elected by the people must prevail over the non-elected senators.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. One province has already stated that it intends to challenge the federal government's right to act under Section 26 of the Constitution. One individual has already served notice that he is going to do so. Two other provinces may be challenging by this time next week. We are talking about the rights of the provinces here. We are talking about the rights of the people.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: They do not believe in rights for anybody.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, 80 per cent of the people of Canada are opposed to the GST. We know he is not in favour of provincial rights and he is obviously not in favour of the opinion of Canadians—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member could hurry up and put his question.

Mr. MacLellan: Will the Prime Minister state categorically that he will wait until the court challenges are resolved before he appoints any additional Senators.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, in a question that is this important and this unpopular to Canadians, Canadians have the right to hear the opinion of the courts. Why will the Prime Minister not respect this and wait for the court challenge to be answered?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think we have answered the questions very directly. It is quite surprising to see a veteran parliamentarian who has a good reputation in this place rising to suggest anything other than the supremacy of the elected members of Parliament over the rights of the Senate.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it is wonderful to see the Liberals and the Tories fighting over the Senate. Neither of them did anything for 125 years to give us a legitimate Senate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I am trying to assist hon. members to get on with Question Period. The hon. member will put his question as quickly as possible.

Mr. Blaikie: My question, Mr. Speaker, is directed to right hon. Prime Minister. Surely the Prime Minister realizes that he is on the brink of pushing the country into another constitutional crisis.

I want to ask the Prime Minister why he cannot see the wisdom of not causing a constitutional crisis in the name of an unpopular tax? Why not just withdraw the unpopular tax, save us from the crisis, and get about the business of real tax reform in the country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to see the usually thoughtful member of the NDP make an argument that specious in regard to a role in Parliament that his party has consistently analysed in a different manner over the decades.

In fact, his hometown newspaper this morning provided some views that he ought to reflect upon. The Winnipeg Free Press stated that: "The Liberal majority's plan to kill the GST is a perversion of the useful role (of the Senate). It is a dangerous and irresponsible abuse of power which should concern all Canadians whatever they think of the GST". I assume that includes the NDP.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will get nowhere with me quoting the Winnipeg Free Press. They were for the free trade agreement as well.

Does the Prime Minister not realize that we patriated the Constitution in 1982? What he is considering is a step which would put Canada back in a quasi-colonial status, having the Prime Minister go to the Queen in order to solve a Canadian political problem that he could solve by listening to the Canadian people and withdrawing the GST.

Mr. Peterson: Call an election, Brian.

Mr. Andre: Is that the same advice you gave your brother?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister could answer the question.

• (1430)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is the member for Willowdale has been consistently referring to an election that took place in Ontario a few weeks ago and, while I like him a great deal, I did not know that he was a masochist.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: I have been trying to stay away from it, Jim.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should hear the next question.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I never got an answer to my last question because it was taken over by this idle chatter between two representatives of the corporate elite in Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona has the floor.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister could answer the question as to why he wants to embarrass the whole country by going cap in hand to the Queen and, at the same time, explain why he continues to maintain that he had some kind of mandate for the GST when it was he and his colleagues who shut up the hon. member for Mississauga South when he mentioned the GST in the early stages of the 1988 campaign.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions, including November 17, 1988, October 1, 1988 and throughout, there were very specific and lengthy arguments by me in regard to our position on the GST. We said that if we were re-elected in 1988, if we received a mandate from the people of Canada in that election campaign, we would bring in and pass the GST. We have done that. That is the fundamental principle of democracy and I am astonished that a socialist will not stand up and acknowledge that.

My friend from Willowdale and I are being accused by the NDP of idle chatter between the corporate elite. Let me quote a spokesperson for the dispossessed and the downtrodden, Stephen Lewis, on the CBC yesterday morning. Mr. Lewis said: "And I must say that if Brian Mulroney were driven to the eight additional senators, I can't say I blame him. Ultimately, we have a parliamentary democracy and the way in which they are behaving in the Senate really drives me crazy".

MONETARY POLICY

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. The minister would know about the recent announcement that there have been at least 30,000 bankruptcies in Canada since the beginning of the year. Monetary policies, especially as they relate to overly high interest rates, are strangling the Canadian economy. My question to the Minister of Finance is to find out whether at long last the government and the Minister of Finance acknowledge that they must change their monetary policy, let interest rates drop, and lower the value of the Canadian dollar?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should point out to the hon. member that while there are a significant number of bankruptcies, and I do not take any pleasure in seeing that, there have been something like 350,000 new businesses created in 1989. While there are companies that fail, there are considerably more companies that are being created because of the dynamic economy that we have had over the last six years.

An hon. member: Where?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member says, where. If he would care to look around in any part of this country, he would see that during this period of time we have had over 1.5 million jobs created. We have been one of the leading economies in the world. If the hon. member will not open his eyes to the progress that we have seen in this country over the last six years, there is no hope for him.

I say to my friend that over the past three months we have seen an alleviation in the implementation of monetary policy which resulted in a 1 per cent drop in the prime rate and about a 1.5 per cent drop in the Treasury Bill rate and the Bank of Canada rate. We are reflecting the change in the economic circumstances in the policies we have been following. If there is a continuation of the ease in inflation and of the ease in the economic conditions, that trend to lower interest rates can continue.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that Canadian business cannot wait. The high interest rate policy is driving thousands of them out of business. If he looks at the job creation he is referring to, he should realize that we are losing jobs in the manufacturing and exporting sector.

Does the Minister of Finance understand that this is just the tip of the iceberg? If he is listening to business in this country, he should realize that the last nail in the coffin of the Canadian economy is going to be the goods and services tax if it passes. Is the minister going to wake up to the economic realities in this country or not?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question would have some legitimacy if he had an alternative to the goods and services tax. His colleague from Ottawa said that the credibility of the Liberal Party would be in shreds if the Liberal Party of Canada, through its non-elected Senate, votes down the GST when it does not have an alternative to put in place.

If the hon. member is concerned about the business community in this country, he will listen to what the business community is saying about the tactics of the Senate. The people in the business community are saying that if the GST is stopped now by the unelected Senate, there will be chaos in the business community. If the hon. member does not want to see that sort of thing happen, he should speak to the people in the Senate and tell them to get on it and pass this legislation in the interest of the people that he is concerned about.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue and it is simply this: Will the Minister confirm for the House today that he has instructed businesses across Canada to begin advance collection of the goods and services tax even though it is not the law of Canada?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no. If the hon. member would welcome the invitation that I gave him for a briefing, I would be very happy to let him know the rules of C-62.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have already written to the Minister.

In supplementary, Eaton's, for example, has told its customers that according to regulations provided by the minister's department, it is obligated to begin collecting the goods and services tax effective September 1. In view of the fact that the tax is not yet law and that the Speaker has already censured this government for premature advertising about the GST, will the minister today, in the interest of fairness and for respect for law, which we have heard so much about in the last couple of days, instruct his department to stop advance collection of this proposed tax which is not yet law and ensure that it is not collected until both Houses of this Parliament pass the law?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I realize the member's disadvantage in being in this portfolio as a critic of revenue a short period of time, but I would want him to very carefully study the directive that he refers to which refers to two things: first, goods sold after January 1, 1991, and second, on the condition that it become the law of the land, which is not yet the case. I hope that he will talk to his friends in the Senate and, on behalf of businesses and consumers in this country, get some sense into those senators who are holding back this good piece of legislation. On behalf of all Canadians, get to work on it.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

In his announcement to the House of Commons yesterday, the Prime Minister appeared to make an offer in good faith to the aboriginal people. Yet, yesterday again, the Liberal premier of Quebec rejected a modest three point proposal which would have allowed an honourable disengagement at Oka rather than the humiliating defeat which Premier Bourassa seems to be committed to.

• (1440)

Is the Prime Minister prepared today to facilitate an honourable disengagement at Oka and to finally settle this dispute in good faith in accordance with the gesture he made yesterday?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did indeed make a wonderful speech to this House yesterday along with a number of very, very positive undertakings to the aboriginal people of Canada. All Canadians can be justly proud of the record of this government, which we will continue and supplement on behalf of our aboriginal people.

In fact, when the warriors in the treatment centre put down their arms and come out, we will be able to make great progress on behalf of the aboriginal people of Canada.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): A supplementary. The Prime Minister promised to reconsider his government's comprehensive claims policy which most people acknowledge as a key factor in the Mohawk's grievance. Will he take the advice of the Coolican report and the Canadian Bar Association and recognize aboriginal title in a new claims policy? Will he introduce legislation to create an independent aboriginal claims commission? What is the Prime Minister prepared to do to prove his offers were made in good faith and are not yet another set of empty promises to aboriginal people?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the record of achievement of this government on behalf of aboriginal people is far and away more generous and has advanced the cause of aboriginal people far more than any previous government in the history of this country. We appreciate the discussions, the important contributions made yesterday and by aboriginal leaders. We will continue to develop these programs in consultation with aboriginal people.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister of Canada with regard to his broad, sweeping statements made yesterday to accelerate the comprehensive land claims process.

No specific commitment to changing the outdated claims policy, which is very divisive, was made. This is viewed as being another empty promise. The extinguishment policy which I referred to violates the fiduciary responsibility the government has for aboriginal peoples.

I ask the Prime Minister, will he make a commitment here and now to abolish this destructive extinguishment clause in the comprehensive land claims policy?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I know how deeply the hon. member is concerned about the cause of aboriginal people and the nature of the comprehensive claims policy. We will have ample opportunity to further the discussions which were held in this House these past 24 hours with members of the various caucuses and parties. I will be personally examining many of the fine contributions that were made here in these important debates.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, since I have not received an answer to my question, I redirect this question to the Prime Minister. My supplementary is to the Prime Minister.

If he does want to reintroduce the dignity and trust he spoke of into the process of consultation and negotiation of such items as comprehensive land claims, will he commit to this House and aboriginal groups to changing the outdated land claims policy by accommodating the Penner and Coolican reports on the abolishment of the extinguishment policy here and now today. Yes or no.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I was present in the House, as was the hon. member, when the Prime Minister indicated that one of our most significant priorities would be to deal with the claims process in terms of specific claims, in terms of the treaty land entitlements which have not been fulfilled and in terms of changes to the comprehensive claims policy which would allow us to expedite the processing of these claims.

I ask the hon. member to show some trust and confidence that we will be able to make these changes, as the Prime Minister has promised.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): In the absence of the Minister of Immigration, Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration and Minister of State for Seniors.

Figures indicate that federal funds for teaching French to immigrants have decreased by 17 per cent in the last year while the number of immigrants has gone up by 12 per cent during the same time.

Mr. Speaker, some immigrants have to wait up to five months before being able to register for French lessons. Can the minister explain why the government cannot make this program more readily accessible to immigrants who need to learn French to make their transition into their chosen society that much easier?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for this question which enables us to stress again that the government does give priority to immigrant linguistic training.

This is why in excess of $120 million was earmarked for language training in 1990–91, three times as much as in the 1984–85 budget. Still I hasten to point out to my colleague opposite that budgets and programs have to be re-examined every year. We do that in close co-operation with our provincial colleagues to make sure that our programs are indeed tailored to real needs.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, only a few days ago, the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council said in recommendation No. 7 that the Council recommended making French-language training available to all immigrants in Quebec. This morning, the Quebec Department of Immigration confirmed the information we got from the media, namely that there had been a reduction of 17 per cent. Why doesn't the government listen to its own advisory council and immediately increase funding to make French-language courses for immigrants available to all?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I again wish to stress the importance of co-operation in identifying these needs with our provincial counterparts. Speaking on behalf of this government, I am very much aware of the importance of making this kind of training available to immigrants. I want to repeat that $120 million have been earmarked within our budget. We want to manage our programs effectively, and I can inform the House that the programs approved this year are three times what they were in 1984–85. That is quite an improvement.

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The ongoing situation in the gulf, which is dangerous and serious, continues to concern Canadians and the people of the world.

There are authoritative reports that the U.S. intends to launch an offensive attack on Iraq completely outside the terms of the United Nations resolution.

Will the minister instruct the Canadian contingent in the gulf that it is strictly to limit its activities to those which are within the terms of the UN resolution and that under no circumstances is it to become involved in precipitated U.S. offensive action against Iraq?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right in assuming that there is a serious international crisis in the gulf. I suggest he is foolhardy in relying on his information through the newspapers as to reports of actions taken by governments.

That being said, I can assure him that before any changes are made to the mission that Canadian forces are involved in at this time in support of the United Nations sanctions, resolution 665, that of deterring aggression, they will have to be consulted and we will have to make that change in Canada. It will not be changed by the commanders in the area.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, among the sources for the suggestion that there is an offensive U.S. policy is none other than the recently fired chief of the air force in the United States of America. This has been supported by all kinds of independent analysts.

I would like to know and this House would like to know what steps the Government of Canada is taking to persuade the United States to give sanctions and the United Nations a chance to get the hostages free and to get Iraq out of Kuwait.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member answered his own question as to his source. A source that has been dismissed is no longer a reliable source, I would suggest to the hon. member.

• (1450)

Let me go a little further and suggest to the hon. member that the actions taken by the ambassador of Canada and United Nations Ambassador Fortier since the outset have been to convince all nations involved to abide by the United Nations resolutions. Canada has co-sponsored on several occasions those resolutions.

Canada has been working consistently since the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq to bring about a peaceful resolution through the United Nations.

I suggest to the hon. member that what he sees taking place, the enforcement of the resolutions by the world and that world condemnation, is proof that Canada and other countries including the United States are prepared at this time to work through the United Nations.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. We in this House should not forget the plight of Canada's farmers.

Last spring this government took away interest-free cash advances from farmers. That was a horrible mistake, and it hurt farmers.

In the face of the current difficult situation—plummeting prices, lost markets, and high interest rates—I want to know whether the Minister of Agriculture would restore interest-free cash advances.

I think the farmers of this country deserve an answer now.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure my hon. friend that we are not overlooking the needs of farmers.

As I indicated in the House yesterday, we are looking at several options, one being the hope or expectation that we can develop a long-term safety net stabilization program that would provide confidence, stability, and security for our grains and oilseeds sector.

I appreciate the magnitude of the question, and I will certainly take his question as representation.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, the answer from the hon. minister lacks precision. The farmers are in a desperate situation and they need answers now.

In light of the horrible mistake that he made, I would suggest to the hon. minister that he swallow his pride and deal with this issue in a serious way. If that means going over and twisting the arm of the Minister of Finance, I will be more than happy to come down there and help him.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that is not literally physical force the hon. member is advocating. Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Harvard: Physical, I do not care.

I have a supplementary question for the same minister. Unfortunately interest-free cash advances are not good enough any more. The farmers of this country need an emergency aid package, and I want to know whether he is considering an emergency aid package now.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member's offer should be interpreted as a threat or as a favour but, having said that, the hon. member knows very well that this government provided $500 million in emergency assistance. Some of that assistance is still in the process of being circulated to farmers, and I am sure that is appreciated.

I think it bears re-mentioning that had the provinces been able to comply with matching funds, we certainly would not have been in the same position as we are today. We are looking at what can be done, but I repeat that I hope I can count on the hon. member's support in developing a long-term safety net program which will serve the long-term future needs of the grains and oilseeds sector. I can assure him that we are actively working on that.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the amount of food on the table and the amount of knowledge in the mind determine to a large extent the health of children, and a healthy childhood invites freedom from all types of abuse and exploitation.

Since the Prime Minister is going to New York this weekend to chair one of the most important international meetings, the World Summit for Children, for their sake, is he now prepared to table in this House a comprehensive national strategy that would set the stage for a war on poverty on behalf of the children of Canada to eliminate or significantly reduce this social cancer in our country?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for a very excellent question. He quite correctly points out that the UN World Summit, which will be co-chaired by the Prime Minister, represents a vital advance for the children of the world. This will be the largest get-together of world leaders since the Vienna Congress in 1814.

One of the goals of the summit will be to plan a concerted attack on world poverty among children. One of the commitments of this government is to continue to do everything that we can to reduce the rate of poverty among children.

I am pleased to be able to tell the hon. member that since 1984 we have been able to reduce by over a quarter of a million, the number of children who are living under the low income cutoffs. We are determined to continue to keep that effort and do everything that we can to reduce the level even further.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, very sadly, there are at least one million Canadian children who are poor and dying. We cannot long endure their continued loss to ignorance, abuse, and ill health. The length of lineups to food banks now extends from Ottawa to New York. In Winnipeg alone, the lineup to food banks has swelled by 30 per cent in the last year.

The Manitoba Child Care Association echoes the fear of all day care supporters across the country, that thousands of children are at risk in life and in health due to an inadequate child care system in the country.

When will this government start providing the now long overdue universal affordable day care to children of Canadian families?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on the subject of child poverty, I believe that we have done well but I believe that we can do better in Canada. That is the commitment that we make. We are committed to introducing a child care policy during the life of this Parliament.

In addition, the hon. member could be very helpful to all of us who are committed to providing assistance for Canada's children. As he is aware, at the present time before the Senate there is legislation that provides for a $500 million increase in parental benefits for parental leave under unemployment insurance reforms. He could be exceptionally helpful if he would ask the Liberal senators to pass that legislation without further delay.

AIR CANADA

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Transport.

Air Canada has confirmed plans to lay off at least 2,300 employees and rumours suggest that the number may be as high as 3,000. There is also every indication that Air Canada will eliminate several so-called unprofitable routes.

What action will the minister and the government take to protect those jobs and to protect Air Canada service to those communities where it is threatened?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour) and (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member on his nomination as transportation critic.

In answer to his question, I will remind him that Air Canada is now a private company that operates under market laws and therefore has to conform with the demands.

We will certainly make sure that all employees who will have to be laid off, if there are any layoffs, are properly treated.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture.

Canadian farmers have been left in the position of sitting on a very good crop with excellent quality facing U.S. subsidies which have exceeded $55 per tonne, a change from the days when they were offering $5 and $7 per tonne.

While this contradicts my reading of the Canada-U.S. trade agreement where they had agreed not to offer those subsidies to third countries, I am wondering what the government has done about the reports that Congress is now very close to changing the trade law to permit the extension of export subsidies for the sale of U.S. wheat into Canada.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a very good point. It is a very serious one as far as the government is concerned.

He is right. We have harvested a better than average crop. It has come off in good condition. We find totally unacceptable the bill that was passed in the U.S. Senate about 10 days ago, targeting specifically Canadian markets.

We are examining very thoroughly and very carefully the possibilities of pursuing an action under the free trade agreement. Once that advice is complete, we will then be in a position to make a decision.

In the meantime we are making strong representations to the U.S. administration to not see that the bill comes into law because, if it does come into law, there are some very pertinent implications as far as the free trade agreement is concerned that we intend to pursue.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker my question is also for the Minister of Agriculture. Both dairy and poultry producers across Canada are concerned about the future of supply managed commodity sectors and therefore the future of the Canadian product that is produced by those farmers.

When the Canadian position on agriculture is tabled at GATT on or before October 15, can we have the minister's assurance that the supply management programs will not be jeopardized but will be strengthened by better support in Article XI of GATT and further, that they will not be compromised by any Canadian support for the aggregate measure of support formula?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. colleague knows that the balanced position Canada has developed with respect to our position at the GATT negotiations has been brought about as a result of extensive consultations with the provincial governments and with all sectors of the agricultural industry. I think it is fair to say that there is general approval for the position that Canada has taken.

We have proposed the strengthening and clarification of Article XI and have outlined the manner in which that will be done. The position we have taken is that we are asking all participating countries to reduce trade distorting levels of support in all three areas. We consider that the aggregate measure of support is a useful tool in terms of monitoring the level of that support. What we are proposing are really reductions that would be considered to be direct support by the government. Of course that would all be conditional upon the other participating countries taking similar action.

UNVEILING OF STATUE OF LESTER B. PEARSON

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning the unveiling of the statue to Lester B. Pearson later this afternoon. I believe you will find consent for the following motion:

That, once the deferred division in relation to Government Business No. 17 on the Order Paper is completed later today, the sitting of the House be suspended for one hour or until the ceremony unveiling the statue of the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson is completed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, on a point of order.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, whilst we are very happy with this proposal, since it came from this side, I wonder if the government would be ready to suspend the House until the ceremony is terminated? It could be one hour or when the ceremony is terminated.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, it is our understanding that when the ceremony is finished the bells will ring to call the members back. That would be fine with us. I should also mention that it is our understanding that the time allotted for this particular event will be added to the clock at the end of the day.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

We had agreed to a one-hour suspension of the sitting. If the House wishes to take an hour of its time to pay tribute to Mr. Pearson, that is fine, but we cannot agree to extending the sitting past 6 p.m.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in an effort to enable members of Parliament to attend the unveiling, may I suggest that we agree for the one hour break or as long as the ceremony lasts and terminate this session at six o'clock as per usual.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we want to participate in honouring this great Canadian who did say, at the end of the day, the will of the House of Commons must prevail over the Senate. So, let us go and honour him.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the House that there seems to be a lot of consensus around here except as to whether or not we sit for another hour.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, there are provisions in our Standing Order that could allow that. We will look into that.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to what I think has been agreed, the House will adjourn at 3.30 p.m. for members to be able to attend the unveiling of the statue. It will be immediately after the vote which should take place shortly.

The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Andre: In anticipation of calling the vote, I believe there is agreement between the two whips that there will be a short bell, not the regular 15 minutes and we can have the vote immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, we just want to know what has finally been decided. Do we agree to withdraw for an hour to pay tribute to Mr. Pearson, come back and resume sitting until 6 p.m. as usual? Is that what we agreed?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: No. What we have agreed to is that immediately after the vote, we adjourn for an hour or however long it takes to complete the ceremony in honour of the former Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada. After that there will have to be some discussion as to whether or not there is provision or we are able to extend the sitting or not, that is a secondary question. I am trying to make it very clear that that is what we have agreed to at the moment.

It being 3 p.m. pursuant to order made Tuesday, September 25, 1990, the House will now resume consideration of the motion of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development respecting the situation at Oka and Châteauguay.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SITUATION AT OKA AND CHÂTEAUGUAY

The House resumed from Tuesday, September 25, consideration of motion of Mr. Siddon:

That this House commends the exemplary conduct of the men and women of the Canadian Forces at Oka and Chateauguay.

That, in the opinion of this House, the laws of Canada must apply on all Canadian territory, including Kahnawake, and that all persons currently at the Kanesatake Treatment Centre should lay down their arms and submit to the processes of Canada's judicial system, thereby encouraging the creation of a constructive climate for discussions between governments and the Mohawk people on land claims and other issues; and

That upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

And the amendment of Ms. Blondin:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "Châteauguay" and replacing them with the following:

"and that this House condemns the complete failure of the government to address and offer solutions to the problems that led to the Armed Forces being deployed; and

That upon adoption of this motion, the said motion be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs.

And the subamendment of Ms. McLaughlin:

That the motion be amended by deleting the words "this House condemns the complete failure of the government" and replacing them with:

"this House condemns the complete failure of the current and past governments".

Mr. Speaker: We will now proceed to the deferred divisions. The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Call in the members.

The House divided on the subamendment, which was negatived on the following division:

HANSARD

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau.

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the comments I made yesterday, as reported on page 13307 of both official versions of Hansard. I got a call this morning and was told that I mentioned the Quebec Department of Indian Affairs. I meant to say the Regional Directorate of the Department of Indian Affairs in Quebec. I would like to have the record corrected.

Second, Mr. Speaker, there is another problem. In my answer to the hon. member for Kootenay East I seem to imply that he is responsible for the failure of Meech Lake. That is not what I meant to say, Mr. Speaker. Obviously I was referring to Manitoba MLA Elijah Harper who used procedural tactics to defeat the Meech Lake accord. I hope the correctioon will be made in the final version of Hansard. Thank you.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we will have to be careful when members want to make corrections to Hansard. They should indicate the page and the word to be changed. But if a member seeks to change the meaning of an intervention this might create a problem. In that case perhaps the member would have to debate the matter at some time. But I think it is not correct for us today to accept that a substantial change be made to the record. Surely the hon. member can understand that it is impossible to change yesterday's record. Her intervention is accepted for what it is worth today.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this is on page 13311 and it does not change anything to the meaning of the speech. Mr. Speaker, I simply do not want people reading these speeches in a few years to conclude that the hon. member for Kootenay West was responsible for the failure. I did not mean to involve him. It does not change anything to the meaning of my speech.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, during the time set aside for unveiling the statue, we had a chance to consult, and if the House is prepared to consider the proposal submitted by the hon. member to the House with respect to the time of adjournment today, I think you will find there is unanimous consent for adjourning at 7 p.m, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 26, of course, to make sure 7 p.m. stands.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if I understand the hon. member, he is suggesting that we go back to what we had originally proposed at three o'clock which was that we add the time, roughly speaking it would have been an hour, but we would agree to seven o'clock. I think all of the members would be happy with that as it provided two things: one, to unveil the statue and, second, to make sure the House does not lose its valuable time.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan wishes to comment. Agreed?

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Agreed.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we accept that great compromise.

Mr. Speaker: So ordered.

PRIVILEGE

POLITICAL AFFILIATION

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Standstead): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is partly related to something that happened yesterday in the Legislative Committee on Bill C-79, the Parliament of Canada Act. You must have noticed the problem since you testified before the Committee.

Briefly, the list of committee members shows me as a member of the Progressive Conservative Party, although everyone knows that since May 18, I have had no further interest, either directly or indirectly, in the party and no longer wish to be associated with it.

It goes further than that, however. It seems that despite my speech in the House on May 18, 1990, my name continues to be associated with the Progressive Conservative Party in various committees, and I make this statement today, Mr. Speaker, to ensure I am no longer associated with this party, either in committee or in any other way.

Furthermore, although nearly 3 per cent of the people in Laurier—Sainte-Marie do not agree with me, 68 per cent will probably appreciate my position.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to get to the main problem which affects my privileges in this House and indeed one of the rights recognized by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and I am referring to freedom of association. I would like to read the following—for the benefit of those who might be watching at home, these glasses belong to my friend, Mr. Plamondon—and I quote: "The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

Everyone has the following basic freedoms: freedom of conscience and religion, of course, but also freedom of association.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but there is no need to read the whole document. The point the member raised is legitimate. I can assure him that the necessary corrections can be readily made. I fully agree with his comments.

Does the hon. member have anything to add?

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Standstead): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege was two-fold.

You have dealt with the first part regarding my former affiliation with the Progressive Conservative Party. The second part has to do with my name being mentioned in official documents of the House and especially on air when the proceedings are broadcasted, as it is the case now.

I request, in the name of the freedom of association and pursuant to the Charter of Rights, the right of freedom of association, that fundamental right I had to be associated with my colleagues of the "Bloc Québécois". I also request that the Canadian people, as well as the people of Quebec and of my riding of Mégantic—Compton—Standstead, be informed of my new political allegeance, the political affiliation I have chosen under the Charter of Rights and in accordance with the basic principles of democracy in our society.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that precedents on this subject dating back in many instances 200 or 300 years cannot be put forward, given that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms takes precedence over any other text or privilege since coming into effect in 1981.

Your ruling will have to be based exclusively on the Charter, setting aside precedents from another era.

This alliance, as you have been officially advised, was agreed to and signed by the new members of a group called "Bloc Québécois", and must be recognized as such. In fact, what would it mean to recognize the right of association, the freedom of assocation, if you were not to recognize this group and call it by its name. You cannot simply say: You, the member for Mégantic—

Compton—Stanstead, are entitled to associate with the member for Richelieu, as long as it is kept under wraps.

On this matter, I don't think you can afford to bury your head in the sand. The only thing I ask is that, during debate in this House and the broadcast of the proceedings, as well as in committees and every time my name is mentioned, I be referred to as the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead of to the "Bloc Québécois", just as any other member affiliated with one group or another is referred to.

My request, Mr. Speaker, is supported by the most fundamental texts in our country, which are widely recognized in every nation of the world and by all governments and democratic assemblies.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): I should like to comment on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I think my colleague from Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead is quite right, for he speaks for us all. You may recall that all the members who had signed the memo I sent you on September 17 asked or officially advised you of their decision to sit under the banner of the "Bloc Québécois".

This note was signed by all my colleagues and expressed our common will to sit under that banner. That being so, be it in the various committees—indeed we will have to deal further with this because I imagine the Chief Government Whip will have something to say about it—if the various committees of the House are to be representative of the House it is obvious that we will have to find a solution concerning our participation in the various committees, given the number of us.

If the committees want to be true reflections of the composition of this House we will have to find a solution to that. I would ask you, and the Opposition Whip more particularly, to consider the matter.

Mr. Speaker, this involves not only television and the committees but also all the elements you mentioned with respect to the various proceedings of the House and the ministerial statements when we hope to be able to have the floor, whenever a decision has been made about that.

Since I am on this subject and knowing that your illustrious Board of Internal Economy had a meeting today, at least I imagine it did, I wonder if the House might be advised as to whether your board has reached conclusions. This might be a good opportunity because all members of the House want to know to what extent a group which a member has joined freely must be recognized.

• (1650)

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in the Committee on the Review of the Parliament of Canada Act, we had practically the same discussion, not exactly the same but almost.

I think it is clear from our precedents in this Parliament, let alone previous Parliaments, that it is the right of members in terms of designation to remove the designation they had when they arrived in this place. If they ran under the Canada Elections Act under a particular party name and they choose no longer to be a part of that, then that is their choice. I discovered through conversations some months ago that no one else can take the designation away from them. That is a matter of individual choice and is well centred in our parliamentary democracy.

The issue the member is raising clearly today is whether or not he has the right to substitute for that designation a new designation of some kind. I am not sure; perhaps it would take a bit of table research to decide whether or not we really have any kind of clear precedents for the power to put a different set of words behind one's name in all of our publications including Hansard.

I do not know if anybody in this Chamber feels negative about the notion that the issue of labelling in our documents be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections and that committee members, in their wisdom, hold whatever hearings they need and report back to the Chamber about that specific issue.

In the course of the argument some other issues were raised, for instance the issue of committee membership. The striking committee has not even met to consider the letter that is in our hands. On the issue related to the Board of Internal Economy, it has not met since that correspondence arrived. It would probably be premature to send any of the other matters to committee at this point.

Perhaps there is a predisposition and it is acceptable to the member and all other members of the House to put the issue of labelling in documents by agreement into the hands of Privilege and Elections, with the sense that it would report with due speed and diligence. It would not be something the committee would just sit on for quite a long time, but it would attack the problem and provide us with advice reasonably soon. If we could reach agreement on that, we could proceed to the business of the day or to the rest of Routine Proceedings and then to the business of the day.

I am not sure if I am detecting positives or negatives on the other side.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we accept the proposal by the Government Whip that this question be referred to a Standing Committee of the House for examination and consideration, with the recommendation to act with the requisite diligence so that this matter can be settled as soon as possible.

There is a problem. Two more issues were raised by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead in his statement. There is the matter of the designation below the name of the person speaking, and I am referring to the individual's political affiliation. On television we see the member's name, and if I am not mistaken, some indication of the political party to which he belongs. I think we have to say, Mr. Speaker, that this is a very important matter that concerns all members of this House, and I think we will have to determine whether independent groups of members constitute a political party in this House and whether we should refer to them as members of a political party, a political affiliation, a group, a coalition or a block.

That, in fact, is another matter, of some concern to us, and I simply want to inform the independant member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead who spoke earlier that here again we feel that the entire question could be referred to a committee of the House for discussion. We are willing to discuss the matter here in the House, but it is not that easy. In fact, it is a very complex matter. To some observers, it may seem trivial, but for us the designation of a political party, a block, a group, a coalition or what have you is essentially a matter regarding the organization of this House. Mr. Speaker, we know the British tradition, even in the way the seats are assigned, with the government on your right and the opposition on your left, suggests the existence of a long standing tradition where there is a government and an opposition, and the fact that the latter is divided into parties, groups or simply composed of independant individuals is not important.

But we will have to decide once and for all if a group, a coalition or a block should be designated as a "political Party". That being said, Mr. Speaker, I know that those problems are a great cause of concern for my independant friends from Quebec who recently broke ranks with the traditional parties. But I want to have the opportunity to discuss the matter freely and to deal with it once and for all. If we have a debate, today or in the next few days, I will be ready to take part in it. I have enough notes to talk for almost two hours, but I will not make my speech right now even though I am anxious to have a debate on that matter.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened to the representations made by both the Hon. Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead and the Hon. Member for Shefford.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief introduction on behalf of my party. This is a subject matter of which I think we have all been seized in various ways for quite some time now. I think the suggestion of the chief government Whip, supported by the Whip of the Official Opposition to refer to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections—

An hon. member: House leader.

Mr. Angus: I am sorry, I forgot about his semi-promotion.

Anyway, the point is that I think that Privileges and Elections should be seized of this particular matter. I might want to add that we have had situations in the past where a member of the Liberal Party, the member for Kenora—Rainy River, Mr. Reid, referred to himself as a Liberal Labour MP out in the hustings, but in the House he was a Liberal member. That was a requirement of the rules of the House.

It may very well be that the broadcasting procedures may dictate the manner in which the label should be applied. We would have to revisit that, much as we have revisited the whole question of television services outside this House and in committee. I think it is rolled together and we have to take that into consideration as well.

There are other matters, but I think it is better that the committee deals with it.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened carefully to the representations that were made. There is a disposition in the House to refer this matter to the appropriate committee. I have to be very careful here because that may very well be the most sensible approach.

However, there were several matters raised in the question of privilege of the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead. If it is going to go to the committee and is going to end up giving me any assistance, it is very necessary that the matters which the hon. member has raised are those that are included in the terms of reference to the committee.

I am in the hands of the House. I have some doubt as to whether this is really a question of privilege. I have very grave doubt about that. However, it certainly could be taken as a point of order. I do not know whether it would be advisable to ask the hon. member who has raised this matter perhaps just to adjourn the matter, over say this evening, until he has a chance to speak to the House leaders. Then come back and give me some indication as to whether or not there is a meeting of the minds on this. That would assist me. In the meantime, naturally the hon. member's application would stay on the floor of the House and we would return to it. I would be very pleased to give the hon. member the opportunity to discuss this over the evening and if he could, get back to me and give me an indication of how the conversations are going.

Is such a proposal agreeable?

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think your suggestion is quite agreeable, because the points are very important. Yet, Mr. Speaker, it is possible that I may not be able to get back to you tomorrow on this issue. But even if we had to wait until next week; I have the feeling that you would have no objection. Therefore, I understand that consideration of this matter is suspended until we return to it.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the Hon. Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead's co-operation. Clearly, there is no need for a solution by tomorrow.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, since the Hon. Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead would not want to take the House by surprise, could he give us his word that he will give advance notice to all Hon. Members before raising this issue again in the House?

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): If he were to invite me to dinner, we could certainly talk about it.

Mr. Speaker: I think that there is a certain level of agreement in the House. I thank all Hon. Members who took part in the debate. This is a major issue.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

TOURISM INDUSTRY

TABLING OF GOVERNMENT STRATEGY

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to table today, in both official languages, copies of a document entitled Tourism on the Threshold which is the first ever federal government tourism strategy. This is for the 1990s.

Mr. Speaker, this particular document recognizes tourism as a strategic industry, not as a parenthetical industry, but strategic to our economy. It focuses on strategic plans for the industry and it recognizes that governments, federal and provincial, must co-operate with the industry in order to build a stronger industry. I am very pleased to table this in both official languages.

Routine Proceedings

COMMUNICATIONS AND CULTURE

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, in both official languages.

This report on the National Arts Centre arises from the committee's motion, adopted on May 29. The committee requests that the government provide a comprehensive response to this report in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 109.

Among many recommendations, it is our firm conviction that the National Arts Centre Orchestra remain as a resident company and it should be renamed the National Orchestra of Canada.

I would like to add that it is our view that this report will contribute to the lessening of tensions in evidence at the Centre and I am grateful to the members of the subcommittee and their staff. All along, their approach has been to foster a dialogue designed to help the Centre as it enters its third decade.

POWERS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I know most of the members of the House are anxious for committees to be able to perform their duties.

We do have a problem with one of the committees of the House, and I have had some discussions in the hopes that I could get the consent necessary for this motion because we do want to see that the committee proceeds.

It is a committee on a very important subject, the subject of the environment. I wonder if I can just read the motion and see if we have consent to proceed with it:

> That notwithstanding any special order of the House, a special committee of this House established on Wednesday, June 27, 1990 to prestudy Bill C–78, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process have all the powers Standing Order 113(5) confers on legislative committees.

Mr. Speaker: Does the parliamentary secretary have leave to present the motion?

Some hon. member: No.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia who oppose the government's proposed goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out at some length all the reasons why they oppose this tax and why they feel that this is the wrong tax at the wrong time hitting the wrong people. They are asking the Liberals in the Senate to at least filibuster sufficiently so that the tax would not become law, because they do not have confidence that they will actually vote against it.

BILL C-21

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to rise in accordance with Standing Order 36.

I have a petition duly certified by the Clerk, and signed by 62 constituents of mine from the town of Bonavista.

The petitioners are concerned about Bill C-21. They are particularly concerned that the Government of Canada is proposing to drastically cut unemployment insurance benefits by making it more difficult to qualify by reducing the number of weeks covered.

Also, they are concerned that the government is withdrawing its contribution of, when last checked, $2.9 billion to the unemployment insurance fund, leaving the financing to workers and employers.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject this bill.

QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 317 will be answered today.

[Text]

$500 MILLION ASSISTANCE PACKAGE—FUR COMPONENT

Question No. 317—Mr. Althouse:

Has the Deputy Prime Minister proposed a $500 million assistance package that contains a fur component and, if so (a) who will be eligible for this assistance (b) what amount is to be paid (c) by what method (d) are provinces required to match funding or share funding of this program and, if so, in each case, what federal-provincial sharing arrangement will apply?

Hon. Donald Frank Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): The 1990 special assistance package of $500 million is contingent upon provincial participation. Federal funds allocated from the $500 million for other commodities total about $50 million. The provinces have agreed to administer the assistance program and they have the flexibility to direct assistance to those producers most in need.

While assistance for grains and oilseeds has been announced, details regarding assistance for the other commodities are yet to be finalized. Provinces are working on ways to distribute funds.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. P-27 in the name of the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam is acceptable to the government, except for the documents which cannot be released pursuant to the Access to Information Act. These documents are tabled immediately.

• (1710)

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all background papers produced in relation to the evaluation by the Department of Health and Welfare of the Canada Assistance Plan, published between August 1989 and May 1990.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cooper: Would you be so kind as to call Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers, No. P-24, in the name of the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands and No. P-26, in the name of the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all documents and correspondence pertaining to the decision to admit Francisco Nota Moises to Canada as a convention refugee.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of operational memoranda, directives and other documents referred to by the Minister of Employment and Immigration on May 7 and 8, 1990 (p. 11048 and pp. 11134-5 of the House of Commons Debates) which outline and give effect to the practice whereby medical attention, in particular the administration of drugs, is given to rejected refugee claimants awaiting deportation.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, Motion No. P-24, in the name of the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands, is not acceptable because it makes requests for personal information.

Motion No. P-27, in the name of the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina is acceptable with reservations. Perhaps the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands would ask that those be transferred for debate.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Transfer for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed that Motions No. 26 and 27 be transferred for debate?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Transferred for debate.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-44, An act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are three motions set down on the motion paper for the report stage of Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto.

Motion Nos. 1 and 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Timiskaming are technical in nature as they correct obvious errors in the bill. They are in order. They will be grouped for debate and a vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motion No. 2.

Motion No. 3 standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops is also acceptable and will be debated and voted upon separately.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-44 be amended in Clause 2 in the French version by striking out line 21 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"de la mer territoriale là où ce rebord se".

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-44 be amended in Clause 3 in the French version

(a) by striking out lines 1 and 2 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"(iii) un montant supplémentaire d'au plus trois cents millions"

(b) by striking out lines 36 to 40 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"c) des dispositions relatives à la participation de Sa Majesté aux bnefices nets;

d) des engagements relatifs aux retombées industrielles et aux avantages pour l'emploi;"

(c) by adding immediately after line 50 at page 4 the following:

"f) les autres mesures que le ministre juge souhaitables."

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a comment or two about the two amendments, motions No. 1 and No. 2, which were grouped for debate. They are technical amendments relating to wording changes that were not caught at the time of the committee hearings. I will speak more on third reading.

These two amendments are very much in the tradition and nature of the spirit that characterized the work on Hibernia. As we enter this last phase on the debate on Hibernia, it is important for the House to know what actually happened in respect of this long-awaited project. What took place was simply this.

It goes back to the mid-1960s when the then Premier of Newfoundland, the Hon. Joey Smallwood, in an act in the best traditions of Newfoundland politics, decided to hire a boat and crew to go to the Grand Banks and used deep-sea divers to place on the floor of the ocean a plaque designating that the resources that some day would be discovered on the Grand Banks. He obviously had visions which others at that time might not have shared. With the placing of that plaque on the floor of the ocean, he claimed those resources for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador.

It was no different, I would suggest, than that which we on the Prairies faced at the time when we entered Confederation and were not seen wither worthy or capable of ownership of resources. In fact, the three prairie provinces did not get ownership to their resources—Manitoba, when it entered Confederation in 1870, and Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1905—until the passage in the House of the Natural Resources Transfer Act of 1930.

In respect of Newfoundland and Labrador, I will not go through a lot of history today. My colleagues from that province on both sides of the House know the history of their province much better than I do, but this summer particularly I have been somewhat steeped in the history and folklore of those people and their province.

With the Atlantic Accord came the dream that Joey Smallwood and, I am sure, many Newfoundlanders and Labradoreans had—the dream that those resources would in fact been seen by the rest of Canada as being a resource, in this case, equally shared between Canada, in the right of Canada, and the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. It is that spirit which has surrounded this bill as it has made its way through the House and its committees.

In the committee, there were quite a number of amendments and members of both sides of the House were very co-operative and I want to thank them for that again. They were co-operative because as we were moving this enabling legislation through the House and the committee, we were also negotiating in Toronto. Therefore I had to make amendments as the negotiations were going on. Generally in this place, as most members with any experience know, it is very difficult to get legislation passed or amendments passed until every t is crossed and every i is dotted in the contractual form. That was the spirit in which this committee worked. These are the two amendments that were not caught that evening and it is in that same spirit that these amendments are brought forward.

At this time, as we enter report stage, it is important to understand what happened in Newfoundland. When the announcement on Hibernia was finally made, obviously the people of Newfoundland and Labrador welcomed this development. I was honoured to be there along with my colleagues and I invited all members of the House to that event. I was there with my colleague, the Minister for International Trade who is the hon member for St. John's East. I have had words with other colleagues from the other side of the House with respect to what happened that day.

It is important for us to know that for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, while the Hibernia project will not bring the kind of wealth or possibly the bonanza that some have always hoped for, that it was seen, as the Prime Minister said, as more than simply another deal. It is more than barrels of oil or economic activity. Rather, it is an issue relating to fairness, equity, and dignity.

I hope that this legislation is seen in that light and, while it benefits the people of Newfoundland and Labrador in the first instance as it should, that members on both sides of the House will recognize that it brings the final act in legislative and legal terms to fruition.

I also hope that members of the House from other provinces will recognize why it is important, first, for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador. They do not want to be recipients of equalization any more than any other province, but rather want to contribute to the financial well being of Canada as they have always wanted to do. So, we must look at this bill as having benefits in the first instance for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, but also as having great benefits for the residents of other provinces of Canada. I have never known major projects that can ever be isolated or insulated for benefits to only one province or region.

I am reminded of years ago when I was Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and it seems like years ago, in 1979. I was on a drilling rig in the Beaufort Sea. On the drill floor I met a fellow who must have been at least 135 pounds dripping wet. I asked him where he was from and he said: "From Newfoundland." I said: "Well, what are you doing here?" He answered: "Well, it is pretty obvious. I am drilling for oil."

I always thought of that when I heard people say that the people from Newfoundland would not get benefits out of this project because they do not have either the expertise or the experience. It was my understanding and my knowledge that they had been willing to go to all corners of the world to work on projects such as these. I asked him why he was there and he said: "So I can earn some money to go back home, build a house and get married." I thought that was a fairly legitimate objective as well.

I use that human story to point out that in this place we can very often get tied up with all kinds of legal arguments and political games. Let us remember that this legislation is good, first for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, and also for all of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. I will then recognize an NDP member and then the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to say how honoured and privileged I am to rise, both as the member from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception on the east coast of Newfoundland and as the associate critic for energy, mines and resources, to speak to these amendments.

As the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said, this is very much a housekeeping amendment and as such I have no detailed comments per se. If I could be permitted, there are a number of comments I would like to make at this point in time.

I would like to say at the outset that, as a Newfoundlander, I am very pleased—in fact, I am overwhelmed—about what this is going to do. Again, as the Minister said, this is not the be all and an end all. There are all kinds of i's to be dotted and t's to be crossed. But I would like to make the point that it is good not just for Newfoundland, it is good for all of Canada. The expenditures that are going to be involved and the oil resources and revenues are going to benefit Canada, not just from the participation and the spinoffs economically, but, indeed, reducing our dependence on white oil.

If I can perhaps be allowed a bit of a motion in this particular aspect, I would again look at the Newfoundland benefit. I would like to go back to the reference the hon. Minister made with respect to the Hon. J.R. Smallwood, the first Premier of Newfoundland. Indeed, it is generally well known by anybody who has been involved with Hibernia that he was the first. He sent a diver down on the Grand Banks because he believed in his province and he believed that if we were going to succeed as a province in the long run we were going to have to diversify from the 1497 comment of John Cabot who said: "Fish were teaming. You can catch them in baskets." It is not quite that way any more.

At about the time that Mr. Smallwood was laying the plaque at the bottom of the Grand Banks, I was a lot younger than I am now. I remember the kind of songs that we used to sing in folklore, songs like Lots of Fish in Bonavis Harbour, Lots of Fishing Around Here; songs like Tickle Cove Pond; songs like The Trinity Cake; songs like A Great Big Sea Hove in Long Beach. Happy songs. Songs that said that although there were always hardships in Newfoundland we could always see through the hardships because there was always the hope that something would come along next year. I remember my grandfather having tough years and good years in the fishing and his father before him. There was always hope that something would come along that we did not have to have these alternatively good and bad years.

Now what are we seeing in Newfoundland just before Hibernia was signed again? The song that is now being sung and understood very much in Newfoundland, if I could be permitted, is a song made popular by the late Stan Rogers, a very well known folk singer. It is a very emotional song. I do not propose to sing it for you, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to give you the chorus. The song is called Make and Break Harbour and the chorus is a very sad chorus and it goes like this:

> In Make and Break Harbour the boats are so few
> Too many are hauled up and rotten
> Most houses stand empty
> Old nets hung to dry are blown away, lost or forgotten.

Forgotten, Mr. Speaker, because of the state of the economy dependent on the fishery almost as a sole industry. Yes, we have forestry and pulp and paper, but fishery is our mainstay.

In Newfoundland in the last two years—and I do not mean to be political about this but I have to take it from my end and portray at least the 100,000 constituents in Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—you have got goods and services tax, you have claw-back, you have got Bill C-21, you have got a reduced, total allowable catch, and you have got foreign overfishing. Wherever you turn around when you get up in the morning, life is not good.

Hibernia represents perhaps a change from the "Make and Break Harbour" syndrome and perhaps a change from the no-hope syndrome that so many of my people report to me and that I have witnessed myself.

Apart from the discussions that will take place here tonight, apart from the housekeeping amendments, apart from all the things that will go on, the one thing that it has given Newfoundland is hope, hope in the midst of despair, hope still for the ocean, but hope in a different aspect, in a different dimension of the ocean.

Mr. Speaker, I wish you could have been in St. John's, Newfoundland on September 14, a week ago Friday. I know the hon. Minister was there. The feeling is very difficult to translate. It did not matter which party you were from. It did not matter what part of Newfoundland you were from. It did not matter whether you had an invitation or not.

The almost 1,400 people who attended that reception in the Hotel Newfoundland was something to behold. The whole thread of hope went right through that reception. That emotion is still with us in Newfoundland. We know that there is more to it than this and we know the spin-offs are not just for Newfoundland. They are for the rest of Canada and we are happy about that. We in Newfoundland are not greedy. We are very pleased to be able to share a project of this nature.

I would be less than total and complete in my introductory comments if I did not admit that the majority of this project, that is the building of the gravity base structure will take place almost in the epicentre of my riding, near Sunnyside, about four miles from it at Mosquito Cove near Bull Arm, nice picturesque words. There is hope.

There is one other comment I would like to make. I have not been in this political business very long, but I have been involved in different aspects of different bills. I must say that it gave me, as a neophyte politician, great hope in the politics and in the business of doing these kind of things in this House, the highest court in the land, when I saw the kind of co-operation we received in getting this bill through. I believe we started first reading, if my memory serves me correctly, on November 7 last year. We had another round I believe on February 9 for second reading. We got through committee stage shortly after, I think about June 6 or 7. I remember the hon. minister and his staff making themselves immediately available. It was detailed, it was hard work. We worked into the night and we finished it very quickly and very amicably.

I would also say that I am very conscious, as I know my Newfoundland colleagues are, and I hope the House is very conscious of the personal hard work and energy the the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources put into this. I am sure the hon. Minister of International Trade and others did also. I know they were in the forefront of the very difficult negotiations that took place this summer.

We were hoping to have third reading before the House took recess, but for reasons that I need not get into, it was not deemed appropriate to bring it before the House. As a last resort I asked the minister, and I quote the question:

> Is it possible for the minister to give us any indication of the date so that the people of Canada would have some indication of when they are finally going to derive some benefits from this mega project?

I do not have the minister's exact reply, but he knows that he said: "Yes, we will continue to negotiate during the summer and work will begin this fall". I believed the minister. I knew he would work hard at it, and I am very pleased to report that the results at this point in time are history. Therefore, I would like to go on record for myself and certainly my Newfoundland colleagues and all my colleagues on this side of the House and thank both ministers. I know the hard work the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his staff put into it. That certainly is to be taken into account.

I know we will be speaking in more detail on this and in depth. I have more detailed comments to make and I know a lot of my colleagues wish to speak to it as well.

At this this particular point in time I would like to say: Thank you for the progress we have made so far and let us hope that we can continue in the spirit of hope and co-operation as we go through to third reading.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I just have a few comments about the bill before the House today and the concerns I have about energy development in this country.

The bill before the House today is important for the taxpayers of this country. What we are looking at is the expenditure of $2.7 billion of taxpayer's money from the federal taxpayer, wherever that federal taxpayer may live in this country. Mr. Speaker, $2.7 billion is a fair amount of money for the taxpayers of this country. Later on in this debate the House leader of our party will be moving an amendment that will make sure that the federal taxpayer has accountability in terms of adequate annual reports being made to this House about the Hibernia project, and what it he is doing not only for the province of Newfoundland but indeed for the people of this country.

We want to know for example, Mr. Speaker, what would be the net direct and indirect economic benefits in each Canadian province that will result from this Hibernia project.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to bring to the attention of the hon. member that we are now speaking on amendments Nos. 1 and 2. We are not on the main bill. I would just like to bring that to the attention of the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, we will be moving further amendments because we are concerned about how they spend the taxpayers' money in this country, and as an Albertan I am sure you, Mr. Speaker, would be greatly concerned as well.

I have seen the polls from the province of Alberta where your party, Mr. Speaker, is now running fourth. I am sure you will be very sensitive as to how government money is spent. I do rise to speak on the amendments that are before the House at this time saying that the main concern in our party is accountability, to make sure that money is well spent, to make sure that taxpayers' money is not wasted, be it a taxpayer from Yorkton, Saskatchewan, or Cambridge, Ontario. It is important that we keep a close watch on the expenditure of money.

I am also concerned about an intention of this government that I want to raise on these amendments as well, because it is very relevant, to privatize Petro-Canada very shortly. I think that is also going to be a waste of the taxpayers' money, a corporation that has now accumulated assets of around $5 billion in this country. It concerns me that the government across the way is going on an ideological binge to satisfy their friends in corporate Canada. They want to privatize Petro-Canada. They want to make sure they have made some very good economic deals like having a Hibernia for some of their rich and powerful friends in corporate Canada. That really concerns me as a New Democrat, concerns me as a Canadian, as a Canadian taxpayer. I am sure it concerns Newfoundland as well. That is being done for ideological purposes.

Mr. Reid: What has this got to do with Newfoundland?

Mr. Nystrom: I am sure the member from Newfoundland who was so active in the constitutional debate, in his heart of hearts being a red Tory, would not favour the privatization of Petro-Canada.

I am sure he would recall that the public institution was formed back in 1974-75 because of an OPEC crisis in the world and the escalating oil prices and because we had a minority parliament where the NDP insisted that we have this public co-operation which would be a window on the oil industry in this country. That is why we had Petro-Canada.

It strikes me as ironic that at the time when there is another crisis in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf this government would want to privatize Petro-Canada. I think it is very important that we mention that in this debate on Hibernia.

We have to deal with these amendments before the House, Mr. Speaker. It is very important that we mention that at this particular time because the people of this country must be made aware of the ideological blinders on the government across the way.

It is like the province of Saskatchewan where the premier a year or so ago tried to privatize the Saskatchewan Energy Corporation and the opposition New Democratic Party walked out of the legislature and let the bells ring. The people of that province, my province, rebelled and forced the government to withdraw the bill to privatize the energy corporation of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker, I perhaps want to give you advance warning that when the privatization bill for Petro-Canada is tabled in this House in a few days, we intend to make that a fight across this country and show the people of this country what the Conservative party is planning to do with their money.

The people of Canada do not agree with the Conservative Party of Canada. That is very obvious with recent polling results and recent election results and when they try to privatize Petro-Canada, there will be another catalyst, another warning gong to the Conservative party across the way. Come the election campaign in 1992-93 the Conservative Party will go down to a very resounding defeat.

It is short-sighted to embark on some of these policies. It is very short-sighted. We are running out of resources in this country. Under the free trade agreement we will be exporting more and more gas and oil to the United States, and it seems to me very unwise that they have moved to privatize Petro-Canada. I raise that at this time in the Hibernia debate because this is only part of the energy policy of the Conservative Party. What they have done here is they have signed a sweetheart deal that will benefit in the main some of their wealthy friends in the oil industry. I just wonder whether it will be of great benefit to the people of Newfoundland. How many jobs will this create in Newfoundland? How many long-term jobs in Newfoundland will this create? I just wonder. I am really curious about that and I am sure you are too, Mr. Speaker.

I see many of these megaprojects that cost millions of dollars for the creation of one good long-term job, millions and millions of dollars. If it would create a lot of jobs for unionized workers, I would be very happy and very surprised, but I am sure that will not be the case.

When we discuss these amendments, I hope the Conservative Party across the way will look very seriously at amendments that we are proposing and we are moving which will demand more accountability. I hope that they will also come to their senses and not table a proposal in this House in a few days to privatize Petro-Canada because if they do that, that will just put a few more nails in their coffin.

I am sure you remember, Mr. Speaker, before I sit down, back in 1979 when the then Prime Minister Joe Clark decided to privatize Petro-Canada. That was one of the reasons why the people of this country defeated the Conservative Party with a resounding vote on February 18, 1980. I know the minister across the way, the Minister of Energy, agrees—I can see him from here shaking his head in agreement—because he was part of that government and he was defeated because of the insensitivity of that party across the way. Increasing oil prices by 18 cents a gallon, do you remember that, increasing oil prices when John Crosbie, the then Minister of Finance, said that we needed this short-term pain for long-term gain. Then the agenda was to privatize Petro-Canada and give more and more breaks. It just shows the Liberals—

An hon. member: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I know there are times when we are not really relevant to what the motions are but when you start getting a little off that, I think that I should intervene. I think the hon. member's time has expired in any event. I will recognize the hon. member for Richelieu.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, the Hibernia project has been around for quite some time. From the outset a number of Canadian companies, including companies from Quebec, had shown considerable interest and in fact had high hopes for this project. As you know, a consortium headed by Marine Industries had been formed, to maximize Canadian content. Companies in Montreal, Toronto and the Atlantic Provinces established a consortium to include companies specialized in platforms and ensure there would be more spin-offs for Canadian industry.

Of course, the new Hibernia project raises a lot of questions, especially for Quebec workers at Lauzon and MIL-Tracy. First of all, one unit, one part of the contract is being built directly in one province, without tenders and without the assurance that local expertise is available to carry out the contract at the best possible price.

The second aspect, which may come as somewhat of a shock andurprise to Canadians and Quebecers, is that federal funding available from the so-called Eastern Canada energy development fund is being used to build infrastructurtes and set up companies that will compete with existing Canadian companies. This is a flagrant denial of the principles of free enterprise and the principles of a Conservative Party that has always stood for private enterprise and keeping government intervention to a minimum, when existing private companies can do the job.

The fact is that hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent to set up companies competing with existing Quebec and Canadian consortiums. This raises a lot of questions for Quebec workers. Why isn't this kind of megaproject used to give existing Canadian companies a chance to develop and why aren't companies like Mobil Oil and other multinationals required to pay the price if they want to exploit the natural resources of a country? Why not let Canadian companies develop their expertise?

Why is the Canadian content not higher than in the present project? It seems to me that the percentage is quite small.

Why is it for instance that, for years now, since the idea of rationalizating shipyards came out, one shipyard after another is closing down, particularly in Quebec—after all, the party I represent puts the financial and other interests of Quebec first? A shipyard was closed in Montreal, then in Tracy. There is only the one in Quebec City left. We were told that the rationalization process would be nation-wide. It was not. So, we end up with several Canadian companies relying on designated contracts from the federal government for their survival. On the subject of military expertise, for example, we know that Marine Industires built most of the frigates during WWII. The frigates contracts having been split—one calling for the conception and construction of six frigates for the Liberals and, more recently, one for another six for the Conservative government—, the military expertise is now shifting toward New Brunswick, whereas it already was in Quebec.

Here is another example: the off-shore contract. The only Canadian company experienced in the construction of drilling rigs was Davie Shipbuilding, in Lauzon. Once again, federal funds are being used to transfer knowledge and expertise outside of Quebec so that, come new projects in the future, such as the Beaufort Sea one, expertise is already in place, having been transferred from another region, it will once again have priority over institutions and companies already established in that field. That is of great concern for Quebecers. This raises a great many questions among workers who expected to see spinoffs either on MIL-Tracy or MIL-Lauzon.

I am quite surprised and I hope that the Quebec Members of the Tory Party and Liberal Party will object to the fact that this project remains as it is and will seek changes in order to increase the Canadian content thus bringing spinoffs to Quebec and the rest of Canada.

I suggest that the decision to reserve to Newfoundland the lion's share in this project worth billions of dollars transforms this Canada-wide project into a mostly Newfoundland project. We certainly do not object to the fact that a very large part of the work will be done in that province. What we cannot accept is the fact that public funds are used to create and finance companies which will compete with existing corporations in other regions of Canada which could bid on these various jobs.

I should like to remind you also that the Hibernia consortium is reserving just one module for Canadian corporations, before going on the international market with the hope that Canadian corporations will be able to compete.

We know that foreign countries grant enormous subsidies to their shipyards which build all these support ships involved in such projets. Canada does not grant subsidies to its shipyards, and therefore they cannot compete internationally. Therefore, the Canadian content should be increased in order to get more spinoffs for Canadian corporations, not only in Quebec. But I know that Marine Industries in Quebec have created a consortium with a number of other companies in Toronto and the Eastern provinces to secure contracts for this Canada wide project.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I wish that my Quebec colleagues will join us in our efforts to increase the Canadian content in this project and have changes made to have more spinoffs for Quebec.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to move the following amendment to motion No. 2 in the name of Mr. MacDougall.

> That motion numbered 2 be amended, in the French version, in paragraph (c), by adding after the word «souhaitables», the following: «notamment l'assurance que les appels d'offres sur les cinq super modules de la plate-forme soient, dans un premier temps, réservés aux seules entreprises canadiennes.»

Mr. Speaker, I want to apologize for giving you a handwritten motion, but I am sure that provided the other parties show some understanding, as soon as we have a research budget, we will be more than happy to provide a typed copy.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You might be able to come to my office and I will let you have a typewriter.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in entering this debate I would like to take a moment to thank the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, the energy critic from Edmonton East, and the officials for the work that has gone into developing this legislation and getting it to the point where we are today. Hopefully we will reach third reading of this legislation by the end of this week.

I would like to make a couple of points. I had the opportunity to be involved in this project for a great number of months. I had the opportunity to be in Newfoundland 10 days ago to understand firsthand how important it was for the residents of Newfoundland, for residents of eastern Canada, and for all Canadians. It will probably be, in my life as a member of Parliament, one of the most key pieces of legislation that has been put forward.

It is going to help economic development across Canada, not only in the province of Newfoundland. I would like to say that it was a great honour to be part of that project, and again I thank my colleagues for the great detailed work they did in this regard.

The member who spoke previously on this amendment mentioned work and the way that parts of this work should be spread across Canada. It certainly was, Mr. Speaker. After my address I would like to send a copy of this release dated November 14 to my hon. colleague. It is entitled "The MIL Group Anticipates Key Role in Canadian Offshore Projects" and in part reads:

> Montreal, Quebec—As Canada's most experienced fabricator of offshore structures, The MIL Group is pleased at the go-ahead announcements for the Hibernia Offshore oil project in Newfoundland—Robert Tessier, President and CFO of The MIL Group, commented, "The MIL Group has been working closely with the international offshore industry for more than ten years. I am very confident that The MIL Group will be able to successfully compete for a wide range of the project content."

The communique goes on, but I would like to condense parts of it because I think it is very important to all members in the House and all Canadians to understand that this is not only a Newfoundland project. This is a Canadian project from which all Canadians are going to benefit.

In closing the communique reads:

> Current MIL estimates project a potential of over 2 million manhours of work accessible to The MIL Group and its associates over the next few years from the Hibernia—projects.

For the benefit of the residents of the province of Quebec who will be paying a key part of this, it is worth $1 billion.

Mr. Speaker, as you can see, with this piece of legislation the Government of Canada under the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the groups, the consortium, have done their utmost to ensure that all Canadians will have the opportunity and the benefits directly and indirectly in this project.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I presume we are on dealing with the amendment moved by the member of the Bloc Quebecois, the hon. member for Richelieu, one of the new kids on the block.

I would like to put a couple of things on the record. I was not intending to say anything during this debate, but I can see what the members are up to. They will be moving motions to delay this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, you will notice that when the motion was moved the hon. member kept referring to work in specific locations in one province, namely the province of Quebec. He kept referring to the province of Quebec. He kept saying that the entire intent of this motion was to say that Quebec was not getting enough out of this deal. That is the entire intent of this motion.

There will be another motion, there will be another motion, and there will be another motion. We are going to be here day after day after day dealing with motions put by these members who are saying that one section of this country—

Mr. Lapierre: No, Canada.

Mr. Baker: Read over his words, Mr. Speaker. Every single reference to employment was either to a specific company or a specific city. Let us get it straight here. Newfoundland is the poorest province in Canada. We already passed an act in this House that set out the benefits from the Hibernia deal. And where do they go, Mr. Speaker? Do you know that under this deal right now, not one petrochemical plant industry can be built in Newfoundland from the offshore petroleum resources until existing industrial capacity is satisfied in three other provinces in Canada under an agreement between the Province of Newfoundland, under the former government, not the present government and this government in legislation passed before this House.

Imagine if the Government of Canada had brought in legislation when the tar sands projects were being negotiated, and said that we are going to contribute to this, but the oil that comes from here will have to go to existing industrial capacity in British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Ontario, and Quebec. It would be unheard of, it would be laughed out of this Chamber. But that is what we have had to put up with under this Hibernia deal just to get it going.

And we have to put up with hearing the minister announce 1,100 jobs when the thing gets going. We have had to put up with an agreement that says that only the Come-by-Chance oil refinery can be served by all this offshore resource for all time if the Come-by-Chance oil refinery was operating at capacity on the day of the coming into force of this act.

Just imagine what we have had to put up with in Newfoundland. Where do all of our energy resources presently go? Let me put it on the record of the House. We sell it to Hydro Quebec for $8 million and it sells it for $800 million to the United States. So let us keep things in perspective here, let us keep this record straight and let us have it on the record that Newfoundlanders are fed up with this. They are fed up with giving this away and that away and something else away and being told, well now this has got to go to this province, this has got to go to that province. And now we have a group of people down here, the "bloc head" is not here today but the new kids on the block are here. They are the guys who are saying this is not good enough for the Province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, we say this is not good enough for Newfoundlanders either, but we want this project started and we are not going to put up with these stalling tactics by this group of members down in the far corner.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address some remarks on this motion as well. I just want to answer the question asked by the hon. member from Newfoundland. He asked where all their energy resources had gone. Under the previous Liberal government, the Trudeau government, they all went to the federal government and at least the Conservatives have split it fifty-fifty, between the provinces and the feds in terms of control and so on. He should at least concede that the Province of Newfoundland had a worse deal—well it had no deal because Hibernia did not happen—in terms of sharing energy resources. I am sure I will hear the old kid on the block on this later on.

I also want to point out to him that the Premier of Newfoundland is lukewarm to this deal. As I understand it, he is saying, "Look, maybe we are not going to get all these things that we thought we were going to get"—

An hon. member: They will lose equalization payments.

Mr. Waddell: —and as my colleague points out, they will lose equalization payments in return. Let us be careful of who is benefiting from this.

I do not want to get in between a dispute between Newfoundland and Quebec here because you cannot win on that—

An hon. member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: No, no. I was just going to say something that you might consider sensible. With respect to the Hydro Quebec deal and the Newfoundland deal, if we were really sensible people and Quebec was sensible—and I put the blame on Quebec mainly—it would renegotiate that deal. It is not fair. I say that and I am from British Columbia. It is not fair. It is part of the reason for bad blood between Newfoundland and Quebec. We are going to have to create some good blood and one way is to renegotiate that deal. I can say that because I am an outsider to this but I know a little bit about it. Second—perhaps I may inform the «Bloc Québécois» or our independent members that I agree with the amendment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Waddell: Not so fast! Wait until I finish. Provided the platforms are built by Canadian, not Quebec but Canadian companies. If Quebec is not in the Canadian Confederation: no jobs, nothing, no Canadian companies in Quebec.

[English]

So if they leave, they do not get any jobs at all. They are gone. This is entreprises canadiennes. Some of them may be in Quebec—

[Translation]

I want to see Quebec.

An hon. member: United.

Mr. Waddell: No, but Quebec in Confederation with Canada.

[English]

Perhaps there will be a new relationship but in here. You know, if Quebec leaves, I tell my friends, there will not be any jobs. I tell the member from Hull none of his constituents will be working over here, my friend, so perhaps he had better deal with that.

But, Mr. Speaker, the real issue is perhaps highlighted by what the Minister of Energy told the committee. Hibernia is a big, fat subsidy to the multinational oil companies. We have given our major oil find to Mobil Oil and its friends. It is unbelievable. We are guaranteeing $1.7 billion in loans and we are giving a grant of $1 billion. That comes to $2.7 billion for the oil companies, the very companies that say, "Let's go by the market". Nice market, eh, if you can have it subsidized by the Canadian government and have it guaranteed by the Canadian government. That is a free market? Well, that is rather a different definition of the free market.

Here is the minister in front of the committee. The NDP member for Edmonton East asked him:

> What is the department's best estimate of the percentage of Hibernia production that will be shipped to foreign market and never seen in a Canadian refinery?

In other words, are they going to refine it here. I asked the minister to respond to this in the House. He said in committee:

> Mr. Chairman, it is possible that some of the production over a given period of time entirely could go to a refinery other than Canadian—

[Translation]

My friends, this means not Quebec or Newfoundland, but New York and New Jersey—

[English]

—where the home companies are.

The minister continues:

> —primarily refineries in the northeast United States. It will depend quite frankly on Canadian refineries bidding on the sum of that crude.

We have to bid for it and we have to depend on Mobil and Exxon. Do you know where they are going to send it? They are going to send it to their own. We will not be coming by chance. There are no chances in this one. They will go to the parent.

Hibernia represents practically the greatest giveaway in the century of Canadian resources. The reason is that Mobil and the oil companies have control. Petro-Canada should have been running that entire operation or some other Canadian company should be running it.

When I sat on the energy committee as NDP energy critic for eight years and went up and down the national energy program, we studied a thing called sourcing. It was Bill C-48 in those days. We had witnesses from all over the world: from Norway, the United Kingdom and other countries that were involved the North Sea. We learned that you have to target your sourcing. You have got to require sourcing.

• (1810)

That is why it is a good amendment for Canadian companies—and I say it again.

[English]

We should get some of those. We have to guarantee that some of those platforms will go to Quebec, that all the oil will be refined in Canada, and that the benefits will go to other parts of the maritimes and spread out into Ontario and the rest of the country. It just does not happen because Hibernia is going to be run by Mobil and the other companies. There is the minister's own testimony. The government is guaranteeing the project and giving vast loans. It wants to tackle the deficit. What a giveaway that is. Then it bribes the people.

The people of Newfoundland are poor. They need jobs and they need aid from the federal government. They say: "There is a billion dollars". It is balderdash. "It is a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. Don't really diversify your economy, Newfoundland; just get this big megaproject and you will be all right".

This is all very well now when the price of oil is going up, but if the price of oil goes down—I predict below $40 Canadian per barrel on Hibernia because I think that is what it will cost to get out of there—what will happen is that taxpayers will be left with a $2.7 billion plus debt.

An hon. member: You are sounding like the Tories.

Mr. Waddell: The member said I am sounding like the Tories. I am just sound fiscally responsible. We are in Ontario, you know.

[Translation]

I agree with, I support and I am in favour of this amendment. It is a good amendment, proposed by the new kids on the block, the «Bloc Québécois».

[English]

I tell them, before they clap, to remember that this enterprise is Canadian. This makes it a guarantee of Canadian sources. We in the NDP want Canadian sources. We want Canadian control of Hibernia. We do not want a government, in false promises to people, guaranteeing jobs that will not be there or guaranteeing a project that is not going to benefit all Canadians.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak in this debate this afternoon. I had intended to speak briefly.

I was first involved in this project some 15 years ago, and ever since then in one way or another, either in this life or other lives, I have been involved in Hibernia. Through the development of what initially was discussions about the imposition of regulations by the Newfoundland government, there have been huge changes as the project has changed, as the science has changed, as the corporate world has changed, as the political world has changed. We have all had things that we have wanted and things that we have desired. We have entered into major economic battles. We have had huge political battles over control of the resource and whose responsibility this would be and who would pay for that.

We saw the Atlantic Accord. We have seen the signing of principles. At the beginning of this month we saw the signing to start the project, but as I sit here and listen to this debate and listen to my good friend from Gander—Grand Falls and my friend from British Columbia, I think of all the things we would like to have.

Yes, we would like to see this project proceed with no subsidies. We would love to see this project proceed, developed by just Canadian companies, and all the work done just in Canadian shipyards or with Canadian products. We would love to see no giveaways for Newfoundland—everything Newfoundland wants it gets, and everything Quebec and Ontario and New Brunswick want they get. That would be great, except there is only one problem: there would be no project.

An hon. member: That is not true.

Mr. Reid: It would not happen. If you can tell me that after the work that has gone on between two successive governments at each level, a variety of CEOs in a variety of companies, after 10 years, we have come up with an agreement that all of us feel we can live with, that none of us love, that none of us are fully content with, we now have a project. We may have the oil, but it is no damn good to us in the ground.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: I resent sitting here and listening to our friends from rich British Columbia telling us: "You know, we are giving it all to the oil companies and poor old Newfoundland." Well, let me tell you, the iron workers who built New York City, who live in my constituency and who leave Newfoundland every year or maybe if they are lucky go to Gander for four months, they are fed up with your unemployment insurance and promises about what they are going to get and what they are not going to get. No, this project is not perfect but a lot of people have done a lot of work and are risking a large amount.

Mr. Waddell: Mobil Oil.

Mr. Reid: That's right, we are. The people of Canada are finally saying to all the people of Canada, and particularly the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, it is your turn. We are willing to invest in your futures. We are not talking about Hibernia with one gravity based system and one platform with five supermodules on top of them. We are talking about Hibernia. Then, we are talking about a series of six or seven other projects that are ready to go, Wild Rose, Ben Nevis and numerous others. We are not just talking about cement and steel and putting steel together and putting it on a big platform. We are talking about engineering.

We are talking about the capacity technology development and transfer gives us. My hon. colleagues opposite question whether the people who work and live in Newfoundland and Labrador have the skills to do this work. Can you believe that? My Newfoundland colleagues are horrified at the thought because we, the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, have the skills that have kept cities like Cambridge, and places like Thompson in northern Ontario and across the west working and building for years. Well, now it is our chance to build our own home where people can live and work in the place where they grew up and want to live. They will build their futures for their kids.

If that is what $2.7 billion gets us, then it is a damn good investment for the country now and in the future.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Reid: I didn't even look at my notes.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I hate to interrupt my friend from St. John's East who admits he did not look at his notes. I am waiting to hear what he is going to do when he actually checks what he was really going to say.

Like every Newfoundlander who sits in this chamber, I am pleased that the Hibernia project is going forward. At the outset I want to do what I have already done publicly, to congratulate the gentleman from St. John's West, the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Energy for the effort they put into this. I know that behind the scenes my good friend from St. John's East was in there batting, too. We are proud the project is going ahead.

I was following the proceedings in my office a minute ago. There is not much need to deal with this issue because my friend from Gander—Grand Falls dealt with it admirably, but I did hear the gentlemen from Richelieu when he spoke a few moments ago. Don't desecrate the new kids phraseology, it is the new heads on the block.

—waiting for the guillotine.

[English]

As one of the new heads on the block was saying a moment ago, the gentleman from Richelieu—and my friend from St. John's East touched on it just for a moment—he was taking about this condescension. He said that we cannot do it. These poor, stunned Newfoundlanders cannot work a few bolts or put a few pipes down the ocean or pour a bit of cement. Now that kind of nonsense—

• (1820)

Mr. Plamondon: I never said that.

Mr. Simmons: Read the transcript, that is exactly what the gentleman from Richelieu was saying.

Mr. Plamondon: No.

Mr. Simmons: If he knows as much about the other causes he espouses as this particular one, God help the cause he is espousing!

Mr. Plamondon: I never said that.

Mr. Simmons: Denial, denial. That is the other plank in their platform: deny everything.

Mr. Speaker, I give you notice and I give the new heads on the block notice, I give them all notice, I give everybody notice that this project within the parameters as it has been spelled out will be a first-class project, done the way that Newfoundlanders do everything—with class and with pride. There is no doubt about that.

Let us not hear again from the gentleman from Richelieu or anybody else about the quality of the project and whether it can be done. If that is what he is losing sleep over at night, he should sleep soundly tonight.

While we have my good friend here, the Minister of Energy, I want to put something else on the record. Yes, we are glad this project is going ahead. Yes, we admire what the Minister did and the Minister for International Trade did and, on the other side, the Premier, Mr. Wells, and the Minister of Energy, Mr. Gibbons, did. We admire what they did. But let us understand the parameters within which they were operating. Let us understand that all four of these men went into this exercise with their hands tied behind their backs because, you see, they had to negotiate a deal within the parameters of the 1988 Statement of Principles.

I recognize that the Minister of Energy and the Minister for International Trade not only had their hands tied behind their back, but participated in the tying a couple of years ago. The project does not give to Newfoundland all the largess that one would be led to assume by listening to the rhetoric in the House in the last hour or two. Newfoundland, under the Statement of Principles, got very badly robbed on the issue of equalization. It is robbing Peter to pay Paul. It is taking it out of the left pocket to put it into the right pocket. Never let it be misunderstood for a moment. We were very unhappy and I sat in the Newfoundland chamber at the time when the premier of the day, Mr. Peckford, came back with the Statement of Principles. We were very unhappy then and we continue to be unhappy with the parameters on which this whole agreement has been built.

This is not a day for recrimination or for talking about what might have been. I just wanted to get it on the record. But having said that, I laud without qualification with what the Minister of Energy has done in respect to bringing this to a final agreement and what the gentleman from St. John's West has done and, of course, my colleague, my friend from St. John's East, I am sure has played a role in this. I laud that and it is a good day for Newfoundland. It would have been a much better day for Newfoundland had it been done right in the first place, but that is a story really for another day.

I want to raise a an issue or two with the Minister while we have a few minutes.

An hon. member: Ask him where it is going to be refined, Roger.

Mr. Simmons: It is one of those days when I need a good script writer. I am going to the gentleman from B.C. He has a job articulating these ideas, but he puts them on paper well and one of these days I am going to turn to him—if I ever can afford him—the smart, transplanted lawyer from Toronto who found a good thing in B.C. and stayed there. Now, Mr. Speaker, getting to the subject at hand. I hope the minister at some point, maybe at third reading, will address something that was not really adequately addressed in the agreement. That is the possible impacts. On this I really want the minister's attention, just for a moment. I hope he will address the possible impacts on the fishery should the unthinkable happen.

In that respect, he will know that in the last few weeks there has been some effort by the fisheries union to open some dialogue on this particular subject. I know he cannot negotiate in public, but I hope he would give it some indication of the framework in public. Will he tell us in at least some general terms what kinds of safeguards there are because this is an industry that is going to be with us for 20, 30 or 40 years.

We have an industry that has been with us for 500 years. I have in my riding alone 17,000 people, men and women, who make their living either in the boats or in the fish plants throughout the riding of Burin—St. George's, 17,000.

They are just part of the total number throughout Newfoundland and Labrador, so it would be a disaster not only in economic terms but in cultural and way-of-life terms too. This would be an unmitigated disaster. I want to have on the public record some of the preventive steps that are being taken and some of the compensation, if you can ever compensate should the unthinkable happen. I want to hear in some detail from the minister what the ministry and the government have in mind should all not go as well as one would like.

There is another issue here that I want to raise. I am covering several subjects quickly because I am not going to be in the Chamber tomorrow. I will be in my riding. I am not sure when the bill might get through. If it is around next week, I have some other things I want to say. I want to get one of those in the record. I hope we have not tied our hands behind our backs in another respect. I hope in getting a labour piece agreement for this project, and that in itself was a commendable effort, I hope we have not short-changed the opportunities for people with skills who are close to the project in terms of where they live but who happen not to have a particular union card. That is going to be a very difficult, frustrating issue if there are people whose only sin is that they do not belong to a particular union.

An important issue that spins off from that is what happened to the union at the Marystown shipyard. As a result of a decision on jurisdiction that went against them in the period leading up to the culmination of the agreement, there will be a situation for people in my riding and the town of Marystown.

The Marystown shipyard will fabricate certain items for the project. At some point in time, as is often the case with these large items that have to be built at one site and then transported to another site for integration of the over-all project, they will have a situation where all the work will not be able to be done at the Marystown shipyard. It will be desirable to do some at the GBS site, in this case at Great Mosquito Cove.

They have been told, as the minister will probably be aware, that any work they do on that item that they will have contracted must be done at Marystown, and once it moves to the other site they have no participation in the finish of that particular work.

That, in my view, is an absolutely mad scheme. I see my time is up so I will clue up for now. On behalf of the people who are directly affected, the workers at the Marystown shipyard, at Cowhead in particular, I make a plea. If there is a way to moderate that in some particular fashion, I would appeal to him to use his best efforts to do so. I may come back to that later if there is a further opportunity, but I realize my time is up.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak to the amendment and possibly cover some of the points that members opposite have been making. I, first of all, want to speak about the benefits. I thought we might get into the benefits argument a little later but, in respect to the amendment that has been moved by members opposite, that brings me to that point right now.

What has to be understood is that in any project in which extensive negotiations are going to take place, you are going to win some of the points that you put on the table, some of them will be modified and some you will not win, but at the end of the day there is a contract, an agreement. We have another step and that step is right here in the House, passage of legislation.

The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam says other countries do it differently, and I want to take him up on that challenge. I would think it would be fair that when we look at a project, we should compare offshore projects to offshore projects not compare, for instance, Hibernia to Nugrade in Regina, which this government also helped to subsidize, but I have never heard a peep from the NDP. I am just wondering if it is because it is a co-op refinery. Probably they will now come to their senses on it.

Second, if one looks at the first projects on the North Sea, the first offshore projects, what they call the national content, either for the U.K. or for Norway, the percentage of domestic content was 35 per cent. I do not know if the hon. member has been to Stavanger but take a look at what has happened in Stavanger. That was 35 per cent of the first projects. In the statement of principles of July 1988, there was a 45 to 50 per cent Canadian content. That is what we had to negotiate, almost double some of the first offshore projects that came in on the North Sea.

The hon. member said that I had to negotiate with my hand tied behind my back. Maybe I did, but we still had one hand and the agreement that we signed now gives us 55 to 60 per cent Canadian content in Hibernia. I think, when one looks at negotiations honestly and fairly, that is not bad. That is not bad.

I want to comment on the remarks of my friends opposite in respect of Quebec. At one time they were members of other parties, at the time the statement of principle was brought into this House, and they agreed. At that time there was zero for the rest of Canada. Funny how things change. Now they want to get into these debates. Let the truth be known. There were 2 million hours guaranteed for Newfoundland and zero for the rest of Canada in metal fabrication. There was 8 million for the rest of the world, on which we could bid, in the agreement that was signed and we had a change, if members are honest. We had to change the entire topsides configuration and move from a multiple module system to a supermodule system and we did. We guaranteed for Newfoundland that they would retain those 2 million hours. I did not want just that they were going to be pouring concrete. I wanted technical jobs as well. I negotiated that on behalf of the Government of Canada and I would think for the people of Newfoundland as well and we got 2.1 million hours out of the two.

Mr. Waddell: You're tough, considering we own the oil—

Mr. Epp: My friend, if you were so smart, why did you not develop it on your own money?

Mr. Waddell: You are developing with my money, $2.7 billion.

Mr. Epp: And you know all about the LRS too. Secondly—

Mr. Waddell: I know a sell-out when I see it.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, the member is exercising his mouth. Is his brain attached to it?

Second, Mr. Speaker, we got for Newfoundland 2.1 million hours against the 2 million hours and for the rest of Canada from zero we got 2 million hours. That gives you the content that I refer to, but I do not hear the hon. member when he talks about North Sea, I do not hear him today for example complaining that out of the North Sea we draw 350,000 barrels of oil for imports into Canada every day. I do not hear him complaining about that.

Mr. Waddell: We do not refine it.

Mr. Epp: Yes, we do. I am saying to the hon. member that he cannot have it both ways. In terms of Canadian content, I think the figures stand up for themselves.

I want to look particularly now at Quebec. One of the arguments was, how can you guarantee it because for Newfoundland obviously we are going to do the GBS and if you are going to do the work Great Mosquito Cove, near Bull Arm—I am starting to learn those Newfoundland words—and if you are going to do at Come-By-Chance and Marystown, obviously there is going to be a lot of work in Newfoundland. Why? Because it is being done in Newfoundland. That is where the project is. I think that even makes some sense. That is why it is being done there.

On September 14 when we announced the final contractual agreement, literally hours later, the consortium announced two major contracts. One was for the GBS, the gravity based structure, and the work relating to the gravity based structure. That contract came in at $1.3 billion Canadian. Of the five members of the consortium that were the winning bid, there are three that each had 29 2/3 per cent of the $1.3 billion in terms of ownership. In large contracts, members will know that consortiums are formed in order to spread risk.

Two of the three major companies are in Quebec and so Quebec companies got 59 1/3 per cent of $1.3 billion on the first contract. Most calculations I think will put that well over $700 million. The second contract which was for topside design and project management, high-tech jobs, we had estimated that contract to be worth something like $230 million. It came in at $360 million. It is headed by S and C M Anenko. Eighty-five per cent of the work in Quebec, I am glad that is the case. I am glad it is a Canadian company. I say to my hon. friends, they argue fairness. Be fair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Dorin): Perhaps I could indicate to the House that there have been two members seeking the attention of the Speaker, the hon. member for Longueuil and the hon. member for Saint—Léonard. We have time to hear from both members before we adjourn today, if that is acceptable. They will divide the time equally, 10 minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. What you are saying to the House is that my colleague the hon. member for Longueuil has been on his feet three times already. As much as 66 percent of our caucus is here, while in the rest of the House, I do not see many members of the other parties.

I feel the Chair should treat everybody the same way. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that you should give the floor to the hon. member for Longueuil. The Liberal member could speak after him.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Dorin): As I indicated, if we do not debate this too long there will be enough time for both people to make their remarks, if we move on to it right now.

The hon. member for Saint—Léonard.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Richelieu and calling for the contracts to be awarded to Canadian firms.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to establish the fact that for the past six years, Quebec Liberal members have tried to convince of that the Tory government to which the hon. member for Richelieu belonged up to a few months ago.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was in agreement with the government. When we consider the policy of this Tory government concerning the naval shipyards in this country, we realize that it has destroyed almost all of them.

What one should do is look at what is being done in this area throughout the world. All the countries of the world which have shipyards are providing them with subsidies to help them compete on international markets.

How many times have we urged the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, whose parliamentary secretary at the time was the hon. member for Rosemont, to provide Marine Industries with subsidies to help them compete on international markets.

This afternoon, or rather tonight, Mr. Speaker, they moved a motion which would appear quite normal, calling on the government to protect Canadian firms. Yet, Mr. Speaker, they overlooked the fact that Canada must abide by international agreements.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lapierre: Come on!

Mr. Gagliano: If these independent members from Quebec would only listen, perhaps they could learn something. They are trying to make gains in Quebec, so that they can claim they are the only true Quebec representatives. Yet, Mr. Speaker, they forget that some major Quebec engineering firms compete on international markets.

If the House adopted such a motion, these Quebec firms could no longer compete on international markets and would be treated accordingly. While trying to make political gains, they could cause serious prejudice to some major Quebec corporations which, like Lavalin, are awarded contracts on international markets.

I cannot see siding with the Quebec-based high-tech firms in this debate as beneficial for the independent members from Quebec. They are only looking for an excuse to say: "We are the real champions of Quebec." But they are penalizing Quebec firms trying to tender on the international markets. Were they really sincere, they would want to help Quebec and to help the shipbuilding industry in Quebec. They should ask this Conservative government to give grants to naval industries so that—

M. Plamondon: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to point out that it is assigning me motives to state that, were I sincere—to question my sincerity. There is no place for that word in this noble House. I request that the hon. member withdraw his statement.

M. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, what I meant was that, if he had been aware of the situation, he would have, as we have for six years now, been calling for grants for that industry. It is done everywhere in the world. Grants are handed out to groups in the naval industry so that they can tender.

To support the MIL Group, which I believe should land very important contracts given the importance of that industry for the province, the Quebec and federal governements should precisely get together and offer grants to make such groups competitive. The Japanese, the Koreans, the Italians, the French and the others who tender in that industry all get grants from their governments. And that is the positive thing to do: To find a way so that our industries can compete on the world markets since shipbuilding has access to world markets.

But if we want indeed to gain political points in the short run, my colleague may present a motion to the effect that contracts be given to Canadian companies. Naturally, he has give the impression that is standing up for Canadians and Quebecers but, in the long run, it is the Quebec engeneering firms that will pay the price for those political points.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the amendment of my colleague from the riding of Richelieu. It is the first opportunity I have of rising in the House since I quit the Progressive Conservative Party to join the Bloc Québécois. It is a new experience for me as I said earlier because, for the first time, today I will finally be able to speak freely, without any restraint, in support of Quebec's interests. I will be able to work without worrying about votes I could lose or win in Newfoundland, in Ontario or in the West. I speak freely for Quebec, without any restraint. That must be clearly understood.

I noted today there was a certain complicity among all three parties Liberal, Conservative and New Democratic. They have decided to unite their efforts to launch a project that seems beneficial to Canada. I do not know how they managed to arrive at a consensus on such a project.

I say I am very reluctant to accept this project. First, Canada is so deep in debt that it is almost bankrupt. This is no secret now Canadiens must realize that Canada is practically bankrupt. We are in debt to our ears.

• (1850)

And so the government launches a project. For some time, a number of experts in this country have been saying the project is not viable. Considering that fact, plus a national debt that is absolutely horrendous, I wonder why all three parties decided to support this project. I intend to support the interests of Quebec. I know Quebec pays a substantial share of income tax and taxes to the federal government, and I have an obligation to defend the interests of Quebec. Speaking on behalf of Quebecers, I say this project is not viable and that we should refuse to go any further until we have tangible proof that the project can make a profit. That is my point. I am not saying we should block the project altogether but I think we should take the time to analyze it and make sure we are not putting our money down a bottomless pit.

Mr. Lapierre: All $2.7 billion!

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): I have the impression, and a lot of Quebecers with me, that we are just throwing money out the window.

Quebec has built a lot of big hydro-electric projects, for instance, for which Canada never paid a cent. We spent billions of dollars on developing expertise in the hydro-electric field, and Quebec paid the whole shot. Meanwhile, here in Ottawa, they where working on major nuclear projects—

Mr. Lapierre: For Ontario!

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): The Canadian government spent billions of dollars on the CANDU which isn't selling at all right now because it is much too expensive. It means all the money spent by the federal development on developing nuclear energy is mainly benefitting the other provinces.

Mr. Lapierre: Especially Ontario.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Mostly Ontario. At the present time, Ontario has cheap electrical power, thanks to the federal government which supported these projects. Today, together with Newfoundland, we could develop hydro-electric power again, at far lower cost, a project that would be worthwhile for Canada as well and would require far less investment. That is why today, speaking on behalf of Quebecers and Canadians, I have the impression we are wasting money we don't even have. If we keep investing money right and left in this country, in four or five years we will probably have to send more than 75 per cent of our paycheques to the federal government, and our standard of living might be as low as Mexico's today.

This is a very serious warning. It is appalling to see the three major parties trying to make political gains and defend one another because they have votes to win or lose, God knows where. But if you look at this project coldly you realize that it is not a profitable undertaking.

Because we know for sure we will not win and because we are a minority in this House, we members of the Bloc Québécois say that if we are about to lose a lot of money in an unprofitable venture the least we can do is give Quebecers and Quebec companies an opportunity to bid freely.

Mr. Lapierre: Even Canadian companies!

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Even Canadian companies! The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources himself said that most of the profits flowing from this company or from this major project would go to the United States. The minister himself said that, as reported in this morning's newspapers.

• (1855)

So Quebec is saying that if most of the profits end up in the United States we would at least like to see Canadians getting their fair share of investment capital during the construction of this major project. That would be the least we could ask for. We did not go so far as to say that Quebec should have its fair share. We are quite conciliatory, quite reasonable. We are saying: Canadians must at least have their fair share. We know that Quebec companies can submit competitive tenders.

It is also regrettable—I deplore the fact that the Canadian government will subsidize junior companies in Newfoundland in fields where Quebec has the know-how, where Quebec has already spent huge sums of money to gain wide expertise. But now the federal government is about to support Newfoundland companies which, having acquired the necessary experience, will probably fold up.

So, I believe there is a cetain amount of waste there, which is nonsense. If there are investments to be made, we should at least assist existing operations in Canada, in Quebec or elsewhere. First, they should all be encouraged to bid for the job because it would be unfair to subsidize Newfoundland operations, especially in this instance when other Canadian companies already have some expertise in this area. We must be carefull, because our country is already on the edge of bankrupcy and we are in dept to our ears. We must be very careful not to unduly subsidize projects especially when we know in advance that they are not economical.

Mr. Speaker, I support the amendment moved by my friend, the member for Richelieu, and I thank you very much for your attention. I hope that the people of Quebec have well understood my message and I also hope they will remember that as a group now we can speak freely without having to toe the line of the other parties.

Mr. Lapierre: Without having a gag on our mouths!

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): That is why Canada is courting disaster because we are concerned with politics instead of strictly working on specific projects. And when politics ignore the interests of the country disaster always looms.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

POINT OF ORDER

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Considering the recent developments at Oka, particularly in the last few hours, I was anticipating that the Minister of Indian Affairs would be making a statement, indicating what the government plans to do in response to the blockade being taken down.

Perhaps I could ask the government House leader, through you, Mr. Speaker, if the minister will be making a statement later in the day. If he is, we are quite prepared to provide that opportunity for him in terms of changing the Standing Orders.

Mr. Speaker: I must point out that the hon. member is asking a question under the guise of a point of order. The hon. House leader may wish to respond but I think, strictly speaking, there is no obligation to do so at this point.

TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-83, an Act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister have leave to introduce the bill?

Mr. Loiselle: The purpose of this bill is to improve the structure and operations of Canadian institutions. It updates the regulations governing trust and loan companies—

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Loiselle: The Canadian consumer will benefit from increased competition and a wider range of services.

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that I said to him out of courtesy and I thought for a moment in absolute certainty of my procedure that his intervention was well taken. It was up to a point. The minister does have the option. Perhaps we could discuss it.

COMMEMORATION OF THE BIRTHPLACE OF CONFEDERATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-330, an act to commemorate the birthplace of Confederation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to introduce this bill asking the Parliament of Canada to designate Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island as the birthplace of Confederation. This has been the goal of many Prince Edward Islanders for a long period of time and I ask you, the representatives of all the people of Canada, to give your support to the first reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Routine Proceedings to seek the unanimous consent of the House of Commons to put the following motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a committee of members travel to the Middle East region to consult with members of the Canadian Armed Forces, to observe all aspects of their operations and report its findings back to the House at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. members: No.

Motion negatived.

PETITIONS

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a number of petitions from the Canada Employment and Immigration union employees asking that they be granted pay and benefits the same as full-time employees.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present petitions from hundreds of individuals from my riding and around Nova Scotia. It is particularly appropriate on this day to present them.

The petitioners urge the government finally to see the error of its way and withdraw the regressive, unfair tax grab called the goods and services tax. They feel that this tax is not only unfair but is unprecedented and they are begging the government at this late date to do the right thing and withdraw this regressive tax.

OPPOSITION TO GST

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to present a petition signed by a number of residents of the city of Ottawa, all of whom are opposed to the GST bill and call on this House and the other place to reject this bill.

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to place before the House some petitions from Broadview—Greenwood.

My constituents are repeatedly asking the government to release the money it committed in the fall of 1988 to begin the clean-up of the hot spot, specifically the Don River.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of the fine citizens of Kamloops, British Columbia, who point out that they are aware that as few as a single Liberal Senator can filibuster indefinitely in the Senate and, therefore, stop the GST. They are calling upon at least one Liberal Senator to do just that, stop the GST, if a single Liberal Senator can be found who will do that.

RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present to the House a number of petitions containing the names of several hundred people. They call on the Parliament of Canada to formulate and legislate a law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the lives of both mother and child from the moment of conception.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this is a petition from numerous Canadians regarding the GST.

The petitioners point out that there has never been a tax on magazines, books, and newspapers and now they will be included in the GST. They feel that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a corner-stone of democracy, culture, education, and a literate and productive society. If we are asking for literacy, why are we applying the GST to magazines and so on?

The petitioners ask that this part of the GST be axed, that is, to retain a zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations on magazines, newspapers, and books.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 302, 308, and 322. I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

Question No. 302—Mrs. Finestone:

In light of the Supreme Court's decisions on freedom of expression, is it the intention of the government to seek, under the Constitution Act, 1867, the disallowance of Quebec's Bill 178 imposing language restrictions and, if not, for what reasons?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): The Government of Canada made it clear at the time that it regretted the resort to the notwithstanding clause by the legislature of Quebec to restrict language rights, just as the Government regretted the legislation enacted earlier that year by the legislative assemblies of Saskatchewan and Alberta to reduce the language rights of the linguistic minorities in those provinces. However, the Government did not believe that the exercise of the disallowance power would have been an appropriate response to the use of the notwithstanding clause of the Charter, anymore than the Government of Canada believed it appropriate to disallow Bill 101, with its more restrictive signage provisions, in 1977. The Government has always encouraged the provinces to adopt generous positions respecting language rights in Canada.

MRS. MILA MULRONEY

Question No. 308—Mr. Vanclief:

Does Mrs. Mila Mulroney occupy an office in the Parliament Buildings and, if so (a) what official business of the government or Parliament does she conduct in it (b) what is the operating budget of that office (c) how many people are on that office's staff (d) what office equipment and furniture has been supplied to the inventory of that office (d) what is the source of the funds used for this operating budget?

MULTICULTURAL OR HUMAN RIGHTS FUNDING

Question No. 322—Mr. Robinson:

1. In fiscal years (a) 1988–89 (b) 1989–90, did any multicultural or minority rights organizations apply for funding from the Department of Justice and, if so (i) what number (ii) did any actually receive funding and, if so, what number (iii) were any applications received from Quebec and, if so, what number (iv) were any granted and, if so, what number?

2. In fiscal years (a) 1988–89 (b) 1989–90, were any projects dealing with human rights or legal aid funded (i) in Canada (ii) in Quebec and, if so, what number?

3. Were any applications for funding of such projects received and, if so, what number?

4. Has Justice Canada taken specific steps to comply with subsection 3(2) of the Multiculturalism Act and, if so, what steps?

5. Has the Minister of Justice entered into any agreement or arrangement with any province respecting the implementation of the multiculturalism policy in Canada, as per subsection 6(2) of the Multiculturalism Act and, if so, has there been any agreement or arrangement respecting multicultural legal aid services?

6. According to the Operation of the Canadian Multiculturalism Act Annual Report 1988–89, the Department of Justice "has committed funds for four major conferences in 1989–90, each of which will include exploration of issues relating to multiculturalism"; were these conferences planned or held and, if so (a) what were they (b) in what locations were they held?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): 1. The question refers to "multicultural or minority rights organizations". This term is unclear and has been defined broadly to include all organizations applying for funding in the area of multiculturalism or human rights in order to provide a more complete answer.

No statistics are kept regarding the type of information requested in this question and so all numbers have been manually determined and are approximate.

a) In 1988/89, 49 aplications from such groups or for such projects were received, including 9 from Quebec. Twenty-one projects were funded, including 4 from Quebec.

b) In 1989/90, 33 applications were received, including 7 from Quebec. Twenty eight projects were funded, including 7 from Quebec. In many instances applications were received in one fiscal year and approved for funding in the following fiscal year.

2. In answering this question and the next question, human rights has been broadly defined in order to provide a clearer answer.

a) In 1988/89, 33 projects dealing with human rights or legal aid were funded by the Department. Of the 33, 9 were located in Quebec.

b) In 1989/90, 37 human rights or legal aid projects were funded in Canada, including 10 from Quebec.

3. In 1988/89, the Department received 68 proposals dealing with legal aid or human rights. In 1989/90, 42 proposals dealing with legal aid or human rights were received by the Department.

4. Yes. The Department has taken action during the past years to meet the objectives of the Act. Specifically, programs and activities were undertaken in the following areas:

(a) Human Resources Management

—By developing a three year employment equity plan to improve the participation of visible minorities in the department's work force.

(b) Communications

—By increasing Employee Awareness of the Act and Canada's Multicultural, Multiracial Diversity through internal communications.

—By portraying in communications materials Canada's multicultural and multiracial diversity.

—By the use of languages other than French and English, in accordance with the Government Communications Policy.

(c) Funding Initiatives

—By funding research and education centers, workshops, conferences and courses with a multicultural and minority rights groups component.

—By continued funding of the Canadian Judicial Centre, the Public Legal Education and information (PLEI) agencies and legal aid under the Criminal Legal Aid Agreements with provinces and territories.

—By holding a seminar to sensitize all funding officers to the Multiculturalism Act and multiculturalism aspects of funding.

(d) Research

—By conducting research to enhance access to justice for multicultural groups.

(e) Service to the public

—By continued adherence to Guidelines for the Representative Depiction of Ethnic and Visible Minorities and Aboriginal Peoples in Government Communications.

—By the use of languages other than French and English, in accordance with section 13.2.4 of Government Communications Policy.

—By distribution of materials through the mail and/or through attendance at multicultural and multiracial groups' conferences.

5. No. The federal-provincial cost-sharing agreements for adult criminal and young offenders legal aid services provide for uniform, mandatory coverage to ensure equal treatment in cases covered by the agreement, namely, all serious offenses and those in which loss of liberty or livelihood is likely; the provincial agency will determine the financial circumstances under which an applicant for legal aid may be approved as a recipient.

All applicants charged with an offence covered by the agreement and who meet the financial eligibility test must be approved as an applicant regardless of their ethnic background or cultural association, and the cost of services provided is shareable under the agreement.

The presence of well established legal aid clinics throughout Canada, including areas where various ethnic groups are predominant, assures that legal aid services are accessible to all Canadians.

6. In 1989/90, the Department of Justice provided funding for the following conferences:

The conference entitled "Realities and Needs for the 90's" was sponsored by the National Council of Jamaicans and Supportive Organizations in Canada, Inc. It was held in Toronto on May 19–20, 1989, and included the participation of human rights organizations, youth groups, social development agencies, NGOs, etc.

The conference included workshops on the following topics: literacy; economic development; institutional participation; the Canadian justice system and minority rights; youth; housing; and the aging visible minority population.

The Conference entitled "Human Rights in Cross-Cultural Perspectives"—University of Saskatchewan, College of Law, was held in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan from October 12 to 14, 1989.

The National Conference on Racial Equality in the Workplace—Faculty of Business, McMaster University in conjunction with the Hamilton and District Chapter of the Industrial Relations Research Association, was held in Hamilton, Ontario from March 2nd to 4th, 1990.

The conference entitled "The Contemporary Women's Movement in Canada and the United States: A Retrospective and Prospects for the Future", Centre for American Sudies and Centre for Women's Studies and Feminist Research at the University of Western Ontario was held in London, Ontario from May 3rd to 5th, 1989. This conference included a major session on "Racism and the Women's Movement".

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 52 to request leave to adjourn the House to debate an urgent matter of pressing public importance.

As you will know, Mr. Speaker, although the headlines portrayed the disturbing incidents at Kanesatake last night as a surrender, in fact it was a final act of defiance.

Aboriginal people are now concerned for the immediate safety and personal security of those being held at Farnham military prison and by the Sûreté du Québec. Many Canadians are concerned that the disturbing events of last night could precipitate further civil disobedience or possibly even acts of violence. Canadians are also insistent that the people apprehended at Oka are treated with full respect to criminal and human rights laws in this country.

I trust you will recognize the immediacy and the urgency of this matter, Mr. Speaker, and will rule accordingly.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I take nothing away from the seriousness of the matter that the hon. member has raised, a matter of concern to all members here and to Canadians across the country. I also point out that there was a long debate two nights ago and I think that it would be appropriate to wait and see how events unfold later on today.

The hon. member has raised a matter which is, as I said, of great importance, but at least at the moment it would not be appropriate to order an emergency debate. I thank the hon. member for raising the matter.

IRAQ

INVASION OF KUWAIT

The House resumed from Monday, September 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead):

> That this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and, encouraged by the unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of the legitimate government of Kuwait, affirm unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the United Nations Security Council and its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2 and for the despatch of members of the Canadian Forces to take part in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula; and
> That, upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

and the amendment of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre):

> That the motion be amended after the words "Canadian Forces" and read:
>
> enforce these United Nations resolutions;
> That this House censure the government for not recalling Parliament at the earliest opportunity to fulfil its legitimate function of consultation and debate as to what role Canada should play in the resolution of the present crisis; and
> That upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

and the sub-amendment of Ms. McLaughlin:

> That the motion be amended by adding the following after the word "resolutions"
> "And further, that Canada work at the Security Council to seek assurances that no country will undertake offensive military operations against Iraq unless they are under UN command and explicitly authorized by the Security Council."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Northumberland.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, today I rise to continue debate on the motion relating to the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. I must say to begin with that it is with dismay and great trepidation that I rise as the member of Parliament for Northumberland to debate this issue.

I have been devoted for most of my life to non-violence, have advocated non-violent resolution to problems, and now represent a constituency in Canada, a country which at this present time is close to open warfare in the Middle East. This puts into jeopardy the lives of many Canadian men and women, each one whose lives are sacred to me, each one of those people who right now with our Armed Forces are very important to me, each one who are as a sister, a husband or a wife to me. It is with great trepidation that I rise in the House to present my views on the government's action and inaction, and to express my concerns about the motion on the floor of the House today.

First, I cannot accept that our government sent Armed Forces into this crisis in the Middle East without recalling Parliament so that we could have full debate on the issue and an understanding of what the circumstances are in the Middle East. I also condemn the fact that the Government of Canada sent our forces into the crisis in the Middle East two weeks in advance of any UN resolutions which would have required their presence there. Rather, we sent forces into the Middle East crisis in response to an American request.

In terms of the motion that is before the House today, I cannot deny for a moment that I support fully the first comments in the motion which are:

> That this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and, encouraged by the unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of the legitimate government of Kuwait, affirm unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the United Nations Security Council and its support of all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2—

That, I support fully.

I have to say at the outset that I have the highest regard and respect for Canadian Armed Forces now serving in the Middle East or who have served in the past in other areas of the world, and the greatest respect for those many people in Canada who have lost their lives in serving the cause of justice and freedom on behalf of all Canadians. But I am quite alarmed that the purpose of our Canadian Armed Forces seems to be changing radically from that which Canada has represented in the past decades.

It is ironic that yesterday here on the Hill we had the unveiling of a statue of a very highly respected Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, a man who won the Nobel Peace Prize, who was present when the United Nations came into being, who was so outspoken in support of this country being involved in dialogue to resolve crises world-wide, and who made this nation so respected in our peacekeeping role. Suddenly, it seems to me that we are diverting from this traditional role in Canada and that we are willing to set that aside, become regressive and take on an offensive role.

Our government has not done sufficient to carry on a process of negotiation to try to bring the crisis in the Middle East to a peaceful resolution. Lives of Canadians are being put in jeopardy.

To describe in some detail what I am referring to, I think it is important that Canadians understand that in the Middle East presently there are two operations in place. The Americans have two different strategies for resolving the crisis which are being hotly debated in the United States. Again, as I say, Canada has two possible positions, one to maintain our traditional role in peacekeeping and being strong advocates as negotiators, or the role of going in, forgetting about strong diplomacy and negotiating positions, and being prepared for offensive action.

In terms of the operations in the Middle East, I totally support our Canadian Armed Forces, with all of the skills they have, and their presence in the Middle East to support United Nations resolutions. From that perspective I can support the role of our Armed Forces, the three ships and equipment, and the CF-18s that are in the area, so long as they are employed only to support UN resolutions.

The second operation that is taking place in time in the Middle East is as a result of Saudi Arabia and Kuwait calling upon governments around the world, Under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter, asking for nations' support in resisting further invasions by Iraq, particularly into Saudi Arabia. The U.S. and over 26 other countries around the world, now and over the past weeks, have been building up troops and military equipment deterring aggression but also putting us in a very vulnerable position in terms of an unplanned offensive act on the part of any of the participants. The activities and build up of those troops and equipment on the Saudi Arabian border are not as a consequence of any UN resolutions but they put us in a very volatile situation, one which puts at risk Canadian lives if there is one mistake. I believe that we, as Canadians and as Parliamentarians, should have had the opportunity to debate more fully exactly what the strategy of Canada is in this crisis and to have urged, as is our traditional role, much more dialogue and negotiation as a process to bring about peace to the Middle East situation.

Personally, I cannot support any action on the part of our government which directly numbers and counts the loss of Canadian lives in the strategy. I believe that the strategy of peacekeeping is no less difficult and requires no less strength than that of offensive military action. I believe that the difference between the clenched fist and the open hand exists in the mind of the person who holds that hand. But I believe that the same strength of conviction, determination and skill is required from both postures and I believe that traditionally Canada, with the skills of our armed forces which cannot be surpassed, I do not believe, by any force anywhere in the world, that our position has been to offer the open hand of negotiation and peace and not the clenched fist. That is what I will personally support.

In the motion of the government, I believe that the government does not give through that motion the necessary respect to our forces supporting only UN resolutions, but leaves a door open for our troops to become engaged in conflict beyond anything envisioned through the UN resolutions at this point in time.

I understand from the speeches that have been given on the other side of the floor that the Canadian forces are present in the Middle East under Canadian command. I believe, given the risk and the insecurity that exists in the situation in the Middle East at this time, that there should be a UN command for the forces in the area. If that is difficult to achieve, we should at least have a joint command in that area so that there is a co-ordinated effort in the area come whatever may come. I certainly pray to God that we can resolve the situation in the Middle East peacefully.

I also believe that if you look at the past history and the recent past history of what has happened in the Middle East, we as Canadians bear responsibility for some of what is happening today. It has been known to us that during the eight year war between Iraq and Iran that Saddam Hussein of Iraq used chemical warfare against troops in that war. In fact, we know that he used chemical weapons against his own Kurdish population within the country of Iraq.

I do not believe that we did everything possible to stand up and condemn those transgressions of all international law. As well, we have been aware of many other human rights abuses in Iraq and in and about the Middle East area. And yet, we have continued to benefit, as a nation, from arms sales to that area.

At the present time in our world's history, we are seeing many precedents being set. We have the end of a cold war, which we all welcomed, and we see in the Middle East crisis new alliances which we would never have imagined possible. We must be doing everything possible to support the United Nations in a process of condemnation of Iraq for its activities and in trying to improve what has been accomplished today by the United Nations through the resolutions that have been supported in relation to the Middle East crisis. We are all encouraged by what has been achieved so far in that forum and we must do everything possible to protect that process and enhance it.

I believe by expressing support for actions outside of UN resolutions, we set the foot for destruction of what has been achieved to this point in time by the United Nations. Alliances could change very, very quickly in the Middle East if conflict were to open up. I think that we set ourselves up for a holocaust of proportions that we do not want to imagine and that I personally cannot countenance. As a Canadian member of Parliament, I believe that every life is important, particularly Canadian lives, but the lives that have been lost already as a result of this man who runs the regime of Iraq are also important to me.

The lives of everybody involved in a conflict in the Middle East are important to me and we must focus constantly on the faces of those people who are in the region, who are there to protect our peace and our democracies and systems of government that represent the peoples of the world everywhere. We must be aware and conscious of the importance of those people's lives, their dedication to maintaining peace on our behalf. We cannot become involved in a conflict whereby we can start counting how many lives we are willing to lose in order to achieve other objectives. I believe that it is possible, but it is not easy with our forces there who are prepared to maintain a peacekeeping role. It is important to achieve the same objectives through dialogue and negotiation and peacekeeping that is possible. I believe it is more possible to achieve those objectives than it would be through open conflict and warfare.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore have to say that I support totally the amendment proposed by the Liberals on this side of the House that says yes, we do support Canada's role in enforcing United Nations resolutions, but we censure the government for not recalling Parliament at the earliest opportunity to fulfil its legitimate function of consultation and debate as to what role Canada should play in the resolution of the present crisis and that upon adoption of this motion the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Northumberland on a very thoughtful intervention. I share many of the concerns that she raised in the course of her remarks.

I want to ask her a question with respect to one of the longer term issues that obviously has to be addressed in the course of resolving the tensions in the Middle East. It goes without saying that the immediate priority is to seek the enforcement of United Nations resolutions calling for the unconditional withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait and an assurance that security will be maintained in that region.

Obviously though, one of the long-term questions that has to be addressed is the very difficult and tragic plight of the Palestinians. Of course, this has been exacerbated by the events in Kuwait resulting in some 40 per cent of the resources which would normally be sent to support the people of the West Bank and Gaza being cut off. So, it is a desperate situation.

We know as well that unfortunately Israel has stepped up its campaign of harassment and violence in that region. We have seen the bulldozing of homes and shops in the Gaza. We have seen the refusal to reopen universities on the West Bank and Gaza.

I would like to ask the hon. member what her views are with respect to the importance in the longer term of responding to this crisis as well as part of a regional solution to reduce conflict in the area, and very specifically, whether she agrees that there must be an international conference in the region, which would include representatives of the Palestinians or the Palestine Liberation Organization, which has been recognized as their representatives, an international conference which would deal with the claim of the Palestinians for self-determination which may include a state and which would finally resolve this historic and tragic grievance of the Palestinians in that region. Does she support this as part of an over-all comprehensive approach to the situation in the Middle East?

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying in my comments, I believe that right now there is an unusual alliance of interest in the conflict represented among the Arab nations themselves. Also, on the international scene, we are seeing alliances that we would never have dreamed of even a year ago.

As I was saying, I believe as well that if we were to get into open conflict, we would put those alliances that exist right now in support of peace in the world in jeopardy, because there are so many unresolved issues in the Middle East. One that my colleague raises is the situation of the Palestinians in the Middle East.

Yes, I believe that we must do everything possible as a nation, and we must be more aggressive in trying to promote peaceful negotiations and dialogue to address the issues of the Palestinians and the state of Israel, and all of the many other very difficult historic problems in the Middle East region.

Before the Middle East crisis erupted on August 2, it was the intention of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade to look carefully into the situation as it exists and to analyse the situation in the Middle East before this crisis.

I think it is important that our committee continue to look at and try to investigate so that Canadians can understand just what the problems and positions are of the different parties to all of the conflicts in the Middle East.

I think there has been trepidation on the part of Parliament to discuss these issues in the past. Without discussion, without witnesses coming before us to explain the various positions that exist, we will never be able to take an effective role in trying to resolve the issues of the Middle East.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a question.

I want to follow up on what the member for Burnaby—Kingsway said. He is asking a question to the member who spoke. She is the associate critic in this area for the Liberal Party. I would ask her if she would answer the question and take a position for the Liberal Party.

With respect, I think that is fudging it a little bit. The question was very specific. The question was: Does the hon. member favour an international—

Mr. Walker: What does this have to do with Kuwait?

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has the floor. I would hope that we could get him to ask his question and try to anticipate an answer.

Mr. Waddell: The question is: Does the member favour an international conference to deal with the broader questions in the Middle East which includes the question of the Palestinians, which tragically seems to becoming lost in the immediate Iraq-Kuwait problem?

That is the question specifically. What is the position of the Liberal Party on that? Does it favour an international conference to deal with the broader aspects, to be specific with the Palestinian question.

Mrs. Stewart: In response to that question, I believe that many issues involved with the Middle East crisis have been lost because of the existing current crisis. Many issues must be looked at, not just the issue of the Palestinian cause.

I would say in response to the question that I, personally, would not be adverse to that. But, I would rather first have our standing committee here in the House of Commons, the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade, look into all of these issues.

I believe, as I said, that there is a profound ignorance in this House and in this country as to just what all those problems are and that we must try to understand them better before we can stand up and say we endorse an international conference. This would be an international conference to do what?

First, we have to decide as a government, together collectively, what is justice in our view for the Middle East crisis.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the member for York South—Weston had a question or a comment.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): I am concerned about the partisan nature of the previous question to my friend and colleague.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nunziata: It is so unbecoming of the member from B.C.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brant on a question or comment.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the hon. member for Northumberland would specifically answer the question.

The question was not what her personal view was on whether or not there should be an international conference on those issues dealing with the Middle East, particularly the Palestinian issue, but what is the Liberal Party's position on an international conference to solve the problem of the Palestinian issue in the West Bank, Gaza, and east Jerusalem along with other issues in the Middle East. What is the Liberal Party's position on it? That is the question.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I get the impression from listening to my colleagues in the NDP that they have all the answers. Obviously that is not the case. They are asking for an international conference with no definition of what should be discussed or what the agenda would be of such an international conference.

I say, and this party and I agree—that there are many problems in the Middle East which must be addressed and which we as a government and as a Parliament must come to some conclusions about, before specifically going out and broadcasting that an international conference is what we want. We have to understand the underlying issues before we were to call such a conference.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, after listening to that exchange in this debate, it sounds like the position of the Liberal Party may very well be in keeping with the honourable traditions established by former Prime Minister Mackenzie King, which would be stated a conference as necessary but not necessarily a conference.

That is not the point I wish to pick up from what the hon. member for Northumberland has said. I listened to her speech and I found it a very heartfelt speech. There are a lot of points I would like to pick up, especially when she talks about an historical perspective and this whole role of peacekeeping. In the next few moments I want to concentrate on peacekeeping, Canada's role as a peacekeeper in the international community and the United Nations.

Perhaps, even following the hon. member's example, we could go back and look at some history. I will go back even further than the recent history to which she referred. I was reading very early yesterday morning a passage which pertained to a Canadian by the name of Stephen Leacock who in 1913 was expressing his fury. He was furious when the Liberal dominated Senate killed the Conservative naval bill which would have provided the money to build three dreadnoughts as an emergency contribution to the British navy.

It almost begins to seem that there are just a very few pieces on the Canadian political chessboard. Whether it is 1913 or 1990, we are still involved with whether the Liberal dominated Senate is going to kill a Conservative bill. In this case another element has to do with three Canadian ships being deployed on an emergency basis, or in that case money provided for their purchase as part of an international peacekeeping effort. Indeed there are many parallels.

That case in 1913, just as the debate we are having now, followed two years after a hard fought election on the issue of free trade with the United States or, as they called it in those days, reciprocity. Here we are many years on and we might well ask: Is there progress?

To come to the present and think of just yesterday afternoon when the statue to former Prime Minister Lester Pearson was unveiled here on Parliament Hill, we can reflect that through his person we see epitomized in fact some of these steps of progress, because he was very much identified with the formation of the United Nations and particularly, for which he was recognized with a Nobel Peace Prize, the role in the Middle East in dealing with the Suez and at that time a new role for the United Nations as a peacekeeper. That brings us again to this theme that I want to explore more: Canada's role as a peacekeeper whether it is in the Middle East or elsewhere, but in keeping with the debate today, most assuredly in the current crisis in the Gulf.

At the end of the First World War, the nations of the world created the League of Nations. At the end of the Second World War, the countries of the world created the United Nations. Now, at the end of the cold war, what are we creating? This is in fact our moment of history. What I think we are creating or have the potential to create is a new world order that coincides and completes the dream, the spirit, and the words of the United Nations Charter, words and the spirit that were confounded during the long twilight years of the cold war.

When I was a student of international law at the University of Toronto, and after that when I was studying international law at the Academy of the International Court in The Hague, what really came to impress itself on me was the realization that we cannot genuinely have international law until we have international law enforcement.

For a moment let us consider this proposition in its domestic context to drive the point home. I think all of us feel that Canadians are peaceable people and that we are generally law-abiding. I can remember living in Montreal at the time of a police strike in that city. I think it could have been any other city in Canada as well; let me make that very clear. As there were no police forces, the principal streets in Montreal were turned into drag strips, the traffic lights meant nothing, store windows were smashed, there was looting and so on in Canada's premier city.

That was convincing evidence once again that although 99 per cent or more of Canadians are routinely law-abiding, there are always some who are willing to push beyond the limit and to take advantage of the fact there is no one around to enforce the laws, laws formed by consensus that are necessary for the maintenance of domestic peace, order, and good government.

I do believe profoundly that the same applies on the international level. Until we have international peacekeeping forces of a permanent and standing nature, an international police force, international law will lack the essential element of any law and that is the ability to see that it is obeyed. We are not starting on this from scratch.

I referred earlier to the work of Prime Minister Pearson. His contribution was to introduce a new notion about peacekeeping in the Suez context and, in keeping with the UN charter, to see the deployment of military forces from various member countries of the UN, under the blue flag of the UN, into the situation to assert the military force behind international law and order.

We have seen that example. We have seen the most acute example of military action being taken in the case of Korea. However, generally something that all Canadians are proud of is the fact that there has not been a single United Nations peacekeeping operation in which Canadian Armed Forces personnel have not participated or, put positively, we have been there every time there has been a role for a United Nations peacekeeping force.

As I said earlier, it is after the cold war, we see a consensus among nations and, this is our moment of history. In the debate on Monday the hon. member for Waterloo pointed out the following:

> For many years in the time of the East-West confrontation we have looked at a standing UN peace force. There have been designs and models and because of the East-West confrontation we have not been able to move.

He urged that we try to establish the machinery for a UN standing peace force with battalions held in reserve by national governments so that in an emergency, such as the current one we are debating or any other regional conflict, the United Nations and Canada as member of the United Nations would not be beholden to any one major power, formerly called superpowers, to act and take a leadership role.

I believe that this is truly the opportunity for us to look at new possibilities and seek a Canadian role to advance this concept of a standing United Nations peace force, just as we have within the respective countries of all member states domestic peace forces.

Certainly the unprecedented situation in the gulf crisis shows that we do have a truly united nations effort going on there. There are 158 countries that have come in, in support of the actions being taken by the United Nations.

Just briefly but for the record, I think it is important to note what those resolutions are. They seem to increase as each day goes by. We are now at the stage where eight resolutions have been passed by the Security Council of the United Nations concerning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq.

On August 2, 1990 Security Council resolution No. 660 condemned the invasion of Kuwait. On August 6, resolution 661 instituted sanctions against Iraq and occupied Kuwait. August 9, resolution 662 condemned the annexation of Kuwait by Iraq. On August 18, resolution 664 called on Iraq to allow other nationals to leave Iraq and occupied Kuwait. On August 25, resolution 665 authorized the use of reasonable force to inspect shipping and ensure that the sanctions outlined in resolution 664 were in fact being respected.

On September 13, resolution 666 set out the conditions under which humanitarian shipments of food and medicine could be made to Iraq and occupied Kuwait. On September 16, resolution 667 condemned Iraq's incursion into diplomatic premises in occupied Kuwait—I would note that that included premises of the Canadian mission there—and the detention of diplomatic personnel. On September 25, resolution 670 was adopted limiting air transport into Iraq in furtherance of the sanctions.

Never in peacetime has any country, which has violated international law the way Iraq has, faced such a solid wall of sanctions. Many of us have looked at previous examples of the use of sanctions and felt that it was a flawed instrument, an effort that was often circumvented and of very little effect. Certainly in this case the United Nations support—and I mean the 158 or so countries of the United Nations that are behind these eight Security Council resolutions—indicates that this very serious situation is being well handled and the aggression that was anticipated has to date been contained to the invasion of Kuwait.

Any suggestion that Canada's actions in the gulf crisis have been contrary to our tradition as peacekeepers reflects an opinion that has been overtaken by the facts. This is both peacekeeping and peace making. That is theme I want again to emphasize as we now look at the new possibilities in the post-cold war era of finding co-operation to make the United Nations all that it was dreamt it could be in 1945.

Peacekeepers have traditionally been deployed under the United Nations flag between the parties to a conflict following a truce. Certainly in the case of the current conflict, Canada would support the placing of peacekeepers between Iraq and Kuwait once Baghdad withdraws from the country it has invaded.

This also raises other questions that I do not have time to go into now, but one must contemplate the nature of a liberated Kuwait. Speaking for myself, I would hope that we would be supportive of democratic forces in Kuwait so that in the future the people of that country would have the opportunity to really have a representative and democratic country.

The sending of Canadian sailors and ships, of Canadian aircrew and aircraft to deter this aggression and to enforce the UN sanctions that I have referred to is also peacekeeping. It is as much peacekeeping as having Canadian soldiers wearing the blue beret of the United Nations in Cyprus or anywhere else around the globe. Our naval and air forces and the forces of a number of other countries are there under explicit UN auspices.

I listened to the member for Northumberland talking about when forces were deployed and when resolutions were passed and I understand the narrow points that are being made. She also asked whether Parliament was or was not recalled soon enough. I do not want to debate that, I am simply saying that when taking a broad view of Canada's role as a peacekeeping country and as a peacemaker, we must go beyond the small details and look at the broad outlines of what is happening. I think it is a very significant moment in world history as we pursue global peace to see this concerted action by so many countries, not only Canadians, but the people of Bangladesh putting their armed forces in harms way.

This drawing of a line is indicating to the Saddam Husseins of the world that international boundaries are to be respected and that the united nations of this world will not tolerate armed invasion and occupation of independent countries.

Our commitment to peacekeeping is and must remain unshakeable. In these difficult days, as we consider our future as Canadians and what the new constitutional arrangements will be for our country, the essential thing is to focus on the values that really make us all Canadians and that do unite us as Canadians. One of those, most assuredly, is the value of peace and the honourable and sometimes very costly tradition of maintaining peace even when that requires the deployment of Canadians who proudly wear the uniform of our country.

Our contribution to international order, not only through United Nations peacekeeping forces, but our overseas assistance, our diplomatic initiatives and so many other roles that are part of this proud tradition is now coming into a new phase, a new era. It is not one where anyone can state, with certainty, what will be, but certainly we can outline what the goals ought to be and work towards those.

It is certainly something that other countries recognize in us as Canadians. Whether it is this current situation in the gulf, whether it is Central American governments designing a peace plan and getting support and assistance from Canada, whether it is our involvement with Japan who is developing its own new interest in this area, whether it is our efforts with Namibia turning it into a new country and a member of the United Nations from having been the last colony in Africa and making it become fully a democratic country, or whether it is the parties to the Cambodian conflict finding where we have provided valuable suggestions for monitoring and upholding international peace there. This is the point. Canadians are committed to peacekeeping and peace making. International order, respect for sovereign countries and the rule of law depend on it.

I hope that we can find here in Canada, just as Lester Pearson found in the fifties in the Suez crisis, a new dimension, an additional forward step in defining and in defending the role of peacekeeping. We must work toward a United Nations standing peacekeeping force to continue through the long and difficult months that will lie ahead. The resolve must be there, not only in goods times of peace but in times of bleak and difficult challenge like this, when Canadians have to be sent into areas to support the principles and the spirit of the United Nations to see that we truly have the rule of international law.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a discussion with the parliamentary secretary, and I thank him for outlining the government's position. Perhaps he and I, unlike the NDP, can stay on topic. He probably notices that every time the NDP do not know what to say, they find another topic because there are some areas such as foreign policy to which they cannot contribute. I certainly hope in the next few years they will be able to understand the world a little bit better than they have shown in the past.

An hon. member: We are trying to get straight answers.

Mr. Walker: Straight answers? If you had a question about the subject, you would get a straight answer. I am sure the new critic from British Columbia will be spending a lot of time in the library in the next period getting caught up on world affairs.

The parliamentary secretary suggested that the issues raised in the speech of the member for Northumberland were nuances in the debate and not central to the point. I think they are central to the point. I think Parliament has a very important role to play in Canadian foreign policy. We have a long tradition of having good discussions on foreign policy and there is a goodwill among Canadians that we do the right thing. Whether it is in areas of human rights, peacekeeping or dealing with nuclear disarmament, this House has spoken at times with one voice to ensure that Canada proceeds in the proper way.

The absence of Parliament sitting during the summer was not just a minor nuance to us but in fact is central to our criticism of what the government is doing and central to our criticism of the motion.

Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could elaborate on why the government has not been more insistent that the command of this military operation—because it is a military operation—is not more directly in the hands of the United Nations. We have, as a middle power, consistently taken the position that it is organizations like the UN which have to be the vehicle for keeping peace. Although we appreciate the speed with which people have to respond to the crisis with the dangers that are there—and nobody kids themselves about that and the goodwill with which we have supported the United States—the point still is that other countries turn to Canada to make sure that organizations like the United Nations are front and central in these missions.

It seems to me that the government could have done more to ensure that the United Nations was in control of this particular operation. I would like the parliamentary secretary to explain exactly why this was not done and what efforts will be made in the future.

Mr. Boyer: I did not refer to any nuances in the speech of the hon. member for Northumberland. I said I was concentrating on the broad lines of what is happening in historical patterns and that I did not seek to enter into a debate as to the chronology of certain events or the timing of the debate within Parliament. However, I welcome the question of the member from Winnipeg. He and I studied questions of international relations when we were both students at Carleton University, it seems just the other day. In fact, it was in the mid–60s.

I want to pick up on this point about the current initiative of Canada in relation to the United Nations. First, the Prime Minister, in his discussions with the President of the United States as this matter developed during August, played an important role in driving home the point to the American government that any action they took in the region ought not to be a unilateral American initiative but rather ought to be a United Nations enterprise. I think this is something that has not been known generally, but it is a fact that this was a very important effort and those of us who recognize how the United States responds in international crises would detect over the long view of history a tendency to go in alone and deal with the situation according to American interests.

The Prime Minister, and I say this very proudly, displayed a good use of his good relations with the American president in urging that this become a United Nations initiative.

I would also draw to the attention of the member from Winnipeg, in case he was not here to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs speaking on September 24 in the House, a quote from page 13246 of Hansard:

> We have encouraged our close allies, we have encouraged others, and we have used our influence and our position on the Security Council to ensure that the action that proceeds is action that is within the mandate of the United Nations and, indeed, that the mandate given by the United Nations expands to take account of the circumstances as they develop in the region. We are working very hard to have United Nations' auspices respected.

That was a statement in the House on Monday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Further in reply to the member, our Minister of National Defence also said in the House of Commons on Monday that both the Departments of National Defence and External Affairs, and I quote from page 13261 of Hansard:

> —are working toward and imploring the United Nations to put a blue flag over the whole of the multinational effort.

Certainly Canada wants this to be and be seen as a United Nations effort. That is the whole thrust of Canadian foreign policy. It is consistent with the policy of previous governments and I am sure will be the policy of future governments of our country. We were there at the creation of the United Nations. We are there now at this time of testing for the United Nations. We want to see this continue under the blue flag and with the blue beret of the United Nations in this area.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to pick up on the last point with which the parliamentary secretary dealt with respect to the assurance that Canada is playing an active role at the Security Council in an attempt to bring this operation in the Middle East under effective United Nations command.

I know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that he was urging the United States not to take unilateral military action in the region but rather to ensure that any additional moves that are taken are within the context of United Nations.

Given the fact that the subamendment which my colleague, the leader of the New Democratic Party, moved urges this House to agree "that Canada work at the Security Council to seek assurances that no country will undertake offensive military operations against Iraq unless they are under UN command and explicitly authorized by the Security Council".

I would hope, given the assurance of the parliamentary secretary, that in fact he would be prepared to indicate that he and his colleagues are prepared to support this subamendment since this is precisely what has been indicated as the government position at the United Nations.

I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether, indeed, he does support the thrust of the sub-amendment because, as I say, it indicates that Canada would work toward this as an objective.

Second, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary the same question I asked the member for Northumberland. I know he will not give us a Mackenzie King answer because he has just condemned that. What is the position of the Government of Canada with respect to a longer term regional resolution of the very serious questions concerning the situation of the Palestinians in the Middle East? Does his government support the convening of an international conference with the participation of all affected parties in the region, including the Palestine Liberation Organization? If so, is he prepared to make a commitment that Canada will work toward achieving this objective?

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway on his recent appointment to the position as External Affairs critic for his party and answer both his questions, dealing with the last one about a conference first.

Yes, we would support the holding of a conference in the region to bring the outstanding issues to some resolution. We think it is important that the representation of those attending such a conference be equitable. We think that the agenda for the conference ought to be clearly defined in advance of the meeting taking place so that there can be a fairly specific indication of the issues to be dealt with and the approach to them.

As to the timing of it, this would obviously be determined by the judgment of a number of players in the region, a number of countries and the United Nations, as to what would be the appropriate time to get this under way. Speaking for the Government of Canada, it is our view that the earliest possible opportunity should be seized for this.

The situation with which we are preoccupied involves primarily a military confrontation, but Canada has never pursued its role as a peacekeeper simply in one dimension. We have sought, apart from any military role, the two other avenues of diplomatic initiatives and overseas financial assistance and development programs and so on. On the diplomatic side Canada is quite open and would be supportive as to how this could be done. I think that is a clear statement of the government's policy.

With respect to the resolution that is before the House and the New Democratic Party's subamendment to it, I agree with the NDP critic that the general spirit of what is there is consistent with what I have been saying. I recognize the sometimes devious nature of the hon. member in trying to deal with parliamentary points. Everyone understands that when resolutions are drafted and amendments proposed to them, there is some effort to catch members in an awkward position where they may have to vote against their own views or the policy of their party. This is something that is understood as parliamentary games. Consistent with what I said to the hon. member for Northumberland, I do not want to deal with it on that level. I am trying to look at Canada as a peacekeeping country and where we can go in the broad terms of the foreign policy of our country in dealing with this.

To complete, in answer to his question—and it is really further as well to the hon. member from Winnipeg—what kind of role and what kind of say Canada has in a situation like this directly depends on how prepared we are to be there, contributing. Unless we have Canadian forces in the situation, we cannot expect to have a voice in the situation.

Canada is respected internationally because in the past we have been present and accounted for. In the past when Canadians have had to make sacrifices to be part of some effort internationally, to respect peace and international law, those sacrifices and the blood that has been spilled by Canadians are the price for us having a voice and respect internationally today.

• (1220)

It is not easy, but it is in fact the reality with which we are dealing. I think that is an important element in this.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in the debate on this very important question, and specifically on the government's motion.

[Translation]

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to stress that the New Democratic Party fully supports the condemnation of the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, as well as the rest of the resolution which states, for example, that "encouraged by the unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of the legitimate government of Kuwait," the House affirms "unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the Unites Nations Security Council".

Of course we support these principles set out in the motion, as well as "all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2".

Mr. Speaker, the problem we have is with the part following that. The part about supporting without restriction "the dispatch of members of the Canadian Forces to take part in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula". That specific part is the one we have a big problem with. The government of Canada always took the position that collective action under the United Nations, as integral part of our foreign policy, is the best way to ensure lasting international peace and security.

However, Mr. Speaker, recent decisions made by the Conservative government in response to the Gulf Crisis take us far away from this basic Canadian foreign policy principle that a great many Canadians agree with.

[English]

As I said, I want to make it very clear that we join in the unreserved condemnation of the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. We fully support the United Nations resolutions which have been adopted to respond to this aggression on the part of Saddam Hussein.

As well, I want to note that Canada's response has not been in the traditions of this country. Indeed, that started with the failure of the government to recall Parliament to allow parliamentarians to debate this very important decision to send troops into the Middle East to the gulf at the earliest possible opportunity.

During Question Period on Monday, I reminded the House of the fact that in August 1988, when the government sent peacekeeping troops to the Iran-Iraq border following the cessation of hostilities on that border, that the then Minister of National Defence indicated: "When such a major new undertaking is given, I have a moral responsibility to report to the people's representatives to ask for their support."

That moral responsibility has been completely abdicated by the government. We can certainly contrast this, as other members have pointed out, with a decision to recall Parliament in August of 1987 to deal with 174 refugees arriving on the shores of Nova Scotia. There was no hesitation to recall Parliament then.

Indeed, many other jurisdictions and Parliaments were recalled by their governments, including the British Parliament, to deal with this crisis in the Middle East. We condemn the failure of the government to recall Parliament at the earliest possible occasion to ensure that we would have an opportunity to speak and that our voices might be heard before the decision was finally made to send our troops into the Middle East. We recognize very clearly that this is simply a continuation of the old manipulative style of politics that we have seen too frequently from the government.

This was the first opportunity, following the end of the Cold War, for Parliament to debate on an early occasion what our response might be in this very serious issue of the crisis in the Middle East. I suggest that the government failed this first test of foreign policy.

I would note as well that our military responsible was not made pursuant to any United Nations request or, indeed, under United Nations command. We recall that the day after of the invasion the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Canada would not be involved militarily in the gulf crisis. A couple of days later, the Prime Minister met with President George Bush. Four days later, before any United Nations resolution had been adopted, he announced, that Canada would be sending three ships to the Middle East.

It was not until two weeks later that United Nations Resolution 665 was adopted which authorized enforcement action. It had the very limited purposes of enforcing the sanctions agreed upon by the United Nations.

There is no question that current United Nations resolutions do not in any way authorize the massive military build-up which has occurred in that region. There is no UN command structure. There is no over all UN co-ordination of military activities in the region.

There was an alternative. Canada could have played a role in leading the world, along with like-minded nations, in ensuring that this operation did come under effective United Nations command and co-ordination. There are mechanisms in the United Nations Charter, under Article 42 and other articles, to ensure that the United Nations would be in charge.

As well, there is the military staff committee of the United Nations. This a body which admittedly has not been active over the years, but this could have been an opportunity for the military staff committee to play an important and effective role in ensuring military co-ordination of this operation.

We must also note—and many Canadians have expressed concern about this—the hypocrisy which has too often characterized the American response to these questions. For example, the Americans are now wrapping themselves in the United Nations flag. We welcome the United Nations role that has been played, but it was just a very short time ago that the deputy representative of the Americans at the United Nations was saying that he looked forward to the United Nations leaving New York. He said he would bid a fond farewell as it sailed off into the sunset. As well, we know the Americans are behind in their contributions to the United Nations by some $750 million. It is interesting to note this new-found support for the United Nations, and it is one that we welcome, but it is certainly not coincidental that it comes at a time that it is in the American interest as well.

I would have hoped that the Americans would have called for the enforcement of other United Nations resolutions affecting that region as well, including Resolution 242. We have heard nothing from the Americans calling for effective enforcement of United Nations Resolution 242 which calls for Israeli withdrawal from the occupied territories in that region as well. A double standard has been in force for some time.

Where was the effective international action when Iraq invaded Iran in 1980? Where were the sanctions? Where was the world condemnation at that point? Where were the sanctions and the effective international action by Britain the United States against South Africa which occupied Namibia for over 40 years? Where was the effective international action following the Iraqi gassing of Kurds resulting in thousands of deaths in March 1988? Where was the condemnation of American aggression in areas such as Grenada, Libya and Panama? Mr. Speaker, there has been a double standard and I think that we must point that out in the response of the world to this crisis.

As well, it is important to note that the nature of our involvement in the peacekeeping operation has changed substantially since the initial debate took place on this question. When troops were first deployed to the region on August 10, Commodore Ken Summers, who was one of the military commanders, stated that Canadian ships and the helicopters they carry would be operating beyond the range of Iraqi missiles and aircraft in the Gulf of Oman. At some point that mission was changed Now we have our ships and their personnel and troops going right into the heart of the Persian Gulf. Of course, they need air cover. That is why a squadron of CF-18s has been sent.

We must ask ourselves, why have they been sent, not just to the Gulf of Oman, but right into the heart of the Persian Gulf? Who made that decision? Why was it made and who is, effectively, commanding our troops in the region at this time? What happens if the Americans decide to launch unilateral military action against Iraq or, indeed, if another jurisdiction such as Israel decided to launch a pre-emptive strike, the kind that has been suggested, for example, by Henry Kissinger or, a surgical strike as he called it, on Iraq. The potential consequences for our troops in that region could be absolutely devastating. Yet there is no effective United Nations command.

As well, I would note that unfortunately the peace dividend, which so many of us have been looking forward to, resulting from the end of cold war hostilities, may be squandered as a result of this new action. Unfortunately, we know that the arms merchants are always looking for new areas to sell their wares. Indeed, the arms merchants were active in supplying Iraq for many years. Of course, George Bush has already indicated that Operation Desert Shield is going to be used as an excuse to increase substantially his military budget and seek support for funding for Star Wars and other military build-up.

Canada's longstanding reputation for peacekeeping is exemplified by our involvement in UNIIMOG, the United Nations peacekeeping activity on the Iran-Iraq border in 1980, which is continued, risks being diminished by our military response to this crisis in response to American requests and not under UN supervision. I suggest that there was a different way that Canada could have at the outset offered to be available for a peacekeeping role when needed. We could have offered substantially increased resources to assist in the repatriation of refugees in that area.

We know the devastating plight of tens of thousands of refugees who are streaming out of Kuwait, people from Sri Lanka, Pakistan, the Philippines and other countries. We know the impact that this is having on those people and on their families as well that they were supporting through the money that they sent home. We know that this is having a very serious impact on the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza who were supported, as some 40 per cent of their income came from remittances from Palestinians working in Kuwait.

Canada has offered resources. I welcome the commitment of the government of $75 million in resources to assist those states that are particularly hard hit, but much more could and should be done.

As well, we must assess the impact of this crisis on prairie grain farmers. They may very well need additional compensation. That is something that we are going to have to look at carefully. I know that my colleague, the hon. member for Humboldt—Lake Centre, has addressed and will continue to address this issue on behalf of prairie farmers. In the year leading up to June 30, 1990, Iraq was in fact Canada's largest customer for wheat, at 721,000 tonnes.

As my leader indicated, we want to pay tribute to the troops who are in the region under very, very difficult conditions, to the embassy staff who have worked so hard, again under unprecedented difficulty. We want to express particularly our concern for the Canadians who are still in the region and for their families at home who are obviously suffering a great deal from this situation. Where do we go at this point? What are our recommendations to the government at this point? First of all, as our subamendment indicates, we believe very strongly that Canada should be playing a leadership role within the context of the Security Council to ensure that this operation comes under United Nations command and United Nations co-ordination to ensure that in fact there is not unilateral military action taken by any state, whether it be the United States or elsewhere.

We must note as well that of course there are other agendas in this debate. We have seen oil companies in too many instances making windfall profits. I would suggest that the government look at the possibility of a windfall profit tax. Why should the oil companies be able to profit from this crisis? Why not ensure that those excess profits are taxed and perhaps put them into a fund to assist the refugees in the region. We know that the Americans do have strategic interests in the region. They want to ensure a continued supply of cheap oil. They have wanted for some time to establish a military base in Saudi Arabia.

I think we have to ask, among many questions that must be asked, what concrete evidence was there to suggest that in fact the massive American build-up in Saudi Arabia was necessary to in fact deter a possible attack on Saudi Arabia. We are looking at concrete evidence. What was the concrete evidence suggesting that such an attack on Saudi Arabia may have been imminent?

We should give sanctions an opportunity to work effectively. They are going to have a serious impact on the Hussein regime. Iraq stands to lose over $19 billion per year. They rely on imports for 80 per cent of their basic materials. They are dependent on the sale of oil for over 95 per cent of their export earnings. We suggest that our ships should go no further, should have gone no further because I believe they have passed the Straits of Hormuz now or they are in the process of doing that. They should have gone no further than the Gulf of Oman. We should have invited United Nations observers on to our ships. We should have, again, played a key leadership role in ensuring that all foreign armed forces in the area come under effective United Nations command.

We should be doing far more to assist those countries that are particularly hard it. We heard from the President of Zimbabwe yesterday. Sixty per cent of their oil comes from Kuwait. There are other countries as well that have co-operated in sanctions that are hurt particularly hard. I am thinking of Egypt, Jordan, Turkey and others such as Romania which have played an effective and important role in enforcing these sanctions. I hope that Canada together with other countries can in fact assist in reducing the hardship.

Mr. Speaker, I know that I just have a couple of minutes left and I want to close by talking about the longer term approach that Canada might take in resolving this crisis. First of all, as I say, we did have an option. We had an option to operate within the framework of the United Nations, to recall Parliament early and that was not done. Instead, we are seen, I fear, by too many countries as having responded, whether it be to George Bush, Secretary of State Baker or to NATO, instead of within a comprehensive and clear United Nations framework.

I hope that the subamendment which we propose with respect to an assurance that no country will undertake offensive military operations against Iraq unless they are under United Nations command and explicitly authorized by a resolution of the Security Council that will be adopted that will bring about enhanced support for the repatriation of refugees in the area as well as those countries and areas that have suffered, including the occupied West Bank and Gaza and, finally, that there will be effective leadership in reaching a long-term solution that includes ending the possibility of chemical or nuclear warfare in that region. That has got to be done.

We are are talking about all states in the region, Iraq quite clearly, Libya, Israel, other states. There must be effective international assurances controlling the flow of conventional arms. We have been dumping arms into that region for years. We must move toward a just distribution of wealth, respect for human rights and democracy. Many of the nations in this region have been condemned for serious breaches of human rights. We must reduce western dependence on fossil fuels and promote conservation and alternative energy sources. Of course, we must convene an international conference which would include all parties affected, including the Palestine Liberation Organization, to facilitate the right of Palestinians to long overdue justice and self-determination.

I would hope we can still, even at this late date, change our policy as a nation, show effective leadership within the context of the United Nations and make all Canadians proud of our re-establishment of that traditionally respected role of leadership and not be seen, regrettably, to once again be following American leadership as opposed to international leadership in world affairs.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment or two.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Burnaby-Kingsway, who is the NDP critic, has singled out a number of points in his exhaustive remarks, and in response I should like to raise just one or two points. My first point has to do with the chronology of events.

[English]

The member was condemning Canada and urging a change of our policy because of, as he put it, following the United States. Canada was not following the United States. Canada was consistent with our traditional policy which I would argue is consistent. Just for the record, when the New Democratic critic said that our action was taken before these resolutions of the United Nations, I had already read into the record this morning, and I will repeat, that it was the August 2 UN resolution which condemned the invasion of Kuwait. It was the August 6 UN resolution which instituted sanctions against Iraq and occupied Kuwait. It was August 9 which condemned the annexation of Kuwait by Iraq. It was August 10 when Prime Minister Mulroney announced the intention of the Government of Canada to respond to this crisis by deploying the three ships, the Athabaskan, Terra Nova and Protecteur to the region, and announcing at that time that with the understanding that it would take time to prepare the ships to sail and time additionally to arrive there that there would be opportunity for the debate which we have been having here since Monday on this issue.

I think that it is important that the condemnation that is being made of our government should at least try to be factually based. The government does not apologize for the swiftness of the response to this crisis. The fact is that efforts at the United Nations, and generally through the international community, were moving in tandem. I hope, although he only confined himself to discussing future possibilities in the last several moments of his speech, he could in his response pick up, for example, the point I was outlining about having a United Nations standing peacekeeping force, some of these ideas. Let us, on something as important to this country and this world as this current crisis in the gulf, try to stop scoring parliamentary points and look at the broad outlines of what is possible for future Canadian policy.

I would welcome the response of the critic for the New Democratic Party on some of these future actions because I know in bringing to this subject his concerns, he will want, as all of us will, to look ahead to the future and try and see beyond an attitude about the Americans or the Soviets or anyone else in the region, that we look here at what we are doing as an independent country, a charter member of the United Nations, seeking, in a difficult circumstance that to date is being well managed, to find a positive role to ensure that the peace that is tenuous but is still holding can in fact be held.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the hon. member's question. I am sure that it was inadvertent but, of course, in his chronology he overlooked a very fundamental point. While the resolutions to which he referred which were adopted by the Security Council prior to August 10 in fact did impose sanctions, it was not until August 25 that the Security Council adopted a resolution which in fact authorized the use of minimal force to enforce those sanctions.

It was the meeting of the Prime Minister with the President of the United States, George Bush, on August 6, followed by a meeting of the NATO countries on August 10 in Brussels, which led to the decision to send troops. That decision was not just pursuant to the United Nations—and indeed it was not pursuant at that point to any United Nations resolution, because it was not until two weeks later that the United Nations authorized that; fortunately most other countries that have troops in the region now did in fact wait for the United Nations—but rather it was for the second mandate.

It is often overlooked that there are two different mandates that this government is operating under. One is purportedly under the United Nations, and indeed at this point under the United Nations, but the second is this vague mandate of deterring aggression which is completely separate from the United Nations mandate. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary would recognize that and recognize that as of August 10 there was no United Nations resolution authorizing the use of force or troops to enforce sanctions.

The hon. member suggests that we look to the future and to what role the United Nations might play effectively. I agree completely with him. I certainly welcome the suggestion of a United Nations peacekeeping force. I think that is a very positive suggestion and one that I hope Canada is actively pursuing in the Security Council.

However, I remind the hon. member—and I would welcome his comments on the point—that there exists now a body under the framework of the United Nations, and I am speaking of the military staff committee, which is in a position to move and to co-ordinate, particularly under articles 42 and 43 of the charter, military action by the United Nations. Is Canada actively pursuing this option within the framework of the United Nations as well at this time?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the hon. member's speech. I congratulate him at the outset on being made external affairs critic for his party. I understand he has been relieved of his responsibilities as justice critic and is now taking on the onerous responsibilities as external affairs critic. I may say that his speech sounded rather like that given by a Secretary of State for External Affairs, because it was very difficult to tell what the position of the party was having listened to the speech.

Secretaries of State for External Affairs are known for their obfuscation and coverup of clear positions, because they do not want to make it appear that anything they are doing is too dramatic. I can recall even some Liberal Secretaries of State for External Affairs who were known for that. The Hon. Paul Martin when he was a member of the House—and I am not referring to the present member for LaSalle—Émard; I am talking about the former member for Essex East—was well known for the statements he made.

I recall a comment made by some persons who were sitting in the gallery of this House. They were from the United States and unfamiliar with the workings of the Canadian Parliament. They thought they had been in a church when they left having listened to a speech given by the former member for Essex East. The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. Do I have the constituency correct? He reminded me of the same when he was giving his speech a moment ago.

An hon. member: Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Milliken: Burnaby—Kingsway, I am sorry. I did not mean to accuse the other hon. member of the same party of making such a pious speech.

I was surprised at the suggestions in his speech that somehow Canada was going to be involved in offensive military operations against Iraq. It is not the expectation here that the forces there are going to used for offensive military purposes. It is designed to bring to an end to the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq which has so outraged world public opinion. What I could not understand from the hon. member is—perhaps I am simplifying things—that I think he said he supports the presence of the troops there nowthat they are under some kind of United Nations mandate. He did not before because they weren't, which I think is clear, and we agree with him in that respect. He seems to be saying that he does not want the troops to be involved in offensive operations, which we would agree with. We do not particularly want offensive operations there either.

What are they supposed to do? Is he saying that they should withdraw if offensive operations get under way? Is he saying that if there are offensive operations they are to be managed by the United Nations, which I think he was saying? Is he saying that somehow the United States which has the bulk of the troops there should manage any offensive operation under United Nations auspices? Is he saying that the United Nations should appoint somebody else and operate offensively, or is he saying the United Nations should appoint somebody to operate the entire force there in a defensive way?

I do not know what he is saying. I found it very difficult to follow that part of his speech. I wonder if he could clarify what role it is he expects the Canadians forces there to fulfil, or does he want the Canadian forces to withdraw?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time for questions and comments has expired, but do I have unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to reply to the question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Clancy: Absolutely.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has accused me of being somewhat obfuscatory in my speech, I must say that was the most bizarre, meandering, obfuscatory question I have ever been posed.

Our position in respect of the use of offensive military action is very clear, and certainly I will be pleased to reiterate what that position is. Our troops that have been dispatched should clearly only be operating under the auspices of United Nations resolution 665 for the purpose of enforcing sanctions.

They should go no farther than the Gulf of Oman. I made that clear. Perhaps the hon. member was involved in researching some arcane procedural point at that particular part of my speech, but our troops should go no farther than the Gulf of Oman. They should be there, as I say, for the purpose of enforcing that United Nations resolution.

We have said as well, quite clearly, that there should be no offensive military action taken by any state in the region without United Nations sanction, explicit sanction by the Security Council, and that that should be under effective United Nations command.

That is the subamendment which we have tabled. Perhaps the hon. member has not discovered the Order Paper yet, but if he would read the Order Paper he would find our position very clearly set out in the subamendment.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words, I suspect very brief words, with respect to the motion before the House which is condemning the action and the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, supporting Canada's actions at the United Nations and the resolutions by the Security Council, and supporting the dispatch of Canadian forces to the Arabian peninsula.

This is a very severe crisis not only for our country but for the entire world. It is a very frightening one with all of the implications it brings with it not only as a result of this unprovoked invasion by Iraq and the threat of Iraq's forces going farther than into Kuwait but carrying on into Saudi Arabia and perhaps even beyond that, but it brings with it as well all the potential horrors of possible chemical warfare. Certainly it would appear to be a long, drawn-out conflict, a long, drawn-out blockade with the efforts to impose sanctions, whether by sea, by air or over land.

Obviously it is going to have very severe economic effects on countries around the world, particularly on some of the countries in eastern Europe which are now struggling to get on their feet after the forces that have been enveloping them recently have loosened their bonds. Communism seems to be disappearing and democracy and a free market system seems to be taking place. Obviously all of this is going to impact on those countries very severely, particularly countries like Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia.

However, with all this great crisis, it seems to me there are some very encouraging bright spots in the whole situation. There are at least three as far as I am concerned. The first of those is the fact that nations around the world have united and come together in an effort to deal with this unprecedented and unprovoked aggression by Iraq. We now have something like 26 nations involved in this process. I think that is extremely encouraging. It is not just a process involving one or two. It is not a process involving North American nations or NATO nations alone. A vast number of nations around the world are now joining together to resist this aggression.

Second, another very bright light is that for the first time that I can certainly remember—and I suspect the first time that most of us can remember—the United States and the U.S.S.R are both on the same side. They are both taking the same position. They are both co-operating and both doing it in a spirit aimed at trying to promote some sort of world peace and order in opposition to unprovoked aggression.

Third, as far as I am concerned the brightest light of all is the fact that this is taking place under the United Nations. Albeit, notwithstanding the comments of my hon. friend and other members in this House, this is an action which does involve the United Nations. It is sanctioned by the United Nations and is proceeding as a United Nations operation.

In my view it is part of a developing process that I hope will go to the ultimate extent of providing some sort of world order and policing body, which will be able to intervene very quickly, more quickly than we have been able to do so in this situation where we are confronted with unprovoked aggression and similar situations such as we have here now.

With respect to the United Nations, I think it is important for all of us to realize that the United Nations has been a very—I hesitate to use the word useless—ineffective body in the last few years and for a long time. When it was born during and at the end of the Second World War, it was born with a feeling that here was the great hope for the world, that suddenly we would have some form of world government developing in which we could maintain some sort of world order and rule of law. That did not materialize.

It is like all institutions and, if we look at our own British parliamentary system, that has been an evolutionary process that has taken place over hundreds and hundreds of years. I suspect that the evolution is still taking place. Each step along the way is another step which reinforces and makes it more difficult to go back to the things we have had before. I see this, in that light, as an extremely positive step leading toward something that will be of benefit not only to Canadians but to all the citizens of the world.

I believe this is something that is consistent with positions that Canada has taken in the past. It is true that some of them were positions of peacekeeping roles to maintain order along a green line in Cyprus or some sort of line of cease fire, truce, or whatever. However, there was also the precedent of the Korean War situation in which Canada participated under the United Nations flag in a very positive way.

All these things are developmental stages toward a very effective United Nations. I think that is an extremely bright spot and one that I welcome.

I have heard a great many comments, concerns, and criticisms about the way this situation has been developing. I hope I have a minute or two to comment on some of those.

The first is that in some way this is a double standard because the United Nations and other nations around the world did not react to other events, other unprovoked aggression, in a similar fashion in the past. That may be very true, but we have to start somewhere. Surely we do not say that this is horrible because we are starting now to react to a situation. We also did not have the United Nations and the U.S.S.R. acting together in the past either. Now we do have. Again, this is part of an evolutionary process.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): After Question Period the hon. minister will have 13 minutes left in his debate, plus the 10-minute question and comment period. For the benefit of the listening public who would like to hear him, it will be after three o'clock.

It being one o'clock, I do not leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE GREAT MEDICINE WHEEL

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, there is an Indian myth about a tribe, starving, unable to track the mighty buffalo herds. Two children brought the hunters robes made of coyote skins, begging that they wear them. Some hunters laughed, some were angry with the children's interference.

However, two elderly, wise members of the tribe agreed to put on the robes and in doing so, found they had the vision of the coyote and were able to direct their people to the buffalo.

Mr. Speaker, many stories of The Great Medicine Wheel teach an important lesson—that to live in harmony and well-being we must see with the eyes of others, hear with the ears of others and speak with the tongue of others.

The challenge now is for all hon. members of this place to see and hear and thereby better understand the commitment of Canada's first people.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, prairie grain producers face historically low prices owing to reduced world demand and highly subsidized grain exports by the European Economic Community and the United States.

The result is that Canadian elevators and terminals are plugged and producers, through no fault of their own, cannot sell any grain. Their only source of cash is the advances which they obtain at the elevator on the strength of their farm stored grain. While producers have no opportunity to market their grain, they have, at the same time, borrowed to the hilt for chemicals, fuel and other inputs.

In the circumstances, I call on the Minister of Agriculture to waive, for this 1990-91 crop year, the interest requirement on at least the first $30,000 to $50,000 of cash advances per individual producer. This will provide some immediate cash flow for farmers who cannot afford to pay any more interest at this time.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, one lesson that the Oka imbroglio has taught us is that all Canadians must be treated with respect. That is what the First Nations demanded and that is what all of our ethnic communities want.

In respect of this point, I call upon the federal cabinet to listen to the voices of Afro-Canadians and review the CRTC decision of August 8, awarding the last available FM licence in Toronto to country music interests rather than to Milestone Communications Limited, a black-owned and operated firm which seeks to air black music and reflect black interests.

There are 400,000 Afro-Canadians in Toronto who desire, along with thousands of other Torontonians, to hear the entire range of African musical genius, including jazz, gospel, blues, soul, reggae, rap, and classical on Canadian rather than American airwaves. However, as Commissioner Keith Spicer pointed out, the CRTC decision broadcast a message that is out of tune with the multicultural reality of our country. The cabinet must send a different signal. Afro-Canadians and other Canadians are listening.

THE SENATE

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, with the appointed Liberal majority in the Senate intent on killing Bill C-62 many Canadians have already begun to ask, where do we go from here?

Killing the GST will not solve Canada's economic and structural problems, yet our Liberal colleagues offer no alternatives. Seemingly we can no longer expect them to do so. After all, to whom are these Liberal senators accountable? Certainly not the people of Canada. If they were, would they be taking this action, which amounts to no more than simply a partisan statement. If they were, would they not be worried about the costs and fiscal responsibility? Bill C-28, UI changes and the government restraint act are all very important bills passed by the elected House of Commons. They have been obstructed by the Liberal senators and failure of their passage would add $8.3 billion to the federal deficit.

This political opportunism must be stopped by responsible senators in the other place.

CANADA POST

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post continues its dictatorial ways as the corporation strips rural Canada of its postal services.

After October 15, 1990 rural P.E.I. will no longer enjoy Saturday mail delivery. This reverses Canada Post's 1982 position which acknowledged that the island was in a unique situation.

After October 30, many rural post offices will suffer severe reductions in business hours. The Richmond post office, for example, will be closed from 11.30 to 1.30, the busiest time of the day.

The elimination of Saturday rural mail delivery will cost Canada Post Corporation almost $200,000 per year in net revenues which is contrary to their government mandate, force newspapers to set up their own rural distribution routes, thus dramatically increasing subscription costs and generally limit mail service to rural residents of P.E.I.

The reduction of operating hours of rural post offices will reduce their revenue generating capacity, thereby ensuring that they will not be able to operate economically. This will give Canada Post an excuse to close these post offices.

Mr. Speaker, I call upon the government to summon Canada Post before the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations to account for their actions.

THE SENATE

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, on January 18, 1965, a certain Jean Chrétien said the Senate should be either abolished or radically reformed. Mr. Speaker, history has shown that for more than 20 years, this great Liberal democrat did not bother to abolish or reform anything whatsoever. They were far too dependent on the system, Mr. Speaker.

On June 23 this year, Jean Chrétien, by killing Meech Lake, killed the first real attempt at Senate reform.

Today, Mr. Chrétien tells us he wants to reform the Senate by abusing its powers and trying to kill the GST. This is a good example of what Liberals mean by democracy, Mr. Speaker.

On April 2 this year, Mr. Chrétien kept saying that to kill the GST, people should be told where the government was going to raise the $25 billion. The people are still waiting, Mr. Speaker.

The question that arises today, when we look at the unwarranted action being taken by the Senate, is this: Do we or don't we have a democracy? And it is high time we answered that question.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, once again we have seen women become victims of the Canadian justice system as well as victims of violence. The judge and prosecution in a sexual assault trial allowed two years of delays so that a police officer who had drugged and sexually assaulted a 19-year old police cadet would get his pension. The officer pleaded guilty after 15 court appearances and can now collect $130,000.

Two Ontario crown attorneys have said judges are biased against women in sexual assault cases after a judge handed a suspended sentence to a man who had sexually assaulted a 13-year old girl.

If the government believes as I do, that this is completely unacceptable, it must negotiate with the provinces to ensure that judges receive mandatory education on the issues of violence against women and on women's equality.

It must ensure that all Canadian judges receive this training as they are appointed to the bench and judges who are already there must also receive this training.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, like most other Canadians I have watched with strong feelings the face-to-face confrontation between the army and the Mohawk warriors at Oka.

Considering the incredible tensions and passions, the presence of so many weapons on both sides, the incredible pressures on all involved, and the army of media throughout the situation, I am amazed and relieved that those involved were able to show tremendous restraint and avoided using those arms which could only have resulted in death and injury. In my view the army handled this unprecedented situation in the best possible manner under strained circumstances.

I want to thank Chief Lawrence Paul of the Millbrook First Nations for helping me understand the concerns of the natives throughout the situation. I look forward to working with the chief as we address the outstanding issues in the future.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I was appalled by last night's chaotic end to the Oka stand-off. Was it really necessary for the army to fix their bayonets? Was it really necessary to shove women and children to the ground? Those scenes were disgraceful.

This crisis has focused national and international attention on aboriginal issues. The government must now deal with those issues quickly, honestly, and fairly. The Minister of Indian Affairs has said that once the guns were down, the disputed land would be turned over to the Mohawk people of Kanesatake. We expect this to happen without delay.

We also expect real action on the Prime Minister's new aboriginal agenda. The agenda is long on promises, and short on specifics.

Fundamental changes to current policies are needed. To show its goodwill the government should immediately announce that it will no longer require aboriginal people to extinguish their rights in claims negotiations.

BILL C-21

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, today I received a fax from the Deputy Premier and Minister responsible for Intergovernmental Affairs of the Province of New Brunswick, Aldea Landry. Mrs. Landry is very concerned about the difficulty workers in

New Brunswick are facing because of the failure of the Liberal dominated Senate to pass Bill C–21, the UI bill.

• (1410)

Mrs. Landry has targeted the real problem, the Liberal majority in the Senate.

I urge the Prime Minister to resolve this impasse, and to appoint the eight senators needed to do the job. Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party no longer respects democracy.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, this weekend the Prime Minister will go to New York to co–chair the World Summit for Children.

While there, it is expected that he will reaffirm Canada's commitment to ratify the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, obliging Canada to comply with the terms of the Convention. Unfortunately, the sad truth is that the government's record on children's rights is a far cry from the standards set out by the articles in the convention.

Article 18(2) requires a government to render appropriate child care services and facilities for the children of working parents. What has been the Tory response to this problem? After six years of promises, this government has failed to establish a long–awaited and much–needed national child care program.

Article 27 requires a government to "recognize the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for a child's physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development".

As we see the rapidly increasing numbers of food bank users in this country, an estimated 40 per cent of them are children. Tens of thousands of Canadian children are dependent on food banks due to the Tory attack on universality, the clawback on family allowances, and the capping of the Canada Assistance Plan.

These are only two of many areas in which this Conservative government has failed Canada's children. Before the Prime Minister trots off to the world arena to lecture to world leaders on giving priority to children, he should make sure his own house is in order.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, the crisis that has taken place in Oka has had a ripple effect in my riding of Cochrane—Superior. As a result, three blockades were erected on CN and CP rail lines thereby halting all transportation of passengers and goods.

I am pleased to say that although the blockades were dismantled peacefully, on the other hand, I am concerned about the negative impact it had on the economy, the industry, the rail workers and the travellers.

Given the fact that only 42 out of 550 land claims have been settled in the past 18 years, it will be well into the next century before these claims are settled.

Furthermore, there have been three constitutional conferences which have failed to officially recognize the aboriginal people of Canada as a founding nation of this country. During the Meech Lake debate, the Prime Minister had promised to discuss aboriginal issues, which he failed to do. History will show how serious he was when he made his declaration on September 25, 1990.

FORESTRY

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it is autumn, young people are back in school, MPs are back in Parliament and Nova Scotia's Christmas tree growers are about to begin this year's harvest in earnest.

This weekend, the Lunenburg Christmas Tree Producers Association celebrate their 24th annual meeting and conference. We wish them well.

The Christmas tree industry yields some $70 million to Canadians and Lunenburg County, Canada's unquestioned Christmas tree capital, exports in excess of one million trees a year. These exports mean jobs for Canadians.

Soon the signs of Christmas will appear. I urge all Canadians and indeed all members to support Canada's Christmas tree industry this year by having a real Christmas tree.

Real Christmas trees are beautiful, environmentally friendly and one of Canada's great renewable resources.

LABOUR DISPUTES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I bring to the attention of the House the disruption of the ferry service between St. Barbe in the riding of my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte and Blanc Sablon in the riding of Manicouagan as a result of a strike that has gone on all summer.

This ferry is the only link between the island of Newfoundland and southern Labrador. The disruption of the service at the height of the tourist season and in the midst of a fishery already in crisis has been devastating for both businesses and individuals.

This labour dispute must be resolved now and similar disruptions prevented in future in what I believe is an essential service. My colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte joins me in calling on the government to immediately bring labour and management to the table for a solution to the problem.

As well, the government should make special assistance available to those in tourism and the fishery who were crippled by the disruption of the service.

Finally, steps must be taken to deal with labour disputes in a manner that will not disrupt what, in effect, is a vital and essential service.

ORAL QUESTIONS

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister.

Today, for the first time in our history, the Queen has created eight additional Senate seats, acting on the advice of the Prime Minister and his Cabinet.

Why did the Prime Minister give that advice to the Queen, rather than advising the Minister of Finance to withdraw the GST, the most unpopular tax in Canadian history, presented by the most unpopular government in Canadian history?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition has been in this place for a long time and has been a very ardent student of parliamentary democracy. He knows very well that it is the obligation and, in fact, the duty of the duly elected Government of Canada to proceed with its legislative program and, indeed, to pass its legislative measures and particularly budgetary measures.

I think the hon. member recognizes that if the Senate were allowed to kill budgetary measures or block budgetary measures as it has and as it proposes to do so in the future, it would literally strangle the parliamentary process that we have and that we all respect and attempt to uphold. It is for that reason that these extraordinary actions had to be taken.

I simply remind the hon. member that the Senate has delayed three pieces of legislation currently before it, all of which have major financial implications: Bill C-21, the Unemployment Insurance bill which has been delayed for 10 months; Bill C-28, the large corporations tax which has been delayed for 9 months; and, Bill C-62 has been delayed for five months. We now have a motion before the Senate which states that the bill will not be proceeded with.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. leader's leader outside the House is on record as saying that he is going to kill the GST and there is no major financial bill that has ever been killed in the Senate before. That is why this unprecedented action is required.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE SENATE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the words of the Deputy Prime Minister sound rather hollow when he claims to be using undemocratic means to appoint unelected people to defend democracy. The words are hollow.

When our Constitution was repatriated in 1982, Canadians thought that they had a Constitution based in this country which would not be interpreted outside of Canada on the advice of the Prime Minister.

Right now a court in British Columbia is seized of the matter of the use of the clause in question of our Constitution. Why will the government not wait to appoint the eight additional senators until the British Columbia court has ruled on this matter? If this government is so concerned about the rule of law, why will it not refer the question itself to the Supreme Court of Canada today?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. Leader of the Opposition will want to re-read Article 26 of the Constitution of Canada which says:

> If at any Time on the Recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit to direct that Four or Eight Members be added to the Senate, the Governor General may by Summons to Four or Eight qualified Persons (as the Case may be), representing equally the Four Divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.

• (1420)

That is pretty clear. It has been upheld in terms of our own legal advisors, plus a number of outside legal advisors who have shared that same view.

If we are going to uphold the fundamental principles of parliamentary democracy, we cannot allow an unelected body to run roughshod over the will of the people of Canada, namely as represented in the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister talks about democracy. They are strange words when he tries to use this method of the Constitution to ram through a measure opposed by 85 per cent of the Canadian people—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): —and when the government trying to thwart the will of 85 per cent of the Canadian people has the support of the lowest number since polling began in the country 50 years ago.

[Translation]

Some hon. members: Hear! Hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister referred to a constitutional provision under which the Governor General may appoint eight additional senators. But, Mr. Speaker, Canadian courts never did rule on that provision!

I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister why is he not seeking to go before the courts and let them settle the matter instead of relying on private and secret legal advisers?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition should take some time to spend with his leader and his leader in the other house to talk some sense into them and to lay out the facts as to what really is the relevance of the meaning of Parliamentary democracy and the fact that they are taking unprecedented action by blocking a financial bill which is fundamental to the future of this country—a number of financial bills. If he prevailed upon both of those leaders, we would not have to take this unprecedented action. I challenge him to do it, even at this late date.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, a consititutional expert of the eminence of Eugene Forsey, today stated that, in fact, there was not a deadlock in the Senate, because there has not been a vote and there is no basis to invoke Article 26, which the Deputy Prime Minister has called upon.

Furthermore, before invoking such an article, the Governor General has the constitutional responsibility to consult widely, including consultation with the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Opposition in the House.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister how his Governor General could call—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the hon. member has some strong views and is putting a forceful question, but it is not appropriate to call into question the integrity or the position of the Queen's representative in Canada.

Ms. Copps: How could the Governor General advise the Queen specifically on a measure which has never been used in the history of Canada without having consulted widely in a way that his constitutional obligations require him to do?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Forsey has been clearly on record indicating that the deadlock has really occurred with respect to C–21, which is the unemployment insurance bill. We would not even have to consider Bill C–62 as well as C–28. People such as Mr. Dawson and other legal opinions and law officers of the Crown have clearly indicated that the interpretation that we have placed upon Section 26 is correct. I suspect that the Governor General would have sought outside legal advice as well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question directed to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Can he explain how there has been a deadlock in the Senate when there has not been a vote?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the intentions have been pretty clear. It has been enunciated—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised. Why does the hon. member not read the motion that is currently before the Senate which says that Bill C–62 should not be proceeded with further in the Senate?

Mr. Chrétien has said it should be defeated. Mr. MacEachen says it will be defeated. They have indicated that there is a blockage. We have to use every vehicle at our disposal to ensure that we have the legitimate right to pursue our legislative program and that is precisely what we are doing, even though it is not the most desirable course.

The hon. member could do her part by taking Mr. Chrétien aside and taking Mr. MacEachen aside and talking some sense in the interest of preserving our parliamentary democracy.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Like all Canadians, I am relieved that there have been no more deaths as a result of the Oka crisis and that we are now hopefully able to move on to another phase in dealing with aboriginal issues in the country. I, too, as I am sure everyone in the House and all Canadians, am very concerned about the loss of the young police officer's life as well.

There are many unanswered questions about what occurred at Kanesatake and Kahnawake this summer, questions about the role of the federal government, the provincial governments, the Sûreté du Québec, the army and the Mohawks. On Monday I asked the Prime Minister if he would consider holding a full public inquiry into all of the events that have occurred. He responded to me and I quote from page 13208 of Hansard:

> —the government will be more than pleased to take the kind of action suggested by my hon. friend.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Will he, on behalf of the government, today commit to a full and public inquiry on the events that occurred this summer at Kahnawake and Kanesatake?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians are certainly relieved that the warriors who were holding out in the treatment centre have laid down their arms, have been taken into custody and that now we can get on with dealing with the healing of the wounds and the legitimate aspirations and the obligations we owe to our aboriginal peoples.

In the context of the future, I would remind the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party there is a motion on the Order Paper, motion No. 17, which would refer all of these questions to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General. Therefore, if we vote on that motion we have the remedy she seeks.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs. Clearly what is needed is a full public inquiry so that all aspects can be heard. I would take it from the minister's comments that he is saying no to that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in his speech last Tuesday the Prime Minister committed himself to speeding up the native people land claim negotiation process. I am delighted, but good intentions and promises are no longer enough: native people have had too much of that as it is.

Here is my question to the minister: what specific long-term plan does he have in mind to speed up this land claim process throughout the country?

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in response to the preface to the hon. member's question, I would say there is no more public place than the Parliament of Canada and its committees in which to discuss and review these questions.

In regard to the acceleration of the means of disposing of comprehensive claims, we certainly do intend to make alterations to certain limitations, such as the six-claims limit, and to develop regionalized processes or province-wide processes to deal with the unique circumstances of a province, such as British Columbia. There has not been a settlement of claims in British Columbia, with the exception of two treaties, since the time it entered Confederation. The details will be forthcoming in the days ahead.

• (1430)

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Deputy Prime Minister. It is interesting to hear the Minister of Indian Affairs say that there is no more public place than Parliament. I agree. That is why we wanted Parliament recalled during the summer to discuss this.

The Prime Minister also said that he would promote self-government within the context of the Canadian Constitution for aboriginal people. My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is: what kind of constitutional process is proposed to be undertaken? Will his government support the entrenchment of self-government in the Canadian Constitution? What will be the plans to involve aboriginal people in that process?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister indicated that the evolution of self-government within the native communities of Canada will be enabled within the constitutional limitations that exist today and if, by some means, at a future day we can modify or amend those constitutional limits, we will have to wait until that time arrives. Meanwhile, we will work to fully accommodate the aspirations of aboriginal people to realize self-government within the present constitutional framework.

THE SENATE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister who did not answer the question asked by my colleague, how can there be a deadlock if there has been no vote.

The Queen is obliged to take the advice of the Prime Minister. The Queen is not obliged nor, unfortunately, does the Queen investigate the basis for that advice. The fact is there has been no vote on Bill C-21. There has been no vote on Bill C-28 and, most important, there has been no vote because of a Tory filibuster on the GST.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, why has the Prime Minister of Canada deliberately misled the Queen of Canada about paralysis in the Senate?

Mr. Speaker: I am not at all sure that that is an allegation that can go uncommented upon. I know the hon. member would not want to make the allegation that the Prime Minister or anybody else in this chamber had deliberately misled Her Majesty the Queen of Canada. I would ask the hon. member to delete that part of his preamble and question.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, taking your advice into consideration as I always do, why has the Prime Minister misled the Queen of Canada?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Beatty: The rats are back.

An hon. member: Next question.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member would want members to understand exactly what he means. I take it that what the hon. member is trying to say is that the information given to Her Majesty the Queen is, in the eyes of the hon. member, not all the information that ought to be there. If the hon. member would rise and confirm that that is his intention.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to confirm that there is no doubt in my mind, and that is what I meant, that the information given to the Queen was obviously incomplete.

Mr. Speaker: I am quick to point out to the hon. member, as I am sure Her Majesty the Queen would well know, being familiar with parliamentary matters, that of course is a question of debate.

Perhaps the government would like to answer.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will respond to the hon. member's question although the premise of his question is fundamentally flawed because, as he knows—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put a question; there has been the necessity of an intervention; the hon. member has co-operated; the minister is now rising to answer. If it is an important question, as I am sure it is, hon. members will, of course, want to hear the hon. minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, as I said before I was interrupted, the premise of the hon. member's question is fundamentally flawed. He should know, if he does not know, that C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act has been sent back to the Senate on three different occasions and so we can only assume that there were votes taken.

Mr. Harvard: Call a conference.

Mr. Mazankowski: It has been before the Senate for some 10 months. Bill C-28, which is a tax bill, has been before the Senate for nine months—

Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Misleading.

Mr. Mazankowski: Then, maybe perhaps Mr. Forsey is misleading Canadians too when he said on a program called CBC Newsworld on September 17, 1990, "Unquestionably, the provision", that is Section 26, "was put"—

Mr. Nunziata: Be honest.

Mr. Waddell: Why don't you quote him on Meech Lake.

Mr. Mazankowski: Let's get this on the record. "—the provision", which was Section 26 of the Constitution Act, "was put in there to look after deadlocks between two Houses—"

Ms. Copps: Deadlock.

Mr. Mazankowski: Well, just a minute, let me complete this. He goes on to say: "Well, there is a deadlock between the two Houses now".

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister should be current. He ought to know that Mr. Forsey said this morning he does not regard the situation that currently exists as a deadlock between both Houses of Parliament. Now, Mr. Speaker, C-21 has been stayed at the request of the government. The GST has not been voted on because of a government filibuster. Let me put this to the Deputy Prime Minister: don't name your senators, we will have votes on all those bills today.

Mr. Speaker: It may or may not have been a question. In any event, it was not put through the Chair. The government may wish to respond.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. I would like to get back to the question put earlier by the leader of the Opposition, a question I feel is absolutly vital. I wish the Deputy Prime Minister would explain why, considering that the question about certain circumstances that might, I repeat, might, allow the appointment of additional senators under Section 26 of the Constitution is being challenged before the British Columbia Court of Appeal. According to custom in this country, the government must await the court's decision. I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister why his government is not prepared to wait until the court has ruled on this matter, before asking the Governor General to appoint eight additional senators.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, very simply, because our legal advisers have indicated that the situation that we presently face warrants the invocation of Section 26. Professor William Dawson of the University of Western Ontario and former Senator Eugene Forsey have been quoted to this effect. Our own law officers of the Crown have indicated that and the hon. member should know, in reading Section 26 of the Constitution of Canada Act, it is pretty clear it does not suggest that you have to seek a legal opinion before you invoke it.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, whatever the Deputy Prime Minister may say, it is quite obvious that legal and constitutional opinions in this respect are very much divided on this issue.

Why are the Deputy Prime Minister and his government trying to draw the position of the Governor General into the political arena? Why does he absolutely want to politicize the Governor General's role at this time?

• (1440)

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. members and members of the Liberal Party are simply trying to divert the real issue. The real issue here is the supremacy of the elected House of Commons.

The hon. member, who is a distinguished House of Commons member, should be one of the first ones to stand up in defence of the House of Commons. I am very much surprised to see him promoting the idea that the Senate should undermine the integrity of the elected will of the people of Canada and the House of Commons.

Mr. Ouellet: Answer my question.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Deputy Prime Minister that government lawyers have been wrong before.

The Prime Minister has decided to roll the dice one more time—

Mr. Crosbie: Take the word "democratic" out of your party name.

An hon. member: You are turning purple, John.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, we all thought the Prime Minister was trying to roll an eight, but I hear that he has rolled a nine and in just a few minutes we are going to have nine Senators sworn in.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, given that this is before the courts, does he not think it unwise on the part of the government to add insult to injury by making what is already an unjust tax a possibly illegal tax? Would that not simply add to the chaos that he says he now fears?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): The answer to that question is no, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Prime Minister quoted an NDP expert on constitutional issues when he said that, "as much as he dislikes the tax, I think we now have a prescription for parliamentary and political chaos which is mind-boggling". That was a quotation by Stephen Lewis.

Today on Canada AM we had the spokesman for the NDP saying and I quote, "It is creating a terrible, terrible precedent that one day the rest of us will rue for these Liberal Senators who say they have the right to stop the functioning of an elected government". I agree with that.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to my friends in the NDP, I did not know that either of them were constitutional experts or that they speak for the NDP for that matter.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Blaikie: I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister this question, the Deputy Prime Minister not seeing what is at stake here with respect to what the Senate is doing and the entire crisis. There is the whole question of political legitimacy brought on by the unprecedented political illegitimacy of this government and his is the only government in the history of Canada that can make the Senate look good.

So I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, will he not do the only thing that can restore political legitimacy to this country and call an election?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, that suggestion reminds me of his former leader who in August 1987 was promoting the same line. His picture was on the front page of Maclean's magazine getting ready to take over Sussex. When the election was called and after the results were known he was the first one to knock on the Prime Minister's door seeking a patronage job.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister could answer the question.

An hon. member: Withdraw.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, someone says I should withdraw. I say to them: if the shoe fits, wear it.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we now know why they are at 15 per cent in the polls.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Deputy Prime Minister is rather selective in quoting his parliamentary precedent with regard to what is taking place. The Deputy Prime Minister should be aware that in paragraph 338 of Beauchesne's and also by quotes made by the right hon. former Prime Minister of Canada, the hon. member for Yellowhead, stated, and I quote: "That when a matter is raised in two public institutions, one being a Supreme Court, the other being Parliament of Canada, it is incumbent upon the Prime Minister of Canada to respect the roles and customs of the House of Commons and withdraw the matter from further consideration".

Will the Deputy Prime Minister do the honourable thing and withdraw the GST from further consideration in the upper House?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member is a lawyer. He should consult with the Table. He will find out that essentially civil actions do not bring this institution to a halt, do not bring the Government of Canada to a halt. He was quoting circumstances involving the Criminal Code and criminal actions, not civil actions.

He should be aware that the government has every right to proceed with its legislative program, and people who believe in democracy would be discouraging the Senate from doing what it is trying to do now.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, for the edification of the hon. House leader, I refer him to quotes made by the right hon. former Prime Minister, the hon. member for Yellowhead, on March 26, 1981 which clarifies that.

Today the leader of my party, the opposition House leader, as well as the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, wrote a letter to the Governor General. It states, and I quote part of that letter: "There is eminent authority that constitutional convention requires the Governor General to accept advice from the Prime Minister or to appoint such senators only when certain extraordinary circumstances exist". Such circumstances do not exist today.

Why is the Deputy Prime Minister and that government opposite using the Governor General as an accomplice in a political scandal?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Out, out.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that is acceptable in this place. It is not necessary. In that question he went too far. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that part of the question.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, in reference to your instructions, I hope the hon. Speaker has not interpreted my remarks as a reflection on the quality of the Governor General.

Mr. Speaker: I am asking the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. Dingwall: I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

• (1450)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, the extraordinary circumstances do exist.

The hon. member and his leader can certainly do justice to the system and the traditions of our parliamentary democracy by prevailing upon their colleagues in the Senate to cease and desist the kind of action in which they are engaged. That is what is the fundamental issue: the preservation of our system of parliamentary democracy.

Mr. Speaker: I was remiss in not thanking the hon. member for withdrawing, and I do thank the hon. member.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Deputy Prime Minister knows that the British Columbia Court of Appeal will be hearing the question on the constitutionality of the appointment of the eight senators. It is obvious the government is not confident that the decision is going to be in its favour.

Why does the government not wait until the B.C. Court of Appeal gives its decision before it forces this unpopular bill on the Canadian people?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member does not like the action that the government is forced to take, I ask him and invite him to prevail upon his friends in the Senate, the Liberal senators, to cease and desist their action and allow the normal process of legislative passage to go through.

We have three major tax bills currently before the Senate: Bills C-21, C-28, and C-69, plus the GST, which is Bill C-62. Many of these bills have been held up for almost a year.

Why does he not prevail upon them and continue to support and allow the traditions of our system of parliamentary democracy to prevail as they have over successive years?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the government is fond of telling the native people, and indeed all Canadians, that they are not above the courts in this country.

Why this double standard? Why does the government not heed its own words? Why does the government not wait for the court decision before it takes action in this matter?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Senate may want to consider the same thing, because what it is doing is unprecedented in the history of this country.

What the hon. members of the House of Commons should discontinue is taking their cues and their leadership from the hon. senator who leads them in the Senate. That is what is fundamentally wrong. He is corrupting and distorting.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether the corrupting and the other words used were directed at a conspiracy between the hon. member and somebody in the other place, but I am sure the hon. minister would want to assure us that that was not the intention.

Mr. Mazankowski: Certainly the comment was not casting any reflection upon any member of the House, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Tobin: What about the Senate?

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Deputy Prime Minister. He was just talking about things being unprecedented. I want to ask him about the action that is about to follow.

There are now two precedents in history where governments tried to swamp the Upper House. One was in Canada by Alexander Mackenzie back in the 1800s. The second was in Britain by Lloyd George when trying to get a tax bill through the House of Lords. He asked the King to appoint additional Lords. The King responded that there was no crisis; if there was a deadlock, call an election and let the people decide, and "if the people re-elect you then I will appoint additional Lords".

Since members of the Conservative Party are interested in precedent in this country, I want to know from the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada: Why don't they follow the precedent in these two examples and let the people of Canada decide? That is the precedent.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Very simply, Mr. Speaker, because the situation is fundamentally different.

What I do find so extraordinary is the NDP supporting the actions of the Senate, and in following that course of action they really are in effect supporting the subversion of the House of Commons. That is a precedent which I find absolutely and totally incredible.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the finance committee is saying: "Abolish the Senate." Why didn't you abolish the Senate a long time ago? You would be supported by this party if you would do that now. Why didn't you do that?

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister about the possibility of an illegal tax. Section 26 of the Constitution has never been used before in the history of this country. It is now being challenged before the court in British Columbia. It could be appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

What is the contingency plan of the federal government? If indeed these eight senators are deemed to be illegal senators, does that make the tax illegal? Are people going to be given refunds? What is the plan of the government if that indeed happens?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly a hypothetical question, but I think the hon. member is going to have to make up his mind in so far as his relationship with the Senate and the NDP is concerned.

They are going to have to make up their mind as to whether they want to abolish it or use it, because quite frankly we are a bit mystified by their inconsistent action.

HOUSING

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Housing.

Despite some recent reductions the price of a home in metropolitan Toronto is over $250,000. The average family cannot afford $250,000. It requires a down payment of $60,000 and an annual income of $90,000 a year.

I would like to know if this government has any creative solutions planned to ease that problem. Perhaps the minister of housing could squeeze the Minister of Finance's arm into allowing RRSPs to be used as down payments.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member and other members of the House are well aware, the government is developing surplus federal government lands in the metropolitan Toronto area in order to try to ease the affordable housing problems, including lands at Vaughan, Downsview, and the CMHC branch lands.

In addition, we have introduced an initiative, the ACT program, Affordability and Choice Today. We have set up a federal—provincial—municipal committee dealing with affordability. We are about to hold a housing financing conference, the very first in this country, to examine creative ideas to bring about more affordable housing in the Toronto area and all over the country.

THE SENATE

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister knows that the courts in British Columbia have been called upon by the British Columbia government to decide whether or not the use of section 26 is constitutional.

He knows as well that the governments of the provinces of Ontario and Alberta are also considering a court challenge. I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he has considered the chaotic consequences that will occur if the courts render this government's use of section 26 unconstitutional and illegal.

Mr. Speaker: It is a completely hypothetical question. The minister does not have to answer it.

Point of Order

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the government has not given that consideration.

The Government of Canada has consulted with the Governor General and the Governor General has consulted with the Queen. The government indicates that it has legal opinions upon which it bases its decision.

Is the government prepared to table those legal opinions and to table the advice that it gave to the Governor General?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can only advise the hon. member that the process that is customary and needs to be followed in circumstances of this nature was followed. I can assure the hon. member that everything is in order.

ENERGY

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In the agreement signed on September 14 with Newfoundland, the Government of Canada and the consortium were firmly committed to economic spin-offs for the province of Newfoundland, but as far as Quebec and the other provinces were concerned, the agreement on the Hibernia project merely states that, "—the consortium also promises to do what it can—"

In other words, some are more equal than others. After making Clyde Wells a present of $2.7 billion, of which $675 million was paid by Quebec taxpayers, how can the minister justify this double standard?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member has asked me that question because it gives me the opportunity to tell him again, as I did in the debate yesterday, that there are 2.1 million hours of work guaranteed for Newfoundland and two million hours of work for the rest of Canada.

In fact, the hon. member should have heard about the first two contracts that have been released. The first, for $1.3 billion, 59.33 per cent goes to companies in Quebec. If he will look at the management of the top sides and the project management, that contract is for $360 million, 85 per cent of which is for S and C M Anenko in Quebec. What is interesting is that these contracts, of roughly $1 billion, have gone into the province of Quebec while others are going into Newfoundland. What I am pleased about is that my colleagues from the province of Quebec have stayed here to fight for Quebec effectively, I wish he had too.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of the Hon. Akira Ohno, Minister of Transport for Japan.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I also draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of Mr. Vadin V. Bakatin, Minister of the Interior of the U.S.S.R.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I also draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of the Hon. Chuck Furey, Minister of Development in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

REMARKS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I bring to your attention Standing Order 18 relating to disrespectful or offensive language. The Standing Order reads:

> No Member shall speak disrespectfully of the Sovereign, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of the Governor General or the person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any Member thereof.

At your request, Mr. Speaker, I withdrew remarks which you believed were intended to be disrespectful of the Governor General. However, on numerous occasions, including today, we have heard the Deputy Prime Minister make reference to members in the other House as being very "corruptive", to paraphrase the words of the Deputy Prime Minister.

If the Deputy Prime Minister did not intend to make that kind of reflection with regard to the Upper House, I would hope that he could stand and withdraw that remark. However, if the Deputy Prime Minister is saying that members in the Upper House are corruptive, I think he ought to be very specific in terms of whether that be Finlay MacDonald, Senator Buchanan or Senator Cogger. We would like to know, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I would hope that the hon. member would allow me to assist the House. I am not quite sure exactly what the hon. member has in mind with that question. The question, of course, carries its own message, which is a matter for political discussion, but I find that the point of order falls somewhat short of an exact allegation or even a request that the hon. minister withdraw any particular comment. The hon. minister may want to respond but that is up to him.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your comments and so there is absolutely no question in the mind of the hon. member, other members, and hon. senators, the interpretation of the hon. member that I was making reference to the fact that members of the other place were corrupt was certainly not my intention.

What I was saying was that the process was corrupting, and maybe that is even an inappropriate word. I would ask the indulgence of the House to substitute the words "subverting the process" instead of corrupting the process.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, during a Question Period exchange the Deputy Prime Minister—I know the kind of man he is—I think inadvertently gave the impression that the former member for Oshawa had somehow been asking the Prime Minister for an appointment.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he would not just explain that—

Ms. Copps: Cut your losses.

Mr. Riis: —that it was not the case, confirm that it was not the case, and if he would just clarify that particular point.

Mr. Speaker: I, of course, heard the reference to the hon. minister but I do not think the hon. minister is compelled to respond to that. However, if he wishes to do that it is completely his business. I think the matter should be discussed elsewhere.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it being Thursday I would like—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I think I must save the member for Ottawa—Vanier. I had indicated that the hon. House leader had been seeking the floor.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just would like, by way of a point of order, to indicate my concern about what happened here in Question Period.

We had a situation where the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte made the statement that the government was deliberately misleading the Queen. You got to your feet and asked that he withdraw the statement. He then withdrew the word "deliberately" but said we were misleading the Queen. You then asked him to further withdraw. He then did that.

The net result of that particular question was to leave on the record those accusations. That language is prohibited by virtue of our practices as set out in Beauchesne's. Those kinds of accusations cannot be made.

Having therefore, in a political sense, for the edification of the camera, succeeded, the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond then went on to make remarks about the Governor General being involved in perhaps illicit activities, or what have you, with the government.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: Your Honour then, quite properly, asked him to withdraw his remarks. He did withdraw, and Your Honour thanked him for it.

My point of order is this. It is on the record, it is done, it is out there. The net result is to make that sort of thing an acceptable procedure because it accomplishes what was intended to be accomplished, totally contrary to why we have these rules in place.

Now, Sir, I do not know what the immediate answer is to the problem. One of the consequences of what happened was an increase in the disorder in the House, which has to be acknowledged—a lot of barracking, a lot of shouting—I am sure we sent a great example to those who might have been watching as to the nature of the conduct in this House.

Perhaps, Sir, I could suggest that maybe this whole question might be referred to the appropriate committee of the House so that we could ask them to study how Question Period might be conducted, might be led by yourself, in a way that does not bring such discredit on the House.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I take strong exception to those words.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear. I do not think we have any lessons to take from that gentleman. Further, Mr. Speaker, I do not think you have any orders to take from that gentleman either.

• (1510)

I would like to make two or three points about the editorializing during Question Period. We are fed up with having that minister getting to his feet and preaching to the people of this House when he cannot even practice what he preaches.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, if you are going to allow that kind of statement from now on, we want a chance to editorialize on Question Period after Question Period, on the quality of the answers we get from that lousy government. We do not think it is proper for the House leader to get up after Question Period and start editorializing, pontificating about how good he is and how to maintain order. It is the Speaker's job and duty to maintain order and I do not think that that gentleman would stand a chance of getting elected in this House as Speaker of the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest when the government House leader was indicating his concern that some members of the House had misstated the truth and then had left that on the record.

I find it rather amusing, when the Deputy Prime Minister who sits near him, stated an obvious mistruth today and refused to correct the record and, in a smug way, just walked out. This is a very serious allegation and for him to say that someone ought not to have done what the Deputy Prime Minister did today, that is cast a slur on the previous member from Oshawa, which I personally find disgusting and despicable, it seems that he waters down his arguments somewhat.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, like all my colleagues, I heard what was said during Question Period. I am not setting myself up as a defender of the Queen but I am sure that we heard a number of instances of lèse-majesté. Throughout Question Period, there were insinuations that the Queen had erred in accepting the Prime Minister's recommendation. The monarchy and the Queen's competence have been called into question, and coming from the party of the hon. member for York-South—Weston, one of the great defenders of the oath of allegiance to the Queen, I found this very surprising. I think we should check whether some members broke their oath of allegiance to the Queen today, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member for Shefford that he should listen more carefully to Question Period. What we on this side of the House were criticizing today was the government's misuse of the Governor General's office for political and partisan ends. At no time did we ever question the role of the Queen or her prerogative to respond to a request from her Privy Council. What we did criticize was the Prime Minister's and the Conservative government's misuse of the Governor General's office.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning an exchange with the Deputy Prime Minister earlier today in Question Period, in which he said, quite clearly, that Bill C-21 is being held up in the other place because of the opposition.

I think it is improper to misrepresent the progress of legislation through both our Houses. On May 10—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. Many things are said on both sides of this House that are contradicted, corrected, adjusted or sometimes amended in the course of debate. We could go on all afternoon if we took those points literally. The hon. member, clearly, has picked up something which he thinks is inaccurate and there are other ways to make that point.

I want to return for a moment, if we can finish up this matter which was raised by the hon. House leader. There are, of course, appropriate ways to take the rules which we have in front of the appropriate committee. If at any time hon. members wish to come into my office and discuss this, I would be only too pleased.

In the interest of the public that is watching us, let me point out the dilemma in which a Speaker finds himself or herself in a television age. Something may be said which is inappropriate but it is said. It is then on the electronic media. The Speaker of course, acting under centuries of tradition and according to the rules, asks an hon. member to withdraw or to put the matter in a more appropriate way. Several examples of that were found today and I have to say on both sides of the House there were withdrawals.

What is almost impossible for a Speaker to do, though, is to stop the comment before it is made. Sometimes, because I have an incredible ability to define what is coming, I am able to cut off a speaker before the speaker has spoken. But it does not happen very often and usually it leads to a member visiting my office saying: "What was it you thought I was going to say?" If I tell him or her I may be insulting them, and other times I may have given them a marvellous thought. In any event, you see the difficulty.

On a more serious note—fortunately, we did not have this today—some time ago I had to remark that comments made in preambles, while clearly out of line, after they are said can do great damage to people across the country. To a remarkable degree, and I thank all hon. members for this, there has been a lot of co-operation in keeping that in mind.

Today some things were said which I felt ought not to have been said and they have been withdrawn. I have to point out to all hon. members that ultimately this place depends on the self-discipline of everybody because the Speaker can correct, the Speaker can force a withdrawal, the Speaker can even dismiss a member. It does not stop the fact that things are said. Things are on the electronic media and of course once there, they are no longer the property of this place.

I would ask all hon. members, especially when we are in matters of great importance, to keep those things in mind. I know all hon. members will try to co-operate.

I think we need the usual business question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it's Thursday, and the Opposition has a duty to ask the government what will be on the legislative menu for the coming week.

I also would like to know whether the Prime Minister intends to make the necessary arrangements very shortly so that Canadians in the ridings of Beauséjour and York North will have a democratically-elected representative in this House. Can we expect the government to call by-elections in these ridings within the next few days?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it is the duty or responsibility of the Opposition House Leader to ask for the minutes but he has been doing it. Certainly I want to co-operate with him and provide as much forewarning as possible.

Today, we will continue with the Iraq motion. I hope the discussions can carry on across the floor and other ways so that we could find a way to reach a conclusion on that debate at some time. If there is a desire to extend hours to allow more people to speak, we would be co-operative with that. We want to give everybody in the House who wants to participate an opportunity to participate in the debate, but at some point in time we would like to bring it to a conclusion as well and have it voted on.

Tomorrow, I would hope to continue with the report stage of Bill C-44; perhaps also to complete second reading of Bill C-73, a technical and administrative bill dealing with the Crown Corporation Dissolution Act. There is a time question involved and it would be helpful to the smooth administration of the dissolution of these obsolete Crown corporations if we could have that passed. I hope I could receive the co-operation of the opposition in that regard.

On Monday, the agenda to some extent will depend on the progress we make today and tomorrow. In all likelihood I will be calling Bill C-44, the Hibernia energy legislation, hopefully for completion. In the meantime, we will carry on our usual discussions respecting further business.

• (1520)

In terms of whether or not there is going to be a by-election in Beauséjour, one thing I can say with great certainty is that the Prime Minister would relish the opportunity of getting the new "la petite garde du Nouveau Brunswick" in the House and will not present an obstacle.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a question with the House Leader.

As he knows, at the beginning of the week I submitted a motion for an emergency debate on the question of the World Summit for Children. I also raised the question directly with the Prime Minister who responded in the House—I believe it was on Tuesday—in a positive way, saying he thought it would be an important opportunity for members of Parliament to express the concerns of their constituents.

There was an indication that there might be a day called before the Prime Minister left for New York. I gather from what the House Leader just said that it is not possible.

In that circumstance, I wonder if the House Leader would be prepared to designate a day next week after the return of the Prime Minister when we have at least seen what the statements were. Members of Parliament would have the opportunity to present what is a very strong and compelling concern of many of our constituents about children's rights and how that is being approached in the international area. It would be certainly in accordance with the Prime Minister's wishes, because he so expressed himself in the House on Tuesday.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, indeed, he did and we did make some efforts to see if that could be accomplished. Having the situation with the Iraq motion, which I am sure the hon. member agreed we needed to proceed with in the House, we had tried to get extended hours on Monday but failed to get consent of the opposition in that regard. Of course, we needed to proceed with the Oka motion, as well as having other legislative business.

We did talk some about perhaps using an allotted opposition day for that purpose but, quite rightfully, the hon. member's House leader said the opposition will decide the subject of opposition days and I will not try to interfere.

On the general question, we would like to be accommodating in achieving a debate on that very important subject. The only caveat I put to that is that we do have some very important legislation and other items on which I need to receive progress. If we can have our usual discussions and achieve agreement on that, we will certainly be ready and more than willing to co-operate.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the response of the House Leader and I recognize the difficulties sometimes in arranging House business. I would make the case that I do not think that there is anything more important right now than the concern about children.

While we have a very full agenda, as he well knows, we are just back in the first week. We have a nice long time ahead of us through to December and these issues will continue to be debated. I hope that in the next week the government will designate its own day and resolution.

The Prime Minister has taken a role as the co-chair of the summit and it has been a matter of very intense discussion across the country. It would be a very important opportunity for Canadians, not only to hear from the Prime Minister on his return from the United Nations, but for us to reciprocate with our views on behalf of so many Canadians.

I really would urge the House Leader and I am sure he will find full co-operation from this side.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, let there be no mistake in terms of the priority. The mere fact that the Prime Minister of Canada is chairing this international conference on children is an indication of the importance that the government places on it.

What I do have to ask, perhaps a bit with tongue in cheek, whether debates in the House are very healthy for children, especially their mental health, given what happened earlier here today.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, perhaps if we had a designated day for debate on the rights of children, we might show them that this Parliament, maybe once in a while, will live up to their expectation. We expect the House Leader to show some leadership in that regard.

REMARKS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have to raise a matter that arose in Question Period yesterday. I have drawn the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that I was to raise this matter.

In Hansard at page 13447, he made reference to me and, based on a newspaper article which I understand appeared in The Ottawa Citizen on September 19, he alleged that I stated things that I simply did not state. He implied a position that I held which is not mine, nor is it even reasonable to draw that conclusion from the words in the newspaper article.

Knowing him to be an honourable man, I am sure that he has had time now to see that he misspoke himself in saying that I advanced this position and I would hope that, in the circumstances, he would be prepared to withdraw and apologize.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my friend opposite is getting just a little tender.

The quote that he was referring to, if I can read it back to him, is this: "Our credibility"—this is the Liberal Party's credibility—"will be in shreds if we don't come up with a thoughtful alternative to tax reform that stands up to scrutiny."

The point that I was making yesterday is that here we have the Liberal Party in the other place, the unelected senators, saying: "We are going to kill this bill." We saw in the House today where it is fully supported by the other members of the Liberal Party here and, at the same time, by implication, the member from Ottawa is saying: "We have no alternative to this bill."

The point that I was making to the member for Acadie—Bathurst is that it is quite incredible to me that the Liberal Party would be killing a bill which the business community has said will throw the business sector into chaos over a period of time if not dealt with. At the same time, the member is saying clearly, by implication, that there is no alternative, that they have not come up with any alternative. Since 1987 we have had a white paper on sales tax reform and an election campaign when the party said that it was not going to go ahead with sales tax reform and it really astounds me that this party has not come up with an alternative.

I say to my hon. friends that if they do have an alternative they should say so. But if they do not have an alternative, they should recognize that their credibility is in shreds, recognize that they have no legitimacy in raising these questions in the House, recognize that the Senate has no legitimacy in—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Ottawa South would want to respond.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I regret that my presumption concerning the minister appears to have been wrong. He correctly read from the article. I said and am quoted as saying: "Our credibility will be in shreds if we don't come up with a thoughtful alternative to tax reform that stands up to scrutiny." He said that I said: "—the credibility of the Liberal Party would be in shreds if the Liberal Party of Canada, through its non-elected Senate"—its non-elected Senate—"votes down the GST when it does not have an alternative to put in place." I think any reasonable reading of those two would show that the point being made by the minister is quite different.

What I have said, and what I continue to say and what our Leader has said, is that prior to the next election we will need to come forward with a thoughtful alternative to tax reform. I stand by that. If the minister would like to put his GST to the people today, I will do what I can to come up with the alternative right away for him. But in the meantime, the phoney case that he has been trying to make is that his GST is the answer to some bizarre, chaotic, situation crisis in Canada that is calling out for an answer. In fact, his tax is what is going to create chaos and the alternative to it is to put it in the shredding machines in his office and forget it, before he drives the country crazy.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my word was not "chaos". That was the word of the business community which is saying that if this legislation does not go ahead, there will be chaos, there will be major disruption, there will be large losses of money on the part of the business community who are planning for the GST to provide.

The hon. member says to put it to the people. We did put it to the people. In 1988 we had an election which a year and three months after sales tax reform was put forward in broad detail in a white paper. I do not see how much more we can put to the people. It was there at the election in 1987.

• (1530)

I have listened carefully to what the hon. member said. I read what I said yesterday and possibly I was a little—I hesitate to use this word—liberal in my interpretation of what he had to say. But the essence of the point is clear. There is no legitimacy whatsoever by the the Liberal Party here in this House or on the other side in the Senate to stop this legislation and throw the business community into chaos when they have no alternative. They have not stated what their alternative is. In fact, they very proudly say—

Ms. Copps: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Let me deal with this point first. I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Ottawa South. I have listened to the exchanges and I will look at Hansard and see whether there is any necessity to come back to the House. It, of course, illustrates how careful we have to be when we appear to be quoting another person. Perhaps we all need sometimes to be reminded of that.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has been parading his moral mandate before the House of Commons for a number of days. He claims to have a moral mandate because of the last federal election. I always believed the Minister of Finance to be a man of integrity. But I explicitly remember when on the issue of the GST in the last federal election he misled the Canadian people.

Mr. Andre: Point of order. Debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has very carefully not said intentionally. We are getting into debate here. I am sure all hon. members know that. The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam on a point of order.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Yes, on a point of order. Hopefully we can be of some help to the House and to Parliament.

A few years ago Eric Nielsen, Yvon Pinard, Marc Lalonde, Ian Deans, myself and the present government House leader were able to get together and deal with the bell ringing problem we had in the House of Commons and come up with a solution. Given that the bell ringing problem started in the House with a motion by the now government House leader, I wonder if the government House leader would like to join with me now that the other fellows are not around and perhaps we could get together and deal with the problem in the Senate over the bell ringing?

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to answer on behalf of the hon. House Leader.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

IRAQ

INVASION OF KUWAIT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) (p.13232); and the amendment of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) (p.13240); and the subamendment of Ms. McLaughlin (p. 13232).

Mr. Speaker: When the House recessed, the hon. Minister of State for Housing had the floor. He has 13 minutes plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, as you indicated, prior to Question Period I had expressed my concern and my support for the motion before the House with respect to the fact that the House condemn the unprovoked invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and also the support for Canada's actions at the United Nations, as well as for the support for the dispatch of Canadian forces to the Arabian Peninsula.

I had indicated that with all the black clouds and the frightening aspects of this entire situation, there are some bright spots. The brightest spot, as I indicated, in my view at least, is the role that the United Nations is playing in the development process that is going on in the United Nations, an evolutionary process which I compared to the evolution of the British parliamentary system, which has taken many many hundreds of years and is still going on.

Hopefully, we are now in the process of evolving that institution of the United Nations into something that will be much more effective as a governing body in the world, much more effective in policing against unprovoked aggression and much more effective in dealing with the kinds of problems we have had and will continue to have in the world, much more effective than it has been heretofore, when it certainly has been a most ineffective body as far as Canadians in general are concerned, and people around the world.

I had started to examine some of the concerns that have been expressed by Canadians and by members of this House with respect to the various actions that have been taken by the government and the motion itself.

One of those concerns relates to the question of United Nations authorization for the action of Canadian forces and other forces in the Persian Gulf and the Arabian Peninsula area. That is an understandable concern in my view.

In light of my comments previously that at the same time this evolving role of the United Nations is understandable, we certainly have not come to the point where the institution of the United Nations can react as quickly as we would like it to. Perhaps in the past it has not been able to react at all except in very limited cases, and well after the fact.

I think what we see here is a circumstance of unprovoked aggression on the part of Iraq. The threat that Iraqi forces would roll on into Saudi Arabia and roll on into other parts of the Middle East provides a need for an immediate response on the part of other United Nations countries in order to counteract that just as quickly as they possibly could. To seek authorization after the fact is exactly what has happened in this case.

We trust that in this ongoing process in dealing with this situation, we will be able to obtain United Nations approval and mandate before any other actions are taken. Obviously, there are circumstances in which Canadian or other forces might have to react before there is such a mandate. There might have to be an effort to try to obtain that mandate after the fact.

I think the significant part here is that we should not be allowing one nation, or a group of nations, to proceed without attempting to get that United Nations mandate.

In fact, as you are aware—unfortunately, I do not believe too many Canadians are aware—Canada has played a leading role at the United Nations in trying to get authority and a mandate for all the actions that have taken place. Although I have not seen too many reports in the Canadian press about this, there are reports in The New York Times.

I would just like to briefly refer to an article in The New York Times of August 14 of this year which indicated that Canada had, and I quote:

> —indicated today that a new resolution authorizing the use of force under Article 42 of the Charter would be required before countries could legally use warships to enforce the sanctions.

In fact, Canada has been playing a leading role at the United Nations and in all other discussions on a bilateral and multilateral basis in order to ensure that there is a United Nations mandate and that one nation, whether it be the United States or any other nation, is not acting on its own, but there is a concerted effort as we have seen and it does have United Nations sanction.

Again, I hope that we can develop a process whereby this will be more automatic. This will work faster and certainly more easily in the days ahead in other crises of this sort, hopefully less severe than this sort.

Another concern that has been expressed to me by some of my constituents—not all but certainly some of them and certainly by members of this House who have pointed out their concern—that we would be sending Canadian forces to the Arabian Peninsula, to the Persian Gulf before Parliament had actually had an opportunity to sit, debate and discuss the matter.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the National Defence Act, the provisions of Canadian convention and tradition in this case have been followed.

They have been followed exactly in accordance with those traditions.

It is understandable, however, that Canadians should feel that this was an important matter, that Parliament should be called and have the opportunity to debate the matter even though the National Defence Act provides that there is no obligation for Parliament ever to vote on this issue in any way whatsoever, but only to be called to sit in a situation of this sort.

• (1540)

What disturbed me more than anything else was, when some Canadians were expressing this concern and members of Parliament were expressing this concern, when the matter was placed before the House on Monday, the very first day, there was an opportunity for the debate to be continued, perhaps for the entire evening and into the night and, perhaps it could have gone on for several days. Unfortunately, the opposition members of this House refused to give their consent to carry on that debate, notwithstanding the fact that they and other Canadians were expressing concern that this was such an important issue and that it should be brought before the House and debate fully as quickly as possible. I, for one, am dismayed that we were not able to carry on in that fashion with the continuing debate.

Another concern that has been expressed—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway on a point of order.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I do hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I know that he would want the record to be set straight. When he suggested that opposition members on Monday were not prepared to continue the debate, I know he would want the record to show that, in fact, the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party were both fully prepared to continue that debate, however, it was an Independent member of the House who apparently was not prepared at that time to do so.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the hon. member's intervention. Whoever it was that was not prepared to continue the debate, it was someone in the opposition benches of the House.

Another aspect that Canadians and members of the House have expressed concern about has to do with the fact that there is no United Nations flag flying over the forces in the Persian Gulf. The forces are not wearing blue berets and there is no specifically designated United Nations commander. I, for one, hope that all of those things will happen and happen as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker, you recall and I recall and I am sure other members of this House are too young to recall the Korean war. We recall that those things did not happen immediately in the Korean war either. They took a little bit of time to get into place and, hopefully, we can get them back into place more quickly than occurred in the Korean war. Hopefully, we will be able to put in place a mechanism so that those things happen more automatically in the days ahead but this is an evolving process and I think all of us should bear that in mind.

Another concern that has been expressed, particularly by some of my constituents who are Canadians of the Muslim faith, is a concern about the whole situation as it relates to the Middle Eastern situation and their roles. Some of these constituents of mine have their origin in the Middle East from a variety of Arab states and there is, just as there is in the Middle East itself, some differences of opinion within those Arab states. Those same differences of opinion are expressed here in Canada as well. I think it is important for all of us to recognize that these are Canadians who originate from countries in that part of the world, Canadians who have legitimate concerns about their families and friends, their origins and their roots which are not always the same perspective that many other Canadians may have. It is important to bear those in mind because we are talking about the concerns of Canadians.

I have suggested to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that what we need is a consultative group, perhaps something like we had in relation to the difficulties a short time ago in China. In that case we had a consultative group of Canadians of Chinese origin who were able to express the concerns of Canadians to the government and to the Secretary of State. They were able to hear the reasoning, the rationale and the position of the government and were able to act as a two-way line of communication between Canadians of Chinese origin, in that case, and the government and Canadians generally.

I think it is important thing that we should be establishing here too with respect to Canadians of Arab origin, Canadians of Muslim origin and the government in a situation like this when there are substantial differences of opinion, concerns, concepts, ideas, and information which have to be communicated back and forth so that everybody fully understands what is going on and why it is going on.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated to me that he is favourably inclined toward that sort of thing. I would like to take this occasion to urge him to proceed as quickly as possible with the creation of such an organization. I can tell him that among Canadians of the Muslim faith now a nation-wide organization has been created and is still in the evolving state which would fit in perfectly with that idea. I truly believe that it would be extremely valuable in this situation to have such a consultative body.

Mr. Speaker, you have indicated that my time is up. I would just like to close by indicating once again that I believe we are in an evolving state as far as the United Nations is concerned. In my view this is a tremendous step toward being able to deal with aggression in a collective form, in a form of collective security with an international mandate. It is even more important and is setting a significant precedent. Every time we do something like this, it is very difficult the next time to do something different. Having taken a collective international approach to this under the United Nations, it is going to be harder the next time we are faced with a crisis like this not to do the same.

I commend that to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and to you, Mr. Speaker. This is something that will be helpful to all Canadians and to everyone around the world.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my colleague and I thank him and the NDP for putting on the record that it certainly was not any member of the Official Opposition in this House who objected to extended hours on this debate on Monday evening.

However, I find it surprising that my colleague across the floor appears to be defending his government which in my opinion acted against both precedent and principle in the way it has handled the Middle East crisis; precedent in terms of not recalling Parliament when this nation was faced with one of the greatest crisis of the last decade, and the principle of this country in always trying to follow UN precedent when becoming involved in any international action.

Is my colleague across the floor suggesting that it was acceptable that this House was not reconvened and that the government sent Canadian Armed Forces into the arena two weeks before a UN resolution to support such action was brought forth and gained approval?

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I gather that the hon. member was not listening to my remarks because I addressed both of the issues that she has referred to. I certainly welcome the opportunity to reiterate the positions that I put.

As I indicated quite clearly, as far as the recall of Parliament is concerned, the provisions of the National Defence Act and the provisions of Canadian convention and practice with respect to the recalling of Parliament in a situation of this sort have been followed and in fact at the earliest possible opportunity when the House met on Monday. As the hon. member is aware, there was the opportunity right off the bat to discuss and debate all aspects of this issue.

The Canadian Forces are still not fully in place in accordance with the expectations of where they will be. Hon. members of the opposition have the opportunity to express a feeling that perhaps they should be recalled and brought back to Canada, if that is what the hon. member is saying. Perhaps I have missed it, but I have not heard any member of the House, to the best of my knowledge, indicate that he or she feels that we should be recalling our forces.

• (1550)

I suspect the great concern here is about the opportunity for the House to be called and to have a debate. Of course that is what we are having now and it will continue, I take it, as long as Your Honour feels it is appropriate. The debate can go on and on and on. The hon. member and other members of the opposition, as will other members of the government, will have the opportunity to express themselves.

If the hon. member truly feels that the Canadian forces should be recalled and should not be there, I think it is important that she and other members of the House who have similar feelings should stand up and tell us so that that will be clear.

On the other issue that the hon. member raised, again I thought that I had addressed that fully in my comments. I believe I did, but I do not mind trying again to explain it, perhaps in a different way, or adding a few more facts or whatever.

In that case the hon. member asked a question relating to the United Nations authorization and acting before there was full and complete authorization by the United Nations.

Again I repeat the fact that all these circumstances took place in the context of very rapid, unexpected, unprovoked aggression by Iraq into Kuwait, and with the prospect of rolling on into Saudi Arabia and perhaps rolling on into other middle eastern countries as well. In light of that it was necessary, in my view, for other United Nations governments to take some action there in order to head that off at the pass.

It would have been very nice if we had had a process in place at the United Nations where all we had to do was call one meeting, and snap: everything would role into place. We would have a United Nations peacekeeping force that was already organized and could be called upon at the drop of a hat to move into place to deal with those sorts of things.

Unfortunately the United Nations, which was founded at the end of the Second World War as the hon. member is aware, has been a world institution for which we have all had great hopes. We have all had great faith in it, but it has not frankly been very effective in dealing with issues of this sort. One of the reasons why is that there has been a great power struggle between East and West in this world, which only now seems to be coming to some sort of an end.

Now we have had for the first time both the United States and the USSR acting together in a common front in dealing with a problem of this sort. It is an evolving process. It is one that I think we should all applaud. Hopefully we will be able to bring it to a stage where the United Nations can react very quickly, but in the meantime surely we should be acting and then getting the approval as quickly as we can after the fact.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question with respect to the point he made concerning the current siting of the three Canadian vessels. Originally it was the intention of the Canadian Armed Forces to locate these vessels in the Gulf of Oman, as the hon minister is no doubt aware. At some point that decision was changed and it was decided to send the three vessels into the heart of the possible conflict zone, through the Straits of Hormuz and into the Persian Gulf.

I want to ask the minister whether he agrees with the suggestion that I have made and that I understand is supported by the Official Opposition as well, that in fact the ships we have sent should not be brought back to Canada as the member indicated but should pull back to the Gulf of Oman where they would be in a position to enforce resolution 665, the resolution that results in the enforcement of sanctions which were imposed under 661. At the same time they would not be at risk in the event of a possible offensive military strike by the United States.

At this point there is no United Nations command. There is always a risk that that kind of first strike might in fact take place by the United States and that the men and women from CF–18 squadron and the ships could have their lives put at risk.

Is the minister prepared to recommend to his colleagues in cabinet that our ships pull back to the Gulf of Oman? They perform an important role in terms of enforcement of the United Nations resolution, but the lives of Canadian men and women must not be put at risk by the possibility of a unilateral American strike not under the auspices of the United Nations?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. minister has a couple of minutes to answer that question.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has expressed concern about the command structure of the United Nations forces in the gulf area. That in itself should lead the hon. member to conclude that there has to be some co–operation, some discussion, and some interaction among all of the forces there, Canadian and other forces. Obviously that is what has been going on and why there may be changes. There may be further changes in the way in which our forces are located or stationed in that area.

If the hon. member is suggesting that we station our forces in one particular place—I am not sure whether or not that is in his motion—that will be most interesting. I do not claim to be a military expert or one who knows anything about the formalities of strategy or tactics, but common sense leads me to believe that when one is in an area in which there could be some sort of conflict or some sort of action, there has to be a good deal of flexibility. That has to be left to the military commanders to be able to make judgments and make decisions not restricted surely by politicians. I think they tried in ancient Rome to have politicians run armies, but I do not think they were too successful.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wanted to make it clear that this member has misinterpreted words and put words into my mouth. I have not in this House or anywhere for one instance suggested that our Canadian Armed Forces should be withdrawn from the region. I just wanted to make that clear for the record.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell—Government advertising; and the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands—The environment.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, barely a month ago more than 900 young men and women sailed out of Halifax harbour on three ships. This is not an event that is unusual in the history of Halifax.

The city of Halifax is over 241 years old. It was founded as a garrison town. It has been a naval base for all those 240 years. It is known, at least in literary circles, as the warden of the north. It is the closest port to Europe. Its citizens are well aware of the responsibilities and the meaning of the word war.

In World War II ships were sunk off the mouth of Halifax Harbour. Indeed, one Christmas early in the war the corvette Clayoquoit went down within sight of shore and within sight of many Haligonians. During that war as well the population of Halifax doubled with the numbers of servicemen and their families moving into the city which was known in many parts of North America as the only city on the continent that really was at war.

Haligonians became very familiar with the sight of merchant men and navy ships limping back into harbour suffering the ravages of war in the North Atlantic. They became very familiar with waving good-bye to young men who went down to the sea in ships and never returned. They understand what it means and they understand what the defence of freedom is all about. Halagonians, as well as all Canadians, have always been prepared to make the sacrifices necessary to defend freedom and to stop aggression at home or abroad. In Halifax we are proud of our services. We are proud of our navy, in particular. Our navy is small but for over 75 years it has sailed with pride, eliciting admiration from allies and grudging admiration from enemies.

Mr. Speaker, we are also proud of our shipyard workers who were called on at the beginning of the gulf crisis and who readied the three ships in less than two weeks. Again, when Halagonians are called on they answer and they come forward.

The last war—and I used that term in quotation marks—Canadians were exposed to on a personal basis was that which was known as the police action in Korea. But since the early 1950s Canada's Armed Forces have been the premier peacekeepers of our global village. Canadians accept that role with pride and, indeed, it is the role that they have come to expect from their armed forces. Make no mistake, Canadians, Halagonians in particular, were appalled by the actions of Saddam Hussein and were prepared to play their role in maintaining peace and security, both in the Middle East and world-wide. Again I reiterate, never have Canadians been called and found wanting in situations of this nature.

That last very sunny Friday in August, I stood on a Halifax pier with some of my colleagues from this House with feelings of pride and trepidation. These feelings, I know, were shared by the vast majority of my constituents. I am sure that they were shared to a degree by the vast majority of Canadians. But I think I have to use perhaps a little special pleading in this case, that because of the things I have said, because of our unique geography, because Halifax is the largest naval base in the country, there is perhaps in the citizens of Halifax and Dartmouth a bit more awareness, a bit more experience in areas of this nature. This is not to denigrate other Canadians who feel very strongly. It is just a fact of life and it is very much a fact of life in Halifax–Dartmouth.

I watched Protecteur, Terra Nova and Athabaskan as they sailed out of Halifax harbour. I wished for three things. First and foremost, that these young men and women would return safely to our port, unharmed and unscarred by any battle. Second, I wished that this operation was securely under United Nations auspices. Third, I wished that the duly elected representatives of the people of this country from all parties had been given the chance to make their views known before the ships were sent.

Mr. Speaker, I was out of the country shortly after the crisis arose in the Middle East. I noticed, watching both CNN, the American news network, and I believe it is called Skyline, the European news network. I noticed

An hon. member: Skyway.

Ms. Clancy: —Skyway, whatever; at any rate, the European English news network. I noticed that every single night representatives of our allies were on television talking to their citizenry about what was happening. George Bush, whether it was from the golf course or fishing boat, was speaking to the American people every night. Margaret Thatcher, from various locations was speaking to her people every night.

Mr. Speaker, Great Britain's Parliament was recalled. l'Assemblée nationale de France was recalled. President Bush consulted widely with members of Congress and with members of the Senate of both political parties in the United States. Again, the people in these countries were constantly made aware by their leaders of what was going on, of what was developing. At least the sight of their leaders on their nation's television networks gave some form of reassurance.

Sadly, no such developments took place in Canada. Our government acted without the broad consultation that Canadians expected. Our Prime Minister did not come before the Canadian people to inform and reassure them. Indeed, on that sunny day when the ships sailed out of our historic port, he did not even come to Halifax to show his support for our forces going east. It was noticed and his absence will be long remembered.

The families of our forces in Halifax are uneasy. It is not that they are unwilling to sacrifice. It is not that they do not know what it means when their sons and daughters, husbands and wives, mothers and fathers enlist in our armed forces. They know what it means, but they are uneasy.

The question of who is in charge has never been fully resolved. It has never been fully answered to the satisfaction of my constituents in the city of Halifax.

The citizens of Halifax are always prepared to defend freedom and preserve the peace. But they and all Canadians deserve to be informed. They deserve to be informed of policy and they deserve to be represented in the decision–making process.

It really is not fair. The stress of having a family member in a war zone is enough. It should not have been exacerbated by a government that hid from its people.

In war and peace Canadians have always shouldered the burden of duty and performed gloriously. But since the days of Lester B. Pearson, the man whom we all delighted to honour here yesterday, our emphasis has been UN related and peace oriented. Indeed, our peacekeepers shared in the Nobel Prize just a few short years ago. I might add that Nobel Prize was in the grand tradition of the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson.

Earlier today the hon. parliamentary secretary referred to Canadian blood spilled in the past. I know full well that he agrees with me that we all wish to avoid bloody conflict, but that Canadians have never shirked when their duty was clear.

The tragedy here is that we are veering from our long–established process. The government by veering from our long–established process has created a form of uncertainty and unease among the populous. Part of that uncertainty and unease arises from the fact that Canadians, who have always done their duty, are almost afraid to come out and say that unease is there. They are almost afraid because they do not want to be thought to be unsupportive of our people who are going to the Persian Gulf. I do not think there is anyone in this House who does not support our personnel in the Persian Gulf, but equally I think that the majority of Canadians need to be reassured that we are under UN auspices. We need to have the UN in charge of this operation and we need to see that Canadians are acting in the interests of peace and stability.

My party condemns outright the doings of Iraq and Saddam Hussein in his invasion of Kuwait. We condemn Hussein's use of Canadians and other foreign nationals as human shields. We condemn him and all his works and pomps, but we remind this government, as it so desperately needs to be reminded, that Canada is an independent country with long-standing ties to the United Nations and its processes. Canada is not a colonial choreboy for the United States. We are not here to save the American oil patch.

The recall of Parliament in the summer of 1987 is something even those of us who were not so fortunate as to be in the Chamber at the time remember well. Again, it is something the Haligonians and Nova Scotians remember very well. I believe it was 157 cold, tired, and wet Tamils who were literally thrown off a freighter in Clark's Harbour, Shelburne County, Nova Scotia. They straggled ashore, to be met—

Mr. Weiner: Sikhs in Nova Scotia, Tamils in Newfoundland.

Ms. Clancy: Sorry. Neither the number nor the nationality is important. I think my friends in the government and my friends in the NDP both get the point. The point is that these poor refugees straggled ashore in Clark's Harbour and the denizens of Shelburne County went down and fed them peanut butter sandwiches on the beach—they did not know where these people came from as, clearly, the member from Halifax was not too sure either—so that they did not infringe on any of their dietary laws. That is why they brought them peanut butter sandwiches.

But because of these harmless people on our shores in Nova Scotia, we had to recall Parliament. However, we did not recall Parliament when we sent nearly 1,000 young people to a war zone. It goes beyond belief. If the people of Clark's Harbour, Shelburne County, Nova Scotia, were not afraid of the refugees, I find it unusual that Parliament had to act, especially in light of the fact, and I understand and I am sure that my learned colleagues will correct me, that it took well over a year to get the bill for which Parliament was recalled passed. There seems to be an emphasis in the wrong direction somewhere.

It is sad that we did not use our considerable influence in the United Nations to ensure that this was an UN-directed operation before our people went. Instead, with its usual desire to follow the United States, the government bypassed our traditions and, most important, the government bypassed our premier, democratic institution, the House of Commons. There has been a lot of talk about democracy in the last few days. The word has been bandied about in a manner that a lot of us find disagreeable.

To send young Canadians into a war zone without the debate and the approval of Parliament I think is an attack on democracy of the first order. Our forces will do the job they are asked to do and they will do it well. And never for one instance should their families and their friends be allowed to think that they do not have our full support and our proud admiration, that is a given. But it is sad, no it goes beyond sad, it is tragic that in hurrying off to defend freedom, in hurrying off to ensure that Canada was following the dictates of the United States, in haring off not, I suspect most sadly, because of the threats but more because of the request of our neighbour to the south, we have seen our own democratic traditions and our own duly-elected democratic representatives in Parliament bypassed and denigrated by the Canadian government.

I started out by talking about the city of Halifax because, of course, for the people of Halifax and Dartmouth this is more than just a national issue, it is a very personal story. On that Friday afternoon when I and some of my colleagues from this House and other people stood on the wharf, we watched the ships go and we watched three old ships. We know that those old ships with their young personnel will do the job. But we never ever stop worrying. We never ever stop praying that the Government of Canada will see the light, return to our traditions, and use its considerable influence before the United Nations now, even after the fact, to ensure that this operation is United Nations driven and United Nations sponsored.

This is what Canadians deserve and expect. It is what those young men and women in the gulf deserve and expect. It is the very least that parliamentarians such as ourselves should demand.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to the role of the United Nations. First, however, I would like to say that I was listening carefully to the hon. member's speech and I had expected her to comment on the absence of the Prime Minister. I fully expected her to do that.

She mentioned earlier that the Prime Minister did not speak to the nation. I think he made it quite clear at various press conferences what the reasons were and what principles were at stake. He was always ready to explain. But since you mentioned that the Prime Minister was not around, I would like to ask where her leader was. Her leader was in Italy on vacation and he did not come rushing back. Why didn't you mention that both ministers of National Defence were there? No, you wanted to show the Prime Minister was not around. Do you know where he was?

I also wanted to talk about the United Nations.

Mr. Duhamel: We want to know where he was.

Mr. Hudon: Just call 992-4211 and you will find out. Find out, instead of accusing people! And I suggest you ask where Chrétien was. He was away on holiday in Italy.

As for the United Nations, Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat here in the House a fact that mentioned several times in the media, especially in the American press. Of course, when a Canadian does something right, he doesn't get much coverage in the Canadian press. However, Ambassador Fortier in New York has been absolutely extraordinary. He did his job. He fulfilled his mission. Canada is a member of the Security Council and, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would do well to stress the leadership role we played in this area by achieving a consensus in what must have been record time at the United Nations, when we realize that customarily, it takes a long time to reach a consensus at that level. Our action was successful. And if you read the Washington Post or the New York Times, you will realize how much the work done by Ambassador Fortier, Canada's ambassador to the United Nations, was appreciated.

[English]

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to answer my hon. colleague from Beauharnois—Salaberry.

Perhaps he is suggesting that I should make phone calls to find out the answers to questions, some phone calls it is not necessary for me to make. I know for a fact that Mr. Chrétien was not invited to the farewell on the wharf, and I know for an equal fact that the Right Hon. Prime Minister was invited.

As to where my leader was at the time, my leader was well represented by the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Dartmouth.

I certainly stated that there were other colleagues in the House. If the hon. member wishes me to put it on the record, the Minister of National Defence was there and the Associate Minister of National Defence was there. But the Prime Minister was not there. The Prime Minister called one press conference. It was very short and he answered very few questions.

I referred to President Bush and Mrs. Thatcher. Neither political leader, I might add, do I often refer to in an admiring manner, either in the House or anywhere else. But, as leaders of their countries, my hon. friend should know, they came on television every night during the early days of this crisis and informed their people. Where was our Prime Minister, the leader of this country? Where was he? If you know, fine. I did not know and I doubt that many Canadians knew. I also doubt that a phone call would have told us, because there were many of families in Halifax-Dartmouth who gladly would have expended the quarter to find out where the Prime Minister was.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Halifax on an excellent speech. I certainly share the concerns that she raised during her speech regarding her many constituents from Halifax. Her colleague from Dartmouth also spoke very eloquently during the debate on Monday from that perspective as well, as a representative of a riding with many men and women who are families of those who have gone into this very, very difficult mission. We pay tribute to those who have undertaken this measure.

Does the hon. member for Halifax agree with the suggestion that I have made and that others have made that the original tasking of these ships should be maintained? That is, the original destination which was the Gulf of Oman, outside the possible range of Iraqi missiles, would have been a more appropriate place for these ships to perform their functions because they would, as well, be under the auspices of Resolution 665 of the United Nations, instead of going through the Straits of Hormuz into the zone of conflict or directly into the Persian Gulf. Does she agree that they should be sited in the Gulf of Oman at least until such time as the forces in that region come under a unified United Nations command? We are speaking here of all forces, including the American forces, under a United Nations command and the hon. member has spoken very eloquently of the need for that. To avoid the risk to the men and women on those ships and in that CF-18 squadron, does she agree that it would be far more appropriate to site them in the Gulf of Oman?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway. Perhaps, if I may be allowed to instruct un peu, they are still under Resolution 665 even though they have gone into the Straits of Hormuz. They are in a more dangerous position but they are still covered at this point by Resolution 665. That is not strictly the answer to the question, I realize, but I have no qualms as long as they are under the UN resolution. I have no qualms in the procedural sense, if you will, other than the qualms I clearly stated before.

Second, clearly, as the member for Halifax and as the representative for those families, those children and those parents, I do not want any of my constituents or their families in the range of Iraqi missiles. But I guess you have to do what you sign up to do.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief supplementary question.

The member will know that in fact our troops in the region have two tasks. One is under United Nations Resolution 665, but the other is as part of the American-led mandate to deter possible aggression. Of course, it is that second element of the mandate which places our troops at risk. The possibility of a unilateral offensive, a possible American-led offensive, would place our troops at far greater risk if they are in the heart of the Persian Gulf under that part of the mandate than if they were in the Gulf of Oman. I trust that the hon. member recognizes that even though they would be under Resolution 665 wherever they are enforcing the sanctions, it is that second element of their mandate which poses the risk.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway and I are in agreement on what is actually taking place, in the sense of what comes behind the theories, sadly, of both our government and the American government. However, while they are under 665, both the opposition parties have called for UN auspices. Resolution 665 is the UN auspices. The second part of the mandate, if you will, is unfortunately still something we can only surmise. Our surmise may be indeed extremely logical, accurate, and true but it is still something we can only surmise. While 665 holds, I do not have a problem with 665.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. You have one minute.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, in the one minute I would like to make a couple of things clear.

First, as the public watches this debate, the question of 665 or 661 is an issue, but the real issue is where the ships are stationed. As much as I would like to get into the stationing of ships, as a politician, I am afraid my present capacity does not allow me. I have not got the military picture in the Middle East. I do not know what is going on. My reaction as a planner, as a retired military man and as a retired admiral, was: "My God, what a thing to do!" But I must say, in reflection, and having been given a secret briefing, the stationing of military forces is really the prerogative of the military commander on the scene at the time.

I think it is very dangerous. As much as we would want to have the ships in a safer haven, the balance for that is inside the gulf itself. They are operating with other forces. I do not know the exact disposition, but I know the American forces are there. They have mutual support and they have air cover. So, while they are within the range of the Exocet missile and the Mirage aircraft, which is perhaps the biggest threat to our ships, in fact they can be under the same threat if these Mirages refuel which they can do. In effect, while they may be under a greater threat, it is my assessment in my present position, and not being on the scene at the time, that perhaps they have better mutual support. They may be as well off, or perhaps even better off, in the Persian Gulf.

The point is that it is very dangerous for us, as politicians, to debate where military forces should be stationed as much as we would like to do. This surely is the prerogative of the Chief of the Defence Staff and the military commander at the scene, Commodore Summers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will allow a 30-second rebut, but I see no reason for it. The hon. member for Halifax.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I appreciate the comments of my hon. colleague from the sovereign province of Newfoundland and I want to say that I agree with him 100 per cent.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the House today on a matter of public concern, a matter of both national and international importance. My purpose in speaking today is principally twofold. First, I would like to explain to the House the significance of the events in the Persian Gulf as they relate to Canada's energy situation and, second, I would like to explain the actions that the Government of Canada is taking to respond to those events.

Members of the House, as this debate also indicates, have followed with great interest the impact of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and the subsequent events that have followed in international oil markets. I want to assure the House and all Canadians that the government remains well informed on the rapidly changing events in the gulf. The situation in the Middle East is both volatile and highly unpredictable. It is true that crude oil prices have risen and remain unstable, but that is to be expected in a situation where the markets remain jittery and the price of a barrel of oil has almost doubled in the last two months.

Despite these uncertainties, our refiners are currently having no difficulty obtaining crude oil supplies. The result of the present embargo of oil shipments from Iraq and Kuwait is the loss to the international oil market of approximately 4.1 million barrels per day. Fortunately, in response to this, there have been some production increases from other OPEC and non-OPEC countries, particularly from Saudi Arabia and Venezuela. This additional production is now reaching significant levels and part of the shortfall in world production is also being made up by drawing down commercial stocks and from somewhat lower oil product demand. This combination of higher production in non-affected areas, stock draw, and demand reduction should be sufficient to avoid a serious tightening of the world oil market for some time. The situation remains manageable.

But there are, as I think members of the House have indicated in this debate, many uncertainties inherent in the present situation. The oil market is likely to become increasingly tighter during the winter months when oil demand is seasonally highest and as the capacity for significant additional supplies gradually diminishes. The situation could also be affected by any unexpected occurrences such as a colder than normal winter or problems with transportation and refining facilities. Over the next several months oil prices are likely to remain volatile as markets respond to a number of factors, including underlying supply-demand pressures, rumours and short-term competitive pressures. So, obviously, the situation bears close watching.

Notwithstanding the inability of governments, industry and the International Energy Agency, the IEA, to precisely quantify the magnitude of any possible future oil supply problem, there is consensus that the global oil markets will tighten and Canadian markets will be similarly affected.

The recent increases in motor gasoline prices in Canada, for example, are evidence that our country cannot be insulated from world oil uncertainties. Canada's response to the Persian Gulf situation has been within the framework of our existing policies on security of supply and emergency preparedness.

The point of departure for present Canadian policy is that energy markets must be allowed to respond effectively and efficiently to changes in supply-demand conditions, both internationally and in the domestic market. Canada's economy is part of that world market.

Efforts of previous governments to insulate us from world energy economy through regulation of prices and trade simply did not work. These tactics only delayed the day of reckoning, and the Canadian economy had to adjust to higher prices which ultimately gave rise to further problems. The tactics prevented or muted the adjustments to higher efficiency of energy use, which is the normal reaction to price rises.

The objective of present policy is to ensure that Canadian energy producers and consumers are free to respond to the pressures and opportunities presented by world markets. We have deregulated oil and natural gas prices. We have sharply reduced oil and natural gas market restrictions, eliminated discriminatory and interventionist tax and incentive measures and reduced the intrusive hand of government in the oil economy. Working more closely with the provinces has helped us create a more stable framework for industry investment. This policy has paid high dividends in terms of industry confidence and improved federal-provincial relations.

The government has no intention of returning to greater industry regulation in the current circumstances. The past has demonstrated that this is not the right approach in dealing with oil market uncertainty.

In normal times our policies lay the basis for both expansion of our resource sector and competitive pricing for consumers. We have intervened primarily to act as a catalyst and investor in certain large energy projects where the national regional economic benefits to be derived are significant and where the costs and risks are so substantial that private investors could not easily cope with them alone.

Our policy has recognized, of course, that we do not always live in normal times. As recent events demonstrate, the world remains vulnerable to oil supply disruptions due to a variety of political and military events that cannot be predicted or controlled.

In November 1974, in response to the oil crisis of the time, 21 of the world's principal industrialized countries signed an agreement on an international energy plan and the International Energy Agency, the IEA, was created. The basic task of the IEA is to reduce the industrialized countries excessive demand on oil in meeting energy requirements and to bring about a better mix of energy supply and demand over the near and long term. These objectives are pursued by setting in place co-operative programs and sound, compatible energy policies.

In times of oil crises, IEA member states have agreed to implement plans to reduce consumption, draw down emergency oil reserves maintained for the purpose and share available oil supplies. The objective is to balance demand with supply among the member states in order to equitably share the burden of supply losses and minimize adverse economic impacts. In the case of an incipient oil supply crisis, the International Energy Agency governing board can implement co-ordinated emergency response measures which can be taken in creeping crises conditions that remain below the International Energy Agency's emergency trigger level of a 7 per cent reduction of normal supply.

The Coordinated Emergency Response Measures involve voluntary actions that can be taken by member states in a pre-crisis situation. These measures may include use of surge production, stock draw, fuel switching and oil demand restraint. In Canada's case, there are few opportunities for fuel switching and surge production, and Canada is exempt from the IEA's stock holding obligation because of our position as a net oil exporter. Consequently, any action by Canada under this program would have to take the form of demand restraint.

The invoking of the oil sharing system has never been necessary in the past. Other means have been found to deal with oil supply disruptions. If needed, oil sharing would give expression to our collective commitment to security. It is premature, however, to speculate on whether such a system will in fact be needed.

Canada has long had in place an effective emergency planning system. In 1974, the Energy Supplies Allocation Board was set up by the Energy Supplies Emergency Act. The act gave the Energy Supplies Allocation Board the responsibility for preparing and, if necessary, implementing contingency plans during an oil crisis.

The government has not waited to see the results of unfolding events in the Middle East to get its house in order. We have begun acting to prepare for any necessary response should the supply situation deteriorate. Included in the actins we have taken are the following.

We have reviewed the measures that Canada could take in terms of demand restraint, and we have updated the readiness of existing emergency plans under the Emergency Supplies Allocation Board. If there is an oil crisis in Canada, Canada has the power to allocate crude oil and petroleum products. There is also a provision for gasoline and diesel fuel rationing at the retail level, but it would only be implemented in a situation of extreme shortages.

Additionally, federal officials have met with their provincial counterparts to brief them on the International Energy Agency and international oil market developments and to explore what actions could be taken to reduce demands on petroleum supplies.

We are meeting regularly with industry associations and oil company representatives to apprise them of our plans and to facilitate our monitoring of the state of oil product markets within our country.

The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and I, as minister, will be stepping up our efforts over the coming period to reduce oil demand and to work with the provinces on other measures that will have a national impact. An initial meeting with provincial government officials has already been held to discuss a national co-operative initiative that would emphasize increased energy conservation and encourage voluntary restraint of energy demand. These measures will become even more germane as we approach the colder months of late fall and winter.

I am also pleased to report to the House that we have had successful and co-operative sessions with the provinces, including a day-and-a-half meeting in early September to update provincial representatives on developments within the International Energy Agency and on issues concerning international and domestic oil markets. Like the world-wide community itself, the provinces know all too well that this is a global energy problem we have on our hands, not a regional energy problem. It is a problem that goes well beyond provincial boundaries.

I would also like to report to the House that our government is maintaining ongoing contact with the industry throughout this period of oil market uncertainty. We have also had close liaison and information exchanges with our partners in the International Energy Agency. So our lines of communication both domestically and internationally are open at all times. I might mention parenthetically that International Energy Agency countries are meeting tomorrow in Paris to consider measures that may be required to deal with the present situation.

In the meantime, we expect Canadian oil companies not to take advantage of the situation. Companies are already co-operating by providing information on oil supply and prices. We expect that they will take all measures necessary to ensure continuity of supply and the integrity of the Canadian supply system. We also expect the industry will follow responsible pricing and marketing practices. My officials will be monitoring the situation closely, along with the provinces.

We must recognize, however, that as the situation evolves, prices have and will rise. I give the House this example. In the first quarter of 1989, the average price of oil in Canada was $15 West Texas Intermediate or WTI, before the invasion of Kuwait. That average price had moved by the end of 1989 from $15 to approximately $20 WTI, U.S. At the meetings prior to August 2, the day of the invasion, the meetings of OPEC had brought the price of oil in the order of $21 to $23 WTI. It is that pricing, that increase from the first quarter of 1989, to the pricing prior to the situation in the Middle East that is being reflected in energy price increases today.

Anyone who speculates that the pricing today is already including the effects of the August 2 period and the post-August 2 period is simply not being accurate in terms of analysing the market and the accounting for oil which we have in Canada as distinct from the accounting for oil that the United States uses. I think it is important that we in the House understand that accounting system.

We cannot predict precisely how prices will move in the future. Short of a major supply crisis, price movements are the logical and most effective way balance supply and demand. It is, of course, important that the full competitive forces of the market remain free to operate. Remedies are available under existing competition legislation in the event of demonstrated anti-competitive behaviour.

Mr. Speaker, the present situation is not one that requires drastic or precipitous action. Through our international partners and our own market analysis, we are staying well informed regarding the evolution of the oil market, the likelihood of general or specific shortages and the movement of prices.

It is important, that Canadians realize that the risk of a disruptive situation arising could be reduced and made more manageable if we all were to exercise some extra prudence in our use of energy over the coming months. By using energy more efficiently, deferring uses that are not necessary and conserving available supplies, we can all demonstrate good citizenship and possibly reduce the necessity for more stringent measures later on.

The department will be working closely with the provinces and territories to collaborate on voluntary petroleum demand restraint measures, to co-ordinate plans, particularly in the transportation area and to demonstrate leadership by example. Through the regular meetings of the Interprovincial Advisory Committee on Energy, we will ensure good communications between both levels of government.

Let me conclude, Mr. Speaker, by stating that the situation in the Persian Gulf should remind all of us that we live in a world dominated by uncertainty. What we take for granted today can become tomorrow's great dilemma.

The Government of Canada has responded to these events in the only ways that make sense, through collective action with our international partners, through effective emergency planning and through the continuation of general energy policies that promote the flexibility and growth of the Canadian energy sector.

I think that all Canadians realize and recognize that we face a wide-ranging problem. Isolationism just does not work in this kind of oil crises. In these days of uncertainty, Canada shares a world-wide problem and we have to learn to work and think at a world-wide level. I am confident we can do it, but we must be prepared to accept co-operative and creative measures that will help to entrench a unique kind of common solidarity with the international community.

Mr. Speaker: Questions or comments. The hon. member for Dartmouth.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the hon. minister opposite. I found very helpful some of the information he put forward today, particularly as it relates to the energy sector in Canada.

However, I would submit to him—and I do not just want to be taking a cheap shot—that perhaps this is some of the information we could have had a bit earlier if his government opposite had done the right thing when this crisis first jumped on the scene and perhaps had an earlier recall of Parliament.

Some of the issues the hon. minister is talking about now are going to have to be debated much further in the very near future. I have some concerns, and I want to ask the minister what specific plans he and his colleagues and the department have to put in place, if we do indeed find out that there is some unfair pricing because of the current crisis in the gulf.

Everybody knows that in the international energy industry, particularly the oil industry, a multilevel pricing takes place. Then we get sort of a blended price as to what exactly is a fair price, given a particular circumstance at a particular point in time.

Most Canadians do not know whether or not they are paying a fair price, but when they see the price going up at the pumps they have a tendency to believe that somebody is digging a bit too deep into their pockets.

I want the minister, if he is able, to give me, members of the House, and Canadians generally some idea—a glimpse perhaps—of the plans that he and his colleagues in other departments like Consumer and Corporate Affairs have to ensure that they are not just monitoring. I would like to make sure that they have the capability to monitor, but if they are going to be monitoring and if some unfair pricing is taking place, at what point do they put in place a plan of action? How do they roll back the prices? What pressure can they put on those national and international companies that are in the oil industry in Canada?

In particular I look at Atlantic Canada which is susceptible to changing prices at the international level. In Atlantic Canada, but for the announcement the other day and the bill that we now have before this place, there is no oil production. In a few years hence we will have oil production from the Hibernia field, we hope, but at the current time we are basically hostage to energy, to oil from another place.

I have a second question for the minister, because I can only get the floor once and I am interested. I would like to know if the current situation which has threatened our security of supply of oil, of energy in Canada, leads the minister to review the position that his government seems to have abandoned, that is of pursuing a policy of energy self-sufficiency in Canada.

In particular, will the minister do everything he possibly can now that we all know how volatile the Middle East situation is today, and perhaps for years to come, and the effect it can have on our national oil supplies? Will he give some type of commitment today to review, to promote, and to do everything he can to try to get this government to approve the proposal put forward by the Synfuels consortium to take Cape Breton high sulphur coal and, through some fairly unique proven processes, turn it into a synthetic oil product? Can he give us some of those assurances here today?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of questions there. I am not going to eat into the 10 minutes of members opposite unduly.

Let me make a few points, first of all in respect to pricing. The hon. member recognizes in his own question that the matter of pricing and blended price or a world reference price, as it is referred to, is very difficult to determine. Quite frankly—and I have looked very carefully at the fluctuations of oil prices and pump prices—when prices go down we as consumers accept that, as it is time that the market is responding to the needs as we perceive them as consumers. In reverse, when the prices go up there is an easy charge made or a very quick charge made that prices are too high.

I think that also applies, for example, when one takes a look at the price differential between Canadian gasoline and American gasoline. When one takes a look at the present situation, one will find that there is still a price differential even if one takes into account exchange rates and volumes. That primarily and almost totally is the difference in federal and provincial taxes.

• (1650)

Having said that, we will continue monitoring if there is an uncompetitive position. As the hon. member knows, that would have to be done under anti-combines investigations and would have to be done with a legitimate due process which has been passed into law by this House.

Second, in terms of Atlantic Canada, the hon. member makes a very valid point. At the present time—and I take one area of departure from him—the Government of Canada has not abandoned self-sufficiency in oil and in energy. In fact quite the opposite. The whole basis of our energy policy at the present time is just to stay with oil and oil products.

Canada exported in the last quarter, on average, approximately 275,000 barrels a day in crude and in oil products. It is for that reason I mentioned that we as an exporter were not subject to the strategic oil reserves of the International Energy Agency to which other countries like the United States, for example, are subject.

Having said that, on the east coast we are importing about 550,000 barrels a day, about 350,000 from the North Sea. That is why I parted company with a number of my colleagues yesterday when they said, for example, that if the oil from the Hibernia oil fields were to go to the United States, why should it not go to Canadian refineries?

On the surface it is a very easy question, and the answer seems to be even as straightforward as the question. The fact of the matter is that because of our distribution system on the east coast through Portland, Maine, we need those 550,000 barrels from offshore as the hon. member put forward. In terms of energy self-sufficiency, that is why we are doing Hibernia.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wanted a clarification from the minister. I have been getting a number of calls and letters—and I am sure he has as well—with regard to the increased prices at the gas pumps. If I have understood his remarks correctly, he is saying that whatever has happened just recently at the gas pumps is in fact not related to the Kuwait crisis.

Certainly those constituents of mine with whom I have spoken believe that what is happening is that the reserves that were accumulated are still being sold. They do not understand that the prices should increase. Perhaps he can just inform me a bit so I can talk with my constituents.

The other questions are two very brief ones. Normally before we enter a conflict such as this one—and it might have been a more appropriate question for the Minister of National Defence—there are briefings given to the ministers and to cabinet. One question that would normally be asked is: What is the probability of conflict when we send a force to such a situation? Obviously some estimates are given. Of course, if there were a conflict, do we have a sense of the estimates of possible law of supply?

Is the minister at all in a position to inform me and this House of those particular questions? I would appreciate that.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, on the last question, I am not in a position to answer that one.

In terms of briefings, I have offered briefings to critics opposite. A number of them have taken up that offer. I understand that will be done next week.

Specifically with reference to the member's question—and this gets into what is known as oil accounting—I will try to be as succinct as I can be. I mentioned to the hon. member that over approximately the last year and a half the price of oil on a reference of West Texas Intermediate, WTI, we have seen an increase of about $15 to $20 to approximately slightly higher prior to the August 2 invasion.

There is a time lag between when that crude has been bought and is sold at the gasoline pump, which varies somewhat from region to region in Canada depending on refinery capacity and storage capacity. Generally speaking, we can look at somewhere between 60 days and 75 days. That will vary from region to region slightly. Having said that, oil that was purchased has come through the system and we are seeing the reflection of that higher energy price at the pumps now. What we have not yet seen at the pumps are the possible increases because of the crisis in the Persian Gulf.

That is why I mentioned the August 2 date very specifically as being the next reference point and, if present prices continue, consumers will see an increase in prices beyond the present level.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I understand in Washington the joke on the Persian Gulf crisis goes: "Why did we go in there? Oh, we went in there on principle. Do you spell it p-a-l or l-e? And the answer is you spell it o-i-l, oil". This is an oil war in many ways.

I am glad the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has spoken on this matter. I just want to tell him that what Canadians are concerned about is that the prices have not gone up as a result of the Persian Gulf. We think in Vancouver they have. Canadians are concerned that if the world price goes down it takes a long time to work its way through the system to the pump, but when it goes up it seems like overnight the prices go up. We are concerned about whether there is any regulation to that.

The competition bureau is a toothless tiger. What the government should be doing is putting in place—and I ask it to consider this—a better mechanism to look at the increase in prices so that there will not be windfall profits if there are actually further difficulties with oil prices as a result of the more serious difficulties, if that is possible, in the Persian Gulf.

I think the minister should consider looking at that matter. The other thing I want to ask the minister just briefly is: Has he considered that maybe the Conservative government should reverse its policy on energy? We were moving toward energy self-sufficiency, to Canadian control. Now we have sold our oil and gas to the Americans in this big free market, with the United States in this free trade deal. Does the Persian Gulf situation not show us that we now are at risk? I do not think we were at risk. I think if we had developed our own energy resources through Petro-Canada and through Canadian companies, not through Mobil and Hibernia or by ignoring the other development, then we could have been protected from this crisis.

We have this energy in Canada. We have the oil and gas. Why are we still dependent on the Persian Gulf and have put ourselves in that position? Have the government's policies not led to this dependency?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, as I tried to make plain to the hon. member, In fact quite the opposite has happened. We are a net exporter of oil. We are energy self-sufficient in almost every form. In fact, in many areas we are world leaders and world suppliers. One that he does not much appreciate is uranium. We are also energy self-sufficient; we now have our gas bubble. Our problem is one of transportation systems. Our problem is one of infrastructure to bring more to the market.

With respect to oil and oil products, we are at a net value today per day, exporting 275,000 barrels per day more than, for example, we need for our own production. On the question of self-sufficiency, the issue is different from the one he raises about Canadianization.

I want to give him a reference, and I will be very brief. I took a look at what the National Energy Program was projecting the price of oil would be this week, and I just happen to have the figure here. The price was to be $116.63 a barrel.

An hon. member: How much?

Mr. Epp: It was to be $116.63, the international reference price in Montreal because that is where we have our international oil coming in. We were asking Canadians to pay $78.73 under the national energy plan. The $40 difference was going to be made up by taxes. Can we imagine what the price of energy would be with their program?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

CRIMINAL CODE

FIREARMS ACQUISITION CERTIFICATE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should initiate amendments to Part III of the Criminal Code (Firearms) to provide:

1) That a "Firearms Acquisition Certificate" be required for the purchase of ammunition;

2) That there be a mandatory two-week delay between the application for a "Firearms acquisition Certificate" and the actual granting of the "Certificate".

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is part of a two-track approach to tighten gun laws in Canada. This particular motion would amend the Criminal Code to provide that a firearms acquisition certificate must be used in order to obtain ammunition as well as a new firearm, and I will explain the reason for that. The motion also proposes that there be a mandatory two-week waiting period between the application for a firearms acquisition certificate and the actual granting of that certificate.

I said that this motion is part of a two-track approach. I also have on the Order Paper a private member's bill, Bill C-283, which I introduced on February 2, 1990. That bill also demands that the firearms acquisition certificate be necessary for the purchase of ammunition and provides for the two-week delay in obtaining a firearms acquisition certificate. But in addition, the bill requires that the application for the firearms acquisition certificate be accompanied by the signatures of two citizens attesting to the responsibility of the applicant. It also provides that the firearms acquisition certificate be only good for two years rather than five years, so that the police have an opportunity to investigate the applicant on a more regular basis.

I should point out that in the horrible massacre of the 16 women in Montreal in 1989, the killer had a firearms acquisition certificate. However, it was an old one that he had had for several years and his degenerated state of mind had not been subject to examination or to scrutiny over that period of time. I have also proposed, and it is not in this motion, that such weapons as the STRUM semi-automatic rifle, which was used in the École polytechnique massacre, should be placed on the restricted weapon list.

I repeat that this motion, and my bill which is on the Order Paper, were presented to the House of Commons in the aftermath of the December 6, 1989 massacre at the École polytechnique. However, I go on to advise the House that I have been a long-standing proponent of tough gun laws. I have had bills and motions on the Order Paper and debated in this House for more than 20 years. When I was Solicitor General I took steps to tighten our gun laws and that was done while I was a minister in government.

I must say that while advances were made at that time, I was never completely satisfied and incidents since that time have shown that my gut feelings with respect to what was done was correct. The incident at the University of Montreal, the École polytechnique, demonstrated that the laws that we now have, while much tougher than those the United States, are still not adequate.

I would like to briefly describe the present regime for gun controls in Canada. We have three classifications of guns. First of all we have prohibited weapons, which are not permitted to ordinary citizens under any circumstances. These are fully automatic weapons such as machine guns and sawed-off shotguns which can only be used for criminal purposes. Well, prohibited weapons are not allowed for sale to the public but may only be used by the armed forces and by the police.

The next category is restricted weapons. Restricted weapons are hand guns, revolvers and so on and semi-automatic weapons. A person may obtain a restricted weapon for one of five reasons. I will not go into the reasons now but these reasons are set down in the law. You apply for the use of a restricted weapon such as a hand gun, for example, if you are a private detective. That is one of the reasons you may get a permit and obtain a restricted weapon.

Finally, we have what I call regulated weapons. These are ordinary long guns such as rifles and shotguns which are used for hunting and other sporting purposes. These are permitted for sale to the public as long as you have a firearms acquisition certificate when you purchase them. For a long time these guns were subject to no regulation whatsoever.

As a matter of fact, when I first came to Parliament, I can recall a very well-known incident where a young man went to a sporting goods store here on Sparks Street. He was very disturbed, went in and bought a shotgun and took the shotgun to his high school, opened the door and started firing on the class, killing several students and the teacher. This young man was able to buy that shotgun without any questions asked, as if he were buying a package of bubblegum.

It was in the aftermath of that incident that we brought in the firearms acquisition certificate. Now, in order to purchase a long gun, an ordinary rifle or shotgun you need a firearms acquisition certificate and there is a certain investigation before you can get it.

However, there are still many inadequacies and shortcomings in the law. For example, although we have the firearms acquisition certificate, in the present law there is no mandatory delay between the application and the granting of the certificate.

We had an incident in Montreal where a woman, in an extremely emotional situation because she found her husband was fooling around with another woman, went to a sporting goods store to buy a shotgun. When she was told she needed the firearms acquisition certificate, she went to the police and applied in the morning and got the certificate in the afternoon.

The present law says that there should be an investigation by the police, but there is no mandatory delay. She applied in the morning, got the gun in the afternoon and went to her husband's place of business and shot him. That sort of incident demonstrated that a mandatory delay is a reasonable proposal, a reasonable addition, to these laws.

Since I tabled this motion and since I tabled Bill C-283, the government has come forward with legislation. I congratulate the government for Bill C-80 because it does deal with some of the proposals that I have been pushing for many years. For example, it provides for a mandatory delay of 28 days and I think that is a very good measure.

It also provides for one of the other provisions that I have in my bill. I propose that every applicant for a firearms acquisition certificate must have the countersignatures of two citizens in his or her community attesting to the responsibility of the applicant. We do that, by the way, with passport applications. You have to get your passport countersigned by one of a list of people who will certify that you are the person you claim to be.

The minister has stated in Bill C-80 that every applicant will require two references. He or she will also need a photograph to go along with the application which will be on the firearms acquisition certificate. That is not the case now. I think this is an additional protection.

• (1710)

Mr. Speaker, the bill does not go far enough. If we are going to amend Canadian gun laws, I believe we should do it right once and for all. For example, one major gap in the law at the present time is that the firearms acquisition certificate is only required for the purchase of new weapons, it does not apply to all those long guns that have been hanging around in the homes of families on the shelves for years and years.

To cover that situation I have proposed that the firearms acquisition certificate should be required whenever an individual purchases ammunition. I do not see any great problem with that. If you already have a firearms acquisition certificate, you would simply show it when you went to purchase ammunition. This means that you would throw an obstacle in the way of those people who might wish to use a weapon under severe emotional circumstances, a weapon that they might borrow, a weapon that they might have had in the family for a long time. I think that would be a good measure and would not cause too much inconvenience to the law-abiding citizen who wants to go hunting or participate in sport shooting.

By the way, the other thing that should go into the government bill is a shorter renewal period. I refer again to the massacre at the École polytechnique. It is possible that someone at the age of 18 might apply for a firearms acquisition certificate and have a good reputation in the community at that time and have no blemish on his or her record. But if you wait for five years for a renewal, a lot of things can happen.

For example, we have to renew our automobile licences every one or two years. If your record declines considerably in that period of time then you are refused your licence. As a matter of fact you can lose your licence with demerit marks even during the period that you hold the licence.

While I congratulate the government for what is in Bill C-80, I would hope that it would consider the amendments which are contained in my motion before the House and in my bill which is also before the House.

Why do we propose these kinds of laws? There is a very large lobby in Canada opposed to any type of gun law. They have the feeling that we are trying to prevent the law-abiding citizen from having guns which they would use for legitimate purposes such as hunting and sport shooting. Well, that is not the case at all. I have used the analogy over and over again with other activities that we take part in, in life.

No one would think for a moment that because we required the licensing of automobiles and the licensing of chauffeurs and drivers of automobiles that we are trying to restrict legitimate use of automobiles. Not at all. What we are trying to do when we require the testing of people who apply for an automobile licence is to make sure that those who get those licences are responsible people who drive their cars properly and know the rules of the road.

Surely, a gun which was designed and manufactured to kill, whether it be killing an animal in hunting or to kill in war or for the police to protect communities, the purpose of the gun is to kill. If we have licences and registration for automobiles, then surely we should have them for guns. I think this country has accepted that principle for a long time. We have accepted the principle and now it is simply a question of tightening up, of closing the loopholes, closing the gaps so that we make it more complete. But we do not. I have never had any intention of keeping guns away from law-abiding hunters and sport shooters. Canada has had a great record in Olympic sport shooting and international competitions. That is not our goal.

The opponents of stricter gun laws say that if you ban guns, and of course we are not proposing that we ban guns, only criminals will have guns. You see that slogan on bumper stickers and on posters and so on. I must point out that two-thirds of the homicides in Canada are committed under severe emotional circumstances, usually by family members and acquaintances. Most homicides in Canada are not committed by the so-called professional killers. The people who attempt to get guns under severe circumstances are people that usually have never committed a crime before in their lives. It is at those people that we direct our gun laws.

I know that we will never stop homicide altogether. We will have a very difficult time keeping guns out of the hands of the professional criminal, the so-called gangster. They will always find a way to get guns. But two-thirds of our murders are not committed by gangsters or professional killers. They are committed by husband against wife, or by a group of friends who get in an argument over one thing or another, usually with alcohol or drugs involved. Mr. Speaker, it is those people, if you look at the statistics and the records, who look for a gun when they get extremely angry and upset. It is toward them that we formulate these laws.

Again, the opponents of these laws say that we should not put in restrictive measures—what I would call preventive measures—but let us rely on tougher penalties. We know that, while tougher penalties may be one way of approaching the problem, it is not the best way. It is applying the tough penalty after the crime has been committed, the murder has been done. Is it not better to prevent the crime from taking place?

If we had prevented that young man from getting that gun last year at the École polytechnique, those 16 women might still be alive today. There was the case that took place in Ottawa several years ago. If that young man had not got that shotgun that day, those murders may not have taken place. That is why the mandatory delay, which is in my motion and in the government bill, is a good thing. Very often the emotional crisis that the individual is undergoing could very well disappear after a week, 15 days, or two weeks. Lots of things could happen to cool the person down. Even though the individual might have applied for a firearm's acquisition certificate in the hope of getting a gun, first, the police might turn down the application, but second, the circumstances might very well have changed after 28 days.

The gangster or the professional criminal will always get guns. But if we can reduce the number of murders committed with guns by those who are not professional criminals, and that is the large number in Canada, if we can even reduce them by 50 or 100 a year, we will be accomplishing something. I suggest that the House might very well do that.

I want to point out that after we tightened the gun laws in 1978 there was a considerable decline in the rate of crime with guns in the country. The facts are on the record. For the countries of the world with strict gun laws, the rate of crime with guns is much lower than those countries with loose gun laws.

The most flagrant example is the United States where the gun laws for the most part are state laws because the criminal law in the United States is a state responsibility rather than national. The rate of crime with guns in the United States is considerably higher than in Canada and considerably higher than in those countries that have strict gun laws. The most recent statistic is that in the United States 60 per cent of homicides are committed with guns where in Canada only one-third of homicides are committed with guns.

Mr. Speaker, you indicate to me that I have only one minute left. I will just deal in that one minute with another slogan that is put forward by those that lobby against stricter gun laws. The slogan goes that people kill, not guns. Well, of course, people kill and the guns do not kill all by themselves, but it has been demonstrated that guns have been five times more effective in killing than any other weapon, for example, a knife. That is obvious to anyone that knows anything about guns. A gun is an effective way of killing and surely we should do something to keep guns out of the hands of those who are irresponsible, who have a record of alcoholism, mental instability, family violence and so on. These are the people at whom we aim our tougher guns laws.

• (1720)

While I congratulate the government for Bill C-80, I would hope that the ideas that are put forward in this debate will provide it with some thought and perhaps will lead to some amendment of Bill C-80 when we approach that bill later on so that it can be made even a more effective bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today in response to the motion of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce in which the government is asked to initiate the following amendments to Part III of the Criminal Code: first, require a firearms acquisition certificate at the time of purchase of munitions; and second, impose a mandatory two-week delay between the application for a firearms acquisition certificate and the actual granting of the certificate.

Before I go any further, however, I would like to say the hon. member is to be commended for his sustained interest in this aspect of the law. The House will recall that the hon. member played a major role in the proceedings leading up to the passage of the gun control provisions now in effect.

According to certain studies, the percentage of deaths related to the use of firearms is so much lower in Canada than in the United States because of the strict gun control provisions we have in the Criminal Code today. For instance, perhaps I may draw your attention to the special article that appeared on November 1988, in the New England Journal of Medicine, on the impact of handgun regulations in two cities that are very similar, namely Seattle and Vancouver.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians must never forget the date of December 6, 1989, when Marc Lépine, a young man in his early twenties, entered the École polytechnique of the University of Montreal around 5:20 p.m., carrying a semi-automatic .223 caliber Ruger Mini-14, and killed fourteen young women before turning his weapon on himself and taking his own life.

This, the worst killing in Canada's history, caused considerable consternation among the people of Quebec and Canadians in general.

Subsequently, it was found that in this particular case, the application for a firearms acquisition certificate had been made on September 5, 1989, and that the certificate was granted several days later.

Apparently, there was nothing unusual about the way the Quebec authorities processed the application. A routine investigation failed to produce a police record or any other information that would justify rejecting the application. Lépine purchased the firearm on November 21, 1989, with 100 bullets and two secondhand magazines.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, Bill C-80, an Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, was tabled in the House of Commons by the Minister of Justice on June 26, 1990.

This bill contains several provisions that reflect the public's growing concern about violence related to the use of firearms. The government's tabling of Bill C-80 would seem appropriate at this time, to deal with the problem of gun control in Canada. I regret, however that I cannot support the hon. member's motion as such, although I appreciate his motives.

Canadian firearms legislation has always tried to strike a balance between the rights of bona fide, legitimate users and the safety of the Canadian public. This also applies to the proposals tabled in the House.

The amendments proposed in Bill C-80 are the result of long consultation with sports and firearms associations, police corps, public interest groups and provincial authorities.

Hunters, target shooters and collectors have for many years been allowed to own and use firearms, and the proposed legislation is not intended to prevent them from doing so.

Furthermore, regarding the waiting period suggested by the hon. member in his motion, I may point out that the period provided in the bill is twice as long.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendments are intended to give the public better protection by improving the screening procedure for applications for firearms acquisition certificates. Furthermore, the Minister of Justice has announced the government's intention to proclaim the coming into effect of a provision of the Criminal Code enacted in 1977, under which persons applying for a firearms acquisition certificate would have to establish that they have either finished a course or passed a test on the safe handling and use of firearms, before obtaining the certificate. Both course and test must be approved by the Attorney General of the province concerned. However, the provinces have yet to ratify the coming into effect of this provision.

Course content will be established in consultation with the provincial authorities and with the assistance of the Canadian advisory council on firearms. The government, working together with the provinces, will set up a national training program to encourage safe handling and use of firearms. The minister has also announced that the firearms acquisition certificate will be revised to include the owner's photograph.

The requirement that the certificate must be produced when ammunition is purchased would substantially alter the original purpose of the certificate, which was to ensure that individuals who acquire firearms are not a danger to society. The hon. member's proposal would, to a certain extent, have the effect of making the certificate of acquisition a certificate of ownership. I think this is one aspect of the question that could appropriately be considered when Bill C-80 is referred to a legislative committee after second reading.

I am looking forward to further discussion at second reading of the amendments proposed in the bill, in the not too distant future.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this is a very controversial issue and I think that perhaps the parliamentary secretary found a solution: he spoke in French, but with the interpretation it was easy to understand his argument.

[English]

I am just saying that this is a very controversial area and I congratulate my friend, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, for his thorough dealing with the situation and I commend my friend from Edmonton for his fine speech, totally in French.

I support in principle reasonable and workable gun control laws in Canada. My friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce made reference to the tragic situation at the École polytechnique at the University of Montreal on December 6, 1989, when a crazed person massacred 16 women. Again it made us look seriously at our gun control legislation in Canada. I should point out at the time of that happening my colleague, the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands, said in the House and I will quote from her comments on December 11. She said:

> Mr. Speaker, today in Montreal thousands of women are mourning the deaths of 14 women at the hands of a gun-toting madman. He was able to buy his semi-automatic rifle because he had met all legal requirements.
>
> On Saturday, the Prime Minister said the ease with which Marc Lepine obtained his instrument of mass murder was "serious and unacceptable". He is quoted as saying his government would deal with the problem if necessary.
> The fact that a man with serious psychological problems was able to legally obtain a powerful rifle and kill and wound more than two dozen innocent people should make it obvious even to the Prime Minister that action is necessary.

The member went on to call for legislation and legislation has been brought forward by the government in the form of Bill C-80. The parliamentary secretary was making reference to this matter.

I would like to deal with the motion. As the hon. member said, the present situation is that everyone who wants to obtain a non-restricted firearm in Canada needs to have a firearm acquisition certificate. Of course, that does not apply to people before 1978. It is an important matter to remember.

Non-restricted weapons, FACs as they are called, are rather simple to obtain. Depending on the province and where you live, you can obtain one within a few hours, or a few weeks if it involves the mail. The body responsible in the province for granting the FAC does a check of criminal records involving violent crime and mental illness involving violence. Although it is rarely an in-depth investigation, there is no problem, the FAC is granted.

It is more difficult to obtain restricted weapons, as you might expect. As I said, individuals who obtained weapons before 1978 and have not obtained a weapon since do not need to have FACs.

I will deal first with part two of the motion. The motion calls for a mandatory two-week delay between the application of an FAC and a granting of the licence. The idea, I gather, is to ensure a cooling off period to stop individuals from buying guns on impulse, as the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce outlined a few cases about this, and the individuals using the gun.

I noticed the member proposed in his motion two weeks. The government bill, Bill C-80, asked for a delay of 28 days. That would make his motion less onerous than the government bill. He says the government bill is better. We will get to consider that I believe in Bill C-80 in committee, and that is one matter we should look at.

Part one of this motion today is the more controversial element of the motion. As it states, it would require that individuals have an FAC to obtain ammunition. This would have several important effects. On the positive side, it would ensure that those who had obtained a weapon illegally would have difficulty getting ammunition without an FAC. On the other hand, we might as well acknowledge this, it would not in fact affect those people who have had a gun before 1978 and do not need to have an FAC. So in a sense, it is retroactive legislation, although indirect if you like retroactive legislation, but it has a retroactive effect nevertheless. That is something that this committee has to consider and consider very carefully because it potentially applies to hundreds of thousands of people in the country. I want to deal with that controversial matter.

I have just become justice critic for my party. I have looked at my mail and I see many letters. Here is a letter from a Mr. Jarvis in North Vancouver who writes to me and says he thinks Bill C-80 is unfair because it really does not succeed in hitting those people who misuse guns and it hits the people, the hunters, and others who are law-abiding citizens. You get that view expressed widely. The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce dealt with that in his speech.

Here is another view from one of my constituents, Miss Elizabeth Thunstrom. Her view is the opposite. She points out that she is very much is favour of more restriction when it comes to firearms, so you have a divided public on this matter. I personally think that the people of Canada are in favour of gun control, accept gun control and want workable gun control.

I am told that there is a difference between people who live in rural areas and those who live in urban areas. For example, trappers, guides and outfitters use guns as tools. If an outfitter goes on a canoe trip, drops his gun, drops his ammunition and has to get more, the question is: does he have to wait two weeks or 28 days or so on in order to get another check or another firearms acquisition certificate? These are real issues for a group of people and we have to find a way that we can make this thing workable.

I personally feel that it is in the long-term interest of those who legally possess guns in Canada, hunters, trappers, gun collectors and people who have a legitimate interest in guns, to have proper gun control as well. I believe that with some thought, in committee we can bridge the gap here. It may be that we have to work out a system in our country where the municipalities could have some control so, for instance, in metropolitan Toronto it would be very difficult to get a permit for guns or ammunition whereas in the municipality of Prince Rupert it might be a lot easier, in the sense that there are more people who are trapping and hunting for a living in Prince Rupert. That is just a thought and that will have to be considered at the committee.

Again, I support the motion in principle. I believe that we can deal with some of these matters in detail when the legislation hits the legislative committee.

Finally, I would like to say that we should compare our situation in Canada with that of the United States. In Canada, we consistently have had stronger gun laws than the Americans. I think the result of this is partly responsible for the fact that we have less violence in our society. In general, each time we strengthen gun laws we do succeed in limiting the illegal use of firearms in Canada. I believe tougher gun control laws are overwhelmingly supported by Canadians, especially when we contrast them with the American situation, with the one caveat that we try to find a less onerous and bureaucratic way for those people who are in rural areas or who use guns in the course of their work, as is the case for trappers and guides.

As the École polytechnique tragedy shows, we cannot become complacent. As we have suggested before and after the tragedy, our laws can and must be strengthened and made to work better. I look forward to seeing Bill C-80 in committee and look forward to finding ways that we can make this legislation workable and that we can continue, as the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce said, to in fact make Canada a safer society and that we can focus our gun laws so that we are looking at that group of people which he said committed the two-thirds of homicides that were not committed by professional killers but by people in trouble; in family situations often times, disturbed people, the Lepines of this world.

• (1740)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Halifax.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise to speak in support of this motion moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

I think it is of maximum importance to the people of Canada and perhaps most particularly to the women of Canada that such an amendment to the gun control legislation be brought forward. I refer particularly to my colleague's recommendation that there be a mandatory two-week delay between the application for a firearms acquisition certificate and the actual granting of a certificate.

I do not think anyone who lived in Canada will forget that night of December 6, 1989. I recall it very clearly. Indeed, it was the night of a celebration in our caucus. It was the night of a Christmas party, a night when a number of members of Parliament were getting together before we would all return to our ridings. Late in the evening, we were joined by our colleague, the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. When he entered the room, I could tell that something terrible had happened. He told us of the appalling events, the massacre of the 16 young women at the École polytechnique. I remember the comment of another colleague at that point who said: "Things like that do not happen in Canada".

I recall again the next day when all of us on all sides of this House were united in sorrow and in mourning for the death of these young women. We all felt that way, that things like this do not happen in Canada. Indeed, we used to enjoy that belief and that certainty that things like this did not happen in Canada. Unfortunately, that is no longer the case.

I certainly have no wish to denigrate in any way the appalling tragedy of the École polytechnique, but violence has become a common thing in our country, most particularly in our cities. I am sorry to say, in my own city of Halifax where violent crime was practically non-existent when I was growing up, the incidents of murder by guns has increased substantially and, with that, an increase in death by firearms.

There comes, whether we really are aware of it on the surface or not, a hardening of attitude. Along with that are the rapid changes in our culture. I refer particularly to the kinds of television and film that we are exposed to. What is happening is that we are becoming desensitized to the issue of guns. We are becoming desensitized to the sight of people being killed or maimed by firearms.

Now I am not, by any means, suggesting that Canadians are not moved and are not disturbed greatly by this change in our own attitude. I am not suggesting that Canadians are totally insensitive or even past, if you will, the 50 per cent line of sensitivity on the issue of gun control and access to guns. What I am saying is that we are farther down the road than we were even half a generation ago. I want to make very clear that, as my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce said earlier, I am not attempting to prevent hunters or sports shooters in this country from access to their use of firearms in a well trained, law-abiding manner.

I have spoken to lobby groups in my own riding. I have spoken to national lobby groups as well. I am not particularly keen on firearms at all. I will be perfectly honest. They make me nervous. However, I know there are lots of people, women and men in this country, who are expert in the use of firearms and in whose possession they will be used for their correct purpose. These are not the situations we need worry about.

When I think of Marc Lepine, when I think of those young women in Montreal, when I think that tonight in every major city in Canada many women and children will be menaced by firearms, because it is happening on a daily basis, when I think that our gradual desensitization to the whole issue of violence is becoming more and more the norm and less and less the exception, and when I remember those young women who died and I know that every day in this country women are dying from violent crime, then I say we cannot merely do the adequate. We must push beyond that to the ultimate and ensure that our gun control legislation is the finest in the world, that our gun control legislation offers the kind of protection that Canadians deserve.

I have heard frequently from people who oppose gun control the rather nauseating phrase that suggests that people who are in favour of gun control are a bit dull, that guns do not kill people; people kill people. Certainly that is a truism: people do kill people, but it makes it a whole lot easier if a gun is put in the hands of those people.

Mr. Boudria: Too easy.

Ms. Clancy: Much too easy. It also is another example of the difference between this country and our neighbour to the south. In their constitution they have the right to bear arms. That is their constitution and that is fine. It is not in our Constitution.

I recall, when I was teaching at the University of British Columbia some 15 years ago, giving a seminar to Customs officers. They told me at the time that one of their big problems is Americans who drive through British Columbia on their way to Alaska and have firearms in their cars. It is the practice of our Canadian Customs officers to dismantle the guns. They are wrapped up some way and sealed, and then when they reach the Canada—Alaska border the seals are broken and they are given back. The same process applies on the way back.

One Customs officer said that his worst problem was the abuse he took from American citizens saying: "We have the right to bear arms". He would say: "Yes, you may well have the right to bear arms, but you don't have the right to bear arms in my country".

Mr. Boudria: Not here you don't.

Ms. Clancy: That is something I think we have always been proud of in Canada. We do not have the right to bear arms because we do not need the right to bear arms.

Mr. Boudria: And we don't want it.

Ms. Clancy: "And we don't want it", adds my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell adds.

Again, we are not talking about hunters. We are not talking about sport shooters. I am sorry, this is the second time today that I have lost out on remembering a particular Olympic sport and the young woman from British Columbia who won the Olympic Gold Medal.

Mr. Hughes: Nancy Greene.

Ms. Clancy: No, Nancy Greene was the skier. The young woman who was the shooter in the Olympic competition is now a faculty member of St. Mary's University in Halifax, Nova Scotia. It is most remiss of me to forget her name.

Mr. Speaker: Susan Natras.

Ms. Clancy: Susan Natras. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

At any rate this is not what we are talking about. We are talking about the very serious subject of handguns. We are talking about automatic weapons. We are talking about the need to protect Canadians and the need to continue to be in the forefront in the free world for all people to say: "This is the way we live in Canada". This is the kinder and gentler society that other people aspire to but which we have achieved. We will only achieve this kinder and gentler society, thanks to Mr. Bush, if we continue to show the human face on this kind of legislation and make the restrictions fit the kind of Canada we all wish to participate in.

• (1750)

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has proposed that the government make certain changes to the gun control provisions of the Criminal Code. He wants to require a firearms acquisition certificate for the purchase of ammunition, and he wants a mandatory two-week delay between the application for an FAC and the time at which it is issued to the applicant.

As most members of this House will be aware, the Minister of Justice has tabled Bill C-80, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, in this House since the hon. member introduced his motion.

Bill C-80 contains extensive changes to the law of gun control in Canada and is supplemented by a number of non-legislative measures. Canada's gun control law is based on three basic elements. First, it seeks to deter those who would misuse firearms through specific firearms offences and penalties. Second, it seeks to restrict or prohibit access to certain types of firearms believed to be a greater than average threat to public safety. Third, it seeks to screen out those persons who should not have access to guns and deny them that access.

The firearms acquisition certificate, or FAC, is a key part of the screening process. All Canadians who wish to acquire a gun in any manner, whether by purchase, loan, gift, or even inheritance, must first undergo the necessary screening process and get an FAC.

It is an offence for anyone to give a firearm to any person without proof that the recipient of the gun is a holder of a valid FAC, and it is an offence for any person to obtain a gun unless he or she is the holder of a valid up-to-date FAC.

The legislative and regulatory package recently put forward by the Minister of Justice seeks to improve the FAC in a number of ways. First, it would require those who want an FAC to pass a course or test in firearms safety. Second, it would require them to provide the names of two references who could provide the police firearms officer with additional background information. Third, it would require them to provide an up-to-date photograph that would be attached to the FAC so that unauthorized use would become impossible. Fourth, it would require the applicant wait at least 28 days between the application and receiving his or her FAC. This is double the delay period proposed by my colleague.

As any member of this House who has recently obtained a firearm will be aware, it generally takes at least two weeks for the police to process an application. This delay is not mandatory. It is simply the time required to conduct the necessary check and fill out the forms.

The four-week delay proposed in the minister's bill would significantly lighten the existing wait, and it would ensure a more or less uniform wait as most applications could be dealt with properly in a month. It would also ensure that an FAC was not used in less than a month, even in cases where the paperwork was completed in less time than that.

The Minister of Justice has said that this waiting period is intended to allow firearms officers time to conduct a proper background check, but it seems to me that it will also reduce firearms incidents for another reason. It seems to me that where a person wants to obtain a firearm to commit a crime or perhaps to commit suicide, a one-month delay might well force that person to reconsider. It might in some cases force that person to reflect on the implications of their acts to the point where they decide not to act at all.

For this reason I would support the idea behind this part of the motion. It is a good idea and worthy of support in this House. I am sure that this is why the Minister of Justice has included a similar proposal in her bill, and I am sure the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce will want to support the minister's bill for that reason.

The hon. member has made another proposal in his motion. He has proposed that the same FAC document be required for purchasing ammunition for any firearm. Unfortunately I cannot support this proposal. I believe that it would cause many problems for the police and others involved in the FAC process, and I cannot see any advantages if any exist at all. I am afraid I cannot see any advantage that it would bring in terms of reduced crime, accidents, suicides, or any of the firearms related problems that exist in our country today.

It seems to me that one of the advantages of our present FAC system is that it concentrates on those persons who we think are the greatest risk as firearms owners, those who have just acquired or are about to acquire their guns.

You do not need an FAC to keep a gun. You only need one to acquire a gun. Once you have had the gun for a length of time and have not committed a crime or had an accident with it, I would think that the chances of such an incident ought to drop considerably.

Persons who obtain a gun sometimes do so intending to use it for a crime, and persons who are new gun owners and are not familiar with guns ought to be much more likely to have accidents with them.

I would suggest that this is why the FAC system concentrates its efforts on these people. It concentrates the scarce resources of the police firearms authorities on those situations where we hope they will do the most good.

What then would be the effect of our colleague's proposal? It would force any gun owner who wants to shoot his gun to have an FAC so as to be able to buy ammunition. It would presumably make anyone who sold or even gave ammunition to another person into a criminal unless a valid FAC certificate was presented.

Many Canadians who have owned firearms for years without any problem whatsoever have no FAC. They may have had the guns since before 1978 when an FAC requirement became law, or they may have bought a gun since then using an FAC and not renewed or replaced it.

There is no need to get another FAC to keep a gun you already have. You only need an FAC if you want to get another gun. The hon. member's proposal would change this. He would require the FAC to buy ammunition. He would require those gun owners who have owned their guns without any problems to undergo the FAC screening process regularly.

He would subject them to a more intensive screening process than is contained in the minister's bill. He would force police authorities who must conduct the screening to screen them over and over again, consuming time and resources that could be better used to conduct more effective screening of new gun owners who pose a much greater risk to the public and even to themselves.

• (1800)

I am afraid I cannot support this part of my colleague's motion. I recognize the hon. member's good intentions in putting it forward, but I am afraid that I see it as unworkable and potentially harmful to the existing gun control system and I cannot support it for that reason.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in today's debate. I hope that, once and for all, the Conservative government will explain why it insists on misleadingly advertising the GST.

Mr. Speaker, I want to sum up the question I asked in the House last June 1. In short, I wanted to know why the government would not withdraw the GST advertising which I described as being misleading. The Minister of National Revenue told me, and I quote: "I simply want to add for the interest of the hon. member and all members in this House that the GST is not a new tax, even in the service sector".

[English]

I read further. On that day, the minister answered questions about the false and misleading advertising of his government. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, we analyzed these ads very carefully prior to making them public, particularly after the Speaker's ruling some months ago about another ad of which the hon. member is well aware.

What happened is that the government was telling us that the radio ads of the Conservative government were not false and misleading. We are talking now about the radio ads.

These "spots" as they are called in radio language, had been featured across Canada and Mr. Paul Tuz of the Greater Toronto Better Business Bureau had complained about them to the CRTC.

Mr. Speaker, you know me. Sometimes I decide to take up these challenges myself as well, so I decided to write a letter to the Canadian Advertising Foundation.

I said to myself: "In the unlikely event that someone thinks that I am not totally objective about this thing," which probably would not be the case anyway, but in the event that they said that, I said: "I will let an independent arbitrator be the judge."

"The Advertising Standards Council of the Canadian Advertising Foundation sounds to me to be pretty objective, at least more objective than the Minister of National Revenue." Listen to what they had to say. They wrote to me on August 2, 1990. They said:

> Dear Mr. Boudria:
>
> The Canadian Advertising Foundation has followed up on your complaint concerning Government of Canada advertising of the Goods and Services Tax.

It said the following in addition:

> The Standards Division of the Canadian Advertising Foundation wrote to the Minister of Finance on June 13, 1990 to advise of the complaints received about this advertising and to inform the Department that the complaints and the advertising in question would be the subject to a review by the Advertising Standards Council at a meeting on July 19, 1990.
>
> On that date, the Advertising Standards Council did indeed review the material to determine compliance with the Canadian Code of Advertising Standards.

I invite the hon. parliamentary secretary opposite to pay close attention to the following sentence. It reads as follows:

> The Council ruled that two of the spots entitled "Future" and "The Consumer" to be in violation of Clause 1 of the Canadian Code of Advertising Standards.

Clearly, an independent body has ruled that my complaint was right and that the minister's answer on July 1 was wrong.

I invite the parliamentary secretary to tell us now whether he thinks the Canadian Advertising Foundation, the Advertising Standards Council and 85 per cent of Canadians are wrong and that his minister was right.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague opposite for giving me the opportunity to reply.

The hon. member from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has expressed concern about, as he terms it, "the $14 million advertising campaign to promote the dreaded GST". Before addressing the member's concerns, I would like to point out that the cost of radio and newspaper advertising in May and June on the GST was about $3.5 million.

• (1805)

As pointed out in the hon. member's question, Mr. Paul Tuz, President of the Better Business Bureau of Metropolitan Toronto, asked the CRTC to remove the government's current radio advertisements from the airwaves because one line was felt to be misleading, and I quote: "It" being the GST "is not an additional tax".

The Better Business Bureau argues that services are not currently subject to a federal sales tax but will be taxed under the GST system. The GST is therefore viewed by the Better Business Bureau as an additional tax on services and not a replacement tax.

This argument seems relatively simple and complete. It demonstrates, however, a complete lack of knowledge of the current federal sales tax system because services are taxed indirectly today through business inputs. Many service industries purchase manufactured goods such as computer systems, office equipment, cars, trucks, gasoline and alcoholic beverages, all of which have federal sales tax embedded in their price.

The service sector currently pays an 11 per cent federal sales tax on most telecommunications charges. These taxes invariably are not paid by the businesses but are passed on to the consumers. A percentage of the $700 of federal sales tax collected from each Canadian every year is collected indirectly through the service sector. Although the tax base for the GST will be broadened to ensure a more equitable system, the government is expected to raise net revenues of about $18.5 billion. This represents about the same amount the current federal sales tax would have raised had it remained in place.

Mr. Boudria: It's revenue neutral, right?

Mr. Reid: I will read that again, Mr. Speaker. Although the tax base for the GST will be broadened to ensure a more equitable system, the government is expected to raise net revenues of about $18.5 billion. This represents about the same amount the current federal sales tax would have raised had it remained in place.

In light of these facts, it is clear that the GST is not an additional tax. It is a replacement tax.

The radio advertisements in May and June were factual and straightforward. They were designed to correct the misconceptions demonstrated by the Better Business Bureau of Toronto and, if I may say, the hon. member.

The government has received 360,000 calls on a toll-free information line.

Mr. Speaker, I see you urging me to complete.

Since the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has posed his question in the House, this issue of the government's radio ads has received further attention. On August 27, 1990, we responded to the Canadian Advertising Foundation. I am happy, either to lay on the table of the House or to give my hon. colleague a copy of the statement issued at the time and a letter that accompanied it.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, as the newly appointed associate environment critic for my party, responsible for international environment, and a member of the international debt sub-committee of the Standing Committee on External Affairs which tabled the report "Securing Our Global Future-Canada's Stake in the Unfinished Business of Third World Debt", I am pleased to be able to expand on a question I posed in the House on June 8.

I want to expand and further expose a major contradiction which I raised in that Question Period on June 8. It is related to the Export Development Corporation. That contradiction is that while the Export Development Corporation, EDC, administers about a billion dollar budget of our tax dollars, it is exempt from environmental assessment.

In my question to the minister of that day, it is clear that this government places economic priorities not only separate from the environment, but economic priorities are given precedence. So much for linking the economy and the environment. So much for the holistic language of the Brundtland commission report on the environment and the economy.

• (1810)

The Export Development Corporation is a federal Crown corporation whose job it is to promote exports by providing subsidies of various kinds to big banks, such as the Bank of Montreal and the Toronto-Dominion Bank, and to corporations such as Inco and Canadian General Electric. An example of some of the work they do: in Argentina there is the EDC-backed construction of a CANDU nuclear reactor that continually breaks down, creating chaos for the economy, threatening the environment and resulting in millions of dollars in losses to the Canadian taxpayer.

In Mexico there is EDC support for another CANDU to be built by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. This one, never even begun, likewise pushed Mexico further into debt; the connections between international debt crisis, our own deficit and our environmental problems are clear. In Colombia, the EDC backed the Guavio hydroelectric complex which has become synonymous in that country with white elephant. As the leading Colombian news magazine, Semana, their Time magazine, pointed out, the cost overruns alone from this ill-conceived project equalled half the nation's entire budget for social programs.

This is what our report on Third World debt pointed out, that we are contributing to the Third World debt by so-called hand-outs. We are not helping them by giving them money for that sort of thing.

Colombians suffered, obviously, as a result but not Canadian General Electric, which carried out the work. The EDC saw to that. Our tax dollars saw to that.

With our government agencies throwing money at environmentally harmful projects like these in order to promote exports at a loss, is it any wonder that the Canadian taxpayers are suffering or that Third World economy and environment is in such shambles. Having the Export Development Corporation exempt from environmental assessment review process is not good for the environment. It is not good for the people of the developing world, either their economies, their environment or their working methods, and it is not good for the Canadian taxpayer.

There are two ways that the government can approach this. We have got the much touted Green Plan that is coming forth, and I am looking forward to seeing whether there is real meat behind all of the fuzz that we have seen up to now. There is also Bill C-78, the environmental assessment review process. I urge the government to give real teeth to Bill C-78 to include the Export Development Corporation in their environmental review process. I urge the government to put real teeth in that Green Plan to make certain that the kind of investments our taxpayers are putting into international development not only bring benefits to Canada, because that of course is the intent—and I do not think any of us are against that—but that those contributions also flow to the rest of the world.

We are globally interdependent if not interlinked. Our government policies should demonstrate that.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to address the House today on a subject which is obviously very important to my friend opposite and I think to all Canadians, the environment. The member for Saanich—Gulf Islands has expressed considerable dismay that the EDC may not be subject to the federal environmental assessment review process.

Frankly, my hon. colleague is quite justified in her concerns. The current environmental assessment and review process guidelines order was created in 1984 by a previous government that was on its way out the door. That guideline makes the application of environmental assessment process strictly voluntary for Crown corporations such as EDC and the Canadian Commercial Corporation as well. That my hon. colleague should express concern about such an apparent loophole in the environmental assessment process is quite understandable and reasonable. It is because of a multitude of such loopholes and weaknesses that the government is undertaking to replace the outdated guideline with the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

Bill C-78, which my colleague talked about, was tabled in the House on June 18 and was part of a comprehensive package of environmental assessment reforms designed to do away with a guideline that never did work as effectively as it should have to protect the environment. We will create in its place an effective, efficient, and accessible environmental assessment process, built around the goal of sustainable development, a process that will move Canada into the forefront of environmental protection and keep us there for many years to come.

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will ensure that all Schedule 3 Crown corporations are subject to the federal environmental assessment process by means of special regulations. This approach has been taken to protect the competitive nature of such corporations. It must be recognized that the operational requirements of Crown corporations are very different from those of federal departments and agencies. Their special circumstances require greater managerial autonomy and flexibility. This fact has been recognized in a separate financial regime established for them under the Financial Administration Act and will be recognized in a separate assessment regime to be established for them under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

The EDC and the CCC represent special cases that are very useful in illustrating the government's commitment to both the economy and the environment, in short, sustainable development.

The granting of commercial credit and the development of Canadian export markets is a highly competitive international business. A significant portion of Canada's economy depends on success in exporting our goods and services. But the hon. member from Saanich—Gulf Islands is quite right. Canadian exports can sometimes contribute to projects which in turn are damaging to the environment. This is just another example of the way in which a lack of environmental stewardship in one country can be visited upon its neighbours and its partners.

Measures taken to address this concern, however, must be implemented in a manner that is both environmentally and economically effective. We must not lose sight of the important role played by Canadian exporters, a role that can only be sustained on a level playing-field where exporters from all countries face a similar set of competitive circumstances.

Our course of action will see a strong Canadian initiative to develop an international consensus among the world's leading export nations on the role that environmental assessment must play in export decisions. In this way a level competitive playing-field can be maintained, the sovereignty of individual nations can be respected, and the environment can be protected far beyond just the Canadian jurisdiction. This international consensus in turn will provide for a special regulation under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act to establish an environmental assessment process for the Export Development Corporation and the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, the government is prepared to take effective action on both the environment and the economy and to integrate both in a way that will move Canada and the world toward sustainable development. Would that our colleagues on the other side of the House were as committed to the environment as to the economy, let alone both.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

CROWN CORPORATIONS DISSOLUTION OR TRANSFER AUTHORIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)) moved that Bill C-73, an act to provide for the dissolution or transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to lead off the debate on second reading on Bill C-73, the Crown Corporations Dissolution or Transfer Authorization Act.

Most hon. members will be aware that this bill responds to commitments made in last February's budget. The budget said the following and I quote:

> We will continue to privatize Crown corporations and sell investments where government ownership is no longer needed to meet public policy objectives.
> We are also winding up a number of Crown corporations and other agencies whose functions can be handled effectively by other organizations.
> Organizations that will be wound up and whose functions will be transferred to other entities include Canada Harbour Place Corporation, Canadian Patents and Development Ltd., and the Canadian Livestock Feed Board.

That is what the budget said and today we are here to deliver on those commitments. The budget named three of the corporations to be dealt with and the legislation we are considering names an additional three. These are Harbourfront Corporation, Canada Museums Construction Corporation and Mingan Associates.

Before dealing with the particulars of these six Crown corporations and agencies I would like to paint a clear picture of the government's objectives for the better management of Crown corporations.

We know that Crown corporations have played, and will continue to play, an important role in the development of the economic, social and cultural fabric of Canada. Crown corporations can be powerful and effective instruments of public policy—their relative autonomy and freedom to operate make them capable of responding to the needs of Canadians and to changes in the external environment in ways impossible for government departments.

Crown corporations, in aggregate, represent a significant proportion of federal public sector assets and employment—the 57 parent Crowns and 112 wholly-owned subsidiaries account for assets in the amount of approximately $54 billion, employ 140,000 people, and receive annual payments of some $4.9 billion from the federal treasury.

[Translation]

Crowns are often charged with providing goods and services to clients that the private sector, for whatever reason, chooses not to serve, but they are also tasked with being financially viable and, in some instances, with earning a positive return on Canada's equity investment in them.

Our Agenda for Economic Renewal, which was presented in November 1984, is a sweeping plan to renew Canada's economy. The Agenda is motivated by two mutually reinforcing principles: First, to restore health, integrity and discipline to the federal government's finances; and second, to restructure our economic framework to ensure that the market forces of the private sector, not government signals, drive the economy.

[English]

In short, we wanted to remove constraints that lay in the way of dynamic economic activity and having done that to let market forces and enterprising individuals take the initiative. We see that as the way to ensure vitality in our economy and to make it—and to keep it—internationally competitive.

While fiscal progress has been a vitally important part of our action plan, we have also made, and are continuing to make, significant changes that improve the way the economy operates.

• (1010)

The 1984 Agenda paper was the first formal declaration of the government's intention to assess the continued use of Crown corporations as instruments of public policy. It noted that although each corporation was established to serve what, at that time, might have been a public policy purpose, we had to ask ourselves whether that remained the case. If it did not, it was important to consider whether the corporation should be retained. The Agenda paper also noted that some Crown corporations were predominantly, or in some cases entirely, commercial in character, and that it was appropriate to consider whether continued public ownership was in the best interests of either the company or the country.

The Agenda set out this government's approach to management which would be centred on financial discipline and efficiency. It stated that our Crown corporations must set new standards for sound management and financial performance, rather than provide examples of inefficiency and massive losses.

Since 1984, I am pleased to note that much progress has been achieved.

There has been significant rationalization of the Crown corporation portfolio. The number of parent corporations has been reduced over the past six years through the sale of all or part of 18 corporations and the dissolution of eight entities, representing an over-all transfer of more than $5 billion in assets to the private sector.

The privatization program is a success story and an initiative that complements our other actions to curb government spending, reduce annual deficits and control the growth in public debt. Air Canada and Teleglobe were in sufficiently robust financial health to attract enthusiastic private sector investors. The sale of Canadair to Bombardier has permitted the company to benefit from the expertise of one of the world's leading manufacturers and to expand its product line into the regional jet niche.

I would like to observe that there have been some real management success stories. For example, CNs balance sheet improvements—long-term debt is down from $3.5 billion in 1986 to $2 billion in 1989; productivity improvements at Canada Post—that corporation became profitable in 1988-89, producing a profit of $96 million in 1988-89 and $149 million in 1989-90. Compare that, Madam Speaker, to an operating loss of almost $400 million in 1984-85; and CMHC, through it's competitive financing renewal process, instituted in 1988, will save an estimated $54 million per year by 1992 by minimizing the interest rates paid by social housing sponsors.

Employment in Crown corporations in general was reduced from over 200,000 in 1984 to 140,000 in 1989. While over half of this reduction was due to the privatization of certain Crown corporations, a very significant portion was attributable to productivity gains that were achieved in the Crown corporations that remain our portfolio. Budgetary payments to Crown corporations in 1988-89, at less than $5 billion, represent a reduction, in real terms, of 9 per cent from those in 1984-85. Liabilities of Crown corporations are down over the same period by 12 per cent in real terms as well.

We have also taken firm action in other cases. The reduction in financial commitment to VIA Rail was a long overdue and necessary step towards ensuring that Canadians retain a passenger service that is, above all, affordable. Marine Atlantic's funding levels were cut by $36 million in 1984-85. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited's heavy water plants in Glace Bay and Port Hawkesbury, Nova Scotia were closed because they were making a product for which there was no market. However, the government recently entered into a joint funding arrangement with provincial electrical utilities to revitalize AECL's research and development program, and AECL continues its restructuring efforts to ensure the long-term viability of its commercial operations. It was amply clear that there is a continuing trend internationally toward more reliance on market forces. It is evident not only in the extraordinary rapid rise of the newly industrialized countries of the Pacific Rim and in the European Community's move towards a single market by 1992, but also in the remarkable events that have occurred in Communist states in eastern and central Europe.

The rebirth of belief in the market economy, the reality of the globalization of economies and the benefits of market discipline bring a growing recognition of the interdependence of nations and peoples economically, social and most importantly, environmentally. These realities force both the private and public sectors to become more flexible and responsive to changing conditions.

For those corporations remaining with the Crown corporation family, we must look to continuing improvement in financial performance. Since deficit reduction remains a prime objective of this government, we must work at lowering the net fiscal burden of the Crowns.

For Crown corporations dependent on appropriations, we must continue to examine how the load on the public treasury can be reduced. Much of the room to manoeuvre will have to come from efficiency gains. Profitable Crown corporations will be asked to return more to the shareholder. The government has invested significant resources in these Crown corporations and, as shareholder, it should normally expect a return on its equity. These corporations are establishing divided policies to encourage management to function in a more commercial way. Over the next two years, new dividend initiatives are expected to yield over $150 million. Crown corporations have contributed to the restructuring of the economy, the goal this government put forward in 1984 and will continue to do so as we realize our goal of achieving a more market oriented flexible and competitive economy.

In this environment the government will continue to examine whether certain Crown corporations are still needed to achieve public policy goals, or whether these goals can be met more efficiently through other means, such as through privatization, tax, regulatory or other program means.

It is just this kind of examination, and the purposes, that has led the government to propose the six initiatives contemplated in the bill before us today.

This bill would provide the authority:

(1) for the Minister of Transport to dispose of the shares of Canada Harbour Place Corporation through their sale or transfer to another federal entity, thus removing a parent Crown corporation from the management of this Vancouver complex that includes a hotel, office tower, convention centre and retail operation;

(2) for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology to wind up and dissolve Canadian Patents and Development Limited and transfer patents and licences to departments and agencies of source, including universities who best know how to take advantage of them;

(3) for the Minister of Agriculture to dissolve the Canadian Livestock Feed Board and transfer program responsibility unchanged to the Department of Agriculture, a saving of a considerable amount of money;

(4) for the Minister of Public Works to change the Canadian Museums Construction Corporation from a parent Crown corporation to a subsidiary as a step toward eventual dissolution, in recognition of the fact that the Canadian Museums Construction Corporation's mandate was to build the National Gallery of Canada and the Museum of Civilization, both have been completed;

(5) and for the same minister to wind up and dissolve Toronto's Harbourfront Corporation once a settlement has been negotiated with Ontario, the city of Toronto and other parties. The proceeds from the sale of the assets will be used to provide for the development of parks and infrastructure on the site and to assist in the creation of an independent, locally-controlled entity having a capacity to continue the very excellent cultural programming that we know takes place at Harbourfront in Toronto;

(6) and finally, for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to dissolve Mingan Associates, Ltd., an inactive Crown corporation.

• (1020)

In summary, we are getting out of inappropriate roles and allocating tasks to where they can be best performed without additional overheads and we are recognizing that when a job is done, the shop that did the job should be phased out. Eminently logical actions, each and every one. Actions that can be and will be supported.

Canadians are very much aware of the size of the federal deficit and the debt load. They want to be assured that the government is a careful custodian of their tax dollars. The savings from these initiatives are modest, but the initiatives are nonetheless a clear indication of a process of critical self-examination that will be welcomed. Canadians are more prepared than ever to review how the government delivers public services and goods. If delivery can be arranged more intelligently or more efficiently, then Canadians, I believe, will support a change.

I therefore commend this legislation to the House and recommend its early passage.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to rise and speak on behalf of the Opposition in relation to Bill C-73, which the government describes as mostly housekeeping and a dissolution and transfer of government-owned assets in Crown corporations.

I would like to start with one or two general comments before I deal with the specifics of the bill. The comments relate to the general field of privatization and regulatory affairs. We can see that it has been recognized for approximately a decade that the role of government in a mixed economy requires continuing reassessment of the government's presence and role in the market-place. That analysis is one that is quantitative and qualitative and we now see, after many years of government growth, the real need to do that.

There are two ways in which we have done that here in Parliament and in government. The first area is the encroachment on the market-place and the cost of government regulatory activity. The second involves the wartime and post-war growth of Crown corporations and Crown enterprises in the market-place. We realized that this growth, this proliferation could not go on forever. In the late sixties and early seventies we became aware of what an economist and author, Peter Drucker, called certain discontinuities which call upon all of us in the western world to reassess the role of state enterprises in our mixed economies and the word I use here is "reassess".

This does not mean that we resort and beat a retreat to Wall Street capitalism. We do not mean that at all. It just means that we have the need to continue to reassess and scrutinize this area carefully, based on short-term and long-term government goals. I know that we do not have, on the other side of the House, a bunch of neo-Conservative carpet-baggers who are intent on plundering and selling everything we have in our Canadian corporate heritage. I know that there are reasonable members and ministers over there and I know that the process of fair and honest scrutiny will continue.

I want to recognize as well the advances that have been made in this area of scrutiny. It goes back well over a decade and is based on the work of parliamentarians and public servants who realized that times were changing and that we had a great deal of work to do. They are to be commended for their fine work in this area.

What we have now is a system of laws, procedures and institutions that are there to audit and scrutinize government presence in the market-place and government regulatory activity.

I would like to put on the record what are now said to be the five preliminary criteria for determination of whether or not a Crown enterprise should be privatized. I put them on the record because they are very relevant to the debate on privatization. They are as follows: First, does the corporation play a continuing role in the support of national and regional public policy objectives? Second, does the company have the potential to be commercially viable? Third, is it ready to operate in the private sector? Fourth, will privatization be compatible with other federal government policies such as bilingualism, competition, foreign investment and trade? Fifth, what will the effect be on the employees, competitors, suppliers or customers, all of which are proper elements of a criterion for assessment of whether or not an enterprise should be privatized.

The first one, does the corporation play a continuing role in the policy area, begs another question. We have to ask just what those regional and national policy goals are. We know that governments will differ from time to time on just what those policies will be. If we are not going to be able to agree on the policy, clearly we are not going to be able to agree on the privatization analysis. There is the nub and there is the debate.

Let us take a closer look at Bill C-73. It is characterized as a housekeeping bill and perhaps a bill that fulfils the promise of that wonderful government budget earlier this year. I say that, of course, with tongue and cheek just so Hansard gets it right. I would like to look at the six corporations very quickly.

The first corporation that the bill refers to is Canada Harbour Place Corporation. We are basically talking about the Vancouver Canada Place lands. The bill calls for the sale or disposition on such terms as the Governor in Council approves, but it also permits and authorizes Canada Harbour Place Corporation to sell its own assets in the way that the Governor in Council approves. I want to come back to this particular Crown corporation in a few moments.

The second one is Canada Museums Construction Corporation. The provisions of this bill call for the transfer of the share now held by the Minister of Public Works to Canada Lands Company Ltd. I do not think any of us are going to have a major problem with that. That truly is housekeeping, subject to—and this is a subject which will have to be looked at in committee—the need to scrutinize very carefully, from a legal perspective, the completion of contracts on the museums which have been constructed at great cost and also from a perspective of compliance with the warranty provisions in each of those contracts.

These provisions all relate to more extensive and complex contracts. We want to be very sure that the transfer in ownership or control here does not prejudice the position of the taxpayer in those two regards.

The third entity affected by the bill is the Canada Livestock Feed Board. This is basically a dissolution and a rollover of the assets and working agency into the Ministry of Agriculture. There is some speculation that this initiative could save the taxpayer several hundred thousand dollars. How can we argue with that. The fourth corporation affected is the Canada Patents and Development Limited. This involves a dissolution and transfer of the capital assets. I think it can be characterized as a rollover as well. The government believes this will ensure more effective prosecution of the development and sale of patents and the patent rights.

• (1030)

The fifth one is Harbourfront Corporation. This involves a sale of assets and a closing out or winding up of all of the activity, I think much in the way that the Vancouver initiative is planned.

We are dealing with some major real estate assets here. We have a book value of approximately $31 million. We have real estate leases, short-term and long-term, and extensive and complex property rights, something only the overheated real estate market of Toronto could develop. But they are there, they are complex. I want to come back to Harbourfront Corporation in a few moments.

Lastly, Mingan Associates is accepted to be a housekeeping initiative.

I want to come back to two of these entities which are being "privatized". I suggest that this is not just housekeeping, that this is in fact privatization. I wonder out loud why we might not have wanted to deal with each of these privatizations each one on its own merits.

Why am I being cautious? Why do we have to be cautious about this? Well, there are a few reasons. I want to make reference to some of the other privatizations we have seen over the last three or four years. I am not going to go into detail, but the mere mention of the name ought to be enough to make the minister take note and want to be cautious.

In the de Havilland sale, we sold a large viable entity in which Canadians had invested heavily and which we did plan to reap heavily. We sold it into the private sector, which is not of itself a bad thing at all, but we sold it for about $90 million. A short time later we settled a lawsuit with the purchaser for almost the same amount of money. With the return to Canadians, I think we basically sold it for nothing or less than nothing. That does not look like much of a deal. I think it should embarrass some of the people who were involved in that.

I can mention the privatization of TeleGlobe. All I have to do is mention it and mention the prospect of the potential down side of too much insider activity which may or may not have occurred in relation to that privatization. I know it embarrassed some.

I want to mention Route Canada. With Route Canada, I know that one of our committees here may want to take a closer look at it. The government sold an asset that had a book value of approximately $75 million for about $29 million. Now, I know that looks bad. I am sure there is an explanation out there somewhere, but what a perfect opportunity for an asset strip.

Purchasers called it a leverage buy-out, but it was an asset strip. It was a perfect candidate. Maybe it occurred just because we in government have not learned how to sell things yet. Maybe we really did not yet learn how to do it right. Maybe there is still a learning curve. I and my caucus want to make sure that if we are going to do this kind of thing again, because we have good policy reasons to do it, we do it right. I do not want to make any more mistakes, and I do not want to prejudice any more government employees. I do not want to prejudice any more employees of the Crown corporation. I want to make sure we do the right thing, and do it the right way. Why am I cautious? The mention of a few of those corporations ought to permit us to deduce why. Let us take a closer look at the two corporations at which I want to look more closely.

First, there is Canada Place in Vancouver. I note that it has a depreciated asset book value of $67 million, not an insignificant sum. Also, I want to point out that the land on which that building sits, which is valued at $67 million depreciated dollars, was purchased for $1 in the Vancouver market. I want to put a flag beside that.

I want to say to the government that it is dealing with an asset value that may approach $100 million, that when it is disposed of there has to be the policy analysis that first dictates the privatization. Then there must be a careful procedure to ensure that it is sold properly, without embarrassment and that the taxpayers have recovered what is justly theirs.

The second area is Harbourfront Corporation which has a book value of $30 million. I have to suspect that the book value on these lands, property rights and leases, all of which were acquired over a decade ago, is vastly understated in the Toronto real estate market.

I think we will be looking for a better appraisal and a better statement of just what these assets were, notwithstanding that the minister indicates that it is the government's intention to move these assets into another public corporation, joint or otherwise, involving the provincial and municipal governments in Toronto.

It is also essential that we see the privatization analysis. I am confident we will have an opportunity to ask for this in committee. I am quite sure we will see it. We are not going to sell these assets involving all of these millions of dollars on such terms as the Governor in Council shall approve unless we see that analysis, not just because it was in the budget.

I am saying all of this for the minister's benefit. I know when he retires in 1993 that he will want to retire proudly, feeling that he has done a great job for the taxpayers and the people of Canada. I want him to be proud of his work. I do not want to see him harassed and hounded out of office by a crowd of journalists and angry opposition MPs. I know he will take our advice. I know he really believes I said all of that for his benefit.

As well, I want to point out in connection with the Vancouver sale the controversy which has surrounded current and recent past sales of the Vancouver Expo lands. There is a mandatory requirement of intensive government consultation with the local governments.

I have a special interest in the Harbourfront in metro Toronto lands, my riding being Scarborough—Rouge River in metropolitan Toronto. I want to ask if the privatization contemplated here is consistent with what is known as the Crombie royal commission on the future of the Toronto waterfront. I know that the minister believes that it is, and I have seen it written in some locations that it is, but I am not a believer yet.

Is this a sale, the terms of which are before us? No, we do not see the terms of the sale. The statute does not even say to whom it will be sold or transferred. We do not know that yet.

• (1040)

We are passing a law that says: "Governor in Council, cabinet, sell this asset and get what you can". The minister says no that is not quite what it is, but that is what the law says and that is why we are here: to pass a law. I am looking at the words in the statute. This privatization is supposed to be consistent with the Crombie recommendation.

I would like to read two recommendations of the Crombie royal commission. The first one says: "We recommend first that there be no further sale of lands currently held in public ownership including provincial and federal". The second one I want to read is: "We recommend that aggressive public land acquisition programs be instituted on the waterfront".

I remain to be convinced that the sale of these lands now are consistent with either of those two recommendations. That royal commission was instituted by this government. I would like to know why the bill as proposed does not, on its face, come close to complying with those two key recommendations which are found in Volume IV of the report at page 68.

Also in metro Toronto there is a land ownership issue very close to my riding of Scarborough—Rouge River respecting the Rouge Valley lands. The federal government owns pieces of the Rouge Valley. The province owns most of it. Recently the province made a decision to give over all of those lands to the preservation of the Rouge Valley. That was lousy economics, but it was good planning. I caution the government that when it deals with the Vancouver and Toronto lands not to chase the god of great economics and end up with lousy planning.

We all have an interest in the proper disposition of these issues. This is a caution flag. I want everyone to know that we in opposition will be looking at these two aspects of this bill very carefully. We want to see the government's own policy analysis dealing with the sale and disposition. We want to see the program that is contemplated for both of these matters before we can feel comfortable supporting this bill.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I too would like to say a few words on the bill before the House.

As the minister says, the bill deals with six different corporations. In many cases it transfers the work of one of the existing Crown corporations to another agency of the Government of Canada. The main thing we should be doing today is saying to the minister across the way that we want this bill in committee so that we can ask some specific questions about each of these six corporations.

I am concerned, for example, whether or not the employees are being dealt with in a proper way. Those are the kinds of questions that I would like to ask. Employees are going to be transferred from a Crown corporation to a government agency, and I want to know if that is going to be done properly in terms of their benefits, their salaries, and their pensions. Is there going to be job loss? Are the employees in agreement with what is happening? I am also concerned about the various relevant interest groups, as to whether or not they are pleased with this new activity.

If I can take as an example the Harbourfront Corporation in Toronto, which is going to be transferred to local control. In principle I like the idea of local control. It is a way of democratizing our economy and our country, but I would like to know more details about what the government has in mind about what local control is.

If it is along the lines of the recommendations of David Crombie and the royal commission, my understanding would be that this would be very attractive and would have the agreement of most Torontonians. We would probably give a green light to that. Perhaps we could get more details on that from the minister in committee.

The second looks attractive in principle. It is the Mingan Associates Limited company which was established to obtain land and fishing rights. It is now a Crown corporation. The intent of the minister under this bill is to transfer this corporation to the relevant Indian reserve so that the Indian people themselves have control over it.

I would also like to know what those local Indian people think of the matter, whether or not they have requested it. Is this the route those Indian people wish to go? If it is the route they wish to go, it could be the proper direction or the proper move toward further democratization of our economy.

I have been one for a long time who thinks that we should be moving toward what I call economic democracy in our country, where people have more control over the economic levers that affect their own lives. I would be very interested in whether or not these are the kinds of steps, in these two cases in particular, that would move in that direction.

Those are two moves, the elimination or the transfer of two existing Crown corporations, which indeed may be interesting in terms of local people or local associations having more control over the lives and over the future development of that relevant agency in terms of their own community.

I notice that for three other Crown corporations there is a slightly different move recommended in this bill at seconding reading. One is Canadian Patents Development Ltd., a Crown corporation that is going to be transferred to relevant government departments. That may or may not be a good move.

Once again I would like to have a chance to question the minister and relevant officials at a committee to see whether or not this is the efficient way or the proper way to do it in terms of the industry to do it. In terms of research and development in this country, is it a good thing for R and D to eliminate this Crown corporation that deals with patents and transfer its jurisdiction to the relevant government departments? It may indeed be the proper thing or perhaps there is some objection to it from the scientific community or from the research community in this country.

I am sure that the member of our party from Windsor—St. Clair, who is our spokesperson on research and development, might be interested in asking a question or two about this issue later on.

Another agency is the Canadian Livestock Feed Board that is very relevant to those of us in rural Canada. My riding being in Saskatchewan is one of those with people who are interested in this particular agency. I understand that the functions of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board have in essence been transferred in the last two, three, or four years to the Department of Agriculture. The functions of that agency are already being carried out by the Department of Agriculture.

Once again I would like to know whether or not the employees have been dealt with in the proper fashion. Are the employees happy with what has happened? Are the farm organizations pleased with what has occurred? Is all the jurisdiction of the existing board going to be felt in Agriculture Canada? That is the second Crown corporation that will be transferred or has already been transferred to the relevant federal government department.

The third one that is going to be transferred is the Canadian Museum Construction Corporation. That corporation was established a while back to deal with the construction in the national capital region of the National Gallery here in the city of Ottawa and the Museum of Civilization in the city of Hull, just a few metres away from the Parliament Buildings. This corporation is going to be transferred as well to become a subsidiary of the Canada Lands Company.

Again the same questions I raised about other companies and employees are relevant in this case. Also in this case I would be interested in knowing about some of the cost overruns in the construction of those museums, why we cannot be a bit more accurate in estimating how much a major building by the federal government is going to cost before we settle on the tenders and before we settle on the contracts.

There is a lot of concern by ordinary Canadians who are not in the national capital region about the cost of these two beautiful places, these two wonderful places. Before we rubber stamp this transfer by the federal government, I think what we should be doing is calling in the relevant officials to make sure that we have answers to some of those questions.

The last corporation is the Canada Harbour Place Corporation, a corporation that was given a mandate to administer properties at Canada Place in Vancouver as the Canadian Pavilion in Expo 86.

• (1050)

I assume that this is going to be sold to the private sector. Of the six corporations that are going to be dismantled or eliminated by the federal government this is the only one, at least on the surface, that appears to be in a position where it is going to privatized in the classical sense: in the way that the federal government has privatized Air Canada and some of the other corporations in recent years.

Those are the concerns we have in our party. In committee we want a chance to deal with these six corporations in a very specific way in terms of finding out of it is good (a) for the country, (b) for the employees working there, and (c) for the people who are interacting with these particular corporations, be it scientists or be it farmers in terms of the Livestock Feed Board or be it Torontonians in terms of the Harbourfront.

Since I know somebody else wants to make a few remarks before eleven o'clock, in conclusion I say to the minister that shortly we are going to have a major bill before the House to privatize Petro-Canada. My attitude at that time will be totally different from my attitude toward these corporations. I believe the Conservative Party is making a very major mistake going ahead with the privatization of Petro-Canada, particularly at a time when there is a crisis in the Persian Gulf and the Middle East.

Petro-Canada was established back in 1973, 1974 and 1975 at a time of a crisis in the Middle East. It is our window on the marketplace in terms of the oil industry. We are making a major mistake by selling out to the private sector—part of it probably to foreign investors—this small window we have on the marketplace in Canada.

Most of our oil industry is foreign owned. It is owned by the private sector. Most countries in the world, except the United States, have a very major publicly owned gasoline, oil, or energy company. The Mexicans have and most European countries have it. Most countries in the world have a major Crown corporation that is publicly owned. I believe we are making a mistake.

In concluding, I say that the Conservative Party made a major change in terms of its ideological orientation and privatization about four or five years ago when this Prime Minister was elected, in terms of trying to privatize as much as possible in this country. The Conservative Party of many years ago was the opposite. I remind the House that the Conservative Party is the party in this country that established many of the Crown corporations we have today: the CBC, the Canadian Wheat Board, and the Canadian National Railway, to name but a few. Peter Lougheed as premier of Alberta believed in a mixed economy in terms of public ownership in that province. The minister responsible for privatization comes from Brampton, Ontario. Former Premier Bill Davis was one who intervened in the marketplace in terms of Crown corporations.

That is sort of the tradition and the heritage of the Conservative Party of Canada. I think there has been an ideological change in the last few years. I think they have blinkers on, in terms of the value of privatization.

Therefore I serve notice to the government today that when the privatization of Petro-Canada bill comes before this House, he can expect a fight from the New Democratic Party. He can expect our party to try to mobilize public opinion to make sure the Conservative Party does not proceed with that bill in the same way we did 10 years ago when a former Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Yellowhead, promised to privatize Petro-Canada, raised the price of oil in this country, and went to the people and was defeated.

Once again we promise to make the same kind of issue out of Petro-Canada as we did 10 years ago and to try to stop the government from privatizing it.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville. It seems to me that with this bill the government is pursuing two objectives. One section of the bill deals mostly with administrative reorganization and changes in responsibility, which I imagine is supposed to improve government efficiency. Other parts of the bill concern the privatization of certain corporations. In your speech, you seemed to object to the bill as a whole for reasons that were mainly connected with the privatization aspect. However, there is also that part of the bill that focuses on improving the effectiveness of government administration, and I would like to hear your views on the subject.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I believe I said before that we have a lot of questions about the effectiveness of the bill before the House today. When I say effectiveness, I am talking about administration. I gave as an example a change that would affect three Crown corporations: The Canada Museums Construction Corporation, the Canadian Livestock Feed Board and Canadian Patents and Development Limited. I wonder whether administratively speaking, these changes would indeed have the desired results for this country and for the government of Canada. I am not sure. That is why I would like to see this bill in committee, where we can ask the responsible minister, the Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and his officials for answers to this kind of question. The proper place to ask these questions is in committee. I would like effective and responsible government but I also want a government that has progressive policies for our country.

This bill also holds out the possibility of having Harbour Front Corporation in Toronto under local control.

As I said a few minutes ago, I agree in principle with the government's proposal but, as usual under our system of government, a lot depends on the details of the bill and the way the regulations are set up. That is why the minister should come before the appropriate committee and answer our questions.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Madam Speaker, I have another question for the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

He pointed out that the bill covers the re-organization or privatization of several very different corporations.

I am wondering whether a single committee would be able to deal with them all, because we are looking at issues related to agriculture, to science and technology, and to other topics more closely tied to the real estate field.

Can the same committee, usually made up of members whose abilities and expertise have something in common, consider the advisability of re-organizing, abolishing or even privatizing various government activities covered in a single bill? Can a committee member be all at once expert in agriculture, expert in science and technology patents, and expert in matters related to real estate.

I have some reservations as to how this might be worked out and, if we are to achieve the goals you have in mind, I should like to hear your suggestions in that respect.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): That is a good question, Madam Speaker.

We have a problem here because, as the hon. member said, we are dealing with six corporations operating in very different fields. For example, one of them is very important to the farming community. Yet another one is a leading concern in research and development in Canada. I would suggest that we need a parliamentary reform, Madam Speaker, for we are often asked to consider what we call omnibus bills which cover a wide range of issues.

It would be a problem because I happen to know that the member for Saskatoon—Humboldt, knowledgeable as he is in the agricultural sector, would want to attend the committee proceedings on the bill. As to research and development patents, Madam Speaker, the member for Windsor is our party spokesman.

I agree with my colleague from Rosemont that the matter deserves more consideration, but the government is putting us in a tight spot.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 11 o'clock, pursuant to Standing Orders 35 and 31, the House will now proceed with members' statements.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, as all members of this House will know, this weekend the World Summit for Children takes place in New York. For the first time ever, heads of state or government will meet to discuss one important social concern, the health and welfare of the weakest and most vulnerable of society, children.

For Canada, the summit is an international event, around which we can find common national purpose. It can be a catalyst which can focus world attention on the specific and urgent needs of children. Children are one of a country's most vital resources. The World Summit is a unique opportunity to draw attention to the specific problems facing children in all parts of the globe.

Mr. Speaker, while much has been accomplishments, there is still a long way to go. Children must become a higher political priority in the 1990s.

I applaud the leadership of our government and our Prime Minister in our participation at this historical summit and look forward to our commitment to focus on "doing the do-able" for the children of Canada and around the world.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, through the mist of the very heady stuff that we have been discussing this opening week of the fall session of Parliament, we find another problem of a different nature but no less magnitude.

In rural Newfoundland, the high number of people who do not qualify for unemployment insurance this year is nothing short of awesome. They do not qualify because this government will not reinstate the variable entrance requirement that takes into account the realities of high unemployment and that would have their qualifying time reduced from 14 to 10 weeks. I estimate the number in my riding alone to be well over 5,000. I met and spoke with them this summer.

They are without money; they are without food, their children will soon be going to school hungry and inadequately clothed. People are close to the point where they are without hope. There is no question the situation is desperate.

I call on this government to take compassion on these people and immediately reinstate the variable entrance requirement and reduce the unemployment insurance qualifying time from 14 weeks to 10 weeks.

GREENPEACE

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Montreal Greenpeace activists were arrested following a confrontation with port authorities while trying to draw attention to the export of uranium from Canada. Their actions stemmed from the refusal, two weeks ago, of the Minister of Energy to launch an inquiry into uranium mining in Canada.

Miners, native groups, health professionals, and environmentalists have been pressing for the inquiry for 10 months. They want to know why two million litres of radioactive waste spilled into Wollaston Lake in northern Saskatchewan. They want to know who is regulating the regulators. They want to know why the maximum penalty under the Atomic Energy Control Act is $5,000, half of that for smoking on the Hill. They want to know why development of massive new radioactive deposits like Cigar Lake are going ahead without intense public scrutiny. They want to know why radiation levels, raised by Jean Chrétien, remain as much as 20 times higher than elsewhere in the world.

Mr. Speaker, pious platitudes and stonewalling are no substitute for truth and action and it is truth and action that we need.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I noticed last night, during the Prime Minister's press conference, that our national network has once again translated into English the part of the speech the Prime minister gave in French but that, with total disregard for the francophones, it retransmitted without translation the part he gave in English.

The CBC should live up to the linguistic expectations of all Canadians, Mr. Speaker. It is unfair and discriminatory for our national network to dare broadcast only part of such an important statement from our Prime Minister.

I therefore urge the minister of Communications to look into this problem.

Mr. Speaker, it is not the first time that this happens and it is totally unacceptable in a bilingual country such as ours.

THE SENATE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, Tory times are expensive times, for taxpayers that is.

Earlier this week, the Prime Minister created eight new Senate positions using an obscure clause in the Constitution in order to obtain passage of his much dreaded goods and services tax.

Let us look at the cost of these eight unnecessary nominations: $71,900 per year per senator in salary, $21,628 per year in estimated travel expenses, $152 per day for sitting in the Senate, which totals $36,352 per year. That is $129,880 in direct expenses per senator. Based on a retirement age of 75, each candidate in question will result in 183 person–years and a direct cost of $23,768,040. That is the cost of the boondoggle of the Prime Minister. Imagine what the cost would have been had I calculated the 15 nominations of last week. It is almost enough to make John Buchanan blush.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that you have changed the time allotted to the speakers in Question Period all week long. Traditionally, the government side was always allowed two questions. By eliminating the second question, you penalize the francophone government members, thus silencing the supporters the government has in Quebec. So, Quebec has to suffer because you allow a new opposition group to use that time, at the expense of another group of elected members which is at least as important. One gets the feeling, Mr. Speaker, that this small group of individuals that represents Quebec, individuals who have decided to change allegiance while in office, which is their privilege. By acting that way, Mr. Speaker, you bias not only perceptions but mainly the true representativeness of this House.

Allow me to urge you to start allowing again a second question from the government side and to restore, that way, social justice and public morality.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, foreign domestic workers in Canada face a variety of problems. Many are poorly paid, drastically overworked and often the victims of sexual harassment. These workers, most of them young women, come to Canada hopeful of a start of a new life. The way they are treated is shameful.

The most glaring example of this inequitable treatment has arisen in the case of Juvy Badua. In Ms. Badua's application for entry to Canada she misrepresented her age, she said she was older than she was. That was wrong. She should not have done this, but she willingly acknowledges this misrepresentation.

But how has the government reacted? They have ordered her out of the country even though she has a job here in Canada. This action flies in the face of previous rulings where misrepresentations as to age and marital status have led only to a slowdown in cases, not in an order to leave the country.

To be blunt, the government has gone right off the deep end on this case.

Why is Juvy Badua being treated so unfairly? Why has she received a punishment which goes so far in excess of her misrepresentation?

I would ask the minister to review Ms. Badua's file and correct this inequitable treatment. Allow her to stay in Canada.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, grain producers in the riding of Macleod have spoken to me about their concerns and their frustrations with world market prices this year. Certain relatively small areas have faced drought and devastatingly low yields for the ninth year in a row. Nothing is more frustrating than personal financial devastation while the media reports boom-time production across the prairies. Nothing could be more frustrating.

But even those with mountains of grain on the back forty face a financial crunch with few sales, low prices, and, I might say, borrowed input costs. In some cases, the only source of cash is the advances available on production not yet delivered.

I ask the Minister of Agriculture to consider waiving, for this crop year, the interest requirement on at least part of the cash advance.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in his speech accepting the Nobel Peace Prize, the Dalai Lama said: "the awarding of the Nobel Prize to me, a simple monk from Tibet, fills us Tibetans with hope. It means that despite the fact that we have not drawn attention to our plight by means of violence we have not been forgotten. It also means that the values we cherish, in particular our respect for all forms of life and the belief in the power of truth, are today recognized and encouraged."

• (1110)

Mr. Speaker, it is truly a tragedy that our Prime Minister does not recognize the power of truth and peace. Why can he not accord this great man of peace the welcome he truly deserves during his visit to Canada, a country which prides itself on defending peace and human rights? Canada cannot only defend the human rights of those countries which are currently in vogue but must adhere to a moral code which stands for the rights of the oppressed throughout the world. By refusing to meet the Dalai Lama, Canada is reneging on its convictions.

WELLAND

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, most of the time in our statements we are complaining about one thing or another happening in our country and across the world. But today I thought I would interject a little bit of good news.

Welland, Ontario, which is situated in the heart of the Niagara peninsula, is becoming known for its magnificent outdoor wall murals. Since the inception of this outstanding tourism and economic development project in 1988, specially selected artists from across Canada have created 27 giant historical murals on building walls in this canal city.

The mural program is a special project of the Promote Welland Task Force. It is a non–profit community organization made up of Welland citizens from all walks of life. They are determined to create a basis for economic revitalization. This grass roots groups has provided the funding and the logistics for the massive artistic effort.

Welland probably boasts Canada's highest proliferation of outdoor art by professional artists. Some of these murals are as big as 82 feet by 32 feet. These can be enjoyed 12 months of the year and it is absolutely free.

We in Welland are very proud of our accomplishments and we would like Canada to be proud of us. We extend an invitation to all Canadians and, indeed, to all people throughout North America to visit the mural capital of Canada and sample our outdoor art gallery and Welland hospitality.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, almost one year ago 14 young women lost their lives when one man's hate exploded into violence at the Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal.

In the aftermath, the federal government promised the women of Canada that it would work to end violence against women. Yet the violence continues. Yesterday, a young woman student at the same school was viciously attacked. Women who face violence often have nowhere to go. The lack of shelter spaces means that one in two Canadian women who need help must be turned away.

Twenty years ago, the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada began its report by quoting from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights". Twenty years later I call on this government to make good on their promise to the women of Canada. Stop the violence.

THE SENATE

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, recent polls have shown this government to be unpopular. This is not surprising when you realize that strong government will many times be unpopular.

Our current deficit is evidence that governments that try to gain popularity through soft legislation fail. Behind the doors of the other House, misguided Liberal senators are holding up a vital UIC bill, a government restraint bill, corporate tax reform as well as GST. These bills have all been labelled as unpopular but they will account for a turnaround of $8 billion in our deficit.

This government is prepared to pay the price for an unpopular but effective government. We are not willing to sit by and watch as an unelected House down the hall holds our taxpayers up to an $8 billion increase in our annual deficit.

HIBERNIA PROJECT

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): With reference to the amendment introduced by the Hon. Member for Richelieu, Mr. Speaker, Hibernia is an expensive project which is not economically sound and even if it were some day to become financially viable the dividends and profits would go directly abroad. Most Canadian economists have shown that it is not a profitable operation as evidenced by the fact that no private corporation was prepared to get involved in this project without the support of the Federal Government.

As to the spinoffs from the construction, there is no guarantee that Quebec firms will get their fair share.

For all these reasons, I am quite surprised not to see a single Quebec representative of whatever their stripe, either blue, red or yellow, rise in this House to discuss openly this ambiguous project.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to give Quebecers fair warning, because obviously they are taken for a ride.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday Canadians saw the Prime Minister fall to a new low, and I am not talking only about the Gallup poll, when he completed his packing of the Senate by using a provision of the Constitution for the first time in our history to appoint the eight additional Senators in a stubborn and desperate attempt to force through the goods and services tax, a tax Canadians do not want.

Why is the Prime Minister continuing to try to ram through the goods and services tax when Canadians know and economists generally agree that it is the wrong tax at the wrong time. It will cause serious damage to an economy already in serious difficulties because of the policies of this government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, far from falling to a new low, I think that all of us would be interested in noting the almost universal condemnation of the actions of the Liberal Party over in the Senate in their efforts to thwart the will and the rights of the House of Commons in Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the government has ignored the universal, not almost, but the universal condemnation by Canadians generally of this government's misguided goods and services tax.

The Deputy Prime Minister has ignored the point of my question so I will ask it again. Why is he ignoring the impact of the goods and services tax on an economy which if it is not already in recession, is tumbling headlong into recession at a time when world oil prices are soaring? They are reaching record levels. Why does the Deputy Prime Minister and his government want to jack up the home heating bills of every Canadian by 7 per cent next January and each and every month thereafter?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if there is anything that is undermining the confidence of the Canadian economy it is the actions of the Liberal Party and particularly the actions of the Liberal senators.

Just simply to support that, because it is not only the contention that we have on this side of the House, it is the contention of learned opinion right across the country. Right here, The Ottawa Citizen in today's editorial states:

> Senate Crisis Blame the Liberal goons
> This fight has nothing to do with whether the GST is a good or bad tax—Rather, it has everything to do with discrediting the Tories;
>
> Equally contemptible is the blatantly opportunistic NDP which is calling on the Senate to kill the tax.

The Montreal Gazette, "Hitting a new parliamentary low"; the Calgary Herald—

Mr. Allmand: Nobody believes that.

Mr. Keyes: Not according to 85 per cent of the population.

Ms. Copps: Issue the writ.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, when I answer the question, and they do not like the answer, they start heckling. They cannot take it.

The Calgary Herald, "Prime Minister Brian Mulroney had little choice but to invoke section 26 of the British North America Act—In fact, it could even be argued that he had a duty to do so".

So, Mr. Speaker, what is at issue is whether Mr. MacEachen over in the Senate is going to pick and choose as to what pieces of legislation he thinks are appropriate for the Canadian people or whether those decisions are going to be made here on the floor of the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the issue is whether the Prime Minister will have his way in spite of the universal opposition of the Canadian people to this tax.

• (1120)

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he thinks that this goods and services tax is the right thing for this country. Will he move immediately to have an elected Senate and see if Canadians will elect senators who support the GST?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Deputy Prime Minister whether, together with his government, he will amend the Constitution right away to make it possible for Canadians to elect a Senate which would support the GST. Clearly, the reply is no: No to the GST and no to this government!

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, for a very distinguished parliamentarian who has served the House of Commons with a very long and distinguished career, I am absolutely appalled and ashamed at the fact that he would surrender the supremacy of the House of Commons of Canada to the Senate.

An hon. member: That is what he suggests.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is exactly what he said. Now he suggests that maybe we should have an elected Senate. It is the first time I have heard that from him in his 30 years of being a parliamentarian, but it is worth while considering.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Most Canadians believe that the only reason the minister is trying to ram his goods and services tax through Parliament before January 1, 1991, is because he hopes that Canadians will have forgotten their anger by the time of the next election.

Given that we have lost tens of thousands of jobs in the last year, given that we have tens of thousands of firms experiencing bankruptcy, given that the minister himself has admitted that we are in a period of recession, will he please explain to the House why he insists on imposing this onerous and inflationary new tax on Canadians at a time when the economy is already badly battered?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me remind my colleague that on what we are debating in the other House, the reason why the Prime Minister took the actions that he took was not because of one bill that is being held up but because of Bill C–21, the unemployment insurance bill, Bill C–28, the income tax bill and the goods and services tax bill.

It is these bills that must be got through to maintain the fiscal integrity of this government. We are not going to allow the integrity of the government to be undermined by a man who was a minister of finance here and failed in that position.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians will find it ironic to hear a Minister of Finance who is no longer believed by the people of Canada and a government that is universally detested promoting a tax that is universally hated, pleading for democracy.

I would like the minister to speak about his tax, the GST. He has admitted that his budget figures were wrong last February. He admitted that he was wrong on inflation. He admitted he was wrong on interest rates, wrong on revenue and wrong on the deficit.

Will he not now admit that he is wrong to be asking Canadian households to pay an additional $6 billion at a time when the economy is in a recession?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the $6 billion figure is a deliberate misrepresentation by the hon. member. That is not an accurate number, and he knows that is not true.

The hon. member has asked why we are pressing to get this legislation through. This legislation has been widely supported by international organizations which are saying that this is extremely important to getting the financial position of the Government of Canada in a stable position.

I have pointed out in a number of ways how it improves the stability of the fiscal position of the Government of Canada. It astounds me that this man is just right now criticizing the fact that our deficit is going to be up somewhat this year, I might say after it was for three years running below our target.

I have not heard anything from him congratulating us to the fact that it is below the target. The hon. member is saying that we should not proceed on this. At the same time, he is saying: "You have to get the deficit under control." You cannot have it both ways. This is an important factor in normalizing and stabilizing the fiscal position of the Government of Canada.

THE SENATE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Prime Minister appointed the eleventh senator from New Brunswick. I would point out to the Prime Minister, according to the Constitution Act 1867 to 1982, that section 22 states: "There shall be 10 senators from New Brunswick". Section 37 states: "There shall be 10 members of the House of Commons from New Brunswick". Section 51(a) of the Constitution Act states:

> Notwithstanding anything in this Act a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons, not less than the number of Senators representing such province.

It would seem that the Prime Minister has chosen to appoint 11 senators from New Brunswick, but we still have 10 seats in the House of Commons. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister how he explains this possible contradiction.

Mr. Riis: A violation of the Constitution.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises an interesting question. It has to be divided into two sections.

First of all, there is absolutely no question that section 51(a) in any way impedes the ability of the government to use section 26 of the Constitution.

Our advisers are looking at the relationship between the two sections. There are a number of ways of approaching it. Clearly, section 26 is intended to be a temporary device, because once there are retirements in those areas, they will not be replaced until the number of senators is down to the proper level.

We are seeking advice on this and there may, in fact, be implications on this for the next generation election. I appreciate the hon. member raising it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary for the Minister of Justice: Clearly, there are some very serious questions here about whether this government is violating the Constitution of Canada.

An hon. member: She just admitted it.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Justice, rather than operate on maybes, why does this government not simply make a reference to the Supreme Court, as was done in 1982, to get a ruling on what is legal about these appointments.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in fact, it may well be appropriate to seek that as a way of answering the relationship between section 51(a) and section 26. It is a complex issue and we are reviewing it. I would underline again that section 51(a) has no bearing on the legitimacy or the validity of section 26.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister. Clearly the government is acting in its demolition derby attitude toward government and not even checking out the legality of what it is doing. We have the possible illegal moves in appointments to the Senate on top of an inept performance by the government and an unfair tax. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Why not do the right thing and pull the tax now.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, most of us are bewildered and perplexed by this new found relationship between the New Democratic Party and particularly the Liberal senators. I would have thought that the last thing I would have experienced in my days as a parliamentarian here in the House of Commons was to see the hon. Leader of the NDP become a spokesman for Mr. MacEachen.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Last week, the Minister admitted willy-nilly that Canada was in a recession. Yesterday, the Bank of Canada increased again its interest rates. Does the Minister believe that it is possible for Canada to get out of this recession while maintaining such a wide difference between our interest rates and those of our international competitors, including the United States?

• (1130)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I might make an observation that the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard has changed the direction of Question Period because he is, I believe, quite uncomfortable with the position that the Liberal senators are taking on this particular issue.

An hon. member: Right on.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I would challenge him to start asking questions which would support the position of the Liberal Party in the Senate because I do not think that he is too comfortable in it at all.

He is asking a question on the state of the economy. He probably has not heard today, but the gross domestic product in July was up from June, so this talk about a slowdown in the economy is not as serious as he is talking about. I have acknowledged that there is a slowdown in the economy, but I have said there is a very good reason for it as well.

When you have had a seven and a half year run of very strong economy, it is natural that there is some slowdown in the economy. We were seeing inflationary pressures building up. It was important to get those inflationary pressures under control. This is what I anticipated in my 1989 and my 1990 budget and this is what is happening.

As we go through this period we will be building the basis for a strong recovery in the economy which we anticipate will happen next year.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the government what makes me uncomfortable. It is the incredibly faulty economic analysis which I have just heard from this minister.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: We are in a terrible, terrible recession. We are in this recession because of the failure of this government to bring adjustment measures following upon the free trade agreement. We are in a recession because we have an absurdly high level of the Canadian dollar. We are in this recession because of incredibly high interest rates which this government has inflicted upon the Canadian consumer and Canadian industry. We are in a recession because of the threat of inflation brought about by the GST.

My question relates to what every single business person and consumer in this country knows, and if the minister does not understand it, he ought to go back out and start talking to people who are suffering the ill effects.

My question is: how does this government think we can compete? With the outdated economic policies of this government, how does it think that Canadian industry can modernize in order to compete in a very different world and if our cost of capital is so much higher than any of our competitors?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard some great rhetoric, but I notice that the hon. member did not make one mention at all of the comments that I made about the Senate.

I think the hon. member is feeling just a little bit uncomfortable with the position of his party here and in the Senate on the actions that the Liberal senators are taking.

Let me answer this hon. member's question directly. He referred to the importance of new investment, of becoming competitive, of getting this country in a position where we can compete effectively. Let me ask him then why he is opposed to the GST which will help our exporters compete more effectively It will put our Canadian producers in a more competitive position as under the existing sales tax, importers pay one-third less tax than the companies they compete with in Canada.

Why is he is against this tax when, with the harmonization in the Province of Quebec, the reduction in the cost of new investment is 7.5 per cent. That is equivalent to a 7.5 per cent investment tax credit, which will encourage new investment in Canada, encourage us to become more competitive and encourage a healthier economy.

The hon. member cannot have it both ways.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Small business employs 40 per cent of the labour in this country. Eighty per cent of the net new jobs created in this country are by small business. Over 90 per cent of business in this country is opposed to the GST.

Why does the Minister of Finance continue to say that business supports the GST when it is in fact a fallacy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am under no illusions. There are elements of the GST that some parts of the business community do not like. But that does not in any way take away from the importance to the business community and to the economy of Canada for getting on with what is widely regarded internationally as one of the best things that we can do to improve the competitive position of the Canadian economy. It will improve, as I said to the member for LaSalle—Émard, the capacity of this country to bring in new investment, equivalent to a 7.5 per cent investment tax credit. That applies to small, medium and large-size business. It will improve their capacity to create jobs. It will improve the capacity of them to compete internationally. Surely we have to get over this partisan obsession of the Liberal Party and regard this initiative of the GST for what it is, a major improvement to the capacity of this economy to compete.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): My supplementary, Mr. Speaker, is to the Minister of Finance. We notice in The Ottawa Citizen today that the PM is exaggerating and this is becoming widely known.

The hardest hit in bankruptcies are the sectors of construction, retail and tourism. These sectors are also the sectors that are hardest hit by the GST. Where is the logic of the Minister of Finance to proceed in spite of the overwhelming evidence that it is the wrong thing to do?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had a visitor in my office yesterday from Germany. He has been living in Germany for about 15 years. He came in and said: "What's this problem about the GST? Tell me, what is it, what type of tax is it?" I explained to him what the tax was and he said: "That is the same as our value added tax in Germany". I said: "Yes, that's right". He said: "Well, what's all the fuss about? It is helping us to compete better as a country". It will help us as a country to compete.

This type of tax is in place in 48 other countries in the world. Some of the smallest economies of the world and some of the strongest economies of the world have this type of tax, and yet the hon. member keeps his head buried right in the sand—

Mr. Speaker: I think we should move on.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister. We have just heard his justice minister admit that her legal advisers may have blown it in terms of section 51 of the Constitution. Those same legal advisers blew it in terms of their advice on the Canada Assistance Plan which had been struck down by the British Columbia Court of Appeal earlier this year.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he has thought of the possibility of those legal advisers blowing it yet a third time, and the courts may find that the appointment of those eight senators to be illegal. If that is the case, not only is the GST legislation illegal, but all legislation passed by the Senate or the House of Commons from yesterday on will be illegal. If that is the case, why does he not do the proper thing and withdraw that tax now? Nobody wants this in the country. Get rid of it.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I strongly resent the hon. member's comment that the government's legal advisers have blown it. They have not blown it at all. The government legal advisers are perfectly aware of the situation with respect to section 51(a) which in no way impedes the operation of section 26.

With respect to the case before the British Columbia Court of Appeal and the tax reference, if I may say it politely, the jury is still out on that. That case is under appeal. Whether or not our legal advisers were correct has yet to be established by the highest court in the land.

All of the parties with respect to the decision to appoint the eight senators had independent legal advice. All of that legal advice strongly supported the view that the government was right to do this. It is absolutely the case. In fact, the government must do this.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the legal advice was wrong in terms of the Canada Assistance Plan and the minister knows that. The Court of Appeal in British Columbia said no.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister a question about the mandate for his government on the GST. The Deputy Prime Minister knows full well—if I can get his attention, Mr. Speaker—that in the last election campaign his party did not campaign on a 7 per cent GST.

What I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister is: are we living in this country in a democracy or do we have a four-year dictatorship? Mr. Speaker, is it not a proper constitutional thing that should be done now to have the Governor General dissolve the House of Commons, not rely on the Senate to block the bill but dissolve the House of Commons, call an election and let the people decide. Is that not the proper constitutional course to pursue?

• (1140)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am kind of amused by this reference that we did not campaign on sales tax reform. Both the Liberals and the NDP have said this.

It is interesting that the Government of Canada had a white paper which set our clearly how we were going to proceed with sales tax reform, but both the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party said: "We will oppose this but we will not say what we will do in its place".

This is the clear difference in the last election: we are clearly on record with what we were going to do with sales tax reform, and there was a great big blank as far as the NDP and the Liberal Party were concerned.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Some 500,000 Canadian children are forced annually to use food banks or go hungry. I am wondering if the Prime Minister is going to mention this fact in his speech this weekend at the summit for children. Too many Canadian children are neglected and abused.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether or not the Prime Minister will announce this weekend at the summit exactly when the government will ratify the convention on the rights of the child and become internationally accountable for the treatment of our children?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, as all members of the House, should be proud of the fact that the Prime Minister will be co-chair of this weekend's conference.

We in the government are very concerned about the conditions of some children in Canada. We know of the many causes of poverty. Illiteracy, basic lack of training skills for workers, and family breakdown are some of the reasons for this immense problem.

When we talk about lack of training skills in this country, one thing the hon. member could do is ask her friends in the other place to pass Bill C-21—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danis: As far as the second part of the question with regard to the ratification is concerned, my hon. friend might want to read today's article in The Ottawa Citizen wherein Stephen Lewis indicates that one of the reasons it has not been ratified yet is that we do live under a federal system and we are presently negotiating with the provinces, but I am sure it will be ratified at the earliest possible time.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister for External Relations.

The Middle East crisis is costing the Third World tens of billions of dollars. It is obvious, in light of this weekend's summit, for children to link the impact of this crisis to the rapidly deteriorating condition of the world's children. This government's cutbacks to Official Development Assistance have worsened the plight of the world's children.

Will this government announce today a reversal of its cutback policy which has sent a signal to the world that we do not care?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, in the first part of her statement, my hon. colleague referred to the Gulf crisis and to the impact of this crisis on children and displaced people in the affected area. She knows how quick the government was to help foreign nationals caught in the area return in their country of origin and to tend to their immediate needs, by the contributions announced. I do share the concern she expressed in her question for the world's children. She knows full well that this government is presently contributing substantially to the well-being of the world's children throught its CIDA programs, especially through its policies, as well as through the work of non governmental organizations aimed at helping the most destitute people better the conditions they live in. My hon. colleague can rest assured that this government will keep providing assistance to the children in the Third World.

PERSIAN GULF

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Today, as Canadian ships arrive in the gulf, Mr. Shevardnadze of the Soviet Union has warned us that war could break out at any moment. Indeed, it is Mr. Shevardnadze who is leading the effort to have a UN commanded military operation in the gulf.

Why is Canada not leading the effort to have a UN commanded military operation in the gulf? What is our position on the options put forward by Mr. Shevardnadze?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be aware that even though this latest enunciation by Mr. Shevardnadze is appreciated, the Canadian Ambassador to the United Nations, Mr. Fortier, has been working diligently over the last several weeks to bring about a unification of the military effort under control of the United Nations.

I am sure the hon. member does not believe that we should wait until that effort has been successful to bring about the force of Canada, along with approximately 26 other countries in the world, to enforce the sanctions of the United Nations and to deter aggression.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, we want to make sure that Canada's voice is heard loud and clear in the community of nations now, as it has been in the past, for a UN commanded operation. I want an assurance from the minister that privately and publicly on a UN commanded operation that we will speak out loud and clear so that if in the regrettable circumstances that war breaks out our forces will be part of a UN commanded operation.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do have some difficulty with my colleague's question. I understand his concern and appreciate his support, but he has yet to answer me. Does he believe that Canada should not be involved, as we are with some 25 other nations in the world, enforcing the sanctions under 665 under the authority of the United Nations?

Mr. Rompkey: In a UN commanded operation.

Mr. McKnight: Yes, the hon. member is saying that he agrees Canada should be enforcing those sanctions. I thank him for his support.

NATIONAL CHILD CARE PROGRAM

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, 20 years ago today the Royal Commission on the Status of Women released its comprehensive and excellent recommendations.

One of these recommendations was for a national child care program, but this government quickly dropped its inadequate proposal after the last election.

When will will this government introduce a national child care program which addresses the shortcomings that child care experts pointed out in their last proposal? Will it contain national standards with no capping of funds? Will it create the critically needed spaces for Canada's children?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to indicate to the hon. member that the actual date the report of the royal commission on the Status of Women was made public was December 7. That in fact will be the day we will be honouring all those who were involved in the development of that report.

As I am sure the hon. member is aware, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has announced that this government will be moving forward with a national child care strategy. We have already implemented a number of measures through the tax system to assist women in the care of their children. We will be moving forward with other initiatives to help in other ways to achieve that objective.

Ms. Copps: Women and men; it is not just women.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, we have seen the government's commitment to child care with the capping of CAP, which is the mechanism right now for funding child care spaces.

How can the Prime Minister go to New York and defend this government's record on child care services? One in six Canadian children live in poverty. Over half of our native children live in poverty. Some 40 per cent of food bank users are children. An estimated two million children in this country are in desperate need of child care.

When will this program be forthcoming? Will it meet the needs of Canada's children?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the member once again that this government has already committed $2.3 billion over a seven-year period through the tax system to child care. That is a significant amount of money that we are putting forward.

Yes, indeed, we are looking at additional assistance, but I do not think the hon. member should expect that the federal government alone or the provincial governments alone can possibly meet the needs of child care. It is going to require partnerships with employers, with communities, with all levels of government, and with parents. All of us have to work together to meet the needs of the children and our families in this country.

FINANCE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. It concerns the government's proposals for financial reform which he released yesterday.

Yesterday the minister only tabled the trust and loan legislation. This means that Canadians are getting an incomplete picture of the government's policy because he failed to table the Bank Act and legislation concerning insurance and credit unions.

When can we expect this missing legislation? Why does the government continue to keep the financial industry in the dark?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will have noticed that together with this first package of legislation I have tabled a complete overview of the principles and the methods that will guide us for the rest of the institutions.

She will also appreciate that we are dealing here with a very complex sector. Some areas of financial institutions have not been touched. They are very central to our economy and have not been touched in certain cases for 70 years.

By proceeding as we have with one major bill and allowing this House to participate in discussions around it—we have been consulting for five years—I think we have a very good package. We want to proceed with this particular package which links with the others and in due course listen carefully to what the members of this House will have to say and come forward immediately after with the second package which will contain all the improvements that may be made to it.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, a complete overview is very different from legislation. As I said, Canadians only have part of the picture.

Certainly a major way to promote harmony in this industry is to work with the provinces to establish similar regulations across the whole country, yet this minister refuses invitations from provinces to attend the annual conference of ministers responsible for financial institutions.

Why has the minister refused these invitations? Will he agree to start attending these conferences?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons we did not proceed with all the legislation at the same time is that maybe we were afraid that her hon. colleagues in the Senate would have indigestion. They have been slowing down our legislation. We would not want to overwork them, would we?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I think the question had something to do with invitations.

Mr. Loiselle: Second, the hon. member would probably be very disappointed if I were to send to her copies of the letters I received from the provincial ministers today who were highly complimentary about our movements.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. I remind him of a pledge that he made some days ago.

He promised compensation to farmers for lost sales to Iraq. I also remind him that the Trudeau government paid compensation to farmers about 10 years ago during the Afghanistan crisis. Of course this embargo on sales to Iraq could not come at a worse time because farmers desperately need cash right now.

Could the hon. Minister of Agriculture make an announcement now with respect to this matter?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would know that it took the Trudeau administration two years to calculate the hurt that was inflicted. We are monitoring the situation and, if in fact there is any injury to the producers, it would be taken into consideration.

I think the member is aware that the embargo was put in place sometime in the fall of 1979. I believe it was in the latter part of 1981 when adjustments for that were made. I think he understands the reasons for that.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I don't think we should be quibbling over timing. Let's get the job done.

On top of lost sales to Iraq, farmers are experiencing other problems. Bankruptcies are up dramatically in the first eight months of this year, income may drop as much as 67 per cent in some parts of the agricultural community, and of course farmers as consumers are having to face this horrible GST.

Has the minister met with farm leaders or will he meet with farm leaders to come up with a compensation package?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have met with most farm leaders and organizations on this particular issue. They think they understand it, quite unlike the hon. member who has posed the question.

I should also remind the hon. member that most of the commitments, if not all, under the long-term agreement with Iraq for the supply of wheat were filled for 1990. How could there be any major loss or significant loss when in fact the bulk of the commitments under the long-term agreement were filled for 1990?

HOUSING

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of State for Housing. The five-year federal co-operative housing program is due to expire soon. Considering that almost 75 per cent of Montrealers are tenants and that this program is of vital importance to them, I should like to know what measures the minister will take to make sure that the program is maintained and enlarged so as to take into account the preferences of Montreal residents.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, co-operative housing is very popular in Montreal and throughout Canada. Earlier this week we did release a co-operastive housing discussion paper. I intend to make a recommendation to Cabinet before year's end.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

The legal basis for sending the army into Quebec appears to be the National Defence Act which, on close reading of the act, allows any provincial premier, be it Premier Bourassa or even Premium Vander Zalm for that matter, to call in the Canadian army unilaterally for an unlimited period of time, with no parliamentary scrutiny, under the direction of the provincial premier, and the federal Treasury pays for it. I find that to be just incredible.

Given that the only protection in the act is the fact that there must be a report filed by the provincial attorney general to the Canadian Secretary of State within seven days of calling in the army, has the government received that report? If it has, would the minister please table it in the House?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would ask my hon. colleague to read closely the act. It says: "within seven days must commence to assemble that information and then provide it".

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, now we even learned that perhaps there is not even going to be a report under the act.

The Quebec government has made public how much it is costing them with the police and the other matters. I wonder if the minister could tell the House how much it has cost the Canadian taxpayers to date to have sent the army into Quebec. Could he also tell the House how long he expects the army is going to stay in Quebec?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if I knew the answer to the hon. member's second question, I would be able to give him an answer to the first question as to how much it would cost.

ENERGY

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

• (1200)

American energy interests, particularly in California, have been trying to create unfair natural gas regulations, unfair from a Canadian perspective.

These pernicious efforts would have had the effect of preventing Canadian natural gas producers from gaining fair access and fair prices in that market. What steps has the minister taken, and what assurances can he provide to this House that this kind of harassment of Canadian producers and exporters will not continue?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important question.

For 30 years western Canadians have been supplying gas for the California market on a stable basis. As the hon. member has remarked, the California Public Utilities Commission attempted to change the contractual rules.

I am pleased that, along with the Government of Alberta, the Government of Canada was able to make not only public statements regarding the unacceptability of that approach, but our embassy as well worked very diligently with the administration of the United States.

I am pleased that, while we did not have to invoke the free trade agreement, everyone came to the conclusion that the free trade agreement is a two way street. It works, and in this case it has worked not only in protecting Canadian interests, but Canadian gas producers and has verified the validity and the veracity of the contracts we have.

Points of Order

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the junior finance critic for the Liberal Party has taken exception to the word "deliberate" in a statement that I made during Question Period.

I withdraw the use of the word "deliberate" because it is an unparliamentary word, but I would ask him if he would make sure of his facts before using them in the House.

PRIVILEGE

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD—TIME ALLOTMENT

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I rose for member's statements to draw your attention to the new time allotment during the Oral Question Period in an attempt to point out to you that this new procedure does have unfortunate consequences for Quebec members who support the government.

In my remarks I implied that you were responsible for this decision and, apparently, I used words which could be interpreted as a direct attack against you. I would like to withdraw the words which may have offended you, for I certainly did not intend to question your competence nor to attack you personally. Such was not my intention. I meant to draw your attention once again to a process which is the outcome of unfortunate decisions and which frustrates Quebec members who support the government.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Bourassa.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a brief point of order to draw to your attention what I think is a problem for this House.

It will be recalled that yesterday during Question Period the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond was called to order on his references to the Governor General, and he was asked to withdraw those statements, which of course he did.

The unfortunate thing is that even though those comments were withdrawn, they ended up on the National last night at ten o'clock.

Once again, I think this draws to the attention of this Chamber how important it is that remarks which breach the traditions of this House, which make reference to the Governor General or to other individuals, that may well be slanderous, or something that could be in some way offensive, have to be dealt with very quickly and very efficiently.

What happens as a result of that withdrawn statement is that it continues to stay on the record. The net result is that the statement that was played on the National last night is I think a poor reflection on the House and the Governor General.

Mr. Speaker: I am not going to pursue this point of order at the moment. It can be dealt with at another time.

There is a question of privilege which must be heard, because it has precedence over other things. I just might say I am certainly prepared to discuss further the point of order raised both yesterday and today. Members can go back and look at Hansard. Yesterday I stated very clearly that it does not do very much good to correct a mistake afterwards, if the matter is out on the electronic transmission. I am not now referring to that particular incident, but any incident from either side of the House. It is there. There is no sudden surprise when it gets used by the media. That is another matter and I am quite prepared to discuss it further with hon. members. In the meantime I must give precedence to a question of privilege from the hon. member for Shefford.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall what you said in the House on Tuesday, October 10, 1989, when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition at the time had asked you for a ruling on the government ad concerning the Goods and Services Tax.

In the course of your statement, Mr. Speaker, you said that there were two main aspects that should be considered: first of all, whether the ad would prejudice the future proceedings of the House and the Finance Committee, which had undertaken an examination of the technical paper, and second, whether it left the public to infer that Parliament had no role in the passage of this measure.

Mr. Speaker, in your learned reply, you made it abundantly clear that the government should never take the support of the House of Commons for granted. In fact, at the time you warned the government, and perhaps I may quote: "However, I want the House to understand very clearly that if your Speaker ever happens to consider a situation like this again, the Chair will not be as generous".

Mr. Speaker, it so happens that I must draw to your attention a similar situation, based on the press release on September 14, 1990, concerning the launching of the Hibernia project.

Mr. Speaker, I was at home watching Newsworld which was broadcasting the events live, when I heard the first statement from the press release, which started like this: "It's official: work on the Hibernia project, estimated at several billion dollars and to be carried out off the coast of Newfoundland, will start immediately, the federal government announced today". Worse than that, Mr. Speaker, while listening to the various speeches, I heard Premier Clyde Wells, and I will quote what he said from the MTT, The media Tapes and Transcript.

[English]

—the Hibernia bill has been passed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as a member of this House. I was absolutely flabbergasted when I realized that this bill had passed without my being aware of it I checked, and I found that Bill C–44 was still at the report stage. So the government had made a public announcement and issued a press release saying it was official, without consulting the House and its members in effect using Parliament as a rubber stamp.

Mr. Speaker, I want to recall what you said on October 10, and also what Premier Wells said about there being an agreement with the opposition parties. Mr. Speaker, we were never party to any agreement whatsoever to sneak this bill through the House at top speed. As you know, $2.7 billion are involved in this project, including $675 million from Quebec taxpayers, and we demand the right to consider those facts here in the House, Mr. Speaker.

I insist on bringing this press release and all related statements to your attention, because what happened was that they used Parliament as a rubber stamp. You yourself warned on October 10, 1989, that you would not be as generous next time.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege. Parliament has been disregarded and ignored, by a government has taken its support for granted, which does not that reflect well on members opposite, who are being treated like a herd of sheep or a bunch of voting machines. I know most of them are, but the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that this is an insult to all parliamentarians here in this House, and I would ask you to rule on this matter.

• (1210)

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to intervene for a couple of minutes. I want to indicate to the hon. member and to the House that, in fact, the Government of Canada has entered into an agreement with the Province of Newfoundland which is mutually acceptable to both levels of government.

I should also indicate to the hon. member that under the existing estimates, which were by this House at another time, the essential funds to start up the project have already been approved and are in place. So there is absolutely no discrepancy between what we, as members, are now dealing with in this House, that is, Bill C–44, and the fact that the announcements have proceeded and that things are going. I do not see any inconsistency at all. It is an interesting point of order but perhaps it should be better described as debate.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, so far this is a point of privilege. What my hon. friend—

An hon. member: A point of privilege?

Mr. Riis: He is arguing a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The point being made is that the government has prejudged what Parliament will do. We have seen this occur on previous occasions and on those occasions your rulings were very specific.

I agree with the comments made by my hon. friend earlier. I was surprised that legislation had been passed. In fact, it had not been passed when I heard a deal had been made between the federal government, the provinces and the companies involved. It requires legislation to be passed.

I think it is fair to say that all of us take our work here very seriously. But when the government announces that it is going ahead with this project, it is simply assuming that, not only the House of Commons but the Senate will pass the legislation, I do not think that that assumption ought always to be made. As a matter of fact, the Senate is not even in session any longer. If the Senate were to do what it presumably plans to do, and that is to keep the bells ringing indefinitely, this legislation we are discussing now, Hibernia, would never occur.

When the government suggests that the project will go ahead and guarantees that legislation will be passed, that does not provide much incentive for us here in the House to take our job very seriously. So I simply want to summarize by saying that if the government wants the co-operation and support of the opposition parties, I think it is in their interest to recognize that there are stages through which legislation must pass. We are not even beyond report stage with the Hibernia legislation and from here it goes into the other House.

Time after time we have seen the present federal government consider Parliament to be a nuisance to their agenda. This adds to the public perception that this government would just as soon not have Parliament in session and simply announce their initiatives by decree.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the arguments of the hon. member which, of course, were just a reiteration of what we had heard a few moments ago. The fact is he did not bother to respond to the very simple statement that these funds had been approved, were sitting in the COLA fund, and it is those funds that are being used for startup. I do not know why they insist on ignoring the facts and continue with the rhetoric, trying to present once again an image which is both false and misleading.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, to the point of privilege raised by the hon. member for Shefford, I am of the opinion that the matter being raised now was really a matter of debate. That is not to say that the Official Opposition does not find itself on many occasions agreeing with the notion that this government is taking the House of Commons for granted.

We made it very clear in this party during the initial debate that we prefer to see the passage of the bill in question at the time it was initially debated. It was very clear during the debate. It should be crystal clear that the funding that is currently in place and that has allowed the first contract to be called on the Hibernia project is being funded from the offshore development fund and is not financed or funded by the Government of Canada as a consequence of the passage of this bill. The reality is that if Bill C-44 does not pass the House and does not pass Parliament, the project will shut down when it runs out of interim financing which is coming from the offshore development fund.

What is noteworthy is that despite the support, both at the initial opportunity that we had to debate Bill C-44 in the House and later, the Liberal Party was supportive of the bill, we still see that the New Democratic Party, now joined by the Bloc Quebecois, is out to destroy the Hibernia project. That is an unusual and unholy alliance, but this is a matter of debate and not privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I listened with some concern to the statement made by the hon. member for Shefford. I have received some documents; perharps there are more. This may or may not constitute a question of privilege. I have also heard the hon. parliamentary secretary's comments, as well as those of the hon. member for Humber—Sainte-Barbe—Baie Verte. I think it would be appropriate for the Chair to take the matter under advisement and come back to the House with a ruling.

There is no need to hear more arguments. I get the point, especially regarding the ruling the Chair made a few months ago.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: I have a statement which it is necessary to make. I have received written notice from the hon. member for Essex—Windsor that he is unable to move his motion during Private Members' hour on Monday, October 1, 1990. It has not been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in order of precedents pursuant to Standing Order 94. Accordingly, I am directing the table officers to drop that item of business to the bottom of the order of precedents.

[Translation]

The "Private Member's Hour" will therefore be cancelled, in accordance with Standing Order 94. Since the House has no business to deal with at 1 p.m., the House should take recess, after the prayer, until 2 p.m.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, we are once again up against one of the problems we have with our Standing Orders. As all members are aware and so there are a number of options for us to handle the situation for Private Members' Business on Monday. I think you might find consent for the motion that we have used in the passed. I move:

That notwithstanding any Standing Order, on Monday, October 1, 1990 the House meet at one o'clock p.m. and proceed to the consideration of Government Orders from one o'clock p.m. to two o'clock p.m.

Mr. Lapierre: No.

Motion negatived.

Mr. Cooper: I heard the noes. Then we have a couple of other options, one of which may help us resolve the situation leaving, I think, the House officers in a difficult position. I would put that second motion. I move:

That notwithstanding any Standing Order, on Monday, October 1, 1990 the House meet at two o'clock p.m. for Statements by Members, followed by Oral Questions and the remaining order of business as provided for Mondays.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I feel it necessary to raise a matter arising from Question Period.

It is the second day I have been obliged to raise matters with regard to the Minister of Finance. He was given notice that I intended to rise but did not choose to stay.

At the conclusion of Question Period he rose and referred to having said that I had deliberately misled the House in a question that I put to him. He said that he would withdraw the word "deliberately". He then proceeded to convey the impression that I had indeed misrepresented. The authorities are mixed on whether the word misrepresent is unparliamentary. In Beauchesne's Fifth Edition it can be concluded that it is either unparliamentary, on page 109, where attempted to misrepresent has been found unparliamentary or, it has been accepted, as noted on page 112.

• (1220)

I feel it is necessary to make the point that I did not fail to check numbers, nor did I attempt to misrepresent in the question that I put. It was a question relating to the goods and services tax and the extent to which the tax will affect a shift in taxation in Canada from businesses to households. In the minister's own statements in this House in second reading debate, he said that it was $6 billion.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The issue was first raised by the hon. member for Ottawa South and raised immediately and properly with the Chair on the question of "deliberately misrepresent." There is no doubt in my mind that "deliberately misrepresent" is unparliamentary. The question of "mislead" or "misrepresent" may or may not be unparliamentary, depending on the context in which it is used. If it is an argument over facts, that goes on in this place all the time. If it is said, and it may well have been, in the matter that the hon. member quotes, it may have been said in a context in which the accusation was a very severe one indeed. That is why I caution hon. members not to just look in Beauchesne's to see what words have, at one time or another, been ruled as unparliamentary, but to remember that it also has to be considered in the context.

In this case, I understand the hon. member, who is a conscientious member in this place, wanting to establish that he did not make this statement carelessly. If the hon. minister has a view about it which is different than his own, that is a matter of debate. However, the hon.

member has said that he feels that he made that in good faith. The hon. minister has withdrawn any suggestion that there was any deliberateness on the part of the hon. member and I think that that is where the matter must end.

Again, it is an example of how careful we do have to be, even in debate, and even in the rough and tumble of exchanges in this place.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni) moved:

That the second report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs, presented to the House on Thursday, March 29, 1990, be concurred in.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take this opportunity to rise in the House and request that the House concur in the second report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs.

As the House will be aware, the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs, over the period of last winter and last spring, took it upon itself to interview leaders of the national and regional aboriginal organizations in order to develop an agenda that Parliament, the government and the people of Canada could deal with through the nineties, to address, as per the title of our report which is called The Unfinished Business Between Canada and its Aboriginal Peoples.

As a result of this investigation carried out by the standing committee, we identified an agenda of approximately 30 items, extremely complex and detailed items, identified thanks to the assistance of the aboriginal leadership of Canada. There were 30 items which represent the outstanding grievances of aboriginal people in Canada and also represent what aboriginal people would like to see dealt with in the 1990s.

It would be appropriate, although this is not one of the recommendations in the report, that Canada consider the decade of the nineties as the decade in which we, as Parliament and we as a people, commit ourselves to finishing that unfinished business remaining between us and our aboriginal people.

I understand that the government is required to respond to the reports of select standing committees within a certain period of time. I believe that period is 120 days. Well, 120 days has expired and what response have we received from the government on this detailed report, concurred in by all parties represented on that committee?

I will tell you how the government responded to that report, Madam Speaker. The Secretary of State for Canada cancelled funding for aboriginal representative organizations, cancelled funding for native communications, newspapers, reduced funding for organizations such as friendship centres and native broadcasting organizations. The government has consistently refused to set up an institute, again through the Secretary of State, to protect aboriginal languages which are dying out in this country at a great rate. Yet at the same time it set up an institute for heritage languages that have a base overseas. Aboriginal languages are the languages resident in Canada, born in this country. If they die out here, they will not remain anywhere in the world. Yet the Secretary of State refused to set up an institute for aboriginal languages, as proposed by one of my Liberal colleagues.

There have been continued delays and obstruction by the Minister of Indian Affairs to the settlement of important native claims and grievances. That, along with the funding cancellations, has led to the incidents we saw this summer. The refusal of the government to allow natives to be recognized, either in the constitutional process or recognized as distinct and founding peoples in our constitution, resulted in the failure of the constitutional amendment this spring and summer.

The delays, inaction and negative actions taken against aboriginal people after the tabling of this report indicate that the government was not willing to put native people in the forefront of the agenda in this country. As a result, some significant things happened this summer.

The first was the refusal by Elijah Harper, a member of the legislature in Manitoba, to allow the constitutional amendment to pass in the Manitoba Legislative Assembly, which resulted in the failure of the constitutional amendment proposed by the government to bring Quebec into the constitutional family. That was done as a result of the refusal by the government to recognize the legitimate claims by native people in this country to be included in the Constitution and to have their society recognized as a distinctive component of Canadian society.

The second and even more damaging result in terms of what it has done to this country and it's reputation in terms of the divisions it has created between aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians with the government's refusal to pay attention to this agenda was the incidents we saw this summer at Kanesatake and at Kahnawake, near Montreal. The spectre of armed native warriors throwing up barricades, after years of frustration, having to resort to arms in order to persuade this government to pay attention to the aboriginal agenda, has been an embarrassment to all Canadians and an embarrassment to this country's reputation world-wide.

• (1230)

Those have been the results of the failure of the government to deal with the aboriginal agenda that our committee talked about and assembled in this report that was tabled in the House on March 29, 1990.

There has to be a more effective government response. There has to be a much more effective government way to deal with this aboriginal agenda.

What happened as a result of the debate on the motion that the government tabled on the first day of the House reconvening? Of course, that motion is now obsolete. Even though it is adjourned, it calls for the Mohawks and their allies to leave the treatment centre at Kanesatake, to submit to Canadian law and turn over their arms to the police and to the Armed Forces. That is now an obsolete motion.

It is the only thing the government has on the agenda of this House to deal with the concerns of aboriginal people. There is nothing else on the agenda in this House. Unfortunately, that is an indicator of the kind of good faith with which Canada deals with native people. There has to be something more coming from this Parliament than that feeble motion, presented the first day, which is now obsolete.

That motion also refers the issue at Kanesatake and Kahnawake to the select Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General. This is a completely inappropriate reference. We should be referring that to the committee that drafted this agenda in the first place and having the confidence of native people in Canada that it is capable of dealing with those issues.

Since that motion is obsolete, I would suggest, as others have done in this House, that the government present a new motion to the House which sets up a parliamentary commission or a special inquiry into the events which led to the confrontations at Kanesatake and Kahnawake this summer, investigates the appropriateness of the behaviour of all parties involved, investigates the type of reaction that the government got involved in, and makes a report back to this House and to the people of Canada on exactly what led to that incident and provide recommendations as to how we can avoid those incidents in the future.

This is an excellent recounting of the grievances of aboriginal people in this country. I think it deserves to be read by every single member of Parliament and by all Canadians. It is basically grievances and problems as outlined by the aboriginal people of Canada themselves and conveyed to this House by the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs.

Essentially what this report does is call on Parliament to make the 1990s the decade in which Canada commits itself to dealing with the aboriginal agenda. I think that some proclamation should come from the Parliament of Canada indicating that it intends to deal with the aboriginal agenda in that way, by making a proclamation declaring the 1990s to be the decade of Canada's aboriginal people, the decade in which this government and this Parliament intends to set in motion the processes to deal with the outstanding business that remains between Canada and its aboriginal people.

I suggest that an appropriate way to kick off this decade after a proclamation is made is to invite the native leadership of Canada to select among their number either a native leader or elder that they believe has the stature to make an address to the joint Houses of Parliament to outline to parliamentarians and to the people of Canada the hopes and aspirations of the aboriginal people of this country and what they would like to see dealt with. It has been suggested that someone of the stature of Georges Erasmus be invited to the House of Commons to present, on behalf of all aboriginal groups in Canada, a statement of the hopes and aspirations of the aboriginal people for Canada and their relations to Canada in the future.

We have had a number of heads of state address this Parliament since I have become a member of Parliament. We have had the King of Jordan address our Parliament. We have had the President of the State of Israel. However, it does not necessarily have to be restricted to a head of state. We have also had Nelson Mandela, the great African leader of the African National Congress, come to address Parliament. The one group that has yet to be recognized by Parliament in that way is the aboriginal people of this country. I think it would be appropriate to establish a decade of aboriginal people, a decade in which we commit ourselves to resolving that unfinished business, to ask the aboriginal leadership of Canada to put up one of their number, a leader or an elder, who will address the joint Houses of Parliament and outline to us their hopes and aspirations as to how they would like to participate in this country of Canada.

I think that the first thing that Parliament can do in order to demonstrate its good faith to the aboriginal people of this country, coming out of the problems that we have experienced through the last summer and in terms of the failure of the Constitutional Accord and the armed confrontations at Oka and Châteauguay, is to vote concurrence in this motion which outlines the aboriginal agenda for Canada and sets in motion a decade of activity which will complete the unfinished business between ourselves and the aboriginal people of this country.

Mrs. Collins: Madam Speaker, I wish to indicate that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) and 78(2) with respect to an allocation of time to the report stage and third reading stage of Bill C–44, an Act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, and, under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal at both stages of the bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments? Resuming debate. We are now, after the Minister has given the notice, back to questions and comments following the speech by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni. On a point of order, the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce.

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, when you called questions and comments, the hon. minister got up on a point of order with respect to Bill C–44, I believe, and therein the confusion. Are you awaiting comments on the point of order or are we now back to the matter which was before the House?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Of course I am not calling questions or comments on a notice that was given by the minister on a point of order which was quite in order.

We are now returning to the 10 minute period of questions or comments following the speech by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni on concurrence in the report. No one rose on questions or comments. Is the hon. member arising on questions or comments?

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Comox–Alberni (Mr. Skelly), who pointed out that Mr. Erasmus should be invited to testify before this House, if he would have any objection to hearing the testimony of native chiefs or leaders from Quebec as well. I wonder because I read in this morning's papers that there is no concensus among native leaders. For instance, Mr. White Duck, from Maniwaki, criticized sharply Mr. Erasmus this morning. This cast a totally different light on the Oka crisis. Would he have a problem with Quebec native leaders testifying before us on what is happening in Quebec?

• (1240)

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for his question. I think he misinterpreted what I suggested in terms of asking the aboriginal leaders of this country, which would include Quebec, to have one of their number address the joint Houses of Parliament. I think it would be an appropriate way of beginning a year in which this Parliament commits itself to deal with the issues, as I pointed out, that remain unfinished between Canada and its aboriginal people.

I mentioned someone of the stature of Georges Erasmus, Grand Chief of the Assembly of First Nations. No, I did not specifically ask that he be invited.

Certainly there are disagreements on issues among provinces, municipalities, political parties, and various groups. It is understandable that there would be differences among aboriginal groups as well.

I think it would be appropriate for this Parliament to call on the aboriginal leadership of this country to select one of their numbers, a chief or an elder, to come and address this Parliament on the hopes and the aspirations of the aboriginal people of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, I would like to know—I skimmed through the report this morning and it contains a number of statistics—whether the committee also analyses figures on housing, income and percentage of the prison population, on a province-by-province basis.

Do we have statistics by province that tell us something about housing and income and about the prison population as a percentage of the provincial figure?

I would like to know whether the committee has those statistics and if it does, could they be tabled?

[English]

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, what the committee was doing in its report and in the research it carried out up until March 29, 1990 which resulted in its report was trying to give Canadians a broad picture of the quality of life enjoyed by native people in Canada as compared with the quality of life enjoyed by other Canadians and to show that there were disparities which have to be corrected.

I know the information the hon. gentleman mentioned is available with respect to aboriginal inmates in prison on a province-by-province basis. There is a Canadian Bar Association report. There is the report of Max Yalden, Canadian Human Rights Commissioner. That information is widely available. I know there is a lower number of aboriginal people in the population of Quebec than in other provinces. However, the number of aboriginal inmates is far too high in all provinces, and that is why we have this report. It is one of the issues this report calls on Parliament to deal with.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): I would like to point out, Madam Speaker, that first of all, since 1986 the Department of Indian Affairs has had information on these matters, by province, and I am somewhat surprised that they are not given here. Is it perhaps because they put Quebec in a favourable light? I am not sure.

I would also like to know why no Indians from Quebec were asked to testify before the commitee unless some were invited but did not show up. In any case, no Indians from Quebec testified before the committee. Is there any explanation for this?

[English]

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I thank the questioner again. The committee makes it a practice to invite all aboriginal organizations. In this one we attempted to invite the national organizations, but others were notified and did volunteer. Included in those national organizations were organizations which do represent native people in Quebec. We felt that we had a relatively broad representation from every province in Canada and from all of the territories.

In addition, the statistics are basically national statistics because we are the national Parliament dealing with national issues. I am sure there was no intention on the part of the committee to eliminate statistics that would have been favourable to one province or another. If it has happened, it was not the committee's intention to do that.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise this afternoon to discuss the committee report Unfinished Business. Certainly the committee put a lot of time and effort into this issue. I compliment the chairman and members of the committee, as well as those who also attended committee hearings and took part in it.

In the forward it states: "The purpose of the report is to share some of the understanding that we have accumulated". The report does not prescribe specific action other than to strongly suggest that Canadians, through their governments, have a lot of work to do in this decade. This is not a challenge facing only one government or only one minister. This is a challenge for all Canadians, a circumstance that has developed over a series of generations and one which will require concentrated commitment over many years.

I think that is an apt introduction to the report in that there is much to be done. There is also much that has been done. It is very unfortunate that the cloud of Oka this summer has obscured much of the work that has been done by the native leaders in this country and the activities they have been involved in to better the standard of living for their people and also their future.

I would like perhaps to take some of the points mentioned in the report and just review some of the things that have been happening in these particular areas.

I became Minister of State for Indian Affairs in February of this year. In the six months that I have been involved, as well as with the problems of which we are all aware, I have also had the opportunity to travel across this country to meet with many of our aboriginal people and their leaders. There are many more I would still like to have the opportunity to meet with.

One of the first things that was spoken about in the committee report was the self-government agenda of Canada. We have a program for community self-government for Indian peoples. many bands are currently looking at this as an opportunity to move forward in rightfully taking over control of the decision making for Indian people.

One of the first opportunities I had was on March 9 of this year at Whitefish Bay, Ontario, where we signed the first self-government agreement with that group. Shortly after that I had the opportunity to sign a self-government agreement at New Credit, Ontario. It was rather a unique self-government agreement in that it was done with the Mississaugas and Chippawas of Ontario and it is a two-level self-government agreement. The band council itself will take on certain responsibilities, and the nine band councils and chiefs will take on other responsibilities.

These two particular signings gave me the opportunity to see from our native people the need to make sure that the programs that we have are flexible, because what met the self-government needs at Whitefish Bay would not have met, if it had been a standard self-government agreement, the needs for the people of the Mississaugas and the Chippawas at New Credit. It is very important that we keep flexibility within self-government agreements.

As mentioned earlier, many bands are looking at it. We have agreements that are close to signing and others where bands are now exploring. The whole purpose of it is that the bands themselves must first want to enter into the agreement. They must have an idea of what they want, the type of self-government that they want. Then we will sit down and work along with them to bring about an agreement that meets their needs within the framework of Canada's Constitution.

Land claims is another issue about which there has been much discussion in the debates this week. On August 23 of this year I met with the Indian Chiefs of Ontario, the Indian Commissioner of Ontario, and members of the provincial government. We sat at that meeting and one of the important requests that came out of it was a request put to Mr. Harry Laforme, the Indian Commissioner of Ontario, to bring about a report on land claim process: what was wrong with it, why it was not working, and recommendations for change.

Mr. Laforme has done done an excellent job. In fact his report was just tabled this morning. Here we are a month and a few days from that initial request to put the report together, and he has done it. I look forward to reviewing the report, when I have an opportunity to do so, and seeing what we can do to take his recommendations and put some of them into operation. He negotiated or discussed input with chiefs across Canada. Much of it came from his own experience in negotiating land claims in Ontario. I am really looking forward to working on the results of the report and seeing what can be done to implement it. Certainly we send our congratulations to Mr. Laforme for presenting so quickly the report that we can start to work on.

I am sure my counterpart, when he is named in the provincial government in the coming week, and I will be able to get together and work. The provinces across this country have a large responsibility when it comes to land claims and it is something that we have to work together on.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been working with the people of Saskatchewan and of British Columbia on land claim issues there as well. We have some indications of agreement from the premier of British Columbia that he too is willing to work toward settling land claims in British Columbia.

Things have been happening on this matter. We are certainly going to continue to work in this area, with the help and the contribution of native peoples across Canada.

We hope to sign and work on land claims in the future. Certainly much has been done in the way of land claims since this government took office in 1984. We have signed agreements to settle claims both of a comprehensive type and of a specific claim type. I have been part of some of those in Ontario. Certainly my hon. colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, has also signed them in the north.

We are proud of those agreements. They are agreements that have been a long time coming. The process is too slow and something has to be done to speed them up, but certainly we have signed and entered into negotiation on more land claims since this government took office than was done for many years prior.

As we go through the report, we see another point that was touched on by the committee. It was the need for economic development as a very important tool for the future development and progress of our native people.

The CAEDS program that our government put into operation is starting to work very well for native people. I have had the opportunity to work with several Indian bands on their programs. They have some very interesting and innovative ideas for changes in economic development. We have committed some $1.4 billion to native economic development over the next five-year period. There are some very interesting projects coming forward. We have a board whereby native people themselves make decisions as to whether or not a business should be funded.

We have a real responsibility to make sure as we help native people develop in the business field that they are successful and have all the backing that they require. Native businesses started some 20 years ago and we now have 5,000 native businesses. Some 2,500 of those have been developed within the last six months.

Our native people are making great strides in economic development, but as I mentioned earlier there is still more that can be done.

On the environment issues, I do not think there is a people in this country who has a better understanding or lives more closely to the land than our aboriginal people.

The Minister of the Environment worked on the development of The Green Plan which included an environmental strategy. The northern part of Canada must be protected.

We held consultative hearings The Green Plan which I attended in Yellowknife and Iqaluit. I had an opportunity to hear first hand the input from the native people and the concerns they had about conservation of resources, about protection of the water, and about the protection of the landscape itself. Much in the way of material has been left behind in the Arctic that must be removed and shipped out. It will be expensive, but it is required. When it comes to the Arctic environment, it is something that we cannot do alone in Canada because the Arctic is not exclusively ours. We are working internationally with other countries to ensure that we can work toward a clean environment in the Arctic.

We have consulted with our aboriginal people in the northern part of the country and will continue to do so. There are sections within the land claim agreements which offer the opportunity to put together groups so that native people will have a say in what is done as far as environment and economic issues are concerned within their area.

Another point that I would like to touch on in the report is education. Education is a key to the future for our aboriginal people, but there is one underlying theme in education that must be followed. The very proud heritage and culture of aboriginal people must be maintained in the education of the future.

On Wednesday I came back from Fort Hope, Ontario where I had the honour of opening a new school in that community. It is a beautiful building, one that has been designed to fit in with the landscape and nature. It is of wood with many glass windows so that the students do not feel confined. As we were opening the building, the chief made the very important point that when it comes to schools and education the building is only a shell, that it is really only what happens within that building that is important as far as education is concerned.

They have classes in that school on native culture and native language which are taught by the elders. This is their link to the past and their preservation for the future. They are also equipped with computers whereby they can provide the children of Port Hope the opportunity to be prepared for the future and to be able to progress as the country and the world are progressing in technology and in knowledge, but at the same time not forget where they come from and their very proud heritage.

I was also in Norway House in Manitoba where they have done a great deal of work on education for students who had dropped out of school and want to return and for elders who want to improve their knowledge and their skills. They have a very interesting computer program. The first thing the program does is to test the reading level of the individual. It looks at the course individuals want to take and then it adjusts that course to their reading levels so that if they need help with their reading skills they are not held back from completing the course they may want. At the same time it produces a course to increase their reading skills.

This is the type of change in education that is necessary. It is more than just the three r's that are necessary. We have to be able to identify the needs, produce the programs to answer those needs, and ensure that the resources and facilities are there in order for it to happen.

We do not have enough of these types of schools. It is something we are committed to work on both at the curriculum level and the physical level. Another thing that is necessary is the opportunity for native people to be involved in the administration of education. They need to be in a position to enter into decisions on curriculum and school facilities. In some cases, this could be through a school board, which is an area that is being looked at.

I was in Fort Francis where the native representative on the local school board has been elected chairman of that board and is having a real influence as far as native education is concerned.

Even before the children get to school there is a need for child care. Many of our native mothers who have not been able to better themselves through education because of having the responsibility of motherhood, are entering training courses and child care is very necessary for them.

In June, I met with a group in Meadow Lake who, through the Minister of National Health and Welfare's innovation program for child care, have begun a program that I was very pleased to hear about. It was one of the recommendations that we made in the special committee on child care, which I had the privilege to chair in 1985.

They have entered into what in the committee we called a "hub and spoke" situation whereby there is centralized control and supervision of child care which is conducted in homes throughout the reserves. They have brought together more than one reserve, so that the core supervisory and administrative needs are met by a small group, but is far-reaching. There are native homes for the children to attend throughout the reserves in the area where they can still stay within their native culture. The administration of that care can be done with native supervision in a centralized office.

I am looking forward to watching that program grow. I think it is an ideal example of how child care can be handled where you do not have large needs, as in a metro area, but rather small needs over a much wider area.

So we are moving in those areas, and as I mentioned earlier, will continue to do so. Unfortunately, I will probably have to continue to say for several years that things are going to be moving more slowly than what we would like, but they are moving.

I think the statement by the Prime Minister in the House this week where he outlined the four pillars of future relationships with aboriginal people, the work that has to be done in the land claims area to speed that up and also in the whole relationship between governments and native people was a very important. I think that goes a long way to really cement the work that has been started. He has given his full commitment to it and I know he will continue to support the efforts and, in fact, continue to direct us to ensure that those commitments are met in the future and are met as quickly as possible.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this report and to again compliment the committee on the work that it has done. I look forward to the work that it will continue to do as a very important committee in the structure of the House of Commons.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, while I am encouraged by the positive tone of the Minister of State's presentation, I am a little concerned about the recent fiscal arrangements of the junior minister. I point out that a document dated March 15, 1990, put together by the Assembly of First Nations analysed the last budget put forward by the government, and tell us a few outstanding facts. The two-year fiscal reduction of $100 million is deceptively buried in the 1991 main estimates of the budget papers, $26 million was cut from approved levels for capital facilities and community services, $15 million from band management, $7 million from welfare services and $2 million from economic development for each of the two years.

The question I have for the junior minister is this. With a crippled economic base and no tax base, just where do native people find the finances to offset lost federal revenues?

Can the Minister of State explain to us if she is prepared to readjust the glaring inadequacies of the last budget and actually turn around that funding to Canada's first people?

Mrs. Martin: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member for Hamilton West mentioned, the reductions he spoke about was in the proposed budget. When you look at the budget of last year compared to this year, the increase in funding in the budget of Indian Affairs was actually 8 per cent. Our budget was raised, compared to other budgets within the government. While they were all taking cuts from actuals, we were taking a reduction in what we had hoped to spend. But our budget still increased 8 per cent over the budget from the previous year.

For instance, the increases in education were some 8.7 per cent, for a total budget of $736 million; the economic development increases were 28.4 per cent, an increase of $20.5 million; under land revenues and trust we had an increase of $11 million, which was 23.8 per cent, for a total budget of $58 million. The government also invested an additional $28 million into on-reserve capital facilities and related services.

The other thing that also should be taken under consideration, is that under the current financial arrangements, we have entered into what we call alternate funding arrangements. Alternate funding arrangements provide for the administration of funds by the Indian bands themselves and not by the Government of Canada. This is the way it should be.

Seventy-two per cent of the Indian and Inuit fair budget is administered by the bands, not by the Government of Canada. They must report to us on an annual basis with an audit. But we no longer do, as the party to which this member belongs used to do in a very paternalistic way, decide how the money should be spent, not the Indian people. We have moved to that. We have increased the budget. Not only have we increased the budget, but we have given control of that budget where it belongs, the Indian people themselves. They decide within their capital budget what they want to spend it on. They decide within their operating budget what they want to spend it on, and they are doing well with it.

No, we did not get as much in the 1990 budget as we would have liked, but we did get an increase over 1989 and we have worked with that increase to make sure those dollars are well spent and spent under the control of the native people of this country. The AFAs are working very, very well.

Again I have had the privilege of signing about four or five of these since March of this year. There are many other bands who want to enter into this arrangement and when they have reached the stage where they feel they are in a position to take over the control of the spending, then that control will be given to them.

This is another reason why education is so important. We need more young Indian people taking business and economic courses so they can use the funds provided to them to make a better future for the Indian community.

Yes, there were reductions from what we had hoped we would get, but we still had an 8 per cent increase. I think that increase has been spent wisely because it is under the control of the Indian people.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of questions I would like to ask the minister.

It is all very interesting to hear what the government is saying today in terms of what more they can do for the aboriginal people. I think one of the best examples of what they can do to ensure that the aboriginal people are going to trust this government is make a couple of changes in their land claims policy.

First, it should adopt a policy that the aboriginal people have the inherent right to self-government and; second, take out the extinguishment clause in the land claims policy. Those are the two issues I would suggest that the minister talk to her colleagues to see what they can do to adopt them.

The minister made reference to the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy, which by the way was started under the leadership of the Liberal party as the Native Economic Development Program. The minister mentioned that it was the aboriginal people who make the decisions on whether or not to award funding or loans to aboriginal groups. Does not the final approval rest with the minister at this time?

• (1310)

Mrs. Martin: Madam Speaker, in answer to the first question that the hon. member raises, the whole issue of land claims, both comprehensive and specific, are being looked at in the department, along with consultation with the native people of this country, to see what can be done to make them more effective. I will take cognizance of the comments that he made and make sure that they are passed on to my colleague as well.

The point that I was attempting to make concerning the CAEDS budget was that the native people have a role to play in assessing the value of the projects that come forward. The final authority still lies, in some cases, within the minister's office, but not in all cases. It depends upon the size of the requirement for a particular project that comes forward. The fact is that we are involving the native people in the decision making. I think we have to look through the whole program.

It is not the huge corporations that we often think of, or very large programs and businesses. There are a lot of small businesses that, given the opportunity to start under the CAEDS program, can grow to something very large. More than that, it is not only a business opportunity for the individual who wants to start it but it is a business opportunity on reserve, or off reserve, but basically on reserve, to offer jobs to native people. It offers a service to native people that they often do not have. It is those small and very important businesses that we must address and make sure that they are funded so that they can give the individual the economic opportunity, the job opportunities for native people on reserve and the services that are necessary within that area.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, the last couple of days and months have been important. Watching the television just yesterday morning where it showed that picture of personnel from the army with an Indian women with her child in her arms reminded me of visiting Cyprus. I thought that we would never have to resort to such a thing here in Canada. Yet, we saw those pictures for almost 70 days.

The hon. minister got up and gave us an overview of education. She also spoke of the environment in the Arctic and what the government, with other countries, is doing. I would like to challenge the hon. minister to name those countries.

My most important question for which I have not yet received an answer is why this government and this minister did not go to her boss, the Prime Minister of this country, and ask him to recall the Parliament last summer?

We can sit here for the whole day but my questions are precise. Why did they not recall Parliament? Would the hon. minister tell me what other countries that they are dealing with on the environment in the Arctic?

Mrs. Martin: Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada, along with seven other countries in the circumpolar area, has formed a group which has already held meetings and which has been working on the Arctic environment. I hope my memory serves me correctly on the countries that are involved. They are the U.S.S.R., Norway, Finland and Greenland. They come to mind initially. I think what the hon. member must realize is that the water that flows into the Arctic comes from our Mackenzie Valley river system. We have very, very little industry within that particular area. But also flowing into that same body of water that provides the water in the north for our native people are river systems coming from deep within the U.S.S.R. where it is highly industrialized. We do not know what the sources of the contaminants are, we do not know if it is coming from a river system within the U.S.S.R. or whether it is coming from our own Mackenzie Valley.

We cannot clean the Arctic up on our own. We can only clean the Arctic up with the co-operation of the other countries in the area. That is why we have been, very, very active within the circumpolar group. Meetings have been held and we will still continue to hold meetings. We have had representatives in the U.S.S.R. who have been working with people there. It is a very serious matter and we feel that by working together with all of the countries in the circumpolar group we will be able to make a difference in the Arctic, differences that are very, very necessary.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, what the aboriginal people of this country feel about the recent events and the way the government has been acting, I would say, to paraphrase a former Prime Minister of this country, welcome to the 1990s. I say that because I think that whatever happens over the next few years, never again will our concerns and issues be put on the backburner.

The Prime Minister has been saying that we are going to have a new agenda for the aboriginal people. Yesterday The Globe and Mail, after the pull out at Oka, stated "that Prime Minister Brian Mulroney praised the army and stressed that the government had not made any concessions." The rule of law has prevailed so the Prime Minister was all praise for the army.

I must admit that throughout the Oka situation, there have not been any shots fired at anybody. However, in saying that there had been no violence, I would just like to point out that we saw, live on TV and in the newspapers, as pictures, of a woman and her daughter being thrown to the ground by the army. So when people say there was no violence, one can be very selective about the description of violence. We saw tanks, machine guns, helicopters hovering overhead at night, we saw a razor wire—I am not exactly sure what a razor wire does but I suspect it is not that easy to just cross over a razor wire—we saw communications cut off from the rest of the world to the group and we saw all sorts of intimidation tactics. So I do not think that we can all rest easy that there were no further deaths after the unfortunate death of Corporal Lemay.

I do not think we can all rest easy and say, "it is over". We can all say, "Thank God, it is over", but we cannot just shove it off to the backburner and say, "Well, nobody died". There was violence. Unfinished business, I think, is really an apt description for the report. I think we will over the years attempt to do justice to this report. I think it is perfect timing for this report. Hopefully the government will be announcing major new initiatives. So far it has not announced concrete initiatives. All we have been hearing are words, nice words, but only words to date.

As I mentioned earlier in my question, I would like to touch on the subject of land claims. Again I hesitate to use the words "land claims". What are we doing? We are trying to claim some land from the government, land that was never given up, land that was never ceded, land that was never surrendered to any government, to anybody, except in a few cases down south. When I say never I mean the eastern Arctic, the area that I represent, more than anywhere else. But there are a lot of cases around here as well.

That is why I think until such time as the government recognizes our problem with the issue of extinguishment of aboriginal rights, there will be other forms of protest against the government continuing over the years until such time as the government recognizes that there is a need to recognize that inherent right to self-government. Until there is that recognition, we cannot just give up rights which we have never given up and which in some cases supersede the Constitution and the laws of Canada, as has been pointed out by various court cases.

One of the great errors or misconceptions by the Canadian people is that when people think of aboriginal issues or aboriginal people, they think in terms of social problems and issues only. I think that people have to be aware that we want participation in economic situations, the constitutional development and the political arena, not just on social issues.

Aboriginal people are more than social problems. It is time that people realized that they cannot continue to treat it as a social problem only, but must start treating aboriginal issues as ones that need to be addressed at all levels and forms.

The Prime Minister stated yesterday or the day before that one of the first things they were going to do was do away with the issue of six land claims at a time. This I think bodes well for the numerous land claims negotiations that are going on. However, these could have been addressed long before this. Why has it taken this government six years to address this issue? Why has it taken that long to address the issue?

Approximately a year and a half ago, in April 1989, the government delivered a Throne Speech, mentioning the words "aboriginal" or "the north"' three times in that very short speech. I said: "It sounds like they are sort of giving us"—I cannot remember the proper term, I think it was something like "the velvet glove; you make sure that they notice that they have been mentioned three times but what we do afterward is not necessarily what we say we are going to do". That is exactly what has happened over the past year. There has been nothing done. Probably as much as aboriginal groups do not condone the armed conflict, there probably would not have been anything done if it had not been for the events at Kanesatake and Oka.

I think that as a result of what happened also in June there would have been a lot less done until aboriginal issues made the issue of the day through various media forums. It was very heartening to see how strong the power of a word can be when watching for something like a week or maybe a little longer a member of the legislature in Manitoba say "no", and that is all he said. It was very, very interesting to see that. It quite put in the perspective of what the power of a word can do when a person is determined to do something.

I mentioned earlier that all the nice words that are being said now have to be followed up. When Elijah Harper said "no" to the Speaker, he meant to follow through. That is exactly what we are saying to the government. When you are saying whatever you are going to be doing for the aboriginal people, you have to be able to follow through over the course of the next number of years.

It is very urgent that the government of the day also recognize that we cannot let what happened over the summer to just be forgotten. The government has to allow an independent inquiry into the events at Oka, a special independent inquiry to ensure that everything comes out, how all the things about came about or what happened.

I was talking about the violence that we saw. I am not even sure that what we saw. I am not at all sure whether there was more. What happened when the cameras were not around at Oka? What happened that the cameras did not see? We do not know. When you see violence, you think of physical violence only. I remember over the course of the summer where food was not allowed to go through, where people were not allowed to go through, all sorts of things. It was a basic abuse of human rights. Therefore, there has to be full inquiry into that issue. The Canadian people have to know what really happened.

• (1330)

On the first day after the session of Parliament started, the government put a motion forward praising the actions of the army. It was quite unbelievable that the government would do that when the issue was still going on. How could it have foreseen what was going to happen?

Now that the issue is over would have been the proper time to put forward a motion. Again, the motion did not address the real issue.

The government through this motion is really trying to gain political points. At the same time, it is trying to make sure that the opposition party might vote against its motion so that it can say to the the Canadian people that the opposition voted against a motherhood issue. It is a motherhood issue.

We all know the army was doing its job. We do not argue with that, but to try to separate what the army was doing to the people at Oka and what the army as a whole is supposed to do is not what we would have agreed with. Instead of being non-partisan about the whole issue at Oka, the government decided to be partisan and tried to make the opposition look bad through its motion.

The constitutional issue of recognition of aboriginal people as a distinct group of people has to be recognized by the government and by the Canadian people as a whole. The Prime Minister keeps saying that the constitutional talks failed. What he selectively forgets is that the 1983 Constitutional Conference chaired by the previous Prime Minister of Canada, Pierre Trudeau, was successful in that it got some amendments that were proclaimed in June 1984.

Again, Quebec did not sign the Accord, but nine other provinces did. So there were some constitutional amendments made in their respective legislatures. There was some success at the Constitutional Conferences.

It was the last two that had no hope of success. In one instance in the last Constitutional Conference, the Prime Minister walked out without even the benefit of trying to come to an agreement. This is basically saying that it was not important enough to try to get the agreement of all the provinces.

Shortly after, the Prime Minister basically locked up 10 premiers until they got an agreement together and came out with a flawed constitutional amendment. Fortunately for the aboriginal people of this country, it was killed by an aboriginal person in the legislature of Manitoba.

One of the areas that the minister touched on was the economic conditions, the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy. One of the problems that I as a previous member of the Native Accounting Development Program encountered was that we always had a lack of capital for the aboriginal people, a lack of equity.

There were always various businesses wanting to start up, but because of a he lack of equity, they could not do it. It is all very well for the government to say it is going out with the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy. However, if it is not prepared to give special consideration to the aboriginal peoples' conditions or financial state, that may fail. I hope the department will take that into account, the fact that there is a lack of equity among the aboriginal people and until such time that that is taken into account by groups like the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy, we will not have a chance.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, in the report Unfinished Business which we are discussing this afternoon, there are some very interesting statistics at the back of the report in Appendix C which is entitled "Socio-economic Conditions of Native People in Canada". If one looks at those statistics, one notes that in many areas the situation is much worse for Inuit people than it is for Indians. Of course, for both aboriginal groups it is very bad compared to other Canadians. For example, with respect to life expectancy, the life expectancy of a Canadian male is 72 years of age and for a female it is 79 years of age but for Inuit, it is 60 years in Labrador, 62 years in northern Quebec and 66 years in the Northwest Territories, much below that of the Canadian non-Inuit person.

If one looks at infant mortality for all Canadians, it is eight deaths per 1,000 births but for Inuit it is 28 deaths per 1,000 births. This is a horrible record. When one looks at suicide statistics for Canadians, there are 15 suicides per 100,000 people and for status Indians there are 34 suicides per 100,000 status Indians, but for Inuit in the Northwest Territories there are 54 suicides per 100,000 Inuit. The incidence of violent death is 54 per 100,000 Canadians and for Inuit there are 173 violent deaths per 100,000 people. In the area of overcrowded housing, only 2 per cent of non-aboriginal people live in overcrowded housing, whereas 31 per cent of the Inuit live in overcrowded housing. Only 17 per cent of non-aboriginal Canadians did not attend high school but for Inuit, 53 per cent have not attended high school and for status Indians it is 45 per cent.

We listened at an attempt at justification by the minister a few minutes ago of what was being done for aboriginal people. I would like the hon. member for Nunatsiaq, himself an Inuit, to tell this House, faced with these statistics whether his people can take seriously the statement made by the minister.

Mr. Anawak: I seem to have a lot of work to do and I have only got 26 years left of my life expectancy. I thank the hon. member for his question.

It is very true what the hon. member was pointing out in terms of housing, benefits to the Inuit and in terms of health. I take a special case in the Keewatin region area where I am from. All our patients are taken to Churchill or Winnipeg. That in itself may not seem so bad, but just imagine a woman who is having a baby having to go to Churchill or Winnipeg, cities in a different province, for a month and if it is a special case, maybe up to two months. That in itself may not seem so bad, but it is the psychological effects that it has on the family. That creates stress, and those kinds of things are prevailing.

• (1340)

Yes, there is very poor housing. We used to try to point out to the Government of the Northwest Territories the difference between the houses which the government provided for its employees and the low cost or low rental houses the government provided for—and I do not say just Inuit—the people, as well as the amount of money that was poured into the houses for civil servants and the amount of money that was not poured into the regular houses.

In terms of other issues, we have the highest suicide rate. I just want to point out that I have lost two brothers to suicide. That kind of thing is very much a case. It is time that we hold the government to the words it is using, that we take the government to task.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq told us that he felt insulted when the government presented a motion stating that it praised the army for its conduct during the events at Oka.

I would like to say that we in the Bloc Québécois also spoke out against the first paragraph of the motion, but I must say I am surprised that the Liberal Party, of which he is a member, did not challenge this passage in its amendment. I suppose it agreed, at the time.

In any case, I would like to ask him—he must be knowledgeable about aboriginal land claims—how many agreements have been signed so far and in which provinces?

[English]

Mr. Anawak: I must admit some ignorance here, Madam Speaker, as much as I hate to do it. Very few land claims agreements have been signed. Although hundreds of land claims have been put forward by aboriginal groups across the country, to date there have been very few settlements of cases.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, I would like to say there have been four agreements to date, three of which were concluded in Quebec and a fourth in the Yukon, but only Quebec, as a province, is taking part in negotiations, since all other provinces have so far refused to do so.

[English]

Mr. Anawak: Madam Speaker, I do not think we have any lessons to learn from the member. As a member from the Northwest Territories let me say that we have one land claim negotiated under the Inuvialuit. We have two claims under process already. The Government of the Northwest Territories takes part in all discussions with respect to the ongoing land claims negotiations with the federal government. The province of Quebec is not an exception.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, I want to take the time to congratulate my hon. colleague for the work that he is doing in this particular field and for the time he spent over the last two to three months dealing with the way his people were being treated.

I want to put to him the question that I tried to put to the minister and unfortunately got no answer, due to the fact that maybe the minister danced around or ran out of time. Does the hon. member think that this government should have recalled Parliament right away when the Oka crisis broke, yes or no?

Mr. Anawak: Madam Speaker, very shortly after this happened on July 11, the Liberal Party of Canada asked for a recall of Parliament, remembering that two years previously the government had recalled Parliament because of 117 boat people coming into one of the maritime provinces.

I think that Parliament should have been recalled. The issue would have been dealt with much faster. Shortly after Parliament returned there was a disengagement of the incident in Oka. The events of the whole summer could have been prevented if the Government of Canada had recalled Parliament.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I rise today to participate in this debate on the report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs entitled Unfinished Business.

I very much enjoyed this report. I recall in 1984, just after I first came to Parliament, that I served on that standing committee. I know the good work that was done during that time when Mr. Penner was involved with that committee. I am very pleased that good work is continuing that good work under the chair of the hon. member for Macleod.

There is just one paragraph in the report that deals with aboriginal women. The committee indicates that the Native Women's Association was unable to appear during the set of hearings that led up to this report, but it indicates that it is aware of some of the issues aboriginal women would wish to discuss. Certainly in other areas of the report it talked about child care, housing, and education, issues which I know the Aboriginal Women's Association would have brought to the committee's attention.

I would like to discuss some of those issues, some of the government's response, and some of our initiatives to deal with those issues.

However, before I move on to that, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to comment on a remark made a bit earlier by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni who opened this debate. He indicated that he felt that other than the motion which was put on the floor and debated on Tuesday of this week, there really had not been anything substantive or specific about what this government's actions were with respect to aboriginal people in this country.

I would beg to disagree. This week in almost every Question Period I think there have been questions raised on issues arising either specifically out of the situation at Oka and Kahnawake or broader issues about Indian land claims and self-government. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and other ministers who have responded have indicated their specific plans to proceed in a rapid and appropriate way to start to deal effectively with some of these issues. This was all predicated upon the peaceful resolution of the situation at Oka, one that we were pleased to see occur on Wednesday of this week.

The most important contribution to this over-all debate—and I am sure it is a contribution which in the minds of many Canadians has been vitally important in helping them think about these difficult issues—was a speech made by the Prime Minister on Tuesday, September 25. I remind members that the Prime Minister on that occasion did indeed set out a very specific agenda. He said:

> The agenda I believe we ought to be addressing will have four main pillars: land claims, the economic and social conditions on reserves, the relationship between aboriginal peoples and governments, and concerns of Canada's aboriginal peoples in contemporary Canadian life.

He then went on and quite specifically talked about three initiatives in areas of land claims. Certainly the one that I am very pleased about, being a member from British Columbia, is that we will be abandoning the old style of only being able to deal with six land claims at a time. The largest number of outstanding land claims are in my province of British Columbia, and it has been very difficult to move ahead with them under the constraints of the old policy. I welcome the announcement and congratulate the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Prime Minister on it. That, along with the provinces' indication that they will be prepared to undertake joint discussions, I hope will mean that we will be able to move ahead substantially with land claims issues in British Columbia.

• (1350)

The other dimension that the Prime Minister talked about related to social conditions on reserves. All members who have had the opportunity of visiting reserves across this country know the variety of conditions. There are some that are excellent. I have in my own riding the Mount Currie community where the previous government and this government together provided the funds to establish basically a whole new community with very good housing and support services.

However, we know that is not the case in some parts of the country like northern Ontario. The Prime Minister's commitment that we were going to be working with the Indian leadership and the provincial governments on a range of improvements to basic community programs and services such as water and sewage facilities will be welcomed by our native people across this country.

It is something that is fundamentally needed in order to move on to some of the other kinds of programs that are so essential, but I think the point the Prime Minister made as well is something we should all reflect on when we talk about the essential of ensuring that our native people have a sense of dignity. Of course that sense of dignity can only come as their own self-esteem is developed and grown, and perhaps in no area more importantly than for aboriginal women. Of all the issues we talk about and the difficulties we face with respect to aboriginal people, aboriginal women are often and frequently more disadvantaged than perhaps others.

When I came to Parliament, the very first piece of legislation I was involved in—and I sat on the committee—was Bill C-31, a bill that this government brought forward to redress a basic inequality which many aboriginal women in this country had faced for decades and decades: the fact that if an aboriginal woman married a non-aboriginal male she was disenfranchised; she no longer had status and her children no longer had status. I think the hon. member who is sitting in the chair right now served on that committee with me.

An hon. member: Not aboriginal. Only Indian.

Mrs. Collins: Indian, I am sorry. He and the hon. member opposite will recall the many hearings we went through and the delegations that came to appear before that committee. There were diverse opinions. It was not something where there was unanimity.

However, this government had made the commitment and that legislation became law in June, 1985. I think we all recall Flora MacDonald, a previous colleague of ours, who provided a lot of leadership on this issue during the 1980s.

That bill has made a difference, that change in legislation. It has meant that Indian women who were disenfranchised have been able to come back to their bands and obtain membership and housing. However, we know that the implementation has not been universally equitable across this county. Indeed there are some difficulties with that.

One of the provisions was that this piece of legislation would come up for a five-year review. I must say that those colleagues of mine who served on that committee, and others, where these kinds of provisions were included were seeing how important they are and that automatic review of legislation after a period of time by parliamentary committees is very important, because we cannot know everything when we write these laws. Sometimes they work out a little differently. They certainly may need some changes or amendments.

Over the last five years, in order to implement this legislation the government has committed some $859 million. Those funds have gone to bands. In this current year, 1990-1991, there will be about $17 million in funds for secondary and elementary education. There will be another $37 million for post-secondary education. There has been funds for housing and funds to support the reinstatement of these Indian women.

In the past little while a special committee has been established. I think it is an indication of the kind of collaboration and consultation to which this government and this Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is committed. The committee is chaired by Bill Monsieur, Chief of the Six Nations Reserves, and includes memberships from the AFM, from the Native Women's Association of Canada, and from the Saskatchewan Federation of Indian Nations.

We expect that the committee will make its report around the end of November and will be making recommendations for improvements in the legislation to deal with some of the difficulties that are still faced. I am certainly looking forward to that report and to improvements to ensure that Indian women do have true equality.

Another area that I think is very important—and my colleague, the Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, mentioned it as well—is economic development programs which will enable native people to take control over their own destinies and their own economic activities. The CAEDS program was mentioned already, the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy which is under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. It has been an important component.

We are already seeing that some $875 million has been designated under that program for the first five years. Also that program emphasizes partnerships with non-government groups as a primary vehicle for native economic self-sufficiency.

In my own agency of the Status of Women we have been working with our provincial colleague. At our federal-provincial meetings of ministers we put forward a plan of action for aboriginal women's economic development. In collaboration and co-operation with three national native women's organizations—the Native Women's Association of Canada, the Inuit Women's Association and the Indian and Inuit Nurses of Canada—we have undertaken a strategy and a plan to provide greater opportunities for aboriginal women to have access to funds through CAEDS and other government programs to advance economic development.

We are all aware that in Canada it is women who are starting up small businesses. I think it is something like two or three times as frequently as men and they are twice as successful. That the same pattern exists within the aboriginal community. I know my colleague from Nunatsiaq would agree with that. I know from my own riding where I have three Indian reserves just how effective some of the Indian women have been in their small businesses, but they do need support, capital, and opportunities. I am looking forward, as I am working with my colleagues, to the implementation of an aboriginal women's economic development plan and that being done in consultation.

All these programs have to be done with native people. They have to set out what they think will work. Governments, bureaucrats, and politicians do not know necessarily what is right. These programs have to be done as partnerships.

The time is getting short, but I just want to mention three other important issues that relate to aboriginal women. We all know the importance of child are. It was raised earlier today in Question Period. Certainly for native families it is very important. Through the child care initiatives fund, we have had 53 projects to support native families. That includes both on and off reserve at $5.7 million. Certainly that is a good start. The Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development has visited some of those projects, as I hope to do in the next little while as well.

Project Haven, which is an initiative of this government under our Family Violence Program, provides support for capital for the construction of shelters for women who have been abused. Under that program, 87 spaces have been provided for native women and their children.

As well, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has a special $3 million allocated under the Family Violence Program for its initiatives. I know when I have talked to my ministerial colleagues from the Northwest Territories, Minister Marie-Jewell and Minister Margaret Joe from the Yukon who are native women themselves, one of the issues that is really the top concerns is this issue of violence against women within aboriginal communities. We are looking forward to working together on new programs to support and to try to not only provide assistance to women who are victims of abuse, but to try more vigorously to look at the root causes and work on prevention and education programs to hopefully some day eradicate this issue. I know my time is up—

• (1400)

Madam Deputy Speaker: I interrupt the hon. minister. The time has expired.

The parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, the report tabled by the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs is, indeed, very important. There are a number of people who would like to continue to speak on it. I am wondering if we could have the unanimous consent of the House to continue with this order of business for the next hour. I think members would appreciate it very much.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, we have a very important private member's initiative coming up for the next hour. We always have to respect the right of individual members of the House. I think my hon. friend from Athabasca is absolutely correct, this is a very important debate.

On behalf of my party I am prepared to say that we are prepared to stay later today to allow all those who wish to participate in this debate an opportunity to do so. It is very important. The situation facing native people in the country has never been more acute. It is more focused than it ever has been and we have an obligation as members of Parliament to do something about that. On behalf of my party we are prepared to stay here for the entire weekend, if necessary, to deal with this important matter.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, that may sound very noble, but perhaps we could have a practical modification to that. Perhaps I could assist the House by suggesting that we move now to private members' hour and that we resume consideration of this subject at three o'clock for, perhaps another hour. Maybe that would be agreeable. But to leave it wide open, I think is probably not very reasonable. I do agree that other members would be interested in participating and perhaps it would be a good suggestion to move now to private members' hour and resume consideration of this issue at three o'clock for an additional hour. We could then adjourn at four o'clock, unless, of course, some time before four o'clock the House directs otherwise again.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, that is certainly more than a compromise. I suppose we can be happy for whatever little debating time we can get on this issue. I am prepared to support the suggestion. I think my hon. friend from Athabasca is very wise, that to extend the sitting this afternoon is a very appropriate gesture. I applaud the government for being prepared to set aside more time on a Friday afternoon to discuss this. I look forward to extending the session as long as we can. If it is an hour, I will certainly agree to that.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I really apologize for members of the House when they try to work in political manoeuvring.

We all know that we adjourn the House at three o'clock. This is to allow members of Parliament to return to their ridings when they have duties for the weekend. My suggestion was that we continue in the next hour and, indeed, we could accommodate the private members' bill early next week. We could make that a priority that he become the very first one next week. It certainly is not acceptable to continue on for the weekend, because many of us in this House have important duties elsewhere. Indeed, I am meeting this weekend with some people of the aboriginal community in my riding and it is more important that I be there, along with some of the other members.

If it is not acceptable to extend for one hour and it is not agreed—

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I am trying to understand the motive of my hon. friend from Athabasca. Perhaps he has thought ahead in knowing that the Prime Minister is in New York today dealing with children, and knowing that my hon. friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is introducing a bill that would do away with a hate that is levelled against children in Canada, which I think is a good initiative, does my hon. friend not want to debate this today for fear of embarrassing the government because of what it has not done in the past? Is that what he is trying to do?

An hon. member: We have reached no agreement.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Obviously we are getting into a debate now and there is no agreement. The hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I have a special responsibility in this Chamber as the whip for the government party. Across the way is my colleague who is the deputy whip for the Official Opposition.

We have several times this week tried to reach agreement for the conduct of the nation's business in a regular planned kind of fashion. The debate we have been having today represents an unplanned intervention.

Mr. Riis: Who cares in this chaos?

Mr. Hawkes: I think the Canadian people care. I think when they go to the ballot box to vote for somebody to represent them they expect that—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Some hon. members: Order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There does not seem to be an agreement so I would suggest that we move on with private members' business.

I have to recognize the hon. member on a point of privilege. I do hope the hon. member will very quickly come to the point. The hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, the member for Kamloops stood in this House and impugned the motives of the member for Athabasca, myself. Very clearly he did so. The "blues" will show that. I ask him to stand up and do the honourable thing and withdraw those remarks immediately.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I am not going to resign. I was curious, Madam Speaker, and perhaps I misunderstood my hon. friend's intentions. He knows what the topic of private members' hour is all about, it is about the horrible thing that is perpetuated against children in our country that the government continues to allow.

Now all I can say is that knowing that and wanting to set aside the private members' hour until after the Prime Minister has done his duty, I suppose, on the stage in New York, I just found to be rather distasteful. That was the point I was making and if it has offended by hon. friend I will certainly withdraw that remark, but it seems that that was what he was up to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we do understand that the hon. member for Kamloops was not imputing the motives to the hon. member.

It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed in today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—BILLS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved that Bill C-207, an act to amend the Criminal Code (hate propaganda—age group) be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise this afternoon to bring to the attention of this House a matter which should be of concern to all of us in Canada. I am speaking of the violence against children; more particularly, I am speaking of the issue of the hate propaganda against children which I believe to be a cause of this violence.

There exists a product in this country today which is known as Garbage Pail Kids. This product exists in our country, but luckily, I suppose, it is not manufactured in our country. It is produced elsewhere and brought across the border into Canada. This product, which I referred to previously as Garbage Pail Kids, is produced in the form of a bubble gum card. These bubble gum cards depict children being mutilated, murdered and dissected. The whole purpose of this is supposed to be to provide entertainment, and I use that word very loosely. The product in question is designed to be sold to children. The cards in question are sold with bubble gum, therefore the purchaser is intended to be a child. The child purchasing this sees other children in positions that I have described earlier and as such, the whole exercise cheapens the value of human life in ways that are almost too sad to describe.

I will take but a moment and give you a quick description of these cards. There is a picture of a child whose back is being scratched and where you see blood flying everywhere. This child is being scratched with a rake and the joke is supposed to be, rake Jake. That is supposed to be the name of the child in question.

In another one of those so-called funny cards, we have a child whose name is Mason Mace and he is being clubbed over the head with a spiked mace and his head is falling off. All of this, of course, is supposed to be funny, accordingly to, at least, the promoters of these products. The Topps Bubble Gum company was interviewed when I brought this to the attention of Canadians some three years ago. When they were interviewed, they said children liked gross and these cards are gross. That may be so, Madam Speaker, I do not think there is anyone who will disagree with the fact that they are gross, but that does not make them right.

I have complained about these cards on several occasions. I wrote a letter in August of 1988 to the senior assistant Crown attorney of Ottawa, the judicial district of Ottawa-Carleton, who, of course, is an employee of the Ministry of the Attorney General of Ontario, to see whether these cards offended the provisions of the Criminal Code. He wrote back to me at that time and indicated that although the cards were certainly not acceptable beyond any stretch of the imagination, that there was nothing that he could do because of the way the Criminal Code is written. I wrote further to the then Minister of National Revenue, the member for Central Nova, bringing the matter to his attention as well, describing how these cards were offensive and objectionable and why they should not be permitted to come into this country from the United States.

On September 20, 1988, the minister wrote to me and said that he had had his officials review the schedules of the Customs Tariff Act which prohibit the importation into Canada of certain material. The minister says in his letter and I am paraphrasing here, that he does find the material offensive and objectionable, however, it is not permitted by him to stop the importation of these awful cards into Canada because they do not offend the hate propaganda provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada.

Madam Speaker, the Criminal Code of Canada, under its hate propaganda provision states: "Everyone who advocates or promotes genocide is guilty of an indictable offence and liable for imprisonment of not longer than five years." It says further that: "In this section genocide means any of the following acts committed against an identifiable group." The identifiable group is further defined by saying the following: "In this section, identifiable group means any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin." Of course, children are of all races of ethnic origin, colour and race, therefore, because these cards do not promote hatred against a specific origin, religion or race of children, the minister was apparently unable to stop the importation into Canada of this awful material. What I propose to do in my private members' bill is very simple. I propose to add one word to the Criminal Code.

The Criminal Code of Canada, as I said previously, states that we must not promote hatred against an identifiable group and that this group is identified by means of colour, race, religion or ethnic origin and I propose to add one word, the word "age". In other words, under this new definition, if you promote hatred against an identifiable age group, that would also be an offence as well as promoting hatred against someone because of their colour, because of their race, because of their origin and so forth. To promote hatred against a specific age group would then be an offence under the Criminal Code.

Just relating back to the cards in question, just in case anyone is unsure whether this amendment would in fact accomplish the objective, I want to state to you, Madam Speaker, that the children in question all appear to me to be within the age group of roughly a few months to three or four years. It is quite easy for anyone to determine that what the cards promote in fact is, in my opinion, hatred against very young children and I do believe that the amendment that I am proposing would correct the situation.

At the very least, I am sure that those who export this product into Canada and those who import it, those who purchase it here, once this amendment is passed, would be quite reluctant to attempt to import the product or even for those who sell it to people across the border would be reluctant to selling it because of course they know that they could potentially be charged for a breach of the Criminal Code of Canada.

I know that the number of private members' bills that is passed in this Parliament in any given year is, shall we say, small to say the least. Only a handful of bills do make it. I am asking colleagues on all sides of the House today to set aside any differences that we might have for the good of our children.

We are opening today this United Nations conference on children. We could in a very small way make a contribution this afternoon, in the few minutes that this House has to sit before adjourning for the weekend. I propose that we adopt this bill at second reading. In the event that there is a minor change to be performed, or course the committee that would be studying the bill clause by clause is well equipped to do that. It would do so if given the opportunity. That opportunity of course is contingent upon this House not talking the bill out, in other words, this House adjourning the debate prior to three o'clock in order to permit the vote.

Naturally, it is my hope that members on all sides of the House would vote in support of this private member's bill, a bill to end hatred against children, or at least in a small way improve that condition.

Madam Speaker, I believe I have one or two minutes left and I just want to indicate to you that I have received correspondence from people right across the country on this issue. I will read a letter sent to me by E. M. Zaleski of Windsor, Ontario which states, and I read selectively:

> Dear Mr. Boudria:
> I was particularly pleased to read about your stand to ban the bubble gum cards "Garbage Pail Kids" with their sick advertising from being sold in Canada, since I, myself, have just written a letter to the president of Topps Chewing Gum Inc., complaining of the grossness of their cards. I enclose a copy of this letter.

This is a letter I received from Windsor. I have another letter which I received from Mrs. Mary Hawes of Calgary, Alberta which states:

> Last night my granddaughter showed me a collection of "Garbage Pail Kids" and I nearly threw up. You are right to say these cards should not be allowed in Canada.

I could read on and on from the stack of letters that I have here. Individual Canadians are not the only ones who have written to me on this issue. I just want to read to you a short excerpt from a resolution passed by the Peterborough County Board of Education on November 25, 1988 in which they adopted the following resolution:

> WHEREAS the Topps Chewing Gum Inc. product called 'Garbage Pail Kids' is most objectionable and is contrary to the values taught in our public schools, and
> WHEREAS this product is available in retail outlets throughout Ontario,

I will just read the conclusion:

> Therefore, be it resolved that the Ontario Public School Boards' Association petition Topps Chewing Gum Inc., the Federal Ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Provincial Ministry of Consumer and Corporate Relations to have these products withdrawn.

• (1420)

Clearly, Canadians do not want this product.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, we know that children buy these cards. But even if they have the opportunity to do so, we parents have to guide them and stop them from buying them. Of course we all know that if you give loose change to a child going to the convenience store he will not necessarily return with what you expect. We know they can buy whatever is on the shelves. For the same reason, we do not want our children to buy pornographic material in convenience stores.

I think we all hope our children will never again be able to buy this kind of hate products aimed at other children. These products lower the value of human life, so I urge all my colleagues to support me with a view to banning them as soon as possible.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Madam Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I want to join my House of Commons colleagues who, a few seconds ago, congratulated the member from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell for his initiative. In response to his invitation of a moment ago I can tell him that government members on this side of the House do not intend to take a partisan approach to this issue. I hardly think the matter raised by my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell will prompt members to express diverging views because they are Liberals, New Democrats or Progressive Conservatives. There can be no partisan politics when dealing with such issues. As far as we are concerned, at least, there is no point of view which stems from ideology as such. The question raised by our colleague is of some concern to many Canadians.

We all know that in recent years the courts had to rule in a few hate propaganda cases. The Keegstra case in Alberta immediately comes to mind as do those of Andrews and Smith in Ontario where these cases went all the way to the superior courts. I believe that at this very moment, the Supreme Court is being asked to judge in this connection on the constitutionality of certain sections of the Criminal Code, including subsection 319(2). This means, Madam Speaker, that the subject raised by the hon. member here in the House today is now being considered by our courts and by the Supreme Court of Canada, specifically with respect to the Keegstra, Andrews and Smith cases.

I also want to join the hon. member in condemning this kind of propaganda—let's call it propaganda, he used the word—which some people see as "entertainment". Quotation marks are indeed in order here because personally, I see no redeeming features in the kind of illustrations on the cards being sold to children. I tried be objective and see whether there was anything positive here but quite frankly, I cannot, and that includes the product itself.

I don't think extensive research is necessary, Madam Speaker. I don't think anyone will order a doctorate thesis on the subject. I think any reasonable person will agree it is not the kind of product we want to sell or make available to children.

One wonders about the motives of the people who distribute and about the kind of person that would have the guts to create this kind of product. It raises a number of questions that are quite troubling for us and for all members of this House.

Madam Speaker, I would like to speak very briefly about the present provisions in the Criminal Code on this subject, and which have been there for some time.

First of all, hate propoganda is an offence that is defined under Common Law. Under our legal system, however people are not prosecuted under Common Law but our Criminal Code is based on Common Law. People are prosecuted for offences that are specifically defined or codified the Criminal Code.

This is one of the principles of our criminal law. Law professors tell us you can do anything in Canada, provided there is no law against it. That is one of the first things you learn at law school, in criminal law. Therefore, this problem, and the hon. member was right to remind us, must be considered within the context of the Criminal Code.

The current provisions of the Criminal Code stem from a study which was carried out in 1965. In January of that year, Hon. Guy Favreau, the then minister of Justice, had appointed a Special Committee to study and report upon the problems related to the dissemination of hate propaganda in Canada.

This Committee, also known as the Cohen Committee, completed its study in 1965 and recommended a number of amendments to the Criminal Code. Anxious to harmonize the new legislation with the major tenets of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, as well as the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, and in line with the Cohen Committee recommendations, Parliament included in 1965 in the Criminal Code a number of provisions concerning hate propaganda.

If I mention these international conventions, Madam Speaker, it is because there is a close relationship between the current provisions of our Criminal Code and the provisions of International Law as it existed at the time.

These provisions deal with advocating genocide, public incitement of hatred, and wilful promotion of hatred. Section 318 of the Criminal Code criminalizes advocating genocide. Everyone who advocates genocide is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years. No proceeding for an offense under this section may be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada.

Madam Speaker, I wish to emphasize that these are exceptional provisions. This is not the kind of provisions which we find in most of the offences mentioned in the Criminal Code. There is a reason for that. In fact, in the case of hate propaganda, an additional review is required. Before legal action can be taken, there must be a political examination, so to speak—and again, I use quotation marks—but there must also be a political will to act before charges can be brought.

In other words, at this level the persons must be committed to suing the person or persons concerned or the organization, according to the values stated or judged, or the prevailing circumstances.

The subsection 319 (1) of the Criminal Code mentions the people publicly inciting hatred. The base of the offence is the incitation to hatred in a public place—and this is the important part of the article—in a way "likely to lead to a breach of the peace" The term "public place" is defined in the Code as including any place to which the public has access as of right or by invitation, express or implied". Those who break the law in this regard are liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

The subsection 319 (2) of the Code covers the case of persons who, by communicating statement, wilfully promote hatred.

• (1430)

This violation differs from the previously mentioned one in that it is not necessary for the wrongdoing to be likely to lead to a breach of the peace. Moreover, the statements must be communicated other than in private conversation. Because there are limits to what the legislator can do and to what we can do as a society, Madam Speaker, I think that common sense would dictate that we at least not seek to regulate in that matter. Private conversations should not be regulated either. That is pure common sense.

As regards the latter violation, Parliament adopted means of ensuring freedom of expression is protected for, in our society, Madam Speaker, every individual liberty is measured against the liberty of others. Let us not forget that freedom of expression, as described in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, in section 2 b) of the Charter in particular, is what serves to counterbalance these provisions of the Criminal Code prohibiting hate propaganda.

The definition of "identifiable group"—and I think that is the key of the problem—which would be modified by my hon. colleague's bill, applies to the three offenses I have just mentioned.

Madam Speaker, I think it is obvious based on the historical background of the provisions relating to hate propaganda, that these provisions were originally intended and are still intended to protect visible minorities, religious groups and ethnic minorities in Canada. The underlying principle of the Report of the Special Committee on Hate Propaganda in Canada on which the present provisions on hate propaganda are based—and I am about to conclude, Madam Speaker—was to provide better protection for minority groups against racism, antisemitism and religious intolerance.

Madam Speaker, that is what in legal circles is called the genus of an article or argument—in other words, a definition that is used to achieve a specific purpose. What the hon. member is proposing today is a definition that goes beyond the genus. That is why the government does not see this particular amendment, at least not in its present form, as the ideal solution to the problem described by the hon. member. It may be the answer later on. However, at this time, Madam Speaker, we believe that the problem described by the hon. member could be dealt with more effectively other than by adding to a section that is now being challenged before the Supreme Court of Canada. My point is that in the next few months, the Supreme Court will have to rule on the validity of all these sections and at that time will decide what the law will be. Furthermore, in a context that is rather technical, it may not be the ideal solution to include age in a definition that cannot suitably include this factor.

That is why, Madam Speaker, I think that as legislators we must act prudently and wait a few months until we have a judgment by the Supreme Court of Canada, which we can then use to propose to Canadians an effective and lasting solution to the very important problem raised by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I join with others in commending my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on his initiative on this most important and critical matter. I join with my colleague from the Conservative Party who has just spoken and say that indeed this is non-partisan. This is not a political issue. It is an issue of compassion and caring where we, as Members of Parliament, are attempting to do something to rid this country of hate propaganda levied against children.

My hon. friend from the Conservative Party has indicated that we should see this in the context of amendments to the Criminal Code. That is one context, but I suggest there is another.

This weekend the Prime Minister will be co-hosting the United Nations World Summit for Children on behalf of Canada. While there is a lot of cynicism in terms of our Prime Minister, would it not be a perfect signal for the Parliament of Canada on the eve of the UN World Summit for Children to agree to refer this matter of hate propaganda levied against children to the appropriate committee for consideration in terms of dealing with this issue? I will be the first to say that perhaps this is not the best way to deal with it. At least it is a way. That forms another context in which I think we should examine this whole issue. We are only too familiar with the fact that children grow up today in an atmosphere of violence, violence that is demonstrated by their daily and weekly viewing of television. If you watch television, as a normal child in our country probably does, you see hundreds of killings every month on television. That rips the status of human life in terms of the image of the child.

We tune in to television in our homes now at certain times of the day and in some cases all day long to pornographic films, soft porn, hard porn, so any child now who can turn the dial on a television set can view some pretty interesting television to say the least, to say nothing of the rap tapes, discs, and records that one buys, that children tend to buy, and to listen to the messages that are sent out on those tapes, discs and casettes is something disgusting.

This is the context in which children today are being raised. It has been brought to our attention that these bubble gum packages imported from the United States carry these little pictures of kids that are supposed to be entertaining, as my hon. friend indicated. These are pictures of children with their heads cut off, pictures of children hanging from trees—lynched, if you like, Madam Speaker—where their hands are being burned in boiling water, where they are being ripped open with a knife, where their legs are being chopped off, where their stomachs are being ripped open, where their backs are being lacerated, where they are being run over by vehicles, where they are being twisted to death in the form of torture.

I can go on and on, but I think the point is well made. These are disgusting. This is not something that I think anyone would suggest is entertaining for a young person. Yet you can buy these in any shop in our communities.

I am sure all of us have received representations from parent groups, school groups and individuals coming to our offices, saying that this is coming into Canada. This is not right.

Well, as parliamentarians we ask what can be done. Surely we just cannot sit back and say that the existing Criminal Code does not allow us to do anything, just sit back and accept this.

What can we do? Well my hon. friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has come up with a suggestion. That is that we have regulations in the Criminal Code that does not allow hate propaganda against certain groups, and he has mentioned them, based on cult groups, based on colour, sex, creed, religion, country of origin. So we are able then to combat this type of hate propaganda that is aimed at those particular groups.

But we have nothing too prohibitive in that same way for hate propaganda that is destined against children.

This very simple Private Member's Bill attempts to include the wording of an identifiable age group as part of the criteria where hate propaganda can be brought into the courts under the Criminal Code of Canada.

I think this is a great initiative. It is at least an initiative, Madam Speaker. I become worried when I hear my hon. friend from the Conservative Party say there must be better ways to deal with this and so we will leave it for now.

I think it is perfect that on the eve of the United Nations World Summit for Children that the House of Commons would take this initiative. We all admit that this may not be the answer, but to simply refer this to the appropriate committee to indicate, first of all, our intention, our support for this initiative, and our disgust at this type of hate propaganda against children in our country, is a very laudable initiative.

We all know the rules here. If the debate ceases before the hour hand reaches three o'clock, this will then be put to a vote. I will say, representing the New Democratic Party, that we would vote in favour of this initiative. I have heard from my friends in the Liberal Party who say they will support this initiative. All eyes will be on the Conservative Party to see whether they support this initiative.

If they do, we will simply have a voice vote and the whole matter is referred to the appropriate committee. Simple, clean, and one of the most positive initiatives this House could take at the end of a very, very chaotic week in the House of Commons.

• (1440)

On behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, I want to say we support this initiative. We are abhorred at the kind of hate literature that is coming into our country from the United States. It is disgusting in all ways and forms. If this initiative can prevent this type of hate literature from getting into the hands of our children, we will be taking a step in the right direction.

I encourage all my colleagues to stop this debate well before three o'clock to advance this initiative.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege and honour to support my colleague who brought this bill before the House.

To me there are not enough words in the English language to say just how evil are these cards by the name of Garbage Pail Kids. They are vile, repugnant, and against everything that is decent and humane about our society. For people who distribute them to say that they distribute them because children like them and want to buy them is to be totally irresponsible.

If we listen to the evidence of so many children who live in poverty in this country today, they will tell us in as many words that they feel like garbage, that their peers call them garbage, and that adults treat them like garbage. We cannot tolerate and allow this type of propaganda, this type of reverse sensitization to exist in our country.

We are judged by what we do not do as often as by what we do. Good people often fail to do what they must do. What we lack so much in this country today is leadership. Again I just want to applaud my colleague for taking the initiative at this very important point in time in bringing forward this proposed legislation. I do not want to take up a lot of time because I want to ensure that this legislation is passed in this House this afternoon by voice vote.

Last night on national television, on the CBC program The Journal, we watched the story of the plight of children world-wide, children who are treated so indecently, like garbage. In some nations of the world today, because children are considered as garbage, they go about killing children on the street. We have to stop. We have to take the opportunity to turn the tide back and do something to address the very dire straits in which children around the world and in Canada find themselves. We must take the initiative as responsible adults to speak out on their behalf. Even though some children because of their age may think that this is amusing, the children that it hurts have no voice in this country. They depend upon us to speak up on their behalf.

I support my colleague's bill. I would urge and expect all of us to affirm it in a vote this afternoon.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I will make my remarks quickly so that we can get to the vote. I want to thank my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, for his determined and thoughtful initiative.

What we see here is nothing more than an housekeeping matter in the Criminal Code. He wants to add the word age. In fact it would arm the government minister with the necessary tool to prevent the proliferation of this kind of horrendous material. It is hate propaganda. There is no question of that.

We have these bubble gum cards, produced by Topps Chewing Gum Incorporated, with pictures depicting babies and older children expressing pain and agony while under dissection or surprise at having been impaled by the horn of a unicorn. This serves no one and in fact is nothing short of sick.

Where do we stop? What do we see next? Will we maybe see elderly persons? Will they pick up elderly persons and start making a mockery of them in this kind of disgusting material?

Given that the municipalities and school boards have condemned the product, it remains incumbent upon us to support them. I would hope that the House would adjourn debate on this motion to allow us to vote and vote in the affirmative in support of the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and Bill C-207 and, in the process, to denounce this product and any product like it.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I want to commence by letting the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell know that I think he has undertaken today to put before parliamentarians an issue that demands our attention and requires our sensitivities. I am one who having looked upon this legislation believes that there are some technical inadequacies to it and that in some parts, perhaps in its greatest failing, does not go far enough.

I pondered as I heard the hon. member read through a list of categories of people which he says the present legislation would restrict from hate literature and then point out that age was not one of those categories. If I heard him correctly, I did not note either that gender was one of those categories. It would seem to me that a further and more thorough examination ought to be undertaken with respect to a number of these criteria.

I believe that there would be a lot of advantage for this House in some ways in waiting for the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to the hearing of the Keegstra case and its pronouncements on hate literature to give us a durable kind of resolution that we might undertake.

Having said that, none of us in any corner of this Chamber would ever want to be in a situation where it would appear that for some reason we were not able to stand up, not only for an age that are called children but for an age that is called innocent. These criteria in my judgment are not as thorough as I would like and not as extensive as I would like. There are some technical limitations to them, particularly on a weekend when we stand on the eve of a world conference being held in New York to recognize the plight of children around the world. The descriptions thereof are well beyond the imagination of the majority of Canadians.

In the country of Brazil there exists today some 25 million street children. I remember that statistic with ease and with pain, because it is exactly the same number of street children as the total population of Canada located in one country. Street children are children who wander loose and alone without their parents.

The hon. member puts before us the whole notion that there is coming into this country the kind of material he described. From the speeches I have heard from others, I can only recognize that they have seen that material also and I accept it as fact. I have not seen it, but I do not doubt it. All I know is that if it fits the descriptions I have heard, it is not in a context which is appropriate that we have that kind of material within our society.

• (1450)

I suppose, to repeat, what I sense is that we would be better off—I say that quite genuinely—to have done a more thorough examination of the matter. I believe that there are other categories of the question of hatred that ought to be examined.

I also believe it would have been far more prudent for us as parliamentarians to have moved after the Supreme Court completed its deliberations with respect to the Keegstra case and laid before us all its recommendations.

Because of the evidence the hon. member has laid before us and because of the inability of this sector of society to be able to stand to protect themselves, it is appropriate for us as parliamentarians to accept the amendments that the hon. member wants to send forward to committee stage. Perhaps at that time we can expand on them. I am not sure to what extent he sees it, but I would presume that we should be able to expand in some detail and into different dimensions.

If in that process we can find even a much better bill that is different enough to change the character and nature of the bill, I believe that the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell will have started an appropriate initiative. He will have forced officials to come forward with an appropriate total response.

If that leads to a different, fuller and more expanded piece of legislation than what is being proposed, so be it. Let's wish, at least as I sit down, that as they meet this weekend in New York we can become a planet that is more caring for the young and is more intently interested in those who are unable to protect themselves.

Then we can stand on the right side of right, particularly in this case, in the interests of children who are being perpetrated upon by unholy material which in the final analysis can do nothing other than make all of us as a society stand together and say: "We repulse such information perpetrated upon our young."

Mr. Charest: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. After having consulted with colleagues in the House, especially with the member from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and the House leader of the New Democratic Party, I think Your Honour would find unanimous consent in this House at this time, after a very trying week of debates for Parliament, especially on the eve of the world summit on youth as my colleague from Crowfoot and others have mentioned.

This would be a good opportunity for the House to offer its unanimous consent so that this subject matter could be sent to a legislative committee for study. We could take into consideration all the arguments that were brought before this House today and take into consideration all the elements that will be coming into play in the next few months. Then the House of Commons and the government together will deal with this issue in the most efficient manner as possible.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I confirm that there has been such a discussion. As I understand it, you will require unanimous consent, first, to withdraw the bill and, second, to ask that the subject matter be referred to the appropriate parliamentary committee. Given that the House seems to be favourably disposed to that, I want to thank everybody even if they are not disposed to it.

I cannot presume that such consent has been achieved. We will have to you, Madam Speaker, to ask the House if it is so disposed. If such consent is achieved, I will thank hon. members in advance for their co-operation.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I too want to confirm that the discussions have occurred. This is a wonderful way to culminate a week. It has not been an easy week for anybody, but I cannot think of a more appropriate way to end it off than to withdraw the bill and send the subject matter to the appropriate committee. It advances the initiative taken by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

I want to say on behalf of the New Democratic Party that we are pleased with the element of co-operation we have seen for the first time this week, almost for the first time this year. Again I say to my colleagues in the House of Commons that this is a very positive initiative with which to end the week.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, first I should like to set the record straight: they say everybody was consulted and there is general agreement, but I can tell you that such is not the case and that nobody in this House speaks for me. The fact is, given the obvious merit of this motion and exceptionally, I will co-operate with the members for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and Sherbrooke precisely because we are talking about the future of our children. This, however, should not be taken as a precedent.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent for the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall I call it three o'clock?

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, perhaps as the sponsor of this bill, a bill turned motion now, I could take this opportunity to thank all colleagues for the support they have just given me.

All partisanship aside, which the Prime Minister and I may have occasionally, I want to wish him a successful weekend in New York City on behalf of the children of the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being three o'clock p.m. this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m., pursuant to order made earlier today.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE SENATE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to comment on the manner in which one of the Prime Minister's recent appointments to the other place, the Hon. Pat Carney, handled herself for openers.

She was asked by a journalist why she did not attend the initial ceremony. She replied that she was not going to drop everything to stand around with some people from the Italian community while they learned where the parliamentary bathroom is.

Her—

Mr. Speaker: At the moment, I think that that goes beyond the clear rules of this place and I must say I ask the hon. member to desist.

I am going to go on and, if the hon. member wants to discuss it with me afterward, I would certainly be prepared to do so.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in its first environmental report the World Bank makes an important point: that destroying the environment means destroying a country's economy. Therefore, natural resources must be used more efficiently. The World Bank is putting together a global environmental facility, a fund to be financed by industrialized countries for projects that would improve the environment in developing countries.

Apparently Canada questions the need for such a fund. Contributing to this important fund would be a step toward resolving the desperate situation of many in the third world, particularly children. It is hard to take the Prime Minister's words on erasing child poverty seriously, while the Government of Canada withholds support for the new fund.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, figures released earlier this summer indicate Canada Post operated with a profit of $149 million during the fiscal year 1989–1990.

While on the surface this is good news, many Canadians are becoming increasingly disturbed that the corporation is gaining its success at the expense of those least able to afford it.

For example, effective August 1, the cost of renting post office boxes for Canadians residing outside municipal boundaries has risen from $26 to $50, an increase of almost 100 per cent.

Canada Post offers one free mode of delivery to every Canadian, but for many who live along rural routes—the elderly and the disabled, in particular—the work associated with maintaining rural delivery especially during the winter months simply is not an option. Consequently, for those people renting post office boxes in town is the only means by which regular mail delivery can be assured.

I call upon the minister responsible for Canada Post to review this new fee schedule now.

BILL C–43

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists has released results of its survey showing that 200 doctors, nearly one-third of all doctors performing abortions, will stop if Bill C–43 becomes law.

These doctors have told the Minister of Justice that they cannot function under punitive criminal legislation where their professional judgment can be attacked by criminal charges.

Many Canadian women in all regions of Canada now face extreme difficulties in obtaining abortions. Doctors have said Bill C–43 will only make matters worse. How can the Minister of Justice still proceed to recriminalize abortion? How can the Minister of Health allow access to medical care including reproductive choice to be eroded?

It is not too late. We call upon the government to abandon the abortion bill.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, strong families are the most fundamental support for children and children are the world's most precious resource.

The Prime Minister and all leaders who participated in the World Summit for Children are to be congratulated for focusing attention on the light of children. Canadians can be proud of the role our Prime Minister has played as co-chairman of this summit.

It is appropriate that during National Family Week, we should recognize the family as the most fundamental building block of this or any nation. If we, as a government and as a people, wish to ensure the future of our children, we must ensure the future of the family in our society.

Support for families is support for children.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, recent events, as well as those of the past summer, have once again shown the arrogance of this Conservative government and its complete disregard for the views and concerns of Canadians on issues of vital national concern.

The refusal of the government to recall Parliament this past summer to deal with the crisis at Kanesatake and Kahnawake, an issue of concern not only to aboriginal peoples but to all Canadians, is deplorable. It indicates the government's contempt for Parliament and our democratic traditions.

In fact, the Wasauksing First Nation of the riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka had to turn to me with its concerns when their own member of Parliament refused to listen to them. This is just one example among many of the arrogance of the Conservative Government.

Rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that the government will pay dearly in the next election for the lack of respect for the views of Canadians.

WORLD HABITAT DAY

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, today is World Habitat Day. As Canadians we must take time to reflect upon the ways in which we can help others, both here and abroad, in support of this United Nations effort.

In the developing world today, some 140,000 people will abandon their rural villages for an urban life, one that to them promises both employment and an improved quality of life. Unfortunately, the cities are unable to live up to their promises. A lack of homes forces the migrants into overcrowded squatters' settlements. For many nations the needs of these new arrivals go beyond the financial means of their governments.

Many countries have been successful and have had good experience in dealing with this crisis. The problem of shelter is a global one and therefore requires a united global effort. While most of these nations may not have the funds to help themselves, they do have the desire. We must couple this desire along with our knowledge and financial institutions to help the developing nations to help themselves.

JAMES BAY CREES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, James Bay Crees have disowned George Erasmus. The spokesman for the Grand Council of Quebec Crees believes that Mr. Erasmus is acting irresponsibly when affirming that the fight of native people against the James Bay II project will lead to acts of violence.

Lawyer Roméo Saganash, Cree Grand Council vice president stated: "If this project breeds violence it will not be on the part of the Crees". He went on to say: "We have always been and we will always be pacifists. We have given very strict instructions, particularly to our youth. We have met with them and explained the Grand Council's position in clear terms, reminding them that we are not violent people".

Mr. Speaker, James Bay Crees have won and lost legal battles in the past, but never did they resort to arms as a means of pressure. They are now fighting against Hydro-Quebec's power developments by attempting first to make the public aware of the environmental impact of the project.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr.Speaker, British Columbia's forests are in a crisis and this government is doing nothing to help us.

A high dollar, high interest rates, poor forestry practices, and the sellout of our forest to the U.S. government has created this crisis. Forest giant, Fletcher Challenge, has laid off 1,200 workers in the last year alone. Workers lose their jobs while a huge foreign company makes huge profits from our forests.

The federal Minister of Forestry sits silently, while the softwood lumber tariff allows the U.S. to run our forests. At the same time, he has failed to sign a forest agreement with B.C., despite his commitment to have signed one before the planting season this year.

The Conservatives and their Liberal friends have failed our farms, our forests, and our fish. It is time to change these policies. It is time for the New Democrats.

THE SENATE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it is written in Proverbs that without a shepherd, sheep are not a flock.

The Concise Oxford Dictionary offers the following definitions of the word "sheep":

> 1. wild or domesticated—
>
> —but otherwise—
> —timid gregarious woolly often horned ruminant of genus Ovis; 2. bashful or docile person; —member of minister's flock, parishioner—

Last evening, Liberal Leader Jean Chrétien is attributed to have said, in reference to Liberal members of the other place, and I quote: "They will do what I tell them to do." In view of his statement, can we conclude that Mr. Chrétien is suggesting yet another definition, "Liberal senator" be added to the current definitions of the word sheep?

Mr. Speaker: I think it is probably appropriate that I remind hon. members of something. Some members may think I should have intervened, but I was not quite sure where it was going.

As I had to intervene with another member a few minutes ago, I remind hon. members of the following rule:

> No Member shall speak disrespectfully of the Sovereign, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of the Governor General or the person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any Member thereof.

That is the rule and I am going to ask all hon. members, especially given what is well known to Canadians as an issue of some importance to the country, that they keep that in mind in Members' Statements, Question Period, and in debate.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, in response to a world grain surplus, worsened by the sanctions against Iraq, the United States has increased its Export Enhancement Program subsidy for sales to remaining markets such as Algeria, to more than $43 a tonne from $28 a tonne in early August.

Algeria is a major Canadian market for Durum wheat. Canada's sales last year to Algeria totalled $125 million, approximately half the value of those we ship to Iraq. However, because of the increased subsidy offered by the United States, we could lose other markets similar to our reported loss of sales to the Philippines. The Philippines used to obtain one-third of its annual 1.2 million tonne of wheat requirements from Canada, but this year it filled that order through the United States subsidized program, the Export Enhancement Program.

We now learn that in September the United States Senate has passed legislation in total violation of section 701.4 of the free trade agreement, with the intent to trump up justification for further increases in its Export Enhancement Program.

I call on the government now either to retaliate against this flagrant violation of the free trade agreement or to scrap it.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Before the Prime Minister and his government went ahead and packed the Senate with the eight additional senators for the purpose of getting the GST through and forcing it on Canadians, we urged the Prime Minister not to proceed until court challenges that were to be begun by various provinces had been dealt with by the courts.

The Prime Minister went ahead in any event. The court challenges are still there. There is a breech of section 51 of the Constitution because there are more senators than there are MPs in New Brunswick. Also, there is an inequitable representation even by divisions because the divisions do not include Newfoundland and the territories. Will the Deputy Prime Minister proceed to have the matter cleared up right away and refer this whole question to the Supreme Court of Canada without any delay? Does he not realize that if this is not done, anything the eight additional senators touch will be tainted irrevocably by this government's mishandling of the whole situation?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to reply to the hon. Leader of the Opposition that the issues which he appears to raise with respect to section 51(a) are non issues. There is no question that I am now prepared to give a firm position on the part of the government that section 51(a) does not apply to appointments made under section 26, which are divisional appointments. Therefore, I would like to reassure him that his concerns are unfounded.

The only thing that taints what is happening in the Senate is their disregard for decades of constitutional convention about the supremacy of the House of Commons on fiscal management.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice with all her power has not yet replaced the courts of this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Right on.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): The Minister of Justice has not stated any grounds for her answer. I challenge her once again to have this matter referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. I point out to her that if she looks at section 23(3) of the Constitution Act, it says in part that a senator shall own lands "within the province for which he is appointed of the value of $4,000."

Subsection (5) states: The senator, and I quote:

—shall be resident in the Province for which he is appointed.

The section does not say that it is enough if the lands are owned in the division for which he is appointed. It does not say it is enough if a senator is resident in the division for which he is appointed. This is a further indication that this government has proceeded improperly and that the taint of its actions will be removed only if there is a ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada. If it believes its position is right, why will it not get that approval of the court today?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will recall from his own legal training, I am sure, there is a provision in statutory interpretation where the requirements or the circumstances relating to one part of a statute are applied and expressed mutatis mutandis to other circumstances to make them consistent with the meaning of the whole statute.

I think it is certainly clear that section 26 will be interpreted to require senators appointed as divisional senators to hold property in the division in which they are appointed. I would like to say to the hon. member that I have no intention as Minister of Justice of usurping the courts. It is unfortunate that the Senate of Canada now appears to be taking unto itself the prerogative of usurping the people of Canada and their mandate granted through the election of 1988.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Justice is concerned with the views of the people of Canada. If that is the case, why will she and the government not listen to the people of Canada who say they do not want the GST.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada announced today that the advanced composite index which points to expected economic trends is down for the sixth month in a row. According to Statistics Canada, "such a series of six decreases has always been followed by a recession".

So I am asking the Deputy Prime Minister why he is bent on imposing the GST when the statisticians of his own government are forecasting a recession. Why not admit this evidence and why does he insist on implementing the GST and thus worsen the recession created by his own policies?

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, possibly the hon. Leader of the Opposition would let the House in on why he and his party are supporting the Senate in holding back, for example, the unemployment insurance bill, which will provide for increased maternity benefits, which will provide for unemployment insurance benefits to be payable to those who are still in the labour force over age 65, which will also allow for about $500 million of increased moneys for training so that people who are out of a job can get some training to allow them to get back as more effective members of the labour force.

If the hon. member is so concerned about the leading indicators and the outlook for the economy, what he should be doing is seeking support from the people in the Senate to get on with the job of bringing in legislation which will help this economy.

Some hon. members: It's a bad bill.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, this weekend the Prime Minister presided over the vital world issue of children's rights. Among the world's goals for the year 2000 is universal access to basic education which, of course, endorses literacy.

Given the fact that books have never been taxed in Canada, that the Canadian government's own studies prove that taxing reading cuts access to learning and that Canadians have said do not tax reading, my question to the Minister of Finance is this. Can the minister explain this contradiction of endorsing children's right to education on the world stage on the one hand, while taxing children's reading at home?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one of the most vital elements to improving our record on literacy is improving education. Education is not taxed under the GST. If libraries want to buy books, those books are not taxed.

We have put in place a broad based consumption tax which does not try to make decisions for individual people. It allows those decisions to be made by the people themselves. There is a low income goods and services tax credit to be paid by cheque four times a year which fully offsets the impact of the GST on low income people. In fact, those people who are earning less than $30,000 will be better off after the GST. In other words, they will be in a better position to spend more money on books, if that is what they so wish.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad this minister does not recognize the regressivity of this tax, particularly on low income people and working families.

[Translation]

The federal government and the government of Quebec, where the illiteracy rate is one of the highest in this country, both claim that literacy is a priority. Once the GST kicks in in Quebec a book now selling for $22 will soon cost almost $31. Again my question is directed to the Minister of Finance: Why does he refuse to withdraw the GST right now before books and reading become the exclusive privilege of the wealthy?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it really puzzles me as to why this hon. member continues to say that the GST is regressive.

Mrs. Finestone: It is.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If she would take the smirk off her face, I would give her the answer.

The goods and services tax, together with the totally integrated GST credit, results in an impact on low income people that is not regressive, far from it, it reverses the regressive form of sales tax that we have in place today. That is one of the fundamental elements of the GST credits.

The hon. member is shaking her head as if she does not understand. I am sorry, but if she will come and spend some time with me, I will take her through this so that she will understand that the GST is not a regressive tax.

Let me just make one other point. In the context of the book publishing review, the policy review that my colleague, the Minister of Communications has under way, we are prepared to address all of these issues, but in a much more comprehensive way than my hon. friend is seeking to do right now.

THE SENATE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice.

She has assured the House that everything is fine in terms of the appointment of the eight senators, that everything is constitutional.

One of her predecessors as justice minister said the same thing in 1981. The then justice minister, Jean Chrétien, said that the 1981 package was fine, until the Supreme Court ruled otherwise.

In light of that precedent and in light of the fact that we now have legal experts such as the Dean of Law at Queen's University and her former colleague, the Attorney General of British Columbia, saying that this action is illegal and that Parliament itself might not be properly constituted, will she now change her mind, do the right thing, refer this to the Supreme Court and not make the same mistake that Jean Chrétien made in 1981?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take it to the Supreme Court because I think it is clear on the face of reading the Constitution that there is not a constitutional issue.

I have heard a lot of interesting debate, and there are certainly a lot of members of the legal profession who are strong supporters of the NDP who are providing it with political arguments, if not very good legal arguments.

I think that is fair game, but I would remind the hon. member of the legality of legislation passed in the Senate. I would remind the hon. member that just recently the election of a member of the House of Commons was declared to be invalid. That did not serve to invalidate everything that had been done by the House of Commons when that person sat here.

I admire the NDP for having enthusiastic supporters who are trying to give it legal arguments, but I am sorry. I know why it is looking for a smokescreen. It is trying to find some issue to hide behind the unconscionable position that it is taking in support of an unelected Senate in defiance of its own position, an unelected Senate which is up—

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the minister is dreaming of.

I have not heard of the British Columbia Attorney General being an enthusiastic supporter of the NDP.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can help the member and the minister.

If the member will put the question, I am sure the minister will try to answer it.

An hon. member: Are there any good Tory lawyers for hire?

Mr. Nystrom: In light of the fact that there is already a court challenge, in light of the fact that there are very serious constitutional people in this country saying: "What happened is it is wrong and unconstitutional", that Parliament itself might indeed be improperly constituted, I want to ask the minister very seriously: What is she afraid of? Why does she not end the confusion? Why does she not end the chaos and refer this, right now, to the Supreme Court?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that the current incumbent as Attorney General of British Columbia is not a lawyer.

All the participants and the decision to use section 26 had independent legal advice. I am confident that the position of the government is correct. The only thing that frightens me is the distressing reversal of the NDP's very principled position over the years and its joining with the Liberals to support the usurpation of the power of the people of Canada.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the minister is sounding more and more like Jean Chrétien from 1981.

In light of that, I want to go to the Deputy Prime Minister who is responsible for the government in the absence of the Prime Minister.

Since the government is afraid to make a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, since the government is not going to rescind the nomination of those eight senators and since the government will not withdraw the GST, I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister will make sure the government does the right constitutional thing and have the Prime Minister go to Government House, see Governor General Ray Hnatyshyn, ask him to dissolve Parliament and let the people of Canada decide.

• (1430)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the last time the hon. member stood in this place and asked for that they did not like the result. They may not like the result when the election is called in due course this time.

* * *

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Automobile Association has again joined the ranks of those condemning the stupidity of the government's GST.

The Minister of National Revenue has told the CAA's members that they do not have to pay the GST when they renew their 1991 membership. On the other hand, he has told the CAA it must pay GST on a portion of these memberships after January 1. This leaves the CAA with the horrendous cost of going back to 3.5 million members to collect anywhere from 50 cents to $2.40 in GST.

Will the Minister of Finance admit that the ramrod timetable of this government is causing havoc in the marketplace? Will he scrap the September 1 starting date or, indeed, will he scrap the GST altogether?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think we have a case here of selective amnesia by the hon. member.

If she would reflect on the fact that the price of an automobile will go down $700 or $800 for a $20,000 car as a result of the GST and not just focus on one side of the GST, she would realize that this is a very good tax as far as the automotive industry is concerned.

What we are seeing in the questions of the last few minutes is an attempt on the part of the Liberals to deflect the fact of what is going on in the Senate. I remind them of what is being said in editorial pages across the country: time to end the obstruction; the Liberal senators should call it quits; Liberal senators are not acting in the spirit of democracy; senators' shenanigans are intolerable; Senate gains, democracy loses; surgery needed to save—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West on a further question.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it appears to me and to all taxpayers of Canada that what the minister is trying to do is deflect attention from his tax to another place. We are not talking about a bill that 85 per cent of Canadians do not want. We are talking about directions coming directly from this government.

The minister says that from September 1 business has to advise its consumers that they will be charged taxes on services after January 1, if the GST becomes law.

Will the minister please tell us what law obliges businesses to do anything about the GST, or is the government now ruling by presidential decree?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what we are talking about here is what is at stake in this country. We are talking about some of the fundamental principles of democracy.

What I might refer the hon. member to is a column by William Thorsell wherein he says: "We are all trustees of profoundly important democratic principles. As trustees, we simply cannot abandon those principles." What Mr. Thorsell is saying is that it is not just the issue of the day that we are talking about, but we are talking about a fundamental issue that affects all of us in this House of Commons.

If the GST goes through and Canadians do not like it, they can vote this government out.

Some hon. members: They will.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): But, if the tactics of Senator MacEachen and the other Liberal senators are followed and they win the day, what can Canadians do with Mr. MacEachen? Nothing. They have no recourse. They have no way of expressing their point of view on what the position of the Senate should be because they are unelected.

That is the fundamental principle, and the questions that the Liberal Party is trying to pose there will not and cannot deflect from that fundamental principle.

BY-ELECTIONS IN THE RIDINGS OF YORK NORTH AND BEAUSÉJOUR

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

When does he intend to call a by-election in the ridings of York North and Beauséjour?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has left the people of York North without an elected representative since May 29 last. Previously the Prime Minister has taunted the Liberals to get their leader elected. The MP for Beauséjour has resigned his seat believing that the Prime Minister was serious.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister now put his money where his mouth is and have the Prime Minister call an immediate election?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are anxious to get the leader of the Liberal Party into the Chamber because—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is, if he can get here. We are getting a little sick and tired of the leadership that is being provided from the other place.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend the Prime Minister, during his speech at the children's summit, said: "And to the children, I invite you to listen carefully to what we say and in the coming years to hold us to our commitments. I hope none of us will be found wanting".

Would the Deputy Prime Minister tell us and the one in six children in Canada living in poverty just what this government's agenda or timetable is to meet and comply with the UN Convention on Children's Rights?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to respond to this question. The summit, which was held under the leadership of the Prime Minister of Canada this weekend, was the most successful summit of its kind in the history of the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Beatty: We are taking action as of now. I am pleased to be able to inform the House of Commons that consistent with recommendation No. 1 of Mr. Rix Rogers' report, the Prime Minister today asked me to co-ordinate activities within the government relating to children in response to the declaration on behalf of children at the United Nations. Second, and in response to recommendation No. 2 of Mr. Rix Rogers, I am announcing today the creation of a children's bureau within Health and Welfare Canada to assist us in doing that.

We are committed to full ratification of the convention. We will have that done before the end of next year. Our goal is to ensure that all legislation in Canada complies with the convention itself, which will enter into Canadian law.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the menu was very nice. The food banks would like to have had that kind of surplus. I also understand that the statements the minister just made about what is going to happen are very nice.

The Prime Minister also stated in his speech: "Funding is important but it is not, in the end, the decisive factor in the war on child suffering. Political will is".

Would the minister explain the political will that gave us no child care program, clawbacks to family allowance, and a failure to act to protect children from child abuse to this point? Statements are not good enough. We would like to see some action. Is this the political will of which the Prime Minister speaks?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is an interesting contrast between the cynicism that is exhibited by hon. members opposite and the tremendous optimism that was shown in New York at the world's largest summit of its kind ever in the history of mankind. In the days—

Ms. Mitchell: How many years have we been asking for action?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, they ask a question, but they do not allow me to answer.

In today's The New York Times Dr. Robert E. Black, the chairman of the Department of International Health at Johns Hopkins University School of Hygiene and Public Health, said it was: "a significant achievement, a great event, to bring all of these world leaders together to talk about a very important issue". Indeed it was, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member asked about political will. It was indeed this government which showed the political will and the leadership to ensure that some 260,000 Canadian children have been able to escape from the low income cutoff since we came to office.

The Liberals talk. We want to see leadership on their part. Today the Liberal Senators are blocking about half a billion dollars in parental leave benefits and the unemployment insurance reforms that are currently sitting before the Senate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, last March I advised the Minister of Transport that Mr. Peter Lush, chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission, was in gross conflict of interest in that Mr. Peter Lush while chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission was also acting as a real estate broker in the sale of $10 million worth of property to the Hamilton Harbour Commission.

The minister promised to investigate. Mr. Lush promised to sever any business ties in the sale of the land.

Why did the Minister of Transport make the statement when, as I learned today, Mr. Lush was in fact paid $400,000 in commission?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when my hon. friend raised this matter last March, the investigation was in fact carried out and at that time there was no suggestion that there was any conflict of interest. It was looked at very carefully.

My hon. friend has just brought another allegation to the floor of the House of Commons. I will investigate that one too.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): My supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

I warned the minister six months ago of this conflict. The government did nothing. In my possession is an internal company memo documenting the $400,000 payment to Mr. Lush who was appointed by the Tory government as chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister respectfully suggest to the Prime Minister that he immediately remove Mr. Lush as chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission, that he relieve the Minister of Transport of his responsibilities, and that he call the RCMP in to investigate the sale of the land to—

Mr. Speaker: I patiently went through that question up until the last part. That is a clear allegation of criminal wrongdoing and it just is not appropriate in Question Period. The minister does not have to answer.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of public record that the Minister of Transport undertook to investigate the allegations, the warnings of the member for Hamilton West six months ago. It is a matter of public record that Mr. Lush, chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission, publicly declared that he was severing all business ties in the sale of land from J. I. Case to the Hamilton Harbour Commission.

I now quote from the comptroller's memo at J. I. Case: "Mr. Lush negotiated with Corporate Reality, Mr. Dishman, a fee of $400,000 as a consulting fee which was approved by Mr. Ashford. My staff did not know about it for forecast purposes. It was not included in the forecast. Please adjust accordingly."

That memo is dated August 28. The $400,000 was paid to Mr. Lush on August 3. We have spoken, both the member for Hamilton West and I, to the company's lawyer this morning and the payment was confirmed of $400,000.

Given these facts, will the Deputy Prime Minister move immediately to dismiss Mr. Lush—and these are facts—as chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I learned a long time ago to relate facts to allegations.

That is an unfair allegation against a citizen of this country, made on the floor of the House of Commons where he or she cannot represent themselves. I thought better of the hon. member, but I will look into it.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Lush in question was the owner of a reality company that was the exclusive listing agent for J. I. Case in the sale of $10 million of land to the Hamilton Harbour Commission. The same Mr. Lush was chairman and is chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission. Mr. Lush cannot be both the agent negotiating on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada and the agent selling on behalf of private interests.

These are facts. If the minister who promised to investigate six months still refused to move, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: remove this minister today.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I looked into my hon. friend's allegations last March and found them to be untrue. I will look into them today and I will bet the same answer stands.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has known since February of this year that His Holiness the Dalai Lama, an internationally respected religious leader, advocate of non–violence, peace, and human rights and the 1989 winner of the Nobel peace prize, would be visiting Canada at this time to open the Canadian tribute to human rights monument.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister now recognize that the people of Canada feel a sense of embarrassment and anger that the Prime Minister has refused to see this respected religious leader and will the he now call upon the Prime Minister to meet with the Dalai Lama?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, we recognize the Dalai Lama as an eminent religious leader who has always been an ardent defender of values we hold dear, namely human rights and world peace. We are glad he has been able to come to Canada and share with many Canadians those fundamental values we respect. The Secretary of State met the Dalai Lama yesterday afternoon, because the government has a keen interest in the issues that are uppermost in his mind. We are pleased with the outcome of this meeting.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of meeting with the Secretary of State. It is a matter of fundamental respect on the part of the Prime Minister of Canada. And now for my supplementary. Today, I intend to move, at the appropriate time, a motion that the House of Commons give the Dalai Lama a hearing. My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: will government members support this motion? Will they let the Dalai Lama be heard before the House of Commons?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I think I was very clear about our respect for this eminent religious leader and his international reputation as a winner of the Nobel Peace Prize.

As I said earlier, my colleague met the Dalai Lama yesterday afternoon, and I also know that tomorrow afternoon he will have a meeting with the Standing Committee of the House on External Affairs. I think parliamentarians will be delighted with this opportunity to meet him and hear what he has to say about human rights and maintaining those values we hold so dear.

FLOW-THROUGH SHARES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Flow-through-share financing for the Quebec mining industry has dropped from $532 million in 1987 to probably less than $50 million this year.

My question is this: Will the federal government raise the level of flow-through shares from 100 to 133 per cent? If not, how does it intend to help junior mining companies?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the interest that the hon. member has shown in the issue of flowthrough shares. I might say to him that the drop in mining exploration is not entirely related to this one issue. There is a very real problem in the mineral markets in the world today and this has caused, in large extent, the slowdown in mining exploration in Canada.

In the tax reform of 1987, we did recognize the importance of the mining industry. The mining sector itself has one of the lowest rates of taxation both for new investment as well as average effective tax. We also recognized, with some special provisions, the important role that prospectors play in the mining exploration process.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. As was just mentioned, today we are honoured to have with us on Parliament Hill the Dalai Lama of Tibet, the winner of the 1989 Nobel peace prize and one of the world's great spiritual leaders.

When the Dalai Lama met with the Secretary of State yesterday, I understand he asked the Canadian government to support his five-point peace plan with China, which includes respect for the fundamental human rights and democratic freedoms of the Tibetan people. Would the minister tell us what reply the government gave to the Dalai Lama and is the government willing to support his five-point peace plan?

• (1450)

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I was very honoured and pleased to have the opportunity to meet yesterday with the Dalai Lama. It was a very moving and inspirational afternoon.

The member is correct. His Holiness did reiterate the five proposals that he has made on two separate occasions, I believe, in 1987 and 1988. I assured him that I would be relaying his interest and the dedicated manner in which he brought them forward to the members of my government.

We then proceeded to the unveiling of a tribute to human rights. It was a very moving afternoon. We had many Canadians participating in an examination of what our future vision of a world where human rights are not violated, can really be. I was thrilled to have the honour of representing the government on this occasion.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer as to whether or not the government will support the five-point peace plan proposed by the Dalai Lama and in particular, a respect for the basic fundamental human rights of the Tibetan people.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the five-point peace plan advocated by the Dalai Lama proposes as well a stop to the transfer of Chinese people to Tibet and the designation of Tibet as a peace and no-violence zone. Is the government prepared to accept the Dalai Lama's proposals? Is the government prepared to discuss them with the Chinese government at the earliest opportunity?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): The Dalai Lama did make his point, Mr. Speaker. He reiterated what the hon. member has just said. His Holiness certainly spoke with compassion, dignity and respect for mankind. He is fully aware of what we are trying to do in this country. I had an opportunity to enlighten him on our new initiatives. We also talked about next December's conference which will provide a forum to debate human rights throughout the world, including Canada.

WOMEN'S PROGRAMS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. A StatsCanada report released Thursday indicated that between 1988 and 1989 the number of sexual assaults had risen by 6 per cent.

The last budget cuts in funding for women's programs have left women support services spending their time scrounging for funds when they should be fighting violence and counselling victims.

When will the government reinstate crucially needed funds to fight this type of violence?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, we certainly share the concern about the rise in sexual assaults against women and children. Every effort must be taken by federal and provincial governments and local organizations.

I would like to say that it was this government that introduced the $40 million family violence program just a few years ago, $22 million of which has gone into Project Haven to provide the kind of support and shelters for women who seek safe places when they have become victims of violence.

I visited a number of these projects over the summer and they are providing excellent support. I know we are going to be able to continue our work in this direction.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Chiefs of Police have reported that violence is definitely on the increase as a result of forced program cuts caused by funding constraints.

I am well aware of Project Haven, but there are many preliminary programs that have to be put into place prior to Project Haven. Is this not proof enough that the funding should not only be fully reinstated but increased?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the hon. member is a very important one indeed.

I can indicate to the hon. member that the government is currently considering a range of initiatives, dealing particularly with the whole field of family violence involving child sexual abuse. We have the Rix Rogers report before us at the present time.

In addition to that, we are looking at the follow-on with regard to the family violence program. We are absolutely convinced that this is an initiative which is essential in our society. We will take every appropriate measure to do what we can to reduce this sort of violence in Canada.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

The minister is aware that representatives of visible minorities, aboriginals, disabled and women's groups met as a national employment equity network this past weekend. We hope the government will provide a public response as soon as possible to its main positive recommendations for action that will improve employment equity in both the public and private sectors.

Since Secretary of State funding was promised and then refused late Friday afternoon—as a result many low-income people are having considerable hardship and must have their expenses covered—will the minister reconsider and provide funds for this important conference of employment equity target groups?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I was made aware of an application by 11 of the groups in the network on Thursday morning.

I might add that those 11 groups already receive $3 million of funding from the Secretary of State, over $2 million in core funding and almost $1 million in project funding.

It became an administrative decision. We fund thousands and thousands of projects, all of them very useful in promoting equality and social justice.

We cannot possibly fund everything that we are requested to fund. Unfortunately, this was one of those occasions where we had to say no. We felt it would still proceed within the $3 million already made available.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, saying no at five o'clock Friday to groups that have been promised additional funding for special projects when their general funding was cut seems to me quite irresponsible and does not show a commitment to employment equity on the part of this government.

There were two emergency resolutions which I understand were put forward in addition to the general resolutions that will come later. Will the government ensure that the planning for PS–2000, which will include consultation with employment equity target groups so that the hiring will be mandatory in the restructuring of the Public Service and be mandatory to include employment equity?

Also, will the minister investigate complaints that aboriginal employees in the Public Service are experiencing harassment?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am very actively looking at this particular file concerning civil service 2000, and particularly the area of equity.

We have received reports from 10 different task forces. We have put out a preliminary report that is being looked at by the unions, and I can guarantee her that I am very preoccupied with this particular aspect. Certainly, I will be able to report on it shortly.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for External Relations.

As was mentioned before, this weekend at the summit for children the Prime Minister said that political will is a decisive factor in the war on child poverty. In contrast, the United Nations children's fund, one of the main organizers of the summit calculates that an additional $2.5 billion a year is needed to save millions of children's lives over the next decade.

I would like to know what additional financial resources this government is going to contribute to meet UNICEF goals for the next decade. Children cannot eat political will.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, the government acknowledges that the future of our planet depends on the children of the world. My colleague would know that for years now CIDA programs have given priority to the health and elementary level education of mothers and children. Over the last five years we have directly and indirectly allocated $1.8 billion to children.

My colleague probably knows that in 1970 only 5 per cent of children had been vaccinated against the six basic diseases and that the current rate is up to 70 to 75 per cent. Canada did more than its share by allocating $140 million in the past few years.

Surely my colleague will admit that this is a firm government commitment. We have programs and will continue to implement them while giving priority to Third World children.

• (1500)

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

We begin National Family Week, but the sad reality is that hundreds of thousands of children and their families in the country experience deplorable poverty and the mortality rate among our native Canadians is twice the national average.

The government is able to give us irreversible dates for such things as GST legislation implementation and the Meech Lake Accord. Is the government ready to announce today a specific date for the ratification of the Convention on the Rights of the Child and a concrete timetable to eliminate our own shameful child statistics?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the first point that needs to be made is that since 1984 when this government came to office, some 260,000 children have escaped from the low-income cut-offs. I believe that we have done well in Canada, but I believe that we can do better not as long as any child lives in poverty, it should be be acceptable in a civilized society.

I can indicate to the hon. member that our commitment is to move for ratification of the convention by the end of 1991. Today, the Prime Minister assigned to me responsibility for co-ordinating the government's response to the UN summit. I will be placing before my Cabinet colleagues proposals which will help us to move ahead on issues related to the health of children, the social well-being of children, child sexual abuse and a whole range of other issues that are of concern to every Canadian.

Most importantly, at the present time legislation we have stalled before the Senate of Canada which would significantly improve parental leave and the hon. member's party could be exceptionally helpful in stopping the blockade of those important reforms for Canadian parents.

PRIVILEGE

THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have a question of privilege from the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville. I might say to the hon. member that I appreciate the fact that he has basically stated his question of privilege in his letter to me. I have some difficulty in accepting it as a question of privilege. I will hear the hon. member very briefly.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. You are aware that there is now a court challenge about the way the Senators were appointed last week and that there are legal opinions that the appointment of the Senators may not be indeed legal or that Parliament itself might not be properly constituted.

My question of privilege is the following one, Mr. Speaker. In light of that uncertainty that we all know exists now in the country, I think there is confusion about what the roles of a member of Parliament may be. There is now confusion about what the role of a parliamentarian might be in this House and as a result of that, I think some of my privileges might be threatened as a member of Parliament.

I think there is uncertainty about the laws that we are going to pass, important laws that concern the Hibernia debate that is taking place later on today and important laws that we are all concerned about such as the environmental assessment law and so on.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is a precedent for this in our country. In Manitoba a few years ago in the Bilodeau case and the French language question, a private citizen challenged the legality of the Manitoba laws, and the court ruled that Manitoba laws were not legal. Those were laws that were passed in legislatures a long time ago, but they were deemed not to be legal by the courts of that particular day.

There is also a precedent in Saskatchewan where certain laws were deemed not to be legal—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may be quite correct in citing some past court decisions. I am prepared to hear the hon. parliamentary secretary if necessary, but perhaps I can assist him by dealing directly with the application that the hon. member has made.

There may or may not be a great debate going on in the country with respect to certain matters that are constitutional in their nature. First, it is not for the Speaker of the House to rule on constitutional matters. It is not for the Speaker of the House to try to interpret at any given time different legal opinions that may be being expressed across the country.

The hon. member, who certainly knows the history of our country and understands the issue of which he speaks, nonetheless has asked the Speaker to consider it a question of privilege. He has been very frank with the Chair. He said that certain things here might not be legal. He talks about uncertainty. He talks about confusion of the role on the part of members of Parliament and he also says that some of his privileges may be infringed.

I have to say to the hon. member, and to all other hon. members, that no matter how much this may be a subject of debate in the country—or even in here at an appropriate time—it does not meet the fundamental test of privilege which is something happening, somebody doing something, or some people doing something which makes it impossible or very much more difficult for any single hon. member here to carry on the obligations which they were elected to do. That is the fundamental test.

I have to say that under these circumstances, whatever the arguments may be, it does not meet that test and I have to with of course great respect reject the hon. member's application.

REMARKS DURING STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York Centre was interrupted by me earlier today when he was making a statement pursuant to S. O. 31 and I understand that he wishes to rise on a question of privilege and of course I will hear him.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I begin by acknowledging the very large measure of responsibility that the Chair has for preserving order in the House in relation to S. O. 31s. But I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the statement that I had begun to make is an entirely proper one to be made in this place.

At the moment when you interrupted me, you may have anticipated, perhaps, that I was intending—if I can use the words of Standing Order 18—to use offensive words against a member of the other place, or that I was intending to reflect upon what was done in another place. Far from it, Mr. Speaker.

What I was doing was quoting one of the newly appointed Senators in the other place, the Hon. Pat Carney, and the words which were attributed to her by a journalist, showing the low regard that she has for members of the Italian community and I think—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a question of privilege. The complaint now is that I may well have cut the hon. member off before I would have if I had heard the hon. member in entirety.

Again, it is difficult to say that that is a question of privilege. It may have been an error on the part of the Chair. I am going to listen to the argument but, please, I tell the hon. member that I did stop him from what could be taken to be an attack on a member of the Senate. I have some difficulty on this rule and the hon. member knows.

I would ask the hon. member to refrain from the attack and pursue the question of privilege.

Mr. Kaplan: I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker.

I wanted simply to quote her and then I wanted to urge her to show greater respect for members of other communities and for other Senators. That was the entire burden of what I wanted to say. I would certainly not have used it to attack the Senate. Indeed, the reverse. I wanted to make some high-minded statements about the role that the Senate plays and hope that the hon. member would do that. I would have then called upon her and the Prime Minister to apologize for the statements that she made and, with respect, Mr. Speaker, I think that this is the place where that should be done.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, on that same point, it was made very clear at the time that the hon. Senator did not make those statements. There were no quotes attributable to her. It was not a quoted statement by the minister, but in fact comments by a reporter in a paper. There were no quotation marks around it. There was no recording of that and she denies she ever said it.

I would respectfully suggest that the hon. member give the hon. senator the benefit of the doubt.

• (1510)

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I must first say that I do not find that it is a question of privilege. It may well have been that the Chair moved too quickly in this case. I did not hear it all because, of course, I interrupted the hon. member.

Again, this is one of the difficulties that in an electronic age the Chair is plagued with. It is extremely difficult for me to divine ahead of time what everybody is going to say. Sometimes, if I think I know where somebody is going and I feel it may be going too far, I run the risk, of course, of moving in perhaps too pre-emptory way. However, the hon. member has raised the matter. I will do the very best I can on such matters. It is not a question of privilege. It is a point of order.

I must say to the hon. member, and to all hon. members, that I will do the very best I can in these circumstances.

On the question of the other place, I have reminded hon. members today of what the rule is. Sometimes when certain issues are being discussed in the country and debated here, it may not be an easy rule to apply. I would ask hon. members to do the very best they can to co-operate.

I have a further question of privilege from the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM BILL

Mr. Darryl L. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, after listening to Question Period, I would like to ask whether the following is a point of order or a question of privilege.

With respect to Bill C-21 which is now before the Senate, in my riding, the Gaspé, the lower St. Lawrence, the Magdalen Islands and in fact throughout the Maritimes including Newfoundland, people have a problem with the 10 to 14-week requirement.

Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I would like to explain that as a result of unemployment insurance reform, 90 per cent—and the figures can be checked—in other words, the vast majority wants us to change this. We don't necessarily want to be stuck with supporting 10 weeks forever, but we are having a difficult time this year, with the bill being blocked in the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask you—-

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member but this is not a question of privilege and probably not even a point of order. It certainly raises a point against the other place, but a debate on the subject is not appropriate at this time.

The hon. member raised a subject that is of course very important, especially to the hon. member, but there are other ways in which the hon. member and other members who might wish to do so can ask for clarification or make a statement on the issue.

AGREEMENTS IN THE HOUSE

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the Associate Minister of National Defence tabled a motion under Standing Order 78(3), stating it had been impossible to reach an agreement under Standing Orders 78(1) and (2).

In fact, it was impossible because the minister never got in touch with me, as a member of this House, to find out whether there was some way to reach an agreement.

I maintain that the minister acted against the spirit and the intent of the Standing Orders of this House and that consequently, the Chair should reject the notice out of hand, on the grounds of failure to respect the democratic freedoms of the members of this House, including the member from Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

Mr. Speaker: That is a very interesting point. However, perhaps the Chair may point out that several months ago, we had the same problem regarding the same Standing Order. I think I would have to say it is not up to the Chair to investigate all deliberations, conversations and meetings that took place among all members before the minister made her statement under the Standing Orders. What we have here is a grievance, not a point of order.

Does the hon. member have another point to raise?

Mr. Gérin: Your comments are well taken, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to add a few words and mention the serious problems that exist in the House at this time. As an independent, I have the same rights as any other member in this House. However, since you refuse to recognize our group as such, we are faced with a problem that will resurface every day. I suggest Mr. Speaker, that you—

[English]

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may or may not have a complaint, but if the hon. member has a problem with respect to the House business and it is something over which I have jurisdiction, I would be very pleased to speak with the hon. member. But I think it is important for everyone in the country to realize—everybody who is watching and listening—if we go back over last week, the group from which the hon. member comes was recognized a number of times in Question Period with questions and also on statements. I have made it very clear that with the Speaker, there is a long and noble tradition of our system, that the Speaker must defend the interests of minorities.

Within this Chamber now, there is not just one minority, there are a number of minorities. I have to do the very best I can to keep that in mind and to treat all hon. members in a fair and equal way, and I shall certainly try to do that.

If the hon. member is having difficulty in discussions with any party in the House, I invite him to seek out members of whatever party it is and to have discussions. If the hon. member has a complaint that, for whatever reason, he or others are not being allowed a fair chance to express themselves in this House, I invite the hon. member and any other member to come and see me, and I will deal with it as best I can.

The hon. member actually rose on a point of privilege. It is probably a point of order. I have explained that I had to deal with that matter many months ago. The hon. member has risen again and I have at least allowed him to say something which perhaps he ought to take up in some other way with ministers or with his colleagues.

I am going to proceed with Routine Proceedings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PENITENTIARY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-331, an act to amend the Penitentiary Act (visit to penitentiaries).

He said: Mr. Speaker, some years ago the Penitentiary Act was changed so as to deprive members of a right to visit at their pleasure in federal penitentiaries. This bill seeks to restore that right to members of Parliament, that is members of this House and members of the other place.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISIT OF DALAI LAMA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to seek the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion inviting His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, an international respected religious leader and human rights and peace advocate, to address the House of Commons as he has addressed the European Parliament in the past.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: No.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

PETITIONS

OPPOSITION TO GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to present in the House of Commons a petition signed by residents of Montreal who strenuously object to the GST and who ask this House, as they asked the hon. member for Mount Royal, to vote against the GST as soon as the bill comes before the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by many people in Mississauga, Markham, Toronto, Don Mills, Ajax and many other places across Ontario. These people are very concerned that magazines, books and newspapers will be taxed under the GST. This has never been done by a federal government since Confederation.

The petitioners state that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society should not be affected by the GST. Therefore, these many people have re-affirmed their stand against the GST. A government is not interested in education that levies taxes against magazines, books and newspapers.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present two petitions from people in Alberta and the city of Toronto with regard the government's plan to impose a tax on magazines, books and newspapers.

These people feel that we should reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax free status for the printed word by retaining a zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present to the House further petitions supporting the previous petitioners who are saying that since Confederation the government has not applied taxes to magazines, books and newspapers.

They humbly ask the government to go back to the drawing board and withdraw the GST tax from such items.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Mount Royal. She has put together a petition with 37 signatures from people in Fredericton, Wainwright, Alberta and Toronto, Ontario. The concern of those who have signed the petition is that since Confederation the governments of Canada, whichever party, has not seen fit to apply any taxes to magazines, books and newspapers—the printed word—until now. It has been decided that the GST will apply to the printed word.

The petitioners see this as a tax on reading and they humbly call upon Parliament to reject this and to retain the zero rate in GST legislation regulations.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36. This petition of 50 signatures has been obtained on the initiative of my colleague from Mount Royal. They pray to Parliament that the GST be withdrawn, particularly because a tax on books and the printed matter is a tax on literacy and therefore unconscionable in the history of Canada.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am presenting a petition today signed by a number of residents from Vancouver, British Columbia. They are opposed to the goods and services tax and they ask, please, that the government open its heart and mind and go back to the drawing board because they are opposed to this tax, especially as it applies to reading material.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36. I too have the honour of presenting petitions from residents across Canada. They are objecting to the government placing a tax on reading materials.

As a former educator for almost 30 years, I find it horrifying that at a time when we wanted to increase literacy, here is a government that wants to tax the printed word.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition in the House of Commons signed by citizens of Mississauga, Scarborough, Aurora, Oakville, North York, Toronto, Brampton, and so on.

These people are sending a very clear message to the Minister of Finance who made that decision to tax books. They want to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in free tax status for the printed word by retaining a zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition with some 50 signatures. These citizens of Canada call for the maintenance of the historic principle embodied in the tax free status of the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulation. The petitioners call for the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education, and a literate and productive society. And they point out it will be negatively impacted by the GST.

• (1650)

Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present these petitions.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of residents of Camrose and Stettler, Alberta, calling upon the government to recognize the integral role of the printed word in literacy education and free speech. The petitioners call upon the government to zero rate magazines, books, and newspapers in the GST legislation.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured once again to rise in the House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, and to present five petitions from Canadians from across this beautiful country who are against the GST; three petitions against taxing the printed word and two petitions against the GST and everything this dastardly tax stands for. All petitioners wish the bill withdrawn or axed.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the member for Mount Royal, I would like to submit several petitions collected in Edmonton, asking the Government of Canada and Parliament to relieve books and the printed word from the proposed general sales tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that on more than one occasion I have heard members presenting petitions on behalf of the member for Mount Royal. If I am not mistaken, the member for Mount Royal is in the House and I am just curious about this procedure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Mount Royal.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I would bring to my colleague's attention that it is passing strange that no one on the other side of this House has heard from anybody. We have just heard from tens of thousands of Canadians who find it totally unacceptable that you are taxing learning, you are taxing reading.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under Standing Order 36 to present petitions on behalf of many Canadians from the Ottawa area and from Saskatchewan. They all deplore the negative impact of the GST on the cornerstones of democracy, culture, education, literacy, all foundations of a literate and productive society. All of these will be affected negatively by the imposition of the GST on the printed word, on textbooks and a variety of other printed matter.

The petitioners call on us to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in a tax free status for the printed word by retaining a zero rate under GST legislation and regulations, if not the withdrawal of the GST altogether.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition, primarily from residents of Mississauga pointing out that since Confederation, reading materials in this country have not been taxed and reminding Parliament that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education, and a literate and productive society, and calling upon Parliament not to impose the GST.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise to present this petition to the House on behalf of people of Edmonton, Alberta, and Mississauga, Ontario, who detest this tax on literature. They request there be no GST on the printed word.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, while millions of Canadians are protesting the GST which is currently going through the legislature, I humbly present this petition under the leadership of the member of Parliament for Mount Royal. She has seen fit to organize Canadians, quite easily I might add, to suggest to the government that the GST not be applied on the written word, namely, on magazines, books and newspapers, as this would slight the cultural attribute of this great country.

I submit, Your Honour, petitions from Richmond Hill, North York, Toronto, Scarborough, and Pickering.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have two sets of petitions. The first is a petition that was circulated in the riding of York North. These petitioners humbly pray that the government comes to its senses and does not proceed with the goods and services tax as planned.

The second set of petitions, Mr. Speaker, were placed in all Ottawa public libraries and were signed by those who should know that a productive and democratic culture is based on the printed word. The petitioners object strongly to the imposition of the GST on books. I will read the prayer, Mr. Speaker: "The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations."

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I too have several petitions that are duly certified. They are signed by people from various communities all across Canada objecting to the 7 per cent GST on books. These people, like most Canadians, object to the regressiveness of this tax. I do not think it is better illustrated anywhere in its regressiveness than when it is applied to books.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition also on the subject of the goods and services tax on books. These petitioners are opposed to this tax and call on the government to uphold the historic principle embodied in the tax free status for the printed word. Canada will be one of the very few countries in the world to tax books if this tax is imposed.

I note that this petition is signed by residents of the city of Mississauga who are represented in this House by among others, the hon. member for Mississauga South, who is on record as supporting this dreadful tax.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, first of all I have a petition on behalf of constituents from Lac La Jeune, Paul Lake, Red Lake, Savona, Chase, Westwold, Little Fort, Clearwater, Barrière, Logan Lake and Kamloops. The petitioners are pointing out their concern for the government's decision to proceed with the goods and services tax in spite of the overwhelming opposition to it. They are asking, even at this late hour, for the government to reconsider continuing with the imposition of the GST, as it is known.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, Mr. Speaker, again on behalf of constituents from Vancouver, Medicine Hat, Victoria, Oakville, Port Moody, Burnaby, Jasper, Winnipeg, Brantford, and even some communities in New Zealand—I guess they probably do not count though on the petition—are pointing out that Canada ought to be expanding their VIA Rail service as opposed to cutting back on it.

The petitioners are asking the government to reconsider this rather regressive move at a time when we should be moving people around Canada in the most environmentally friendly manner possible. They are asking a reconsideration of the decision to abandon much of VIA Rail.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, Mr. Speaker, and again to join with many others in the House this afternoon, I have a petition indicating that the government plans to tax reading. I think this is the only government in the world that taxes literature and children's story books, for example. The petitioners are saying that this is a rather peculiar policy to have at a time when we are trying to develop more literacy in the country and they are asking the government to reconsider applying a GST to reading material.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting petitions signed by hundreds of Canadians, including many of my constituents from Burnaby—Kingsway expressing their concern and their anger at this government's attempt to even at this point, despite the overwhelming opposition of Canadians, push through the goods and services tax. They urge the government reject the goods and services tax. They urge a meaningful reform of the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations. They demand that the government stop this proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

• (1700)

I am sure that they speak for literally millions of Canadians in urging the government to stop the GST. Axe the tax.

GUN CONTROL

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I am presenting a petition with another 477 names in support of more gun control legislation.

The Metropolitan Toronto Police have documented a 48.4 per cent increase in violent crimes between 1984 and 1989. The use of guns has increased by 51.9 per cent. This trend is evident in other parts of Canada.

My constituents and I think that gun control legislation is essential.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of residents of Delta, Langley, the south Fraser Valley, and other communities across Canada represented by my colleagues on the other side of the House. The petitioners bring to the attention of us all in the House the very serious concern about the imposition of the goods and services tax and the unfairness of that tax.

Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would be happy to table this petition on behalf of my colleagues on the other side of the House.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present to the House.

I should say I have just come back from a fascinating, extraordinary, and most moving ceremony this morning in Toronto just to be able to present these petitions.

First, these petitions deal with the cutbacks to VIA Rail which the government has carried forward. The petitions, which are signed by approximately 500 Canadians from right across the country, ask the government to reverse its position and to see to it that VIA Rail is in fact modernized and expanded, not cut.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Second, Mr. Speaker, I have a petition which comes from Corner Brook, Newfoundland which deals with children's rights. The petition mentions particularly the sixth of Canadian children living in poverty.

The petitioners pray that the government supports the Private Members' Motion No. 254 calling on the government to negotiate with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have a set of petitions which come from all parts of the country with respect to the goods and services tax.

The petitioners reject very strongly as unfair the goods and services tax, and request the House of Commons to reject the goods and services tax and the government to withdraw it. They suggest that instead there should be a system of fair taxation put into effect in the country.

[Translation]

OPPOSITION TO GST ON PUBLICATIONS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to table this petition on behalf of my colleague from Mount Royal, who collected hundreds of signatures in the Dundas area. Mr. Speaker, these people are very concerned about the tax on books and other publications, and they call on you to prevent the passage of this unfair tax, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to present a petition signed by many people in Ontario.

These people declare themselves to be opposed to the goods and services tax to the point where they call upon Parliament to reject the current proposals for a goods and services tax.

I should make it plain that this petition as written is addressed to Parliament.

Therefore, I think it reasonable to infer that these people, like millions of other Canadians, do not give two hoots if it is the Senate or the House that kills the GST.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, which also calls upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

This petition is signed primarily by people in Victoria and in the Victoria area, but also by people who have visited Victoria over the summer from all parts of Canada. I would call on the government to adhere to the petition.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have petitions from residents of Ottawa, Nepean and Iroquois Falls in Ontario.

The petitioners note that the government is now trying to tax reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins, and home-heating fuels and they point out that what we need is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, not the massive tax grab that is being proposed here. They say that what we should have is a tax proposal that will bring real tax reform, not this kind of reform.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House of Commons petitions from residents of Quebec who are opposed to the goods and services tax, particularly as it applies to books, newspapers, and magazines which have never before been taxed in Canada.

These people humbly pray that the government will eventually come to its senses and do away with the goods and services tax.

[Translation]

OPPOSITION TO GST ON PUBLICATIONS

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, although I agree with the principle of the goods and services tax, I am in favour of exempting books and other publications. That is why I wish to table a petition from the riding of Mount Royal, asking that books and publications be exempted from this tax.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege of tabling petitions on behalf of the hon. member for Mount Royal, signed by residents of the National Capital region who strenuously object to the GST on books and publications.

Mr. Speaker, I may add that I have the honour of tabling this petition because the hon. member for Mount Royal heeded the advice of her leader and went on a cross-Canada tour this summer.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am quite sure that I just heard the hon. member say that he was presenting a petition on behalf of the member for Mount Royal. I think the member for Mount Royal is a member of the Liberal Party which, I am sure, the people in Newfoundland would be really intrigued by right now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Richelieu on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would like to respond by saying that when the cause is noble, there is no place for political partisanship.

[English]

DETROIT CITY AIRPORT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I, too, just as my colleague from Essex—Windsor, had to rush back here from an experience of pure joy in Toronto. However, I did not take an airplane. I was wafted back to Ottawa by the pure turbulence created by loud hosannas all across Ontario.

I have two petitions, which have been duly certified, from the people of the eastern portion of Windsor who ask for a remedy from Parliament with respect to the expansion of the Detroit city airport. It has created an outrageous frequency of low overflights over that portion of Windsor at heights as low as 1,000 feet without an appropriate response from government.

The petitioners ask the government to do something on behalf of those citizens to protect their environment and their quality of life.

• (1710)

[Translation]

OPPOSITION TO GST

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, this petition has been certified correct as to form and content, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

I support the GST, Mr. Speaker, but since citizens do not always have an opportunity to have their say in this House I am pleased to present this petition on behalf of the hon. member for Mount Royal.

Besides, I for one have always been in favour of taxing everything and compensating according to various sectors of economic activity. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present this petition in the name of constituents of Mount Royal.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 313 and 321.

[Text]

LEGAL SERVICES—FBDB

Question No. 313—Mr. Simmons:

1. For (a) 1987 (b) 1988 (c) 1989, were legal services valued at more than $500 supplied to the Federal Business Development Bank and, if so, in each case, what were the nature and type of (i) security work (ii) litigation involved?

2. Were guidelines used for selecting legal services for the Federal Business Development Bank and, if so, did these require (a) the calling of tenders (b) the inviting of proposals (c) the selection of lawyers or firms at random?

3. Can the government provide an analysis of the cost of hiring outside legal services compared to maintaining an in-house legal division within the Federal Business Development Bank and, if so, what is it?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Federal Business Development Bank (FBDB) and the Department of Justice as follows:

1. In fiscal 1986-87, 1987-88 and 1988-89 the number of loans and investments authorized totalled 5,704, 5,581 and 5,144 respectively. There were in excess of 400 litigation matters in progress in each of those fiscal years.

In general, security is taken on the assets of the business financed and may include realty mortgages and/or debentures and/or chattel mortgages/Personal Property Security Agreements and guarantees in common law jurisdictions and hypothèques and/or commercial pledges and guarantees in Quebec. Litigation matters generally involve realization proceedings relating to the security given in support of a loan including foreclosures, actions on convenants and guarantees and priority disputes.

For additional information, please refer to the answer to question #197 tabled on February 23, 1990.

2. FBDB instructs external legal counsel in accordance with the following policy:

Bank policy requires that "lawyers used by the Bank must have a good general reputation and known professional competence in the field in which their services are required, having particular regard to the quality of their work, promptness and the reasonableness of their fees".

Bank policy provides that the borrower may designate his/her own lawyer/notary on loans under $200,000 and, as well, the borrower's lawyer/notary is designated where he/she referred the loan and/or was actively involved in the negotiations for the loan. Lawyers/notaries who prepared the security on an initial loan are instructed on superseding or supplementary loans to effect cost savings to the borrower. Given the Bank's mandate to assist small and medium size business enterprises, in excess of 80 percent of these mandates are directed to lawyers/notaries designated by the borrower.

Litigation/realization, venture capital mandates and specialized corporate mandates are given to firms selected on the basis of perceived expertise/competence in the particular area of law involved.

3. FBDB seeks to employ the most cost effective method possible in the provision of legal services relating to its activities. While maintaining a nucleus of internal expertise, external resources are utilized to the maximum extent possible. Loans and investments are authorized to customers across Canada out of 78 Branches, the majority in rural areas. It is the policy of FBDB to instruct external legal counsel in the area where the borrower and/or security is located. The use of external legal counsel is most cost effective for the Bank and the borrower, who is responsible for the cost of security preparation. FBDB has been able to effect in-house staff reductions by placing reliance on external counsel. Legal fees relating to realization/litigation proceedings are, generally speaking, added to the loan/investment account and are recoverable from the borrower.

The Bank may engage external legal counsel for specific mandates because of the specific expertise/competence required in the particular area of law involved.

At this time, The Attorney General of Canada has no analysis comparing the costs of providing legal services to the FBDB in relation to litigious matters through agents as opposed to inside counsel.

JUSTICE CANADA EMPLOYEES

Question No. 321—Mr. Robinson:

1. Out of the total number of Justice Canada employees, are any located in Quebec (exclusive of the National Capital Region) and, if so, what number?

2. Out of the total number of Justice Canada employees (a) are any of them members of visible minorities and, if so, what number (b) are any of the Quebec employees (exclusive of the National Capital Region) members of visible minorities, and if so, what number?

3. Does Justice Canada have a departmental Advisory Committee for Visible Minorities and, if so (a) what is its composition (b) are any of the members of this Committee members of visible minorities and, if so, what number (c) is there community representation on this Committee and, if so, what representation?

4. In fiscal years (a) 1988-89 (b) 1989-90, were any federally-appointed Crown prosecutors members of visible minorities and, if so (i) throughout Canada (ii) in Quebec, what number?

5. In fiscal years (a) 1988–89 (b) 1989–90, were any federally-appointed judges (Superior Court or higher) members of visible minorities and, if so (i) throughout Canada (ii) in Quebec, what number?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): 1. As of June 25, 1990, the Department of Justice had 1,942 indeterminate and term employees. Of these, 138 were located in the Montreal Regional Office, which is the only Department of Justice location in Quebec exclusive of the National Capital Region.

2. (a) As of June 25, 1990, 44 employees of the Department of Justice had self-identified as members of visible minorities. This figure is based on voluntary self-identification and may not therefore accurately disclose the number of employees of the Department who are members of visible minorities.

The Attorney General of Canada does not inquire whether lawyers in private practice are members of visible minorities before determining whether to appoint them as her legal agents. No information is available as to whether any of the persons appointed as legal agents of the Attorney General of Canada in fiscal years 1988–89 and 1989–90 were members of visible minorities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 285 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

DISCUSSION ON A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): After last Wednesday's Oral Questions Period, Mr. Speaker, I rose on a question of privilege and the Speaker asked me to defer the debate and to advise hon. members and other parliamentary leaders as to when debate would resume.

I believe it would be convenient to resume debate tomorrow after Oral Questions Period.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not know why the hon. member is getting up at this time. We still have an application under S. O. 52 from the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville. His point has nothing to do with Orders of the Day.

I have to listen to the application under S. O. 52 from the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville. After that, if the hon. member would like to get up on a point of order, that is fine, but the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville has the floor.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

SENATE APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I gave you notice that I intended to rise under the provisions of Standing Order 52 to ask that you consider adjourning the House for the purpose of discussing a matter that I believe is of urgent and pressing necessity at this time, namely, the events surrounding the nomination of the eight additional senators last week. I think they have left the people of the country quite confused and uncertain about the propriety of that act as it pertains to the Parliament of Canada.

I believe that this undermines the House of Commons and that we are now working under a cloud of uncertainty and a cloud of confusion. I believe that this is a crisis at this time—

Mr. Speaker: I have been considering for some hours the application of the hon. member. I assure the hon. member that I have given it a great deal of consideration.

The point I am making at this moment is that applications for emergency debate should be brief, concise, and to the point. There is a reason for that. If the discussion strides into debate, under the Standing Orders, no other member in the Chamber can rise. That creates a situation in which one person has the floor, gets into debate, and there may be very grave differences of opinion as to what is being debated, but no other member can rise on the matter.

That is why we have the order and I know that the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville understands that. I would ask him to complete his remarks very briefly.

Mr. Nystrom: I had just completed my remarks, Mr. Speaker, as you were rising. I believe it is an urgent situation. There is a crisis in the land and the people want to see this issue before Parliament.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will remember that when the reform committee was dealing with the rules of this place, one of the recommendations was that a Speaker not give reasons when an application for an emergency debate was turned down. I have tried to follow that admonition most of the time. However, sometimes it is important that the public which is watching and listening understand something about what goes on in the Speaker's mind when trying to assess whether or not it is appropriate to adjourn all other business of the House and go into an emergency debate. One of the things that guides the Speaker is if there are any other avenues open to raise the issues which would be debated if there was an emergency debate.

The hon. member knows that the matter he raises has been the subject of comment in this House and in question period, and there will be further opportunities in the next number of days to raise the matter.

If an emergency debate is turned down, it does not mean that the matter is not an important matter. Many matters here are important but they do not all, under the circumstances at any particular time, warrant adjourning the other business of the House to debate that matter.

I would ask the hon. member to understand that it would not be appropriate at this time to go ahead with the application. The hon. member does know that there are other avenues open to him to bring that matter to the House and, of course, to the government.

I thank the hon. member for giving me advance warning and especially the detail with which his letter dealt with the matter. It gave me a great deal of assistance and helped me to make the decision.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-44

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved:

That, in relation to Bill C-44, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage and, one sitting day to the consideration of the third reading stage of the bill; and

That, fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the day allotted to the report stage consideration and on the day allotted to the third reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to rise on this occasion to debate the motion. This is the first time I have been up to speak on the subject, and I am sure the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would support my 10 minutes, now approximately down to nine and a half minutes.

This is a motion that hurts me to agree with, but because we are involved, not just in Newfoundland, but in Canada, the first point I really have to make is that this is a Canadian project first and foremost. It is seen and has been seen in the last few days of debate in the House as a project that primarily affects Newfoundland. In the sense that the gravity based structure is being built in my riding in Newfoundland, one of the modules will be built in my riding, and the oil is 200 miles southeast off Newfoundland, I suppose it could be looked at as a Newfoundland project.

Sixty-five per cent of this project will be achieved in Canada, which is more than double any project of this nature that has been done so far. I am making reference now to essentially the North Sea oil. We have made a lot of progress in that time.

Just for the record, here is what is going to happen. The design and construction of the Hibernia project, which is the largest energy development in Canadian history, will provide important new business opportunities, challenges and items for the skills of Canadians and take them to the leading edge of technology, not just in Newfoundland, but the whole of Canada.

The oil field is being developed by a consortium of oil companies led by Mobil Oil. I think this is well known. It has extensive backing from both the federal and provincial governments. We have been working on this since the Hon. Joey Smallwood was premier of Newfoundland. How many more premiers do we have to go through? How many more times do we have to sign this? How many more times do we have to negotiate?

I have a chronology here that would go on for a long, long time. The Year 1965 was when the first exploration permit was issued to Mobil Oil. In 1966, the first hole was drilled. In the period 1966 to 1978, the exploration started. It is now 1990. In 1988 Newfoundlanders were promised that the sun would shine and have not would be no more. Later on, Canada was promised that we get this project under way.

I said that the gravity base structure, which essentially is the concrete platform that will sit in about 250 feet of water, 200 miles off Newfoundland, will be constructed in Newfoundland, with one module.

For the benefit of those who are not instructed in the actual construction of this, essentially we have one blob of platform and five modules. There will be a process module, a mud module, a utility module, a service quarters module and the module that will be built in Newfoundland will be the wellhead module.

The consortium estimated that 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the person-hours for the total project management and engineering design for the gravity base structure, top side and offshore, will take place in Canada. That is 90 per cent of that will take place in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, you have heard me speak on the benefits to Newfoundland and you have also heard me speak on the benefits to Canada. Let me tell you some of the things that is going to happen on a Canadian basis. The project itself is going to require more than 100,000 tonnes of cement, which can be supplied by plants in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec, almost 55,000 tonnes of reinforcing bar and prestress cable. Rod will also be needed. That can be supplied by companies in Central Canada. I and members in the House can look to our ridings to participate in this megaproject.

The equipment for the project is estimated to cost another $300 million. It includes expenditures for items such as the pressure vessels, the compressors, pumps, valves, motors, electrical units, blow out preventors, instrumentation and wellheads. I could go on, but I think I have made my point.

Most people in Newfoundland, and I was one of them for a while, believed that on September 14 that everything was over but the shouting, but it seems that there is still more shouting to be done. I am not one of the shouters. I am trying to argue from a logical viewpoint that we should get this bill under way and approved because for one thing, the hon. minister has essentially negotiated to borrow $95 million from the offshore development fund.

It is my understanding as of today that MacNamara Construction Company will start to build the four and one-half mile road in from the TransCanada Highway into Bull Arm. Pretty soon they will be starting on the camps and getting the project under way. In order to get a production at a certain time, we have to fall into what is called the weather window of opportunity because there are only about two months in the year that this structure can be towed out and launched on the ocean floor. The downstream production has to be backed up to the signing. I have spoken to the hon. minister and I have spoken in the House about how hard the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has worked on this to get it under way by October 1. There is $95 million that we borrowed from a fund and that is not going to last for a long time at the rate of expenditure.

We on this side of the House are not very often in favour of motions of closure or time allocation or anything that would limit parliamentary debate, but how many times has this been debated and how many more times can we debate it? What is there to debate? If you want a debate to make the bill perfect, we will be debating from now until this House does not exist any more, because there is no such thing a perfection in a bill that requires this kind of negotiation. We have been at it since 1965. We are not about to make it much more perfect than it is now.

Sixty-five per cent of Canadian input, I think that is fantastic for a megaproject like this; $5.2 billion in the construction stage and $3.3 billion capital expenditure, $10 billion. That is a mega-megaproject. It is inconceivable just exactly how big that is. Those in certain parts of this House who would want to go back and renegotiate for 100 per cent Canadian content or who would like to go back and double dot the *i*s and double cross the *t*s, I have no time for that. If we wait for that, the oil will be in Hibernia from now to kingdom come and the only oil that we will get are the sample oils that we got from drilling the 160 or so wells. This cannot go on. We have to get moving on this bill.

An hon. member: How about the Senate, get moving on the Senate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to bring the House to order, please, because I would like to hear the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the hon. member for York West and a few others are having a little conversation. If you don't mind, please to keep it down or go behind the curtain.

The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your intervention and I am sure this will be under control in very short order because my colleagues do support this bill and they support the project both as a Newfoundland project and as a Canadian project.

I have to remind the House that the expenditures and the oil revenues will boost the economies in all parts of Canada. Newfoundland will benefit, there is no question about it, but the summary of what I have just said is that Hibernia will provide business opportunity to shipyards, equipment suppliers, cement producers and hundreds of other businesses throughout the country, not just those involved in the initial consortium but the downstream work that is going to follow is horrendous.

Canadian goods and services will account for 55 to 60 per cent of the project expenditure during construction and 65 per cent during operation. Most of the people employed during construction will be Canadian residents and it is expected that most workers during operation will be Canadian.

How anybody could delay, how anybody could speak against, how anybody would want to go back and reopen the books and renegotiate, how anybody would try to get another per cent—yes, it is motherhood, it is great. I would like 110 per cent Canadian but I am practical.

We have achieved what can be achieved in this document. There has been enough talk about it. I am just wrapping up, Mr. Speaker, with about 30 seconds to go. I would implore the House and I would implore my colleagues, indeed all members of the House of Commons to get this thing under way. Let us get the bill going, let us get the oil producing, let us pay off the $95 million that we borrowed from the offshore fund and let us get on with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for St. John's East, it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for South West Nova—Fisheries; the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre—Tourism; the hon. member for Surrey North—Taxation.

• (1730)

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke in this debate on Wednesday last, it was the first opportunity I had had in a while to speak in this House about Hibernia. Unfortunately I made the error of some politicians and allowed myself to get a little excited and allowed myself to get a little emotional perhaps.

I was surprised to hear members of the NDP suggesting that we should not be providing, as they put it, subsidies to the oil companies because of the fiscal situation of the government. Of course I accused them of being Tories of the worst order.

There were three points raised on that evening that I would like briefly to refer to. One is the question of subsidies, as it was put, to the oil companies. It is quite simple. If we want this project to proceed for the benefits to this country that my friend, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, talked about, it is essential that we put some money into this project to give it a kick-start. It is essential that we contribute $1 billion to this project and ensure that other resources are available if they are necessary, not only so that we can see the development of Hibernia but, as a number of us have said before, to ensure the ongoing development and expansion of the oil and gas business off the east coast of this country for the benefit of Canadians.

Quite simply, if we are not prepared to put those resources forward we will not have a project, so none of us benefits, none of us can take advantage of this economic development project that hopefully will lead to the creation of employment and wealth in this country to make us stronger and more competitive.

Another comment that was made was that this project and the contribution that the Government of Canada was making to this project would be subsidized to subsidize the creation of Newfoundland companies that either today do not exist or that today Newfoundlanders and Labradorians do not have the skills to provide to a project like this. Therefore what we would see is government subsidized competition of currently existing companies.

Frankly, if any comment got me excited, that got excited the most. To suggest that Newfoundlanders and Labradorians do not have the technical or entrepreneurial capability to take advantage of a project like this is not only insulting but it is outright wrong.

We have a capacity in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador that unfortunately, because of our geography and because of our economy, we have not been able to take advantage of in the past. We have an engineering capacity. We have a scientific capability. We have the ability to work with concrete and to work with steel. As I said in this House the other day, Newfoundlanders and Labradorians participated in the largest construction projects in North America and continue to be called upon first for their skills, their dedication, and their productivity.

Companies in Newfoundland and Labrador that do not have the capacity, that have not developed the capacity themselves over the last number of years, have had enough sense to go out and enter into joint ventures. With whom have they entered into joint ventures? Let me give you a little example, Mr. Speaker.

Last week after the announcement of the project agreement, there were two contracts awarded. One contract was worth $1.3 billion and that is for the project that my hon. friend, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, talks about. That is a Newfoundland-led project, but in recognition that certain skills exist in Newfoundland and that we have certain capabilities but there are others that we need, a consortium was put together. Some 59 per cent of that consortium is Quebec based companies. There was another contract awarded worth somewhat over $300 million, and 85 per cent of the participation in that project is Quebec owned companies.

As we develop the Hibernia oil field and as we develop the fields around it, we will see more and more involvement of Newfoundland companies with companies from all across this country. This will enable us to bring together the skills, the knowledge, and the capability that we have not only to develop the oil and gas business but to move off into other ventures, to take the technological knowledge, the transfer of capacity, and export that around the world in the oil and gas business and to utilize it in many other industries for which there is similar need and like necessity.

My time is short. The third thing that got me a little upset and concerns me greatly is the lack of recognition in this place that if something is good for Newfoundland and Labrador, it is good for this country. Newfoundlanders and Labradorians are as much a part of this country as anybody else and have been for over 40 years and, I would suggest, will be as long as this country continues to exist. The thought that just because it might be good for Newfoundland does not mean that it is good for somebody else is absolutely despicable and should be unacceptable in any forum in this country. Our friends from British Columbia should not be so touchy. To quote a friend of mine, if the shoe fits—

I am delighted to hear my friend from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception talk about the need to move this legislation forward and the need to get on with this motion that limits time and gets this in place. We need to tie up the loose ends and the pressure that exists on the Canada-Newfoundland offshore agreement.

I was intrigued by the number of the hon. member's colleagues who were presenting petitions this afternoon. I was intrigued that there was absolutely no co-operation on the motions. I was very intrigued that we made it past five o'clock, so we lose another day. I would suggest that my Newfoundland colleagues across the way ensure that they talk to the remainder of their colleagues to ensure that this does move through and that the obstruction that we saw today does not continue, because this project is vital to this country. One part of this country that will benefit most from it is Newfoundland and Labrador but not at the exclusion of the other Atlantic provinces, not at the exclusion of any province in this country.

We have an opportunity here for all of us. Newfoundland has an economy that can only provide so much and take so much. The concept of a $5.2 billion project in an economy like Newfoundland and Labrador, all we have to do is think about the capacity of that economy to bear such a project. It has to be of benefit of all Canadians by sheer logic, but all Canadians can maximize their benefit wherever they live, as individuals, as corporate groups or anything else like that, by seizing the opportunities that are provided by the contribution of the government and the people of Canada in terms of this grant or loan guarantee. The sooner we vote on this and get it passed, the better off all this country will be.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it seems like a nightmare is occurring on the floor of the House of Commons.

I cannot believe that what I am hearing are people actually expressing their views. I hear a representative of the Conservative government saying that we must go out now and we must bribe and entice these poor multinational oil companies to come into our waters and start developing. How much bribery money do we need to entice these people into this project. Is $10 million enough? No, no. What about $100 million? No, No. What about $1,000 million to these poor multinationals called Gulf, Chevron, and Mobil Oil? Is $1,000 million enough? No, that is not enough. What about $2,000 million? Is that enough? No, that is still not enough. What about $2,700 million? "Aha", he said, "that is enough".

We have the government saying: "We are going to commit the government to spend $2,700 million of taxpayers' money on this project". And the people are saying: "Is this the best way to spend that money?"

Way back when is interesting; I thought I would look up the record because the minister responsible for this project came to us in December 1989 saying "we have to get this legislation moving", so it was introduced at second reading. Then it evaporated for months and months and months. There was not a word from the minister of energy, not a single word. Then in June he came in and said: "Listen, we have to get going on this second reading", so we set aside one day. That was it; that was all then.

Here we come in and rush, rush, rush; we have to get this thing through now in the next couple of days. How much time has been spent in this House to discuss how we should spend $2.7 billion of taxpayers' money? Do you know, Mr. Speaker, how long we have taken?

On November 7, we spent two minutes. On December 18, 1989, we spent 61 minutes. On February 9, 1990, we spent 130 minutes. On June 7, 1989, we spent 148 minutes.

Then it went to committee, this huge thick bill went to committee for study. Do you know how long, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Party allowed it to be studied in committee? One day, one single day, and this is $2.7 billion of taxpayers' money and it cannot be frittered away without proper discussion and debate in committee. One day, and then they rush it through.

Then we come back to the report of the committee to the House. How long do we spend on that, four or five days? We spent one minute—60 seconds and that is all. The committee report was presented to the House in one minute and then at report stage we spent 103 minutes. Now the government says that is enough, that it cannot stand any more debate on this topic. We have actually spent 800 minutes, including voting, on a $2.7 billion taxpayers' expenditure.

No wonder the people of Canada do not trust this government. That is $2.7 billion, $2,000 million plus $700 million, and it says: "Let's rush this through".

We have some questions we want to ask. We have not heard satisfactory responses. As a matter of fact, we have not heard any of the responses at all.

When the minister of energy first proposed this legislation he said it would make a major contribution toward the regional source of supply of oil for Atlantic Canada. When I read that, coming from the hon. minister, it sounds to me that the oil from Hibernia will be going to refineries in Atlantic Canada. He says: "A major contribution toward a regional source of supply of oil for Atlantic Canada".

Not a drop of this oil is going for refining in Atlantic Canada. It is going down to the United States. Every single drop of this oil for refining will not touch a single refinery in Canada. That is what some people are saying. Will we have a chance to examine that? Oh, no, we do not have time.

What business are we in? Is it our job to facilitate the development of our energy resources for Mobil Oil refineries in California, in Texas, or on the east coast of the United States. These are important questions that must be asked, but the government said: "Oh, no, we have the majority. We are the four-year elected dictators. We can do whatever we want. We want to ignore the House of Commons".

Quite frankly we are saying that this is the reason the people of Canada have lost complete faith in this government. This is the reason 85 per cent of the people of Canada say: "We do not want anything to do with this government in the future". The minister of energy says to the people of Canada that the government is going to invest $2.7 billion of their money so that it can provide a major contribution to the regional source of supply of oil for Atlantic Canada and then changes his mind so that we are now part of a continental energy security program. We are using our taxpayers' money to develop our reserves for the North American market.

Is this what Canadians want their hard-pressed tax dollars to do? The government says we do not have any money for child care. But when Mobil Oil wants $100 million or $500 million, or when Chevron wants a half a billion dollars, then we have lots of money, and we do not want to debate it in the House of Commons. We say that is wrong, undemocratic and flies in the face of the parliamentary system in Canada. No, this has come as a surprise to us. Of course, it does.

Here is a government that is prepared to stack the Senate, to knowingly violate the Constitution of Canada simply to be able to jamb their goods and services tax down the throats of every single Canadian. Eighty-five per cent of Canadians say they do not want this tax, they do not need this tax, they cannot afford this tax. It is the wrong tax at the wrong time hitting the wrong people. But, does this government listen? No, it knows best. It is the "Father Knows Best" parliamentary system. Our Prime Minister knows what is best for Canadians. It knows that Canadians need to entice the multinational oil companies to our east coast to the tune of $2.7 billion. For that there is all kinds of money. For child care there is no money.

I listened to my hon. friend from Newfoundland. If he is so interested in Newfoundland then his motive is probably legitimate, that he is concerned about the people there, as we all are. Why then did he cut back transfer payments to Newfoundland? Why did he change the Unemployment Insurance Act against the people of Newfoundland? Why is he taking step after step after step that makes the life of Newfoundlanders more difficult today than it was two years ago and four years ago if he is so concerned? What has the government done to the fishery?

Let me quote the Premier of Newfoundland. Premier Clyde Wells is quoted in the The Financial Post as saying that the number of permanent jobs generated by Hibernia would be the size of the workforce of two fish plants. That is $2.7 billion for two fish plants' employment. That is what we are talking about. This is outrageous! The Premier of Newfoundland says that this is a very expensive job-creation program, and it will cost millions and millions of dollars to create a single job. Who will benefit in the long term? Will Canadian firms? No. Will Canadian refineries? No. Will Canadian employees in the oil business benefit? With a handful of exceptions, no.

Mr. Speaker, when we say this time allocation is inappropriate, what we are saying is that we want to find ways and means to provide jobs for those people in Newfoundland and throughout Atlantic Canada that will be permanent and long-lasting, not the kind of employment opportunities that will have the one time only construction aspect of this project and not be there in perpetuity. I think that the people of Newfoundland want jobs, not only for the short term but, indeed, for the long term.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I think we are witnessing here today something very important that we could describe as an absolutely incredible machination where the Bloc Quebecois is effectively becoming the official opposition in this House with regard to the Hibernia project.

Mr. Speaker, at the moment there is no Liberal Party member from Quebec in the House, only one Conservative member from Quebec as compared with six representatives of the Bloc Quebecois. Mr. Speaker, we are not against the Hibernia project as such, but we resent the fact that once more Quebec is being shortchanged. And particularly when we see the official opposition agreeing with a closure motion. This is the first time in all my political life that I see the official opposition, namely the Liberals, agreeing with a closure motion.

Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois, through the hon. member for Richelieu, clearly put forward an amendment in this House last week at the report stage.

• (1750)

An amendment whereby Bil C-44 would include and confirm the Canadian content! The Separatists which they say we are are standing up for Canadians and trying to look after their interests by urging the federal government to set the amount of Canadian content in the legislation. Mr. Speaker, it is the world upside down!

Recently, the Newfoundland Premier, Mr. Clyde Wells was reported as saying that this was a routine matter, that the federal government was ready to go ahead with Hibernia, and that the official opposition was in agreement. Today, I realize that Mr. Wells was right when he said that. I understand also that last June, the hon. member for Bona Vista—Trinity—Conception told the House that he expected this bill to be read the third time by the summer recess. We all know that for reasons I need not explain, the government deemed advisable not to introduce this bill in the House at that time.

As a last resort, I directed a question to the minister. I cannot elaborate on this, Mr. Speaker, but the House will remember that the fact the Meech Lake Accord was killed last June is one of the reasons why the government did not proceed with Bill C-44, because the Tory members of the Quebec caucus were determined to scuttle the bill. Since then, Mr. Speaker, we have not heard a peep out of the Quebec Tory members. They are completely out of it, out of the House. A while ago, I could see the Technology Minister trying to keep his Quebec troups in line by telling them to vote in favour of this bill, a very good bill.

If this bill was really that good, Mr. Speaker, the morning papers would not be filled with paid advertising stating that the bill concerning Hibernia had to be amended to give Quebec its fair share. Outside the House, I heard some Tory members from Quebec insisting that the SNC had obtained a contract worth $360 million— This is a contract awarded on the international market, Mr. Speaker. It is not a contract for Quebec firms, it was awarded on the international market.

We accept the fact that a module was guaranteed to Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, but we ask that the other four modules be offered on the domestic market first. If our domestic market is unwilling or unable to meet the challenge, this contract should then be offered on the foreign market. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, we know from opinion polls that the credibility of this government is being seriously questioned, but we find it hard to believe that the official opposition should be going along. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who signed this agreement said the other day in the House that he was not prepared to renegotiate it once more. Yesterday, during the Question Period, he even went so far as saying that it would be stupid, childish and that he would not reopen the negotiations.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are being railroaded, pure and simple. Although the Canadian government is going to invest not less than $2.7 billion in this project, Canadians are not even sure to benefit from the spinoffs. That is incredible, but true, Mr. Speaker, especially in view of the fact that there was no Persian Gulf crisis at the time it was negotiated. And who says that the price of oil will not increase to $50 or $60 a barrel. We know that the price is currently between $38 and $48 a barrel. On the other hand, under the terms of the agreement, if the price should fall below $25 a barrel, the government would have to make up the difference. If the price exceeds $25 to the barrel, the U.S. oil companies like Mobil Oil will reap handsome benefits on the market.

Mr. Speaker, Newfoundland claims to have been ripped off in the Churchill Falls project. The whole affair has even been referred to the Supreme Court where it was decided that the agreement signed by Quebec and Newfoundland was quite legitimate. Now, not only Newfoundland is being had with this agreement but the whole country. And that is why we became in this House the Official Opposition because the Official Opposition is hands in hands with the Governement and I bet the NDP will in the end vote for the bill. After winning Ontario, it now has an eye on the Maritimes. We want to make sure that the superior interests of Quebec are protected in this House, but at the same time, we wish to protect the interests of Canada since we are still part of the Constitution as it now stands.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated a few days ago that the Hibernia oil will benefit mostly American interests. Considering the accrued debt and the deficits we are talking about, can we, again, make such an effort and for whom? For our American neighbours? I would not want to enter into the free trade debate which has been going on for the last two years. But as far as Hibernia is concerned, I hope that the governement will come to realize, the next few minutes, that it is making a blatant mistake and it is all the more true since the Senate is shut down, Mr. Speaker. And because of whom? The Liberals. So, why steamroll a bill while the Senate is shut down? Would it not be because the Conservative Government wants to pass this bill now in order to force the liberals to re-open the Senate? It is incredible, inconceivable, I would say diabolical to go to such an extent to pass that kind of legislation!

I thank you again, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that they will see the light!

[English]

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, we have the bloc. Their heads are going to be on the block before this is over.

The Bloc Quebecois state there is not enough construction work going to Quebec. As well, we have the NDP saying that it wants to know where the oil is going to go to be refined. People who have examined these questions must be really confused as to what they are talking about.

The companies that are constructing the infrastructure are Concrete Products Limited, 3.5 per cent Newfoundland; Doris Engineering of Paris, France, 7.5 per cent; Janin Construction of Montreal, 29.66 per cent; Atlas Construction of Montreal, 29.66 per cent. Then, there is McNamara Construction of Newfoundland at 29.66 per cent. That is a bit deceptive unless you examine who these people are.

For example, Atlas Construction is a subsidiary of one of the largest construction firms in Quebec called Atlas-Gest Incorporated. It is a subsidiary of the Paris based Dumez, one of France's largest construction firms.

• (1800)

When you go to the topside design, you have B&L Consultants of Newfoundland with 70 employees; SNC Group of Montreal, 4,000 employees; Monenco of Montreal at 1,000—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Shefford is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would remind my colleague from Newfoundland that it may be French but it is not necessarily from Quebec.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): France is a foreign country!

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. It is a point of debate.

The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

Mr. Baker: No, Mr. Speaker, it is not even a point of debate. I do not know what it is a point of.

Monenco of Montreal has 1,000 employees and then there are two other smaller firms, a Houston based firm called Brown & Root and a company called Aker Engineering of Norway. Monenco was formerly Montreal Engineering.

Here is the point, Mr. Speaker. In looking at all of the offshore construction in the world, one finds these same names that are here. You find Doris Engineering of Paris, France. They are the experts in the platforms make up only 7.5 per cent of the deal. The same Montreal firms are connected with every large construction undertaking in the world. The company that is associated with Atlas Construction of Montreal, Dumez, is one of the companies building the French half of the English Channel tunnel.

It is the same companies doing these large construction projects. No matter how you cut it, Mr. Speaker, you could have almost predicted the names of these companies before the contracts were let.

The other point raised by the NDP members is an interesting one. They say that none of this oil is going to be refined in Canada. Away back in 1987, we passed legislation in the House that deal with exactly that. It was decided by this chamber and the Newfoundland legislature and it is perhaps the most backward step that could ever be taken by legislatures, the Parliament of Canada being a legislature. It defined where the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland could force an oil company to bring oil to refine if the companies had not entered into a contract to sell the oil. In other words, if the company had a contract to sell it to Venezuela, it would go to Venezuela. The only way the Government of Newfoundland can interfere is if the Government of Newfoundland—under the existing legislation that the NDP now claims they do not know anything about—says: "All right, we have what is called legally a shortfall of petroleum deliveries in the province."

But one mistake was made in the legislation and that is it did not guarantee to any industry in the Province of Newfoundland oil from the offshore, not one single industry. That is why that legislation should be brought back into the House of Commons and amended to include refineries or possible petrochemical industries in the Province of Newfoundland.

The NDP now has a motion before the House trying to delay passage of this legislation, wanting to know where the oil is going to go after we had dealt with it for three years in this chamber under a Bill called the Canada–Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think if you will check the Orders of the Day, you will find that the NDP has no motion on any Order Paper pertaining to anything having to do with this bill at the moment, thank you very much.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the amendment I am referring to is on the Order Paper. It is Motion No. 3. It was put there on Wednesday, September 26. It is moved by a Mr. Riis and it talks about the quantities and percentage of oil production which are exported or unrefined or in semi-refined states.

The legislation that was passed by this Chamber back in 1987 was bad legislation. It was terrible legislation. It is legislation that should be brought back in and changed, but it is legislation that some of these objectors voted for. That is the incredible part.

The legislation was proclaimed on April 4, 1987 and our refining capacity in Newfoundland went through the pipes four months later, so there was the error. Beyond that, there is an even greater error that says for all time, all petroleum resources offshore in Canada will go to wherever the companies want it to go unless there is a shortage of supply that can be proven by the Newfoundland Government and agreed to by the federal government. Then it would go to arbitration if the companies still object. But if the bids were what they call "commercially acceptable", then the companies would have to deliver oil to "the existing feedstock requirements to industrial capacities that were operating on the time that this act came into force". That restricts it to refineries in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island. That is the law of Canada today.

The hon. minister is adding two words, "and Quebec." There is no reference to the province of Quebec in that legislation that was passed three years ago and neither should there be. Should there have been any reference to Quebec? No. Should there have been reference to any other province if Newfoundland was not guaranteed some oil? No. Shame on any member from the Bloc Quebecois who would suggest that. That is an outrageous suggestion and an insult to every single Newfoundlander.

I would also suggest in closing, as you are motioning to me that I should be finished, that for the last two weeks, we have had tents in the hon. member's riding of Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. We have had many dozens of tents out in the wilderness where this road is going to be built after the announcement of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. People are living in tents waiting for the start of the construction which the Bloc Quebecois wants to stop so that they claim more people in the province of Quebec can get hired.

Both these motions of the NDP and the Bloc Quebecois should be thrown out because they are not worth the paper they are written on.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate for a few minutes.

Coming from the province of Alberta, we of course, have a strong identification with things relating to oil, the industry, and the importance of it. We recognize just how important the development of a project such as Hibernia can be to a people.

I come from an area where we have a fair amount of oil and gas activity and, in fact, in my riding we have one of the projects that we are all hopeful, with the changes in oil prices right now, may well see some change in activity. Of course, I am referring to the Shell project in the town of Peace River. That particular project deals with putting steam into the ground and removing the oil through a process that is costly and complicated.

• (1810)

As a result of that, we know just how difficult it is to proceed with the development of some of these larger oil projects that are very costly. They produce oil that is very expensive, particularly over the last few years when most of us have seen oil prices dropping dramatically and, as a result, it was just not economically viable to proceed with the more expensive oil.

Therefore, for me to identify with the people of Newfoundland is not difficult. I understand the sense of urgency and the sense of importance which they attach to this project. For a long time they have wanted an opportunity to develop their economy and to demonstrate the kinds of skills and abilities that they have within their population.

So, it is a bill that has important to us and a bill that all of us want very much to see proceed. I am quite disappointed that, through the processes of presenting petitions and forcing votes on first reading of a bill, the Opposition has managed to delay the proceedings of the House on Bill C-44. Of course, that does have a direct impact on the people of Newfoundland, because we know that delays can be costly and, at a time when things like oil and oil prices are so volatile because of the situation in the Middle East, all of us are very much concerned about what is going on. With that in mind, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), I move:

> That this House continue to sit to complete the business now before it.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion moved by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons. Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And more than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the motion being debated at the moment is one that would cut off debate on Bill C-44. Bill C-44 is that bill that neither creates nor particularly furthers the Hibernia project; Bill C-44 is that bill which provides for federal investment in the Hibernia project.

Before dealing briefly with the merits of the investment structure outlined in Bill C-44, I would like to note that we are again debating whether or not to continue debate at all. We are debating a government motion to turn off the lights on the debate on Hibernia.

The government says this has to be done. "It is a dirty job but someone has to do it, the government claims", because all kinds of time has been wasted on it and if time continues to be wasted on it, then the project itself may be in peril.

I used to work in Edmonton with a small group of people. We worked for Grant Notley. One of them had a colourful metaphor that she applied to certain qualities and classes of argument. She referred to this class of argument with the metaphor "el toro pooh-pooh".

The arguments we have been hearing with regard to the wastage of time from the government, the arguments we have been hearing about the frailty of the project—the project itself being destroyed if we take more than a day to debate Bill C-44—bring to mind that colourful metaphor, el toro pooh-pooh.

An hon. member: Unparliamentary.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I have checked in Beauchesne. It is not ruled out.

In total, two minutes were spent on introduction and first reading of Bill C-44. That was on November 7, 1989, eleven months ago. Second reading got under way on December 18 when 61 minutes, an hour and a bit, were spent. Then it was dropped. Not because of the opposition, the opposition was not standing around saying "by gosh, you bring back Hibernia and we will make your life hell". No, the government just sort of dropped it as if it exited into the ether with not so much as a thought following it until February 9 when we spent two hours on it on second reading. We were then up to the horrendous total of three hours in second reading debate on a bill which, when passed, will see the authorization of an expenditure of federal public funds up to in excess of $3 billion.

This was not to be all because that perfidious opposition demanded yet further discussion of Bill C-44. So, on June 7—from February 9 to March, to April, to May, to June 7, four months later, again at the sole discretion of the government—the bill was brought back once more and debated for about two and a half hours, at which time it was passed after a total of five and a half hours of debate; hardly tortuous. The entire second reading was spread by the government over more than half a year, then it passed. Then it went to committee. Would you like to know what horrible, gruesome delay the opposition imposed on this bill in committee? I can tell you. I was there. We whistled it through in a day.

Mr. Reid: That's how much you worried about the debate.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): One day. The reason for that was because I can tell a done deal when I see one. I was simply unwilling to waste my time hearing a hallelujah chorus come before the committee, praising the deal to the skies and offering no critical assessment whatsoever. One day in committee, and that, by the way, was very quickly after second reading concluded. That was merely five days later. A day after that it was reported to this House by the chair of the committee. There after June 13, it languished, orphaned—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Ontario on a point of order.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member who has just spoken, he was absolutely right that while he was in committee there were no objections raised, including by the member who has just spoken.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, that was not entirely accurate. In fact, I attempted to propose several amendments to alter the bill, all of which of course were defeated.

Again, questions of accuracy do not bear close inspection in this House very often. In any event, we get to September 26 of this year and the bill is brought forward for report stage. A total of one hour and 43 minutes was spent on it at report stage. Two minutes at first reading and introduction, five and a half hours at second reading, six hours in committee, one minute to report it to the House and one hour and 40 minutes so far in report stage.

• (1820)

Is this unacceptable to this government? Does this cause it to bring in time allocation?

This is a government that demands that the legislative process move with the speed of Mercury. Our legislative process is not designed to do that. It is designed that we may consider the contents of a bill carefully at numerous steps. It is a prudent system, especially when it is proposed to allot in excess of $3 billion in federal public taxpayers' money.

It is money that will have to be made up, perhaps by the GST. It is proposed that $3 billion be invested. Given the debate to date, we have been okaying that money at a rate in excess of $4 million a minute. More than $66,000 a second.

This can hardly be deemed dragging our heels. If I was able to drag my heels like this at home, I would be a wealthy man. I can guarantee you, Mr. Speaker, I am not that.

The government tells you that it must pass this legislation and the only way it can achieve that is over the prostrate corpse of the opposition, that the opposition has been obstructionist. El toro pooh-pooh.

Further, it tells you, Mr. Speaker, that this has got to be done because if it is not done, the project will collapse. In the committee, the minister admitted that the progress of the project at this point into the next year is utterly independent of whatever may happen in this House. There is much more than enough discretionary funding available to the government, the minister and the pools there now to cause the slightest ripple of worry until sometime next year.

The reason it is bringing in time allocation is because it fears the truth about this project: the squandering of public funds irresponsibly and to insufficient end.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to Quebecers back home who are watching the proceedings on TV that I am an independent member of the Bloc québécois. I belong to the Bloc Québécois to serve the interests of Quebec here in the House of Commons and, if at all possible, Mr. Speaker, to convince my fellow citizens to accept or at least better appreciate the fact that we are moving rather quickly towards Quebec sovereignty. It is important that one and all understand that. In this bill—

Mr. Langlois: I am not so sure about that.

Mr. Gérin: No, no, no! I see a Quebec Conservative member in the House. Maybe the others have gone to bed. Yet this is an important bill—

Mrs. Landry: I am here.

Mr. Gérin: There is also a minister in the House.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder how these Quebec Conservative members can applaud their government's imposing closure or lowering the boom after only a few hours of debate on a bill which entails expenditures in excess of $6 billion.

We will try to explain to the people of Quebec—they are quick on the uptake—that we have had a debate on an issue which will cost $1 billion an hour. The member for Manicouagan was on that committee. I think he spoke for about 90 seconds, yet today he is in favour of cutting off debate. I can hardly wait to see how Quebec Conservatives vote on this motion because for once the people of Quebec would like to be told how much of these billions of their tax dollars spent by the federal government they can expect to get back. That is interesting, Mr. Speaker, and I see some members nodding in agreement. Interesting indeed!

I refer you to what was said by the Minister of Energy, Mr. Jake Epp, when he appeared before the committee on June 12, 1990, not long ago, and testified as follows: "But may I say, Mr. Chairman, that obviously we would like to have more industrial benefits, for instance, in the shipyards of eastern Canada, and the industrial benefits that will flow from that. May I say I have been speaking about this issue with our colleague, Benoît Bouchard, as to what we could be doing. We have been presenting this to the consortium and that is why we have not, quite frankly, finalized all the industrial benefits. There is also, apart from the super-modules, the matter of possible ancillary shipbuilding needed for servicing".

So, on June 12, 1990, Benoît Bouchard, the political leader for Quebec—Quebec meaning what is still left of the Conservatives that come from Quebec—said: "We don't know what will be in it for Canada. We don't know what will be in it for Quebec. That has not yet been negotiated. No agreement has been reached. We are still in the dark". Today, we tabled a very modest amendment. We wanted Canadian companies to be first in line to tender for these contracts worth several billion dollars. The government's answer is— Benoît Bouchard may come to the House to speak. He hasn't spoken in the House for a long time. He may come here himself to tell us that no, we don't want to say that; we don't want to put this in the bill. Even worse, they are going to muzzle the members of the Bloc Quebecois. They won't let members speak. They won't let the Conservative members from Quebec speak to this issue, because if the government gave us just two days in the House, the Bloc Quebecois would probably be able to convince all Quebecers that here in Canada we are being shafted with this kind of project. Unfortunately, we will be gagged after only a few hours of debate in the House. I've got them right here.

Canadians who are listening know how many meaningless speeches they can hear on a single day about equally meaningless legislation, sometimes involving amounts of as little as $2,000 or $3,000. Here, we are talking about $6 billion. This is all the time that was allocated to that, and few members were heard. On December 18, 1989, the minister did not even introduce the Bill himself in the House. God knows where he was. It is Parliamentary Secretary who introduced the Bill, but he was himself very brief. A mere fifteen minutes. That day, an hour was spent for the introduction of the Bill.

On February 9, 1990, there were four speakers—by the way, the minister was absent again—and two hours were spent examining the Bill. On June 7, the Bill was referred to the legislative committee and the committee—on which sat Mr. Langlois from the Quebec Conservative Party, but who did not say more than two words—met for less than two hours. Imagine, to take less than two hours to examine a $6 billion project. That is incredible!

At that time, the Minister had said, in his testimony: "I know nothing. It is ongoing. We do not know. We have no idea". He was unable to answer most questions, except to say that the people of Newfoundland would be happy to receive a lot of money from Canada. I am sure they would!

On June 13, 1990, the report was presented to the House. On September 26, 1990, we came back and discussed the bill for two hours. During those two hours, two members of the Bloc Quebecois took the floor, two members from Quebec rose to state that only Canadian firms should bid.

Mr. Speaker, after that, the government decided to gag us. If they think they can stop us from taking the floor in this House! If they think they can stop Quebecers worthy of that name from speaking in the House of Commons, they better think again!

I see I have two minutes left. That is fine, for I will have a chance to speak again tomorrow on this issue, and the day after. I will speak as long as I have things to say in this House.

• (1830)

Mr. Speaker, we have had fourteen speakers altogether on this bill, including the Minister for International Trade from Newfoundland who also put in his two-cents worth, when he said that we absolutely had to help Newfoundland, and that in any case it was the right time to do it, on June 7, 1990. You may remember that Clyde Wells was in Ottawa, talking about other things at the time.

Mr. Speaker, in his speech last year, the parliamentary secretary said that the project might have as much as 45 per cent Canadian content. Today, faced with the objections of the Bloc Quebecois, they are suddenly talking about as much as 60 per cent. We don't believe that. We don't believe the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when he says that. We don't believe the Minister from Newfoundland. They fooled Canadians so often, we can't believe them any more. Let them put it in the bill! When it's in the bill, when it really says Canadians will have the right to tender on all projects in this six or seven billion dollar megaproject, when Canadians have that right in the bill, then I can say I did my duty as a Quebecer and as a Canadian. During the remainder of our term. Then I will be able to say yes to this bill. Meanwhile, as the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead and with the other members of the Bloc québécois, we intend to vote against this bill unless it can be amended as proposed.

I ask the Conservative members from Quebec, and my time is almost up: Talk to Benoît Bouchard about the statement he made recently! Remind him of what happened in late June, 1990!

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to say that in his speach, the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead continuously called hon. members by their names while the practice in this House is to call members by the name of their riding. I would like to see the hon. member who has been here for a while show more respect for our Standing Orders.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I know the hon. member will address the minister by his title or the hon. member by his constituency. The hon. member has 30 seconds left in his debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I want my colleague who was a member of the committee to know that I am sorry and that I understand very well why he would not want to see his name associated with such a situation. If I were him, I would feel the same way. I would be ashamed, back in Quebec, to make such a statement. He is perfectly right, Mr. Speaker, and I would ask you to strike his name from my speech, like, he will be stricken from the political map after the next election, unless he comes to his senses pretty soon.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it would like to say a few words in French, having been impressed by the address of the member who just spoke. He told us he was here to represent the interests of Quebec and of Quebecers. It must however be understood that the members who are sitting to my left, the group of independents who want to be called the Bloc québécois, are not the only ones to champion the cause of Quebecers, in Canada—

Some hon. members: Who else?

Some hon. members: Where are the other ones?

M. Volpe: —because members are elected to represent all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Right on!

Some hon. members: Ah, ah!

Mr. Volpe: So, if my colleague insists on draping himself in the flag of only one province while arguing at the same time that his group wants to represent the interests of all Canadians in this project—

This makes us wonder when in fact he is telling the truth: is it when he speaks for Quebecers only, or when he stands for all Canadians. When he says that for now he is still a Canadian, and as such, wants to protect everyone's interest, he is trying to confuse us. He wants to send one message to Quebecers, to those listening in Quebec who are of the same party, who share the same ideas, but at the same time he wants to leave the impression he still represents Canadians. He says he was elected as a representative of all Canadiens, not only Quebecers but Canadians who live in Quebec and in all the other provinces. So, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that member insists on introducing procedural points into the debate. Because, if my memory serves me well, that same member along with some of his colleagues, used to be part of the gouvernement's caucus, a few months ago. And at that time in this Parliament the guillotine was used 13 times to bring an end to the discussion of some on bills.

Mr. Lewis: Incredible!

Mr. Volpe: The Minister says it is incredible and so it is! And more incredible still, Mr. Speaker, while we are discussing a bill which should be a matter of interest to all Canadians, we hear from a member who, again, was a member of the government's caucus a few months ago, when the object of this bill was developed.

So, the honourable member and his independent colleagues from Quebec, who previously agreed with this bill, now say: "No, things have changed." So, what are they saying now: "No. The bill we agreed on before now must be changed."

[English]

I do not think we can continue to debate procedures and the discussion of closure when what we should be talking about is the substance of this bill. It has been clear through some of the debates we have heard over the course of the afternoon, brief though they have been, that the NDP to my left and the bloc of independents from Quebec are not in favour of this bill. They cannot hide that kind of attitude.

We cannot talk about procedures or amendments in the hope of trying to confuse the viewing public. Canadians at large, that they are against this bill. I ask myself why? It can only be because they do not want to look at the way that we are thinking about diversifying the economy of our regions. This is particularly relevant to Newfoundland.

If it is the intention of hon. members to my left to say out in the open that they do not want to diversify the economy of Newfoundland, let them stand up and so say. That is not what we should be doing. I would have thought that if they were interested in a meaningful debate on substance they would have asked some significant questions. For example, is this Hibernia project economically viable and capable of making appropriate returns for Newfoundland? I would have been interested in hearing that; so, I dare say, would all Newfoundlanders.

Could federal money, for example, be used more effectively for creation of other types of industries in Newfoundland? Let me hear them say that. We have not heard any of that at all. What are we talking about when we are talking about where we are putting our moneys—

An hon. member: Why are you talking as if you don't know anything?

Mr. Volpe: We have not heard anything about how to best allocate federal moneys. We have not heard any of that from my colleagues to the left. In fact when my colleague from Quebec says he is here to defend the interests of Quebec, I did not hear him mention that there are many estimates that talk about $1.5 billion. That is spelled with a b. In French it is milliards. Encore une fois, $1.5 billion in contracts to the province of Quebec.

• (1840)

[Translation]

Who knows who stands for Quebec's interests! One must understand that 1.5 billion $ will be spent in Quebec.

[English]

I do not know why they would be against that. I am not sure that anybody else here would have been against it. Quite frankly, there is $1.5 billion being spent in Quebec and only $770 million expected to be spent in Newfoundland. I would have expected my colleagues from Newfoundland to be upset about that but they are not. They must be good Canadians, great Canadians.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Volpe: I see my colleagues to my left are really interested in hearing some of the other facts that they have ignored all the way along. Quite frankly one needs to note that Hibernia is expected to account for 12 per cent of Canadian light and medium oil production by the year 2000. I think that is a valuable undertaking.

Also what should be kept in mind is that all estimates indicate that we are to have 10,000 person-year jobs in Newfoundland or 50 per cent of the total of the project is employment. Only 70 per cent of all the Canadian jobs is expected to be created under this project, so the benefits are going to be distributed not only throughout the maritimes but I dare say through all the adjacent provinces as well. This includes, I might add for those whose geography is falling by the wayside, the province of Quebec.

If we are to talk about substance and about whether or note we want this bill, what we should be doing is directing our attention at criticizing the bill itself, clause by clause, on each point of substance in the debates. We should be talking about whether or not this is the best deal.

Quite frankly what I have heard all along is that because it is not the best deal for Newfoundland, it is not a good deal for any part of Canada at all. The fact of the matter is that it is a good deal for Newfoundland, for maritime Canada. It is a program to diversify the economy of depressed regions in Canada.

I might remind the House that Newfoundland currently has the highest unemployment rate in the country. A good portion of that unemployment rate is structural. It is nothing else. Until we change the structure of the economy in provinces like Newfoundland, we have a very poor hope of trying to buttress the employment rate.

If we are to be talking about those items in this bill which say that we cannot have this because it is not the best deal and therefore we do not want anything but the best deal, then let them say that. However, if there are movements in the direction of creating long-term employment and creating an environment whereby the structure of that province and the provinces adjacent can look toward a different type of industrial economy, I think we owe it to the people of Newfoundland to say that we support that bill.

If they do not want to support it, let them be honest. Let them stand in their places and say: We from the bloc Quebecois, we from the bloc NDP do not want this bill for the province of Newfoundland and for maritime Canada. Let them have the courage to say that.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. President, I had no intention to get involved in this discussion, but after hearing the comments expressed earlier by my honourable colleague for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, I have decided to say a few words in order to clarify certain matters.

I must say, Mr. President, that when I worked with the Legislative Committee responsible for the review of bill C-44, my colleague blamed me for speaking too little or too briefly. I must remind him that I was the only member on that Committee who requested that witnesses be heard by the Committee, and indeed, the object of having witnesses appear before the Committee was to bring out—

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead rises on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: I think that there is a provision under our Standing Orders whereby, whenever the House deals with a Bill, the Minister who introduced the Bill is under the obligation to be present, or at least two ministers must be present in the House, because I suggest there is no point—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On time allocation, there are two ministers in the House. In fact, there are three present. Debate, the hon. member for Manicouagan.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, calling witnesses would have made it possible for committee members to assess the opportunities for economic spinoffs from the Hibernia project not only for Quebec, but for Eastern Canada as a whole.

I should also like to comment on the remarks the Hon. Member for Edmonton East made when he blamed the committee for too quick a study. May I remind my hon. friend that he was one of those committee members who recommended that the committee should proceed quickly, that it should carry out and complete its clause-by-clause study as quickly as possible.

Apparently, they claim that Hibernia will not yield the economic spinoffs people expected and will not contribute to the energy security of our country. They seem to overlook the fact that beyond energy security, there is the need to use some of our natural resources, so that, by selling this commodity, we may improve our balance of payment.

Together with the Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from a tour of Northern Alberta where I had the opportunity to see for myself our huge tar sand deposits which represent a major source of energy for Canada. Hibernia will make it possible, not only for Newfoundland, but for Eastern Canada as a whole to develop an expertise which does not exist there, to master new technics and help Newfoundland, Maritime and Quebec people develop new techniques and participate in the realization of a major project which is important for Eastern Canada.

Thus I must tell you that as a Member of Parliament for Quebec and unlike my friends from the Bloc Québécois, I support the Hibernia Project and I hope that this House will be able to pass it as soon as possible since it holds extraordinary benefits for Quebec. Remember that when the project was announced, one single province was going to benefit from it and was promised fall-outs, and that province was Quebec. Right away, engineering and construction companies were identified as possible beneficiaries; Hibernia guaranteed them work and activities. Why then try to stall the business of the House? Why all those amendments that would delay the passage of that bill? By delaying this bill, Mr. Speaker, all we are doing is damaging the economy of Eastern Canada.

Therefore, I would like to simply ask my collegues of the Bloc Québécois and of the NDP to support this bill, to proceed as fast as possible, to let all members speak freely on this matter, so that the Hibernia Project can be carried out for the well-being of Newfoundlanders, but also for the people of the Maritimes and Quebec.

That being said, I will give other members the opportunity to speak, now that my position is clear.

I would like to remind my collegue, the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead not to worry of what might happen to me during the next election. I can take care of that very well. My constituents of the riding of Manicouagan know full well where lie their best interests. I would worry more in his place than mine. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join in this debate, though the points I would like to make are a little different from the points that I hear from my Liberal and Conservative colleagues and now from my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois.

As I sit here listening to this debate I am reminded somewhat of the movie, the Ship of Fools. We are debating the so-called spin-off benefits of a technology that we should be encouraging rather than debating how much we should subsidize. There is a bit of schizophrenia here. All members are concerned about the greenhouse effect. We have heard much talk about the greenhouse effect. It was a big issue in the Liberal leadership debate. But on the other hand, what are we doing? We are quite willing to continue subsidizing the oil industry.

• (1850)

Clearly, we are a ship of fools—

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Are you against Hibernia?

Mr. de Jong: Yes, I am against Hibernia, and I am against every other oil megaproject. I think it is about time that we stopped subsidizing the oil industry. In fact, might I suggest that instead of subsidizing the oil industry we start placing a special tax on oil and gasoline in terms of how much they pollute. And the more a substance pollutes, the more it should—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. Would the hon. member please take his seat?

I would like to hear the hon. member. There is still another nine minutes left before seven o'clock. Could I have just a little bit of order? Thank you. The hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle.

Mr. de Jong: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

This weekend I noted in the popular press that the state of California has come out with some pretty new and stringent regulations regarding emissions from automobiles. If I may quote from a newspaper article:

> The new rules require carmakers to start selling cleaner vehicles starting in 1994 in the smoggy Los Angeles basin and 1997 statewide. By 2003, all cars sold in the state must emit at least 70-per-cent fewer hydrocarbons and other smog-forming chemicals than in the 1993 models.

That is not much time. California represents around 11 per cent of the consuming public in the United States.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the economics of this project do not make sense. I suggest that the concern about the greenhouse effect will speed up the development of alternate forms of energy. If California takes the lead in the next decade to two, we are not going to see the amount of gasoline used in cars. I suggest that the pay-back period of Hibernia will be such that we will never get back what we are sinking into it now.

In conclusion, I wish to repeat that it seems to me what is happening in this House is that we are indeed a ship of fools, debating about economic spin-offs and benefits for which later generations are going to curse us.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, a man with your experience in Parliament should understand our astonishment as we, from the Bloc Québécois, witness what is happening here today. It was only last week that our group made its debut in Parliament.

During the first few days, we made a list of the matters about to be raised on the floor that would be of critical importance both for Canada and for Quebec. Among those, was Hibernia. Wednesday morning, we saw the notice in the Order Paper and knew that we would have an opportunity to discuss the project and the bill. We all knew that several questions remained unanswered in June, after the parliamentary committee sat. I was a government member and others were members of the government too. The project was announced a little while ago, but the figures quoted were unverified. The week before, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made a statement, announcing that the project would benefit the Americans, not the Canadians. There are still many important questions to be answered.

At the time, Mr. Speaker, we figured: "That is no big deal! We are members of Parliament. We will go back to the House and ask the real questions that this bill raises. So, we started by introducing an amendment dealing specifically with the spinoffs for Canada. Everybody told us that the project itself had to produce interesting spinoffs for Canada. We have no problem with that, Mr. Speaker. But then, when we saw the legislation and the confusion in the remarks made by the ministers who spoke on the bill, we introduced an amendment to force the promoters of this project to limit the bidding to Canadian firms at first, for the first round.

There are, amongst others, the five big modules of this project. We are told that one of the modules would be assigned specifically to Newfoundland. Under the circumstances, it is reasonable that Newfoundland be responsible for one of the platforms, or modules. As for the rest of the project, since it is a Canadien project, we have moved an amendment to bring about a vote in the House to amend the bill. We do not wish to block the project, to delay it, or to kill it outright, but to have it brought about in a way that is favourable to the economy and in the interests of both Canada and Quebec. What do we see? We discuss the matter for about two hours. It is the beginning of the session, the beginning of the year. Everything was going smoothly; there was no filibuster; we respected the Standing Orders and waited to be recognized before exercising our right to speak. After just two hours, we are being cut off. We are being told that enough has been said and that we cannot discuss the subject any further.

That is what we do not understand, Mr. Speaker, because this bill pertains to capital matters. We only want the right to discuss them in the House. The debate is essentially about closure. Our arguments should have been limited to this procedure, but everybody, government as well as opposition have raised arguments relating to the content of the bill. It ensues that many basic issues have not been mentioned, debated and or resolved.

What about fundamental issues like the technological future of Canada, to name only one? Will Canada always submit to policies dictated by foreign companies? Will Canada show, once and for all the will to invest in its own future? Will Canada, Quebec and all the other provinces ensure that from now on the high-tech mega projects will be realized by Canadians, for Canadians, in the interests of all Canadians, not only here in Canada, but also in foreign countries? Will we be a people forever dependent on other people's interests? Canadian money will—

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I have just listened to the lovely rhetoric of the new leader of the Bloc Quebecois. Perhaps I am mistaken, but it seems to me that when he was Minister of Environment in the Conservative government he supported the Hibernia project.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the environment, everybody knows but nobody mentioned it except the hon. member a moment ago, that no other project has ever undergone as many environmental studies before being brought forward. When I was Minister of Environment and a very strict minister as that because many criticisms were levelled at me in economic circles, I have attested, and I can reaffirm it now that in that project everything has been done to protect the environnment.

We do not criticize the legislation from the environmental point of view. What we criticize and find unacceptable are the conditions under which the project is to be economically and technologically realized. Certainly, Mr. Speaker— I would like to conclude my remarks, with your permission.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): On the same point of order, perhaps, Mr. Speaker. I find it a bit confusing because at the time he was a minister, he was unconditionally for the project. Is he mixed up or what?

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, although we are close to adjournment time, I would like to make another point.

Essentially, in the battle to be recognized we in the Bloc Quebecois are fighting a very important battle for parliamentary democracy, for the interests we represent in Quebec and for the future of Quebec. We know quite well that the right we claim must be won little by little. We will patiently fight day after day. We will patiently bring the House toward full recognition of the Bloc Quebecois. That being said, we will not accept any attempt at muzzling members one at a time, we will condemn it, contest it and immediately repudiate it. And that is what was done today. An attempt to muzzle one by one—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the Bloc Quebecois just now on what needed to go to Quebec. It seems to me the deal that was signed helps Quebec immensely. It helps less so the maritime provinces, such as Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and P.E.I. who would be looking for the work.

• (1900)

However, last May 8 I rose in the House and, just after he had tabled his amendments to the Fisheries Act, I asked the minister about the penalties that he was planning to bring in at that time. The question was about the fines up to $1 million for harmful alteration, destruction or disruption of fish habitat.

I asked on that day in particular because I knew there were 42 foreign boats fishing in what was called the silver hake box, while our own fishermen were not able to fish in that area at that time because of the spawning ground rules. The odd part is that they were fishing right beside the spawning grounds. They are allowed a by-catch of the traditional fish in the spawning grounds.

It just seems that the government—and I am looking forward to hearing more about these amendments as they come into play—was hitting at the people who are least able to pay the penalties, our own Canadians, when we have foreigners out there fishing and overfishing, yet we cannot impare the same type of penalties on them.

I know the Minister for International Trade signed an agreement with the Americans whereby they would look to have a uniform system as a guide to prosecuting Americans in our waters. I know the American system and I have seen how it works. That agreement is only worth the ink on that paper, because I cannot see the eastern seaboard American states agreeing very rapidly to an agreement that will prosecute their fishermen who are fishing in our waters.

The government says it looks all the time for a level playing-field in the fishery. On the same day, I asked the Minister for International Trade about the $130 million subsidy that was going to help the offshore in the Northern cod. I asked that day that the penalties be the same right across the board for the foreigners in the offshore and the inshore—anyone who is caught in violation within our waters. The $130 million did not represent level playing-field, as far as I am concerned.

I have been waiting since last June, when I questioned the minister and his officials on two separate occasions, for the guidelines on the $10 million available for new markets so I could send them to my constituents. I have not seen them.

It is just like a month ago when they introduced a subsidy program that any fisherman in our area would love to have given to them. It means free fish, fish by foreigners to be landed at plants, and these plants to be guaranteed loans by both governments. They then turn around and say: "We are playing on a level playing-field."

What about those who have the most influence, whether it is foreigners with the Minister for International Trade for other reasons, or whether it is the offshore with the Minister of Fisheries? Even on the day that he announced the amendments to the Fisheries Act I do not think that he was saying clearly which way it was going to hit fishermen. Who was going to have to pay more? Was it going to be the companies who can afford to pay for their offshore trawlers who may be in violation or the individuals? Or was it just another way for this minister to say we have to cut back our catching capacity in the inshore. Certainly that is the way it was reviewed by the inshore fishermen in the area that I come from. It was just one more way.

Yet, there are many things on a daily basis that I see this Minister of Fisheries closing his eyes to. He should be looking to see whether or not there are things going on within the fishery, both offshore and inshore, that should be questioned or looked at. This government in particular does not look at what is good for the majority of Canadians. It looks at what is good for the few and to satisfy on any occasion the big companies in Canada, even the international ones.

I am looking forward to seeing what these particular guidelines are, but I am particularly looking forward to seeing this minister in this new session come up with what I consider a level playing-field. That means, that for once, he has to start looking at the inshore.

I will sum up by saying that it is time that the government and this minister start looking at the millions of Canadians who are so dependent on every day employment and labour in the fisheries in Canada and not just the big companies.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, as is the procedure in the late show, I will respond to the question that was referred for further debate. That is the question of the silver hake box, which as you know, Mr. Speaker, is really a small mesh gear area where all small mesh gear fishing takes place with the exception of redfish and shrimp. Fishing activities restricted to this area include silver hake, squid, and argentine.

The silver hake box was identified in the 1970s as an area where the use of small mesh gear would have minimal effect on traditional groundfish and pelagic fisheries. This zone lies approximately 100 miles off the coast of Nova Scotia and includes an area stretching from east of Sable Island to the Fundian Channel and from the edge of the Continental Shelf to the 200-mile boundary.

The silver hake has been harvested in 1990 by foreign vessels from the Soviet Union, Cuba, Japan, and Bulgaria.

By-catches of cod, haddock, and pollock are minimal in the silver hake fishery. In 1989, these amounted to 3,300 tonnes of which 2,400 tonnes was pollock. As part of the 1990 bilaterals with Cuba and the Soviet Union, negotiations have been ongoing. To date, several hundred tonnes of by-catch have been landed by U.S.S.R. vessels for Canadian processing.

Canadian fishing activities were approved for 1990. These were confined to inshore operations less than 65 feet. As well, a successful experimental fishery on Emerald Basin using MG vessels less than 65 feet has been completed.

With the exception of the inshore Emerald Basin experimental fishery, all fishing activities are within the small mesh gear zone, commonly referred to as the silver hake box. This area does not overlap the haddock nursery closure area on Emerald and Western Bank and therefore there are no foreign activities in areas closed to Canadians.

The silver hake fishery is prosecuted in deep water on the edge of the Continental Shelf and therefore damaging to productive fishing habitat is minimal. Canadian observers are on board all foreign vessels and monitor all fishing activities.

The haddock nursery area was introduced in 1987 in an attempt to protect the excessive harvest of juvenile haddock by otter trawl vessels. The closure is landward of the silver hake box and covers an area of 5,000 square miles on Emerald and Western Banks which lie to the west of Sable Island. The outer boundary of this nursery area is proximate to the inner boundary of the silver hake box.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

TOURISM

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, this debate is extended because of a question I had asked in this House, last April. I had then asked the Minister how he intended to address the issue of rebates for tourists from other countries.

Indeed, I will not repeat the minister's answer, but he had indicated that along with Ministers of Finance and the Standing Commitee of the House on Finance, he had initiated action to solve that issue. The travel wholesalers had some problems because it was a very complex matter and they would be at a disadvantage compared with the so called package deals for tourists from abroad.

• (1910)

In the second part of my question, Mr. Speaker, I had asked the minister how come according to the wholesalers whatever rebate system he would promote, it would in no way help to solve their problem.

So, as the months went by the wholesalers insisted that the rebate system for tourists from abroad, especially those from United States, Mr. Speaker, would give an undue advantage to the wholesalers of United States coming to Canada.

They informed the minister many times that there was a problem. The minister imagines, of course, that he has solved the problem. But obviously, the problem is still there. When I asked the question, I was not a mind reader, but I realized the minister insisted that the refunds would really solve the wholesalers' problem.

Indeed, it was in April and I knew the tourist season in Canada would peak in May, June, July and August. Now, we are at the beginning of October and the evidence is overwhelming. M. Speaker, tourism has indeed substantially declined in Canada. There has been more complaints from the wholesalers that one of the reasons tourism has dropped was because there are so many rumours about the new GST— Imagine, it has not yet come into effect and it is already creating problems!

Consequently, I wanted to further inform the minister. There is always time to make changes. What kind of changes could he make? I do not know. But I would be very happy if his parliamentary secretary, here in the House, could advise his minister that, indeed, maybe the time has come to look at ways to improve the rebate system so that it would be acceptable to the wholesalers.

But as I am speaking to you, Mr. Speaker, the new leader of our Party, as you know, the Hon. Jean Chrétien, has given me new responsibilities that do not come under tourism anymore. The new member—let's say since 1988—the member from Broadview—Greenwood, is indeed for the Official Opposition critic for tourism.

Unfortunately, given the Standing Orders, he would have liked to make his maiden speech, not as a new member of this House, but as our critic for tourism. He will develop his ideas and will convey them in the next few years. I do not want to elaborate too much on this issue, I simply want to ask the hon. member responsible for tourism tonight, who will answer for the minister, if he would ask the minister for information, since this question is very important for the tourism industry in Canada, which will become in the future our greatest industry. We have to take whatever time it takes to ensure the tour operators, who bring a lot of tourists into Canada, fully understand the issue and to work with them to find a solution that will promote tourism in our country, since it is probably our major export industry.

Now, I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the time you allotted me. I am sure the hon. Member standing in tonight for the minister will inform him of my concerns on this issue.

[English]

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, first of all, if I might, I would like to congratulate my hon. friend opposite on his new appointment. On behalf of the minister and my colleagues, I wish him well. Certainly, we welcome his colleague from Broadview—Greenwood on his new responsibilities for tourism. To get to the point at hand, before undertaking any major policy initiative, the federal government must examine the impact on the tourism industry. This was certainly the case when the government undertook its recent overhaul of the taxation system. The proposed goods and services tax will strengthen Canada's ability to compete with our developed country trading partners.

Canadian business will no longer be obliged to pay the hidden manufacturers' sales tax. Registered businesses will be eligible for a refundable tax credit for GST paid on all business purchases. This means that the effective rate of federal sales taxation on products or services purchased as part of a business enterprise will be nil. This is not presently the case. Many businesses, including those in the tourism industry, currently pay the hidden 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax when they purchase certain goods.

Under the goods and services tax, it is estimated that for some tourism businesses, the input tax credit will result in operating savings of 2 to 4 per cent. In 1989, the $25 billion we earned in tourism revenues was credited with generating direct employment for more than 630,000 Canadians. Today, there are some 60,000 Canadian businesses which derive all or a substantial portion of the revenue from tourism. Under the GST, this vital industry, which in 1989 ranked third among Canadian exporters after automobiles and auto parts, is expected to continue to grow.

All evidence suggests that foreign visitors will continue to view Canada as a desired vacation destination. We are going to have a GST rebate for international visitors that extends to both accommodation and purchases. We are the only country to offer a rebate to international travellers for accommodation. Except for transporter air services to the continental United States, inbound and outbound international passenger transportation will be zero rated. The rebate program will be accessible and visible. Visitors will be permitted four claims per year. The government is also implementing a program for foreign visitors to collect their rebates at the point of departure through duty free shops.

Other measures include simplifying the administrative aspects of tour packages, as my hon. colleague referred, and conventions where accommodation is offered as part of an over-all, all-inclusive package of services offered at a set price. In these cases, a visitor will be entitled to claim the actual tax paid on accommodation if this could be broken out or the visitor will be offered a flat rebate amount of $5 per night. I am pleased to report that, as recommended by the Standing Committee on Finance, wholesalers and tour operators, as well as corporate and convention planners in some instances, will now be able to claim a rebate for the GST paid on the accommodation portion of their Canadian packages.

The threshold for the rebate has also been reduced from $25 to $20. The lower threshold brings the total eligible expenditure for individual tourists back in line with that originally proposed in the light of the reduction of the GST rate from 9 per cent to 7 per cent. My time is up.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, last spring I had the opportunity to ask the Minister of Finance why seniors were being required to pay the clawback on their old age pensions when the legislation had not passed all parts of the legislative stages. I trust there is going to be at least a government member in the House to answer.

Mr. Vincent: Not to worry.

Mr. Karpoff: Not to worry. I am sure that their answer will be better than the one of the Minister of Finance. At that time the Minister of Finance said that it was perfectly all right, that if they did not wish to pay, they did not have to. However, that is not what has happened to old age pensioners. Old age pensioners who chose not to fill in the information about the clawback, simply filed their income tax returns and were entitled to refunds had the ministry of finance complete their income tax return and deduct the clawback from their refund.

Pensioners are concerned about the clawback for a number of reasons. It is being forced on them without the passage of legislation.

• (1920)

Also, they are concerned because it is the beginning of the erosion of universal programs. Government is saying that people with an income over $50,000 are no longer entitled to old age security, even if they have worked all their lives for this type of social security program. They paid taxes so that they could have it.

Now they are beginning to wonder if the government is saying this about old age pensions: "Why not next year health care?" We simply say: "People over a certain income level no longer get free health care or education." Then where do we go? We end up with a two-tiered system. One system for education, for health care, for pensions for people on low incomes and those for the wealthy.

We see what is happening in the United States when you get into two tiered systems instead of social security programs.

Pensioners are also saying to me that they are concerned about the clawback because, again, it is part of an unfair tax system, that this government is choosing to tax seniors at a 100 per cent rate on certain income pensions while, at the same time, it has reduced the corporate income tax in this country from 36 per cent to 28 per cent. And, 60,000 comfortable corporations paid no tax.

In fact, many of the large corporations not only paid no tax, but they got tax credits. We have people like Brascade and Brascan, $263 million and no tax. Also, they happen to have donated $50,000 to the Tories. People like Standard Trusco, $13 million, no tax. They happened to donate $15,000 to the Tories.

The good friend of both Tories and Liberals, Tridel, the friend of both of the old line parties, $72 million. They happened to donate $29 million to the Tories and I think $80 million to the Liberals. Seniors are saying: "What is happening to the fairness of our tax system?"

Now they are asking me: "Why is the government insisting on proceeding with the most unfair tax of all, the GST?" They said to me over the weekend: "What is happening in Ottawa?" "Why do we have a spectacle of a Tory government packing the Senate in order to get the GST through? An unfair tax."

At the same time, they are saying: "We do not believe the Liberals. They are two-faced about it. Their critic quit because he supported the GST. They refused to give any alternatives to the GST. Their new leader filly-fallied around for months to make up his mind. He had the opportunity to kill the GST in June, July, August, September but no, he deliberately waited until he knew that the Prime Minister was going to pack the Senate."

They are saying: "Plague on both the Houses of the old line parties. They are in cahoots for unfair taxes." The clawback is just part of this unfair tax system. But, seniors have been saying to me repeatedly: "We do not mind paying our fair share. We do not mind shouldering the burden evenly. The time has come that the big corporations paid their fair share." The time has come that the old line parties—be honest with us—the Tories and the Liberals level with the public as to what their intentions are.

If they have alternatives, put them on the table so that people can look at them. If their intent is to stop unfair taxation, do it when they have the opportunity and not simply mark time until that opportunity is lost.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that the remarks of the hon. member for Surrey North have left me utterly disappointed and surprised. The member for Surrey North is arguing against a piece of legislation under which people with an income of $75,000 or more would have to pay their fair share of taxes. We are not talking about low-income Canadians, Mr. Speaker, but about people aged 65 or more whose net income is $75,000. The government has decided that such people must carry their fair share of the tax burden.

Mr. Speaker, I let the member express his views, he should do the same thing. I can hear him trying to confuse Canadians by saying that companies do not pay taxes. Not true, Mr. Speaker, all Canadian companies pay their fair share of taxes. The hon. member forgets to mention that every year a number of companies report losses which keep piling up and must be deducted from taxable income. Other companies are entitled to claim depreciation. These are the only deductions. The member may say they do not pay taxes but that is not true at all, Mr. Speaker. I am disappointed that the member for Surrey North, for whom I had a lot of respect, should make such claims and try to confuse Canadians.

With respect to Bill C–28, I am saddened by the hon. member: his party supports a bunch of unelected senators who are doing their best to belittle Canadian democracy and disregard the rights of duly elected members of the House of Commons. Mr. Speaker, the Liberal senators are sitting on Bill C–28, just as they are sitting on the GST legislation and all the other bills. These non–elected parliamentarians, led by a non–elected leader, have the nerve to contradict the will of the Canadian people expressed in 1988, Mr. Speaker, which was to elect a majority progressive conservative government. If the senators want to get into the political arena, let them run in the riding of Trois–Rivières or Surrey North. Then I will respect what they say. Then I will respect the position they take on legislation.

As long as there is only one elected House, that House will decide. No senator has the right to play games with the democracy of this country. I will not mention all the editorials that agree with my position, Mr. Speaker. I am talking here about a fundamental principle that was clearly expressed by the people in the riding of Trois–Rivières on the weekend. They said: The senators should pass legislation that was passed in the House!

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time has expired. Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.27 p.m.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

TABLING OF REPORT OF CANADIAN GROUP OF INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1) I have the honour to table in the House, in both official languages, the report of the Canadian group of the Interparliamentary Union. This is the report of the official delegation that represented Canada at the interparliamentary conference on disarmament held in Bonn, in the Federal Republic of Germany, from May 21 to May 25, 1990.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO APPOINT ASSISTANT DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE HOUSE

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): After consultations, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. members for Ottawa—Vanier and Kamloops:

> That Mr. DeBlois, member for the electoral riding of Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, be appointed Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to confirm that the Opposition has been consulted by—

Mr. Lapierre: Only the Official Opposition.

Mr. Gauthier: —the government. I heard the member for Shefford say "the Official Opposition", Mr. Speaker. There is only one Opposition in this House, and it is ours.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I might remind our vociferous independent colleagues that tradition is such that Opposition members support any appointment to the Chair or to the chairmanship of Committees of the Whole.

We are therefore very—

Mr. Boudria: You have to be familiar with the Standing Orders!

Mr. Gauthier: —pleased to support the motion to appoint Mr. Charles DeBlois Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole. We know he is a diligent worker and that, even though he sits on the government benches, he will be impartial when occupying the Chair. For the time being and until notice to the contrary is given he can count on our full co-operation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker I, too, want to lend my remarks to those of the opposition House Leader, in terms of saying that, yes, consultations have taken place, that we in the New Democratic Party also support the position, and that we assume that the tradition of non-partisanship will continue while he is conducting business on behalf of the House.

I wish to say we are looking forward to working with the hon. member and wish him well.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, as an independent member who has yet to be recognized by this House as a member of the Bloc québécois, the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead was not consulted and, of course, cannot give his approval.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): On the same grounds mentioned by my hon. colleague, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give my consent.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I was present in the House and I abstained from voting because I was not consulted, as is customary in the House on these matters.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, for the same reasons given by my hon. colleague, I did not vote, although I was in the House. However, I have every respect for the member who was appointed and he will have my full support. This is a matter of principle. I have nothing against the hon. member but against the fact we were not consulted.

PETITIONS

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and privilege to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from 61 of my constituents in Plate Cove East and Plate Cove West.

This petition is against the unemployment insurance system overhaul being done by the government through Bill C-21. They are terribly concerned about the difficulty being caused by this bill. With the lack of the variable entrance requirement, in a lot of cases they cannot qualify for unemployment insurance and have a bleak winter ahead of them.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reintroduce the variable entrance requirement and to overhaul the unemployment insurance business in a much more meaningful manner.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions here, signed by the great constituents of the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

These great constituents of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell have asked me to table in the House a petition against the government's proposed goods and services tax, which in a recent magazine cartoon was called recently the good Samaritan tax or the GST.

Several hundred petitioners from a number of communities in my riding, such as Hawkesbury, Vankleek Hill, L'Original, Plantagenet and all those other wonderful places that I have the opportunity to represent in this House, have asked me to table this petition calling upon the government, while there is still time, to abandon its foolish plan to impose a goods and services tax on practically everything.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty to present to Parliament this petition calling upon the government to rescind the GST and especially to lambaste this government for taxing education. In light of what the Prime Minister said at the United Nations and what the minister of health said about the bureau for children, perhaps he might start by scrapping the GST as it relates to education.

[Translation]

MINERS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition from the Syndicat des Métallos (FTQ) of Malartic, in the Abitibi area, which since 1965 has been asking that the status of miner be legally recognized by the Government of Quebec; that the Unemployment Insurance Act be amended to provide for complementary unemployment insurance benefits when a mine is shut down; and that the Unemployment Insurance Act be amended to provide that relocation allowances will cover all costs incurred for a worker laid off after a mine is shut down.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present this petition to the House. It concerns the opposition Canadians from coast to coast have with regard to the GST, and in particular the opposition Canadians have with regard to the tax which will be put on books.

This petition hopes to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in a tax-free status of the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

These four petitions are from individuals from across the country including the great province of Alberta and, of course, the great city of Edmonton, Alberta.

• (1120)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to have an opportunity to rise today to present petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

Petitioners from Kamloops, Logan Lake, Chase, Clearwater, Little Fort, Savona and a variety of other communities, who are still very concerned that the government seems to be determined to proceed with its very unpopular goods and services tax, point out a long list of reasons why they oppose this proposed tax.

The petitioners call upon the Liberal dominated Senate to do whatever it needs to do to ensure that it never becomes a reality in our country.

Mr. Speaker, on another issue, again the petitioners from Kamloops, British Columbia and from Chase, British Columbia point out that the government has decided now to do something that has never been done before, that is to tax reading.

The petitioners find that this is an odd thing to do in light of the government's concern regarding the high levels of illiteracy in the country.

The petitioners are calling upon the government to smarten up and simply stop this idea of taxing literature in Canada.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter, again unrelated petitioners from Kamloops point out that they believe that in a time of increasing oil prices and recognizing that the passenger rail service is the most environmentally friendly way to move large numbers of people. They are calling upon the government now to do what most progressive countries in the world have done.

The petitioners want the government to expand their VIA Rail system, invest in new equipment and enable people to use this as a way to move from one part of Canada to another, rather than do the regressive act of cutting back on VIA Rail service in the country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition on behalf of many people from across this country, and particularly from some of my friends in Thunder Bay, who want to impress upon the government to do away with the goods and services tax as proposed.

More so, the petitioners want to do away with the goods and services tax if it should go through on the cultural and educational tools needed in this country by our children.

If it is going to be the year of the child, as I heard, let us put our money where our mouth is and let us not tax those tools of education that are needed by the children in this country.

QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 327 will be answered today.

[Text]

STATE DINNER IN HONOUR OF NELSON MANDELA

Question No. 327—Mr. Kaplan:

1. With 1800 guests invited to the state dinner in Toronto on June 18, 1990 in honour of Nelson Mandela, why were no Toronto Liberal or New Democratic Members of Parliament invited and every Toronto Conservative Member invited and given tickets to be allocated to supporters?

2. Is this official event, paid for by Canadian taxpayers, an attempt to bolster the fortunes of the Conservative Party and, if so, will the Prime Minister so inform Mr. Mandela?

Mr. Leonard Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1. Twenty one Liberal and NDP Members of Parliament were invited to attend the official government dinner in honour of Nelson Mandela.

2. No. The dinner was held to honour Nelson Mandela, a leader who has dedicated his life to the cause of a free and democratic South Africa. The reception included Canadians from all walks of life; from Parliamentarians belonging to different political parties, to representatives of various ethnocultural and community groups to leaders of the academic, arts, religious, business, journalism, science, trade union, and local and provincial government community.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-44

The House resumed from Monday, October 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp:

That, in relation to Bill C-44, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage and, one sitting day to the consideration of the third reading stage of the bill; and

That, fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the day allotted to the report stage consideration and on the day allotted to the third reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean had four minutes left. Since he is not in the House, I will have to recognize the hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have been following this particular debate with great attention because, of course, it is an issue that very deeply affects Newfoundland and is of great interest to most people in Newfoundland.

Let us be kind. This debate has not been without its virtues. Like all debates, we have learned a few things. I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that you and I have learned the following: We have learned that the NDP has discovered economic viability.

The NDP, whose principal credo is that the state should give everybody a free ride, now spits out the term "government subsidy" like it is some kind of a new strain of malaria. It has discovered economic viability.

The NDP, which has made no secret of its belief that all businessmen and businesswomen should be taken out, drawn and quartered, now stumbles almost fluently over something called the bottom line. To say it differently, the president of the temperance society is keeping us still. I say to the NDP: you cannot talk out of both sides of your mouth all the time.

I see my good friend from Halton—Peel. He is recovering well from the pressure he was under to continue as chairman of the committee. Everybody was terribly upset. Tell them they will get over it. I have been telling them, hang in there, our fearless fighter from Halton—Peel has new causes to fight, he does not have time to be chairman of the piddly little committee of the House of Commons. I have been fighting for him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Could I have a little order please. The hon. member for Burin—St. George's has the floor. It is only 11.25 a.m.. Wait until about three or four o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. Simmons: My good friend, the Minister of Supply and Services, says talk about Hibernia. I am sorry, I say to him, if we were completely over his head that time. I was pointing out to him, to the House and to the public that the NDP, in attacking this very good bill, and the minister and I agree that it is a very good bill, the have your cake and eat it too NDP crowd suddenly discovered economic viability. They were suddenly beating their breasts for the poor big businesses out there which might not be able to make it all by themselves. They were suddenly making a brief that somehow we should not be dipping in to the public treasury, no matter how good the calls. They were suddenly doing an about-face. That is off the bill, I apologize to the minister and I will not say another word about it.

I was talking about the things we have learned so far in this debate, and this debate is far from over. I invite all of you to stick around because it is going to get better. Here is the second thing. It is not like my friend from B.C. to be nasty like that. He has had his nasty pills. Audrey got them all in a room, and told him to say things he does not believe in again. I have also learned that the bloc—the new heads on the blocks—

[Translation]

People who are heading towards the guillotine.

[English]

—the bloc has discovered Canada. They have discovered that they are fighting for Canada. Every one of them is Captain Canada.

Joey Smallwood, the former premier of Newfoundland, as premier arranged in 1966 to have a plaque put on the floor of the ocean where Hibernia is, claiming the oil for Newfoundland. All this nonsense about who did what to whom last week is about 24 years too late because Smallwood did that a long time before you were out of your cradle. Putting a plaque on the floor of the ocean claiming oil for Newfoundland was actually done. In 1966 a diver went down in do it. There is a plaque down there saying the oil is ours.

That says two things: one, that somebody had to go down and do it and, two, that Smallwood was aware as early as 1966 that there was oil there, 24 years before today. But I digress. The bloc has discovered Canada. It was Joey Smallwood who used to quote that line or two from the famous Methodist hymn as follows: "While the light holds forth to burn, the vilest sinner may return." In other words, for my friends who are behind me in many respects,—

[Translation]

As the prodigal son found out, it is never too late to go home.

[English]

As the prodigal son found out, it is never too late to come home. To say it one more way, where is home? It is Canada—that is home—as the bloc discovered last week when it finally put down a motion here, the only merit of which is that it recognizes something it tried to deny the existence of up until now.

• (1130)

They are fighting for Canada. They do not want more benefits in Quebec. No, no. Let the record show that it is not Quebec in this motion. They want them in Canada. They want them in British Columbia, Alberta, and Ontario. That is my idea of a true unselfish Canadian.

What they wouldn't do for the folks in Prince George, I say to the minister. His heart must be touched that this bunch of fearless fighters are out there fighting for people up in Bulkley Valley. It is exciting, isn't it? My wife comes from that valley. It will tickle the cockles of her heart when she knows these people are really just separatists in disguise. They were fighting for the Annapolis Valley all the while, as well as Bulkley Valley and the other valleys and hills in this great and beautiful country. The Ottawa Valley, God knows, needs some people fighting for it. To say it one more way as we are still talking about the bloc—

Mr. Lapierre: Do you support the amendment?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, that gentleman has actually spoken more since he has been back there than he did all the while he was down here with us. Did you notice that, Mr. Speaker? He has finally found his tongue. If he could only find his head—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: To say it one more way, the fearless fighters for Bulkley Valley, Annapolis, the Codroy Valley in Newfoundland, and all those other places—

Mr. Boudria: And the Ottawa Valley.

Mr. Simmons: The Ottawa Valley and the Bow Valley. I must not forget the Bow Valley near Calgary. To say it one more way for them, the arsonist has become chief of the fire brigade.

Now that we have dealt with the new kids, the new heads on the block, now that we have dealt with the "have your cake and eat it too" New Democratic Party, let us come to the question of closure. Closure is put in the rules for a very good reason. Its beauty is that it must be used sparingly, very rarely, only in the most extreme of circumstances.

I can understand the anger and the frustration of my good friend, the minister of energy, when he yields to the suggestion that maybe closure would be a weapon to be used here to try and beat down the closet Canadians who call themselves separatists. I understand that, but I want to say to the minister of energy that maybe there was another way. I say to him that if his problem is the new heads on the block, then that is a problem we can deal with very quickly in this House, because this House by its very nature is for people who believe in Canada. That is what it is all about.

I will vote for a motion any day at all that runs this crowd clean out of this place once and for good. I will go for that motion because they do not belong here. They do not belong here, Mr. Speaker. If he wants to get this bill—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. On debate, the hon. member for Richelieu has the floor.

Mr. Simmons: By leave, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent to hear the hon. member for Burin—St. George's?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think there is unanimous consent. Is the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca rising on debate?

Mr. Barrett: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca has the floor on debate.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to this debate on the basis of some comments by my good friend from Newfoundland and some comments about other members in this House.

My good friend speaks about the business aspects of this deal. He condemns my colleagues, suggesting that we would hang, draw, and quarter business persons who are involved in the great enterprises here in Canada.

An hon. member: Who said that?

Mr. Barrett: My dear friend is obviously one of those great corporate social workers who hands out welfare in the billions of dollars. If this deal is so good and this government is so business attuned, and if that group over there of handout artists wants to present itself as an alternative to the Canadian people as a government then it should take an equity position for the taxpayers of this country who are putting up the money for this operation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barrett: If you are such clever business people, then you know very well that when you hand out money for nothing you get nothing in return. Only the Liberals and Conservatives—and Lord knows where those guys are because they are all over the ball park—hand out money with no return whatsoever for the Canadian taxpayers who are footing the bill.

An hon. member: Shame on them.

Mr. Barrett: It is $2.7 billion, and they call it smart business to give it away. If you have any brains at all, any sense of social responsibility, you will say that the first profits from that operation come back to the people of Canada who put the money up.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barrett: I challenge any one of those oddballs over there who believes in this corporate welfare bum system to come to Newfoundland with me and we will debate it publicly. I believe the people of Newfoundland should have the right to say where the first profits should go. I believe the premier of Newfoundland has a right to suggest that if the Canadian taxpayers are putting up the money, there should be integrated in the indigenous economy of that island a complex of petrochemical industries involved with that resource. However, what are these yahoos doing?

Mr. Nystrom: Ross Reid.

Mr. Barrett: They are setting about by giving $2.7 billion of Canadian taxpayers' money to an oil company so that they can ship the oil to the United States and the Americans get the benefit of our subsidy to those international oil companies. Who owns the Government of Canada? It is the oil companies. They can suck up to this government and walk away with $2.7 billion without any obligation whatsoever to the taxpayers. The member from Newfoundland has the gall to come into this House and suggest that this is good business. It is dumb-bell business.

You find more ways of giving away money than any other government I ever heard of and that group over there wants to emulate them.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Barrett: If that money is to be shared by the people of Canada then let the job stay here in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barrett: We are not in business of raising taxes here in Canada to buy jobs in the United States. Do you think you are elected to run George Bush's economy? What kind of dumb-bell outfit are you anyway? You want to reduce the deficit by $2.7 billion, and you hand it over to the international oil companies. You embarrass me. You shame this country. You shame the unemployed people of the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on a point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, which one of us has the floor? Two of us are rising.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on a pint of order.

Mr. Boudria: I was going to get to that once my colleague sat down to give me the floor.

I am sure the member meant no disrespect, but when one refers to you in a condescending way in this House, assuming that "you" means the Speaker, that message is aimed that way. I am sure that my colleague did not mean any disrespect for the Speaker. Perhaps, then, he should address the government as the hon. members across or the government rather than you, because you should only be used in reference to the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Knowing the hon. member I was not offended, but anyway the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca has the floor.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barrett: I can call the government dumb-bells, can I not?

Some hon. members: Sure.

Mr. Barrett: Yes.

An hon. member: He called you a yahoo.

Mr. Barrett: No. If the shoe fits, Mr. Member, wear it. I cannot be responsible for that. I called the government dumb-bells. I called the Official Opposition yahoos. They both support giving away taxpayers' money. They are giving away taxpayers' money to the international oil companies. How do you want to describe that? As a generous Christmas present? As some kind of benevolent charity organization?

• (1140)

The native people of this country have had their lousy little budget cut for running newspapers. The women of this country cannot even get funding for battered women's services, but when the oil companies come begging they cough up $2.7 billion and they call it a good business deal. Mr. Speaker, how would you describe that? I describe it as dumb-bell.

What about the rest of the people of this country who are putting up the money? Mr. Speaker, do you think that this is the kind of thing that they can go and defend in their ridings by going back and saying: "Guess what we have done. We are going to pass the GST and we are going to use the money to give it to the oil companies. Aren't you all happy? Applaud the government for giving away money to the oil companies"? I can see it now. The Minister of Finance will say: "This is our first step toward reducing the deficit of the oil companies".

They are moving the oil to the United States. The jobs will be in the United States. The Canadian taxpayer will pay for it. The indigenous people of this country get nothing. The ordinary working people of this country get nothing. Newfoundland does not get an integrated economy. All that member could speak about was a plaque on the bottom of the floor saying this is what we got.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Labrador.

Mr. Rompkey: Just as a matter of interest and for the edification of the hon. member—perhaps other hon. members, but certainly this one—I would just like to tell him that the correct pronunciation of the island and therefore the province too is Newfoundland. It rhymes with understand, which probably now you do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca has one minute remaining.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I do not see that on the Order Paper. That is a spurious point of order. The member is attempting to interrupt my intelligent discourse that is embarrassing the government and the opposition.

The simple matter is that both the Liberals and the Conservatives are going to hand over $2.7 billion to the oil companies with no return whatsoever. Whether I speak in English or in French, whether people pay the taxes in English or in French, they are not paying their taxes to fatten the oil companies of this country.

What about some legislative action to ensure that the oil stays here in Canada, goes to Come-By-Chance in Newfoundland and that the Newfoundland Come-By-Chance refinery provides jobs for people in Newfoundland? They will not care whether the cheques come in French or English. They just want a paycheque. If they are going to hand the money out, hand it back to Canadians.

I want to just conclude my remarks—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You have just concluded.

It being 11.44 a.m., the two hours provided for the consideration of the motion now before the House, under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), have expired. Accordingly, under the terms of the standing order, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the motion. The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more that five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Minister, on a point of order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to inform the House that I was held up by traffic. I was unable to vote because I arrived late. However, if I had voted, I would have voted for the government, Mr. Speaker.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, June 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Valcourt that Bill C-74, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on a point of order.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the standing practice of the House has been that the opposition is consulted and apprised of the work called before the House of Commons for debate.

The Projected Order of Business today states that the item to be called after we had dealt with the time allocation motion would be Bill C-73. I just heard the clerk say Bill C-74, which is a totally different bill. I would like to have some explanation from the government as to why it changes these things without notice.

I know the Order Paper states: "subject to change without notice," but I just wondered if it really has gone out of its mind and is trying to play games with members of Parliament.

Mr. Andre: No, Mr. Speaker. As I have indicated in the House on a number of occasions, most recently last Thursday in answer to the usual question about House business, this institution works a lot better when we can solve and agree to the agenda and so on.

We did have an agenda. I laid it out last Thursday and intended to follow it. It was thrown off track by a motion of concurrence by the New Democrats on Friday which lost us a day, something we were led to believe would not happen and which came as a surprise. Of course, it was thrown off yesterday by a totally unnecessary double vote on first reading of a bill and then by an excessive number of petitions in order to delay and make it impossible to proceed.

I agree with the House leader of the Liberal Party that this institution does not function very well when there are surprises coming at each other from each side of the House.

We will be meeting this afternoon at a House leaders' meeting—our regular meeting. I am quite prepared to sit down, talk about an agenda and stick to it. If the hon. House leader of the Liberal Party would like to re-establish our practice, I look forward to doing that.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that we recognize what the government House leader has just said. That is, last week when the House leaders met, he laid out an agenda for the House of Commons.

I think we have to tell the government House leader that it is not he alone who decides what happens in the House of Commons. We have a number of political parties. We have a number of independents.

Some hon. members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think we should get on with debate. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that if the government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls wants to get on with the debate, but I will listen to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: We have to make one thing very clear, Mr. Speaker. With all due respect, if the government is going to punish the opposition for using the rights that opposition members have to oppose legislation, then that is a new ball game. If vengeance and retribution is what the government wants, it will get it.

The spirit of this House today is such that it is not to be told to think that the government House leader is going to take it out on the opposition because yesterday we used the rules of the House to oppose the introduction of a bill. We will continue to fight the privatization of Petro-Canada, whether he likes it or not.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier: Furthermore, I am going to tell the government House leader that this debate on Bill C-44 was started on June 16 last. We never heard about it since. He brought it forward today as a surprise to us, with no notice, nothing. He has done it before. The House leader is well known for his little tricks. We will be done with that, Mr. Speaker. We want to operate within the rules of this House and we do not want to be criticized for using those rules.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Andre: The hon. House leader of the Liberal Party has said that they are free to use the rules of the House. Of course, they are. But he expressed outrage at our use of the rules of the House as somehow being unfair.

The New Democratic Party House leader indicated that the rules of the game were that we were to lay out the schedule for the week, but that they had no obligation to indicate to us their intention to use a day of government time last Friday, as they did.

The House leader of the Liberal Party said he is opposed to the PetroCan privatization bill and that is fine, but the deliberate use of votes, delays—

Mr. Gauthier: Those are the rules of the House.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member says it is the rules of the House.

The deliberate use of votes, petitions and so on to prevent the schedule to proceed in an orderly fashion is regrettable because it makes life uncomfortable for both sides of the House. I do not see how the hon. House leader can get so outraged at our use of the rules of the House, while claiming he can do the same.

I again repeat that we serve the people of Canada better when we talk about these things. Every other legislative body in the world works with some form of usual channels. That has been our regular Tuesday afternoon meeting. We can meet and discuss the agenda for the week and operate however this House wants to operate. We do not have control of the House. We are forced to use the rules. All I ask is that the rules be used in an appropriate manner to serve the needs of Canadian public.

• (1220)

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the remarks by the government House Leader are—I would not use the word intentionally because that would be a distortion of the facts—indeed somewhat misleading, in this sense: a motion for concurrence was put forward by the third party. I did not hear any objections coming from members opposite, particularly the House leader for the government or, indeed, his parliamentary secretary or, indeed, any minister of the Crown opposite. There was not a word of opposition. There was not one scintilla of a sentence put forward to express their disappointment or their disapproval as to what my colleagues in the New Democratic Party had done.

Second, with regard to the two votes which were exercised by the Official Opposition in terms of the introduction and first reading of the Petro-Canada bill, members should know, both on this side as well as members opposite, that there has not been a practice in this House that on every bill which is introduced are there votes at first reading stage, but this particular bill is of such significance and importance to our party and to the people we represent that we wanted to register a very sincere and a very forceful protest with regard to the actions of the government. Mr. Speaker, if that is in any way contrary to the rules, I would hope that in your adjudication you would bring that to my attention and to the attention of my colleagues. But let it be understood, Mr. Speaker, that the government, by the incompetence of the House leader of the governing party, will now run the risk that on each and every bill, on each and every motion, and on everything that it wishes to do, we will have now to resort to numerous tactics in order to get the government back to the bargaining table to deal fairly and within the traditions of this House.

An hon. member: Parliamentary war.

Mr. Dingwall: I find it totally unacceptable that the government House Leader would demonstrate those kinds of practices, as he has done here today.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Dingwall: Shame.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, in an effort to conduct the business of the House as effectively and as efficiently as possible, consultations took place earlier today and, based on the Projected Order of Business, the government indicated that we would be debating Bill C-73, once we had concluded the business regarding Bill C-44. That is what the government said and that is what the Order Paper suggests will be the order and we assume that the government can be taken at its word, that when it says that that is what is going to happen, that that is going to be. Mr. Speaker, from now on, are we to conclude that what the government tells us earlier in the day will be the business may not be the business and that what the Order Paper tells us will be the business of the day, may not be the business? In other words, this is a government that cannot be trusted.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the point of order very long, but I do think it is necessary to make a couple of comments.

As one of those individuals who is involved daily and, in fact, hourly in the negotiations that go on to make this House run smoothly, I think all hon. members will know that my personal philosophy is that when members sit down to talk about their various agendas and concerns we somehow, together, negotiate a process that is acceptable to all of us in the House. That is the best way for the House of Commons to run. It is the best, in terms of ministers' use of their time and members' use of their time and, as a result of that, I think it is a better tone for the House.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, what has been happening, over the last few days is that we have laid out what we had proposed as an agenda. We had discussed it with the Opposition. It was not set down as an edict from on high. In fact, I can personally say that on Friday I was very much left with the impression that we would proceed with the legislation that was put forward and discussed at the House leaders' meetings as well as discussions I had had with members privately. I had the same impression for yesterday. The House Leader has made a point, and he has made it on more than one occasion, that any time people are going to play a game, it is necessary that they all play by the same rules. Unfortunately in the analogy that he has used, what so often has been happening—it certainly has been demonstrated in the last couple of days—is that we as a government are supposed to play all our cards. Then the opposition will pick and choose which cards it wishes to play.

At best, I am a very amateur poker player. But I can tell you that any time I play poker I keep my cards to myself, unless there is some sort of arrangement made with the others. In fact, what happened is that yesterday and the day before, on Friday, essentially there were discussions going on, and the understanding changed. It was within the rules. I do not object to that. I have no problems with that.

If the members wish to play by the rules, we can play by the rules. What has happened here today is that the government has operated perfectly within the rules, but we have also tried to make a point. I think we have effectively made that point.

The point is this. We are quite happy to sit down any time, discuss, negotiate and co-operate. I think we have developed a track record along those lines. Certainly, I have.

The point is this. We are prepared to do that. However, if it is only one side that is going to constantly be faced with the situation where it is to play by a certain set of rules and the others are not, then we want to announce very clearly that that kind of game will not work for any of us.

What we are best to do is to sit down, discuss, negotiate, and we have done it. The hon. members say: "Forget it". I wanted to make the offer. It is there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair is the servant of the House. We would be more than delighted to help the cause here.

We have now placed Bill C-74 on the table for debate. Therefore, I am calling for debate on Bill C-74. I am calling the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls on debate.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, this bill which is presently before the House for second reading, debate in principle, is brought here by the Government of Canada because we have a serious problem in the fishery. That is why the bill is here.

This is a bill to impose penalties, mainly on Canadians, to send them to jail, to seize their property if they violate fishing regulations by the Government of Canada. That is what the purpose of the legislation is before us today.

We have a problem in the fishery and the Government of Canada is saying: "We are going to crack down on people who do not follow the rules in Canada". That would be fine and dandy. I would not have any objection to that at all if the Government of Canada were not bending over backward and giving away the entire fishing resource to foreign nations inside our 200 mile zone.

The parliamentary secretary is now saying: "Shame." Right now as I speak, there are 14 Canadians aboard 14 factory freezer trawlers belonging to the Soviet Union within our 200 mile zone off the northeast coast of Newfoundland in my riding.

There are three Japanese factory freezer trawlers with three Canadians aboard their vessels fishing within Canada's 200 mile zone. These 17 factory freezer trawlers that are floating fish plants are not little vessels 100 feet long. These are gigantic 300, 400 and 500 footers.

These are floating factories. That is why they are called factory freezer trawlers.

I mentioned the Canadians aboard these vessels because if it were not for those Canadians, I would not know that those foreign vessels were there. There was no public disclosure by the Government of Canada that 14 Soviet factory freezer trawlers would be fishing today in zone 3K and that there are three Japanese factory freezer trawlers fishing in zone 3K just off the coast, with Canadian fishermen looking out at these gigantic vessels. They can see them from their front door.

• (1230)

The Government of Canada brings legislation into the House of Commons. I do not suppose we can disagree with it. If a Newfoundlander or a Nova Scotian or a Quebecer or a New Brunswicker or a Prince Edward Islander or a British Columbian went out and violated an agreement—say he took something out of the water that he was not supposed to take—if he had a net out for codfish and a salmon came along and got caught in the leaders, which usually happens, and he takes that salmon aboard his vessel, if he does not throw it overboard dead, if he keeps it, then he can be charged under these new regulations with stiffer fines.

Fishermen are beginning to wise up to these licences that are granted by the Government of Canada. These foreign nations walk into an office in Halifax, Nova Scotia or St. John's, Newfoundland and over the counter they are given a licence for their vessel. They do not pay for it on the spot like Canadians do. They are billed later in the mail. They go out there in those massive vessels and destroy the fishing resource of Canada, using gear and machinery that is foreign to us because we have never got to the stage where we would have a gigantic vessel with gigantic gear all operated by computers in a control room, just like something out of outer space, this incredible machinery operated by these foreign nations. They go out and take a large net. By their computer on a screen there in front of them, they can tell if that is a capelin or a codfish or a salmon. They can tell all the different types of fish by their computer in front of them and where then to put the big, gigantic net out. There are rollers on the bottom. When it hits a piece of rock on the bottom of the ocean, why that automatically goes up above that rock and goes on. It is an incredible technology. We do not have it.

There is only one factory freezer trawler or maybe there are two in Canada today owned by Canadians that I know of. I believe there are two licences, because we believe as Canadians that that is not the way to go. We believe, which is correct, that the best fish you can take out of the ocean is a fish that is caught by a fishermen in a small boat. He takes the fish over the side, bleeds it, and brings into shore for processing. That is the best fish you can take out of the ocean, Mr. Speaker. That is the best fish you can eat.

I would not eat, as a Newfoundlander, or somebody who knows something about the fishery, some of the fish that come out of these gigantic vessels. They are taken in, squashed altogether, almost like mush, cut and split by machines, frozen into big blocks, thawed out again, put into packages and sold to you. When compared to a codfish, or any type of fish that is caught by a fisherman in a small boat, with hook and line over the side or bait, those are the two best fish. A trap is when you have the fish alive and in an enclosed area; not gill-nets because gill-nets drown fish.

The point is that we have up to about 70 or 80 factory freezer trawler licences issued to foreign nations so far this year to fish as the Soviets are fishing capelin in 3-K. The Japanese are fishing redfish and ocean perch. They fish what we call turbot, which is a flatfish. It is all licensed by Canada now, all handed out over the counter by the Government of Canada. They fish turbot, which is a big flatfish. The only difference between a turbot and a different flatfish is that his eye is further up around his forehead. In other words, the normal flatfish has both eyes and the top of the turbot has one more or less in the centre, just so that you will understand the difference between a turbot and a normal flounder, Mr. Speaker.

Here they are getting licences for this fish. Why? The Government of Canada says that it is an underutilized species. If they were to say that on a wharf in eastern Canada, they would be thrown over the wharf. Fishermen rely on capelin. We had new regulations this year that limited entry into that fishery and that saw full-time fishermen thrown out of the fishery because the Government of Canada brought in new regulations that there must now be three crew members and no new entrants.

They had a quota in 3K less than the Soviet Union has today in 3K licensed by the Government of Canada. The Government of Canada says but, you know, the Soviets are catching fish that are not spawning. Think that logic through, Mr. Speaker. What is the difference between catching a fish before it spawns, after it spawns, or while it spawns? If you catch the fish it cannot spawn, can it. Then the logic is used that turbot is underutilized. The entire what we call longliner fleet off the east coast of Canada has lived on turbot for years and decades. That is all they fish. Then the Government of Canada says: "Well, these big vessels are out in deep water". I know of a vessel in my riding that fishes 600 fathoms. You might be able to find deeper oceans around Europe somewhere, but we have always fished 400–450 fathoms with gill–nets for turbot. The Government of Canada does not know that. This year, for the first time in our history, we had allocations given to Bulgaria to fish mackerel in what is called 4VN which is around Cape Breton Island.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member from Cape Breton who just said "hear, hear" should listen to this one very carefully because it was not a good decision by the Government of Canada. Mackerel spawn in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, around the coast of New Brunswick and the south shore of Quebec. For the first time we allowed foreign nations to come in with factory freezer trawler licences using these gigantic vessels to catch mackerel.

Canadians want to sell mackerel. Why should we bring in Bulgaria to catch mackerel? The Government of Canada says: "Well, we have come up with a deal. They can catch 5,000 tonnes of mackerel if they bring the next 1,000 tonnes ashore to be processed. Go out and catch another 5,000 tonnes and keep it for yourself. The next thousand tonnes, you bring ashore to be processed".

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Baker: Today there are four Canadian companies including Fisheries Products International that have hired the Norwegians. There are six Norwegian factory freezer trawlers today on the east coast of Canada catching fish, even in 2J. The term 2J probably does not mean much to you, Mr. Speaker, but 2J is a zone on the southern Labrador coast that goes out for 200 miles. The other Canadian companies have been given permission now to fish their quota, to fish their Canadian quota, utilizing foreign vessels for the first time in our history this year. It was granted the other day, again without a public announcement, without public disclosure to the people of Canada, but we know it because there are observers aboard. These six Norwegian vessels will go up and catch turbot that is up in O, right at the top, and then 2G and 2H in the Hamilton Banks spawning area, and then down into 2J in northern Newfoundland.

• (1240)

We had all these problems of the northern cod, all of the fish plants that closed in eastern Canada because the northern cod stock was in serious trouble. For every single licence granted to those foreign nations today to catch turbot they have an approved by–catch of 10 and 15 per cent of cod.

That means they will put down the gigantic net to catch this flatfish. As you know, codfish operate in the same area as the flatfish, just above the bottom. If you were out jigging a codfish you would put the jigger right down to the bottom and then you would haul it in three lines. That is how far they operate above the bottom of the ocean.

They put out the net to catch the turbot and they bring it in. I have seen the licences. I have copies of the licences. I am not supposed to have them but, my goodness, when you have a government issuing licences like that they are sure to get to me eventually or to some member of the House. One Soviet licence I was looking at the other day had a 30 per cent by–catch approved under it.

In other words, for all of that underutilized species that is granted to those foreign nations they can catch 10 per cent or 15 per cent cod in with their catch. When the observer comes ashore in two weeks and says "they are catching 30 per cent by–catch; it is over the by–catch level," the government moves them two or three miles to the north, south, east, or west, and they keep doing it again.

The totality of the problem is this. We have more foreign vessels fishing inside Canada's 200–mile zone under what we call the offshore quota than we have Canadian vessels licensed to fish inside Canada's 200-mile zone for what we call the offshore quota. Let me run that by you again, Mr. Speaker. We have more foreign factory freezer trawler licences issued in Canadian waters than we have of all the licences for all the ships that take part in the offshore quota in Canada.

These were the very vessels that served Canso, Nova Scotia and the south coast of Newfoundland. This was the reason for the closure of these fish plants. There was a cut in the offshore quota.

Mr. Speaker, if you look at it today and you see that there are more foreign licenses than Canadian licenses inside the 200-mile zone, then you ask: "Why do we have a 200-mile zone?" There is no such thing as foreign overfishing. It is just foreign fishing. They are not overfishing; they are fishing their quotas given by the Government of Canada.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Baker: How did they get the quotas? Some of them, I mentioned at the beginning, were not disclosed publicly, not announced under the groundfish plan like the 14 Russian factory freezer trawlers today that we can see off the coast of Newfoundland. I will tell you how they got them, Mr. Speaker. They got them through deals that were made. The Government of Canada told me the other day that it had given the Soviet Union 3,000 tonnes of cod in 3N and 3O. It has asked the Soviet Union to give it back 2,000 tonnes, and in exchange it would give 20,000 tonnes of capelin in 3K and another 20,000 of something else off Nova Scotia with an approved buy catch of 10 per cent.

In other words, the Government of Canada one day gives the Soviet Union a quota of 3,000 tonnes and the next day turns around and says it will give 50,000 tonnes of something else if the Soviet Union will give us back 2,000 of the 3,000. This was not announced publicly.

Nobody would know anything about this situation today if it were not for people who are working in this country who have been looking at this situation too long and saying: "We're not going to put up with it. This is ridiculous". We would not know today that Canadian companies—perhaps it has never been mentioned publicly but I am going to do it—including Fisheries Products International have been given permission to utilize foreign vessels to catch their quotas of turbot. This is the catch that we live on on the east coast of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I see you indicating that I have only a minute left.

There is an expression in the rural areas of Newfoundland that states that right is right and wrong is no man's right. It is wrong for the Government of Canada to issue all of these licences today for foreign nations to fish inside of our 200-mile zone, then turn around in this Chamber and introduce legislation of increased penalties for Canadians because they are catching too many fish over their quota. That is wrong. Right is right and wrong is no man's right.

The Government of Canada has to face the facts if it wants to cure the fishing problems in this nation today. It will have to cancel all foreign licences within our 200-mile zone. If it does not, there will not be a fish left in the ocean. If it does, as the government decided the other day, allow Canadian companies to hire foreign vessels to catch their quotas, then we will not have a fisherman left in this country before long.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I only have ten minutes to comment on a number of the points my fellow Newfoundlander made. He obviously shares the concern of the government over the fishery. As usual, we have had a huge array of pieces of information, pieces of fact, pieces of observation, woven together to create a picture, but the problem we face is that a lot of the very critical information, unfortunately did not make it on to the floor of the House.

I wish to address a couple of things very quickly, if I may. First, the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act provides for the same level, or in some cases higher levels, of fines for offences by foreign fishing vessels against the Canadian fishery. That act is already in place. We have substantially increased our surveillance. We spent a fortune increasing our surveillance. We have observer coverage and it will be increased. All foreign vessels carry observers so there is no question that vessels not carrying a Canadian flag who break the law stand a very good chance of being caught.

What my hon. friend talked about is the number of foreign vessels fishing inside Canadian waters. It is important to remember when my friend asks: "where did we get the 200-mile limit? Why have it?" that this country under the former Liberal government decided it was important that we have a 200–mile limit. It was right. That economic zone is designed to protect the resources of the coastal country, but it only happens by consensus, and the basis of that consensus is that the resources not utilized are to be made available to other countries. If we don't or won't or can't catch the fish that is out there, it is incumbent upon us as our part of the deal to provide it to other countries. So when my friend talks about Norwegian vessels fishing turbot, he is absolutely right. It is important to recognize that that turbot is caught, as the hon. member has said, for instance, in 2GH.

The quota for Canadians in 1989 was 11,000 tonnes. Canadians caught 18 tonnes. Therefore, we are making it available to another country to catch that quota for us and we can put it through, as is the case in many of these instances, into Canadian fish plants. In this way, Canadian fish plant workers will have a job. Otherwise they would not be working, because as is clear by some of these quota numbers, the fishery is very tenuous. We do not have the equipment or are not willing to make the investment until we know more about it.

The hon. member talks about cod out of zone O. I stand to be corrected, but no cod was taken in some of those zones during the last three or four years despite a humongous quota. If it is fish that can be made available to Canadian fishermen, it will be. But if we can make a deal so that Canadian quotas can be caught by vessels that we do not have, and landed in Canadian plants, I say do it. The plant workers that I know would like to work. We do not want to make the fish available to others. It should be here for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, surely I have a couple of minutes?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are a couple of other questioners too. If the hon. member would put a question, I would appreciate it. If there is time, I will come back for a supplementary. Would the hon. member like to put the question?

Mr. Reid: I am really here, Mr. Speaker, to make a comment. I know that my hon. friend will respond, he always does.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, Canadians are not allowed to fish inside the 200–mile zone of any other country in the world. We are not allowed to send our vessels to the coast of the Soviet Union. They have quotas inside of our zone. We do not have any inside theirs. We are not allowed. We would be arrested if we went inside any zone of any other country in the world.

The hon. member talks about having fish in a zone that is not caught. First of all, we have to realize that the scientists have not been very accurate in what stocks are where. Second, fish do not respect lines. They swim. They do not swim along the ocean and all of a sudden come to a line that says, "2G", then back up, turn around and say, "I cannot go across that line. Go down here and meet a line that says 2J". They then turn around and say, "I am boxed into this zone". That is what the Government of Canada is saying. There are fish that are boxed into this zone. They are not going to move from that zone.

We have fished in Canada in every zone that there is. There is a great population of fishermen that go up to these zones in northern Labrador and spend the summers there with their entire families; mothers, fathers, grandmothers, grandfathers and little children. They form communities for the entire summer along the coast of Labrador, but they come from Newfoundland. That is where they fish. The turbot stock off the coast of Labrador is the same stock as is off the coast of Newfoundland. There is only one stock of turbot on the entire east coast of Canada.

You cannot say: "It can be given away up there because nobody is fishing with big boats". So it can be given away.

That same fish moves. No other country in the world says: "We have fish that Canadians can fish if they want to." Yet we welcome foreign fishing vessels with open arms. We bend over backwards to all these nations, including France by the way. We bend over backwards, and we allow them to come in and to do with our fishery what they did with theirs, that is, destroy it.

They go on the spawning grounds with those big nets. As you know, Mr. Speaker, you should not disturb a fish during a spawning period. They come in and take the food of the codfish, salmon and everything else. Capelin is what the fish eat.

If you want to catch a lobster, you have to put fish in a lobster pack. It is one thing living off something else. When you allow those massive ships in from all those nations approved by the Government of Canada, they disturb the entire ocean floor. They are destroying the fishery of Canada.

The Government of Canada should be ashamed of itself for issuing these licences this year.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief because we only have a few minutes left.

The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls is always very entertaining. He has so many moves, I wonder if we should not dip him in batter and put him in the frying pan. He flounders and flits and flots around.

Certainly he represents the views of his riding well. I appreciate all the comments he has made, and his learned discussions to this House about the concerns and problems with the fisheries resource on the east coast.

My question to the hon. member relates specifically to Bill C-74, which we are debating this afternoon. The announcement by the government when it released the legislation talks about some of the proposed amendments.

Among them, the amendments are such to "provide greater deterrence for fishing violation, fish habitat offences and to strengthen the effectiveness of fishery management, including the collection of accurate fishing statistics."

Let us accept at face value that these words are true. How do you ensure that a government, like the members opposite, will actually implement legislation and see that the laws to protect fish habitat are followed? How do we guarantee that, when we know the record of the government opposite is far less than we would expect from a government. We demand much more.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member has a very good point, especially when you consider inland fisheries, the Guardian program and so on.

The point that we would make is this. It is fine to increase penalties if everybody is treated the same. If a Canadian goes out and catches more fish of a particular species in his incidental catch than he is allowed, under this legislation he really gets jumped on. The penalties are increased.

However, if a vessel from a foreign nation goes out and does it, it is not penalized at all. It is just moved the next week. In other words, the Government of Canada says: "We will allow you to keep your by-catch which is more than that permitted under your licence because we have an observer aboard."

But a Canadian vessel that comes into port with some pollack that he was not licensed to catch as a by-catch, you throw him in jail. Because there was an observer aboard the foreign vessel and can keep an eye on things, the foreigners are excused.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, in the riding of Restigouche—Chaleur, the unemployment rate is 15.7 per cent, almost twice the national average. The government's proposed reform to the unemployment insurance system will make life a lot more difficult for the unemployed in my riding.

Unfortunately, the government refused to introduce the variable entrance requirement, which would have brought the number of weeks required to obtain benefits down from 14 to 10.

The Conservative Government should not be affraid to give Canada's workers a decent unemployment insurance system.

I urge the government to completely revise its short-sighted reforms. And while we are waiting for the final verdict on Bill C-21, the government should table another bill to reinstate the variable entrance requirement as all previous governments have done.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, now that the warriors at Oka have laid down their arms, I would like to pay tribute to the Canadian Armed Forces for their role in the restoration of law and order at Oka.

The Armed Forces were called in under the National Defence Act to assist the civil power when the situation became impossible for them to control. I commend the soldiers for their professionalism, discipline, and self-control in the face of extraordinary provocation, exemplified by Private Patrick Cloutier—the young soldier who stood his ground coolly in the face-to-face challenge.

I also commend the government for remaining firm on the principle of the rule of law and its equal application to everyone in Canada and that one does not negotiate any issue at the point of a gun.

Now that the guns are down, I urge the government to do all in its power to do justice to our first citizens through the many concrete and comprehensive proposals mentioned in the Prime Minister's speech in the House on Tuesday, September 25.

TORIES

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, we all know sometimes that politics makes strange bedfellows and we know that applies to the Liberals and Conservatives. But in politics, it is important to define one's views and to choose one's political friends carefully.

What is the definition of a Tory according to Websters?

> tory—(a hunter, applied to bogtrotters and outlaws.) 1. A name originally given to one of the numerous mosstroopers who, during the civil wars of the sixteenth century plundered people—

—they plundered people, Mr. Speaker—

> —in the bogs of Ireland, being in arms nominally for the royal cause, but really to afford a colourable pretext for their own lawless proceedings.

GOVERNMENT OF ONTARIO

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, for the past six years the Government of Canada has been making appointments to boards and commissioners and whenever those appointees were either Liberals or New Democrats, they were met with deafening silence from the opposition benches. But let one Tory be appointed and we could count on the member for Kamloops to shout: "Bagmen, flacks, hacks." He did it so often that it could be counted on it as being an established principle of the opposition parties.

Now we have a brand, spanking new government in the province of Ontario. I would assume that it will adopt the principle which the member for Kamloops has established so clearly in the House. There will be not one NDP worker who has worked so hard for the establishment of an NDP regime in the province of Ontario, not one of them, will want to line up for an appointment. It will be only Liberals and Conservatives who will now qualify for appointments there, and if it does by mistake appoint a New Democrat, then I know the member for Kamloops is going to get up and talk about the hacks, flacks and bagmen in the province of Ontario.

THE LATE DANIEL MACDONALD

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to remember the passing of a dear friend and former member of the House, the Honourable Daniel "Dan" MacDonald.

Dan was a distinguished war veteran who lost both an arm and a leg in his service to Canada during the Second World War. But this did not slow him down. After the war he got married and started a successful farm.

In 1972 Dan was elected member of Parliament for Cardigan and was sworn in as Minister of Veterans Affairs. In this department Dan served with great distinction. As Minister of Veterans Affairs, Dan gave the department a human face, a face of compassion and understanding.

Daniel "Dan" MacDonald died on September 30, 1980. His service to his family and country was unyielding. As member of Parliament for Cardigan today I often hear people speak fondly of Dan.

To his wife, Pauline, and his seven children, I say that his example of service is one that is an inspiration to many. We will always remember him.

BILL C-43

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice has stated that the new abortion legislation will not affect the relationship between a woman and her doctor.

Yesterday we learned that 200 doctors will no longer perform abortions in Canada once Bill C-43 imposes criminal sanctions on them. Today we find that Ontario doctors are trying to protect themselves by requiring a woman to sign, not only a normal medical consent, but also medical files confirming that she has considered all alternatives.

Women will have to endure forced life-style counselling.

Given these new impediments to choice, the Minister of Justice can no longer pretend that Bill C-43 does not restrict a woman's right to reproductive choice. We again call upon the minister to abandon a restrictive and unworkable abortion bill.

UNITY

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, today marks an historic event in the history of Europe and of the world—the reunification of Germany. In a sense, it marks the final end of World War II. We must put the past in the past but without forgetting.

It is with cautious optimism that one notes that this third unification of Germany has not been greeted with the same sense of national euphoria as on previous occasions.

This can also be a time for Canadians to reflect on the state of unity in this country, and to ask the simple question: What progress are we making toward Canadian unity? Members of the government might ask: What role am I playing toward the development of unity among Canadians? Members opposite might ask how their approach to national issues contributes to national understanding and unity among Canadians. And members of the national media, especially the electronic media, should ask themselves if their approach to covering issues and informing Canadians is intended to foster unity or disunity in Canada, to create understanding or to confuse? Do they wish to contribute to bringing Canadians closer together, or to driving them apart.

We wish the German people well with their unification, but we must also think of our own country, Canada, and its need for unity.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, October 1 to 7 is National Family Week. This year's theme, "Sharing Family Traditions", is meant to reflect our multicultural identity as a nation and to encourage greater appreciation of our cultural differences as a people.

That the week commenced following the end of the United Nations World Summit for Children adds special meaning to this year's celebration since children are the corner-stone of any family.

Hence, I welcome the creation of a national children's bureau to help co-ordinate all federal policies dealing with children and ensure the need to respect children's special needs is recognized at all times.

As we express our feelings to our families, I remind the government that it abandoned its promise to double the number of day care spaces shortly before the 1988 election and abandoned its promise to create those spaces shortly after that election. I further remind the government that it promised nearly a year ago that a new child care program would be "in place, not promised, not progressing through Parliament, but in place" before the next election.

Since the government has deemed it timely now to create a children's bureau, I now challenge the government to deem it timely to introduce at once the long-awaited day care program so urgently needed by our children today.

As we celebrate this year's family week, let us remember that children continue to grow and they with their parents cry out for the urgent attention of the government to create now a national day care program.

THE SENATE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the conflict between the House of Commons and the Senate is confusing and offensive to my constituents and probably all Canadians.

What they should realize is that this debate is not over the concern or quality of the bills held up, such as the UI changes in Bill C-21, the tax back on large corporations in Bill C-28, or, of course, the GST in Bill C-62. No, it is purely politics.

In the late 1970s, the Liberal government twice introduced changes to the UI system and the Liberal Senate passed them in one day. The Conservative changes have now been held up in the Senate for 205 days with no sign of relief.

In the four years between 1980 to 1984, one bill each in two years was held up in the Senate for more than a month. However, in the last two years, 23 bills have taken longer than a month—some more than 200 days and again with no relief in sight.

Make no mistake about this, we are seeing politics at a very low level and it is no wonder Canadians are disillusioned about their politicians.

THE LATE ALICE PARIZEAU

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House today to the passing away of a great Quebecer, Alice Parizeau.

Mrs. Parizeau was 60 when she died, leaving behind an impressive literary legacy; works of fiction; scientific writings to help the world's children, who certainly need help, as we were reminded at the First World Summit for Children; and writings that reflect a commitment to the aspirations of the people of Quebec and also to her native Poland where she worked in the underground movement and was a prisoner in a Nazi concentration camp until her release in 1945.

Alice Parizeau was always actively involved in the Comité d'aide à la Pologne to help her compatriots.

The Polish community, in recognition of the work done by this great Quebecer, will be represented at her funeral tomorrow by the President of the Canadian Polish Congress, Mr. George Rawiez.

Quebec mourns a great lady, a great writer and a great Quebecer. A brilliant exponent of modern Quebec, both in her literary work and her commitment, she is a symbol of todays openness, energy and confidence.

To those in the House who would like to join us in expressing their sympathy, we suggest making a contribution to the Borowa Wies Fund.

Borowa Wies is a small Polish community near Katowice, where a rehabilitation centre is being built for about 100 handicapped children and young people who will learn all about working on a farm.

It will come as no surprise that Alice Parizeau wanted to further the cause of Poland, even after her death.

THE SENATE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): On June 4 last, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York Centre said in the House that "nowhere is there more dissatisfaction than there is with the place of the Senate in the Constitution of Canada".

He went on to say: "I do not like to admit it but the Liberals were defeated in the last election. Our basic principle is democracy. We have to accept the will of the people. It is not for the Senate, although controlled by a majority of Liberal members, to contradict the result of the last election".

Mr. Speaker, why does he not explain that to his leader and to the democracy-gashing senators?

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, the lack of affordable housing in the country has forced over 600,000 households to spend more than 50 per cent of their income to pay for shelter. The government's refusal to promote the construction of affordable housing amounts to 1.4 million Canadians living in inadequate housing, more than 566,000 of whom are children.

Over a half a million Canadian children are spending their childhood in inadequate housing and forced to stand in line at the food bank because the rent used up most of their families' incomes.

The United Nations met in New York on September 29 and 30 for the World Summit for Children to discuss the welfare of children around the world.

Canadians must have compassion for all children, but we must never forget the children growing up in poverty and desperation in our country. The government, as its first order of business, must commit itself to adequate and affordable housing, right now.

THE LATE DR. NGUYEN NGOC HUY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, with much sadness, I would report the passing of the much loved Dr. Nguyen Ngoc Huy in July in Paris. Over half a century, he became a giant among those in the world seeking an independent and democratic Vietnam, so much so that he earned the title, "the Gandhi of Vietnam".

He founded that country's New Nationalist Party in 1965 and the Nationalist Progressive Movement in 1969 whose goals were fundamental human rights and a more liberal national policy. He was a member of the South Vietnamese delegation to the Paris peace talks.

Since the fall of Vietnam, Dr. Huy has worked at the Harvard Law School on the legal history of Vietnam and China. He was an honorary member of the International Committee for a Free Vietnam, a scholar, a scientist, a speaker of simple and easy-going style, and a prolific writer with many short essays, books and poetry.

His death leaves behind him several unfinished projects, among them, "a free and prosperous Vietnam". No one has worked longer or more diligently in the cause than he. He will be greatly missed.

BILL C-21

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this is National Family Week, a time when new mothers and, for the first time, new fathers in Canada should be enjoying the benefits of the new unemployment insurance legislation. This bill would allow for up to 30 weeks, during which both mothers and fathers could participate in the nurturing of their newborn children. This progressive bill clearly supports our nation's families.

The unaccountable Liberal members of the Senate are blocking this much needed family legislation. The irresponsible, uncaring actions of these Liberal senators are also preventing thousands of families in areas of extreme unemployment from receiving much needed unemployment benefits.

In the House we are celebrating the week of the family. Perhaps members opposite can implore their leaders in the other place to join us and allow this legislation which supports families to pass.

LEADER OF THE LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal leader in absentia seems to have a serious credibility problem. Some would even say a credibility gap. It all started when Jean Chrétien's advice to Canadians after the failed Meech Lake Accord was to take the summer off and, just like the Prime Minister, he did. He was nowhere to be found when events at Oka and the Persian Gulf heated up. When he finally surfaced and was asked about the constitutional implications of swamping the Senate, his response was a mind-boggling "I am not a lawyer". His former clients at the law firm of Lang, Michener, Lawrence and Shaw will be surprised with this news.

Interviewed last week about his absence, Chrétien stated that he had toured Canada three times in the last two months and, if the third time you go to Flin Flon, Manitoba, it is no longer fun.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal leader has not been to Flin Flon three times in the last few months. According to Flin Flon residents, he has not been to Flin Flon three times in his life. And he was not there once this summer.

Not only does Flin Flon deserve an apology but the Liberal leader must start telling the truth. Can Canadians ever expect open and honest leadership from a politician who forgets his own profession—

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, Statistics Canada reported that the composite leading indicator, a measure of how the economy is expected to perform, is down for the sixth month in a row. In releasing this information, Statistics Canada said: "In the past, six straight declines have always been accompanied by a recession in the economy."

I ask the Prime Minister if he and his government agree with their own statistical agency which is indicating a recession and will he admit that this recession is a direct result of his government's own misguided economic policies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Leader of the Opposition is taking a very short time frame when he asks the question.

He neglects to say that over a period of seven and a half years we have had extremely strong growth in the economy and that led to an overheating in the economy. It is a natural phenomena that when the economy overheats, it has to slow down. We are in that period of slowdown right now because it is important to get the inflationary pressures out of the system so we can get interest rates down, get ourselves back on to a track of non-inflationary growth so we can have another long session of strong growth as we have had during the course of most of the 1980s.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is trying to avoid and evade accepting the facts that his and his government's and economic policies are creating a recession in this country.

I would like to ask, particularly, why the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are trying at this point in time, while we are in a recessionary period by his own admission, to force on Canadians the horrendous goods and services tax, a tax which Canadians say is the wrong tax at the wrong time, especially now if we are entering into, if we are not already in, a serious recession.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me draw the attention of members opposite that 13 years ago Jean Chrétien said this: "It worries me that serious structural problems have been identified in the manufacturers' sales tax. These problem areas in the law cannot be tolerated indefinitely". In fact, they were not tolerated indefinitely because in 1981 Allan MacEachen, then Minister of Finance said: "The federal sales tax which is imposed at the manufacturers' level suffers from a number of structural defects" and then went on to show how it hurts exporters and favours importers.

Mr. Speaker, members opposite say they know that. If they know that, why are they resisting a change from a sales tax which needs to be changed to one which will address those problems? The only answer that I can give is that it is pure partisan politics, that when they are in government, they—

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is typical of the twisted logic of this government that it wants to replace a tax with problems with a tax with even more problems with a tax that is even worse.

[Translation]

Why does the minister refuse to face reality as interest rates soar, as our over-valued dollar chokes our exporters, as the bankruptcy rate gains momentum, and as the statisticians of his own government now point to a recession? Why is the government standing still instead of stopping the recession which threatens our economy, and why is the government bent on imposing its GST which, given the prevailing context, will make the situation even worse and cause untold harm to the Canadian economy?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition talked about twisted logic. Let me ask him to consider the twist in this logic. Senator MacEachen in 1985 said: "I think if we did amend the bill in any serious way, or if we defeated it, I think that it would be quite arrogant".

Senator Frith about the goods and services tax: "We oppose the principle of the bill and we do not intend to unduly delay it". Now he is saying they are going to kill it.

Senator Hebert on Bill C-55: "The non-elected representatives should give way to the elected representatives, leaving the people the choice to elect another government". If there is any twisted logic, it is the logic in the other place, supported by the Liberals in this House who are saying: "We don't like this bill. We want to see the Senate kill it".

Mr. Duhamel: Call an election.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): But, they are saying: "We support the supremacy of the House of Commons". You cannot have it both ways.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. It concerns the latest horror story caused by his department's multi-million-dollar misinformation campaign on the GST.

In the latest example which is now in all the newspapers, Air Canada, the nation's largest airline, indicated to a consumer last week that it had an obligation to collect in advance the 7 per cent GST on travel that will not take place until next year, and indeed, that if the consumer refused he or she would see the reservations cancelled.

My question is this. Will the minister order his department today to notify all the businesses in Canada that they do not have either a legal obligation or the right to demand prepayment on a tax which is not yet law in the country?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker, because I did that on August 9, 1990.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the minister who supposedly is responsible to protect the rights of consumers across the country.

My question is this. How could the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs possibly have sat at the cabinet table and endorsed the multi-million-dollar propaganda campaign that has now caused havoc and confusion for consumers from coast to coast to coast in this country, and what steps will he take today to inform Canadian consumers of their right to just say no to the advance collection of the 7 per cent goods and services tax?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as I just pointed out, on August 9, 1990, we advised Canadians by way of a backgrounder and transitional rules and press releases. We have continued to do that and I made it very clear last week when I stated that no consumer is obligated to pay the GST prior to January 1, 1991, and no business is obligated to collect it prior to January 1, 1991, but businesses will be accountable for any GST that straddles the date from September 1 to the implementation on January 1, 1991. If the hon. member is so interested in the GST, I suggest to him that instead of trying to confuse the public with irresponsible questions of this nature, he go to the other place and make sure it stops hijacking democracy. That is what he should do.

THE SENATE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Despite the justice minister's assurances yesterday, there still appears to be a great deal of concern that the government, in its haste to ram through the GST, may indeed have made a very serious error in appointing the eleventh senator from New Brunswick.

As the Prime Minister knows, the stacking provision that he used, which allows for either eight senators to be appointed or four senators to be appointed, that the four appointments, had he done so, would have required one maritime senator while eight appointments would have allowed for two.

The Prime Minister will know that there was only one extra maritime seat available for the Senate without disrupting the balance between the Senate and the House of Commons. With only one maritime seat available, the Prime Minister was limited to the appointment of four new senators.

I ask the Prime Minister: Is the fact that he refuses to make a referral to the Supreme Court on this issue simply because he is afraid that he will not be able to continue to ram through the GST?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend knows full well that the government has received the full assurances of the senior legal advisers of the Crown, that all the actions that we have taken have been pursuant to the statutes, convention and appropriate custom.

If my hon. friend has any trouble with that, then I know that she or some other member of her party will feel free to contest it before the appropriate courts.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. Mr. Speaker, a good many people are worried because they wonder whether the steps taken by this government to ram the GST through might not undermine the legitimacy of all proceedings in the Senate and in the House.

A parliamentary institution whose membership is contested might prompt a court to rule against the validity of any legislation adopted by this Parliament.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: Can he table in the House the opinions of his advisers which, he feels, justify his inaction?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I already gave a general answer to the question of my hon. friend. I am surprised to hear her state that many Canadians are concerned and wonder whether we are casting doubt on the Senate proceedings. I would suggest that many people would indeed question the approach of Liberal senators, including their most recent effort which resulted in Liberal senators giving themselves $153 a day simply to report for work.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

The Canadian people have a right to know whether the actions that this government has taken in reference to the Senate are legal and will not be challenged, and that the actions that it has taken are based in law.

The Prime Minister has not agreed today to table the expert opinions on which he says he has based his actions.

If the Prime Minister is not prepared to withdraw the tax, which would be the honourable thing to do, will the Prime Minister table the opinions of the legal experts upon which he has based his opinion?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to my hon. friend that the Government of Canada has acted pursuant to legal advice received from the law officers of the Crown.

We have respected both the constitutional provisions and customs that apply. If my hon. friend or anyone else has any difficulty with that, then of course they will avail themselves of all the provisions of access to the courts.

• (1430)

Inasmuch as my friend is the leader of the NDP, I thought she would be interested in paying heed to the comments of one of Canada's most distinguished NDPers who said on Canada AM—

An hon. member: It is old.

Mr. Mulroney: No, it is new. I am not going to quote Stephen Lewis. I will quote Gerry Caplan who said:

> It is creating—

This is the NDP now.

> —a terrible, terrible precedent, that one day the rest of us will rue, for these Liberal senators to say that they have the right to stop the functioning of the elected government.

Listen to the people and listen to Gerry.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Over the weekend our Prime Minister led world leaders in New York in a chorus of Save the Children.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

Mrs. Marleau: Meanwhile, here in Canada his government seeks to impose a GST which will tax children—

Some hon. members:: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Marleau: Their clothing, their boots, even the heat that keeps them alive in the wintertime. Will the Prime Minister, for the sake of Canada's children, today withdraw the goods and services tax?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the one thing that I expected from the Liberals—and I know that they have difficulty in resisting partisan cheap shots—is that they should have left the children out of this particular fight because—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: —the summit dealt with the world's neediest children and I would have thought that the Liberals would, for once, have the decency to stand up and applaud a measure in favour of the world's children that goes much beyond partisan politics.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): You know that, Paul. You know it.

Mr. Mulroney: The New York Times, Mr. Speaker, reported yesterday that:

> Leaders from more than 70 nations came together here today in an extraordinary show of concern for the world's poorest children. The Declaration of the World's Summit for Children pledged the participating nations to work together in an effort to save the lives of at least a third of the 14 million infants who now die each year before the age of five.

This is an enormous human tragedy, particularly visited upon the poorest of the poor nations of the third and developing worlds.

I know that all members of the House support the Government of Canada in its attempt to help in that particular area.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the point. Even in Canada we have poor children. Do we want to create more?

On Sunday in New York the Prime Minister said: "The World Summit for Children has galvanized political will to help children".

[Translation]

Is the Prime Minister prepared to show that he has the political will to protect Canadian children? Charity begins at home. Is he prepared to scrap the GST today?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, under the leadership of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Government of Canada has shown political will in taking some 260,000 Canadian children out of poverty since coming to office.

Additionally, the hon. member refers to the goods and services tax. The Liberal members opposite, if they are honest, must recognize the fact that families earning less than $30,000 a year are ahead with the GST. It is time that they were honest with Canadians in recognizing that fact.

GST ON CHILDREN'S BOOKS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the minister responsible for children has the necessary authority to implement policies that provide for the mental and physical health of our children. As an initial official gesture, will the minister explain to the Minister of Finance that the mental development of children is not the unique preserve of schools and libraries but is also and above all a matter for the home, and that parents would rather buy books for their children? Could the minister responsible for the mental and physical health of our children explain this to his colleagues and have books exempted from the GST?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the hon. member's question as to whether or not I have the powers that are necessary to enable me to serve the children of Canada, the answer is yes. I am very, very pleased to say that the Prime Minister has asked me to co-ordinate on behalf of the Government of Canada the response to the World Summit. We have acted immediately by creating a children's bureau in the Department of National Health and Welfare.

I was delighted to see the op-ed piece in the Montreal Gazette today by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre wherein he endorsed the idea. I am pleased to say that we acted upon it even before the hon. member could get his article published.

In so far as tax on reading material is concerned, the hon. member yesterday was arguing that it was discriminatory against poorer people. Keeping in mind the fact that families earning less than $30,000 will be ahead of the game with the GST, the GST will be beneficial to those people and make it easier for them to be able to cover the cost. By arguing that we should stick with the iniquitous and unfair manufacturers' sales tax, the Liberal Party would seek to penalize poorer Canadians.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Come on, that is just nonsense. Stop talking, stop lecturing. I think the minister should stop lecturing and start listening. Eighty-three per cent of Canadians said that they do not want books taxed.

As the government tries to move to its good news, good bear, jolly news agenda, will the minister for children bring children good news, withdraw the very negative tax on books, and make them accessible to all levels of society?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks that I stop lecturing. I might put the same suggestion back to her.

I might also suggest to her that if she is concerned about Canada's children, it is time to lift the Liberal barricade in the Senate and pass parental leave benefits that are being stalled by the Liberals in the Senate.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, this weekend the Prime Minister signed another statement in support of children's rights, and a year ago his government supported the goal of eliminating child poverty in Canada by the year 2000. Last weekend also the Prime Minister said that it was political will more than money which is the decisive factor in the war on child suffering.

It is fine for the Prime Minister to posture on the world stage, but here in Canada his government has capped the Canada Assistance Plan, clawed back family allowance, and cut funding to the provinces for health and post-secondary education.

If the Prime Minister truly wants to help Canada's children, will he promise this House today that he will ensure that this legislation which impacts so negatively on Canada's one million poor children will be scrapped immediately?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think all Canadians have a right to be tremendously proud of the leadership that has been shown by Canada and by the Prime Minister of Canada on the international scene.

• (1440)

Let me simply recall for the benefit of the House what it was said last night by Sahira Piracha, the children of Canada's representative on the Canadian delegation to New York. She said: "To tell you the truth, I was optimistic going into it and being there. I can honestly say that I have come back and I am very proud that Canada took the initiative to co-chair the summit and I couldn't even think of the words to explain how Mr. Prime Minister represented us. He did just a wonderful job".

That is the case. The children of Canada and those people who attended the international summit have tremendous pride in what has been achieved by Canada. They recognize the fact as well that under the leadership of this Prime Minister we have reduced child poverty in Canada by over a quarter of a million and that we are determined to carry on until child poverty is eliminated in Canada.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, Canada has become a world leader with a million children hungry and the number of children at food banks increasing day by day. If that is the sort of leadership this Prime Minister is giving, I do not think Canadian children need it. It is time that the Prime Minister responded to his critics and not let his ministers do it. He is speaking on the world stage for Canada. It is time he fessed up to those criticisms.

Bill C-69, which puts a cap on CAP, limits the number of child care spaces available, and limits transfers to the provinces, is in direct violation of articles 24 and 28 of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child that he says he wants to ratify. If he is so committed to ratifying this convention, will he withdraw Bill C–69 from the Senate today?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's credentials to give legal opinions are about comparable to mine. I do not know what sort of legal advice he got with regard to the provision of the convention if he says that there is no reason whatsoever to believe that that is the case.

What I can indicate to the hon. member is that significant progress has been made with regard to child care under this government. Almost $1 billion is being spent each year on child care in Canada by the federal government, a significant increase since we came to office. We are committed to having a full program in place during the life of this Parliament. There would have been one in place by now if it had not been for the Liberal senators.

Finally, when the hon. member talks about provisions relating to children, it should be kept in mind that this socialist party is the one that takes the position that family benefits should be provided to rich families instead of being concentrated for poorer families. The vast majority of Canadians disagree with his party on that.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport who is now fully aware that Peter Lush received a $400,000 commission on the sale of land to the harbour commission of which he is chairman. The minister is also probably aware of the Prime Minister's own conflict of interest guidelines which say, and I quote: "Public office holders shall not solicit or accept transfers of economic benefit".

Given that Mr. Lush personally negotiated first and then accepted a $400,000 payment as a commission contingent upon the sale of the land to the harbour commission of which he is chairman, will the minister now relieve the harbour commissioner of his duties?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport):. Mr. Speaker, I wish to read a letter, which I received this afternoon. It is addressed to me as Minister of Transport. It reads:

> Dear Sir:
>
> It is with regret and personal reluctance that I tender my resignation to you as Chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission.
>
> In undertaking my duties with the Hamilton Harbour Commission I have sought the best available advice, including a legal opinion, as to how I might strictly follow all relevant guidelines. As I have repeatedly said, I believe that I have always maintained an appropriate separation between my public and private activities. However, with the recent allegations made against me, it is clear that both my own reputation and that of the Harbour Commission will be subject to continued assault. I am not willing to subject the Harbour Commission to this situation.
> Minister, in stepping down from the Commission, I would ask that you move as soon as possible to establish an independent review of these circumstances in order to set the record straight. I would welcome such a review and assure you that I will co–operate in every way possible.
> I want to thank you, Minister, for the honour of serving on the Commission and I look forward to having this matter resolved at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, I will be naming an independent law firm to conduct this review, in the very near future.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday, the Minister of Transport said: "I bet the allegations are untrue". Well, he lost the bet. What was the wager? What is this minister now going to do? He says he is going to set up an inquiry by a law firm.

We want to know, is the bet, first, a return of the $400,000 commission to the Canadian taxpayer? Is it, second, an independent audit and impartial inquiry into this entire matter or is it, third, the resignation of the Minister of Transport who did not know what was going on in his department six months ago when I raised this issue?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in relation to six months ago, my hon. friend raised a different issue at that time vis–à–vis conflict of interest. At that time the following took place. Mr. Lush wrote to me and said:

> I have taken the appropriate steps to dissociate my group of companies as to any consulting, planning, engineering, marketing and/or agency relationship with the J. I. Case lands in Hamilton as from March 13, 1990, until such time as the Case company and the Harbour Commission have finalized one way or another, any purchase and sales arrangements on their surplus lands—

On March 14, my hon. friend is quoted in the Hamilton Spectator as saying: "I am satisfied with that. I can live with it. I think this whole thing—".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: He took the money and ran.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, while we on this side of the House welcome the justified resignation of Mr. Lush, we do not condone the stonewalling of this government and this minister, because in a parliamentary democracy there is something called ministerial responsibility and ministerial accountability. This minister only muddied the waters of the Hamilton Harbour Commission.

Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Lush has resigned, we would like to ask the minister if he is prepared, on behalf of the Canadian taxpayer, first, to recoup the $400,000 that has gone into his pocket and, second, order a full and impartial inquiry. We do not want an inquiry through a law firm, but a full impartial inquiry that would allow the subpoena of witnesses so that we can get to the bottom of this.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to welcome my hon. friend to his duties as transport critic. I am sure that once we put this behind us we will be able to get on with more constructive matters.

My hon. friend referred to some traditions. I think one of the most basic traditions in this country is that people are innocent until found guilty. That is a tradition to which we all should pay attention. I suggested that I will be naming an independent law firm to review this matter. When that report is ready, it will be made public.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, when is enough enough? We advised the minister six months ago. The facts are simple. On August 3, 1990 the Hamilton Harbour Commission paid J. I. Case $10 million. On the same day Mr. Lush received $400,000 from J. I. Case.

The Prime Minister has advocated these conflict of interest guidelines, not only to the country but to the world. In light of the accusations and in light of the facts, is he not prepared to have a full and impartial inquiry that will allow a full public airing, not only of this issue but to ascertain if any other illegal transactions have gone on in the harbour?

Mr. McDermid: Make those accusations outside the House.

• (1450)

Mr. Speaker: There are certain fundamentals that we have to take into account during Question Period, and one of them is one I have had to remark on in the past. For the most part I must say the hon. member has respected it.

A question put in such a way that it carries an allegation of wrongdoing is wrong. I am not going to define the wrongdoing. I am just saying it is wrong, because first of all it cannot be answered. Second, it is done without any basis of fact.

There is a way to make an allegation in this Chamber. It is formal and it requires facts.

The questions on this matter that I have allowed both yesterday and today have for the most part been dealing with facts that are out in the open. It is not for me to say whether there is or is not a conflict of interest.

In any event, there are certain facts from which it might be argued that there is or is not a conflict of interest. That is one thing. But suggestions that there is something else going on here, without any basis for saying it, is not appropriate.

I know the hon. member, who feels very strongly about this issue and is pursuing it, would understand that there have to be guidelines, especially when we are talking about accusations or allegations about somebody who is not here and without a basis upon which a charge can be made.

It is a very serious matter. I do not want to overdo my intervention, but I know hon. members will understand what I am saying.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister is very simple. Will he agree to order a full, impartial public inquiry so that all the facts may be known and then dealt with?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment you, Sir, on the way you laid out the rights of an individual in this country to a trial by a court or an appropriate authority, and not a trial by allegation on the floor of this House of Commons.

The individual in question has asked for an independent review. I am in the process of ordering that independent review. I have offered to make the results of that independent review public and I undertake to do so.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for either the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs).

The United Nations affirms "the inalienable right of all countries to exercise permanent sovereignty over their natural resources in the interests of their national development".

However, Canada signed away most of that right with the free trade deal. Now this government is proposing to sell off Petro-Canada, our last major public policy tool for spurring Canadianization, energy security, energy diversity and conservation.

Why is this government so determined to turn the energy fate of Canadians over to an industry dominated by foreign multinationals that could not give a tinker's damn for the interests of ordinary Canadians?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the point that has to be made is that we have a varied energy supply in Canada ranging all the way from thermal, coal, natural gas, and including nuclear in the province of Ontario where it gets over 50 per cent of its electricity on a competitive basis, on into oil and oil products. At the present time we have a surplus which we sell at approximately 275,000 barrels a day.

If one looks at the work of the International Energy Agency, at countries which are not in a self-sufficient position in oil and are asked to put in strategic reserves, Canada has been exempted from that for the very reason because, with the market driven approach that we have taken, we are not not in the position which other countries find themselves in, but are in the enviable position of increasing our reserves. As well, we have increased the amount of oil available to us and to legitimate customers.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Yankee Doodle dandy over there. The bill introduced yesterday—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): The bill introduced yesterday provides for ownership percentages, languages used by the corporation, head office location, control of upstream and downstream assets, but no green provisions whatsoever.

Why are there no provisions requiring Petro-Canada to lead the way in recycling used engine oil, to set up capture stations for ozone destroying CFCs, to provide propane and compressed natural gas pumps at service stations, and to provide ethanol fuel blends?

Why has this government completely ignored all environmental considerations in its privatization legislation?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member has mentioned the matter of alternate fuels and I draw his attention to the increased emission standards in California. Other than suspended particulates, Canada has already met those standards.

The point that I make is this. In Canada at the present time we have substantially more cars or vehicles on propane or natural gas than California, plus the transit system in California is quite different from that in Canada.

I would suggest that he take a look at what has been done with alternative fuels. We are well ahead in many areas, even those he purports to put forward here—even though he does not like anything about the United States except when he can use standards which he thinks for the moment suit his purposes.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It also concerns the Lush affair. Because the Prime Minister is solely responsible for the conflict of interest code of his government, will he commence immediate action to recover the $400,000 paid to Mr. Lush while he was the chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission? Yes or no.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend surprises me. Questions have been raised. The Speaker quite properly admonished all members to proceed with great care when the reputations of individuals are involved.

The question just put presupposes that that amount of money improperly found itself into the hands of Mr. Lush. It presupposes a violation of guidelines, and it presupposes some degree of illegality, against which the Speaker has just admonished the member.

With respect, I say this to the hon. member—

Mr. Foster: Why did he resign?

Mr. Mulroney: My Liberal friend says: "Why did he resign?" That is alien to a Liberal but he resigned because he wanted his reputation cleared. That is exactly what an independent agent proposes to do.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister could complete his answer.

Mr. Mulroney: The minister has fully responded and indicated an appropriate course of action. I would have thought that my hon. friend and his Liberal colleagues would have learned over the last three or four years that the rat pack philosophy leads to certain defeat. You are at it again, and you are going to be defeated again.

An hon. member: That's the big rat talking over there.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the following supplementary for the Prime Minister who seems to think that the whole issue is so straightforward. I would like to ask him why the government has appointed a law firm to examine the issue of privately. Why not have a public judicial investigation of this matter right away? What is the government trying to hide?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister pointed out, the individual in question has resigned because of the continued assault on the Hamilton Harbour Commission. He says he is not willing to subject the Harbour Commission to this situation.

• (1500)

There will be an independent review by an independent law firm. The results will be made public and I will make it public in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Churchill on a single question, please.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

For a year, the minister has had in his hands the report of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas. Yet, because of his inaction, employers, employees, and their families face 1991 with uncertainty.

Will the minister denounce the acknowledged shallow findings of the ask force and bring in a system of fair taxation for all northern residents?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is well aware that we have tried to broaden the benefits under the northern and isolated post benefit provisions so that more people can be beneficiaries of this. We are trying to do this in as fair a way as possible.

The hon. member is very well aware that this is a complex issue. It took well over a year for the task force to come to its conclusions. There have been some difficulties with these conclusions that we are trying to work our way through. As soon as I am able to provide a decision to the House, I will announce it.

POINT OF ORDER

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the Minister of Transport would be so kind as to table in the House the documents to which he referred today. I am talking about all of the documents that he referred to, not just one. I think he referred to several.

Second, Mr. Speaker, in response to a question from an hon. member on this side, the Prime Minister made reference to a $153 allowance which was made by the other place. It should be noted that, at page 1835 of Hansard of the other place, the motion for the increase was moved by the former Conservative Deputy Premier of Newfoundland, now Senator, William Doody. The Prime Minister should be correct in his facts.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. minister rising on the same point?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): If I may, Mr. Speaker. There has been a request that I table the letter from which I read and naturally I am pleased to do so.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I have wanted to ask a question today and other days. It seems that the supporters of the government do not have many opportunities to ask questions, even though we have more members than the opposition. This is one way we have of doing our job and fighting for our constituents.

I wonder if Mr. Speaker could clarify the rules on what we can expect in the way of questions for members of the government side.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member was seeking the floor and there were others who were seeking the floor. I have indicated to the hon. member that if he rises tomorrow I will remember that he was rising today.

I have 45 minutes. There is a lot of contest in the Chamber now for questions and I do the best I can.

What hon. members will notice is that if the hon. member and maybe somebody else were not recognized today—watch it day after day. I am trying very hard to even it out. It is not an easy task and I ask hon. members' co-operation.

I know that the hon. member has an important matter and I know that when the hon. member cannot rise, it makes it difficult, especially with respect to serving his own constituents. I am very aware of that.

The Hon. Deputy Prime Minister.

Points of Order

REMARKS BY SENATOR

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a very serious matter, a matter that has just been brought to my attention, and one which I believe is deserving of your attention, as well as attention of all hon. members of the House.

The issue that I am about to raise , I believe, not only affects the privileges of the members of the House of Commons and are comments that I find most offensive and disturbing. More importantly, what I am going to raise, I believe, strikes at the very fundamental pillars of our parliamentary democracy and that is, namely, Her Majesty the Queen of Canada.

I refer to an interview that was carried by TVA–CHOT, on September 30, at 7.30, involving Jean–Pierre Ferland and Pierre Nadeau who were interviewing Senator Jacques Hébert. The interview was conducted in French and I will translate it into English. It was an interview about the current issues of the day in Parliament and indeed, the GST. Senator Hébert is quoted as follows:

Ms. Copps: He doesn't dare speak French.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is right, Mr. Speaker, I do not speak French and it is one of the misfortunes of my life and I regret it very much.

The quote is as follows: "We have a perfect right to amend it", namely, the provision before the Senate, "which would have been impotent because it is too bad a law, or to block it, which we intended to do until Mr. Mulroney went to bribe the Queen." In other words, the words that were used were: "soudoyer la reine". I looked in the dictionary to try to define the word soudoyer, and it means to hire, to hire an assassin, or to have in one's pay or to bribe.

I firmly believe that these comments constitute an unfounded and unwarranted and indeed, a scurrilous and shocking attack against the Queen of Canada, not to mention a scurrilous attack against the Prime Minister of Canada. I am sure and I would hope that in the best interests of our parliamentary traditions, and I know that this is raised—

Mr. Speaker: I know that the Deputy Prime Minister would want to assist the House and the Speaker, but I am finding some difficulty in finding exactly what relief the hon. minister is asking for or whether I am in a position to give it. I wonder if the hon. minister could wrap up his remarks very quickly.

Mr. Mazankowski: What I do propose to put to the House and seek the unanimous consent of the House to put is an appropriate motion, but I think it is important for me, before I put the motion, to explain precisely what we are trying to do.

If we are interested in preserving the traditions of the House, in preserving the long-standing parliamentary practice which is a practice and a tradition not only upheld in the House of Commons but indeed in the Senate, we have to deal with these kinds of situations. To cast a reflection against the Queen of Canada is a serious violation—

Mr. Speaker: I have the Deputy Prime Minister's point. My difficulty is procedural. If the hon. Deputy Prime Minister is rising and seeks the consent of the House to put this matter to the House, it may well be that that consent would be given, or it may well be that the consent would not be given. The matter is now moving beyond just a point of order or just seeking the opinion of the House.

I see other hon. members wanting to rise on this matter. What seems to be the situation at the moment is the hon. Deputy Prime Minister is seeking some kind of unanimous support from the House with respect to this complaint.

• (1510)

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, this is a blatant attack on Her Majesty the Queen of Canada and I, as President of the Privy Council, will not stand idly by and see that happen.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Therefore, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move the following motion:

That this House, as one of the constituent—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: If I could have order, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The Deputy Prime Minister is asking the consent of the House. Would he please put his motion?

Mr. Mazankowski: I am asking the consent of the House to move the following motion:

That this House, as one of the constituent elements of Parliament together with the Senate and the Crown, hereby condemns the disrespect for the dignity and authority of Parliament and the scandalous and unfounded allegations made by Senator Jacques Hébert during an interview on the TVA network on September 30th, 1990.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister started his comments by saying that the matter was an important one and affected the privileges of the members of this House.

Mr. Speaker, our privileges have been affected only by the fact that the Minister took the time of the House to table a motion we consider entirely unacceptable in this House.

It is unacceptable in the context of this House, and second, Mr. Speaker, only a government that is pretty desperate would waste the time of the House with a proposal as inappropriate—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has the floor and I know that hon. members will give him the courtesy of listening to his remarks. The hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, none of the privileges of any member of this House were affected by the comments made by Senator Jacques Hébert, either directly or indirectly, not even those of the royalist Minister of Communications.

Mr. Speaker, we believe this motion comes at a time when it is very convenient for the government to use the Senate to do its dirty work in this House.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, the government has no reason to raise a question of privilege when in fact, nothing the senator said affects the privileges of this House.

I listened to you, now you are going to listen to me!

Mr. Speaker, the minister rose on a point of order. He used the time he was allowed to present a motion which, according to my reading of the Standing Orders, is highly unusual. It seems to me that it was highly irregular for the Chair to accept a motion on a point of order.

Some hon. members: He is right!

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, he did not have the floor to present a motion. Furthermore, if he did have a question of privilege, the Chair had a duty to decide if there was a prima facie case before the House, that—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: Will you keep quiet! I know what I am talking about. A prima facie case—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if we could just reflect for a moment. I am going to hear the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, but I think it is appropriate that we reflect for a moment on exactly where we are.

The hon. Deputy Prime Minister rose on a point of order. He talked about privilege. What the Deputy Prime Minister was doing from a procedural point of view was seeking the unanimous consent of the House for something. That happens regularly around here. It may be a contentious issue, but that is what the hon. Deputy Prime Minister was doing, and I had to hear him.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has the floor and he is entitled, as did the hon. Deputy Prime Minister, to be heard and I am going to hear him.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I just remember a few things about procedure. The first thing is that we need to have order in this House. The Deputy Prime Minister cannot bootleg this kind of motion without getting unanimous consent to put it and I am telling him now he will not get unanimous consent to put the motion.

Mr. Speaker, they will not drag the Queen into an argument between the Senate and this House. I think it is rather uncalled for—

An hon. member: Scandalous.

Mr. Gauthier: And scandalous, yes, scandalous for that government—desperate is the word—to call the Queen into question at this time.

I will not give this thing any more importance than to say, you are all wet.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister said that his privileges had been breached by the fact that a single Liberal senator has made some public utterances. I want to say that many of us feel that our privileges are breached by the mere existence of the Senate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member for Kamloops would want to assist the Chair in this matter.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, as a result of this enthusiastic response on behalf of the government members, perhaps we should consider the abolishment of this unelected Senate as soon as possible.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. member for Kamloops that that is something that I cannot do.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I accept your gracious comments. I guess I could say on behalf of my party that we certainly would give unanimous consent right now to consider a motion to abolish the unelected Senate.

An hon. member: Write it out right now.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on this issue, the Deputy Prime Minister knows the rules of the House probably as well as anyone in the House, and he knows that this incident happened back in September and there has been ample opportunity to consider this.

An hon. member: Two days ago.

Mr. Riis: Two days ago, my apologies. Mr. Speaker, first of all, this is a matter that ought to have been raised in the Senate. There are Conservatives in the Senate. If there were privileges that were breached, they would have been senatorial privileges. I say to my hon. friend, the Deputy Prime Minister, that if he was serious in seeking unanimous consent to deal with this issue, there is a procedure that we always follow. He knows the procedure—he has been part of it for many, many years—where a discussion would have taken place and we would have sought to discuss this in a serious say.

The motion is debatable and we would have set aside, presumably, time today during the government's agenda to debate this important issue. If the Deputy Prime Minister is interested, we are prepared at the House Leaders meeting that will take place momentarily to discuss whether this is the appropriate place for this question to be raised and whether this is the time.

• (1520)

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, just briefly on that point. I had intended to make that comment. This has just been drawn to my attention and I have raised it at the earliest possible time.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that given the fact that the motion has just been presented, if members across the way want some time to deliberate on it, we would certainly be pleased to give them that time and it could be discussed at a House leaders' meeting. We would be prepared to debate it and we would be prepared to vote on it.

I thank the hon. member for his submission.

[Translation]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Apparently, Mr. Speaker, my friend the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is suggesting that the privileges of a member may have been breached by the statement made by Senator Hébert last Sunday night—hardly 48 hours ago—on the TVA network.

And the hon. member for Hamilton East takes the Deputy Prime Minister to task for using a translation. I have always thought that, unilingual or bilingual, English- or French-speaking, all members of the House of Commons are full-fledged citizens.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: When it comes to national unity, I should think that the Deputy Prime Minister's record is second to none.

As to Senator Hébert's statement, Mr. Speaker, allow me to quote him because he did refer to me personally: "Either we will block it, and this is what we wanted to do until Mr. Mulroney, forgetting all conventions—" Listen to the statement of Senator Hébert: "Mr. Mulroney, forgetting all conventions, bribed the Queen—I would not know how—to appoint—" The interviewer interrupted him: "Senator, what you have just said, 'the Prime Minister bribed the Queen', is a very serious statement on the part of a senator". Senator Hébert: "Do you see the danger inherent in live programming? Nothing can be changed. However, what is true and what surprised me the morning after the eight appointments is that I did not see anything in the press about a heavy tax burden being imposed on Canadians thanks to the co-operation of the Queen, the Queen of England. That would have been some headline".

What he said was that the Prime Minister of Canada bribed the Queen, whom he insulted by calling her the Queen of England when she also happens to be the Queen of Canada, the Queen of all Canadians. And if the Liberals had the least bit of common sense—

[English]

—they would call in Senator Hébert and they would kick him out of the Liberal caucus right away for what he just said.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would you please tell this House what procedure is being followed at this time? Is this part of the debate on the motion? I would like to know because many of my colleagues want to participate in that debate.

I will however remind this House, Mr. Speaker, that, in Beauchesne's, 6th edition, Comment no. 19 simply states that:

> Statements made outside the House by a Member may not be used as the basis for a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, Senators or Members, it is all the same thing. So, it is our opinion that a statement made outside the House should not be the subject of a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order that has been raised, I think it should be clear to you and clear to all members that what is being debated here today is not whether or not an insult was offered to Her Majesty, the Queen.

It is clear from the comments as attributed to Senator Hébert that a statement was made. It is equally clear there was no serious suggestion whatsoever that either the Prime Minister offered abroad or that Her Majesty the Queen accepted abroad. That is clear.

What is equally clear and what is shameful—and let me say that I have as much affection for Her Majesty the Queen as any member of this House—is the partisan attempt participated in by no less than the Prime Minister himself to divert the attention of Canada from the GST by dragging the Queen into this debate. That is shocking and shameful.

I suggest if we are to be serious here about our responsibilities and serious about any kind of concept of respect for the sovereign that the Prime Minister, followed by the Deputy Prime Minister, would apologize for the shameless spectacle today.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief point in regard to the question raised by my hon. friend about dragging the Queen in.

On Wednesday of last week, the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte who just spoke said: "I asked the Deputy Prime Minister: Why has the Prime Minister of Canada deliberately misled the Queen of Canada about paralysis in the Senate?"

A final point. My hon. friend expresses his affection and respect for Her Majesty the Queen and I have no doubt about the sincerity of his commitment whatsoever. I think the evidence of that should be that he should join all members of the House in asking Senator Hébert to immediately repudiate an offensive and unacceptable statement about Her Majesty that this party and this government will not allow to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford is seeking the floor. I understand the hon. member has a matter to raise which is not the one that is presently before the House.

I am going to exercise the prerogative of the Chair, and I am going to advise the House that it is important that we understand where we are.

What is in front of the House right now is a request put forward by the Deputy Prime Minister asking unanimous consent for a motion.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is probably right. There is some doubt in my mind as to whether, given all the circumstances, there is necessarily a breach of privilege here. I do not have to decide that.

The hon. member is absolutely right in saying that that is another argument. Procedurally, we have a request from the government for unanimous consent on the motion that was read out. That is the position.

I have allowed some comment, but I do not think that I am allowed or ought to extend the debate for the rest of the afternoon on this matter.

The House has heard the motion. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

COMMENTS ALLEGEDLY MADE BY THE MEMBER FOR BURIN—ST-GEORGE'S

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, if you can hear me— This morning, I heard the member for Burin—St-George's make frankly offensive remarks concerning some of us, but I would like to reserve the right to check the transcripts of the debate and comment on this question of privilege tomorrow.

REMARKS BY SENATOR

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, regarding the point of order on which the Deputy Prime Minister stood, I was trying to get the Speaker's attention to make an intervention.

I am asking for instructions from the Chair, not necessarily in terms of the substance of its ruling. Why it is that members opposite, particularly the right hon. Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister are allowed or seem to have the right to stand in their place not to make comments but to make very lengthy speeches. While they were in their place, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you—and I look for your guidance in this matter—that they have cast aspersions upon all hon. members, particularly within my own party.

It is rather interesting to note that when the Deputy Prime Minister raised in his place this very, very important point of order—and he talked about certain comments made by an hon. member in the other House—I did not hear the hon. Deputy Prime Minister or the right hon. Prime Minister, at any time inside or outside this Chamber, stand in their place and defend Her Majesty the Queen when hon. members in the back row were renouncing their oath to the Queen. Where was the Deputy Prime Minister? I have never seen such hypocrisy, such two-faced—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has made a point. I do not think it is a point of order and it is not a point of privilege,but he has made a point.

Mr. Dingwall: My question in terms of seeking direction from the Chair is the following: Why is the appearance allowed to go on and unchecked for members opposite, particularly the right hon. Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister, not only to make comments but to make speeches and to lecture those of us on this side and on that side of the House, and we are not allowed to have similar rights in order to respond to the most deceitful arguments ever.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier did have the floor, and extensively, on behalf of the Liberal Party.

The hon. member for Hamilton East on a point of order.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Prime Minister, in developing his strategy to save his doomed GST here in the House, suggested that I was criticizing the Deputy Prime Minister for raising a point about the Queen in English. He beat his breast and made a wonderful extemporaneous speech about a person is a Canadian in any language, leaving the impression that I somehow felt one language was better or worse than the other.

[Translation]

I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the difficulty I have with the prime minister's point of view is that he was perfectly prepared to get very close to the Queen in the English language, but not in French.

The point is not the choice of language, but—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may have a complaint, but this is clearly a matter for debate.

If there is a question of privilege, it is very difficult for the Chair to find one in this exchange.

[English]

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me what we have been subjected to as members of Parliament in the House is an abuse of the rules of the House by the Deputy Prime Minister and the Prime Minister to further their own political agenda.

Yesterday, during Question Period my colleague, the member for York Centre, began to make a statement about Senator Pat Carney concerning her statement about another senator, Senator Con DiNino. Before he was able to complete his statement—

Mr. Speaker: It is true that I interrupted the hon. member. There was also an exchange afterward. If the hon. member is raising that particular incident of another day as a question of privilege or a point of order then perhaps I ought to hear it. It seemed to me that the matter was settled and I indicated that I may very well have interrupted the hon. member more rapidly than I should have, but that is the end of the issue. Otherwise,it just becomes a reargument about whether or not the Speaker made an error. If I made an error, I made it. I cannot undo that, but I do not think it is appropriate to be raising that again today.

With respect to what happened this afternoon, I tried to make it very clear. One can argue about the issue and there is lots of argument about it, as is obvious, but basically what happened is that consent was asked for a motion and consent was not given. That is the procedural situation, and I tried to be as even-handed as I could be.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Nunziata: If I may finish—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I am not criticizing your ruling, Sir. I am criticizing and asking you to take into consideration the hypocrisy and the double standard of the—

Mr. Speaker: Whatever the hon. member's complaint may be, if he rises now he can rise on a question of privilege, if there is one, or he can rise on a point of order but not on a matter of debate. I am prepared to discuss with all hon. members, and especially the hon. member for York South—Weston, if there are errors made or if there is a better way to do things in here. I would be only too pleased to try to do that, but I do think I have to recognize a senior member here, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Kamloops.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, traditionally, when a minister or the Prime Minister reads a document in the House or reports what was said by someone, they have an obligation to lay the document on the Table. In his comments, the Prime Minister mentioned that Senator Hébert said such and such. I understand that at the end of the interview, Senator Hébert apologized. I think that for the purposes of this debate, hon. members should know the conclusion and in fact the contents of the entire interview. I would therefore ask the Prime Minister and his parliamentary secretary whether they could give us the complete text, without any—

Mrs. Finestone: Embellishments!

Mr. Gauthier: —without any embellishments or omissions and table the document in the House so that everyone can read it.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I will relay the message and concern of the hon. member, and we will do our best to comply.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, earlier today we witnessed some very unfortunate, nasty remarks being hurled back and forth across the aisle. I simply want to raise this point of order that on October 1, reading from Hansard, Mr. Speaker, you admonished members in terms of the way they were accusing other members in this House and in other places of doing various things. You said, Mr. Speaker, at page 13609 of Hansard for October 1, and I quote:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of the Sovereign, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of the Governor General or the person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any Member thereof.

I think my hon. colleagues were making the point that what the Prime Minister had to say about the hon. senator was anything but honourable in terms of the words which quite frankly were very offensive in terms of the allegations levied against the hon. senator.

• (1540)

I simply want to say that if this was used for admonishment of members of the House a few days back, I think the same thing could be done to the Prime Minister of Canada today.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I know that you had asked for unanimous consent. I would have thought that the issue would have died several minutes ago. However, the debate continues and I cannot let that ride.

It is very clear that what both the Deputy Prime Minister and Prime Minister were doing was not calling into question Mr. Hébert or his reputation or anything of the hon. member in the Senate. What they were doing was calling to the attention of the House words that were spoken that had a very serious reflection and implication on the Queen. It had nothing to do with the member himself, but rather his words, and I think that is the true form of debate that all of us should be considering and acting upon.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. parliamentary secretary has a very selective memory. We all heard with great fanfare the quote to which the Prime Minister referred, but the Prime Minister went beyond the quote as all hon. members who were here could hear and of course could see. He went beyond that.

In his description as to what should be done with the hon. member in the other place, I think it was quite clear that in the provisions of Standing Order 18 there was indeed a breach of that particular standing order.

I am glad the hon. member would perhaps now want to agree with me that we should leave that to the direction of the Chair so that the Chair can perhaps reflect on what has transpired and also have an opportunity to review the "blues" to see whether or not in point of fact the Chair can see a prima facie case there that would amount to being a breach of Standing Order 18, with which all members including the Prime Minister must comply.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that you would take that under advisement and at the appropriate time report to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. I certainly will consider very carefully the comments that were made. If it is appropriate to report back to the House, I shall.

I must also say that I always depend on hon. members for help and guidance along the way. I appreciate the hon. member's comments.

I have a question of privilege of which I have notice arising out of these matters. I really think I must move to it. The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS ALLEGEDLY MADE BY MEMBER FOR CAPE BRETON—EAST RICHMOND

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, during the debate that just took place, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond referred to the members sitting in this row, all of whom belong to the Bloc Québécois, and claimed they had renounced their oath of allegiance to the Queen.

I say the hon. member had no right to make these comments which may have various implications. It is a very serious matter to claim that someone did not keep his oath. As I see it, Mr. Speaker, there is a big difference between someone who does not believe in the constitutional monarchy and someone who believes that Quebecers and Canadians in general would prefer to change the system in a constitutional manner. I don't think this is renouncing one's oath. If we want to change democratically what we consider to be an anachronism and a mere symbol, I think we have a right to do so, while preserving our full allegiance to the people of Quebec and our constituents.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to mention this because it has come up several times since the House resumed sitting. I would therefore ask the Chair to take a position on this matter immediately and ask the hon. member to withdraw his comments. If not, he should be expelled from this House because he is the one who, by making such remarks, will disrupt for a long time the business of the House.

We come here in a spirit of cooperation to put forward our ideas and that of the Quebecers who are our constituents and, under no circumstance, will we allow a member of this House—and we urge the Chair to help us—suggest that we reneged on our allegiance in any way.

It is not to renege to ask for constitutional reform, for one thing, and , at the same time, that the Queen of Canada be replaced by the people of Canada. That stands to reason and I think that even the Queen would agree on that point.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the Queen was particularly embarassed, as were all Canadians and Quebecers, when the prime minister went and made her the request he made.

I ask you to support us, Mr. Speaker, by requesting from the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond to apologize to this House and to take back what he said.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may reply.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is rather ironic that we would have a member who professes in one statement to be a member of a group that wishes to be a party in this House, and on the other hand he says very clearly that they have taken their oath of allegiance and their oath of allegiance is now to the Queen, when in point of fact—

Mr. Barrett: Point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, to what particular motion are we speaking? What order are we dealing with? What is the point we are dealing with?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could help the hon. member. I heard others crying for help too.

The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead rose just a few minutes ago on a question of privilege. That is what I am hearing. As I understand the argument, he takes offence to something somebody else has said and feels that his privileges have been breached. I have been listening to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond in reply. That is where we are at the moment. I thank the hon. member for giving me an opportunity to clarify the matter.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my contention that there is no breach of privilege. The member has not established a prima facie case. I find it rather peculiar that in public statements in the newspapers, they portray a particular oath, if you will, or allegiance to the Province of Quebec. Now when someone questions questions their oath with regard to allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen, they wish to take issue with that.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is any point of privilege whatsoever.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I have received a considerable number of letters, and I am sure you have, on the subject of the oath of allegiance that each member is required to swear before taking his or her seat in the House of Commons. At some point, Sir, you will be called upon—and presumably this is the time, given the hon. member's point of privilege—for you to rule on what it means. What exactly does the oath of allegiance mean?

A member of this House was elected as a Bloc Quebecois member. He was quoted as saying in the press that the oath of allegiance that we swear was a mere technicality.

A ceremony took place in the city of Hull several weeks ago where the hon. member said to Canadians from one end of the country to another that he was washing his hands of the oath of allegiance that he swore, that each and every one of us swore, to the Queen of Canada and that his allegiance was to the Province of Quebec. That is fair enough.

Mr. Speaker, you will be required at some point to determine whether some hon. members in this House breached that particular oath of allegiance. If it is a mere technicality, then it has to be clearly specified in a ruling of the Chair. I believe that our oath of allegiance is more than a mere technicality. We are pledging allegiance to Canada. I would ask you, Sir, to rule that our responsibility as federal members of Parliament is to be loyal to Canada, loyal to a strong and united country.

• (1550)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has risen on a question of privilege. He was really rising on a point of order. I may or may not have to deal with that now or at some other time. Of course I can always hear that matter if it is required.

At the moment I have a simple, direct issue arising from the exchange. The hon. member has said that what was said by another hon. member is a breach of his privileges. I will consider that. I will look carefully at the "blues" and I will come back to the House.

On the other issue of the oath, it may well be that that matter could come in front of the Speaker. It may not be appropriate for the Speaker to rule on that but certainly I cannot deal with that on this particular point of privilege. I have to deal with that as I have heard it.

The hon. member for York South—Weston on a point of privilege.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I will put the question right now. I will raise it as a personal point of privilege, asking you as the Speaker of the House of Commons—

Mr. Speaker: I know what the hon. member wishes to do but I would ask him to give me written notice as he would ordinarily do, because I am also bound by the rules. I take it I will be expecting to have written notice from the hon. member.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke.

[Translation]

COMMENTS ALLEGEDLY MADE BY MEMBER FOR HAMILTON EAST

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I too rise on a question of privilege which does not relate to that raised by my colleagues earlier today. I do so with some hesitation because I know you have already dealt with a number of questions of privilege, but there was an incident in the House today and I do not think I can let it go unnoticed. I am referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton East who, unfortunately, is not in the House as I speak. First, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I do not expect you to rule on my question of privilege today, for I think the hon. member should be given the opportunity to respond.

Unless I am mistaken, Mr. Speaker, when the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council was addressing the House the hon. member for Hamilton East, from her seat in the House, criticized him for not speaking in French. Other members will confirm this. Indeed, the hon. member for Shefford indicates that he too heard the same remarks. I would not want to put words in her mouth, Mr. Speaker, so perhaps we might wait until we get Hansard to find out exactly what she said. But I want to raise the issue for the following reason: in Canada, unless the rules have been changed recently, as far as I know members of this House have the right to speak English or French, and nobody is allowed to criticize them for their choice of language.

I raise the point today, Mr. Speaker, not only as a member of this House but also as a French-speaking citizen because as such I reject this approach and I would not want anybody here or elsewhere in my country to criticize me for speaking French or to request that I speak English when I have every right to speak French. Mr. Speaker, nor would I want my children to be criticized for the same thing some day. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to review Hansard or what we call the "blues" and to give us a ruling on this matter.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps after the hon. member has seen Hansard it may or may not be necessary to pursue the matter any further. In any event, I would ask hon. members not to pursue it any further, especially because the hon. member for Hamilton East is not here. If the matter should be pursued further, I will of course receive a notice of a question of privilege and it will be heard some time tomorrow.

Orders of the day.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Valcourt that Bill C-74, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for South West Nova, it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur—Forestry; the hon. member for Mackenzie—Agriculture.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate on this bill. The amendments introduced last June by the Minister of Fisheries increase the penalties for fishermen who are caught in certain violations of the act.

I realize that matters other than the debate may be most interesting down in that end, but there are other people in Canada who want to get on with the debate on this particular bill.

This bill shows the Canadian people just how bad this government has failed in its fishery policy. The minister, when he spoke on the bill last June, told us of the clear measures that will be taken by the government. He said:

> —unless the government takes clear measures to show its intention to conserve and rebuild these stocks, they will be out.

In other words, knowing that these measures will come about, this would be a reason to conserve and restore the stocks. I will get back to that in a minute. He goes on to say:

> We are going to be the country which will have the more stringent fines for fishing violations. It just shows how important we see this issue to be.

In other words, he does not talk about this being a country that has a great resource, or that we have to develop this resource within Canada and have incentives that apply to all sectors of the fishery. He says that no, we are going to penalize the fishery. We are going to penalize who, Mr. Speaker? Who do we penalize in this?

I say that most of the present surveillance effort is concentrated on the inshore sector. The new enforcement provided in the adjustment program announced earlier is directed toward the inshore sector as well. It is the inshore sector that gets it again.

It stands to reason that those who will be caught overwhelmingly will be from the inshore sector. And why is that? Because our fishery in Canada has been an inshore fishery and has progressed to the point of being a very efficient inshore fishery. We just have to look at the subsidies which the government has handed out in the last year. They have been to the offshore sector of the fishery to help boost it, contrary to the free trade agreement. We should be self-sufficient in selling into the U.S. First of all, we subsidized National Sea on the northern cod, and more recently in the Seafreez deal where we paid off the loans of Canso and Burgeo that were outstanding for National Sea Products.

We have an efficient inshore fishery. We have an inefficient offshore fishery, and now we are going to bring in stiffer penalties. Who are they going to affect? Well, the bulk of the people are in the inshore fishery. So, the people in P.E.I. who violate part of the Fisheries Act or the small herring fishermen somewhere else who violate the Fisheries Act are going to be affected more by these amendments. I will speak of these penalties in a minute.

• (1600)

With regard to conservation, there are no solutions to conservation from the government by having stiffer penalties. I want to say why it is going to affect again the inshore, because in the past we have not been able to enforce the existing provisions for defying the Fisheries Act against the offshore sector or against the foreigners within our waters.

We do not have the power to do it, number one, because if we are talking about the Americans, they go quickly over the Georges Bank area and quickly get back into their own waters, away from any Canadian enforcement, if we had the capacity even to chase them. We have seen in the past that we do not really have that much capacity.

We do not enforce it in the same way against the foreigners who may get over. This morning, we heard my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls talking about the foreigners having overcaught their resources, but they are not penalized in the same way that an inshore dragger fisherman is when caught overfishing, and not on purpose, but in the abundance of the sea. Then, the vessel will be penalized if it has either to dump it or to bring it in.

We do not talk about the fact that it is that inshore fisherman who goes out every day. He is his own operator of the boat. He owns the boat, operates it, and is the one who is going to be affected.

We do not talk about the few big companies that are going to pay the penalties in the offshore for those fishermen who may have overfished. I find it quite offensive that the act will not differentiate between a violation within the inshore where it is owner operated for the most part, a violation in the offshore which is company operated, and a violation by the foreign fleet which is country operated for the most part. The heaviest burden is going to be on the inshore sector.

The minister hopes that bringing in stiffer penalties is going to provide for better conservation and restoring of the stocks. He does not talk about the dumping that has had to be done because of the poor conservation policy that the government has had in the past in the inshore fishery.

He does not talk about poor biological data that allows a place like the Bay of Fundy to have an abundance of fish and yet the department does not have the willingness to recognize this and allow the fishermen to fish there in a greater number this year.

The minister does not talk about having caught people who perhaps were transferring fish at sea, or dumping by the foreign fleet. He does not talk about providing better biological data.

Certainly, the fishermen would have a lot to tell him if this Minister of Fisheries and Oceans would listen. One of the reasons that this bill is so bad is that he has not consulted the various fishing groups or the various associations. Again, it is as the government always does: "Do it our way or no way". It is either "do it" or "suffer the consequences". We have seen this all summer. We have seen it in the fishery in the past. Once again, with this bill, we are seeing that it will be their way or no way.

I cannot believe that he could not have at least have presented the proposals in the bill to the fishing industry.

Another aspect about this bill is that it is bad. It is not going to help us with the Americans. Last week, we heard the Minister for International Trade say the government had reached a comprehensive enforcement agreement with the U.S. government in order to penalize the American fisherman who comes over into the Canadian side of the Georges Bank area. Their penalties will have increased.

None of us who have seen the fishery and had dealings with the United States know that there is a fair game in place. The President may say that he will attempt to have this passed by Congress, but there are the eastern seaboard states to consider. Those states have to give up their right to have jurisdiction over enforcement of the fishery. They have to delegate it to their federal government. At no time in the past, whether it was lobster when the Prime Minister said he would talk to President Bush, whether it was on the line of the Georges Bank dispute, or at any other time in the history with which I have been involved, have I seen the Americans give in to Canada when it related to the fishery.

I read in a newspaper that a federal Department of Fisheries spokesman said last Saturday that the tonnage that they catch is hard to estimate but cannot even come up to prosecuting the amount of fish that goes across that imaginary border, or that line that looks like a line but the Americans seem to be able to violate it at will. They just take millions of dollars without Canada being able to enforce our rules against the U.S.

Last week the Minister for International Trade said that they were hoping to see the fine go up on the U.S. side from $10,000 to $100,000, which almost matches what we have here before us in this bill.

I know I do not have a lot of time to speak on this, but I want to say that we have not got a good record in prosecuting the Americans. We have not got a good record in halting foreign overfishing in our waters. Personally, I do not think that we have had a very good record in going after the offshore for some of the overfishing that they have done. However, I do feel that this bill is not going to help to go after those sectors that I feel are offending our fishing rights within our 200-mile limit. I say that because I know that the government has slanted its policy toward what is big and not the benefit of what is small.

Another area in this bill that is just ridiculous is section 61 regarding information returned. This bill will impose red tape on the small inshore fishermen in Quebec, New Brunswick, P.E.I., Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and on the west coast. Just listen to this, Mr. Speaker. A person referred to in section 61(1), that is an ordinary little fishermen in a 45-foot boat going out to fish, may be required to provide information or to keep records or other documents relating to any of the following matters: the number of fish, the sex of the fish, the size of the fish, the weight of the fish, the species, the product form, value or other particulars of any fish caught, cultured, processed, transported, sold, or purchased.

Now, you tell me, Mr. Speaker, how the ordinary fisherman is supposed to take the fish out of the water, weigh it, look at the sex, look at the size, see what the species is, as the lines are going and other fish are coming out of the water. I do not know what the government thinks or what the burden is that they want to put on the fishermen, but the red tape that this particular section puts on the inshore fishery with is so ridiculous it does not bear talking about, but it is in the bill.

I cannot believe that this minister thinks that this will provide for the conservation and restoration of the stocks. This minister would be much better advised by his officials if he went dealt with the efficiency of the inshore and said: "Can we not get rid of the foreigners in our waters and fish under-utilized?" But, no, today the headlines of The Province, the C section of The Chronicle-Herald states: "Valcourt Sticks by Canso Deal". Mr. Valcourt said: "Silver hake and capelin have not been caught successfully to any extent by Canadian vessels."

Give us a deal. Give us a deal like the Minister of Fisheries gave out a month ago and I will retire from politics and trade the under-utilized species. I can certainly see trading under-utilized species or bartering. Give me an under-utilized species quota like you gave that company, and give every Canadian that.

But the government has never offered that to Canadian fishermen. In fact, it has not even listened to Canadian fishermen or the processors who on this appear to be together. The Fisheries Council of Canada and others are all saying that what the minister did with this deal is changed the playing-field. He changed it altogether. He said that nobody is against Canso and Burgeo. That is such a false argument. I have maintained that if the boats are given to Canso and Burgeo, they will survive because the boats will land the fish there. I have maintained that if the fishermen are given the amount of money that cancels their debts and to go out and equip themselves for the under-utilized species, we would all be fishing. If the amount of money in guarantees and loans given out in this deal was given to plants, they would also be able to fish, process, market, and keep the jobs here in Canada, as well as giving it away to other countries.

My colleague said this morning that we do not go into the other countries' waters. Since 1977 and the declaration of the 200-mile limit, we are the only country that is not fully utilizing a resource that is at its doorstep when there are thousands of individuals without work in the Atlantic provinces. We do not give those individuals the deals. We give it to one or two people. We give it to the big guy. We give it to the National Sea's or we give it to the Seafreez's. I do not think we give it to the people of Canso and Burgeo. If we did, we would be doing it for everybody. You do not change the playing-field by giving some people free fish while others have to go out and buy it.

I cannot believe that the government, is slanted in one direction and one direction only. That is what pleases it and it does not care about the rest of Canada. The government does not care about the little people. It does not care about an inshore fishery that has provided jobs and work for many people on the east coast. This is an example of that type of legislation.

We have asked for good biological studies. The government has said no. We have asked and presented plans to the government. I am not talking about northern cod but in relation to the southern part of Nova Scotia.

We have asked that, rather than cut back and have only one word in his vocabulary, capacity—over-capacity as stated in the Hâché report—why did he not listen to all the other responsible people in the fishery as to what they could have done to solve the problem? But, no, he has to do it his way, or as the government says it, "my way or no way". I think it is almost a song now in Canada. One either does it their way or it is no way.

We just saw the effect of it last week when we got eight new senators because the government did not want to play the game of Parliament. It is just my way or no way.

I know my time is short, Mr. Speaker, and I just want to say that at one point the minister said something and I challenge him. I challenge the minister when he says: "This is why it is proposed in the bill that for these offences the current maximum of $5,000 be increased to $100,000 on summary conviction and $500,000 on indictment". That is a drastic increase. He said: "Those who choose to violate the Fisheries Act and jeopardize the future of fishermen in Atlantic Canada as well as the Pacific coast, those who choose to take the livelihoods away from the kids". He may think he is taking the livelihoods away from the kids, but he is taking the livelihoods away from thousands of fishermen. He said: "Those who take the livelihoods away from the kids in Atlantic Canada who may become fishermen and some of them will, they will pay for it." They being the thousands of inshore fishermen.

This bill should allow that for an offshore offence the penalty should be so much greater because it is a much bigger enterprise, and that foreigners caught in our waters which are part of a big enterprise and freezer factory ships should be penalized more heavely. Why does he have to lump the inshore with the foreigners who are overfishing with the offshore who are not? In my view, it is only a company that is going to pay for it and some of them are being subsidized by the government.

The Americans who have been overfishing have been overfishing to the tune of thousands of tonnes of fish on Georges Bank and we cannot prosecute them. The enforcement is valueless until it is agreed to by the U.S. government and that means getting the east coast states to agree to it. This bill is bad legislation. It is slanted against the inshore fishery without, in my view, due justification because they want to conserve and restore the stocks. There are many other ways, if the minister would only listen, as to how you could conserve and restore the stocks in Atlantic Canada in the inshore fishery without having a bill—and I am not against the penalties being increased for true violations—that does not discriminate between violators that are inshore, offshore, foreigners or American.

Mr. Ross Reid (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be very brief. I just want to correct a few things that have been said and point out a couple of things because I think it would be unfortunate to leave some of the impressions that are out there.

First of all, if I may comment on Canso. I cannot recall how many weeks it was in this House that the opposition called for a solution to the problem at Canso. This government, in co-operation with a couple of small fish companies, was able, with the support of the government of Nova Scotia, the unions and the community of Canso, put together a deal that has not only saved that community but I suggest, it saved Burgeo as well. If you want to tell Bill Barry, a little fellow from Curling, Newfoundland, he is a big corporate company, I am sure he would be delighted. I am sure he lies in bed at night dreaming about the day that he is a corporate giant, but it is not the case right now.

If we can take underutilized species and be creative, as we have tried in the past to do, as we are spending tens of millions of dollars today in trying to do, we can save fish plants and communities and to enhance our fishery. In the past, things like silver hake have not been taken up because they do not suit our markets, our consumers or our way of fishing. If we can have others who come in and participate in those fisheries, all the better, we might make some progress.

I have heard a couple of times the comment that we do not go into other people's waters. It is a long way to go to other people's waters, except the United States. The hon. member has no concept of economy. A country like Portugal and Spain can afford to come to Canada. First of all, they have no options. The Portuguese are also fishing off Mozambique, Angola and the Falkland Islands. They are a little south of the fishing grounds. Why? Because they have no choice. The efforts of this government, supported quite a bit by members of this House in trying to reduce overfishing, have been relatively successful.

There has been great co-operation from all parties in this House to try and bring to the attention of the Europeans the need for action. I would suggest the results of the last NAFO meeting have shown that there has been some success there.

With regard to this problem of the department taking advice from its scientists and advice from its officials, the advice that is taken by the government is based on scientific advice of the best professionals available. We increased the amount of money that we spent on science and northern cod last year by $30 million. Of the $584 million we put in to increase our ability to deal with the problems in the fishery, a huge amount of that was directed toward increased science, not just the northern cod stock, but in the gulf off South West Nova and other areas like that.

With regard to the comment about the Bay of Fundy, my hon. friend had better be very careful. What we have said is that we would take the responsibility of providing the best advice from professionals, not amateurs like politicians. It is not in the interest of the fishermen.

With reference to section 61, empowering the government to collection information, Dr. Harris in his report made it very clear that we needed more information, more knowledge. We have the power to do that in a number of areas. This action makes sure we can collect that information if we so desire and need it. It is in the interests of fishermen that we have that information.

The hon. member knows and I know well enough, that you cannot go in and say to inshore fishermen: "You must take the sex, weight, size and age of every fish before you do anything with it." Be sensible. That is ludicrous. We have programs whereby we bring scientists together with fishermen, at the union level, at the community level. We are saying to fishermen: "You are a little bit special because you are part of this program". We are giving them a designation. It has worked very, very well in New Brunswick. We are doing more of it.

In Newfoundland, Mr. Larry Cody, one of the best scientists in this government has been out dealing and meeting with fishermen, asking fishermen what they do and asking fishermen for their advice. The thought that we could go in or we would or could go in and go through what the hon. member has talked about is absolutely ludicrous.

There are many more points. I am sure my friend has a response, she always does. I am also interested in hearing from my hon. friend from British Columbia.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I will only take a few minutes in case there are other people who want to ask me questions.

I would say, particularly on the subject of Canso, because I was a strong advocate in this House for Canso and Lockeport, that when you take the boats away from a community as was done by National Sea, you take away the whole livelihood of a community.

Mr. Reid: The boats are staying.

Ms. Campbell (South West Nova): Now the boats are going to stay in Canso. They have not gone back to Lockeport. All I am saying is that on top of that, you give those boats only the quota that National Sea thinks is fair. That is not what you are talking about. What was wrong in the Canso and Burgeo deal was that you changed the playing field. You gave them underutilized species that they could trade for stocks, barter with the Russians who are going to catch it and then you give them free fish to process and sell. Now most companies in Canada do not get a free product. That changed the playing-field.

I am just saying that when the Fisheries Council of Canada and the seafood producers of Nova Scotia and others all think this deal stinks, I have to agree with them. You are not helping Canso and Burgeo over the long run. When you cannot barter any more, how are you going to get the fish free?

The other thing I want to say is that countries like Spain and Portugal, or any other countries that fish here, foot the bill for the penalties in this act. The little fishermen in the inshore communities foot their own bills if they violate this act.

I say through the parliamentary secretary to the minister that the bill should make a difference. Whether it is a small fishing boat, an inshore or an offshore fishery, or a foreigner or an American the penalty—

Mr. Reid: The courts will do that.

Ms. Campbell (South West Nova): No, Mr. Speaker, the courts will only interpret what this Parliament puts into the legislation. A foreign country such as Portugal that supports its fishery and pays its penalty is not hurting the country. It is hurting the inshore. It is no way to improve conservation methods in this country or to restore stocks by having an attitude that will kill the inshore by heavy penalties rather than reversing and coming up with better policies. And on biological data in the Bay of Fundy, use the fishermen. They can tell you what is there. They can tell you that the foreigners should not be in the silver hake box next to the spawning grounds when they cannot go fishing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there further questions or comments? On debate, the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to be in the House and to speak today on Bill C-74, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, which was first read on June 6 and debated at second reading on June 19 and the debate that we are starting today.

I gather that the government had consultations yesterday about bringing this bill forward today and, although not planned, nevertheless we are prepared to participate fully in the debate in the House today, to make some comments about this legislation and about some of the changes that we feel can be identified in it and, obviously, to make comments about what to expect when this legislation makes its way into committee.

First of all, I want to just say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I want to thank my leader, the hon. member for Yukon. Following some recent appointments, I am now honoured to speak on fisheries issues as well as forestry issues. Why I think that that is a smart move on our leader's part is that if we are to truly develop a sustainable development policy for our environment and our resources in Canada, what we clearly have to do is pay careful attention to perhaps two of the most important resources there are in Canada right now, our forests and our fisheries.

I said in a statement yesterday, which I am sure you listened to carefully, Mr. Speaker, that the concerns I have about the policies of the present Conservative government and the Liberals, when they were in power and now in opposition, relate to farms, fish and forests, some of those basics in Canada that we come to rely on to make our livelihoods and also in which to recreate. I think the clear direction that our leader has given is going to develop the kind of policies and directions that I think will be in the forefront and the leading edge of policy that is going to ensure the kind of renewable resource policy that we need in this country.

This bill, C–74, is a bill to amend the Fisheries Act which, interestingly, was likely one of the first pieces of legislation passed by Parliament after Confederation. The Fisheries Act, first passed in 1868, has given, generally, the legal authority to the Government of Canada to conserve and protect fish habitats and to control and manage Canada's fisheries. It has been amended 40 times since 1868, which gives an indication of the amount of time and importance that Parliament gives to our fisheries. It is interesting, as a side note, that a lot of the words we use about the fisheries resource are the same ones that we use in forestry in terms of developing a resource and the problems that we have there.

Let us take a look at some of the issues in this legislation and some of the concerns that we in this party have over the bill. Before I start, I should give some credit to the member for Nanaimo who was our fisheries critic and did a great deal of the important background work on this proposed legislation prior to my taking over the responsibility. I thank him for that because he is certainly well known in that field and has a great deal of knowledge. His will be some big shoes to fill and we will see how it goes.

This proposed legislation, Bill C–74, is primarily oriented toward increasing the fines levied against those who either fish illegally or contaminate or destroy fish habitats. This is essentially the purpose behind the proposed legislation.

• (1630)

There are also provisions which strengthen the ability of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to gather the information necessary for the department to monitor fishing activity. It is one of the areas mentioned by the previous speaker. Clearly, when this legislation is before the committee, it is what we are going to have to take a look at in terms of the detail of that legislation and how it will impact on the small inshore operators.

In this context we are not opposed to this legislation. However, there are some very serious proposals which I will lay out in a number of points about this legislation that we will have to deal with in committee and in later debate.

First is the importance and need for public participation and debate in this legislation. I know the parliamentary secretary is listening carefully. I know he will enjoy, and I hope support, our proposal to have the committee travel when it deals with this legislation to have an opportunity to hear from people about this specific legislation and some of the proposals and changes that we will be proposing and making. Of course there will be changes that may come from the other parties as well. It is our intention to introduce those amendments and any others that are required either in committee or in the report stage of the legislation.

Let us take a look at the legislation. Basically it relates in a number of ways to what this government is trying to do in terms of The Green Plan which has not done well to date. I suppose at some point we will hear more from the Minister of the Environment as he tries to recover and gain some high ground with that plan. To date it has been considered by all to be a failure.

Two very important reports on the east coast fishery that have been debated and discussed in the fisheries committee and raised many times in the House are the Harris report on northern cod and the Haché report on the Scotia–Fundy groundfishery.

Perhaps I can add a certain west coast perspective to this bill at this point. There is a complete lack of any substantive background material on what this bill can do to try and crack down on polluters on the west coast. This is an indication of the government's failure to address the whole question of pollution from pulp mills and to try to clean up the Fraser River. There has been no serious attempt by this government. It is one of the shortcomings in the background material. We will be mentioning and referring to that later as we go.

The intent of the legislation is certainly laudable and one that I have said that we can support for that purpose. I put a question earlier today to a previous speaker. You can write all of these fine things into legislation or you can even put them into constitutions, but how can we be assured that those policies, laws, and rules are actually going to be followed up on and be acted upon?

Let me quote from a memo that came into the hands of the member for Skeena, our environment critic, about this particular point in relation to controlling polluters and obviously questions about overfishing by foreign countries on the east coast as well. I think it is an important message, not in a partisan sense, for the government to pay heed to and to ensure that it is implemented when we do pass this bill.

This memorandum and internal document from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is quite shocking to read. I want to read it into the record anyway because it shows the problems we run into when there is complete collapse within a department of any serious intent to follow the legislation or to apply the law. I am quoting here:

> We (DFO officials) have determined that DFO friendly corporations—will enjoy relative immunity from the Fisheries Act.

The memo went on to state that:

> —it must be appreciated that DFO habitat enforcement has reached an all time high in inconsistency—

My friends from the east coast pointed that out in terms of the reference to foreign fishing fleets in this area and the treatment of large operations versus the smaller inshore operations. The memo goes on to say that because of the immunity phenomenon, a large number of violators are not being properly pursued. It continued:

> It would appear that Alcan—

And other operators:

> —are given immunity from the law and we are just getting after the little guy.

That is not a pamphlet from the New Democratic Party or anything like that. That is a memorandum and some advice being offered by officials within the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

I would be most interested in any further debate, to hear from the parliamentary secretary or others on how we actually make sure that the laws that Parliament passes are actually applied and followed up on.

A second point that we have some concerns about is the proposed amendments contained in Bill C–74 which will bring the Fisheries Act into line with the penalties imposed on foreign fishing vessels caught operating or fishing illegally in Canadian waters under the provisions of the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

Under this act foreign fishing vessels caught operating illegally in Canadian waters face fines up to $500,000 and, if caught fishing illegally, the fine is up to a maximum of $750,000.

When the act I previously referred to was passed, the then member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands, Mr. Manly, raised the following points in debate which have become quite prophetic. I am quoting from page 2127 of Hansard, for December 15, 1986:

> —it is not enough for us to just raise the maximum fine. There has to be some way of getting the message through to the courts that they have to raise the level of fines they are imposing because in some parts of eastern Canada the courts are imposing very low fines when compared to the current maximum. If we are going to raise the maximum, we must send a message to our courts that international fisheries violations are serious enough that they should be considering imposing the maximum fines in a number of those cases.

Dr. Harris, in his final report on northern cod issued in February 1990, indicated that the warning given by Mr. Manly was not one listened to by the government. The provisions of the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act allow for severe penalties. However, and I am quoting from the report at page 127:

> In practice penalties have not even approached those levels. We cannot escape the feeling that the violation of fishery regulations—are regarded as mere peccadilloes; as if the whole matter of enforcement were a game.

I think members on the east coast have certainly brought much evidence before this House about those particular problems. Mr. Speaker, I know you are aware of all the newest reports from my province of British Columbia where the whole question of habitat damage, with which this bill is going to deal, is certainly going to be looked at very carefully.

One example that comes quickly to mind, which we raised in the House prior to our summer break, was the reference by a retired Department of Fisheries and Oceans official who at a public meeting felt comfortable in making the allegation, as he was no longer in the employ of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, that he and other scientists had been pressured into coming up with decisions regarding the Kemano completion project in northern B.C., in part of my riding.

We will be pursuing that further, because there is an example of an official from the department who is making a clear allegation. I advised him of how serious his concerns were. We will be following up on those provisions because I think those are some of the issues that we are going to have to deal with when we are discussing Bill C–74.

The third point is actually referred to or mentioned in the release by the minister that the government is packaging this legislation as part of its response to deal with the crisis in the Atlantic fishery. Contained in the package was reference to the intention of Fisheries and Oceans to increase its surveillance and enforcement capability. DFO will increase its patrol capability by chartering additional offshore and inshore vessels.

Two issues are important here. The first is that there was no indication of the amount of funding which would be allocated for such an operation. Second, there is the concern on the issue of privatization.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has not just discovered the fact that it is not capable of providing the kind of coverage it is mandated to provide under the Fisheries Act. Another example is: you can have all the rules you want but if you do not have the staff or if you cut back the staff, then you are simply not going to be able to implement the rules of Parliament and very important conservation and habitat protection rules which this legislation is going to try to bring in that we will be reviewing in committee.

Another point is clause 12(1) which if passed will enable the federal government to institute a full surveillance program that would ultimately see every fishing vessel outfitted with a transponder device enabling DFO to monitor every movement of those vessels. On March 19, officials with DFO were saying that a pilot project was planned which would see up to 10 offshore vessels being outfitted with these devices. However, according to the director of Atlantic operations, before there could be any wider application of this program "there would have to be a lot of consultation with industry". The passage of Bill C–74 will turn a pilot project into a permanent legal requirement which may have to be accommodated regardless of consultation.

I would be interested in hearing from the government on the progress that may or may not have been made in that particular area and, if we are going to be implementing something in law now that we considered earlier at one time, doing it as a pilot project before it actually becomes law.

This is one of our concerns with respect to this legislation as well. Section 35(1) of the Fisheries Act reads:

> No person shall carry on any work or undertaking that results in the harmful alteration, disruption or destruction of fish habitat.

According to the material provided by the minister, the examples cited were where fish habitat is altered as a result of road or bridge construction. No reference is made to, for example, the technology used in the conducting of the offshore fishery during the spawning season.

This is a particularly important part of this legislation. If we work on this legislation to improve it, and if there is good will on the government side and we have an indication that these laws will be followed, the Fisheries Act can and should be a vital instrument in ensuring the quality of our water and the protection of our fisheries resource, be it on the east or west coast or in any particular area where Fisheries and Oceans has jurisdiction. In my particular riding with the headwaters of the Fraser River, with three pulp mills, and with our concerns about the pollution of the Fraser River, a lot has to be done.

Our party is in general support of this legislation, Bill C–74. We think it needs some work. We will see the legislation to committee. It is our view that the committee should travel to hear the views of others on this particular point. I am referring in part to the questions of habitat protection. Also it would give all of us an opportunity, myself included, to tour Atlantic Canada and hear the fisheries concerns in that part of the country as well. We look forward to that debate in committee.

Given some of the debate that has taken place in the House today and given the concerns and attitude of the government, I move:

> That this House do now adjourn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to participate in the debate today. I just wish I would have had a little more time to get my information together.

By bringing this bill forward the government has shown the same old attitude. It will deal with the fishermen of Canada only when it is good and ready, not when its actions are needed. It is their way or no way.

As a member of this House I have asked the Minister of Fisheries and his predecessor when we could expect an aid package for the fishermen of Atlantic Canada. The fishermen were suffering because of federal mismanagement of the fisheries. The minister knew of the situation. Still he waited and waited while the fishermen continued to suffer.

After six or seven months of questioning in the House and protests in the streets of Atlantic Canada, the minister finally decided to act. When the fisheries aid package was announced in May there was a lot of smoke and mirrors but not a lot of new money or new ideas on how to solve the fisheries crisis.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans failed to address some of the serious problems facing the Atlantic Canadian fishery. The problem of foreign overfishing was not addressed in the minister's band-aid package and it is not properly addressed in Bill C-74.

Overfishing by foreign fleets on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks is a serious problem. The federal government's inaction is causing the stocks to be destroyed. One of the recommendations of the Harris Panel on the Northern Cod was:

> That Canada should seek international agreement to permit its management of all fish stocks—and that failing achievement of this objective, Canada should take unilateral action to acquire management rights in accordance with the provisions of the Law of the Sea Convention.

Why was this recommendation not acted upon? When is the government going to wake up and realize the damage that is being done by foreign fleets?

Not only is this government not helping fishermen but it is adding to their burdens. For instance, section 61(2) of the bill states that fishermen shall be required to keep records of the number, sex, size, weight, species, product form or other information particulars on the product caught. Other information required includes the time and place of the landing, gear used and other types of equipment used. This is more information than the Cabinet ministers are required to give when they fly on their government jets.

The basic problem with this bill is not so much what it is, but it is what it is not. The government is using its blind-sighted attitude in dealing with problems in the fishery. As far as the government is concerned, extra fines with no enforcement guarantees will solve the problem. Once again, the government does not want to go to the heart of the problem because it is afraid of what it will find.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments? Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Valcourt, seconded by—the hon. member for Kamloops.

An hon. member: What's going on?

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I must say I had not intended to debate Bill C-74 today because the projected business of the House was Bill C-73.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Riis: Now that we have changed this, allow me the opportunity to say a few words on these most important amendments to the Fisheries Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. The hon. government whip.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, we have a question of timing here. It was our understanding on this side of the House that the question had been called. Our observation was that the member who is now speaking was not in his place when that occurred. We are wondering whether or not the recognition of the word "debate" spoken from the back row is sufficient to continue the debate, or whether members have to be physically present in their place?

I am sure the House leader for the New Democrats would acknowledge that when the question was called, he was not in his place, but shouted "debate" from the back. I suggest this is not appropriate in terms of the way that we conduct our business.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway on a point of order.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, just two points on a point of order. First of all, my understanding is that following a speech, there is an opportunity for questions and comments. I stand to be corrected, but I do not recall the Speaker giving members an opportunity for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Oh yes, I did. I asked for questions or comments. I did not get questions or comments and then I asked for debate. As I asked for debate, the hon. member for Kamloops was coming down the aisle to speak. I recognized the hon. member for Kamloops, but I wish that you would not bring the Chair into this argument, please.

Does the hon. member for Shefford have a privilege or point of order?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, but from the moment you recognize a member— Unlike the government whip, you had not asked the real question at the time we were discussing in this House. Therefore, I compliment you for recognizing the member for Kamloops.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for St. John's East on a point of order.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to drag you into this any more than is necessary but you quite clearly said it has been moved by the hon. member for Madawaska—Victoria. I heard that quite clearly. My colleagues across the way agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I was just beginning to put the question. I said, "Mr. Valcourt, seconded by—" and the hon. member for Kamloops was walking into the Chamber. I was going to put the question, yes, but the hon. member for Kamloops, as many members do in this Chamber, walked in as he was ready to speak. Members do have 15 or 20 seconds to walk in from the back to the front and occasionally the Speaker does recognize a member. In due course I will have to recognize the hon. member for Kamloops again, but I now call it five o'clock.

it being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order paper.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia) moved that Bill C-250, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (grain handling), be read the second time and referred to a legislation committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to this private member's initiative, which was brought forward on behalf of prairie grain producers who depend, in such large measure, on the export market to move their product.

Hon. members, I am sure, will know that domestic consumption of wheat in Canada amounts to, perhaps, 7 per cent of the crop insofar as human consumption is concerned and perhaps another 10 per cent is consumed by animals. In excess of 80 per cent of the wheat crop has to go to export.

Hon. members will also know that prairie farmers have been beset, over the past number of years, by serious drought and today they face a very debilitating export subsidy trade war between the European Economic Community and the United States. The history of this goes back some years. Back in the 1960s, the common agricultural policy of the European Economic Community brought forward massive subsidies which led to over-production of a number of agricultural commodities, including wheat. Thus, those countries moved from a position of being net importers to the point where they had surplus and, when they had surplus, they began to dump it on the world market.

For a time, the United States suffered the consequences and saw its share of the wheat market decline. But, in the early 1980s, it appears that the Americans had had enough in terms of their loss of market share and decided to enter into battle with the people in Europe. Of course, we all know the result of that. There has been a vicious crossfire in terms of export subsidies. Both of these agricultural superpowers have been prepared to make sales of various grains to importing countries in the rest of the world, at massively subsidized prices. In effect, they are giving away a bushel of wheat for every bushel that an importing nation is prepared to purchase. The result has been a collapse in the world grain prices and very difficult circumstances for Canadian producers. Clearly, it is a buyer's market and has been for some time.

We, in Canada, have a very massive grain handling and transportation system which has developed over many years. It is a system which moves the grain from the prairie farm to the grain elevators by rail, road, canal, river, and ultimately by sea. There are some 37 unions which are involved, we are told, in the handling and transportation of grain at some point in the system and, of course, there are a great number of employers, the railways, the elevator companies, the ports, and so on. Each and every one of these entities, management and labour alike, represents an important cog in the wheel or link in the chain which moves the grain from the prairie farms to export.

Any one of these cogs or links is capable of breaking down and causing a stoppage in that vital flow of grain. When that happens, when the collective bargaining process breaks down and the problems between labour and management are not capable of being resolved in the usual collective bargaining process, a strike or lock-out results.

The question then is, who bears the cost? Unfortunately, it is not the parties in the collective bargaining process. It is not the companies and it is not the workers. Regrettably, it is prairie farmers and ultimately the Canadian public because when the market-place is not working, and it certainly is not working at the present time, it is the Canadian public who has to support the agricultural community, in this particular case the prairie grain and oilseeds sector, through the Canadian treasury. Something in the order of $20 billion, over the past six years, has been paid out to that sector and, unfortunately, because of market conditions more will be required.

The point of this bill today is to try to focus on this problem. Both sides of the dispute, labour and management, know that the movement of grain is an essential service. They know that if they fail in their collective bargaining process that the government has to come to the rescue. We go through this ritual dance virtually on an annual basis and the unions and the employers are content perpetuate this situation.

One then asks: How many days have to be lost? How many millions of dollars of sales are lost? How much misery is inflicted on third parties, such as the Canadian agricultural producer, before a settlement is finally imposed?

The companies know that they will get the business in the end. Whether it is the grain companies, railroad, shippers or whoever, they know that the grain has to come through their system. The unions as well know that they will get it in the end because sooner or later the grain has to go through the funnel, into the system, and down the chute.

The prairie farmer also knows that he will get it in the end. The problem of the prairie farmer is that it is more of an anatomical question at that point. The producer gets it in the end. It is the producer that has to bear the cost of the failure of labour and management to conclude their agreements. The prairie farmer loses in terms of lost sales, untimely delays, and having to pay demurrage while ships languish in port waiting for the opportunity to load.

The producers have a very difficult situation because, at the same time as they are beset by low world prices and ever-increasing input costs, they face this added possibility of further shut-downs in the grain handling and transportation system. Of course, the Canadian public does as well. When the farmer cannot get what he deserves from a market-place that does not work, whether it is because of destructive and unfair foreign competition, or whether it is because of destructive and unfair problems in terms of domestic labour-management strife, it is the farmer then who has to get it from the government. Canadian taxpayers have to contribute more through the tax system to find the money to help fund the programs that Canadian farmers need in order to survive.

It seems to me that we need to find a better way. Strikes and lock-outs are rather blunt, crude, and archaic instruments. Surely we can make the effort to seek more workable and more suitable alternatives.

This bill, Bill C-250, as worded, would curtail work stoppages by grain handlers, railway workers, and all those involved in the movement of grain from the farm-gate to export. A mechanism of binding conciliation would be implemented and so on. I gloss over it because it is not very important. In fact, I would urge that members in the House not waste particular time in looking at the wording of this bill, Bill C-250. The proposal in it is only one of many possibilities.

What I wish to do is to focus the intention of the House on the problem to try to secure some relief for the people who suffer when labour and management fail to resolve these problems. The bill is simply an attempt, once again, to get the House to pay some attention to a serious problem.

We are not here right now to union bash or to unduly criticize labour or management. What we would like to do is to try to find a better way. Surely, in our modern society, there is a better way than this sort of blunt instrument.

The subject matter of this bill cannot be dealt with in one hour of Private Members' Business or in five hours. I believe that it requires some study by a parliamentary committee where there is some research and members could seriously consider alternatives and examine them without prejudice and without any preconceived notions. Indeed, I would very much appreciate the consent of the House to a motion which would withdraw the bill and would in fact refer the subject matter to the appropriate committee and I will come to that in a few minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. Before the hon. member comes to that, I must advise him that he alone cannot put the motion. He will not be able to put that motion on his own bill.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): I appreciate your advice, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member did not let me finish. If he gets unanimous consent, yes; if he does not, he will have to get somebody else to put the motion.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That is the understanding that I have and I appreciate your confirmation.

• (1710)

It seems to me that if a parliamentary committee were able to take a look at the alternatives, it could examine what is done in other jurisdictions and perhaps it would conclude that what we have now, flawed as it is, is the only alternative and that it is the only workable system. Well, if that is the case, fine. I will accept that verdict. But at this point in time I do believe the situation is worthy of a look. I believe it is worthy of some examination. I do not think we should continue to blindly accept that our system, flawed as it is, is the only alternative.

It is perhaps ironic that we debate this bill today. It is a bill that I filed back in the spring of 1989. Today, there is literally no movement of grain because of the adverse conditions of increasing world supplies and that debilitating, cut-throat foreign export subsidy war we referred to earlier.

As we speak, most of the storage in the country's elevators and terminals is full and no major sales appear imminent. It is a very difficult time for grain and oilseed producers. They need some interim help pending the introduction and establishment of grain and oilseeds safety net programs, the Guaranteed Revenue Insurance Plan and the National Income Stabilization Account. These are programs which are being developed by the grain safety net committee under the auspices of the "growing together strategy" put forward by the Minister of Agriculture last fall.

These conditions make it doubly important that we resolve this problem of shutdowns in the flow of grain, because when the market improves—and sometime in the future it will—and the Canadian Wheat Board makes some major sales and our grain handling system is being pressed to the limit in order to move that grain and maintain Canada's reputation as a trustworthy, reliable supplier of high quality product, at that time the same old anachronistic weapons are going to be trotted out. it is going to be the prairie farmer who again pays the bill.

I circulated the bill among a number of prairie farm organizations for their comments and it is interesting to note some of them.

The United Grain Growers, with some 73,000 members, in fact, call for the Government of Canada to make Canada's grain handling system an essential service. They also ask the government to implement a system of binding arbitration with no strikes or lock-outs.

The Alberta Women in Support of Agriculture state:

> Insuring the shipment of grain to our export customers is very important to the grain industry and to the country as a whole. We cannot afford to lose customers or potential customers because our shipping system is not reliable.

The Western Canadian Wheat Growers represent some 11,000 wheat growers and they wish to endorse the passage of this bill as it stands. They state:

> Our industry is critically dependent upon the services provided by grain handlers and railways. Whenever there is a work stoppage, and there have been many in the past, we face the prospect of lost sales and a damaged reputation as suppliers.

The Keystone Agricultural Producers of Manitoba at recent annual meetings have adopted resolutions calling for the handling of transportation of grain to be declared an essential service.

A number of farm organizations are supportive of the idea behind this bill. The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, it appears, is not. I had a letter from the President of that organization, Mr. Stevenson, who stated, and I quote:

> —you will note that we continue to use a system of labour relations that places the responsibility for achieving collective agreements squarely where it belongs—on the parties who are directly affected by its terms and conditions.

He goes on to say, and I quote:

> As a farmer, I do not want to see the flow of grain stopped; but as the President of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool I want to ensure that we are able to achieve the goals we set relative to the collective bargaining process. For these reasons, among others, I do not believe that legislation such as you are proposing is appropriate.

I hasten to add that I do not expect this particular piece of legislation to be approved, not at all. It is simply a device to get the subject matter in front of the House in the hope that it may, in fact, be referred to the appropriate committee for some study. Perhaps, in the world today, we are capable of finding a better way to ensure the much needed movement of grain without having to put up with the agony and the costs of these various work stoppages, regardless of whose fault they may be.

I certainly agree with the wheat pool when it states that the responsibility lies with the parties who are bargaining. I wonder what happens when those parties fail to live up to their responsibilities, whether it is one or the other or both. Again, it is the innocent third party, the grain producers of western Canada and ultimately the taxpayers of Canada who have to pay the shot. I frankly very much doubt if the positions expressed by the president of the pool is in keeping with that of the majority of the individual members.

The Country Guide in May 1987 summed the matter up in an editorial headed "Grain must keep moving". In referring to a particular strike or stoppage at that time, it stated, and I quote:

> This doesn't have to happen. Since everyone is pre-programmed for the government to step in anyway, it makes sense for that intervention to take place before grain movement is disrupted or even threatened with disruption.

The editorial goes on to say:

> No one likes to restrict freedom of action by any group. But the accidents of geography, history, economics, and politics have combined to place prairie farmers at the mercy of a handful of individuals who can cut off access to grain and oilseed markets. The balance of power is too one-sided. In the minds of reasonable people, a strike that disrupts grain movement this year is unthinkable. The government must make sure that reason prevails and the unthinkable doesn't come to pass.

I believe that most prairie producers would find themselves in complete agreement with the editorial as expressed by the Country Guide three and a half years ago, but just as valid and poignant today.

In canvassing this situation, I have relied on the viewpoint of individual producers in my area of Saskatchewan and across western Canada who tell me that they are deeply disturbed by this process which seems to go on and on.

I recall dealing with Thunder Bay, the maintenance of ports act in the fall of 1986. In the summer of 1987 we were called back here for the Maintenance of Railway Operations Act. In early 1988 it was Prince Rupert, the grain handling operations there. In the latter part of 1989 it was legislation which sent the seaway workers back to work again.

I am not here to comment on who was right and who was wrong, but we do know who pays the price. The question then is when the collective bargaining process breaks down, what are we going to do? Are we going to continue to allow the grain producers of this country to pay the shot? The whole process seems to me to be embarrassing. It is costly, unfair, and is simply not in keeping with the structure of modern day society.

We have sophistication in the hospitals. We have all sorts of operations to transplant. We can put people in space with all sorts of sophisticated techniques, and yet the method of resolving problems, the labour-management process, date back literally to the stone age.

The hon. member says perhaps this is not the answer. Maybe it is not. I am not pretending that it is. I am simply asking, can we not in this place refer it to a committee for some study? Perhaps we can find out what they do in other jurisdictions. Maybe it is the same thing. If it is, I will hold my peace. But, I urge members on all sides to not talk this out but rather to consider at least searching for some other alternatives.

I see that my time is almost up, and so what I am going to do at this point is ask whether in this House there would be unanimous consent for me to withdraw this bill and, in fact, refer the subject matter to the appropriate committee which, in this case, might well be the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

I wonder if I could have the agreement of members in this House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am afraid there is not unanimous consent.

The hon. member has 30 seconds left in his speech.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in the brief bit of time left to me, let me just say that I am rather disappointed but not surprised. It is pretty clear that the interests of big labour and big business on the one side and the prairie farmer on the other really cannot exist under the same roof. Their interests are very much opposed.

I had hoped we might be able to seek out a solution in this place. It appears that that time has not yet come. I am disappointed particularly with members of the New Democratic Party. Many of them come from the prairies. They come from Saskatchewan. They pretend on the weekends to be in support of the prairie grain producer. On Monday morning, they come back into this place and bow to the dictates of big labour. It is extremely disappointing.

• (1720)

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make some comments on the bill presently before the House.

Let me say to the hon. member who just spoke that there is no alternative. Never did I think that in the House of Commons there would ever be a bill brought in that was going to take away the right to strike from the employees in this country.

It is a fundamental right that belongs to and has been fought for over the years. To think that some member would say in the House of Commons that the right to strike should be taken away from the employees in this country deserves some mention not only from this side of the House but from my friends who I am sure will follow me. Comments like that must be addressed, and at the earliest possible time.

If there is one group of individuals in my constituency—I am sure in many parts of this country—who have been hard done by by the Conservative policies, it is the grain handlers, and particularly the grain handlers in Thunder Bay.

If the hon. member wanted to make comments on how to solve the problems in the grain industry in this country, perhaps he should have been better advised to give some degree of consideration to the St. Lawrence Seaway, the viability of the greatest inland waterway in this country, and perhaps to the largest terminals that are available for grain storage. Those are located in the city of Thunder Bay, the area that I represent.

I do not know how much more the grain handlers in Thunder Bay can take at the hands of this government. We know that the grain business in Canada is affected in three ways. It is affected by legislation, where our markets are and, unfortunately, it is affected by politics.

In so far as the legislation is concerned, the Western Grain Transportation has to be changed. We can no longer rely on the theory that distance is going to be the relative factor in how we ship and subsidize the movement of grain in this country. We have got to change this act, and we have got to start to realize the costing mechanism that is available.

I think what we have to do with respect to the Western Grain Transportation Act is to get some accurate costing on what it costs the railways, CP and CN, to move a tonne of grain certain distances in this country and not to relate the cost of those areas in just the distances that are travelled. So the Western Grain Transportation Act has to be changed.

We were led to believe so many times that markets had a great bearing on why the ports in Vancouver and Prince Rupert were so busy, and why they were experiencing the movement of grain up to 60 per cent or 70 per cent of all the grain that we export in this country, until Iraq.

Iraq has always been a traditional market that was served through the port of Thunder Bay to the down river ports and then over to the mid-eastern countries. When the ships were stopped because of the embargo on grain, the ships that were stopped that were loaded for grain and sent to Iraq were not in the down river ports in the St. Lawrence. They were not in the ports of Thunder Bay, but were in the port of Vancouver.

This dispelled the theory that we have been led to believe, that the markets were in the Pacific Rim and not the markets that were traditionally served by that great inland seaway, the St. Lawrence Seaway and the port of Thunder Bay.

Unfortunately it seems, that, although we do not like to acknowledge it, that politics does play a part in where and how the shipment of grain is handled in this country. That is the reason for the disparity and the inequity that is caused because of the absence of grain going through the port of Thunder Bay, using the St. Lawrence Seaway and utilizing the magnificent structures in the down river ports in Baie Comeau and other centres around Montreal.

When I got this legislation, I could not believe what the member was proposing as to how to solve the effects of certain labour problems in the grain industry in Canada. I asked one of my friends who is involved in the grain industry, and I would like to read with your indulgence the views of the grain handlers in Thunder Bay regarding this particular bill.

These views were passed. I thank Mr. Herbert Daniher, the General Chairman of the Canadian Lakehead Grain Elevators Workers Transportation and Communications Union. He said to me that the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia is absolutely wrong when he proposes that the right to strike be taken away from all grain handlers in this country.

Let me quote what Mr. Daniher has to say:

> The truth of the matter—

I am quoting to his words.

> —is Thunder Bay grain elevators have been involved in only two labour disputes in the past 23 years. Both disputes amounted to only a 7-week work stoppage in total. After the 17-day dispute of 1981 the Thunder Bay grain industry accounted for those missed days by moving as much grain through the port in a 4-day period than was moved through other ports the entire year. Again after the labour dispute of 1986, similar records were set. This bill would destroy that type of relationship between the union and the companies.
> This bill would make it impossible for the parties to have an effective, productive relationship because the parties wouldn't be allowed to settle their differences and reach an agreement both the union and management could claim as their own during the tenure and length of time of the contract.

Mr. Daniher goes on to say:

> It's important that both parties be put to the strict test. If they want to retain or acquire a certain right, is it important enough to go the distance for it? In most cases, due to a relationship developed through many years of collective bargaining, both parties rally to find a compromise or fair and equitable solution to the problem rather than shutting down the industry.

The best result a binding conciliation board could give would be sometimes the result that both parties do not agree to. The imposed settlement would ultimately be made by someone whose job would be not to create a fair, productive, harmonious workplace but whose job it would be to impose a settlement without regard to the effects on the relationship between the parties. The union and the companies would be forced to accept piecemeal solutions versus real, workable solutions hammered out at the negotiating table where labour contracts should be settled.

A bill such as the one before the House today would do nothing but harm the grain industry and the country as a whole. If such a bill were passed, does that mean there should be a bill to ensure the farmers deliver their product not when the price is most advantageous but when it is dictated for the farmers to do so.

This bill that is before the House, although it is alluded to help the farmer, would be detrimental to the farmer. That is the very case they find themselves in today in the west when they cannot get the price that is needed for a tonne of grain. They would be forced, if that bill were passed, to submit their grain for sale when the prices were at a most disadvantageous stage.

The grain industries have been shut down a hundred times longer in our history due to agricultural policies, due to what the United States is doing with respect to labour disputes involving grain elevators, not what is happening in Canada.

Broken bridges, canal walls falling in, the Canadian Wheat Board's marketing policy, surely these areas must be of greater concern to the people who are involved in the very intricate business of growing and selling wheat in this country than destroying the harmonious productive industrial relations climate that exists between the elevators and the people in the port of Thunder Bay and those involved in the elevator industry.

Mr. Speaker, let me conclude, and I know my time is running short. What we are talking about in this bill that is presented by this member and is before this House today is a fundamental freedom. We almost challenge the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in this country. It goes without saying that one of the fundamental freedoms that we have had is the freedom of association, freedom of speech in this country, and we hold that inalienable.

What this member is proposing today is taking away a fundamental right of our workers in this country that they fought so many years to get, that is the right to withdraw their services if they cannot get the deal that they think they should be getting. That is just not acceptable to this party, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to deal with a statement made by the member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia—that is almost as bad as Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Mr. Speaker—with respect to his motion to have this matter go to committee.

• (1730)

I point out that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections is chaired by one of his members. The majority of members on that particular committee are members of the Progressive Conservative Party who are on that particular committee. They have looked at all matters that are drawn to come before the committee and at whether they fit certain criteria to come before the House of Commons as a votable matter.

In this particular case this matter has been chosen not to be a votable matter and to go no further than the debate in the House today. That was as a result of them looking and deciding, for whatever reason, that this particular bill lacked what it took to become a votable matter for further discussion. I point that out simply to make sure that everybody who is watching understands full well what the procedures are here.

If I can turn directly to the bill before the House, I think it is important to look at the crux of the proposed amendment. I would like to read it into the record. It refers to section 89 and I suggest is the crux of the matter. It reads:

> Notwithstanding subsections (1) and (2), no trade union of employees engaged in the handling, storage, transportation or shipping of grain shall declare or authorize a strike and no employer of such employees shall declare or cause a lockout.

That is what we have before us, something that is saying notwithstanding what the law says we are going to single out one sector or our economy and say no fellas, or women, you can no longer use the right to withdraw your services.

As has been pointed out by my friend in the Liberal Party, that is a right that has long been fought for throughout the history of labour. It is the only thing that an employee has to use in order to better his lot.

We do not want to go back to the sweatshop days. We have progressed far beyond that. I do not want to lose sight of how important it is for the movement of grain to continue as uninterrupted as possible to the ports. It is important not just for the farmers, but it is important to the economy of the prairies and it is important to the economy of Canada as a whole. I caution that the way of doing this is not by setting, as unfortunately this member did toward the end of his speech, the trade union or labour movement against the farmers and the farmers against the grain handlers. The provisions are there for an adequate collective bargaining system.

I have been involved throughout my lifetime in strikes when I worked in the trade union movement. I have been involved as an employer in strikes and lockouts as a member of town councils. I have been an employer as a lawyer. I have also worked for the B.C. department of labour in labour standards. I understand the movement and I understand what is going on. I have worked through all of them. I have been involved in a number of strikes and lockouts in both the mining industry and in the pulp and paper industry, as well as lockouts and strikes on the municipal level. I have been involved in the bargaining process on both sides of the fence, on both the labour and management sides.

The collective agreement process works if given the opportunity. We only have to look in the grain industry to this summer in particular when the type of job action anticipated in this bill was avoided by the parties, when an agreement was reached between the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and the grain workers' union. Again it shows that the collective agreement process does work.

I wonder if this is the thin edge of the wedge. We legislate now the grain workers—and I agree that the movement of grain is important to the economy of this country—but do we now expand what we are doing here? Do we expand it into those areas in small communities where the community is being devastated because of a lockout or strike situation? Do we expand it every time that there is a nurses' strike, a teachers' strike, or a lockout because it is essential that these people get back to work for the very economy of the communities?

Do we continue in this vein? Do we stick the wedge in, try to split it wide open and gut the collective agreement process in Canada? I suggest no. There are other alternatives.

The conciliation process as set out here in part can and should be given the opportunity to work. People should be given that opportunity to reach an agreement. They should be able to use the right that they have earned in order to withdraw their services if that is the case or, in the case of a lockout situation, I suggest that management can do the same thing.

I do not think we accomplish anything with this particular motion before us but cause heartache and problems. Every time we get into difficulties and if it hurts us personally, the temptation is always there to short circuit the system; let us find a way around the inconvenience. It is natural.

I put it into very basic terms as we look at whose ox is being gored. We do not want to turn grain handlers against farmers. We do not want to turn farmers against grain handlers. We want people to be given the opportunity to use a system that in fact works.

If we look at the Canadian Autoworkers' recent strike against Ford, they used the system and in a very short time were back at work. I emphasize once again that the system works.

The hon. member says that the farmers would love to hear that. Farmers want more money, and I think that we should be looking at the over-all picture of what this government has done for farmers. Let us make farming more viable. Let us not try to turn one group against the other. Let us get them all working together so that at the end of the day farmers can make an adequate living and the grain gets transported by people who have used the collective agreement system to get that grain across.

We cannot attack a system that has been so hard fought for and hard worked for. I suggest that this bill was found wanting by the privileges and elections committee with good reason. I would not support the bill.

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased today to second the motion of my colleague from Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia and to spend a few minutes speaking in favour of Bill C-250.

The purpose of this bill is to outlaw strikes and lockouts in the grain handling and transportation industries. It is unfortunate that the member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon had not listened to what my colleague said in his remarks concerning him not being hard and fast about the particular wording of the bill being what he wanted or needed. He would be perfectly willing to have the subject matter go to a committee of the House and find that better way that he spoke of.

• (1740)

In my riding of Dauphin—Swan River in western Manitoba we have roughly 25,000 miles of farmland. We probably have some of the best oilseed growing land in the country. Coarse grains, pulse crops, are grown in my part of the province. Strikes and lockouts in the grain handling system are very serious not only for the primary producers in my riding but for all of my constituents, because in one way or another they all depend on agriculture. It is the number one industry by far so everyone depends on farmers and farming.

As I said, strikes or lockouts in the system are very serious. It is like traffic on a freeway. As long as things are moving smoothly, nobody notices how quickly things are moving. As soon as you have a bottleneck on a freeway, things back up pretty quickly. That is what happens in the grain handling system. It works well. Every piece, every cog in the system is very important: the grain handlers, the grain companies, the railway workers, the producers. They are all very important, but if one of those cogs breaks down the whole system backs up very quickly.

Since I have been a member of this House for a little more than six years, there have been three occasions I can think of where there has been work stoppages in the grain handling system. In each case when the New Democratic Party had to stand up and choose between organized labour and the farmers, it picked organized labour every time.

It has happened many other times in the past, but there are three times that I have personally stood and supported the producers in western Canada and I have seen the NDP across the way stand up and do exactly the opposite. I think it is important that the farmers in Canada know that because, as my colleague said, one thing is said to the farmers on the weekend, they come here, and the other hat goes on pretty quickly.

We are talking about a major industry in Canada. Grains and oilseeds in Canada account for $5.7 billion in exports every year. That is big business. Bill C-250 brought forward by my colleague from Saskatchewan is being brought forward on behalf of grain producers, but as I mentioned it is important that the interests of every cog, every person involved in the grain handling system, be taken into account.

The conflict resolution process, as it exists today, is very tedious and very time consuming. I cannot believe what I just heard from the previous speaker, the member from British Columbia, who said the system works. If I went back to western Canada and stood before a group of farmers and said that to them, I would be strung up in pretty short order because the system does not work. It works fine as long there are no work stoppages, but if you told a farmer in Canada that the system was working when there was a work stoppage, look out. As my colleague from Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia has said, there must be a better way.

In the event that Bill C–250 that we have before us today is not the best way, then I think the best way to look at it would be to refer it to an all-party committee of members of this House and come up with the best way. Many of the comments brought forward in the prepared speech by the member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon could very well come before that committee and be considered. We are not saying that those are not valid points. They have to be considered along with the others, but the interests of the producers have been ignored every time there has been a dispute to this point, and they have got to be taken into account as well. How could any MP in this House who purports to have the interests of farmers in mind oppose such a move?

Therefore I would like to move the following amendment to Bill C–250. I move:

That the motion be amended—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am afraid the hon. member seconded the motion. Therefore he cannot move the amendment. Is the hon. member finished with his debate?

Mr. White: We will come to that later then, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry. I thank you for your advice. I was unaware of that, but I would hope one of the members who speaks after me would move the amendment that was first alluded to by my colleague from Saskatchewan and that I would support as well, that the subject matter of the bill be referred to a committee for further study and to come up with a better way.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to enter this debate on the private member's bill, Bill C–250, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code.

What I would like to talk about is the kind of charade that is being played here today. I beg your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, for a moment. As a fairly new member, I was led to believe that when it comes to private members' bills, if you had an idea that you thought made a lot of sense, you put it into a private member's bill and put it in front of the House for debate. You did not just throw out a piece of legislation and tell the people who are going to debate the matter, for or against, "Just ignore that bill, it is not any good anyway. It is just to start the talking".

Mr. Speaker, we do a lot of talking in this House. However, we are being asked to deal with a particular piece of legislation, in this case, a private member's bill which asks for some very specific changes to the Canada Labour Code.

First of all, the changes the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia talks about relate to a right that workers in this country have fought for for over 100 years. They have put a lot of time and effort into learning their trade and they put pressure on governments and on companies to give them the ability to pull their services, if they are not allowed to make a decent living in this country.

Some of us propose that unionism is not a political party. To some of us unionism is the art of collective bargaining, the ability to get a good standard of living in this country. That is exactly what unionism is all about, what collective bargaining is all about and what, in essence, pulling your services is all about, if you cannot make a good deal.

I want to talk about some of the issues and statements made by members of the Conservative Party relating to the fact that farmers always get an unfair deal. If we take a good look at the railway strikes which took place in this country as well as the grain-handlers' strikes, very serious consideration was given to what would take place if we let those individual unions stay out for too long and, therefore, there was back-to-work legislation. That is a prerogative of this House. When strikes go on too long and this House feels that it is hurting the economy as a whole, then we have the ability to legislate a particular group of individuals back to work. If you look back in history, in the case of the railway union for example, they have been legislated back to work after a period of one week, in most cases, and I do not think that that was unfair.

I want to talk a little about the fact that the hon. member feels that because it is an essential service these individuals should have their rights as Canadian citizens and workers taken away.

Let us just use an example which we saw not too long ago, the nurses in Alberta. There was legislation in place, but the fact is that legislation did not work. What did the nurses do? They broke the law.

What happens when you put a piece of legislation like this into effect that, in essence, stops 37 unions and thousands and thousands of employees in this country from having their right, to choose if they want to continue to work for an employer when they believe that they are getting an unfair deal. Sooner or later, in something of this magnitude, people will be forced to take matters into their own hands. Legislation is only as good as people will allow it to be, if they have respect for its intent. That is why we have used back-to-work legislation versus mandatory non-strike rules which would, in essence, trample all over people's rights.

I want to use another example. What would happen in southern Ontario if we use this same scenario that the member put to us today for the auto workers? In southern Ontario the auto workers are a big portion of its economy. What would happen if we were to tell them that they were no longer allowed to strike, that they were an essential service because of the effect of an the auto workers strike on the whole southern Ontario economy. In fact, I think I can say that it ripples through the whole Canadian economy because that is how big and important that auto industry is to Canada. What we do not say or what I do not hear the members opposite saying is, let's not let the auto workers strike. The hon. member is looking at the situation in very simplistic terms and the fact that the farmer or the producer is the individual who is hurt.

• (1750)

Everyone gets hurt during a strike. Believe me, the workers get hurt, the company gets hurt and yes, third parties get hurt. But the most important part of this whole scenario is that, through a period of many, many years we have built a system, sometimes cumbersome and very slow, but the best system in the world so far, that allows workers to have rights and to negotiate with their employer in good faith. When they feel that the good faith is not there or they are not getting a deal that is necessary to take home for their families and to have the kind of living they are looking for, then they pull their services. That is not too difficult to understand.

I would also like to go back to what the hon. member talked about earlier. Never have I heard a member come forward and say, well, here you go, never mind this but we will use this as a talking point. Are there not other mechanisms to be able to do that?

Perhaps the member could write the chairman of the transport committee and ask him if it is possible for this matter to be put on the agenda for discussion. My colleague from Thunder Bay would tell you very quickly that they would be more than willing to entertain looking at other ways of improving the transportation system, which is what we are really talking about here, and not that we have to pull workers rights to strike or allowing companies to lock out workers or the other scenario when what we are talking about is a transportation system that does not seem to work very well and the modern kind of system that we must have to be competitive.

I would also suggest that the member very seriously consider that over on that side of the House is where the government sits, in case he wondered. If the government feels there are some legitimate problems, it can also put forward a motion that can go to committee that would allow us to look at an issue as large as the transportation system as it relates to the hauling of produce for farmers from the west. To come forward and say, just ignore this bill, it is just a talking point, I do not want to union bash and take away the rights of the workers, but I would like to resolve an issue.

I suggest that he use his staff and the research at his disposal to come forward with something a little more concrete that we can debate and not to use the charade that this is a talking point. In essence, his real intent is to severely handicap workers and not allow them to have their rights. That is not democracy. Democracy may not be the best system in the world for some people but for some of us it is the only system and the price that we have to pay for it is the fact that if we have to allow certain disruptions in this country for a worker to have his rights, then we will do that.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, entering into today's debate on Bill C-250, I would like to make a few brief comments about the bill and the concerns from someone who comes from northern Ontario and from an area where agriculture is also very important. I also understand some of the frustrations that my colleagues from western Canada have gone through for the last number of years.

Bill C-250 is intended to outlaw strikes by employees engaged in the handling, storage and transportation of grains. It also prohibits lockouts by employers of such employees. The bill would seek to accomplish the objectives by a blanket prohibition of the right to strike and the right to lock out. The collective bargaining issue in a dispute between unions and employers would be resolved through the appointment of an conciliation officer. The majority of the employees performing these functions are governed under the Canada Labour Code and are subject to the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

The framework for collective bargaining established by the Canada Labour Code is designed to encourage the resolution of disputes without work stoppages, and in the vast majority of cases collective agreements are, in fact, reached through the normal process of negotiations provided for by statute.

The government recognizes that an effective, efficient and reliable transportation system is critical to the maintenance of Canada's reputation as a dependable supplier of grain and will continue to assist labour and management in resolving the collective bargaining disputes. I also recognize, along with my colleague from Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia and also the member for Dauphin—Swan River, how important it is for them to be able to communicate and try to look and see if adjustments can be made in pieces of legislation.

Therefore I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-250, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (grain handling), be not now read a second time but that the order be discharged and the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate?

An hon. member: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is a debatable motion. The hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, the NDP is not blocking it again.

I have one minute to make a 10-minute argument and the members opposite do not want to hear it. They are afraid of something.

I do not profess to be an expert on grain handling but I do know a little bit about collective bargaining and what this bill is intended to do. Whether the members opposite want to admit it or not, this bill is the beginning of union busting, plain and simple.

We have worked for many years in this country to give workers rights, to give them the ability to bargain, and to receive fair return for a fair day's work. This bill contravenes all of those efforts.

I understand I have 20 seconds left, Mr. Speaker. If this bill had been introduced in the form of anti-scab legislation rather than in its present form, with its sole purpose being the outlawing of strikes and lock-outs, if there had been an incentive for the employers to sit at the bargaining table and come up with a solution prior to a strike, I think there would have been unanimous consent in this House to support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

FORESTRY

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, on May 10 last I directed a question to the Minister of Forestry concerning the serious effects of the government's monetary policy on the forest industry. Here is one of the questions I asked, and I quote from page 11266 of Hansard:

Given the forestry minister's responsibility to protect the interests of the forest sector, and given the disastrous effects on that industry of the government's high dollar policy, what measures is the minister taking to help ensure that the high dollar will be lowered or, at the very least, what measures is he proposing to offset the harmful effects of this policy on the forest sector?

Not satisfied with the minister's response to this question I thought I would try to elicit more information this evening.

The minister knows how important the forest industry is for the Canadian economy. For example, it employs about 300,000 workers and indirectly, gives work to 500,000 more. In 1988 productive forest lands brought in more than $30 million in exported goods. In the Canadian manufacturing sector, one out of seven dollars comes from the forest industry. It contributes in excess of $17 million to Canada's net trade balance, more than the total net trade balances in agriculture, fisheries and mines.

The forest sector is larger than those of the car-making and oil industries. In addition domestic and foreign sales of forest products account for a Canadian annual trade which brings in close to $25 million.

[English]

The monetary policy of the government to which I am referring in the question has to do with the high dollar value and that is linked to the high interest rates. I just want to point out the impact that this has had on the economy in general. I want to quote a few statistics here.

In regard to corporate profits and bankruptcies, corporate profits fell 17 per cent last year and are expected to fall an additional 10 per cent this year. During the first six months of 1990 there were 23,651 bankruptcies. That is up 30 per cent over the 1989 period and up over 3,000 from the worst showing during the recession of the early 1980s.

I will put this in context from the beginning as I am not blaming all of this on the monetary policies. There are other factors as well, but certainly it has had an effect.

In the manufacturing and professional job area, 148,000 manufacturing jobs, representing 6.9 per cent of all jobs in this sector, were lost between June, 1989 and June, 1990. Shipments are declining in 17 out of 22 sectors, the worst showing since the 1981-83 recessionary period.

In regard to the budget, Mr. Wilson's 1990 deficit figure was based on an average interest rate of 11.1 per cent. We know that the interest rate is somewhere around 13.38 per cent on average over the first six months of this year. This means that if Mr. Wilson wants to meet his deficit target he will have to lower rates to an average of 8.82 per cent for the second half of 1990, a drop of 4.56 percentage points. I should have asked how many more jobs have to be lost in the general economy over all.

Since my question had to do with forestry, I want to find out what this monetary policy has done to the forestry sector as well.

Earnings in the forestry sector are down 40 per cent to 50 per cent in all forest products industries for the first six months of 1990 because of the high dollar. Pulp shipments are down 20 per cent for the same period because of the high dollar. Industry spokesmen estimate that 4,500 lay-offs are directly related to the high dollar.

In British Columbia, a one-cent raise in the dollar means a loss of $100 million in revenues, that is one cent on the dollar. Revenues of $5.1 billion have been lost in the forestry sector over the 1987, 1988, and 1989 period because of the high dollar. The loss for 1989 was $2.5 billion, and the loss for 1990 is expected to be higher.

• (1805)

In my riding of Restigouche—Chaleur alone, we suffer from high unemployment, but we are a natural resource-based riding. Again, we see the effects of this: the high unemployment and lay-offs. There are two major companies that look toward international markets that have their workers on strike and are reluctant to come back to the table because of the high dollar. The high dollar is not the only reason they are on strike, but it adds to the whole issue.

The Minister of Forestry has the responsibility to protect the forestry sector. I am not asking to change the fiscal policy, but I am asking him to try to influence the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister to see the detrimental effects that the high interest and high dollar policy of the government has on forestry. I think it is imperative that the minister realizes that he has a responsibility to do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member that at the time, the minister said in response to the question raised by the hon. member that our department did not have authority over monetary policy. In fact, the Liberal Party helped create this department and organize it in such a way that the department would work together with the provinces to develop programs and better technologies to improve and protect our forests. Furthermore, our program's entire policy is based on sustainable development, within the jurisdiction of the Department of Forestry.

Of course, the hon. member's question had a budgetary aspect, and I may remind him that our government's policy has borne fruit, insofar as we have been able to control inflation.

I may remind the hon. member that in the early 80s when the Liberal Party was in power, it was decided that the Department of Finance would let inflation run its course. We saw exactly what happened: inflation soared out of control. When the Minister of Finance at the time realized he could no longer control inflation, he started increasing interest rates. The result, Mr. Speaker, was far more disastrous than the present situation.

Obviously, there are problems as a result of the present state of the economy in this country and throughout the world. Interest rates are a problem as well. However, I may remind the hon. member that in 1984, when we were elected, we signed federal–provincial agreements on forestry development with each province. These agreements totalled over $1.750 million, on average, for each province. The new Department of Forestry has worked with each minister to develop the concept of sustainable development, which will help the industry to survive. With New Brunswick, for instance, we have signed a new agreement on forestry development. We have made proposals to each of the provinces on ways to renew agreements that would help alleviate economic problems but also help the industry, the provinces and governments to get through this difficult time and provide present and future workers with jobs in a forestry sector that would be based on the sustainable development of a renewable resource.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, on March 6 I raised one in a series of questions directed to the Deputy Prime Minister who is also the Minister of Agriculture.

I asked him to give the House the details of what he called the drought assistance program and what the rest of us thought should have been called a farm income assistance program.

There was a shortfall in excess of $1 billion on income which he admitted was, in part, due to subsidization levels from the Europeans and the Americans. While there has been half a billion dollar payment made which is in the pockets of the creditors of most of the farmers across Canada, the situation has not changed greatly.

• (1810)

Mr. Speaker, when you look at the answer the minister gave, you will see that the situation has worsened considerably. In his response to me he said that the government is prepared to assist again, but reminds the House that the level of enhancement has been reduced quite substantially, enhancement being the subsidies paid by the Europeans and the Americans to customers in order to entice them to buy their grain.

He reported in March that the Europeans had dropped their enhancement programs from $200 a tonne to the neighbourhood of $80 per tonne and that the United States had dropped their export enhancement program to about $20 per tonne. He was expecting grain prices to continue to rise, because they had risen, as he says, by roughly 50 per cent.

Many things have happened since March 6. Europeans are still using the enhancement program of about $80 per tonne. They completed a sale to Tunisia recently at about $81 U.S. a tonne. However, instead of being at the $20 per tonne level, the United States has surpassed $53 per tonne. In some of the recorded transactions, they are reported to have gone up as high as $58 a tonne.

Meanwhile, at the beginning of the new crop year in western Canada, Canadian Wheat Board initial prices for No. 1 wheat at the elevator came in on August 1 at 22 per cent below the price it had been the day before. This is accounted for by a drop of the federal government's guarantee on initial prices of $20 a tonne as well as decisions by federal government agencies to increase elevation, storage and handling charges, and to increase the farmers' share of the freight rate under the Western Grain Transportation Act. In all, producers of No. 1 wheat received 22 per cent less delivering on the first day of this crop year.

The result is that the prairie pools, who have done a fairly thorough estimate of the potential damage, say that at the end of this calendar year with the assistance that is appreciated of approximately $500,000 to Canadian producers, Saskatchewan farmers on average will have a net income of about $4,000 each.

If we are going to attempt to have net incomes for farmers similar to those of the last four or five years, we will require an addition $1.25 billion to go into the grain sector alone. That is the sector that is most hurt by these actions by other countries.

The livestock, dairy and poultry areas have been more or less holding their own, in part because we have a certain amount of protection for some of these commodities with supply-management marketing boards. Others happen to be just at the low end of the cycle, for instance the prices for beef, while they are not good, are almost as high as they were in 1977 and 1978.

That gives you some idea of how desperate farmers are when they see 1977-78 prices as being very good news. We are only about 15 per cent below that on those commodities.

The point that I want to make to the Ministry of Agriculture is that the problem has not gone away. Their preview of what was to come was much too over-optimistic. The reality is there is still a great shortfall in the country, and at least $1.25 billion is needed in order to bring these farmers' incomes up to a level consistent with what average Canadians are getting.

I would urge that the minister take action as soon as possible. I note that he has always said that the next injection of funds would be through a firm program, possibly the proposed GRIP or NISA. Those programs will not handle this kind of pay-out because the triggering mechanism is on an average price and that would not trigger a pay-out under these circumstances. The cash is needed desperately and I urge the government to act quickly.

• (1815)

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I just want to point out that the government is very keenly aware of the difficulties facing the grains and oilseeds sector. Over the last number of years we have taken unprecedented steps to help farmers through the difficult times. I believe our record speaks for itself.

We established the Special Grains Program for the 1986-87 crops to ease the burden of low grain prices brought on by the international subsidy wars. This program paid out more than $2 billion over those two years.

Again in 1988, when farmers all across Canada were reeling from the effects of a devastating drought, we provided about $850 million to help them cope again. This year, we announced $450 million in assistance to grains and oilseeds producers.

Agreements have now been signed for approximately $435 million, or 96 per cent of that total. The remaining amount has been earmarked for the fur and horticultural industries, and to support soil conservation projects across Canada.

These initiatives I have just outlined constitute assistance for the grain and oilseeds industry totalling almost $3.5 billion. That is a significant commitment to the industry.

However, these special programs are not enough and we recognize that. Canadian farmers should not be expected to rely on government assistance packages year after year. An improved safety net system is needed to provide financial stability to the sector. A new program may be within sight. Over the last nine months proposals for a new program have been designed by the farmers and governments represented on the grains and oilseeds safety net committee. These people have recommended that these programs be implemented for the 1991-92 crop year.

These new programs, the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan, called GRIP, and the Net Income Stabilization Account, called NISA, are designed to provide the stability farmers need. The committee believes the programs would be bankable. That means farmers would know in February or March their income position for the year. With that information, farmers can go to their banker and negotiate their credit needs.

The GRIP and NISA programs are designed to offer maximum benefits when taken together. The GRIP and NISA programs offer a way of achieving long-term stability which is needed in the grains and oilseeds sector. Our goal has to be long term stability. And whatever we do in the short term must be done with that in mind.

We are aware of the cash flow problems that grains and oilseeds producers are now struggling with. That is why we have been meeting over the summer with farm groups and provincial governments to address this problem.

We know there have been many meetings held across the country and we know that the problems are there. Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with those problems.

THE LATE MARNIE KIMELMAN

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, in August, I visited the beach in Israel where, on July 28, 1990, Marnie Kimelman of North York was fatally injured by the vicious irrational actions of a Palestinian terrorist.

Marnie was 17, intelligent, attractive, concerned, and compassionate. She was known by her friends as the peace lady. Marnie would have made a tremendous contribution to our society, to Israel which she loved, and possibly to a just and lasting reconciliation with the Palestinian people. Her death and that of other innocent victims of terror in Israel must strengthen the resolve of all fair-minded and peace-loving people to find a lasting peace settlement.

It should also strengthen our resolve as a country not to deal with terrorists. If the PLO leadership do not condemn and dissociate themselves from such acts, we should not give them credibility by official interaction with them.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FERRY SERVICE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this summer a federal environmental panel ruled against the government's proposal for a fixed link between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

A new proposal may or may not be forthcoming. But even if a new fixed link proposal is approved, it could be the year 2000 before the first car drives across the strait.

That is why the federal government must continue to meet its constitutional obligation to provide adequate ferry service between the mainland and Prince Edward Island.

As the rising ferry traffic continues to put a strain on ferry capacity, the adequacy of this service is in serious doubt. For almost two years now, I have been pressing the government to act on this important transportation issue which affects all sectors of our economy.

Once again, I urge the government to give its Crown corporation, Marine Atlantic, the green light to proceed with plans for a new ferry. The time for action is now.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, last week we learned that, at the powerhouse of the CN shops in Transcona, CN knowingly allowed workers to be exposed to asbestos for a period of several weeks over the summer.

When CN asked workers to remove some insulation from one of the boilers, an employee asked what was being removed and was told by management that whatever it was, it was safe. Only then did CN send a sample of this material to a government lab and was told in July that there as asbestos in the insulation. However, CN did nothing to protect the workers until the middle of September, when an employee asked to see the lab report. The negligence of CN in this affair is shocking.

The asbestos is now being professionally dealt with, thanks to the union's press conference on the matter, but we must still find out how this was allowed to happen. To this end, I wrote to both the Ministers of Labour and Transport, backing the union call for a parliamentary inquiry.

CN may finally be dealing with the asbestos properly, but the government has yet to deal with Labour Canada for its negligence in ignoring union concerns throughout the summer and conducting an inspection only after the union press conference. The parliamentary committee responsible for Labour Canada should definitely have a look into this one.

HIBERNIA PROJECT

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, for many years, we Quebecers played second fiddle.

For many years we sat on the sidelines instead of being actively involved, we listened instead of speaking up, we obeyed instead of making our own decisions.

For many years, we were told: "You can't run your own show; you don't have the intelligence or the skills; in other words, don't get your hopes up"!

Today, however, we have put all that behind us, witness Quebec's economic, social and political progress in the past thirty years.

We are proud of our success.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, some people still say we can't stand on our own two feet. The Hibernia project is a good example. We must now show that we Quebecers have what it takes!

THE LATE MARNIE KIMELMAN

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Marnie Kimelman who was killed by a terrorist bomb on an Israeli beach on July 28, 1990.

I attended Marnie's funeral at the Adath Israel Synagogue and the next day I visited her parents, Harold and Linda, at their home. They told me that the whole family visited Israel in 1986 and that Marnie was so anxious to return. While they were able to deter her visit last year, they knew they had to give their blessing for her to visit Israel this year.

Fortunately, Marnie kept an extensive diary and took many pictures during her visit. These are very precious memories of Marnie's thoughts and activities before she was tragically taken from us.

Her warmth and generosity will always be remembered by her parents, her two brothers, Jason and Mark, and other members of the family. Her memory will be an inspiration to young people everywhere.

THE LATE MARNIE KIMELMAN

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, on July 28, a home-made pipe-bomb exploded on a crowded Tel Aviv beach. It injured 18 people. It killed Marnie Kimelman, a 17-year old student at York Mills Collegiate in Toronto.

Marnie, who lived with her family in Willowdale, was part of a group of 80 Canadian teenagers touring Israel on a trip sponsored by the Canadian Zionist Federation. She was the fourth foreign visitor and the third Canadian to be killed by Palestinian terrorists.

As Canadians, there are no words that we can find to express our outrage at this vicious act of terrorism perpetrated against an innocent person. There are also no words that we can offer to Marnie's parents and her two brothers to ease the pain that they feel at her loss.

For our part, we must renew our pledge to fight against terrorism and re-affirm our commitment to do everything possible as Canadians to seek a lasting peace.

TAXATION

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, we need to rethink our approach to family taxation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnson: The present system is a patchwork of rules, regulations, and programs, each with their own valid objectives. However, it is time we made a complete re-evaluation of the system to ensure that our scarce resources are being used in the most appropriate way to strengthen and preserve family structures in our society.

Any changes to our family support system must treat all families equitably and ensure that the rights of women and children are not only protected, but enhanced.

The family is a pillar of our nation. I urge the government to act now to ensure that our tax system does not weaken it.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Liberals really oppose the 7 per cent goods and services tax and I would like to explain why.

Did the Liberal senators vote unanimously in favour of the GST when leave was sought to introduce it in the Senate? No.

Did the Liberal senators vote unanimously in favour of the GST when it was introduced in first reading?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: Yes, they did.

Mr. Riis: Let me try it again, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: In summary, let me say that the Liberal senators did not vote against it at first reading. They did not vote against it when they sought leave to introduce it. They did not vote against it at the second reading stage.

They then rang the bells all Friday, Saturday, Sunday and Monday. But, Mr. Speaker, the Senate does not sit on Friday, Saturday, Sunday or Monday. I think they could have kept the bells ringing but, of course, Jean Chrétien ordered the now minority number of Liberal senators to return to the Senate when they are—

THE SENATE

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal senators have systematically blocked bills that were tabled in the Senate after they were passed in the House of Commons.

This attitude is a contradiction of our system of government, in which the ultimate responsibility lies with the elected representatives in the House.

This is a matter of democracy and concerns the elected government's right to conduct its business on behalf of the people it represents.

The problem is not the GST but the fact that non-elected Liberal senators are depriving an elected government of its right to govern.

The Senate is now blocking three other money bills, adding a total of $8.3 billion to the deficit.

Some hon. members: Shame!

Mr. Della Noce: These bills, including the GST bill, are the main components of the government's economic plan for Canada.

This paralysis of government business caused by a non-elected Senate is a denial of the principles of our parliamentary system.

Mr. Speaker, the will of the elected House must prevail. We have a duty to defend our system of government and we shall do so.

LITERACY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada, in partnership with the Canadian Library Association, is honouring individuals in our communities with a very special award for their outstanding contribution to promoting literacy.

This year, 1990, is International Literacy Year and it is therefore fitting to present Canada's Literacy Volunteer Awards. This is an important program in the literacy movement for it recognizes those Canadians who give of their time and effort to help others.

Nominations can be made at our public library boards which will then select the recipients to be honoured. This is the time to praise and to commend those persons who are contributing so much to stamp out illiteracy in Canada.

Literacy is vital to our future and we must all work toward ensuring that forthcoming generations have the opportunity and pleasure of knowing how to read.

Oral Questions

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we welcome back to the House of Commons the corporate welfare bum of the week award. Our nominees are as follows: North Canadian, with no tax paid in 1988 and 1989; last year's winner Hemlo Gold, also with no tax paid in 1988 and 1989; and last, we have Brascade Resources, which also avoided the onerous responsibility of paying taxes in 1988 and 1989.

May I have the envelope, please?

The winner is Hemlo Gold. Yes, it is true. Hemlo Gold is a second time winner. They have outdone themselves in making profits of $54 million, that is $10 million more than in 1988. Hemlo has managed not only to avoid paying taxes, but also has received $1.9 million in government hand-outs, again for the second year in a row.

I think congratulations are in order to the parent company Brascan Holdings, the owner of all three of our nominees, and its president, the newly appointed Senator Eyton, for keeping the award—

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow in Manitoba, university and other students throughout the province will be meeting in Winnipeg to demonstrate and protest against such critical issues and injustices as sky-rocketing tuition fees; a mounting and crushing student debt; an outdated student aid program whose only substantive change in recent years has been the imposition of a 3 per cent tax on those students who need help most, the poor students and the poor families; massive cuts in transfer payments to education; reductions in funds for training and retraining; and neglect of research and development.

When will the government help Canadian students to acquire the tools necessary to build a better future for themselves and for all Canadians? The government cannot expect to create a new generation of world leaders while cutting the necessary resources to education and wanting to impose additional taxes such as the GST on books and other learning materials.

We need sound and intelligent leadership that will provide this generation of Canadians with the tools they need to improve their life and make a solid contribution to this country.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

Today, the Economic Council of Canada released its annual review. The council's own official summary of this review when speaking about this government's high interest rate, high dollar policies, in part said that these "policies not only fail to achieve acceptable economic goals for Canada in the short run, but the process of fighting inflation solely through tight money may actually get in the way of firms attempting to modernize operations—in the longer run."

I ask the Prime Minister: Will he direct the Minister of Finance today to bring in a new budget immediately to reverse these economic policies, which the Economic Council appointed by this Prime Minister say are not only damaging the Canadian economy but harming its ability to work in the world and achieve global competitiveness? Will he move immediately in this direction?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member full well knows, we are not relying totally on monetary policy.

We are relying on fiscal policy and on what are called structural policies to reduce the inflationary pressures in the economy.

My hon. friend should know that the OECD has put out some numbers which demonstrate that, of the seven major industrialized countries, Canada's fiscal policy has been the most contractionary in the last five or six years.

Also, I think that Canadians are owed an answer to the following question: What has the Liberal Party done in the last six years to encourage this government to follow policies which will reduce the fiscal deficit, which is where the economic policies say we should have done more?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Minister of Finance in case he has forgotten—the Canadian people have not—that he is in government. He must account to Canadians for the policies that his government's own Economic Council says are damaging the Canadian economy.

Here is what the council also said in its summary. This council was appointed by this Prime Minister. It said that the government's approach to inflation fighting "threatens to increase both unemployment and the federal deficit. Because conditions differ from region to region, it also produces varying and sometimes inappropriate effects, adding to regional resentments and weakening national unity."

I ask the Prime Minister: Will he listen to his own Economic Council and stop the economic policies which are not only damaging the regions of this country, but in fact are weakening the very fabric of Canada's unity? Why will he not act on his own council's advice?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there was a very good reason why I wanted to refer not to the inaction on the part of the Liberal Party in dealing with fiscal policy, but the fact that the Liberal Party has resisted this government and everything that we have done to reduce the size of the fiscal deficit.

It is the two faced, cynical approach of the Liberal Party that is leading me to make that specific statement.

If Canadians need any further proof of this, what is the Liberal Senate doing right now? The Liberal senators are holding up Bill C-21. The Liberal senators are holding up Bill C-28. They are holding up Bill C-69.

If we do not get those three pieces of legislation through, we are going to have a hit on the deficit of over $8 billion. That is going to hurt interest rates. That will undercut the competitive position of Canadian companies. If the hon. member had any honesty to deal with these problems—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, speaking of honesty, will the minister be honest enough to say that the—

Mr. Speaker: I think if both sides stay off that allegation it will be a lot better.

Mr. Crawford: He started it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians will want to know why the Minister of Finance has gone out of his way to refuse to answer the criticisms of this government's policy by the Economic Council.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Economic Council did not mention the Senate; the Economic Council did not mention the Liberals. It referred directly to the policies of this government. And according to the Economic Council, these policies have done serious harm to the economy of this country.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the only point for me raising the Senate and the Liberal Party is that we are trying to do some of the things that the Liberal Party says we should do and which we agree we should do. What we receive from the Liberal Party and the Liberal senators is a road-block, trying to stop us from doing the very things that this document and the Leader of the Opposition says we should follow. We are trying to follow those things but we need some co-operation from the Senate, from the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Liberal Party, who I believe is sitting in the gallery right now.

THE SENATE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice.

On Monday, the Minister of Justice categorically stated about the constitutionality of the government's recent Senate appointments that there was no breach of section 51(A) of the Constitution because the appointments are divisional appointments and not provincial appointments.

However, section 147 of the same act provides a direct link, I suggest, with section 26, under which the new senators were appointed, as it provides that no senators above 10 could be appointed in the province of New Brunswick, and I stress province and not maritime division, except under section 26.

In view of this direct linkage, will the minister not reconsider the government's decision and refer the whole matter to the Supreme Court of Canada so that these legal arguments can be fully and completely aired?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will recall, when the issue was first raised in the House, which I believe was Friday of last week, I indicated that the issue was an arguable one. There are a number of provisions in the Constitution which have to be reconciled. Having reviewed all of those provisions and their various relations to one another, we are confident that our position is the correct one. If the hon. member is not, he has recourse to the courts.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to say that we have recourse to the courts but as the highest law officer of the Crown, I would like the minister, and I put the question to her, to consider the section which specifically states: "That only 10 members can be appointed to New Brunswick" and "the representation of each of those provinces shall not be increased at any time beyond 10, except under the provisions of this act for the appointment of three or six additional senators under the direction of the Queen", which is now four or eight.

The linkage is clear; you cannot appoint to the province of New Brunswick more than 10 senators under section 26. Will you not put that question to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, once again, I can appreciate why members on that side of the House are very uncomfortable with what is going on now and are seeking issues to try and deflect attention from what they really stand for, which is the supremacy of an unelected Senate over the House of Commons. I have been quite happy to concede that there are arguable issues and to state the position of the government, and I would state this point. I would like to quote a senior member of this parliament from a previous time:

> This tendency that whenever there is something controversial you shovel it to the courts is not that of responsible government. A responsible government makes up its mind, does what it thinks is right, and if it is constitutionally wrong, it is for the courts to decide.

I am sorry the hon. member finds that arrogant because that is a quotation from February 15, 1981, of his new leader, the Hon. Jean Chrétien.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The opinion that the stacking of the Senate to ram through the GST is unconstitutional is increasing every day.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. McLaughlin: I have here a legal opinion which says that not only is the Prime Minister in violation of section 51(A) of the Constitution Act, 1867, by creating more senators from New Brunswick than members of the House of Commons, but that he is also in violation of the Constitution Act, 1982, because section 41(B) states in effect that the appointment of the eleventh senator from New Brunswick amounts to an amendment of the Constitution of Canada, requiring unanimous consent of the provinces and of Parliament. The Prime Minister does not have that.

I ask the Prime Minister, will he show real confidence in his decision and make a reference to the Supreme Court?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I explained to my hon. friend yesterday that the government acted pursuant to legal advice from the most senior law officers of the Crown. It followed the constitutional provision, Her Majesty did the same. All of the actions taken were following this kind of advice from the senior law officers of the Crown. It may very well be that my hon. friend has a different point of view. Clearly that appears to be the case. That is what the courts are for.

If my hon. friend wishes to contest—

An hon. member: Send it to the court.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to respond to my hon. friend. If she has a different—

Ms. McLaughlin: Send it to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Mulroney: If she has a different point of view, I am sure the Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court would be happy to entertain it at an appropriate time and under appropriate circumstances.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister. Surely it is the responsibility of a government to ensure that the actions they are taking are legal.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, experts throughout the country agree that what the government did may very well be illegal. Some very serious questions are being asked—this morning for instance, in Le Devoir, by a doctor of constitutional law, in a Kitchener newspaper by former Supreme Court Justice Willard Estey, and by other experts as well.

Will the Prime Minister finally table in the House the advice given by his experts, who seem to be the only experts in Canada who approve the actions of his government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there may very well be lawyers across Canada who do not agree on the scope of a legal provision or the interpretation of a legal decision. I can inform the hon. member that the Canadian government consulted with its legal advisers in the Senate, who unanimously suggested a procedure that was entirely legal and acceptable. And we followed that procedure. We asked Her Majesty's permission, under a provision of the present Constitution. If this action gives the hon. member cause for concern, she has the same rights as any other Canadian citizen. On the basis of her allegations she can seek the appropriate remedy from the appropriate court.

• (1430)

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): He and only he can go directly to the Supreme Court to get this settled once and for all.

Mr. Speaker, until that question is settled in fact all decisions made by this Parliament, all laws passed, may indeed be illegal, I would say. I remind the Prime Minister that the Secretary of State for External Affairs appears to agree with us because on October 15, 1980, when he was Leader of the Opposition, he slammed the government of the day for refusing to refer its constitutional resolution to the Supreme Court.

I think his words were very wise and should be repeated here. I quote the words of the current Secretary of State for External Affairs, as reported at page 3680 of Hansard:

> —whether it is the position of the government now that Parliament and the people of Canada should bow to the government's will on the basis of advice that the Minister of Justice insists on keeping secret, and the validity of which he refuses to submit to the basic test of the Supreme Court?

Will the Prime Minister take the advice of his external affairs minister advice and refer this matter to the Supreme Court?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has already acted pursuant to advice it has received from the most senior law officers of the Crown. Her Majesty has acted as well.

If my hon. friend is concerned with the propriety or the legality of that action, she is entitled to seek redress before an appropriate court. In the absence of a decision to the contrary from the Supreme Court of Canada, the responsibility of the Government of Canada remains the same.

We were elected to govern and that is precisely what we are going to do.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

This government has chosen to exempt public day care centres from paying the GST but not those that are privately operated. This will add as much as 3.5 per cent to the cost of private day care for an average family.

Having already reneged on his government's commitment to public day care, can the minister now explain why his government is trying to eliminate private day care as an option for working mothers?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the position taken by the hon. member is not correct. It is not our intention whatsoever to eliminate private day care.

My understanding of the position taken by many members of the Liberal caucus, however, has been that they have been opposed in the past to private day care and have argued in favour strictly of public day care.

Our position in the government is to encourage child care in Canada. That is why we are committing almost $1 billion this year to do precisely that.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, I understand the minister's abrasiveness which attempts to conceal his embarrassment at his government's plan to save day care legislation until the next election.

Because of this government's day care deception of 1988, more and more working mothers are unable to find space in non-profit day care and are forced to rely on private centres. If the GST passes these families will pay as much as $300 more per child next year.

Will the minister inform the House as to whether his ministry will make any effort to stop the GST from smothering much needed day care, or is the national Revenue the only ministry interested in targeting day care?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member will forgive me for introducing facts on the floor of the House of Commons.

However, the position taken by this government from the outset has been that we want to see a national day care program in place. If it were not for the Liberal senators, we would have a national day care program in place today.

I would ask the hon. member whether she speaks for the Liberal Party of Canada in arguing in favour of private child care over publicly financed child care. I would point out to the hon. member that families earning less than $30,000 a year will be ahead of the game as a result of the GST tax credit. She should be supporting it

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, despite a chorus of protests, the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board are still refusing to grant an exemption from the GST on books, which will sound the death knell of the publishing industry. The Minister of Communications said, and I quote: "Put your questions to the Minister of Finance. As far as I am concerned, the studies I paid for are being used to attack the GST".

My question to the Prime Minister is as follows: Does he agree with his Minister of Communications or with the President of the Treasury Board? Which one?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will understand that the Minister of Communications, the Minister of Finance and myself have an abiding interest in the growth of the publishing industry in this country. The Liberals, unfortunately, have started to believe what they say about the GST. They describe the GST as a monster, and they are now shooting at the monster. The GST is a tax that exists in many countries. It is a direct and visible tax, applied to a very broad base so that choices will not depend on the tax. This tax also helps to improve the state of the economy, so that more people will be able to buy books after the GST is introduced than was the case before.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): You know perfectly well you are killing one of Quebec's cultural industries.

[English]

These ministers and this government in particular are killing the book industry in Quebec and across this country. It is a very serious matter. This is not a laughing matter. Reading is an opening into the world, and you are cutting back the population's access to it—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put her question.

Mrs. Finestone: Will any one of these ministers come clean with the Canadian public, come clean with the printing industry and recognize that you are killing them with this GST tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept that for a minute, but let me also say to my hon. friend that education is not being taxed and libraries are not being taxed.

My colleague, the Minister of Communications, has a program that will be helping Canadian book publishers, but I think what this does—

Ms. Copps: Day care is taxed.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Day care is not taxed. The member for Hamilton East has just said that day care is taxed. It is not taxed.

What this all points out is that the Liberal Party of Canada cannot accept the fact that this bill has passed the House of Commons. It is in the Senate and the Liberal members opposite are saying that they want to pass over their responsibility as elected members of Parliament to a body to which the Canadian public has no recourse.

They have no way of voting out Allan MacEachen. They have no way of voting out Sid Buchwold. It is this fundamental principle of parliamentary democracy that the Liberal Party is trying to deflect the attention of Canadians on. They will not deflect the attention of Canadians because of the wide-spread editorial support for what—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

* * *

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): My question is for the Prime Minister, if the Liberals will calm down over there, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nystrom: My question is for the Prime Minister, as the leader of the government. In a rather unprecedented report this morning the Economic Council of Canada launched a scathing attack on the federal government's economic policies. It said that the government leader should admit that there is something fundamentally wrong with past economic policies.

• (1440)

I want to know from the Prime Minister of Canada whether or not he agrees with his blue chip economic advisory group that there is something fundamentally wrong with the economic policies of this government. Will he now admit that and change those policies on behalf of the people of this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a fairly loose interpretation here, but that is normally expected from the hon. member.

We accept the fact that we should be getting the deficit of the Government of Canada down. That is precisely what we have been trying to do over the last six years and what we have been having a reasonable amount of success in doing.

More work has to be done, but perhaps the hon. member and his party could get off this horse of supporting the Liberal senators when they are blocking Bill C-21, which is designed to get the deficit down; Bill C-28, which is designed to get the deficit down; Bill C-62, which is designed to get the deficit down, as well as Bill C-69. Those are bills on unemployment insurance, on taxation, on the GST, and on expenditure—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, no wonder the Canadian people are cynical about this government. What this report does is attack the government on its failure to bring down inflation in this country in the proper way and to bring down unemployment in the proper way. They say, and I quote, at page 45: "Canada has never made more than a timid commitment to full employment".

The old ways have not worked. What I want to know from this government is what new policies it will introduce now to respond to this report. What new commitments will it bring in for the unemployed of this country? What new direction can we expect in Canada to put Canadians to work?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the record of this government stands. We have brought the unemployment rate from 11.7 per cent down to the current level of around 8 per cent. A million and a half jobs have been created.

The Economic Council, if the hon. member will go on a few pages, also points out the fact that we should be spending more money for training to help people who are unemployed get better skills so they can get back into the labour force. That is the bill that my colleague has put to the Senate. It is a bill—

Ms. Copps: You just said it was to reduce the deficit.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member obviously has not read it. The hon. member for Hamilton East has been away too long. It is designed to get the deficit down. It is also designed to redirect $800 million of moneys to encourage a greater amount of training for unemployed workers.

It is one of the bills that is being held up in the Senate. It is one of the bills that the New Democratic Party, in a very cynical way, is supporting the Senate in holding it up.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. When did his government first learn that Peter Lush received while he was chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission a payment of $400,000 for a real estate transaction?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Transport informed my colleague yesterday that there would be an independent law firm named so that they would be able to examine the actions that have been taken. I am sure the hon. member would wish that to take place before he made any further statements.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am simply looking for facts, as the hon. minister mentioned earlier, on the floor of the House of Commons.

Given that six months ago I advised the Minister of Transport that the chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission was also acting as a real estate broker in the sale of $10 million worth of property to the Hamilton Harbour Commission, and given that the lawyer for J. I. Case, the seller of the property confirms that Peter Lush was paid a $400,000 commission on the sale of the land when the land deal closed, will the Prime Minister recognize the ineptitude of his Minister of Transport and relieve him of his duties immediately?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I fail to understand my colleague's actions at this time. In March that member from Hamilton said—and I have it in the Hamilton Spectator of March 14, 1990—"I am satisfied with that. I can live with it" in explaining what had taken place. My colleague the Minister of Transport said that there would be an independent law firm engaged to review the situation and that their report would be made public. I hear the member for Hamilton West. I do not understand, unless it happens to be the history of Hamilton and the harbour commission, dating back to 1975 and 1979, that causes the hon. member to have this inane desire to investigate the activity which is taking place in Hamilton. Will the hon. member not wait for the investigation as everyone else will?

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the two Ministers of Transport I address my question on the same matter to the right hon. Prime Minister. Yesterday, in response to my request for a full public inquiry, his Minister of Transport said that the individual in question, Mr. Lush, had asked for an independent review and that he would be naming an independent law firm to review this matter.

Why is the government only agreeing to Mr. Lush's option, rather than satisfying the interests of the Canadian taxpayers which would be best served by a full and public inquiry on a public matter involving public funds? After all, to whom is this government responsible?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can only quote my colleague, the Minister of Transport. I am sure the hon. member and all members of this House would like to be assured of the ability of individuals to receive justice without having it biased in any way. I can quote my colleague, the Minister of Transport—

Ms. Copps: How about $400,000.

Mr. McKnight: The member for Hamilton East would also, I am sure, share that concern.

I can only quote my colleague, the Minister of Transport, in Southam News, citing a recent Supreme Court of Ontario decision. They said a public commission is not the place to conduct these investigations because people's reputations are at risk and they have no recourse to reply. I am sure that the hon. member would accept that. I am sure the hon. member would wait for the independent law firm to be engaged and review this. And it will be made public, as my colleague, the Minister of Transport said yesterday in the House.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I return to the Prime Minister and I hope that he finds the courage to answer about his own government's conflict of interest guidelines. How can the Prime Minister defend his transport minister, who was a former Minister of Justice, in promoting a cosy, closed door review by a law firm which will end up reporting to the same minister? Why does the Prime Minister not stand in his place and do the—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the hon. member would wish to allow the issue of innocent until proven guilty—

Mr. Marchi: His interests are served in the public too.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, again I can only quote to the hon. member, who has much more experience, I presume, in the law than I, the statement in the Ontario Supreme Court ruling which said that a public commission is not the place to conduct these investigations because people's reputations are at risk and they have no recourse to reply and respond. I am sure the hon. member, being a fair-minded member, would like the individual involved to have the right of reply.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, this is a question for the Minister of State for Privatization. When the government privatized Air Canada, it paid RBC Dominion Securities and Wood Gundy Incorporated over $30 million to tout the stock. Now, ostensibly to sell Canadians an oil company they already own, the government will spend up to $175 million, or more, money that will go straight into the pockets of hot shot brokers and agents. Free of the GST, too, thank you very much.

• (1450)

From where is the minister taking that $175 million? Is it from the $155 million cut from the Canada Assistance Plan? Is it from the $35 million cut from programs for Canadian veterans? Is it from the $1.2 million cut from women's programs and the $9.7 million cut from native Canadians? Where is the money for all those stockbrokers coming from?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I find it passing strange that the hon. member has these figures when there has not even been a price set for the stocks of Petro-Canada.

Once again, the NDP is manufacturing things to make it look spectacular on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it is not the NDP that is manufacturing figures. It is Ian Doig and other noted market analysts. We are just sort of feeding it to the House.

Assuming for a moment that the $175 million figure is correct and that the government is going to turn the $500 to $700 million generated by the first 15 per cent issue back into the company, is it the case then, that in its frenzied desire to strip the Canadian people of assets they now own, the government is prepared to give away somewhere around three-quarters of a billion dollars of taxpayers' money to big time oil company shareholders and stock touts? Is that what the government means by restraint and fighting the deficit?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question on that substance.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Statistics Canada.

In February of this year, the minister will remember that I asked him whether or not there would be a question dealing with the disabled and employment equity targets on the 1991 census. He answered the House that it was being discussed.

Today, I would like to ask the minister what the outcome of these discussions were.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the answer to that specific question at the moment. I will get back to the hon. member.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, just last Friday the minister's colleague, the Secretary of State, denied funding for a conference held this past weekend on employment equity.

This government is sending a mixed message to Canadians who are disabled. Will the minister now, while there is still time before the issue of the 1991 census, consult with disabled groups to formulate a census questionnaire that will generate the data to provide the target levels and programs that physically challenged Canadians need?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): In answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the House that our government is very interested in the role of the handicapped and of visible minorities. Prior to the tabling of the next annual report, we had consultations in Ottawa Monday with a group of national leaders concerned about employment equity. Monday's gathering was the first in a series of regional and national meetings, and before the end of December we expect to table our third report featuring an assessment of progress made so far. We have a long way to go yet, but we are working together to improve the situation.

CANADA POST

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post.

Effective August 1, the cost of running post office boxes for individuals living in areas where royal delivery is present increased almost 100 per cent, from $26 to $50. Not only is this increase unacceptable, but for the elderly and particularly the disabled, it is very unfair.

Given that there are a number of Canadians affected by this, what assurances can the minister give us that this matter will be reviewed by Canada Post and by the minister with the hope of correcting it?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by Canada Post that everyone in Canada is entitled to one free mode of mail delivery, be it by letter carrier, community mail box, rural route, general delivery or postal box. It is free.

It is only in circumstances where people want special treatment, out of ordinary from their neighbours, that imposes an extra cost on the post office that they tend to recover it. As it is, the costs they charge are only a fraction of what the private sector charges for similar services.

However, the post office does have a provision for accommodating special circumstances, such as the elderly or people who are unable to make it to the mailbox. If the hon. member will bring to the attention of the post office the circumstances of specific people, I am sure they will take care of it.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister changed the immigrant investor regulations without consulting the joint committees established under the Cullen-Couture agreement signed by Quebec and Ottawa in 1978. Why did the minister choose not to consult the joint committees? And why would the minister want to thwart economic development in Quebec where the new regulations are applicable immediately, whereas other provinces have 18 months to comply?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to extend a warm welcocme to my dear colleague as critic of the Official Opposition, for this is his first question.

There have been quite a few discussions on the program with Quebec and other provinces in anticipation of the changes. Changes have been implemented for all provinces, and all provinces have endorsed the regulations.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works concerning a project which is extremely important to all of Atlantic Canada and that, of course, is the fixed link to Prince Edward Island.

Even though the environment review panel did not endorse the project as proposed, they did recognize that improvements must be made to transportation. Now with dramatically higher fuel costs and the increased traffic to Prince Edward Island this summer, I and all Atlantic Canadians would like to know if every effort is being made to address the concerns of the panel and move on with the fixed link to P.E.I.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, Public Works continues to be supportive of this project, provided the concerns of the environmental assessment review panel, which reported last summer as my colleague knows, can be satisfactorily addressed. This opinion is also shared, in my view, by the premiers of the maritime provinces.

For example, Premier Ghiz, in a recent speech to the Charlottetown Rotary Club, said the following, and I think it is worth putting this on the record. "With the fixed link it may well be that further engineering will reveal a particular design that can withstand the most rigorous environmental tests. If such environmental integrity can be demonstrated publicly then, in my view, the fixed crossing should proceed." I think that is the correct view.

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise the House that there will be a single question from the hon. member for Rosemont, followed by a single question from the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

HIBERNIA PROJECT

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Since the 1984 Conservative government election the Minister of Finance has been trying, rightfully so, I think, to convince Canadians that the deficit has to come down. However he told us recently that this year's deficit would be at least $1.5 billion more than expected.

Last week the Prime Minister also said that, because of the bills now stalled in the Senate, there is a possibility that next year's revenues may fall short by $8.3 billion. Be that as it may, I would ask the Minister of Finance how can he possibly support the federal government's $2.7 billion commitment for a project like Hibernia, particularly considering that we have no firm guarantees that Canada will get a fair share of the work?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member that the Hibernia project, as compared to the first projects in the North Sea, for instance, in Norway or the U.K., have achieved a domestic percentage of approximately 35 per cent. The statement of principles of July, 1988, targeted approximately 45 per cent Canadian content in Hibernia, that was with the negotiations. With the negotiations, we have reached a level of between 55 per cent and 60 per cent. All areas of the country will benefit, including the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap on a single question.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question really falls under three areas of responsibility—environment, fisheries, and transport—but to facilitate the question, I will direct my question to the Minister of the Environment.

My question concerns the Fraser River Estuary Management Program which is a joint federal-provincial program. Over the past five years it has been mandated to assess and to monitor the environmental health of the lower Fraser River in British Columbia. As the minister knows, the five-year funding for the program expires shortly and the management committee has applied for a three-year continuation in funding.

Can the minister advise the House whether the government at this time is prepared to ratify the federal moneys required to maintain the program and whether the government is also prepared to expand the mandate of the program so that it can proceed with an implementation strategy to clean up the Fraser River?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question, I would like to assure my hon. colleague that we are prepared to extend the funding for the program. We are currently negotiating an extra $1 million over the next three years.

I would also like to tell my hon. colleague that the clean-up of the Fraser River is considered a priority in the Green Plan. At the moment, my department, in consultation with other departments having the responsibility for the Fraser, are developing actions which focus on the areas of pollution abatement, waste management, and site clean-up. That will be made public as soon as possible.

PRIVILEGE

Mr. Speaker: I have, first, a question of privilege from the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

There are also some other questions of privilege likely to be brought before the Chair. If the Chair is correct, these are questions that are very important to many lot of members. They are also questions that I have to ask hon. members to deal with in an exact, clear, and helpful way to me.

I am going to hear them, but I am asking hon. members, if I can say so, putting out a bit of a caveat, that I expect to be addressed on these matters in a way that can help me make a decision, not in a way that is designed to create abrasive feelings in this Chamber. We have a duty in this place to take care of our country and sometimes that requires some very special discipline.

The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park I know will help the Chair.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice of this question of privilege with the greatest seriousness because, when I was first elected in 1979 by the constituents of Parkdale—High Park, then re-elected in 1980, and again in 1988, each time before I could set foot into this Chamber I had to take an oath of allegiance. These are the rules.

I wanted to take that oath of allegiance because when I took the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty, the Queen, I knew that I took this oath to serve Canada, and to fight in this Chamber for everything that is in the best interest of our beautiful country. I know every member sitting here came to this Chamber with the same intent.

But when someone else sitting in this Chamber now takes the same oath and then goes and washes his or her hands of this oath, this oath has very little meaning to every member sitting in the House. When that happened, my constituents phoned me. They were very, very angry. They said: "Mr. Flis, that oath you took does not mean anything. What is happening up there? How dare you sit in the same chamber with someone who is denying the oath that he took." Maybe this member did it without thinking of the consequences of his actions. Therefore, I would like to make a constructive suggestion.

If that member, either today or sometime this week or next, would think about what he did, stand up in this Chamber, and apologize for his actions, it would in a way restore the oath of allegiance that he took. This would satisfy me. I know it would satisfy my constituents in Parkdale—High Park.

Failing that, then I have no other choice but to request you, Mr. Speaker, to make a ruling whether this member should be sitting in the same Chamber with us. Failing that, I request that this matter be referred to the appropriate committee to look into this whole matter because it undermines the role of every member in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford seeks the floor.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the allegations the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park just made are probably the most serious ones ever made in this House. I must say that, during the past few months, I made some research and had research made on the Oath of Allegiance.

Mr. Speaker, you asked us to help you. I think it is important that we talk today about the right to hold a seat in this House, a House governed by the Canadian Constitution and which recognizes full freedom of expression for every member.

In the early days of Parliament, the principle of "no taxation without representation" was laid. That was way before my days, Mr. Speaker. There are millions of Quebecers who are in favour of sovereignty and still pay taxes administered by this Parliament. These people too,

Mr. Speaker, have the right to be represented as long as their representatives in this House are elected democratically and that we are citizens of this country.

In the past few months, we have witnessed deliberate attempts to cast doubt on the legitimacy of the members of this House who do not share the centralizing views of some and the confederative views of others. Mr. Speaker, attempts were made to try and establish that there are good Canadians and not so good ones. I will not tolerate, Mr. Speaker, that our institution allow the right to hold a seat without a collective exercise of soul-searching.

Mr. Speaker, the precedents in this House date back a very long time. The last time the House questioned someone's Oath of Allegiance, it was Louis Riel's. I should like to remind those who today would like to see a repetition of the treatment Louis Riel was subjected to at the time just how severely history has judged Riel's opponents and especially his murderers.

Mr. Speaker, Joseph Howe sat in this House on behalf of Nova Scotia. I should like to remind the hon. member for Cape Breton who was all worked up yesterday when he said that we hardly had the right to sit in the House that Joseph Howe did sit here as an Antifederalist member. I should like to remind him also that several members also sat in the Nova Scotia legislature.

• (1510)

Quebecers were not the first to question the Canadian Federation, Mr. Speaker. As early as 1867, Nova Scotians did just that.

Today, those who are claiming that this situation is unprecedented are lacking in historical perspective and showing no respect for democracy.

I mentioned Louis Riel earlier; he had been elected to the House in 1873 and 1874, and was finally evicted in 1874 in spite of the fact that he had taken the Oath of Allegiance.

As far as the violation of the Oath of Allegiance is concerned, Mr. Speaker—I would not want to quote Beauchesne again—I suggest that the only example which occurred in the past was in 1940 when Fred Rose, who had been elected to the House of Commons, was later on found guilty of spying following his trial which took place in 1946.

Mr. Speaker, if any member of this political group represented in the House has violated the Canadian Constitution, the law of Parliament or the Criminal Code, let the hon. members who are prepared to lay charges do so immediately! Otherwise, as the hon. member for Burin—St. George's yesterday, they would be showing a lack of courage. They claim that they would be ready to vote on—

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, but— It is with some concern that I accept the hon. member for Shefford's position as I accept the more general terms of the history of our country, because with some clarity the hon. member touched upon similar situations that occurred in the past.

However, I think the point of my ruling is very clear. After all, I have heard the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park and also the hon. member for Shefford. Other hon. members might have the same question of privilege. Could the hon. member for Shefford explain or perhaps even suggest to me how best the Chair could hear other points, because a lenghty argument may not be necessary if the points are the same.

The hon. member for Shefford.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I understand your interrupting me, but I was just into my introduction.

You asked us to learn about the oath of allegiance, Mr. Speaker; I have researched the subject, prepared myself and am now ready to share the results with you and our colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, I will certainly mention precedents because in this House parliamentary law is based for the most part on precedents.

Mr. Speaker, I will talk to you—

Mr. Speaker: Once again, I accept the position of the hon. member for Shefford. But I have a question. The hon. member for Shefford has clearly presented an argument which is very precise, very interesting, very historical. So I wonder, given the thorough argument put forward by the hon. member, if the Chair should have to listen to the same argument over and over again this afternoon.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): I am coming to that, Mr. Speaker. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to tell you about the situation in the provincial legislatures.

Mr. Speaker, what my colleague of Laurier—Sainte-Marie did—

Mr. Speaker: I understand very well the position of the hon. member for Shefford, but I have a question for all the members who gave me notice of a question of privilege.

Is it the position of my colleagues from the Bloc? And if so, why should I have to hear the same argument from each and every colleague, and member?

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, your approach to the Bloc Québécois is somewhat unpredictable. Today, you ask me to speak on behalf of the Bloc Québécois, although usually, you ask me to speak as an independent. The fact is that today, I speak as an independent member who happens to belong to the Bloc Québécois. I am sure my colleagues have their own personal privileges that may be affected, and I would not presume to speak on their behalf.

Mr. Speaker, I may recall the customary procedure in the Quebec National Assembly, because it is quite relevant here. The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park referred to a second oath sworn by the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie. Although the Crown is indivisible, the fact is that for years, each member of the Quebec National Assembly has sworn two oaths. Each member of Cabinet swears three oaths. Mr. Speaker, I would like to read this to you because there are precedents.

When my colleague from Hull—Aylmer was a distinguished member of the National Assembly, he swore his two oaths, and he was never accused of lèse-majesté. The fact is, and I would like to read this to you, since 1982 members of the Quebec National Assembly have been asked to swear a second oath. Section 15 of the National Assembly Act provides that a member may not sit in the Assembly until he has sworn the oath or made the solemn statement provided under Schedule 1. Mr. Speaker, Schedule 1 contains the oath or solemn statement, which reads as follows: "I swear I shall be loyal to the people of Quebec and will perform my duties as a member honestly and fairly, in accordance with the Quebec Constitution." Mr. Speaker, according to the manual, members of the National Assembly must also swear the oath of allegiance to the Queen prescribed in section 128 of the British North America Act.

However, one does not exclude the other. An oath of allegiance to one's homeland has been deemed to be constitutional, has been accepted for years, and I cannot accept that today, a procedure is being challenged that has been followed since 1982. Mr. Speaker, if people were more aware of what has happened in Quebec in recent years, they would be more attuned to the political, legal and economic realities of Quebec. Unfortunately, the hon. member is not, because this has been a common procedure since 1982, and no one has ever challenged the right of a member of the National Assembly to sit in the Assembly, to be democratically elected and to be a faithful defender of the interests of his homeland.

Mr. Speaker, I will not bore you with a description of the situation in other countries, but I would like to recall the situation in Great Britain. To our friends who sought refuge during the past few days in the monarchy and the Queen's prerogatives, I would like to say, especially to the hon. member for York South—Weston, that in Great Britain, members of the nationalist Welsh and Scottish parties were elected to the British House of Commons and sat in the House after swearing their oaths. Better still, members of the Labour Party, who have a certain philosophy in common with the Liberal Party, campaign against the monarchy in every election but they still sit in the British House of Commons.

To be helpful, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that the oath of allegiance, as prescribed by law and by the Constitution, was respected. A person can swear allegiance to the Queen because she represents the people. We certainly do not place our trust in the monarchy. We place our trust in the people of Quebec, the people we represent, and we do so proudly in this House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to thank the hon. member for his comments. I do not think I need to hear more arguments on this issue. I do understand the position of the hon. member for Shefford. I also understand the position of the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park and probably also the opinons, views, and behaviour of all the other members in this House. But I would like to make a suggestion. Of course, when we have to deal with such an important issue, it is appropriate for the Chair to reserve its decision. For the record, it would probably also be appropriate to make a list of all other members wishing to raise the same question of privilege. But clearly, we do not need to hear the same argument over and over again.

• (1520)

I would ask the rest of the members to cooperate with the Chair and support this approach.

Is there consent to use this approach?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Flis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order. He may well be able to help me. I will come back to the other members in just a moment.

Mr. Flis: In making your decision, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will not take into account any arguments quoted from what happened in the provincial legislatures. We are masters in our own House and I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will only take the arguments and precedents as set out in Beauchesne, a federal oath of office. Again, I remind anyone who wants to make representations on this case, we are masters of our own House and provincial legislatures are masters of their houses.

Mr. Speaker: The point the hon. member makes is a legitimate one. I want to assure the hon. member that in dealing with this issue I am going to be very careful. However, my point is the hon. member for Shefford has made a good argument. I think he has said about all he can say to persuade me, because I think he has covered the major points.

There are other members who have also filed applications of privilege. I want to make it very clear to them, I do not need to hear an extensive argument from any of them. I would be very pleased to hear from one or more of them very briefly, very briefly indeed. The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

COMMENTS MADE BY THE MEMBER FOR YORK SOUTH—WESTON

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege relates to a statement the hon. member for York South—Weston made in this House yesterday. He said, talking about me:

> A ceremony took place in the city of Hull several weeks ago where the hon. member said to Canadians from one end of the country to another that he was washing his hands of the oath of allegiance that he swore, that each and every one of us swore, to the Queen of Canada, and that his allegiance was to the Province of Quebec. That is fair enough.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct the record. First, I never mocked the Canadian Parliament nor the Queen. I swore the oath of allegiance with all due regard for the democratic institution that the Canadian Parliament is. I did not later say that I was washing my hands of the oath. I did say that it was a formality, and I stand by what I said. It is a formality. I swore allegiance first and foremost to my Laurier—Sainte-Marie constituents, who knew very well, from the start, that I advocated sovereignty. The election results, must I remind you, Mr. Speaker, were conclusive: 68 percent voted for me, 19 percent for the Liberals, 8 percent for the NDP and 3.9 percent for the Conservative Party.

I believe that my election was legitimate and that I can legitimately be a member of this House. I will not repeat all the examples given by my colleague from Shefford, but, as I recall, at every election in Great Britain, the left wing of the Labour Party campaigns against monarchy, then swears an oath to the Queen and request, in one of the first motions they introduce, that monarchy be abolished. Funny that never offended sensitive souls in English Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention to insult the English Canadians the way I was when some of them trampled on the Quebec flag last spring. I will not reciprocate. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that things are happening quite dispassionately and calmly in Quebec and that incisive and false statements, such as that were made yesterday by the member for York South—Weston, foster a climate which is detrimental for Canada as well as for Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Again I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. I would ask all members to be very careful in their remarks and refrain from making accusations or allegations concerning the attitude of their colleagues.

I would urge the hon. member to restrict his comments to the matter under consideration.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I was about to conclude my remarks by saying that I do not have to listen to a lecture on democracy from members of a party which relies on non-elected senators to bring Parliament to a standstill.

My point is very clear, Mr. Speaker: false statements have been made yesterday and I am asking the hon. member for York South—Weston to withdraw his words. That is a specific point and a clear request.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I will heed your advice and be brief. We live in a free and democratic country. We are proud of our political system where elected members enjoy freedom of speech to promote the interests of their constituents, and I would suggest that all members share that sentiment. This is why it is so saddening to realize that good though our system may be it does have weak points. For it has become clear in recent days that some members take advantage of democratic freedoms to discredit democracy in this House. As members from Quebec we left our parties to be free to defend the interests of the people of Quebec. Entertain no illusions, we have their support. The democratic process in Laurier—Sainte-Marie is proof positive of that fact. We got two thirds of the votes. A clear-cut victory. It also goes to show that we members of the Bloc Québécois promote and respect democracy.

In light of that, Mr. Speaker, the attitude and remarks of the hon. member for Burin—St. George's yesterday are totally unacceptable. It is unacceptable that a member with his experience would dare say, and I quote: "I will vote for a motion any day at all that runs this crowd clean out of this place once and for good. I will go for that motion because—"

Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to show more respect for our parliamentary democracy and to withdraw his remarks.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could hear the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands just briefly and then I will come back to the other hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The Standing Orders are clear: whoever wishes to rise on a question of privilege must do so at the most convenient time. The Hon. Member for Burin—St. George made this statement yesterday during debate. Hon. Members were here and they could have risen during debate, but they failed to do so. Therefore, I suggest that what the Hon. Member is doing is irregular and out of order.

• (1530)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I must say that I received all these notices in writing this morning. In the past there has been a general sense that a matter that is to be raised is sometimes raised after it is possible to see the "blues". In any event, I suppose the hon. member is partially right in a very narrow sense, but I have accepted them and I am trying as best I can to dispose of the matter without taking up too much time of the House.

I am saying to the hon. member for Longueuil that he is beginning to go beyond the question of privilege. Sooner or later someone is going to complain about that. I would ask him to bring his remarks to a close and would give him a few more minutes to do so.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I want only to repeat that I am asking the Hon. Member for Burin—St. George to withdraw the remarks he made concerning the Bloc Québécois. I do so, not only on behalf of my Bloc Québécois colleagues, but also of all the Members of this House.

It is a matter of principle; no member of this House should be allowed to comment on the right of another member to sit in this House. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with your suggestion, you wanted to receive direction or, if you will, suggestions from hon. members in helping you to make your adjudication.

Of course you are aware of Beauchesne's paragraph 24, which is a definition of a point of privilege, paragraph 26 and of course paragraph 31 of Beauchesne's.

I wish to point out a number of facts which I believe are quite pertinent to the issue at hand. The first is that the hon. member for Shefford quite rightly made reference to a great Nova Scotian in the person of Joe Howe, who was elected to the House of Commons and had a particular view on Canadian society whereby he led a movement, an anti-confederate movement in this particular country. That is correct, Mr. Speaker, and that is an acknowledged fact.

Second, the acknowledged fact that he did sign or did complete his oath of allegiance to the Queen. No matter how distasteful I may find the views of particular members, if they are duly elected, have signed the appropriate oaths and enter this Chamber, they have a right to present those views.

That in no way should lead one to conclude that members of this party or anywhere in the House would agree with some of the statements and some of the positions that may emanate from that particular member.

I want to put on the record, Mr. Speaker, facts to help you in your adjudication because this is really a dispute as to the allegations of fact. We have had members who have renounced their oath to the Queen at a public ceremony. It was thereafter reported in the press.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dingwall: Just a minute. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is interrupting. Just give me an opportunity to put some facts on the record.

It was reported in The Ottawa Citizen of September 20, 1990: "Bloc MP to wash hands of his oath of allegiance". That was the headline. It may be misleading; it may not be misleading. This is the quote that the author in the newspaper article used, and I wish to read it to you, Mr. Speaker:

> Gilles Duceppe who won a Commons seat in a Montreal by-election recently, said Wednesday he will swear his devotion to the people of Quebec to counteract the oath of allegiance he had to swear to the Queen before being allowed to take his place in the House.
> "It is a symbolic gesture", said Duceppe, reached at his Montreal riding office.

An hon. member: What is your point?

Mr. Dingwall: The hon. member does not like to hear those things; only when he can twist the arguments to his benefit. I am trying to put before you, Mr. Speaker, some of the facts. That is the problem, that the argument is with regard to disputing the facts.

If the hon. member has not said these things, I think the hon. member has an obligation to inform members of this House, to inform the Chair, and to inform Canadians that his Oath of Allegiance to the Queen is firmly intact.

In The Ottawa Citizen of September 24 again there is another fact. The hon. member does not have to agree with it but it is a fact. The headline was: "Separatist supporters in Hull cheer MP's protest oath". Therefore, Mr. Speaker, you can see where hon. members sincerely would question what is taking place.

I provide this information to you, Mr. Speaker, to assist you in your adjudication, reminding you of Beauchesne's definition of the point of privilege, which is paragraph 24; paragraph 26 which draws the distinction between question of privilege and question of order; and of course paragraph 31, which says:

> A dispute arising between two Members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

I give that to you, Mr. Speaker, on your instructions so that you can adjudicate accordingly, but this matter has resulted from certain statements that have been made by hon. members either intentionally or unintentionally.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances, I feel there is a difference of opinion as to the facts. I think it would be appropriate to recognize the Hon. Member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie for a very short reply.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Instead of relying on newspaper reports, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Liberal Party should ask their political minions who had come to the Hull ceremony to cause a row to see whether I had really made disparaging remarks against the Queen or against Parliament. Quite the contrary, Mr. Speaker: We insisted that it is with the outmost respect for Canadian Parliamentary institutions that we are sitting here, while insisting that we would strive to achieve Quebec's sovereignty as soon as possible. That is the solemn promise we made Quebecers. If the Liberal Party does not agree with that, it is, I know, because it does not understand what is going on in Quebec; my impression now is that they do not even want to know. But, that is not our problem, Mr. Speaker. If they rely on newspapers, they will have to correct a lot of things which were said about Jean Chrétien over the past few days. Let them find out from their political minions, paid with taxpayers' money, what I said—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I think that hon. members have heard all that is necessary to be heard, at least for the moment. I am going to consider the matter. I will do the best I can to report back to the House at an appropriate time, in the hope that I can be of some assistance to all hon. members.

[Translation]

I thank the Hon. Member for Parkdale—High Park and his colleagues for their comments. Again, I thank all Hon. Members for their eagerness to co-operate with the Chair.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF APPOINTMENT AND REFERENCE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, an order in council appointment which was made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), it is deemed referred to the appropriate standing committee, a list of which is attached.

• (1540)

And, while I am on my feet, Madam Speaker, I move:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it. The motion is carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Flis: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. By moving to Orders of the Day, I am wondering whether the government realized that it bypassed Statements by Ministers.

As we all know, today is probably one of the most important days in the history of this world. Of course I am referring to the unification of the two Germanys.

There is a national holiday today in Germany commemorating the union of the former two Germanys. I would have expected the Prime Minister, or someone on behalf of the government, to make some statement congratulating the new Germany rather than moving to Orders of the Day.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do agree with the hon. member that this is quite a memorable day, but there was a motion in front of the House that we do now proceed to Orders of the Day. The motion was passed, so I will now call Orders of the Day.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from September 26, consideration of Bill C-44, An Act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and motions Nos. 1 and 2 of Mr. MacDougall (p. 13462) and the amendment of Mr. Plamondon (p. 13468).

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Madam Speaker, on September 14 1990, the Government of Canada announced the conclusion of an agreement with a consortium of private companies concerning the Hibernia development Project.

Today, the House is asked to adopt a Bill that would allow lenders to lend money to that consortium for the duration of the capital project.

The bill does not pertain to the purpose of the project but simply seeks to ensure that the consortium will get the funds it needs and that the federal government will also make certain seems available.

Today, we are asked to say yes to the bill so that the consortium can get the funds or to say no to the bill altogether, in which case, the project would be cancelled or delayed five years.

After the very short period of time allotted for my speech, I will be glad to answer questions from those who need more information.

People have the opportunity to say yes, especially in my riding where we have the best shipyards in North America. The Hibernia Project would bring great possibilities and a lot of work for 1992 and the following years.

We know that in 1992, shipyards in Lauzon will have completed the contracts given them by the federal government in 1985.

So, like the management of the MIL Group in my riding, I say "Hurray for Hibernia, hurray for the agreement, hurray for the work in Lévis and Lauzon"!

Furthermore, this project would provide two to three million hours of direct labour for workers in my riding and from two to three million hours of indirect employment involving draftsmen, management, secretarial work and administrative support. Those jobs, those hours would be feasible in connection with the following major works, and I will mention the main jobs. For instance, the topside ground-based work of the Hibernia project represents 700,000 hours. Dock building and unit construction represents a potential 1,200,000 hours in the shipyards in my riding. As for construction of a supermodule—the people in our shipyards are able to tender a proposal that would be accepted by the consortium—this work represents one million hours.

Madam Speaker, I find it rather incredible that most of the opposition to this project across Canada comes from ridings about the size of my own and from groups that are certainly not aware of the spinoffs. For their information, I will try to explain what the Hibernia project means.

When the project was announced, the consortium was under no obligation regarding the choice of contractors and subcontractors. The consortium went to the private sector, and on September 14, it announced two contracts. The first was with a firm of consulting engineers in Quebec, SNC, which received a contract worth $360 million. This means 600 professionals in Quebec will become experts on processing of hydrocarbons. Thanks to Hibernia, the kind of professional expertise that exists in Western Canada is now being developed in the central and eastern regions of this country. Hibernia will make Quebecers experts in the extraction and processing of hydrocarbons. The second contract, also announced on September 14, was for project management worth $1.3 billion and was awarded to a company that is 60 per cent Quebec-owned, by Atlas and Janin in Montreal. Madam Speaker, this means that the people who design and carry out this project and select input will go with what they know. They will call on Canadian and Quebec services and goods. So we have a leg up in the saddle in Quebec, with the Hibernia project.

There has been a lot of talk about preferential treatment of Newfoundland. They say there will be $1.6 billion worth of work done in that province, and that is true, Madam Speaker. But then that money will go for the construction of the huge base structure that will be built on the Newfoundland shore, for the graving docks that will be needed. This huge concrete island cannot be built in the Great Lakes nor in the West. It must be built on the Newfoundland shore, and then towed 325 kilometers offshore. So, the construction work has to be done on the Newfoundland shore, with all the appropriate equipment. The super modules must be built in Newfoundland, not one after the other, but all five at the same time. That is why Canadian firms will have to tender for all five super modules, and if they can't, then we will have to look elsewhere, Madam Speaker. When all the work is completed, this cement ship will have to be towed to sea, where it will finally be anchored with concrete or some kind of reinforcement. As you see, it is essential that this construction work be done in Newfoundland. Madam Speaker, the only restriction in favour of Newfoundland is that one of these super modules should be built in this province. But any foreign builder could win the bid to build this super module there. And so, no Canadian business has an advantage over other bidders.

• (1550)

I come now to my conclusion, Madam Speaker. My message is: the Hibernia project is good for Canada. It is excellent for Quebec. It carves us a place in the oil industry. It will be necessary, essential, for my riding in the years 1992 to 1996. That is what we, in this government, had in mind when in 1987 we started preparing, developing the technology in my Lauzon shipyard to improve it, and until this program gets under way, in 1992, we will continue to help the people of Lauzon, the MIL people whom we are also supporting in the frigate program they are building for the Canadian government.

So, Madam Speaker, I feel my government is making an excellent contribution to Lévis and to the province of Quebec, a magnificent investment for the whole country.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Having heard what the Hon. Member had to say about Hibernia, Madam Speaker, I would not want to repeat the arguments which were used in the past to support this major project which people have been waiting for over 18 years. It is clearly a major project which certainly was supported by the general public, considering the high unemployment rate in that province. Yet, having seen some of the figures dealing with this project and the huge amounts of money invested by the Federal Government, I became very much interested and I examined some elements. In fact, I feel that the Hon. Member for Richelieu has moved an amendment which I find somewhat interesting for the simple reason that it suggests most contracts should be awarded to Canadian firms. That is clearly desirable. What is clear is that he has failed to consult for instance the MIL, the SNC, the major Quebec firms which know everything there is to know in that field.

The MIL and SNC experts—I am not going to give their names, because they would not want to be quoted as such—provided me with interesting data. They told me that the previous government had a shipbuilding policy. For instance, late in 1979, the MIL had built supermodular drilling rigs in the Gulf of Mexico. It was a great success. MIL built 12 of them. They acquired some kind of expertise in that area. They achieved success in spite of the international competition because the federal government at the time had a shipbuilding policy which no longer exists today whereby they were subsidized in an effort to help them first of all obtain these contracts. Because of a lack of shipbuilding policy, whenever supermodules are build in Great Britain or in Scandinavian countries such as Norway, there is no tarif. The legislation on this is so vague that foreign competition can be unfair. Again, because there is no policy, Canadian firms may experience great difficulties in obtaining most contracts.

But to return to the amendment moved by my colleague the Hon. Member for Richelieu, when we examine the amendment, we realize that it is unrealistic for various reasons. First of all, as far as supermodules for Newfoundland are concerned, the experts say that the five of them must be build at the same time and not one after the other. And I was told that, in fact, even across Canada, we don't have the capacity to build them simultaneously because, for many years, in other countries, technology has improved and we don't have the same capacity. This is one of the factors working against Canadian companies.

Second, if the government insisted on building all five supermodules in Newfoundland, the cost would be higher. Under the agreement now in effect between the international consortium and the federal gouvernment any additional costs would have to be borne by the consortium. In this event, they would be put in a bind and the project would then be in jeopardy. There is talk that they might even withdraw from the agreement.

Consequently, for these two reasons, we must realize that our colleague from Richelieu has tried, in good faith, to help Canadian firms. But we must be realistic! When we get an amendment like the one he has moved, we must look at the facts. One can move totally redundant amendments, but if they are not realistic, they do not mean anything. And that is the case here.

Which forces me, then, Madam Speaker, to move:

That the amendment be amended, by striking out all the words following the word "platform" and substituting the following therefor:

"provide for maximum Canadian content consistent with not harming the project".

This is supported by my colleague, Fred Mifflin, the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

Madam Speaker, this truly reflects the reality, after consultations with experts from Canada and especially from Quebec, and I present it to you here.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I know that you will consider that amendment.

I suggest that that amendment to our amendment negates the present amendment. The latter is intended to create the obligation to go to Canadian bidders first.

The most our colleague from Gatineau—La Lièvre is asking for is what was already announced in all the press releases from the consortia. They say they will do their best. We suggest that their best is not enough, Madam Speaker. We want them to be bound by a legal obligation.

The amendment is basically diluting our amendment to the point of negating it completely. That means that the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre is indirectly saying no to our amendment.

I would ask him to be straightforward. He should just get up and say he is against Canadian companies, not hide behind a sub-amendment. Even his leader said he supported our amendment, Madam Speaker. But now I get the feeling that they are a little twisted in that party because they do not know where to stand. They spoke against our amendment, but their leader said he was for it. They are all mixed up, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, because I think the member for Shefford is loosing his temper for no reason.

One must realize, Madam Speaker, that the amendment to the amendment proposed by the member for Richelieu is precisely intended to add to the contracts and tendering documents for contracts a provision encouraging greater Canadian content without impeding project advancement. That is clear and very precise.

Mr. Lapierre: It is a negation!

Mr. Gauthier: The member for Shefford may think it is, but it is not, Madam Speaker.

• (1600)

Madam Speaker, I believe the motion to be acceptable because it clarifies further the amendment proposed by the member for Richelieu.

The reason for such an amendment, Madam Speaker, is quite simple. Bills are now written simultaneously in both languages. In the French text, there is no paragraph f), but in the English version there is one, and it reads as follows:

[English]

Such other terms and conditions as the minister considers desirable.

[Translation]

But, Madam Speaker, this paragraph is not in the original French text. That is what the government was trying to do. Correct this error, so to speak, and include an amendment which would give the minister the right to decide, when the amendments will be adopted, that there be a highest possible Canadian content, without prejudice to the project itself. Madam Speaker, the amendment complies with the Standing Orders.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): I raise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The honorable member for Richelieu raises on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, the person who can best know whether or not there is a contradiction between this proposition and his amendment is the person who presented it. And in my introduction on this amendment, Madam Speaker—

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but I have to interrupt the Hon. Member straightforwardly. The person who is most able to dertermine if the amendment is relevant or not is the one who is at the Chair. And, after having examined the amendment presented by the Hon. Member for Richelieu and the amendment to an amendment that has just been presented by the Hon. Member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, I must rule that the amendment to the amendment complies with the Standing Orders and put it to the House now.

Mr. Plamondon: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I would have appreciated to have been allowed to finish my 20 second argument. You interrupted me after only five seconds, and you made the ruling without hearing what I was going to say.

The whole bill was based on an encouragement to work with Canadian companies and the amendment I have presented is to make coercive the decision the government is going to take on the need to have a Canadian content. It is utterly contradictory to what I have said and to what the government had said.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I interrupted the hon. member for Richelieu, simply because his declaration was denying the Chair the opportunity to rule on the admissibility of the sub-amendment put before the House. The reasons why he originally proposed his amendment are certainly valid, just as much as the reasons for the amendment to the amendment. Nothing will prevent the hon. members, when the amendment to the amendment and then the amendment are put to a vote, from deciding. The decision belongs to the House. At the present time the Chair cannot rule otherwise. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Manicouagan has the floor.

Mr. Plamondon: Point of order, Madam Speaker—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Let me tell the hon. member that I would not like him to question the Chair's ruling at this point. The hon. member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, you said you had to interrupt me because you said the ruling is yours, and I can understand that. But, after reminding me not to prejudge, that the ruling was not mine, but yours to take, you did not give me the opportunity to put my argument forward before rendering your ruling.

We did speak the same language. We cannot blame it on a bad translation or something like that. Your point is— Any linguist or constitutional expert would tell you, after comparing the texts, that they are complete opposites. And you ask me not to question your ruling, Madam Speaker? I am sorry, but it goes opposite to what I said, it is the antithesis of what I said, and I would call for a division on this.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, I find most regrettable that an hon. member of this House should challenge a ruling of the Chair. For years now, it has been agreed that a ruling by the Speaker should not be challenged. The ruling in case was made by the Chair. The amendment to the amendment is in order. We are now at debate, Madam Speaker, and I suggest that you proceed accordingly.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, resuming the debate, Bill C-44 authorizes the federal government to contribute financially to the development of the oil field discovered in the Atlantic a few years ago, off Newfoundland. This oil field is known as Hibernia. In June 1990, I sat on the legislatve committee which studied section by section Bill C-44, the one that is debated today. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, when appearing before the committee, spoke at lenght about the benefits to be derived from the project, for the economy as well as the creation of jobs, both in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec.

I readily concluded that it was essential for Canada to gain expertise in the development of our underwater oil resources. We have to look at the situation in Great Britain, in Scandinavia and in Russia to understand how important it is for us, in Canada, to acquire that expertise. Right now, Canada has very little or no expertise in the development of off-shore oil fields. Canada has no choice but to join the group of nations that have acquired the technology to develop those vast off-shore reserves in a cost-efficient way. That is the purpose of Bill C-44.

By joining a consortium of private enterprises that are already involved in the oil sector, the government of Canada makes it possible for the Hibernia project to become reality. Moreover, Canada becomes a partner in the development of new processes and advanced technologies for the extraction of oil from off-shore reserves. Also, the government and the private sector work together to give Eastern Canada state-of-the-art facilities, to allow our engineering firms to acquire the knowledge and expertise they need in the design of supermodules, to give shipbuilders in Eastern Canada an opportunity to join together for the construction of those supermodules and to allow our workers to specialize in trades related to the construction and operation of the necessary equipment.

That is why I supported Bill C–44 when it was referred to the Legislative Committee for clause–by–clause study last June. I have to say that I asked, seconded by the hon. member for Ontario, that the Committee hear witnesses before completing its study of the bill. I wanted to take advantage of the presence of witnesses to ensure that Quebec would benefit fully from the economic impact of the Hibernia project. The minister reassured members of the committee telling them that as a result of discussions between private sector partners and the government of Eastern Canada, including of course Quebec, would get maximum benefit of the positive effects of the Hibernia project. On the basis of this assurance and convinced that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was making every effort to reach this goal, I supported Bill C–44 in the legislative committee. Now that the Hibernia project has been announced and that some information have been made public, we can see that we made the right move in committee. Indeed, when the project was recently announced in Montreal, we were able to learn that a very large part of the engineering works will be done in Montreal by Montreal firms, by Montreal engineers. In addition, some building companies from the province of Quebec and Montreal play a leading role in the joint venture that will perform most of the construction work related to the project.

• (1610)

Madam Speaker, Quebec is already benefitting: some companies already play a big role and are major participants in the Hibernia project. Better still, Hibernia–related business opportunities, unique in that they will lay right at our doorstep, will be provided to our cement companies, shipyards and large manufacturing industries established in the Montreal region in all manufacturing areas from metal parts to highly sophisticated electronics and computer equipment.

Shipping and trucking companies based in Montreal are getting ready to meet the additional traffic Hibernia will generate in the movement of goods manufactured in the Montreal and Quebec region—

Mr. Saint–Julien: Hear, hear!

Mr. Langlois: —toward Newfoundland.

An hon. member: What about Sorel?

Mr. Langlois: I include Sorel in the Montreal region.

It is quite true that because of the Hibernia project Newfoundland will experience an unprecedented economic recovery, and that is good. It will, however, have an impact beyond Newfoundland over the whole eastern part of Canada, including Quebec, of course.

Madam Speaker, the members of the New Democratic Party object to the fact that some of the Hibernia crude oil production will be refined outside of Canada, especially in the United States. Our NDP friends should know that Canada can afford to use some of its natural resources as export commodities.

Should we treat oil differently than we do wood, copper, iron or electricity? I say it should not, Madam Speaker. Some of our oil production can be exported, thus contributing to foreign currencies flouring into Canada and helping us to maintain a sound balance of payments. You should understand that, my friends.

Madam Speaker, Canada has huge oil and gas reserves, both proven and unharnessed. One only has to visit the North of Alberta, as I did recently, to realize the vastness of the oil resources that can be found in the Athabaska oil sands alone. I would invite my colleagues to make such a visit. It is an education.

So, we can rest assured that there is no risk in exporting some of Hibernia oil production. Canada will benefit from it for many years.

[English]

There is another reason why I supported Bill C–44 in the legislative committee in June, and also why I support it in the House today.

The Hibernia project will provide job opportunities to the residents of several localities of the lower north shore, the eastern section of the riding of Manicouagan. The Blanc–Sablon area is linked to the island of Newfoundland by a ferry service. Already there is a continuous movement of people and goods between the island of Newfoundland and the Blanc–Sablon area.

It will be possible for the residents of the villages of Old Fort, St. Paul's River, Middle Bay, Bradore, Lourdes–de–Blanc–Sablon, and Blanc–Sablon to apply for jobs on the construction sites. I encourage them to do so.

I am sure that Newfoundlanders, maritimers, and Quebecers will team together in Hibernia. They will work together to bring this great project to its conclusion, making it a truly Canadian project, in the best spirit of co-operation and teamwork.

Let us pool our knowledge, our skills, and our determinations and let us show the world that we, as Canadians, are a proud people and that we are the best when we work to attain the same goal.

Hibernia offers us a great challenge. It is up to us to make sure that this challenge will be met by us by voting for Bill C-44 as soon as possible.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, let's overcome our fears! Let us give Quebecers the opportunity to work with their fellow citizens from the Maritimes and Newfoundland in the development of the Hibernia project.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise this afternoon unfortunately having to tailor my remarks somewhat from what I had intended, given the weak-kneed, lily-livered, pusillanimous, nonsensical sub-amendment proposed by the member of the Liberal Party. Anyone who has access to the text can see that it takes what was a perfectly reasonable Canada-first Bloc Quebecois amendment and turns it into a wishy-washy, mushy sort of pap of the kind that, quite frankly, Madam Speaker, Canadians have come to expect of the Liberal Party.

Before moving into the content of these motions, I would like to say something for the benefit of those unilingual anglophone Canadians watching at home who are wondering what all the fireworks are about. There are many of them in my riding, Madam Speaker. I would like to go into just a bit of what has been said here.

This is all about an amendment to Bill C-44, the bill which authorizes the expenditure of public money in Hibernia and other things. It is an amendment to clause 3 of the bill which is on page 4. Oddly, this is all being done strictly in the French language. It is only the French version of the bill which the Bloc Quebecois amendment sought to amend. The French version currently reads that the minister has the authority to do this, that and the other, and eventually gets to subsection (f) "and such other measures as the minister may judge appropriate or suitable". To this, the Bloc Quebecois, in the person of the hon. member for Richelieu, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford, proposed an amendment that would add to it after the "suitable" or" appropriate"—

[Translation]

"— notamment l'assurance que les appels d'offres sur les cinq super modules de la plate-forme soient, dans un premier temps, réservés aux seules entreprises canadiennes".

[English]

It means basically that the minister may do such other things, especially to guarantee that invitations to tender for the five platforms will be initially restricted to Canadian firms.

The Liberal member has now proposed that the words, which roughly in English are "will be initially restricted to Canadian firms", be replaced with words that basically say that the proposal must provide for maximum Canadian content consistent with not harming the project. That, at least, is how I, in my own admittedly imperfect fashion, come to translate all of these things.

Obviously you can see the difference between requiring that the bids be restricted to Canadians in the first instance on the one hand and seeking maximum Canadian content on the other. It is this difference which forms the reason why we in the New Democratic Party will be voting against the Liberal subamendment and for the Bloc Quebecois amendment. Unfortunately, we will be doing so fully in the knowledge that the Bloc Quebecois amendment, as presented, flies in the face of the free trade agreement.

There are several provisions in the free trade agreement, entered into almost two years ago now, that are quite pertinent here. I would like to note a few. The first article I will quote is from the version of the agreement published in the Canada Gazette, Part III, Chapter 65, assented to December 30, 1988. I quote from page 2118 of that Gazette, the following, article 105, National Treatment: "Each Party shall, to the extent provided in this Agreement, accord national treatment with respect to investment and to trade in goods and services".

We come to chapter 14 dealing with services, article 1402, sub (1): "—each Party shall accord to persons of the other party treatment no less favourable than that accorded in like circumstances to its persons with respect to the measures covered by this Chapter". This is the chapter which covers services. Among those services covered by this chapter, it notes in annex 1408 on page 2246 the following: mining services, including oil and gas field services, construction services, including building, developing and general contracting services, and wholesale trade services.

• (1620)

As well, it covers commercial services, including professional services such as engineering, architectural and surveying services, scientific and technical services, repair and maintenance services and building management services.

I am now to chapter 15, annex 1502.1 dealing with business visitors. On page 2260 of The Canada Gazette, it is noted "(a) Business visitors. A business person seeking temporary entry into Canada—shall be granted entry without being required to obtain an employment authorization—upon presentation or proof of United States citizenship and documentation" et cetera.

Those business persons covered include persons doing technical, scientific and statistical research, conducting independent research or research for an enterprise located in Canada. It includes production management personnel conducting commercial transactions for an enterprise located in Canada.

As well, it includes after sales service such as installers, repair and maintenance personnel. It includes general service professionals, including management and supervisory personnel engaging in commercial transactions for an enterprise located in Canada.

Virtually all of the work associated with the Hibernia project, especially in the construction of the various parts of the project, is covered by the free trade agreement, so that in the absence of some indication in the act, a provision for Canada first will be undertaken notwithstanding the free trade agreement, it cannot be done.

Again, I say we will be voting for this amendment, but I am afraid that in the face of the free trade agreement, it would have to fall. We will vote for it, hoping that it will pass regardless, because we think this is precisely the sort of contradiction that Canadians ought to be made aware of.

However, I would note—and I do this with some heavy heart—that we are dealing here, unfortunately, with an amendment proposed by persons who perhaps are not dealing entirely genuinely with this House. I would note that at the time of second reading, report stage and third reading, among those voting for the free trade agreement, the agreement which precludes that which is being sought in this amendment by the Bloc Quebecois, were the members for Lac-Saint-Jean, Verdun—Saint—Paul, Megantic—Compton—Stanstead, Longueuil, Richelieu and Rosemont.

All of those members voted for the free trade agreement at second reading, report stage and third reading.

Two other members of the Bloc Quebecois, the hon. member for Shefford and the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer, were not present at any of those votes, so they did not oppose the free trade agreement.

Now we have the circumstance of a series of members—it would be wrong of me to accuse them of being hypocritical, atavistic reactionaries so I will not do that, Madam Speaker—however, we are confronted with the spectacle of members who, previously having voted apparently with great passion and determination for a particularly odious government measure, are now proposing measures to this House which cannot be implemented unless that prior piece of legislation is in some way overturned or at least put aside in this instance.

I will leave this conundrum to the House. Again, I will say that we absolutely support the goal of maximum Canadian content, of Canada first. We support those measures that would be part of any rational economic strategy involving the maximum upgrading and value adding on our resources here in Canada.

For that reason, we will oppose the Liberal subamendment. We will support the Bloc Quebecois amendment. We will continue to oppose the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Madam Speaker, I am extremely happy to take part in this debate not only as a member from Quebec, but also as a House of Commons member, and I will add that as a member of the Committee on Energy, Mines and Ressources, I have been able to notice the point of view—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Laurier–Sainte–Marie on a point of order.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie): We do not have a quorum. We cannot proceed without a quorum.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I believe we have a quorum. The hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Before I was interrupted, Madam Speaker, I was saying I am pleased to take part in this debate not only as a Quebec member of the House of Commons but also as a member of the Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources.

I have had an opportunity to examine the scope and consequences of this project. As many of my colleagues pointed out the Hibernia development project will create a great many new business opportunities for all regions of Canada, including Quebec.

This is a major and highly technical oil project which will bring huge benefits to Quebec. It is expected to have a significant impact and contribute to improving existing Canadian know–how and developing new skills.

Supporters of the Hibernia project should keep in mind that the government has set a series of objectives. We want to create as many jobs as possible for Canadians, train highly skilled workers, seek the assurance that contracts awarded to Canadians during the negotiations are of strategic significance and pave the way for more projects designed to develop other petroleum resources. Finally we have done our best to make sure that the work is spread among various regions.

It might be interesting to consider the economic impact of these benefits. The government has been working for a long time now to achieve these objectives. The first step was made when the government enacted the Atlantic agreement provisions concerning the economic consequences for Canada and Newfoundland and when it established the Canada—Newfoundland offshore development fund. The provisions concerning the Atlantic Accord spinoffs have been reinforced by the Canada–Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act.

Madam Speaker, a good many Hon. members are aware of the spinoffs which Hibernia will bring to Newfoundland. For instance, the consortium has agreed to build the gravity based structure in Newfoundland. The wellhead module and other elements connected to it will be built and assembled in the same province. Moreover, a large part of the technical design will be done in Newfoundland. This is quite logical in view of the fact that these enormous infrastructures could not be moved either by land or by sea.

I must mention that Hibernia will bring additional spinoffs to other Canadian regions.

Let us have a closer look. As a Quebec member, I am pleased to see that this province will receive its share of the spinoffs, no matter what some independent members may say to the contrary, Madam Speaker. Hibernia will use over 100 000 tons of—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hull–Aylmer on a point of order.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Could you check and see whether there is a quorum to listen to this Quebec Tory Member?

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is a quorum. The Hon. Member for Richmond—Wolfe has the floor.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): As I was saying, Madam Speaker, this structure will require over 100 000 tons of concrete which will be provided to a large extent by a number of Quebec plants.

• (1630)

It is also expected that the metal parts for the major components will be largely built in Canada. For instance, some companies could build the top sides and one of the supermodules. Surely you must be aware that on September 14, Hibernia Management and Development Company Limited awarded a contract for an important part of the Hibernia Sea Tanker to les Entrepreneurs Offshore de Terre–Neuve, a joint Canadian–European venture. Two important engineering firms in Quebec, namely SNC and Monenco Limited, are the major partners in this joint venture.

This very important contract for Quebec features two main components. The first one is to provide for the structural engineering and supply work for the facilities at sea. These superstructures account for approximately half of the capital value of the Hibernia project. Over the next thirty months, engineering and supply alone will provide employment for some 600 people at the project office in Montreal: $360 million, 600 engineers for more for 30 months in Montreal. Not to mention other projects worth $5 billion for which contracts have been awarded and approved. The first contract: out of $1.4 billion, $360 million go to Montreal.

The other part deals with the management services for the project.

As stated by Mr. Guy Saint-Pierre, President and Chairman of the SNC Group, the project will provide for the firms located both in Montreal and Saint-Jean involved in the joint venture additional expertise and experience which will raise their international profile.

Some of my other colleagues have given some concrete examples. A second contract, worth $1.3 billion, has to do with the design and construction of the Hibernia gravity structure. Two Quebec firms, Atlas Construction and Janin Construction have a 60 per cent ownership in the Newfoundland Offshore Development Corporation, NODECO, which was awarded the contract. Under this contract, Atlas and Janin will be mostly called upon to develop new skills in the very specialized construction techniques of offshore structures. This aspect of their participation will help improve their image and make it possible for them to operate successfully both in Canada and abroad.

Madam Speaker, I want to mention here that out of these 2 contracts which total $1.6 billion, an excess of between $400 and $500 million will be paid out automatically. Compared with the $1.5 billion total for the contracts awarded so far, the spinoffs will amount to more than the 20 per cent of which some independent leaders were satisfied long before this bill was ever introduced.

Over the past few months during which some of our colleagues left our party to sit as independents, improvements to the project with which their leader was satisfied earlier have been made. All this to say that thanks to the representations made by the members who chose to stay with the government, the benefits are there.

Another Quebec corporation, MIL—I have a clipping somewhere—said it was quite satisfied with the contract. I quote only the heading of the press release: MIL expected to play a major role in Canadian oil development projects. That is the heading of the press release. But to return to MIL. It expects to bid successfully for a large part of the project. MIL has gained tremendous expertise in the construction of drilling rigs, the repair and maintenance of mobile rigs, as well as the construction of shuttle tankers and supply ships.

The company will also offer for these projects installation, start up, engineering, inspection and testing services. Groupe MIL has worked closely with companies located in the Maritimes and Newfoundland. The confidence that they expressed in their press release is confirmed by the wording of the act. I am not afraid to say it and to prove it.

Madam Speaker, all regions of Canada will benefit from the $3 million which will be spent in the country for the bringing into production of Hibernia. I believe that all the members for Quebec and Canada and the people of Newfoundland have the right to be satisfied with this great project which will be profitable for Canada as a whole, for all provinces, and for Quebec in particular.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I feel somewhat refreshed after that vote of confidence to be able to get up and speak on this motion.

I would like to begin by complimenting my colleagues from Manicouagan and from Richmond—Wolfe. I certainly appreciated the comments that they had, and I do believe they put this amendment very much in perspective.

I can say at the outset that on a project of this nature, one of the biggest if not the biggest project that has ever been undertaken in Canada, as a Newfoundlander of course I have my own views, but surely there is enough to go around for everybody on this by the time we get over the details of what is going to follow. I mean we are at the very early stages of the bidding on this particular, very highly technical contract. When we make comments and when it is written in the contract that we are looking at best efforts and we want the best and the maximum, I think we have to put it in perspective.

Like everything in this world this project is a tradeoff. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that I would love to have this project have everything for Canada, bar none, without exception, but I believe I am a realist and I know that many of my colleagues on both sides of the House are realists as well.

Let me put it to you another way, Madam Speaker. If we waited until we had this particular contract perfect, we would have the contract still being negotiated until the second coming. It would be impossible to have it perfect. Somewhere between the perfection and the doing, the practical nature of getting oil out of Hibernia and the follow on fields in Ben Nevis and Terra Nova, which is 20 miles south of Hibernia, we have got to get moving on it.

Our subamendment asks in its simplest terms to favour the maximum Canadian content without jeopardizing, without delaying the progress of this very important project, not just to Newfoundland or Quebec but to Canada. The whole of the country is going to be involved. If we were to wait until we got all the things that we wanted, we would never ever be able to get the project under way.

The NDP and the independent members of this House, it would appear to me, do not particularly want this project to go ahead. NDP members have already said that. There are a number of reasons why they said it. I was not amused, but I found it passing strange that the hon. member for Kamloops got up and complained about the little time that we have spent speaking on this particular project.

I also recall the hon. member for Edmonton East, just a few moments ago, complaining about various aspects of what went on, what was not done, what should have been done, and that sort of thing. Without playing dirty pool, I remember very distinctly as the quarterback of this bill, certainly for second reading and I participated in first reading, that there was no big fuss about why the project should not go ahead. There were some amendments being proposed. I remember distinctly in committee on June 13 that it took one day because that is what the committee members agreed to. All we needed was one day.

Therefore, I found a time warp from June 13 to this very day and last Wednesday I found some interesting positions being changed. Some of the members who are now proposing amendments to this particular project previously, at least on June 13, were quite happy to support the project as it stood. I find it very strange that now, when we are ready to pull the trigger on this highly technical and valuable project, they complain that they want all kinds of amendments made to the bill. They want amendments that essentially would make the project not viable if we were to invoke those measures.

The subamendment that I speak to does a number of things. I have to speak about that subamendment in the knowledge that there was a 20–year passage since the Hibernia field was discovered and the development in eastern Canada, indeed across Canada, and the increase in the sophistication in the supply, in technical knowledge and in the skills of offshore drilling. This project is certainly the first offshore oil project that will come into production in Canada and it takes a long time to develop expertise.

We do have a lot of expertise in Newfoundland, in eastern Canada, Quebec, all over Canada, but it has taken 20 years to develop it. This is why the Canadian content in the entire project is between 60 per cent and 65 per cent. It is not 100 per cent, but 60 to 65 per cent is more than twice as much as there was about 20 years ago when the Norwegians and the British became involved in the development and production of North Sea oil. That is a quantum jump, to say nothing of the fact that there are certain elements in the highly technical nature of the concrete structure, the five modules, the delivery systems, and perhaps even the tankers themselves that are going to deliver the oil.

I do have some knowledge of the shipbuilding business. I have some knowledge of marine things. I can assure you that as a ship's captain and overseeing staff, we could not produce in Canada all the items we needed to build a ship. Perhaps it is too long ago for me to count the number of years, but the point is that had we relied on 100 per cent Canadian content for our radar, machinery and in the case of the older destroyer, for our Y–100 machinery, the valves, the seam stops in our submarines, making sure it was safe to go to sea and to die, we would have had to shut down the navy. There would be no navy. There would be no ships. There would be no repairs.

If my choice as a parliamentarian, politician, Newfoundlander and as a Canadian is to look for the perfection in this particular project that my NDP colleagues are looking for with respect to Canadian content, including their reluctance to spend $2.7 billion on this very worth–while project, it would never leave the ground, as the hon. member for St. John's said a couple of days ago. We would be here arguing, cajoling, debating, amending, putting motions and all these kinds of things about Hibernia when we are all old men. That is unsatisfactory. That is unacceptable.

We have 42,000 unemployed people in Newfoundland right now. I am prepared to get up here and talk about any amendment for the rest of my life to get one more job, because one more job is another person who will have some measure of satisfaction and dignity and can make one more contribution. It is not that people in Newfoundland do not work. The jobs are not there. To me every single job counts.

When I get people looking for perfection but that search impedes a project that will employ 10,000 people in eastern Canada, a lot of Newfoundlanders and permanently employ 1,100 people, considering the number of people who are unemployed, I will go to any length to fight the amendments that slow it down and I will support the amendments that speed it up.

We have been talking about this Hibernia project for a long time. It just did not start with the first reading of this bill. It has been going on for 10 years.

• (1650)

As I said the other day, how many times do we have to sign this? How many times do we have to debate it? How many motions do we have to have?

Madam Speaker, I am aware of the work my friend from St. John's East has done on this project and I know how close it is to him. Indeed, I know I speak for the majority of the members of this House who have had enough of the i–dotting and the t–crossing and who want to get on with getting this project under way.

I believe, Madam Speaker, our motion is a way to facilitate that. It is a great opportunity for us to move ahead and develop the technical expertise so that by the time Terra Nova comes onstream we may be able to go for 80 or 85 per cent Canadian content.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): I am happy to rise to take part in the debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Longueil on a point of order.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): I move that the hon. member for Rosemont do now speak.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry. I cannot accept the motion at this time. The hon. member had already started his remarks. The hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise and speak about this famous project. We have been talking in Canada about the Hibernia project for twenty-five years. There is nothing new there. Between 1980 and 1984, the oil field was surveyed and evaluated. Eight out of the nine wells that were drilled proved to be worth developing and worth the cost of $465 million. They can go on talking. I am very pleased they noticed that there are conservative Quebecers who have been defending Quebec's interests since 1984. We did not wait until 1990 to start defending those interests, Madam Speaker. We have been doing it since 1984 while some of the hon. members on the other side were travelling around the world a couple of times—

Madam Speaker, in February of 1985, the Atlantic Accord was signed. The funniest thing of all is that, on May 10, 1988, when the Atlantic Accord was voted on, the New Democrats voted with the government in favour of the Accord. I see also that the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead voted in favour of the Accord on that day, and it seems somewhat bizarre today to see the other members sitting on the other side, the member for Longueuil, the member for Richelieu who was not present—maybe he was gone on a trip around the world— Madam Speaker, in this project, all regions of Canada have the opportunity to benefit from the $3 million that will be spent in Canada to get the Hibernia project off the ground. We know that companies in Quebec are in a very good position to get their share of the contracts that will be awarded to Canadian companies.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Point of order. The hon. member for Rosemont has the floor.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): I would like to remind you, Madam Speaker, to listen carefully to what the hon. member is saying. If some members of this House did make inappropriate trips on official business, then that may be considered an insult to the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not see how the hon. member for Rosemont can feel threatened by a comment not intended for him. After all, the Chair cannot be responsible for each and every word uttered in this House. The hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am glad his point of order has been ruled inadmissible. I never talked about official trips. I think, everywhere in the world, when people talk about the whole wide world, they also mean Quebec. I want to thank my colleague. Since Quebec has already carried out similar projects, for example, some hydro projects, and I think I am in a position to talk about hydro projects, since I come from the largest riding of the ten provinces, and the Bay James project has had an enormous impact— All of the equipment was built in Quebec, and then brought to my constituency. These people have some experience in the shipbuilding field. Quebec businesspeople will surely be able to compete when bidding for the Hibernia contracts. It may be that I know nothing of the sort, but I won't refrain from rising because I am a Conservative from Quebec. And it is not the member for Rosemont who will stop me from speaking in the House of Commons. Stay in your small Montreal. You never came to Abitibi. Stay home!

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order!

The Chair would ask the member for Abitibi to address himself to the Chair and not directly to one of his collegues. This would help to maintain order in the House. The member for Abitibi.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I admit you are right. You are perfectly right. In both cases, Quebec companies already own majority interest in the consortia which obtained the contracts. Discussions on the contracts have begun in Montreal. More than 600 individuals, Madam Speaker, will work on designing surface modulars for Hibernia.

Quebec companies are also hoping for contracts related to Hibernia. I agree with the Quebec Conservative

Members and I agree with the Bloc Quebecois members that we have to stand up for Quebec interests in this project. We all agree and that is why we speak today.

Madam Speaker, the significance of what Quebec is getting is not measured only in terms of value of the contracts flowing from the Hibernia project, but also in terms of acquiring new and valuable expertise in the field of design and construction of offshore structures that Quebec will be able to use on the international market over the years.

People in Quebec should be reminded of one thing, Madam Speaker, it is that the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean voted for Hibernia. When he was minister of the Environment he had managed to get 2 million man-hours for Newfoundland. What is even more surprising, Madam Speaker, it is that the hon. member for Roberval and Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, and the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm and Minister of the Environment, have done better. They got 4 million man-hours. Four million man-hours is quite an achievement! I wish to thank them for that. Some other people should also be thanked, Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Manicouagan—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Rosemont on a point of order.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Madam Speaker, I did not rise earlier when the hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe mentioned that some government members had voted, abstained or kept silent when the bill was in the House. I was Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Sciences and Technology then, Mr. Speaker. I am prepared to take risks whenever what I believe in is at stake.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I fail to see what Standing Orders could could have been infringed upon in the hon. member's words. The hon. member may want to debate it at some other time, but he has no point of order. The hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to mention the contribution and the efforts of the member for Manicouagan, who is right here beside me. He is a new and very good member. I am extremely pleased to do it, because he was a member of the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources. He worked very hard for Québec and Canada to have that project.

An hon. member: That is true, Guy!

Mr. Saint-Julien: As my colleague for Duvernay, Vincent Della Noce, used to say: "That is one of the biggest projects for Canada and for Quebec". I agree with him.

Madam Speaker, we could talk about many things regarding that project, but we all stand for it before the voters and the people. It is normal for Quebec members to seek assurances that a good chunk of the 2.7 billion dollars Ottawa has coutributed to the project will be spent in Quebec. But it is not certain that their approach is, in the long term, in the interest of Quebec.

It is the duty of the federal government to make sure that its contributions be handed out equitably through out Canada to be used in the most cost-efficient way. It means that Quebec will never have more than its fair share of the federal windfall. Therefore it is important not to try and grab the whole thing but to enhance our chances to get what will do the most for the economic development of Quebec.

• (1700)

Mr. Langlois: And quality!

Mr. Saint-Julien: And quality, of course, Madam Speaker, as my colleague the member for Manicouagan, who is seated at my left, said. What is important is quality made in Quebec.

Madam Speaker, this whole debate about Hibernia and the allocation of work would not be, were Hibernia a purely financial project. If it were, the participating oil companies would then be completely free to go for the lowest bid, whether it came from Quebec, Korea, Singapore or Italy. Politicians would have no say in the matter. However, the financial involvement of the government introduces a political element and there is no indication as to where political involvement must cease and sound project management begin.

As my colleague the member for Manicouagan said, he immediately stood up for Quebec and the Quebecers as well as for Canada. The project is excellent, I agree.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker—

Mr. Duceppe: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Boudria: Is there a point of order, Madam Speaker?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie on a point of order.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, the member for Rosemont stood up at the same time as me. I would ask that he be heard.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott-Russell had already started his address. The motion is therefore inadmissible. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this afternoon to speak to this House and to this important bill. I was anxious to hear what the hon. member for Rosemont had to say, but I am sure that sooner or later we shall have that opportunity. I am certainly looking forward to hearing the hon. member on the subject, as are all Canadians, because as you know—

An hon. member: Sit down!

Mr. Boudria: I suggest the hon. member for Richelieu listen carefully, since he moved the amendment that would allow only Canadian firms to bid on the platform contracts. In fact, the hon. member is to be commended for his spirit of renewed federalism as reflected in his desire to help the industry across Canada. A great federalist, the hon. member for Richelieu, proposed this amendment! I must say it is edifying to see this Pan-Canadian spirit among members of the new party, the Bloc canadien. So the Bloc canadien moved this Pan-Canadian amendment, seconded of course by another ultra-federalist member, the hon. member for Shefford. He supported the federalist amendment, because we must not forget they want to help Canada as a whole with this amendment.

Madam Speaker, I am sure all our colleagues from Alberta, Ontario, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and the other provinces will be proud of this renewed interest in Canada, as demonstrated by these two members. We could almost ask some members to renew their oath of allegiance to our country, almost, perhaps, but not quite.

Although it arises from the great spirit of renewed federalism to which I referred earlier, the amendment, notwithstanding its federalist imprint, was not well prepared. The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, however, did his homework. He did some research and drafted an amendment to the amendment, to improve the text. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre who, I am told, consulted SNC in Quebec as well as MIL and several other organizations.

Following this thorough consultation, the Hon. Member for Gatineau—La Lièvre who, as always, is showing utmost dedication in his efforts to promote the interests of Canadians generally and Quebecers in particular, hastened to move this amendment which certainly has improved the Hon. member for Richelieu's federalist mention.

Once amended, the amendment would read:

> f) les autres mesures que le ministre juge souhaitables, notamment l'assurance que les appels d'offres sur les cinq supermodules de la plate-forme—

His proposal would guarantee an optimum Canadian content without delaying the project.

What the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre has done, Madam Speaker, is to move an amendment to the amendment which will help achieve the purpose of the hon. member for Richelieu, this great federalist, while making sure that it will not hinder of the project. As you can see, Madam Speaker, the amendment in question—

Mr. Lapierre: The amendment to the amendment. . .

Mr. Boudria: Yes, the amendment to the amendment, as the Hon. Member for Shefford, who knows the rules, is saying. Because of his regular attendance in the House of Commons, he is well informed of the procedure of the House, Madam Speaker.

I want to praise this new interest for federalism on the part of our colleagues, especially the Hon. Member for Richelieu and the Hon. Member for Shefford. I should like to add, for instance, that a true message of congratulations should be unanimously sent to our colleague the Hon. Member for Gatineau—La Lièvre who, as a result of his dedication, has put together this amendment to the amendment which I hope will be adopted by the House of Commons.

[English]

I join with all my colleagues who, I am sure, want this project to go ahead very soon. It is to the benefit of the great province of Newfoundland and I am sure that all of us want Canada's newest province to achieve a state of prosperity that it has not yet enjoyed. The proud people of Newfoundland want this project.

All members of the House who represent the province of Newfoundland have spoken eloquently about this bill. It is our hope that the amendment to the amendment offered today by the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre will make this bill even better and will achieve greater prosperity not only for Newfoundland, but for all Canada. Again, it is my hope that we will vote in favour of this bill and we will adopt it unanimously later today.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, it is a great honour for me to have the opportunity to speak—

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming had the floor. He had started his remarks—

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is a member of this House who clearly expect the Chair to look in all directions and see everything at once. Unfortunately, this is not a privilege which comes with the job.

• (1710)

According to the normal rotation that applied all through proceedings on this bill, the next speaker should be somebody from the government side.

I have recognized the hon. member—

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order!

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I ask and move that the hon. member for Rosemont be now heard.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): I second the motion, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming had been recognized and had started his remarks.

The hon. member.

[English]

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I know this has been a very difficult—

[Translation]

Some hon. members: That is not true!

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): You are being partisan, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, it is a tradition of this House—

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker is neutral.

Mr. Boudria: —that all members respect the authority we ourselves entrusted in the Speaker. The authority of the Chair is not imposed on us. We gave that authority to the Chair.

Therefore, by that very fact, the Chair has the confidence of the House. If the House decided otherwise, it would freely address the issue.

In the meantime, Madam Speaker, I find it unacceptable that any member challenge the authority of the Chair because that would be challenging the authority we entrusted in the Chair.

This is the basis for my objection, Madam Speaker. I consider it is an insult, not only to the Chair, but in fact to the whole House which has decided who should preside over its proceedings.

Mr. Lapierre: On the same point of order!

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have sat in my seat patiently all afternoon trying to listen to the debate. I would like to commend you for the patience you have shown during the deliberations all afternoon.

Any objective observer of the deliberations today would conclude that there are certain members in the House who have attempted all afternoon, not to engage in legitimate, intelligent debate, but to disrupt the proceedings in the House. You have been patient and have recognized points of order after points of order in a shameful display by certain members of the House.

If they were truly interested in debating this most important bill before the Parliament of Canada, surely they can show respect for other members in the House but, more importantly, respect for the Chair.
