YUKON PLACER MINING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-68, An Act to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and to make provision for the application of certain orders be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, Bill C-68, which is presented for second reading today, is necessary to ensure that the Government of Canada can continue to manage public lands in Yukon.

A recent decision of the Federal Court of Appeal has declared that withdrawal orders under Section 23 of the Territorial Lands Act do not prohibit the staking of mining claims in Yukon. This decision eliminates the use of procedures under which the government has, in the past, set land aside, land for future use or to be held pending final decision on the use of that land.

Some of the reasons this government and previous governments have withdrawn lands include: Setting aside three potential sites for an airstrip pending the result of assessments of the sites for their suitability as an airstrip; setting aside lands that have been identified during land claims negotiations for the selection by the Yukon First Nation under a final agreement; and, setting aside lands for right-of-way.

All of these reasons for preventing the creation of new third-party interests in land are essential to good management of public lands. It was, therefore, of great concern to this government that a court declared certain lands open for staking under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. This is why the Solicitor General, the former minister for northern affairs, stated in this House on February 13 of this year that it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation to take effect from that day, to make the lands withdrawn under the Territorial Lands Act not available for staking under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

The bill that we are debating today has been drafted to enact the promise made on behalf of the government. This bill proposes to amend both the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act. The changes proposed for the Yukon Placer Mining Act affect Sections 17 and 98.

Clause 1 of this Bill proposes amending paragraph 17(2)(E) to make the words consistent with Section 98. Clause 2 of this bill would amend subsection 98(1) by replacing the word "is" by "may be" in the first sentence. This will ensure that the Governor in Council may prohibit entry on several parcels of land where only one is actually needed. For example, various choices for the location of an airport. However, until studies are completed it is not possible to identify which of the several possible sites will be selected.

This change in the wording of subsection 98(1) gives government the flexibility needed to properly manage these lands. It will prevent confusion and protect the lands from third-party conflicts until final selections are made.

Subsection 98(1) is further amended by adding "the settlement of aboriginal land claims" as one of the purposes for which prohibition of entry may be ordered by the Governor in Council. In addition, the purpose has been changed from a "a public purpose" to "a purpose in the public interest" in order to ensure that a broad power is being granted. This could, for example, include a privately-run enterprise such as a forestry nursery or a fish hatchery which could be considered in the public interest.

Clause 2 of the bill also proposes to amend subsection 98(2) to make the language consistent with the changes proposed for subsection 98(1) of the bill. As I explained earlier, this provides for flexibility and proper land management.

Clause 3 of the bill proposes changes to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act by the addition of a new Section 14.1 which would have the equivalent effect in the Yukon Quartz Mining Act as Sections 17 and 98 do in the Yukon Placer Mining Act, as amended. Specifically, this would provide powers to withdraw lands from disposition by Orders in Council.

Clauses 4 and 5, are very important amendments. They permit the proper management of territorial lands by validating all current withdrawal orders under the Territorial Lands Act or the Yukon Placer Mining Act.

The concluding clause of the bill provides that Clauses 1 to 3 inclusive come into effect on February 13, 1990, as announced by my colleague, the Solicitor General. If this bill should meet with the approval of Parliament, the authority delegated to the Governor in Council, will be no greater than what earlier governments of Canada have, in good faith, believed they were exercising before.

It is important to remember this point, because prior to the Halferdahl decision, the Crown believed it had properly protected these lands. There is a need to set land aside while decisions for its use are being made. The government has been negotiating aboriginal land claims in the Yukon for several years. Government negotiators promised to set aside land, which had been identified by the Yukon First Nations for future land claim settlements. This was done in good faith by the government. However, the effectiveness of these actions was challenged with respect to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

Land claim negotiations have been going on in Yukon for many years. We are now in the final stages of a settlement and the government must ensure protection of selected lands so that negotiations would not suffer a major setback. The government is now asking Parliament to provide the proper authority so that the government's promise to the Council for Yukon Indians can be fulfilled.

The question of retroactivity of this bill was given careful consideration before the bill was prepared. The government decided that the then Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should announce this in the House, that a bill would be introduced to take effect from the date of this announcement. There is a question: if the Council for Yukon Indians were promised by negotiators for the Crown that certain lands will be withdrawn from disposition, with the intention of protecting them from further alienations, why not keep that promise? The answer is that we will keep the promise to the extent authorized by law. Federal lawyers have filed an appeal of the court decision. In addition, I am now asking Parliament to make a new law that will allow proper management of lands in Yukon, but which would also protect the existing rights of third parties under the law.

I would be remiss if I did not acknowledge the support that I have received from the Yukon mining industry, following Minister Cadieux's announcement. The representatives of the industry support the settlement of Yukon aboriginal land claims and have written to support making specific changes to the acts, so that the failure to proceed with this bill would not be a reason for failure to complete a land claim settlement in Yukon.

In closing, I urge members of the House to support the bill for good land management in the Yukon and to meet our commitments to the Yukon First Nations and provide better administration of Yukon land for all Yukoners.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on Bill C–68, an act to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and to make provisions for the application of certain orders. This is a rather long title for a rather simple bill.

This bill clarifies a situation in respect of lands that are withdrawn for the purpose of aboriginal land claims settlements in Yukon. It protects these lands from encroachment by other interests. According to the government's press release, the changes will firmly establish the Crown's right to prohibit disposition of mineral rights on Yukon lands which are required for a purpose that the government believes to be in the public interest.

Specifically included are those lands which have been withdrawn by Yukon Indians for the settlement of their land claims.

The government thought these lands were protected. A court challenge with respect to the Yukon Placer Mining Act, proved the government wrong.

It has been government practice for some time to withdraw from the public domain, lands which are claimed by aboriginal peoples while negotiations on the settlement of these claims are proceeding. The legal authority to do so is contained in various sections of certain pieces of legislation. For example, Section 23 of the Territorial Lands Act permits the Governor in Council to withdraw tracts of territorial lands from disposal, upon giving reason. Territorial lands are defined as lands in Yukon or Northwest Territories that are vested in the Crown or are lands over which the federal government has the power to dispose.

Section 98 of the Yukon Placer Mining Act permits the Governor in Council to prohibit entry on certain lands for the purpose of locating a claim or prospecting for gold or other precious minerals or stones, except on some terms as he or she may prescribe. The Yukon Quartz Mining Act contains no provisions to withdraw lands or prohibit mining on certain lands as specified in Section 98 of the Yukon Placer Mining Act. However, Section 14 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act provides for exceptions to the general rights to acquire mineral rights.

The government's position has been that a withdrawal under Section 23 of the Territorial Lands Act should be considered an exception under Section 14 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

The government's position with respect to the applicability of the Territorial Lands Act withdrawal orders to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act was challenged. A prospector staked 265 mineral claims in an area withdrawn for the settlement of the Kluane Tribal Council land claim. The mining recorder refused the mineral claims. The matter was brought to the federal court on July 12, 1988. On February 12 of this year, a judgment in favour of the individual was brought down. The decision was based on the fact that subsection 3(3) of the Territorial Lands Act states:

> —nothing in this Act shall be construed as limiting the operation of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, the Yukon Placer Mining Act, the Dominion Water Power Act, or the National Parks Act.

The judge decided, therefore, that any withdrawal orders made pursuant to the Territorial Lands Act could not have an effect on the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. In other words, claim staking under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act could not be curtailed by orders pursuant to the Territorial Lands Act.

The judge ordered the mining recorder to accept the claims. The day after the court decision, the then Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the hon. member for Vaudreuil, made a statement in the House of Commons. He announced that the government would be bringing forward legislation to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act. Also, he indicated that the forthcoming legislation would be retroactive to that day, February 13, 1990.

The government had to act fast to prevent any further mining claim registration disputes. On March 9, the new Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development introduced the promised legislation, Bill C-68. This bill amends two pieces of legislation: the Yukon Placer Mining Act, Sections 17 and 98, and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, Section 14.

The purpose of the amendments is to ensure that the lands withdrawn for the settlement of aboriginal claims are clearly within the definition of withdrawn lands.

The amendment to Section 17 of the Yukon Placer Mining Act changes a phrase "prospecting for minerals" to "prospecting for gold and other precious minerals or stones". This new wording clarifies the definition of placer deposits. The same wording is already utilized in Section 98 of this act. As such, this is basically a housekeeping or clarification amendment.

The amendment to Section 98 is more substantial. It specifically includes land which may be required for the settlement of aboriginal land claims in the definition of land upon which prospecting or locating a claim may be prohibited.

New subsections are added to Section 14 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. The new subsections ensure that there is not an unfettered right to acquire mineral claims. Subsection 14.1(2) lists the types of land upon which the Governor in Council may prohibit entry and lands required for the settlement of aboriginal land claims are included. The wording is essentially the same as that in section 98 of the Yukon Placer Mining Act.

In essence, this bill closes a loophole that the government did not know existed. It will protect aboriginal lands from encroachment while negotiations proceed towards a final settlement. It will also provide clarification and certainty for the mining industry.

For these reasons, we, in the Official Opposition, support the bill with some reservations. We recognize the need to deal with this legislation expeditiously since we are, in effect, retroactively approving prohibitions, back to February 13, made under the acts Bill C–68 is amending. We have consulted with interested parties on this legislation.

I do want to add our profound regret that the Kluane Tribal Council was the victim of this loophole and that there was not enough foresight on the part of the government to prevent this unfortunate situation.

In 1973, the Council for Yukon Indians presented the federal government with a document entitled, Together Today for our Children Tomorrow. This document expressed the aboriginal rights of the Yukon Indians to the territory of the Yukon.

Accepted for negotiations in 1973 by the federal government, settlement negotiations have been ongoing since. An umbrella final agreement was ratified on April 1, 1990. Individual agreements are being negotiated with the 14 Yukon Indian bands.

At the present time, 17.9 per cent of the total area of the Yukon is, for various reasons, withdrawn from the staking of mineral claims. The land claim settlement represents 8.6 per cent of that 17.9 per cent.

The information kit on this bill provided to us by the minister's office contains an information sheet on the Council for Yukon Indians Comprehensive Land Claim. I want to challenge an underlying premise of that background paper which outlines the government's claims negotiation policy.

The document states, and I quote: "Comprehensive claims negotiations are conducted with aboriginal groups that continue to use and occupy traditional lands and whose aboriginal title has not been dealt with by treaty or superseded by law." Aboriginal people have long contested the government's presumption that it could extinguish or wipe out aboriginal rights by passing legislation that effectively prevented the exercise of those aboriginal rights.

The recognition and affirmation in 1982 in the Canadian Constitution of existing aboriginal and treaty rights has lent some weight to our position. The Supreme Court of Canada has recently confirmed that the rights recognized in Section 35 of the Constitution do have significant and contemporary meaning.

I am not a lawyer, but even a layman can see that the Supreme Court decision in the Sparrow case a couple of weeks ago is a significant victory for aboriginal peoples. The Supreme Court judgment also contained some serious warnings for the federal government.

The Supreme Court stated that Section 35 demands a generous, liberal interpretation. It said that legislation that affects the exercise of aboriginal rights will only be valid if it meets the test for justifying that interference.

That calls into question, in my mind, every piece of legislation that could affect aboriginal rights, including the acts that we are amending today by this Bill C–68.

The government has a responsibility to act in a fiduciary capacity with respect to aboriginal peoples. There is a restraint on the exercise of federal power. Federal power must be reconciled with federal duty. These are the words of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Supreme Court went on to say that the best way to achieve the reconciliation of federal power with federal duty is to demand the justification of any government regulation that infringes upon or denies aboriginal rights.

According to the Supreme Court, the test for justification requires that a legislative objective must be attained in such a way as to uphold the honour of the Crown and be in keeping with the unique contemporary relationship between the Crown and the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

I want to quote the next couple of sentences directly from the Supreme Court judgment:

> The extent of legislative or regulatory impact on an existing aboriginal right may be scrutinized so as to ensure recognition and affirmation. Section 35(1) does not promise immunity from government regulation in contemporary society but it does hold the Crown to a substantive promise. The government is required to bear the burden of justifying any legislation that has some negative effect on any aboriginal right protected under Section 35(1).

This is a very forceful message from the Justices of the highest court of this land to each and every member of Parliament in the House. All of us have a responsibility to examine every piece of legislation that comes before this House to ensure that it does not infringe or deny an aboriginal right in a manner which cannot be justified.

Some of us carry out this type of examination as a matter of course, out of personal conviction or interest. But I suggest that this responsibility is incumbent on every member of this House, and most particularly on members of the government.

What is required first is an answer to the question of whether the legislation under consideration has the effect of interfering with an existing aboriginal right. If so, other questions must be asked. The Supreme Court has suggested what these other questions ought to be. Is the limitation unreasonable? Does the regulation impose undue hardships? Does the regulation deny to the holders of the right their preferred means of exercising that right?

If a case of interference with an aboriginal right is found, there must be a test of justification. The justification test involves two steps. First, is there a valid legislative objective? The second has to do with the honour of the Crown in dealings with aboriginal people. The special trust relationship and the responsibility of the government vis-à-vis aboriginal people must be the first consideration in determining whether the legislation or action in question can be justified.

The bill we are debating today will rectify an oversight, a negligence on the part of the government that has had the effect of clearly interfering with the rights of the aboriginal people represented by the Kluane Tribal Council.

We in the Official Opposition are supporting the corrective acts contained in Bill C-68 so that the rights of other Yukon Indian people are not interfered with.

But we caution the government that it must take its trust responsibility with respect to aboriginal peoples far more seriously than it has to date.

Whether it is the re-examination of past legislation, current proposals or future initiatives, or whether it is in the conduct of current land claims negotiations, the federal government has been served notice. The meaning of Section 35 of the Canadian Constitution is to affirm aboriginal rights. It is to be construed in a purposive way. The government is in breach of trust if it does not protect aboriginal rights from unjustified interference.

It is of no small significance that the Supreme Court found the justification of "public interest" to be so vague as to provide no meaningful guidance and so broad as to be unworkable as a test for the justification of a limitation on constitutional rights.

It may well be that much current and proposed activity or development in aboriginal lands which does not have the consent of the aboriginal peoples affected, and which infringes upon their aboriginal rights could be found unconstitutional.

I take this opportunity to urge the government to conduct itself according to the guidelines established by the Supreme Court. The recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights in our Constitution imposes an obligation on the government. As the Supreme Court has said, "recognition and affirmation requires sensitivity to and respect for the rights of aboriginal peoples on behalf of the government, courts and, indeed, all Canadians".

I want to draw to the attention of the government and this House a communication from the Council for Yukon Indians which I received in my office this morning. It has some recommendations for us which I support. It recommends:

> 1. Legislation be retroactive to September 30, 1987, when the first interim land protection agreement was initiated by the parties to the land claims negotiations for Yukon.
> 2. Lands that are identified for selection and interim protection are being alienated due to the lack of adequate protection by the Minister. There must be justification for such action and equitable remedies for each incident.
> 3. Legislation must take into full consideration the recent Supreme Court decision, R. vs. Sparrow, May 31, 1990. Specifically, the Minister's fiduciary responsibility.
> 4. Bill C-68 to be taken to the Committee for full review.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to address Bill C-68 at this very critical stage. I must say that recent results which have occurred in Yukon have perhaps in some respects made the processing of this bill less critical than it was a few months ago.

I want to begin by saying that the legislation capsulized in Bill C-68 amends the Yukon Placer Mining Act and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. It is to be retroactive to February 13, 1990.

We understand the reasons for this retroactivity. While we normally are concerned about retroactive legislation, perhaps I will take a moment or two to explain the necessity for it in this case.

Before I do, I simply want to say that the amendments we will be looking at regarding these two mining acts will ensure that withdrawn lands, including lands identified as being of interest to Yukon Indians, will not be open for the location of new mining claims. The changes will firmly establish the Crown's right to prohibit disposition of mineral rights on Yukon lands which are required for a purpose that the government believes to be in the public interest. As I say, just to emphasize, those will also be lands under claim by Yukon Indians.

Our first concern was with whether or not it is such comprehensive and broad sweeping legislation that it would be of concern to miners in Yukon. My leader, who represents Yukon has had extensive and intensive consultations with the mining community generally in Yukon and the placer miners specifically regarding this legislation.

I must say that their comfort factor has to do more with the certainty that they have in terms of filing claims in the knowledge that certain lands are excluded and certain other lands are not. That precision is appreciated by the placer miners and the mining community generally. If we have rules that everyone understands, then it is just a matter of getting on and following them.

In the original press release from the minister he stated that he proposes to bring forward these changes to ensure that the mining industry clearly knows which areas are open for staking and exploration and recommends that people intending to stake mining claims in the Yukon should first contact the mining recorders office to determine the status of the lands in which they are interested.

Again, I think it is fair to say that that particular initiative lends a certain exactness to the process and is appreciated by the miners generally.

I also want to say that consultations with the Yukon territorial government indicates that it also supports this bill for the reasons that I have just stated, as well as others. The Council of Yukon Indians, while generally in support of this legislation, have some concerns. We are aware that it has recommended at least three specific amendments to the legislation that ought to be considered. We will be pursuing those in committee.

Perhaps I should say at this point that while there has been some question as to whether or not we should move expeditiously with this legislation and move through all stages, perhaps even in one day, the feeling is that that ought not occur for two reasons. The first has to do with the information that has now been made public regarding the concerns that the Yukon Indians have regarding the legislation. Obviously, they have to be considered in detail.

Also, our concern that this legislation ought to go to a legislative committee for some examination flows out of a concern that my hon. friend from Skeena has.

In June, 1984 we passed expeditiously a number of amendments to the same legislation, based on the comments of the bureaucracy, which assured us that there were no real problems, that all aspects had been considered and that it was all very straightforward.

Lo and behold, all of us will recall the nightmare experienced by John Turner. I do not mean the Leader of the Liberal Party, but another John Turner who was victimized by an earlier piece of legislation which made revisions to a mining act and with respect to which, again, the member for Skeena had received government assurances at the time of the vote that there would be no outstanding claims.

To simply set aside that possibility from occurring again, we are asking that this matter go to a legislative committee, not for an extensive set of hearings, but at least to provide an opportunity for those people who want to make representations. I assume that representatives of the Yukon Indians would certainly want to play a role in that process.

These amendments to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act are by and large the result of a court case. Members thought that under Section 23 of the Territorial Lands Act the withdrawal of public lands for public purposes, including land claims, would be clearly understood. In order to designate certain parcels of land in the Yukon for specific public purposes, including the settlement of aboriginal land claims, and to remove the possibility of new third party interests being created in such lands, lands have been withdrawn from disposition under Section 23 of the Territorial Lands Act. In so far as mining is concerned, prohibition orders under Section 98 of the Yukon Placer Mining Act have also been promulgated.

Although the Yukon Quartz Mining Act contains no provision to withdraw lands or to prohibit mining on certain lands, as in the case of the Yukon Placer Mining Act, it has always been the government's position that a withdrawal made under section 23 of the Territorial Lands Act is considered a reservation within the meaning of section 14 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. Section 14 provides for exceptions to the general right to acquire mineral rights under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. That seems to be fairly straightforward. I think everyone following that would understand clearly the process that we have been going under in terms of the basic assumption.

However, the government's position with respect to the applicability of the Territorial Lands Act withdrawal orders to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act was challenged in the courts by Mr. L. B. Halferdahl when he staked 265 mineral claims in an area withdrawn for the settlement of the Kluane Tribal Council claim. We are all familiar with that particular process. Mr. Halferdahl's mineral claims were refused by the Mining Recorder. That was pretty straightforward. We appreciate that those claims would be refused, with the Mining Recorder perhaps not quite clear in terms of which of these acts took precedence.

However, the matter was brought to the Federal Court and on July 12, 1988, a judgment was handed down in favour of Mr. Halferdahl. In his judgment, the Justice based his decision mainly on the fact that because subsection 3(3) of the Territorial Lands Act states that: "Nothing in this Act shall be construed as limiting the operation of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act," any withdrawal orders made pursuant to the Territorial Lands Act could not have an effect on the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

In other words, claim staking under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act cannot be curtailed by orders pursuant to the Territorial Lands Act. Mr. Justice Collier had ordered the Mining Recorder to accept Mr. Halferdahl's claims.

That really caught everyone by surprise. I remember the day the order came down. I think there were a lot of comments around the House of Commons that this surprised everyone and something obviously had to be done.

In order to protect all these various withdrawn areas in Yukon, which I think account for almost 70 per cent of the entire Yukon land mass, from further staking, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Hon. Pierre Cadieux, announced in the House on February 13, 1990, his intention to bring forward legislation to rectify the problem. This legislation, if eventually passed, would be retroactive to the date of this public announcement.

We have heard that the Council of Yukon Indians has concerns that the retroactivity ought in fact to go even further to protect its interests in terms of very specific claims. Because I know those listening are interested in the situation in Yukon, I want to make it very clear that this proposed legislation that we are debating today at second reading stage would affect only Sections 17 and 98 of the Yukon Placer Mining Act and Section 14 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. It is also proposed that the Yukon Placer Mining Act be strengthened to ensure that lands required for the settlement of aboriginal land claims may be considered as lands required for public purpose.

As well, it is proposed that the equivalent of Section 14 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act be expanded—and I want to emphasize that point—by adding equivalent prohibition provisions to those contained in the amended Section 98 of the Yukon Placer Mining Act. Both of these mining acts are proposed to be further amended in order to validate as at February 13, 1990, all existing withdrawals under the Territorial Lands Act and prohibitions under Section 98 of the Yukon Placer Mining Act, and any orders passed between February 13, 1990, and of course when these amendments take effect.

It is most important that this retroactivity take place, otherwise the existing Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the existing Yukon Placer Mining Act would take precedence over these lands which, for various reasons, ought to be removed in the best interest of the public. In most cases in Yukon we are dealing with Indian land claims.

Having said that, I want to get into some of the details of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act as they presently stand and some of the changes that we would be recommending. In the consideration of time, however, I will simply say that we will raise these in committee. I think that that precision and exactness would have a more appropriate place in committee discussion as opposed to the discussion of the principle of the bill that we are doing now at second reading.

Let me conclude by simply saying that we support the major thrust of this legislation. The legislation is timely. While the settlement in Yukon does not necessitate quite the consideration that we would normally have given this legislation, we feel that it is appropriate now to send it off to the appropriate legislative committee, bring forward the appropriate witnesses and move expeditiously to pass it through all stages and get it off to the Senate for ratification there before it is finalized. This will set the record straight in law on just what the opportunities are for the miners of Yukon and to ensure that the rights and interests of the general public are adequately protected.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, I do not want to take more than a couple of minutes. I just want to make a comment on this particular bill.

Basically, it is a bill on land use. I know that land use across the provinces is considered to be a provincial responsibility, but that land use as far as the Northwest Territories and Yukon, to a certain extent, is concerned is still a federal responsibility. This points directly to the dangers of not having in place the kind of regulation and thus the lack of control that allows development of land to be made at the behest of the person who thinks they can make a few bucks on it rather than the common good of the people.

In many cases, particularly in Yukon since the finding of gold, the development and the mining of gold was considered to be much more important than anything else in the development of Yukon.

We have the same kind of situation right now in the rain forests of Brazil where large areas of the rain forests are being devastated so that some placer mining can be done. That is the type of thing that happens if you do not have in place the regulations and controls necessary to allow development of land for the good of all people.

I know this particular legislation is before us basically because of the concerns about the land claims of the aboriginal peoples of Yukon. That in itself is a major story, I suppose, and something that needs careful understanding in terms of aboriginal rights and their definition.

It does also deal specifically with the use of land. My point in getting up even for these few minutes is to put before the House and the people of Canada the fact that we in Canada must look much more closely at regulation. We must not think that deregulation of all industries in terms of all use of land is acceptable. We must recognize that we should have in place the kind of legislation which allows us to make sure that development occurs in such a way so that the rights and the best interests of all Canadians are recognized.

I say this particularly now because we are recognizing that over the last 50 years in Canada we have not put in place regulations which have protected the environment, the land and our standard of living, the standard of living that we think we should be able to have in Canada. We have not put the regulations in place and now find ourselves suffering and having to make changes which are much more costly than they would have been if we had put them in place in the first instance.

This piece of legislation, as I understand, will go to a legislative committee now. I hope that some of the concerns of the people of Yukon will be recognized and dealt with in committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On questions or comments, the hon. member for Labrador.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, I know time is short but I want to make a few comments on this bill to say that the bill certainly goes in the right direction, but that it does not go far enough.

I want to support the recommendations of the Council of Yukon Indians. I want to draw particular attention to the third recommendation of the Council of Yukon Indians, that is, legislation must take into full consideration the recent Supreme Court decision of Sparrow in British Columbia.

That court decision, it seems to me, will have ramifications all across the country, as has been pointed out by the First Nations. I just want to point out to the government the situation that is occurring in my own riding now, not with regard to placer mining but with regard to fishing which I think bears on this point.

The government has restricted food fishing for trout in the Lake Melville area to three weeks, whereas normally people in that area, most of whom are members of the Labrador Métis Association, would be able to fish for food throughout the season, as I think is their historic right.

Second, a recent government regulation has restricted the salmon quota on the coast of Labrador and has reduced that quota by 43 per cent. This is at a time, I might say, when there was a crisis in the cod fishery and at a time when there was an ice blockade on that coast. It seems to me that that court decision has implications for this situation as well.

I draw to the attention of the government that while it is moving in the right direction it must, as the Council of Yukon Indians point out, take into consideration in all future legislation and in regulations the decision of the Supreme Court with regard to Sparrow.

Aboriginal people do have rights in this country, not simply to the protection of their lands during and after the land claims process, but in respect to their food fishery as well.

It seems to me the government should revise those regulations that it has brought in this year. It should be cognizant of the Sparrow decision in all future legislation and regulations that it brings in with regard to native people in this country.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

CANADIAN POLAR COMMISSION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C–72, an act to establish the Canadian Polar Commission and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I realize I have just a couple of minutes before we move on to other orders of the House. I am looking forward after Question Period to providing the House with the government's position on Bill C–72.

I must say that I just returned last night from Iqaluit where I spent the last couple of days. For the first time as a Canadian I had the opportunity to appreciate truly the north. I feel that many Canadians are missing a very important part of their heritage by not taking the opportunity to visit the northern parts of our country.

My hon. colleague across the floor was there with us yesterday as we met and listened to Innu people and northerners speak about their concerns about the Arctic, about the beautiful opportunities that we have there, as well as about the problems that are there as far as the environment is concerned and the possible pollution that is approaching the Arctic.

Certainly, there have been steps taken by this government to work on the Finnish initiative and other initiatives to protect the environment of the north.

As we enter into debate on Bill C–72, which is a bill to establish the Canadian Polar Commission, we see that this is a step which we feel will further enhance the opportunities of the people in the north, and also put us in a position to act more positively internationally on the scene. The Arctic is a very important part of our country, but it is also affected by the actions of other countries in the northern hemisphere.

The eight countries that are working together on northern opportunities for the Arctic are very, very important in the future not only of Canada but those countries as well. As we enter into debate following Question Period, I look forward to imparting to the House the information about Bill C-72 and the establishment of a Canadian Polar Commission.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Madam Speaker, in spite of my respect for the Supreme Court of Canada and its enlightened jurisprudence, I must express disappointment in its decision on C195.1 of the Criminal Code (street soliciting).

For my part the dissenting judgments of Madam Justices Wilson and L'Heureux-Dubé reflect more fully the value we place on free speech and the availability of other solutions to the important goal of freeing neighbourhoods from the plague of public commercial sex. I recommend, for example, the study by Paul Fraser of Vancouver.

The House committee which is studying the impact of this law, 195.1, has had a lot of evidence that the law has not worked nearly well enough to justify its existence.

The courts impose ineffective light sentences because they feel accurately, I believe, that the vast majority of prostitutes whom they sentence are more victims than criminals. We need to relieve neighbourhoods of the blight of street soliciting, but we need a better solution.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, Tory neglect in the riding of Laurier—Sainte-Marie goes beyond lack of representation in this House. At a time when unemployment in the riding is over 20 per cent, this government is trying to increase unemployment even further with its high interest rate policy and its failure to do anything for East Montreal.

Half the families in Laurier—Sainte-Marie are single-parent families, and eight out of ten of these single parents are women. These people have suffered under this government. They have suffered as a result of cutbacks in co-operative housing and funding for women centres, and they have suffered due to a lack of manpower adjustment programs.

It will be a long and hot summer for the Conservatives in Laurier—Sainte-Marie, Madam Speaker. Voters in the riding are going to judge this government, and once again, the Tories will have every reason to fear their candidate will lose his deposit.

On the Liberal side, when Jean Chrétien, the next leader of the Liberal Party, winds up his leadership campaign, he may well see a second member for the New Democratic Party in Quebec, Ms. Louise O'Neil, elected on August 13.

HOUSING

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, as the population in Canada ages it becomes increasingly important that the federal government take action and an active role in providing adequate and affordable housing for our senior citizens.

That is why I am pleased to be representing the Minister of State for Housing in my riding at the June 16 opening of the new Masonic seniors complex in Woodstock.

The federal government will be making a contribution of approximately $50,000 annually over a period of 35 years. This direct contribution is in addition to the insured loan of $600,000 provided by CMHC required to construct this complex.

This initiative is another strong indication of our government's commitment to assist the elderly in our society in maintaining a decent standard of living. I commend the Minister of State for Housing for his support in making this project a reality.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, with only a few days to go until June 23, 1990, by which date the Meech Lake Accord should be ratified—a date that is also an important occasion for the future of my political party—I would like to congratulate all those who said a forthright yes to Quebec and to its expected return to the constitutional table.

The support of all three parties in this House and the unconditional support of seven Premiers in English Canada, including Peterson, Vander Zalm and Getty who represent the provinces with the largest population, is very significant, and I find this very heartening.

A nation cannot evolve unless its leaders are determined to see it evolve, and I hope that in future constitutional discussions we will be able to apply the principles of honesty, integrity and openness on behalf of the unity of our country.

LITERACY VOLUNTEER AWARDS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, at the opening of the Canadian Library Association's annual convention yesterday, I had the opportunity of announcing on behalf of the Government of Canada the establishment of Canada's Literacy Volunteer Awards.

The awards program will work in partnership with the Canadian Library Association, the Canadian Association of Public Libraries, the Canadian Library Trustees Association, the Association for the Advancement of Science and Technique of Documentation, the National Literacy Secretariat, and the members of Parliament.

Canada's Literacy Volunteer Awards will recognize individuals and organizations in our community who have made an outstanding contribution to the promotion of literacy. We encourage more Canadians to become involved in the fight against illiteracy.

On behalf of the Secretary of State I want to thank the organizations which have worked with us on the creation of the program for their co-operation and for their commitment in promoting literacy in Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, when the economy was improving in 1984, this Conservative government had all the answers and took credit. Now that the economy is in decline, this same government washes its hands and blames others.

Yesterday the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs reported a 34 per cent increase in bankruptcies since last year, with a 21 per cent increase in corporate bankruptcies.

Last Friday Statistics Canada reported that unemployment rose from 7.2 per cent to 7.6 per cent in the month of May, with over one million Canadians out of work and a loss of 165,000 manufacturing jobs over the past year.

When will the government wake up and readjust its economic policy? High interest rates are not the answer at this time, and the government should take moderating action.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Veterans Affairs had good news for British Columbia's veterans last Friday. The Minister of Veterans Affairs and British Columbia Health Minister John Jansen signed an agreement to provide 200 long-term health care beds for veterans.

This agreement, worth up to $35 million over the next five years, provides for the capital cost of priority beds for veterans in centres as needed throughout the province. The distribution of these beds is to be decided upon in co-operation with the province. This will ensure that veterans who are no longer able to carry on in their own homes will at least be able to continue living closer to their communities.

Through this agreement the federal government is responsible for two-thirds of the capital cost of the new beds, and Veterans Affairs Canada will pay a daily co-payment fee to the province for each veteran occupied bed.

If I may, I quote from Mr. Jansen: "This agreement represents a major improvement in the level of service to veterans—and demonstrates the strong co-operation between the provincial and federal governments on matters concerning veterans."

HEALTH CARE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, the time has come for this government to live up to its mandate and show leadership in the health care delivery system in Canada.

When a country is faced with hospital crisis from coast to coast to coast; when deaths of cardiac patients are being reported in major centres because of shortages of acute care beds, nurses, or technicians; and when children with life-threatening illnesses are being turned away from children's hospitals because of acute bed closures, the Tory government must rethink its fiscal responsibilities and priorities.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare must ask himself: "Is this the time to be putting a lid on federal health care support?" He must then, on behalf of all Canadians, those Canadians who trust and rely on him, convince the Minister of Finance that federal belt-tightening is weakening Ottawa's presence in health care and threatens the universal system set out in the Canada Health Act.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, June 10, 1990 marked the beginning of the third National Access Awareness Week in Canada.

This week we celebrated the achievements of persons with disabilities and worked toward the elimination of remaining barriers to their full economic and social integration.

Governments at all levels have programs and services which benefit persons with disabilities. Many of these are related to areas that were highlighted during Access Awareness Week: transportation, housing, employment, recreation, and education. As a result we may tend to think of these in terms of specific government initiatives. However, during the past week it helped to give attention to other aspects of the disabled's integration into our communities.

I hope National Access Awareness Week provided all of us with the occasion to become informed about the events which are ongoing in our communities. By sharing in these activities we will not only gain in awareness but also find new ways of helping to meet the challenges faced by disabled Canadians.

CANADA DAY

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, in a couple of weeks, on July 1, we will celebrate our country's one hundred and twenty-third birthday.

For such a young nation, we have a lot of which to be proud. We are very lucky to be Canadians. Our country is one of the best places in the world in which to work and to live. Other countries look to Canada as a leader in world co-operation and development. Those of us who have travelled outside the country can appreciate how very fortunate we are.

[Translation]

Now is the time to get together to celebrate everything we share as a people. Our natural resources, our fundamental rights, our diverse cultures and our tolerance are what makes Canada a country that is appreciated throughout the world.

[English]

For the last 123 years Canadians have worked together to make our country what it is now. I am confident that this same spirit will carry us into the next decade and indeed into the next century. This is the land of compassion. This is a land of opportunities.

On behalf of the people of Ottawa Centre, Happy Canada Day.

HOUSING

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, during National Access Awareness Week I would like to draw the attention of the House to the efforts CMHC has been making to provide greater accessibility in the area of housing.

Under the social and co-operative housing programs, the common areas of each project must be accessible in order to obtain mortgage insurance from CMHC and to qualify for federal subsidies.

The sponsors are required to provide a minimum of 5 per cent of their dwellings as mobility units, ones which can be readily outfitted to meet the specific needs of people with disabilities. Further, the sponsors can obtain full financing and subsidies on the cost of adapting these dwellings to the needs of specific clients.

As well, CMHC has assisted over 9,000 households to adapt their homes to meet the needs of family members with disabilities, through the Residential Rehabilitation Program. We can be proud of the proactive position of CMHC, which brings reality to the slogan for National Access Awareness Week: "Independence, That's Living!"

PASSENGER RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, the federal government has been repeating incessantly that Canadians have given up on passenger rail and that it is the way of the past.

We have known all along that that is not the case. Industrialized countries, our competitors around the world, are moving to modern rail.

The latest to choose rail in Canada is one of our most important centres for innovation, creativity and culture. I am speaking of course of MuchMusic. This June, MuchMusic's veejays have been riding the rails, across the country, with the latest in videos, promoting the first ever Canadian Music Video Awards.

On behalf of VIA supporters everywhere, I applaud MuchMusic on choosing an efficient, environmentally friendly mode of transportation.

If I can make my own RSVP request, it is for this government to listen to the people and restore the passenger service it cut so foolishly in January.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, this week national, provincial and local organizations, in co-operation with the Department of the Secretary of State, are marking National Access Awareness Week.

It gives all Canadians an opportunity to work together to answer the following question: What can we do to ensure the integration of all people with handicaps into community life?

As one of my constituents wrote this week:

> I just want to comment that to someone who has difficulty climbing stairs, there is no such thing as two short flights of stairs—if there are two sets of stairs, that is automatically too many for comfort. The alternative?

They were told by people to stay in their cars on a ferry, yet there is a sign on the ferry which says that people cannot stay in their cars. They are faced with a double question. Being handicapped, does one leave the ferry? Does one stay in the car? What does one do?

In this week of national awareness things like that should not be happening to handicapped Canadians. I hope that after this week people will have achieved some greater awareness of the difficulties.

THE SENATE

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I would like to commend the Prime Minister for accepting the nomination of Stan Waters from Albertans and appointing him to the Senate. I offer my congratulations to Mr. Waters.

The process of reforming the Senate is under way.

Don Getty has shown courageous leadership in holding the Senate election and in moving Senate reform to the top of the national agenda.

Alberta's Liberal senators should take note of the prevailing democratic winds. Stan Waters' first duty is to encourage other senators to not stand in the way of democratic reform of the Senate. Albertans would like to see the election of at least seven new senators from Alberta five years from now in a newly reconstituted Senate.

Some people and parties talk a lot about Senate reform. Our government is actually doing something about it.

Congratulations to the Prime Minister, Premier Don Getty and other First Ministers for their tremendous accomplishments.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In recent days, the aboriginal peoples of Canada have expressed deep concern and, in fact, a deep sense of grievance, about the outcome last weekend of the First Ministers' Conference.

I understand that the Minister of Justice and other ministers met the leaders of aboriginal peoples in Ottawa yesterday. I would like the Deputy Prime Minister to tell us what was the outcome of the meeting. Has a result satisfactory to these native leaders been achieved? If not, what does the Government of Canada intend to do to respond further to the deep concerns and the deep sense of grievance of aboriginal peoples of this country as a result of the outcome of last week's constitutional conference?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first, I am sure the hon. Leader of the Opposition would acknowledge that the Meech Lake Accord and the document that was signed last week contain some very important provisions with respect to the aboriginal people.

Therefore, it is certainly in everyone's best interests to see that the Meech Lake Accord and the documents that have been signed by the First Ministers would be ratified as quickly as possible.

With respect to the meeting that took place yesterday, not only Senator Murray but the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development attended the meeting of Indian leaders. It was a very friendly and amicable meeting. The Indian leaders laid out their positions very clearly. The ministers listened and took cognizance of their concerns. They have undertaken to deal with each of them in a very specific way.

I can advise my hon. friend that discussions with respect to the points that were raised yesterday are ongoing at the present time.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Premier of Newfoundland has invited all provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada to address the Newfoundland House of Assembly on the 1987 constitutional amendment.

I therefore ask the following question: Will the Prime Minister himself go to Newfoundland to speak there and if so, when will he go?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister and the Premier of Newfoundland have been in contact almost on a daily basis discussing this very important issue.

As the Prime Minister indicated in response to a question earlier this week, if there was a feeling that his presence would be helpful in the ratification of the Meech Lake Accord, clearly he would be prepared to visit Newfoundland. I think that is still a matter for consideration.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a further question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Legislators in Manitoba have said that they believe that the Constitutional Amendment of 1987 will not be ratified by their legislature by June 23. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister if the government is of the view that there is a means of extending the deadline, should that prove necessary, just exactly what does the federal government intend to do and what is its response to this particular situation in the province of Manitoba?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, in Article 1 of the document that was signed last week, there is a clear undertaking on the part of the Premiers of New Brunswick, Manitoba and Newfoundland, to use every possible effort to achieve a decision prior to June 23, 1990.

We still believe that that target can be achieved and we also believe that every effort is being undertaken by the respective legislatures to achieve that target. The fact that there is a procedural wrangle is something that we anticipate the respective legislatures, in this particular case the legislature of Manitoba, will deal with. The federal government is offering its assistance in every way, shape and form, as well as with the aboriginal people as a result of the meetings yesterday and ongoing discussions to see whether we can be helpful in breaking the logjam.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister.

It now appears that the Meech Lake Accord will not meet the deadline in Manitoba. The Manitoba legislature adjourned a few minutes ago until Monday and it is becoming more pessimistic in that Assembly every minute.

Let no one put the blame on Elijah Harper or on the aboriginal people of this country. The blame rests squarely on the shoulders of one man. The man, who, in his own words, chose to roll the dice and he chose the date when to roll the dice. By delaying the First Ministers' Conference, he has gambled with the future of our country. That is what he has done.

I put this question to the Deputy Prime Minister: Will he go immediately to his leader, the Prime Minister of our country, and suggest in the strongest terms, that the current constitutional crisis is now his, and his alone, and his responsibility.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, let me assure the right hon. member that we are not putting the blame on anyone and certainly not putting the blame on Elijah Harper, just to make that very clear.

There are procedural rules and privileges that any member can exercise in the democratic process. I find it very strange that at this late hour, particularly as the right hon. member suggests that there is a crisis, that he would engage in the kind of political rhetoric that he has just engaged in. I will simply refrain from commenting on the latter part of his question.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, the Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador and the Premier of Manitoba both warned the Prime Minister on several occasions during the past few months, that legislative time was running out. So did the hon. Leader of the Opposition. Yet, the Prime Minister refused to heed those warnings of his two colleagues. He allowed time to run and he allowed pressure to build.

I want to ask the Prime Minister again, if he will impress upon his leader that the consequences are grave and that the responsibility for solving what has now become a very grave issue, lies with the Prime Minister of Canada who put us in this mess.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I do not want to be argumentative but I think the right hon. member would recall that the first effort in breaking the logjam came from the legislature of New Brunswick, wherein they brought forth the idea of a parallel resolution which was followed by immediate action on the part of the federal government in setting up the Charest committee.

That is a fact. That process did take place and quite frankly, notwithstanding what the right hon. member suggests, there was an undertaking by all First Ministers to use every possible effort to pass the Meech Lake Accord prior to June 23. We believe that that undertaking is serious and we believe that they will use every possible effort to see that is achieved.

MONTREAL PORT CORPORATION

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The Montreal Port Corporation, a federal crown corporation and its general manager, Dominic Taddeo, seem to be on a virtual shopping spree with Canadian taxpayers' dollars.

I have a copy of an invoice for $1,725 billed to Mr. Taddeo at the Port of Montreal for Montreal Canadiens season hockey tickets, an invoice also showing the Port of Montreal entertained ten people at a gala at a staggering $500 apiece. The Port of Montreal was also billed for $4,428 for Expos season tickets.

Can the minister confirm that the Port of Montreal actually paid these bills and, if so, does he think this is a good use of taxpayers' money?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will take my hon. friend's concerns under advisement. I must admit that I try to brief myself for Question Period, but no minister's briefing includes going through all the invoices of every crown corporation or every local port authority. We just cannot do that. We try to come here and answer questions. There is another forum for my hon. friend's questions. Obviously, if she wants those answers, she could put the question on the Order Paper.

In the alternative, I come here to try to answer the questions I can answer, and I will certainly look into my hon. friend's concerns.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, the Montreal Port Corporation has been purchasing land as well near Contrecoeur using federal Tory fundraiser Maurice Mayer as its agent. Mr. Mayer, it seems, was in line to make a very good commission. I have one invoice of August last year showing he had billed $186,637 for his services.

Can the minister tell us how much money in total Mr. Mayer made on this transaction and why was not the port itself or Public Works handling this transaction, as they are able to do?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, obviously within the ordinary course of business the Port of Montreal purchases land. That comes as no surprise to any member of this House nor any member of the public.

What I really want to ask my friend is whether she has evidence of any impropriety in any of the transactions that she talks about, or is this just another allegation floated out there in an effort to smear innocent people?

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, the minister knows full well that it is the duty of this House to ensure that taxpayers' dollars are accounted for and spent well on behalf of the taxpayers.

[Translation]

Since there are many ethical questions about the land purchases in Contrecoeur and the excessive spending of members of the board of the Port of Montreal, will the minister order an inquiry?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, since we have a question on the floor of the House, since I have suggested that I will look into my hon. friend's concerns, obviously I will look into them. We do not go running off calling for inquiries until we make some investigations and ask ourselves if there is an answer to my hon. friend's allegation. If you want a smear campaign, I will not give it to you that easy.

TRADE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to raise a question with the Deputy Prime Minister concerning the trade figures in a release by Statistics Canada today.

The Deputy Prime Minister would recognize that once again we have experienced a substantial decline of over $1 billion in our trade figures. Perhaps more dramatically, we have a $750 million decline in our trade with the United States. I would remind him that in 1984 we had a $20 billion surplus in trade with the United States.

How can the government continue to support the continuing high interest policy, high dollar policy, and a trade agreement which is leading to the erosion and destruction of the industrial and trade capacity of this country?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend knows that we continue to have a surplus. The reason for the declining surplus is due to the imports, primarily of machinery and of high tech goods, in order to get our economy ready to be extremely competitive under the free trade environment.

We have had record imports of new machinery and new capital goods—which is an indication of tremendous confidence in the Canadian economy—in the manufacturing and service sectors to make us very competitive in the decade ahead.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the reason we have a trade decline is because the government's economic policy is creating that problem.

Since the minister is now answering questions on the trade issue, how does he explain the fact that in the automotive trade industry, the most important industrial sector in the country, we now have a deficit of $131 million? It is the first time in years that we have experienced a major decline in the automotive trade sector.

Combined with the loss of 165,000 jobs in manufacturing in the year since we signed the free trade agreement, does he not understand and agree that what we are experiencing is the de-industrialization of Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, we have heard this de-industrialization theory for the last five or six years in Parliament.

The truth is that in the automotive sector almost one-quarter of all the automobiles being produced on this continent are being produced in Canada. We have put in place a context of competitiveness for the auto sector far above that of the United States. Cycles change, they go up and down, but over all we are in a much better position than the United States when it comes to our proportion of automobile production in North America.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. In the first five months of this year, 4,424 Canadian businesses and 15,050 individual Canadians were driven into bankruptcy by the government's high interest rate policy.

How many more Canadians must lose their homes, their farms, their businesses, and their jobs before the government comes to its senses?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we share the concern of the hon. member about these bankruptcies. I would like to remind the hon. member that they are considerably fewer than they were under the Liberal government.

He should also know, and I think he does know, that we are at the end of a record cycle of very vigorous economic growth. The economy has been working over capacity for some time and there are some pressures and disruptions that we need to correct.

He talks about the symptoms, interest rates, but the problem is inflation. As long as the inflationary pressure is there, we will have to continue to maintain our monetary policy.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, let us look at the result of the government's monetary policy. Bankruptcies are up. Job-creation is down. Foreign control is up. Research and development is down. Our April trade surplus plunged 88 per cent. Canada lost 172,000 manufacturing jobs since January of last year.

Will the minister act now to stop this economic free-fall or, like Candide, does he still believe that this is the best of all possible worlds?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, from May, 1989 to May, 1990 there have been 124,000 jobs created in the country. This is not an economic free-fall.

My hon. friend quotes the bankruptcy statistics. It is important that we understand and have sympathy for those in a position of bankruptcy. The number is 4,400. Put that against the job creation in the last year in the small business sector. We have had over 200,000 small businesses start in the last year alone, unincorporated, and 138,000 incorporated. That is just a little over 1 per cent of all the new start-ups in small business in Canada.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the minister has suggested that somehow all these jobs have been created. In fact, unemployment rates are up as well as personal bankruptcies. At the same time, the inflation rate has fallen to the lowest point it has been at since 1987. In short, the justification for high interest rates is disappearing and the damage to people from those high interest rates is growing dramatically.

Does the government recognize that to protect Canadians, it must now finally, reduce interest rates in the country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the fact that the CPI has declined is indeed good news. However, we have to look at the reasons why it has. We see that two factors, basically, have caused this to occur. For example, the increase in taxes from the federal and provincial governments in the spring have been more or less swallowed. There is also the fact that companies' profits are the lowest they have been in the last seven years, a situation that cannot continue.

We have a very artificial situation here. Meanwhile, the ongoing pressures are there, especially for the unit labour costs. The pressures are very real and in no way can we relax our effort to deal with this because this is the real threat to the Canadian working people.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, it is typical of the government to blame workers for its mistakes.

The fact is that average weekly earnings have declined by 2.9 per cent since 1984 when the Conservatives came into power. The fact is, too, that at this stage in the cycle, as the minister puts it, output is slowing down and therefore naturally unit labour costs increase. It means nothing in terms of indicators. It is just a statistical output.

Will the minister recognize that it is his own high interest rate policy which is slowing down output and, therefore, creating the rates of higher unit labour cost that he says he is fighting? In short, will he get out of the vicious circle he is in by cutting interest rates right across the country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I wish it was that easy. Our policy has been approved and supported by all organized groups, the OECD and others.

With regard to unit labour costs, we are not blaming labour, we are just looking at the facts. To develop themselves, our business and industry have to be competitive. Our competitiveness has continually decreased over the last few months. This is what needs to be tackled, otherwise we will never be able to compete and more jobs will be lost. This is certainly something we do not want to occur.

BRITISH COLUMBIA FLOODING—EMERGENCY RELIEF

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of National Defence. The severe rain storms in British Columbia, and in particular in my constituency of Okanagan Centre, have caused severe property damage and a tragic loss of life.

Can the minister responsible reassure the people of British Columbia that the federal government will provide assistance under the disaster financial assistance arrangements to the Province of British Columbia?

• (1140)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would like to confirm with the hon. member that the federal government will indeed provide financial assistance under the guidelines of the Disaster Financial Assistance Arrangements and a federal Emergency Preparedness Canada official will be appointed immediately to work with British Columbia officials to co-ordinate this federal response.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Siu family of Toronto is under deportation order because they have retained legal status in China.

They and their child will be persecuted in China because they were refused permission by the government to reproduce.

Will this government abandon its policy of deporting Chinese nationals who are seeking to have, and to protect the lives of, their children?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax, being an experienced lawyer as she is, would know that the process involved means that the decisions are taken by immigration adjudicators and then the Immigration Refugee Board, both independent bodies.

As far as the deportation to China is concerned, the hon. member should know that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has suspended all deportations and the suspension remains in effect as of now.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, that sounds very comforting, but it is not very comforting to the Siu family when they are being told that once their child is born they will have to return. We know that children in China who are unregistered are being refused food and medicine. A little compassion goes a long way, maybe as far as experience.

My supplementary question is for the same minister.

Why does the government refuse the Siu family the basic right to give birth to their child in safety? Why does the government insist on putting the future of this child and its parents in danger?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, with her experience as a lawyer, the hon. member, as I said earlier, should know that all cases where the Immigration and Refugee Board orders someone deported, for example.

CONSUMERS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and concerns the appointment of Nicolas Murray, chairman of the board of the Consumers Association of Canada, to the position of president of the government's GST information office.

Why has the minister undermined the credibility of the consumer protection agency by offering a patronage position to Mr. Murray behind the back, and I repeat behind the back, of the executive of the Consumers Association of Canada?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, of course I do not accept the premise of the hon. member's question, but I want to inform him and the House that last evening there was a full board meeting of the Consumers' Association of Canada. At that meeting, Mr. Murray, in the interest of consumers across Canada, offered his resignation which the Consumers' Association accepted with regret. A Consumers' Association press release of this morning reads, in part:

> This move allows Mr. Murray to assume his new position as chairman of the new consumer information office unencumbered. CAC is pleased with the—appointment of Mr. Murray, an outstanding consumer information communicator. CAC feels it is important to have Mr. Murray's agency report directly to the public through Parliament.

Which of course he will.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, this very instant I have received the same communiqué. There is one sentence which the minister left out, that is:

> The CAC board has accepted the offer of Mr. Nickolas Murray to resign from his position as president of CAC.

My question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the present non-informed or non-informative minister. The roughest guesstimate one can extract from the minister's non-informed declarations is that of the $19 million budget provided to the GST Public Relations Information Office, staffing and office space would amount to about $3 million.

How much of the remaining $16 million will be spent on the government's GST propaganda?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about uninformed or misinformed. I think there is no one who has spoken on this matter in this House who is more misinformed than the hon. member who just asked the question.

The fact of the matter is that Mr. Murray, a consumer advocate for many years, is a very good choice on the part of the government. In the interest of consumers he took it upon himself to offer his resignation last evening.

I talked to him this morning and he said this to me: "The most important thing in my mind is to serve the consumer to the best of my ability as head of the Consumer Information Office and I will be able to do just that".

There is no propaganda. There is no misinformation. What this is, is to support—

Mr. Bellemare: You should work for Barnum and Bailey.

Mr. Jelinek: If you would keep your mouth shut and your ears open you would learn something.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister may want to conclude his answer by speaking through the Chair.

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, this is character assassination by the hon. member of Mr. Murray. On the part of the Government of Canada this is supplementing the market-place which will allow consumer prices to be passed on to consumers, providing the information that is necessary and required by consumers across this country.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for small business. It concerns the shutting down of Fruehauf Canada Limited, which was announced earlier this week, terminating 334 jobs. This morning Solaray in Brantford announced it is shutting down permanently, throwing 125 more people on to the unemployment lists.

In both cases it was brought to my attention that it was caused by a combination of high interest rates, deregulation in the trucking industry and the free trade deal. The president of Fruehauf Canada Limited blamed the free trade deal publicly. He said it is because there is no such thing as a level playing field between the Canadian and American manufacturers.

The minister knows that a nation that loses its ability to make things, to manufacture, loses its ability to survive. What in God's name is this government going to do to stop this ridiculous decline in the manufacturing industry in Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, in terms of what the government is going to do immediately, we have a full range of assistance programs which we will be making available. More important in the broader context, we have a consolidation of Fruehauf. It is moving from Brantford to Ingersoll. The consolidation is occurring in Canada. It is not occurring elsewhere.

There has been a slow-down in orders, which led to the original problem. The management made it clear that it was a slow-down in orders primarily, not the FTA, that was the problem.

More important, Madam Speaker, we must remember that in southern Ontario, from where the member comes, we have had endless openings, one after the other. Chrysler has had a $400 million expansion. Stelco has had a multimillion dollar expansion. Freightliner has had an over $100 million expansion, and there are 1,000 new jobs in CAMI just down the road from Brantford.

So things are strong in southern Ontario, thanks to the free trade agreement and thanks to the new competitiveness of our economy.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, what the minister says is extremely misleading. The trucking industry in Canada was about 80 per cent Canadian-owned a year and a half ago. By the end of this year about 65 to 70 per cent of it will be owned by the Americans because of the free trade deal, and that includes the manufacturing of tractor trailers as well.

My supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. In conversations with congressmen in Washington this week, I learned that they are extremely apprehensive about jobs going to Mexico if the United States enters into a free trade agreement with Mexico. They said the same things to me this week that we were saying two years ago about Canadian jobs going to the United States.

I want the Deputy Prime Minister to tell this House and the nation today that Canada will not enter into a free trade agreement with Mexico at the risk of losing what manufacturing jobs we have left.

• (1150)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, there are further details about the Fruehauf development which I think the House should know as well. We have found a need in the past to change the licensing agreement for trucking with the Ontario government. The GATT has found this inappropriate. That has nothing to do with the FTA, it has to do with GATT, and that has affected the over–all potential of this company. The consolidation is occurring in Canada, in Ingersoll.

More important, the hon. member should know that it is companies such as Fruehauf that are going to benefit enormously in the years ahead from the removal of the most iniquitous tax we could ever put on an industry like that, the manufacturers' sales tax.

After the Senate sees the sense of this, come January 1 one industrial capacity after another in southern Ontario, the Brantford area especially, is going to gain enormous strength as a result of this change.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Last month Canada lost a crucial decision by the free trade lobster panel. The United States intends to increase the minimum size of lobsters again in 1991 and 1992, also under the pretence of stock conservation.

Will the minister specify what he will do to avoid the impact of the next two increases and to minimize the fishermen's loss due to the latest ruling?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, this question is essentially similar to what this House has heard in the last two or three weeks. There is a slight difference. He wants to know what more we are doing.

There are two major things the government is doing of which the hon. member should be aware. The first is the promotional campaign that the Government of Canada is putting forward for large lobsters and, indeed, for small lobsters—large lobsters in the United States, small lobsters over all.

What is happening is that the inventories have been selling down very, very nicely. We have moved from about a $20 million inventory to an inventory of about $2.4 million. This promotion program is working well. In addition, we want to work with the industry, with the unions and others to come up with another approach to deal with the difficulties the small lobster export industry is facing. They are difficulties which can be met through promotion and co–operation with the industry.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the fishermen in eastern Canada will certainly appreciate that when they are selling their lobsters below cost.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister is no doubt aware of American state legislation which makes the import of processed lobster very difficult. Will the minister now specify what he will do to guarantee access to the American market for processed Canadian lobster?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the member, of course, wants iron clad guarantees in all situations, but here is what I can tell him. The conversations going on now with the industry are focusing on that matter in particular. I expect that given the new context, some creative new ideas will emerge. We are seeing them emerge. That, together with the promotion campaign, will hopefully address what the hon. member is concerned about.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I am sure he and all the members on his side of the House know that the deal that sold CN Route to the Fingolds and to Manfred Ruhland was truly a lousy deal. Everyone on this side, and certainly all the employees of CN, past and present, know about this terrible transaction. The minister should know that you cannot continue to Watergate the facts of this deal.

Will the minister table today all of the agreements of purchase and sale, the financial agreements, and all of the consents that were entered into to complete the sale, and the audited statements just prior to the sale of Route Canada?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I reject completely the premise of my hon. friend's question. My friend knows that this company was losing between $30 and $40 million a year. That is good Liberal business practice, but it does not work anywhere else. The only alternative was to shut down the company. We sold it and gave the employees a chance to make a go of it. Under those circumstances, it was a normal business transaction by CN with respect to one of its subsidiaries and that information remains with CN, and not with the government.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. I appreciate that answer. I really feel that the employees had nothing to do with the success or failure of that company, after it was sold. The success or failure was due to the mismanagement by the Fingold's and Manfred Ruhland.

To verify what the minister has just told us, we need the books and the records of the company. All we are asking is for him to table those records so we can ascertain for ourselves whether the deal was a lousy deal or a good deal.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend knows that those records are with the Registrar in Bankruptcy because the company is going through bankruptcy proceedings. That is where the records are. This is a normal thing. That is why we have a Bankruptcy Act.

Two weeks ago I was in Thunder Bay where there was a demonstration by the grain handlers because they are concerned about the amount of grain going through that port. Yet my hon. friend never raises a question about events current to his riding. I think he should get up to date with the concerns of his people.

TRADE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister, who will be well aware now that three Canadian firms are bidding to sell up to 12 million tonnes of water to the city of Santa Barbara, California. This is the first of an ongoing series of bids.

Yesterday, in response to a question from me, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the government is opposed to large scale water exports by interbasin transfer. Does this include canal transfers, pipeline transfers and supertanker transfers of water as well?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, in order to respond in detail to my friend's question I think it best to consult the 1987 Water Act. Under that act any proposal to export water must be consistent with the federal water policy of 1987. That policy clearly states the government's opposition to any large-scale water exports by interbasin transfers. The FTA does not oblige Canada to export water to the United States. The hon. member knows that.

In the case of Santa Barbara the situation is quite different. I understand that three Canadian companies were on the city's short list of bidders and the companies will, of course, have to meet the province's licensing requirements. But we are not talking about any interbasin transfers.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, not long ago the Prime Minister was quoted in Fortune magazine as follows:

> If someone wants to buy a little of our oil, a little of our water—hell, we're in the business. That's what it's all about.

My supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. With the Prime Minister having said he is prepared to sell our water to the United States, is this government saying that it is prepared to accept massive supertanker sales of Canadian water to the United States?

The government ought to know that once you turn on the tap with the United States, and other cities add on to this tap, there is no way that Canada is going to be able to turn it off.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, when the hon. member talks about massive sales of water he truly is all wet.

We have all read the free trade agreement. The free trade agreement could not be more clear. Two things that it allows is the sale of bottled water, which probably makes good commercial sense for water bottlers, and tank containers of water. Beyond that, the free trade agreement does not allow this.

I again invite the hon. member to read the 1987 Water Act.

HOUSING

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Housing. There are 5,000 low income families on the waiting list for co-op housing in Toronto. According to The Toronto Star, one of the units in a subsidized co-op housing project intended for low and moderate income persons is being occupied by the NDP member for Trinity—Spadina who makes $80,000 a year.

What is the minister going to do about this situation?

• (1200)

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member will know, part of the co-op housing philosophy is to have a mixture of incomes in a particular project. However, the hon. member will also know that it has been the federal government's policy since 1985 to ensure that all of our money is targeted toward low and modest income people.

This year the co-op housing program is being reviewed by the federal government and situations such as the one pointed out by the hon. member are extremely unhelpful in that particular situation.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will allow two single questions. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and the hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

TOURISM

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism and it concerns the ad contract given to Camp and Associates for tourism promotion.

As the minister knows, his government, in answering my access to information request, has refused to make public the ratings of each bidder for that contract. Of course, by coincidence, Camp and Associates was the bidder that got the contract.

I want to ask the minister just exactly what it is that the government has to hide.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I have two very important revelations for the hon. member this morning. First, he should be reminded that Treasury Board guidelines dictate the choice of the advertiser for the Government of Canada. Treasury Board guidelines put together a panel of public servants who make this decision and the decision, as the hon. member knows, was made from six invited firms that came to bid on the work.

Mr. Boudria: You whited out the pages.

Mr. Hockin: A further revelation, which is so important, since Camp has taken over the advertising for Tourism Canada, Canada has now a very strong image in the United States, and it is our major job to advertise in the United States.

In 1984 when we took over, on nine attributes of tourism the United States came first in seven and Canada came first in two. The results that I received last month indicate that on those nine attributes Canada is now first in seven and the United States is first in only two.

COMPETITION BUREAU

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. He will be aware that the Director of the Competition Bureau has complained publicly that he is the last to hear about mergers, that companies are entering into mergers and telling him after the fact.

This is something that we have been saying for a year or so has been happening. He has given notice that he is not going to take it any more. I ask the minister what action the government is going to take to stop this practice so that the Competition Bureau is not reduced to being a rubber stamp for big industry.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the last part of his question is totally false. The Competition Bureau is not a rubber stamp to the industry. It never has been, is not, and will not be in the future.

Nevertheless, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs today is out of this Chamber on official government business. He will be back next week. I will take the question as notice and I am sure the minister will respond accordingly.

COPYRIGHT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-316, an act to amend the Copyright Act (fair use).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Greene: Madam Speaker, after considerable consideration and consultation, I have produced a bill which I think goes a long way to alleviate the concerns of users about the copyright legislation currently in place, while protecting the initiatives of the government to encourage the establishment of collectives and protect creators' rights.

This bill actually provides an incentive for creators to join collectives and make their work accessible to users. At the same time, it provides an appropriate balance with respect to the rights of users such as educators, librarians, politicians and other people in our society who need to communicate, and the rights of society in general.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CAPITAL ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-317, an Act to amend the National Capital Act (description of National Capital Region).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

He said: The bill that I am proposing before the House today is to amend the boundaries of the National Capital Region in an easterly direction, extending to an area at or near Plantagenet, Ontario.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill would be to extend the territory of the National Capital as far to the east as the existing territory now extends to the west of Ottawa.

Madam Speaker, this bill enjoys the support of all municipalities concerned.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

TRADE ADJUSTMENT BENEFITS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-318, an act to provide for the payment of benefits to Canadian establishments laying off employees.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the bill I am introducing is for the establishment of a trade adjustment review board that would have the responsibility of designating those industries or locales that are affected by substantial lay-offs or job dislocation caused by trade matters or other changes in the industrial area. It would then be able to provide or to utilize its powers to apply various benefits to workers under the present programming of the government, and also to provide ways of organizing these. I think it is a proper response to the major and serious industrial changes going on in Canada at the present time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

POINT OF ORDER

NOTICE OF PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILL

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, on April 3, 1989, something over a year ago, the hon. member for Kamloops gave notice of a private members' bill to amend the Parliament of Canada Act (estimates).

I must say that I have been sitting on the edge of my seat since April 1989 waiting for the hon. member for Kamloops to introduce this bill. I thought the contents would be most interesting since I presume he is amending the presentation of Estimates to this House. I know his interest in procedure and form, and I wonder if he could indicate when we might see this bill?

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): At the earliest opportunity, Madam Speaker.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, it is with pleasure that I present a petition signed by many Canadians on a subject which is extremely important to them.

Canada Post Corporation does not have strict regulations governing the distribution of publications that are deemed by many to be offensive. Those who are trying to bring up their children in a responsible manner with healthy morals deserve to be given the opportunity to do so with the minimum of interference.

The petitioners state that a change in the review standards by Canada Post could prevent the recurrence of incidences of wide-spread outrage and complaint. They petition Parliament in large numbers to change the Criminal Code accordingly.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I have two sets of petitions, one of which has been signed by over 2,000 Canadians who are opposed to the goods and services tax on books, newspapers, and magazines.

They ask the House to reject this bill when it comes back before the House again.

I also have another set of petitions on behalf of people who are opposed to the GST.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a double entry in today's petition lottery.

The first petition has over 700 signatures primarily of residents and citizens of the city of Winnipeg protesting the major cut-backs in veterans' benefits that the government took in the last budget. They are asking for restoration of the full range of those benefits in view of the great service veterans provided to this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the second set of petitions has over 1,700 names registered by people in the city of Winnipeg concerning the goods and services tax and asking the government once again to reconsider its very serious decision to impose this tax upon consumers.

ABORTION

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I have petitions today from 2,240 Canadians from Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba, and from my own province of British Columbia.

The petitioners state that, since the choice to bear children or not to bear children is a matter of personal choice and not a matter of criminal law, since the Canadian Medical Association already has guidelines and regulations in place concerning abortion and that criminal sanctions do nothing to address the reasons why women seek abortions and do nothing to reduce the number of unplanned pregnancies, they call upon this government not to proclaim Bill C-43.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty on behalf of a number of citizens of Ontario, Kapuskasing, Moonbeam and Toronto, to present petitions which call upon the government to reject the current proposed goods and services tax which shifts the tax burden to ordinary Canadians and put in place tax reform which would be much more fairer to all Canadians.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table yet another petition signed by residents of the province of Newfoundland who object to the government's goods and service tax.

These petitions were gathered at the behest of my distinguished colleague, the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, who brought this petition to Ottawa to present on behalf of these persons who are opposed to this tax. They are also opposed to the 31 previous tax increases imposed on them by this spendthrift government, and they are opposed to the continuation of the proposal to impose this tax and call upon Parliament to reject it.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to again present several hundred names collected in my riding and elsewhere from citizens opposed to the goods and services tax. I recognize by the addresses that probably 90 per cent of the signatures on this petition are seniors who are concerned that their already limited income will be even further diminished by the imposition of this tax. The petitioners remind the House that the Liberals on behalf of Canadians strongly oppose this new goods and services tax and they pray that Parliament does not adopt it.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I too rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, a petition from the people of Newfoundland.

They call upon this government to reject the proposed goods and services tax as it is an unfair tax burden on the people of Newfoundland as well as people elsewhere in Canada.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present today. One is from a number of employees of CN, as well as CP Rail in Kamloops, who are concerned about the government's cut-backs to VIA Rail services.

They simply cannot believe that the government of the second largest country in the world, geographically, would not have a decent passenger rail system which is environmentally friendly. They are asking the government to invest in a first-class passenger rail service for the country as opposed to curtailing parts of it.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of constituents of Kamloops and other parts of central British Columbia who point out that the 7 per cent goods and services tax will have an adverse affect on the tourism industry and the hospitality industry generally and will put Canada in an unfair competition position vis-à-vis the United States.

They believe that literally thousands of American tourists will stay home as opposed to visiting Canada, and thousands of Canadian tourists will go to the United States to avoid the 7 per cent GST on their goods and services related to tourism.

That is to say nothing of the tax on reading which now makes us the only country in the world that does so. Naturally they are asking the government to come to its senses and stop this tax. If they were here, they would call on the Liberals in the Senate to kill the bill as well.

IMMIGRATION—MAHMOOD HASSAN RANDEREE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, before we move to Government Orders, I want to acknowledge the decision of the government to agree to accept the refugee application of Mahmood Hassan Randeree. The case has caused some major discussion in the House of Commons over the past two weeks.

I want to express my appreciation to the Minister of Employment and Immigration for listening to those entreaties and to acknowledge the fact that the government had made a mistake and was wise enough to correct that mistake.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I would like to thank the hon. member and tell him that we certainly do appreciate that message and it will be related to the minister.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADIAN POLAR COMMISSION ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Siddon that Bill C-72, an act to establish the Canadian Polar Commission and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the legislative committee.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I rise to continue debate on Bill C-72, an act to establish the Canadian Polar Commission, which was first announced in Leningrad last November by the Prime Minister. Now it seems rather fitting that we are discussing legislation to fulfil that promise after the recent visit of Mr. Gorbachev to Ottawa.

The Prime Minister has continuously acted on his commitment to enhance Canada's role in the international forum. The establishment of the Canadian Polar Commission is a culmination of this leadership in enhancing Canada's role in circumpolar and scientific affairs.

I have been very fortunate of late to spend time in the north. As mentioned earlier, I returned to Ottawa yesterday after visiting Yellowknife and Iqaluit to participate in the Arctic environmental strategy consultations, another important initiative of this government.

Not many Canadians have had the opportunity to travel to our north. I can assure members that since becoming Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development my appreciation for the north, in particular for all northerners, has increased tenfold.

At the end of last month, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development embarked on one of the most interesting excursions that he has had to date. During this trip not only did he participate in the historic signing of the eastern Arctic land claim, but he also spent a night in an igloo and experienced first–hand polar science by visiting the Igloolik Research Centre.

There are many components of northern life that amaze me, but one that is particularly salient is perhaps the environment and, in even broader terms, the science of the north and northern life.

Polar science and the ongoing research happening in this country is for the benefit not only of Canadians but for all people who live in a northern environment. Furthermore, it expands the understanding and respect for the north which all Canadians should share.

Tremendous progress has been made recently in the north. The Council for Yukon Indians and the Dene–Métis have reached the final agreement stage, and the TFN has signed an agreement in principle. I am sure everyone realizes that the environment of political certainty and stability created by these settlements bodes well for the continued economic and political development throughout the north.

However, this economic and political development is not a random occurrence without rhyme or reason. Development has been carefully orchestrated by this government's commitment to a solid policy and program framework in the north. The approval of the Northern Political and Economic Framework in 1987 effectively demonstrated this commitment.

This northern framework points our way toward developing the north in a sound and sustainable manner. I believe such development will be further enhanced through increased knowledge that will be provided by the Canadian Polar Commission.

As I mentioned earlier, the Prime Minister has heartily supported the creation of the Canadian Polar Commission, but he is not alone in this support. Two extensive studies commissioned by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have both recommended its creation, but the need for this commission does not simply respond to my department's point of view. Over the years there has been widespread support for a polar commission that includes territorial governments, aboriginal groups, private enterprise, research institutes, and universities. This bill fulfils that need in an effective manner.

The creation of this commission is an initiative which fulfils an important role in Canada and ultimately among circumpolar nations. The Canadian Polar Commission will promote and disseminate knowledge in and about the polar regions, not only in this country but wherever northern issues are a concern.

The thrust of this commission's activities is to monitor research and information about polar regions in an international capacity. What is more, it will foster the promotion and development of such knowledge through co–operation with organizations, institutions, and associations, private and public, national and international.

In the scientific world it is imperative that professionals and practitioners be kept informed about the extent and nature of our polar science. The Canadian Polar Commission responds to this need.

The commission will also lead to the development of a comprehensive Canadian polar information system. Furthermore, an increase in the field of polar knowledge will in accordance with Canada's foreign policy enhance Canada's international profile as a circumpolar nation by fostering international co–operation and by increasing international attention to Canada's polar regions by addressing such issues as resource development, legal or jurisdictional questions, security concerns, and global environmental problems including the greenhouse effect, the ozone layer, and water and airborne contaminants.

After sitting in on the hearings on The Green Plan and the Arctic environmental strategy in both Yellowknife and Iqaluit, I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that these issues are of great concern to the people who live in the north, our Inuit, our Dene–Métis, and our other northern Canadians. This commission will answer needs that have been brought forward during these hearings.

The commission will also initiate, sponsor, and support conferences, seminars, and meetings. It will provide support for the publication of studies on polar subjects as well as recognize achievements and contributions in polar matters. In this way it gives prominence to the scientific research and its applications for Canada's polar regions.

During these times of fiscal responsibility funding for scientific research obviously cannot be lavish. However, the commission will bring greater focus and efficiency to the diverse and dispersed Canadian polar research community and will link research efforts more effectively.

The Canadian Polar Commission will receive core government funding this fiscal year of approximately $1 million, but it will be encouraged to seek non-government support for its endeavours as well.

The activities of this commission will be managed by a board of directors consisting of up to 12 members, including a chair person and two vice-chairpersons. They will be appointed by Governor in Council on the recommendation of my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and will serve terms of appointments of three years.

Persons appointed to this board of directors must have knowledge that will assist the commission in the furthering of its purpose. Its membership will reflect the ethnic, linguistic and regional diversities of Canada's polar regions.

Although the commission's principal office will be in the national capital region, regional offices will be established in other locations with at least one such office north of 60. The commission's presence in the north will be appropriately visible and significant with at least half of its meetings being held there. I believe this will challenge the commission to decide priority areas of focus, which will help to establish its national and international credentials.

My colleague, the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and I plan to ensure that the presence in the north is an effective presence, a presence which seeks input from northerners, particularly those appointed to the commission and those interested in its programs. We will table a report on the commission's activities each year in the House of Commons.

The creation of a polar commission is a great step toward enhancing Canada's future as a leader among the circumpolar communities of nations. It reinforces the commitment made by the Prime Minister in Leningrad last November. This commission is a response to a number of issues and priorities. Therefore I ask the co-operation of all members of the House in ensuring prompt passage of this bill.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I commend the minister with whom I came down from Iqaluit yesterday for her appreciation of the north. I invite all ministers and all members of Parliament to come up to the north. If they are from the other party, I will not even take credit for bringing them up there.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to participate in the second reading of Bill C-72, also known as the Canadian Polar Commission Act. We in the Official Opposition support this bill in principle because it is a good initiative and is long overdue. For too long, knowledge about the north and knowledge for the north have been at the bottom of the government's priority list.

I would like to relate how we view the fact that there has been a lot of research which has not been co-ordinated. Many people have come up to do research in the north. As a matter of fact during the middle 1970s and late 1960s there was a joke going around that every Inuit family consisted of a father, a mother, some children, and an anthropologist because there were so many of them coming up there. Most times we did not know what they were doing. We knew they were studying, but we did not know what they were studying. It got to a point where we laid down the law and said that we appreciate people coming up to do some studies, but there was some invasion of privacy in some cases. However, I think that good co-ordinated scientific research in the north will alleviate that. Northern science efforts have ebbed and flowed and waxed and waned according to the level of interest in southern Canada at a particular time.

The proposed polar commission has had an exceptionally long gestation. Almost five years have passed since September, 1985, when the then Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development established a working group to study the feasibility and advisability of establishing a national polar institute in Canada.

The report of the working group entitled, "Canada and Polar Science" was released publicly in March, 1987. A subsequent Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development commissioned another report, known as "The Shield of Achilles: The report of the Canadian Polar Research Commission Study" and it was completed in May, 1988.

Both these reports confirmed the existence of serious problems respecting polar research in Canada. Both reports identified a need for a more co-ordinated integrated system of research, science, and knowledge.

There is research going on, as I mentioned earlier, but it is being done by a number of very different organizations who are sponsored by a variety of interests for a range of purposes. There is not enough sharing of information between all the players. I must state that during a meeting the minister and I attended yesterday some comments were made that there was not enough co-ordination between departments. One department did not know what the other was doing in terms of research and they were not sharing the information. There was general agreement that there should be some co-ordinated effort to have a working group consisting of several departments so that each department would know what other departments were doing.

Again there is not enough support being given to the polar research community. As a result Canada is well behind other circumpolar nations in research and development.

It is worth quoting some excerpts from the 1988 report of the Canadian Polar Commission Research Commission study:

> The great diversity and widespread dispersion of those engaged in research in and about Canada's polar regions has slowed and handicapped the development of a strong and effective Canadian polar research community.
> The many problems—are accentuated by the striking lack of knowledge about what is and is not being done in many fields of polar research, by a serious sense of isolation among much of that community, and by the woeful lack of knowledgeable support for polar research among major public and private institutions in Canada. Moreover, many thoughtful observers are increasingly concerned, even alarmed, about Canada's disorganized and sporadic participation in international polar research. The worlds of polar knowledge and northern public policy are uncomfortably distant from each other in far too many cases. Perhaps most troubling of all is the persistent sense of remoteness and alienation of Northern Canadians from most Canadian polar research and, indeed, from national affairs generally.

I will touch on this aspect of northern alienation in a few moments, but I want to first draw to the attention of this House a recent report of the Science Council of Canada. The Science Council's report entitled, "Harnessing Science and Technology for Cold Regions" was released last December. That report contained some very harsh criticism of the government. The report of the Science Council revealed that more than 30 federal departments and agencies, over 30 Canadian universities, numerous individual firms and industrial organizations, several provincial and territorial governments, as well as native development corporations and private organizations in both northern and southern Canada, are engaged in some aspect of the development and application of knowledge pertaining to the cold climate technologies.

However, the expertise is thinly scattered and there is widespread dissatisfaction within this community regarding the scope and focus of northern science and technology.

The council had strong words concerning the lack of sustained commitment by the government to polar research: "In Canada, there has been a failure to address the changing nature of northern scientific and technological needs. There are no clear national scientific or technological goals: nor is there evidence of national leadership".

The Science Council went on to describe how, in stark contrast to the inadequacies of Canadian national policy, many other nations in the world, including the United States, West Germany, Norway, the United Kingdom, France, Japan and Sweden have been increasing their commitment to cold climate technology.

The problems of the circumpolar world require international co-operation. Canada is a signatory to numerous bilateral and multilateral agreements which include co-operation in the polar science and technology and exchanges of information. Clearly the proposed polar commission could serve as a focus to promote polar science co-ordination. Without its own set of priorities, the Science Council of Canada believes Canada is in danger of giving away the shop.

The 1987 Canada and polar science report described in some detail how northern Canadian residents view science and research as a two-edged sword. It can be beneficial but it can also be detrimental. Quite often there is conflict between the traditional knowledge of the aboriginal people and the scientific data bases of the non-aboriginal researchers. Northerners object to the outside or southern scientific activity that excludes, ignores and dismisses their knowledge and information. They resent the fact that everything is controlled from southern Canada.

I would just like to again elaborate on some examples. Some years ago during caribou surveys in the Keewatin region in my riding of Nunatsiaq, the biologists found there was a decreasing herd at the time. The numbers were roughly 150,000, down from 450,000. At the time the Inuit hunters of the Keewatin said that that just was not the case. It was not possible and they knew it. Again, they said some have moved. Sometimes there are movements in different years, sometimes the caribou come right through, in this case, Rankin Inlet. At other times they do not come through Rankin Inlet in big herds. The Inuit hunters are very, very knowledgeable about the movement of caribou, because they have hunted for as long as we have been around the Keewatin region, which is roughly about 4,000 years, I believe. The biologists did their survey and decided that there were only 150,000.

It was going to start imposing quotas. People who came from the South who were allowed to hunt five caribou a year were suddenly told that they could hunt only one caribou a year. They wanted to hunt more than one. It was the Inuit who use the caribou for food and clothing who felt the hardship.

Whether it was different biologists or the same biologists, a year or two later the movement of caribou was different again. The report came back saying a mistake had been made and there were still 450,000 caribou. That is a good example of the contradiction between the knowledge of the Inuit, the authorities and the biologists at the time.

I admit that the relations between the biologists and the Inuit have improved somewhat over the past few years. The biologists realize that the Inuit knowledge is vital to research. We have maintained that it was always vital to any kind of research because of our intimate knowledge and very strong ties to the land.

I will give you another example of where it has not improved. This example is so recent that it is still ongoing. The communities of Lake Harbour, Pangnirtung and Iqaluit have hunted beluga whales for as long as they have been around, which is a long time. They have always hunted beluga whales, but earlier this year the Department of Fisheries and Oceans decided that there were not enough belugas. They wanted to do away with any form of hunting for the next 10 years.

The Hunters and Trappers Association and the hunters in those three communities told the officials that they did not know everything about belugas. After a conducting a sporadic survey they tell us there were only a few hundred. They wanted to tell the hunters that they could not hunt for the next 10 years.

The newly formed Nunavut Planning Commission intervened and decided that perhaps imposing a quota of five for each community would be sufficient. This was all right until, again, the hunters and trappers said: "What about us? What about our views? Do we not count? We are the ones who hunt the animals. We know where they go. We know their movements. We know the land because we hunt around Lake Harbour, Iqaluit and Pangnirtung."

This issue is still ongoing, but it is another case of where the people's knowledge of the land was not considered before the decision to impose some restrictions on the hunting of the beluga whales was made.

Since then, there have been ongoing discussions about that issue. I hope it will be resolved to the satisfaction of the hunters of those communities, rather than to the satisfaction of other groups.

Again, I must reiterate that the hunters are not going to kill for the sake of killing. They have never done so. They kill for food and when hunting is done in those communities, it is self-regulated. In some cases, there are quotas. We have the quota system on polar bears, but it is self-regulated if there is no quota system. I just wanted to point those things out.

There is a conflict between traditional and scientific knowledge. I just gave two examples. Unfortunately, it seems to be the case that interest about the Arctic peaks in southern Canada when there are sovereignty, military concerns or economic development interests. From a northern perspective, very little of what has been done to date seems to have been done for the benefit of the people who live in the north.

Lately, environmental concerns have prompted renewed interest in northern research and science. Toxic contaminants from outside Canada's borders have permeated the northern food chain.

This country needs a Polar Commission. There seems to be a widespread consensus on this fact, and increasingly southern Canadians have come to realize what we, Inuit, have always known. Canada is an Arctic nation. Seventy-five per cent of Canada lies within the Arctic or sub-Arctic. Canada's northern border forms along the longest ocean shoreline in the world. Canada is a circumpolar nation. We have much to contribute to the world in terms of increasing the world's knowledge about our environment.

We have consulted with interested groups on this legislation. All are supportive of the establishment of a Polar Commission. Again, there are some concerns. The purpose of the commission should be strengthened. The commission should be given a role in establishing goals and priorities. The imperative is missing.

In addition to canvassing the state of knowledge, the commission should advise the government on national goals, objectives, and priorities. It should provide direction. The commission should have the freedom to advise the government on any matter relating to the polar regions, at any time.

I am pleased that the language used in this bill refers to knowledge rather than the term "science". It seems that the government is assuming, within the scope of the word "knowledge", aboriginal knowledge. Perhaps the government could specify that aboriginal knowledge is included. Also, the government may wish to make clear that social science, as well as physical science, is covered by this commission.

Earlier, the minister gave the location of the head office. We have some concerns about the location of the head office of this commission. The government proposes to locate its head office in Ottawa, with regional offices in the north. We suggest that the head office should be in the north, with regional offices in the south.

We have some questions about the commission's budget. We want to ensure that sufficient financial resources are given to the commission to enable it to do a credible job. Again, the minister stated, earlier, that there are going to be about 12 commissioners, including a chairperson. I would suggest that a majority of these commissioners come from the north and have a very good knowledge—and I emphasize knowledge—of the north. I think it is very important that the commission, in its deliberations, should know exactly what it is talking about and who it should call on, whether it is in terms of animals, climate, or geography. Who better than the people of the north would know these things?

All these issues we will discuss in greater detail in the committee. For the moment, as I said earlier, we express our support in principle.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the previous two speakers and have enjoyed their comments. I am delighted to have an opportunity to add a few comments to those already made.

This particular piece of legislation to create an arctic commission is long overdue. If my memory serves me, I believe that we are the only polar nation that does not have a commission in place. I must say that, on behalf of the New Democrats in the House, we are pleased with this initiative coming out of the study made public at the end of May, 1988, and now we are taking action on this legislation.

I want to say from the outset that we are a northern nation. As a matter of fact, I think the global perception of Canada is just that, we are a northern people. The fact that the overwhelming majority of our land mass is Arctic or sub-Arctic only emphasizes the need for such a commission. The fact that our Arctic coastline is, by far, our longest coastline, brings home the fact that much needs to be done.

I recall, not long ago, being with the parliamentary delegation visiting the U.S.S.R. and meeting with the Arctic Institute of the U.S.S.R. We heard about all the Arctic and sub-Arctic research going on, in not only the hard sciences, but the social sciences and in all aspects of the northern environment, both in terms of physical aspects, as well as the human and cultural aspects. They elaborated at some length and indicated the role of their polar commission and the research that was going on and, more importantly perhaps, the research that was being co-ordinated by their commission.

They then asked us what Canada had of a similar nature. It was slightly embarrassing because we had to think very quickly as to just what we had that was even similar and we could not come up with anything, other than to point out that we have a number of institutes around the country. I think particularly of the Canadian Institute of North America, based at the University of Calgary; and the Boreal Institute at the University of Alberta in Edmonton. There are others where there are serious specialized activities going on regarding research into northern Canada and northern Canadian issues.

Let me begin by talking about Bill C-78, an act to establish a Canadian polar commission, by saying that we support this bill in principle. However, we have many concerns that we would like to see addressed in order to ensure that the commission is an effective and functioning body and not simply window-dressing for the government to give the impression that it is doing something regarding the northern parts of the country and, I might say, northern issues globally.

In principle, we support the bill. At this reading, which is second reading where we discuss the principle of the bill, it is important to say, right off the top, that we support this bill in principle.

The government first announced that a commission would be established in August, 1988 in response to the excellent study by Professor Thomas Simons, from Trent University, entitled: "The Shield of Achilles".

When members of Parliament read the report, an excellent report which pointed out the need for such a commission, we were very motivated and encouraged by the fact that the government indicated it planned to move. That is a long time ago but, finally, it is moving and I guess we should be thankful for that. Nothing much was done.

The Prime Minister, when he visited Leningrad in November of last year, announced the establishment of the Canadian Polar Commission. That was one of the announcements he made in the Soviet Union, based on the rather embarrassing experience that some of us had being there just prior to the Prime Minister's visit. However, the Conservative government once more announced that a polar commission would be established and The Green Plan was released this spring.

Most of the initiatives pertaining to the Arctic, which were included in The Green Plan, unfortunately were just old and rather over-used initiatives. That is why we wish to ensure that there will be some real results from the establishment of this commission.

We believe that Canada should be a leader in the area of circumpolar co-operation in the broad range of areas of scientific, social, historical, environmental, human rights and the rights of indigenous peoples. We feel, as a result, that the establishment of this commission is a step in the right direction. However, as I said earlier, we have many, many concerns.

I think it is fair to say that people around the world expect of us, as a developed country with a fine educational and research basis, that we should lead the way on a number of polar research issues. While we have made incredible gains in certain areas, at certain institutes, and in certain departments, the co-ordination of this has been overlooked and certainly things could be an awful lot better.

The mandate given to the commission, while very broad, should ensure that the function of the commission is to set priorities for the government and to keep the government on track addressing the very real issues facing our north, not just academic dissertations, but something more than a dissertation that will sit on the shelf and see no action.

I must say with some regret that this happened with a study done back in 1987 on Broughton Island which found that there were very high levels of PCBs in the food chain and in the blood samples of the local people. Two-thirds of the children had abnormally high PCB levels, yet no action was taken on the piece of research. We hope with the polar commission in place there will be some incentive not only to study the problems but to take action on them.

We ought to ensure that the commission co-ordinates the work being done by various government departments and agencies and that the wheel simply is not being reinvented time and time again regarding arctic issues.

One ought to mention when the research was being done on the creation of this commission, there emerged from an inquiry across Canada an incredibly strong consensus by Canadians from all walks of life that a Canadian polar research commission was not only desirable, but required urgently. Whether we were hearing from polar researchers presently in place or from universities, industry, aboriginal leaders, politicians, government officials from federal territorial and provincial levels, various research organizations or granting councils, or many interested Canadians, we found that they wanted a Canadian polar research commission in place as quickly as possible. It will do us all well to act on this piece of legislation as quickly as we can without being careless but move expeditiously. I am certain we can once we have begun this stage of the bill.

The great diversity and widespread dispersion of those engaged in research in and about Canada's polar regions has slowed and, in some respects, handicapped the development of a strong and effective Canadian polar research community. The research that takes place is rather disorganized and sporadic, and I must say that the worlds of polar knowledge and northern public policy are uncomfortably distant from one another. There is a desperate need for co-ordination. We are hopeful that the commission will provide that necessary infrastructure to co-ordinate these efforts.

It is important that the commission not undertake initiatives that duplicate the responsibilities or the efforts of others. It ought not to take over activities where the work can be done by others, perhaps more effectively or more efficiently. Instead, it should build upon, complement and support the work of the many diverse existing Canadian institutions, programs and organizations that are dedicated to the development of polar knowledge.

This is something that not only the commission ought to guard against, but should ensure that it not simply duplicate work, and I must say the excellent work, that is being done currently in our country.

We should recommend in the strongest terms possible that the Canadian Polar Research Commission must be concerned with the full range of knowledge in and about the polar regions and not be limited to the contemporary and restricted meaning of the word "science", or even to define formally notions of research as might be expressed in universities or industrial research and development ventures.

I am thinking of heritage and cultural issues. The indigenous knowledge of northern aboriginal people, the large and small scale technological developments appropriate to northern development and the whole range of the humanities and social sciences together form important components of polar knowledge. The commission must address the development of these facets of polar knowledge with the same enthusiasm it demonstrates for the development of polar knowledge in the natural and applied sciences.

I believe it will be reflected in the committee hearings that too often when we think of polar research or northern research, we think in terms of the pure sciences. An appeal will go out to broaden the scope of the work of the commission as much as possible.

When the report entitled The Shield of Achilles was being developed, the views expressed by those sought out for their views indicated an appreciation and a recognition for the fact that we have a broad sweep of the terms "research" and "science".

It is also important that while we call the commission an Arctic commission we also recognize that the definition of the word "north" means a variety of things to many people. Depending on the discipline or perhaps the individual, the definition of what constitutes the northern part of Canada will vary from person to person or from institute to institute or from source to source.

I believe the mandate of the Canadian Polar Research Commission should reflect the broadest sense of the word. I agree that while no clear line of demarcation presently exists between the north and the rest of Canada, we all would recognize the nordicity of our country developed by Professor Hamelin, who I think is from the University of Quebec at Laval, which offers what is probably the best guide but which is nonetheless the real sense that most Canadians have of what is the north and what is not.

In order to give guidance to the work of the commission, our definition of the north would certainly include research in and about Yukon, the Northwest Territories, the Arctic Seas, Nouveau Quebec, Labrador and certain northern parts of our provinces.

I want to refer briefly to what the mandate of the commission ought to be. The primary functions of the commission should be to monitor continuously the development in Canada and elsewhere of knowledge in and about the polar regions and to report regularly and publicly thereon. It is important we see that the work of the commission will go beyond simply research into Canadian issues.

Also, the mandate should be to promote and encourage the development of polar knowledge in Canada, and to encourage national, public and private institutions and organizations to support the development and dissemination of such knowledge.

I might add that it should advise the Government of Canada when requested, on any matter relating to polar regions, and perhaps from time to time on areas about which the commission is not necessarily requested to do so.

The mandate should also include the commission to act as a source of information about polar research matters for Canadians and Canadian institutions, and to foster contact and co-operation among members of the Canadian polar research community and between that community and the international polar research community.

I do not think we can over-emphasize that in recognition of all the countries that are polar nations involved in the polar community, there is a need to have this type of co-ordination between countries. That is probably as important as the work that we do within our own country.

Obviously the role of the commission in this international research should encourage the commission to devote an appropriate portion of its time and its resources to monitoring, fostering and reporting on Canadian participation in international polar research. The rapidly growing interest in circumpolar co-operation and the general importance of international Arctic affairs demand that Canada have a focal point for knowledge about Arctic research. I believe that the commission would provide that focal point.

It is recommended that the commission be composed of 12 commissioners. I suppose that is arguable. But I suppose 12 commissioners, as long as they are working commissioners, would be appropriate. Other members have also indicated that we feel very strongly that a significant number must be residents of northern Canada, as well as being knowledgeable about northern Canadian issues.

I do not think there is any question that those who have spent their entire lives, or a major part of their lives, living in the north or working in the north would be appropriate to be named as members of the commission because we see these commissioners as not being a typical board of directors but, in fact, very much working commissioners.

In conclusion, it is important that the commission report to Parliament. If there is one thing that the Parliament of Canada is interested in, and perhaps ought to be much more interested in, it is what is going on in our northern regions. Therefore the suggestion that the commission report directly to a minister and through that minister to Parliament is appropriate. This of course would assume that all of the commission's reports, including an annual report on the state of polar research in Canada and elsewhere, should be made public, tabled in Parliament and then sent to provincial and territorial governments and to other interested institutions and persons.

The budget of the commission needs to be adequate. I know that we have been given a basic budget that outlines what ought to be included. But I must say that in my first examination of this budget I think it is extremely modest. The work required of the commission in the first few months of its existence is critical, especially in terms of its establishing its credibility in the eyes not only or our scientific community but of Canadians generally. Without being specific about areas of the budget which I would like to see increased, and there are two or three which probably could be even decreased, a substantially larger financial commitment would be appropriate. However, I will leave that matter until we get into discussing this legislation at the committee.

We support this bill in principle. We believe it requires a very specific and clear mandate. We believe that it ought not to overlap with work being done presently and that it ought not to involve itself with work that can be better done by others.

We look forward to the work in the the legislative committee and to hearing not only appropriate witnesses from the aboriginal people and various research organizations, but interested people in northern development, as we define the north, to ensure that the commission not only is an effective and efficient commission but the best polar commission going.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke) moved that Bill C-300, an act to amend the Criminal Code (obscenity) be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, in a statement on February 8, I brought to the attention of the House an incident that had occurred involving a lingerie company's catalogue that had been delivered to residents on three Canadian Forces Bases in Ontario.

The catalogue in question arrived unwrapped and contained pictures that are obscene. In many cases children in the families were the first to see the catalogue. This has upset many parents who feel that their fundamental right to choose what is acceptable or not has been challenged. This is best described by a paragraph in a newspaper article which states:

> The call for changes was sparked by a full-colour booklet that contained pictures of semi-clad women sent to residents of three military bases in Ontario late last year.
> Porrier, who was offended when one of the 30-page catalogues arrived in her mailbox, was angry that it arrived without an envelope to prevent children from seeing it.

She and others have since complained.

That is why I bring this bill forward. I will read the first paragraph of the bill which really sets out its purpose. It states:

> 1. The Criminal Code is amended by adding, immediately after section 168 thereof, the following:
> "168.1 (1) Everyone who makes use of the mails for the purpose of transmitting or delivering unsolicited visually obscene material is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Hence the purpose of the bill is to strengthen the provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with the mailing of obscene material.

The targeting of Canadian Forces Bases was unfortunate and a bad judgment call in itself. It indicates that the producer felt that he was tapping a willing market. This was insulting to those people. Content aside, this fact provoked those who received the catalogue.

In her letter to me one resident said:

> My right to choose what is acceptable, or not acceptable in my home has been challenged—I feel violated. My freedom to choose has been taken from me. And something that I do not wish, has been thrust upon me.

In an effort to obtain some answers I wrote to Canada Post asking for an explanation of the review process that governs any distribution. I will just read one paragraph of that letter to Canada Post in which I stated:

> From your legal point of view, I understand that the circulation of this catalogue does not violate any Canadian laws. I would like to clarify Canada Post's position on this issue. What criteria applies to the distribution of publications that might be deemed by some to be obscene? What is the review process that governs any distribution? What standards are applied to the distribution itself?

I got a reply from Canada Post. In part, it reads as follows:

> The Corporation is obliged to deliver mail which is tendered to it which does not violate the provisions of—the Criminal Code and the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act—
> In your letter you have asked what review process is used to govern the distribution of unaddressed admail and what standards are applied to the distribution itself. The standards which are applied are those which are set by the Criminal Code—The review process which is used provides that where the employee at Canada Post Corporation who receives the mail piece believes that it may be obscene, he may refer this matter to his superiors who can then contact our Legal Affairs Branch for a legal opinion on the matter. Through our divisional and national control centres, it is possible for an employee to complete this process within a very short period of time, usually within a matter of hours.

My reasons for introducing the bill are these, and I have stated some already. There is an obvious lack of clarity in the Criminal Code with regard to such mailings. There is no question about that.

In introducing this bill I am seeking to strengthen the Criminal Code by providing stronger guidelines for Canada Post. This bill will make it possible to respect people's right of choice and what they consider to be their codes of morality.

It is realized that there are varied opinions on this mailing. Many people would not think twice about it, whereas others are extremely upset by it.

Therefore, what I am endeavouring to do is to provide through legislation a reason for Canada Post to improve the standards of packaging of such items, thus forcing the producers to reconsider their packaging and mailing methods. In doing so we will also be protecting the right of choice and respecting people's moral standards.

The catalogue in question arrived unwrapped and contained pictures that are borderline obscenity or pornography. In many cases children in the families were the first to see the catalogue. As a result, Mr. Speaker, you can understand why some parents were justifiably upset.

The Fraser committee into prostitution and pornography in Canada has recommended more context sensitive and precise definitions of obscenity. Unfortunately, these legislative amendments have not been adopted. For that reason I have introduced Bill C-300.

In introducing this bill, I am seeking to strengthen the Criminal Code by providing stronger guidelines for Canada Post. This bill makes it possible to respect people's rights of choice.

At present, Canada Post is simply following the guidelines that it has to work on. It will continue to do so. It claims that it is not up to it to monitor the mail. It probably reacts more than it acts, although some of the things that come to its attention are certainly questioned. But there is a great area in between that is very questionable.

In this bill I am trying to put a clarification into the Criminal Code as to the meaning of obscenity and to strengthen the hands of Canada Post by amending the Criminal Code accordingly. I would appreciate it very much if the House would take these matters into serious consideration. The very fact that the producer of this particular catalogue targeted three military bases in Canada without sending it at that time to other communities in Canada shows that he had a lack of respect and a lack of judgment for those communities, and I do not think that is fair ball. The Criminal Code should be there to protect people from these publications, if they do not want to receive them. That can only be done if we put the guidelines in for Canada Post to follow.

I thank members of the House for their attention.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to discuss Bill C-300, which would amend the Criminal Code to include a provision dealing with one aspect of the mailing of obscene matter.

The control of pornography and obscenity has been a concern to Canadians for a long time. It is connected with our concerns about sexual assault and also the way in which our society views women and children.

The report of the Special Committee on Pornography and Prostitution, the Fraser committee, which was referred to by the hon. member who introduced this bill, concluded that there were two kinds of harm flowing from pornography. The first was the offence to the general public who were involuntarily exposed to it. The second was the broader social harm to the values of equality that are enshrined in Section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I know the hon.

member voted in favour of the enshrinement of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

We are not alone in attempting to deal with this concern. The Attorney General's Commission on Pornography in the United States recently supported an attack on pornography. In its final report it concluded that the problem was in some ways getting worse.

In Canada, the Criminal Code has contained provisions against the sale and distribution of obscene material for a number of years. Other federal legislative provisions deal with it as well. For example, the customs tariffs have prohibited the importation of materials of an immoral or indecent character. Provincial legislators have created censorship laws and bodies to enforce them and municipalities have regulated the sale and display of obscene publications within their jurisdiction.

However, the legal scene has changed since the charter came into force in 1982, enshrining as fundamental freedoms in section 2(b) the "freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication".

Chief Justice Dickson recently wrote that freedom of expression was entrenched in the Constitution "so as to ensure that everyone can manifest their thoughts, opinions, beliefs, indeed all expressions of the heart and mind, however unpopular, distasteful or contrary to the mainstream".

In our consideration of the issue of pornography, as with many other issues in Canadian life, the charter has created a number of situations in which values must be weighed against one another and a policy developed that will meet our concerns about a social problem while at the same time respecting the fundamental freedom of others. This weighing process must take into account not only the situation of a person attempting to sell hard core pornography, but also other concerns such as artistic or literary merit and the needs of the scientific and medical communities for technical literature that might in other contexts be considered obscene.

This bill would, for instance, prohibit the mailing of a book containing reproductions of some of the greatest works of art. The legislators will attempt this reconciliation of values and interests.

The problem with this proposed bill is that it attempts to deal with a very difficult problem. I commend the hon. member for introducing this bill because it is a difficult problem. But I believe it is being dealt with in a piecemeal fashion.

We must bear in mind the importance of this fundamental freedom and the careful balance that must be made in attempting to reduce its protections. In that it has not fully balanced considerations such as the one that I mentioned about artistic and other community values, I say that this bill is premature. I strongly suggest that this is a matter that should be reviewed in full and in detail by the Minister of Justice as part of a complete package before any legislative action is taken.

I would ask that the Minister of Justice proceed to give us a legislative package that we can work on.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I rise to enter this debate on Bill C-300, introduced by the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke. I also acknowledge the incident that the hon. member set forward as the reason for his letter and his bill. We can certainly understand the unsolicited nature of the material that was sent to these particular residences.

It seems though that the unsolicited nature of the material arriving is more to the point than the actual definition of obscenity that the hon. member has put forward in this particular piece of legislation. The difficulty that I have with the Private Member's Bill is the definition that is put forward in this particular piece of legislation.

The matter of obscenity is one that has consumed individuals and legislators for quite some period of time in order to find the balance between what is acceptable and would allow artists and other individuals to have the freedom to express themselves. On the other side of the coin is what society abhors and would not want to have our children and other individuals see.

It is obviously a matter of censorship and where do we draw that line. It is something that has been going on for ages and it will continue. It is something with which we will deal. There was an attempt in the last Parliament to deal with certain aspects of it.

Section 168 of the Criminal Code provides:

> 168. Every one commits an offence who makes use of the mails for the purpose of transmitting or delivering anything that is obscene, indecent, immoral or scurrilous, but this section does not apply to a person who makes use of the mails for the purpose of transmitting or delivering anything mentioned in Section 166(4).

Section 166(4) outlines exceptions to the offence created by that section which I just read with respect to the restriction on the publication of various reports of judicial proceedings. If a Crown prosecutor or anybody else was dealing with some obscene material as set out under this section, they would be able to be transmitted through the mail to these individuals. They would not be caught by this section. This is the only restriction that applies to this particular section. I would indicate that the matter has already been dealt with in the Criminal Code.

The hon. member's proposed bill would add another section after the one that I have just cited, basically dealing with unsolicited obscene material.

Mr. Hopkins: "Visually obscene material". You are not on the same subject.

Mr. Atkinson: Visually obscene material, and I grant that that is what is in the bill as proposed. As I indicated, it is already a crime to send obscene, indecent, immoral or scurrilous materials through the mails. If this particular material was considered under that subsection, it would be obviously caught by that particular matter.

What is the definition of obscene? The statutory definition of obscene materials is those in which there is an undue exploitation of sex or of sex and violence.

The exact nature of unacceptable images and written descriptions is not set out in the Criminal Code but has been left to judicial interpretation. The courts have based their interpretation on what is referred to as the community standard of tolerance.

With respect to the community standards test, guidance is provided by the following statement from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in its 1984 decision in Towne Cinema Theatres Ltd.:

> What matters is not what Canadians think is right for themselves to see. What matters is what Canadians would not abide other Canadians seeing because it would be beyond the contemporary standard of tolerance to allow them to see it.

This is an objective standard that is decided by individuals in the community through a jury trial. They apply this particular standard to what they consider to be visually obscene material or any obscene material in any other medium.

This has proven to be a good way to deal with the matter, because a jury of the peers in that community are the ones who decide what is tolerated within that particular community.

It is something that shifts, as well, over time. That is the reason that obscene or visually obscene has not been defined in the Criminal Code up to this particular time. I think we can all agree that over the years that line has shifted as standards change within a particular community.

That is the reason that judicial interpretation has been used for this particular definition of obscene. It has proved to be a workable definition relating to each individual community.

If we take a moment to examine what is presented by the hon. member in Bill C–300, we will see that the proposal is an amendment as I mentioned immediately following Section 168. It would introduce a special restriction on the use of the mails for unsolicited, visually obscene material.

Visually obscene material is defined in this bill to include "any matter or thing in or on which is depicted (a) a nude person; (b) a female person who is not nude but whose breasts or any part thereof is not covered by something which is not non–transparent; (c) a person who is not nude but whose (i) genitalia or any part thereof is not covered by something which is not non–transparent, or (ii) buttocks or any part thereof is not covered by something which is not non–transparent."

The bill obviously is based on two concerns. First, that the mails are used to distribute materials which include depictions containing nudity or revealing any part of the buttocks, genitalia, or the female breast. Second, that the mails are used to send such materials when they are unsolicited.

That is more the concern that I would read into this particular bill and also from what the hon. member mentioned as the incident precipitating this particular piece of legislation being brought forward.

We have to think for a moment about how far–reaching such an amendment would be. I will give an example which I think would raise some concern for members of this House.

If an individual was given a subscription to Sports Illustrated and then subsequently the swimsuit edition of Sports Illustrated arrived at an individual's home, it would be considered to be on an unsolicited basis. I would dare to say that from the definition included in this particular bill, from what I have just read, that particular issue of Sports Illustrated would be considered obscene. At the very least some portion of a female breast is depicted as well as possibly bare buttocks, but it is considered one of the tamer forms of available publications. If this publication is caught by this law, one can see what difficulties would ensue.

It is a real difficulty to define what is obscene. My hon. friend has made an attempt to do it, but I would submit that what has occurred in trying to define visually obscene material is that the standard has been drawn too tightly and not something that should be decided by each individual community as set out already in the Criminal Code.

I have other concerns with the proposed bill as well. In my view a provision of this nature would be anomalous. It creates a special statutory definition of obscene with respect to using the mails for unsolicited, visually obscene material. That definition would be different from the definition used for obscenity in other sections of the Criminal Code. There would be this difference for one type of material as opposed to another.

In trying to deal with the whole aspect of obscenity and pornography, it would create a great deal of difficulty. As my friend, the hon. member for Mississauga West indicated, it is probably a premature matter. I commend the member for his attempt at the unsolicited aspect of it. In defining obscenity, I think he would run into these difficulties with the piece of legislation that is put forward.

Between 1977 and 1988 there were 43 bills introduced into Parliament, including six public bills to change the law governing pornography. The most recent of these was Bill C-54 which died on the Order Paper on October 1, 1988 when Parliament was dissolved. That bill proposed to define as illegal the visual presentation of explicit sexual behaviour which was further defined in detail. Arts, literary, museum, and media groups, as well as the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, considered the definition of pornography to be too broad because it included explicit sex.

We are dealing with a definition in the proposed Bill C-300 which does not even refer to specific sexual acts. Bill C-54 caused a great deal of controversy, not only for the reverse onus that it put on an individual, but as I mentioned for the various groups that felt the definition of pornography included in it would restrict a lot of people, to the point, having sat on a library board in my municipality, where the library board and the officers of the library were concerned that they could be called to account for this book or whatever they had in their library. It does create some concerns.

Obviously that piece of legislation is important and something that should be revisited. Everyone in this House abhors the depictions of sexual violence against women and sexual acts against children. It is something that should be dealt with. We will have to try to work toward a definition and a process that will allow us to do that.

It is interesting that in 1987 an Angus Reid poll found that only 37 per cent of Canadians thought the definition of pornography should include depictions of sexual intercourse between consenting adults. Therefore one might conclude from this that the majority of Canadians consider nudity or partial nudity in visual presentations to be acceptable.

Quite frankly, in my view, if one looks at the community standards test to which I referred earlier, I rather doubt that most Canadians would be intolerant of their neighbour sending or receiving a subscription to a magazine or catalogue as was mentioned.

The unsolicited aspect of it, as I say, is the matter that my friend is trying to get at, but with the definition that is included here I do not believe that we could support the bill. We will go on from there. I believe it is inopportune at this time to consider any amendments to the Criminal Code to deal with the matter of pornography or obscenity.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to voice my objections to Bill C-300, the purpose of which is to amend the Criminal Code to make the mailing of unsolicited visually obscene material an offence. Mr. Speaker, my objections obviously do not arise from a belief that such practices should be encouraged but are based on the fact that this amendment is not useful. Its substance is remarkably vague. It is the reverse, Mr. Speaker, of that spirit of tolerance that encourages most Canadians to support the free expression of ideas and the free distribution of photographic, audio-visual or other material.

The Criminal Code provides that using the mails to transmit obscene, indecent, immoral or scurrilous material constitutes an offence.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the proposed amendment is to broaden the concept of obscenity, but only when the mails are used, since the other sections of the Code dealing with the use of obscene material are not affected by these amendments.

I can well imagine that some people do not appreciate receiving letters or packages in the mail containing pictures or photographs of persons who are nude or whose bodies are not decently covered. Fortunately, the Criminal Code prohibits such practices when the content is indecent or obscene.

However, the scope of this amendment would seem to be far too broad. If it were passed, it would be possible to prosecute, under the Criminal Code, a person who uses, for commercial or other purposes, works of art or nude or semi-nude persons represented therein.

Strictly speaking, the proposed amendment would make it an offence to send by mail photographs of the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel, just because a person of the female sex is not entirely covered. Imagine!

Mr. Bellemare: And of the male sex!

Mr. Jourdenais: And also of the male sex, my colleague is perfectly right! What about Adam?

So, Madam Speaker, considering the tenor of my comments, it is probably unnecessary to stress the problems with interpretation—as you know, the same subject may elicit varying interpretations,—often leading to 20-minute arguments and speeches in the House—as well as the uncertainty the bill would cause if it were passed.

We need only consider how difficult it would be to determine exactly what the word "covered", used twice in the amendment proposed by the hon. member, is supposed to mean. What happens to the snapshot or that well-known ad where we see a child with part of its buttocks open to view? A baby—and this is supposed to be obscene? Can we reasonably claim that this snapshot is obscene? However, Bill C-300 before the House today criminalizes the mailing of such photographs. Does anyone disapprove of this kind of photograph? I think the hon. member is pushing obscenity too far.

There are of course any number of examples, but I am confident that my colleagues here in the House, and we are not supposed to comment on those who are absent, Madam Speaker, they are perfectly right— However, I am sure they would feel the same way I do about the bill before the House today and its lack of precision.

Madam Speaker, Canadians don't want reactionary measures that will make our country the laughing stock of the rest of the world. Canadians have shown, and continue to show, tolerance for the views of others. As far as obscenity is concerned, tolerance is especially important and desirable, considering the wide range of opinions in our society on what should be considered obscene.

This tolerance has been expressed on many occasions, and the government must try to promote tolerance with legislation that is appropriate to the circumstances.

To paraphrase a former Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, Justice Potter Stewart, it is very difficult to define obscenity. However, Madam Speaker, one thing is certain: We know it when we see it.

Madam Speaker, how can anyone claim to see anything obscene in a photograph of the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel or of Michelangelo's David? Nevertheless, that is the kind of conclusion forced on us by the amendment proposed by the hon. member which gives a definition of obscenity which, I am sure, fails to meet any of the current standards of Canadian society.

Once again, Madam Speaker, I am not saying that all Canadians should be delighted to receive pictures in the mail that may be somewhat offensive. My point is that our legislation already provides that this use of the mails is illegal when our society's standard of tolerance is exceeded.

The question is not necessarily what the individual considers to be in good taste, but how far Canadians are prepared to tolerate certain things and to what extent their tolerance level has been exceeded in each specific case.

Madam Speaker, with respect, Bill C-300 merely imposes a view of the world that no longer corresponds to current standards in Canadian society. The bill tabled by the hon. member opposite makes illegal what the vast majority of Canadians do not consider to be obscene.

In cases where there is genuinely obscene material, the Criminal Code provides that this is an offence. I see no reason to go beyond what the Criminal Code already provides. We as Canadians are proud of the range of opinions and views expressed in our society and of our ability to respect them.

Madam Speaker, we must not undermine this tolerance, which is our strength as a people, by passing legislation whose impact is considerable and goes well beyond the existing social consensus on the difficult question of obscenity.

For six years I have seen and heard the hon. member opposite in this House, and I know him to be very respected and a man of extraordinary integrity. Before drafting my speech, I gave the matter considerable thought, but I cannot accept Bill C-300, for all the reasons I just mentioned.

Therefore, Sir, I cannot support your bill.

[English]

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for bringing forward this motion and I think it is certainly a measure worthy of consideration.

I trust that the minister will report to the justice committee on this important matter in a reasonable period of time. I, too, think it should be looked at as part of a larger package.

I have some specific concerns about the proposed motion, because the kind of pornography that I would like banned is much more specific. It is not simple nudity. I personally do not have any problem with the portrayal of women's bodies. I do not think that is pornography. What I and I believe most people are really concerned about is when women's bodies, children's bodies and men's bodies are portrayed in a degrading or dehumanizing way. It is the type of portrayal that frequently sends a hate message to society.

I think this legislation is too general to address such an issue. It is suggesting that the depiction of women's bodies in general is wrong or hateful. The bill is much too simple and would require a number of amendments.

The kind of legislation that I would support would attack the worst of the pornography that is in our society. Most of us can agree on what is generally offensive material, which is material that combines violence with nudity or children being used in a sexual way. We can only really attack the worst kinds of pornography in our society through legislation but even that is a small part of the total answer to this problem.

As a media studies teacher, this is one of the subjects that we were trying to grapple with. Legislation can never address the influences upon young people in our society and the tremendous amount of mainstream pornography that confronts us. Pornography can be far more insidious because many people do not even know when they are seeing material that dehumanizes other human beings.

For example, if one looks through a popular women's magazine that one could find on the stands in a Loblaws store or any other supermarket, one can see pictures and products that promote rape myths about women. You will see pictures in which women are depicted as enjoying pain and being violated. You will see pictures that treat women as things, simply there for sexual purposes. There are images of domination and violence against women in our society, making other people think this is sexually attractive.

Think of some of the names of products in our society that suggest that women are, in fact, simply meant to be violated. I think of products with names like Impulse, which suggests that women are always ready, or Poison, the perfume. A recent Calvin Klein Obsession ad frequently depicts a woman surrounded by a group of young men. In some of them, there was a hazy type of photography used, so that it appeared that everybody was nude. We had what was being used simply to sell Calvin Klein perfume or the Calvin Klein name for jeans and so on, the picture of what was, in effect, a teen gang bang.

To young people in our society, these kinds of images infiltrate their consciousness. It looks to them as if this is fun. However, of course, when we hear from rape victims, it is no fun at all.

In one unit in my program in media studies we had a play and discussion on date rape. The particular play pointed out many of the myths about young women and about what happens in a particular date scene, and some of the myths that young men have about women as well. For example, when a young woman wears a sexy dress, some young men may think that she is looking for more than a simple date. At that particular session when we talked with the students, three young female students actually collapsed and experienced a tremendous traumatic feeling about the whole thing because it had happened to them. We were prepared for this in advance and, as teachers, had to deal with these children. They were taken out of the room and talked to. They were just ordinary young girls that had gone out on a date, expecting to go out on a date, expecting to have fun, go to a movie with a young man, and ended up being raped. That was three in a group of about 100 young people.

In fact, one hears some young men say things like "she was looking for it". What gives some young men the idea that when a young girl wears an attractive dress she is looking for more than a good time, that we all think is a good time? I think it is the constant invasion into the minds of young people through the media. It is totally unavoidable. If one looks at ads in the subway, even in the city as we drive around, one can constantly see images of young women looking as if they enjoy being violated.

I think of another ad in which shoes are being sold. In fact, I can think of several shoe ads. In one particular ad in Vogue, the woman's head looked like it was being kicked. Her expression, of course, was a dull kind of expression, the eyes sort of glazed over, and her mouth was very large and open with very large pink lips. Again, a very sexy looking attractive face combined with a violent action. It looks to people, in the subconscious very frequently, as if pain and sexuality are attractive.

This kind of insidious attack in our society is something that is really frightening. This is one reason why, in Ontario, media studies education has been made a mandatory part of the curriculum. It is also one reason why I am very concerned about copyright legislation. There are many advertisers who do not want teachers to look at their material and decode it with students. I am sure they would certainly like to attack many media studies teachers when they examine these sorts of things in classrooms, because we do copy them, make slides out of some of the ads, and go over what is happening so that the students can see how they are being manipulated when they go out into society.

Rock videos are some absolutely startling examples of mainstream pornography that certainly are very, very damaging. Almost always young male rock singers dominate women. Women are depicted as things. They very frequently have uniform-like outfits on. They do not do anything; they are just there to look attractive. They are seldom playing instruments. They are simply sex objects. They are there, I am sure quite consciously on the part of the rock video makers, simply to be a sexy figure that is associated.

The young men almost invariably are placed higher on the stage. The woman is always down. The woman is only there for the purpose of appearing sexy. There are many insidious things that rock videos do besides dealing with sexuality. They also depict authority figures in a very negative fashion. So, it extends much further than just women.

Education is probably the best answer to the problems of mainstream pornography throughout our society. An alert and aware population, that can see when it is being manipulated, can counteract the insidious influence in our society.

I have also thought that we should be rewarding, using a positive approach, rather than just dealing with it through legislation. We could provide awards for the positive values that are presented by advertisers and by the media. One can see many examples of advertising that exerts a very positive influence in our society. It is very effective. Rather than this constant preoccupation with negative values, if positive values were promoted by advertisers, they would probably sell better products and society would be better as a result.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to rise to speak to this bill sponsored by a long-term member of Parliament, my friend from the Official Opposition.

Private Member's hour reflects the best of the Parliament. It has changed over our joint tenure in the House, his much longer than mine of course. In the past, Private Members' bills would go year after year being talked out and going to the bottom of the list. They had virtually no chance of ever coming to the fore.

Private Members' Business today has much more significance. It does not mean a bill always goes through the first time, the second time, or even the third time, but because a certain number of bills are drawn and have to come to a vote. The government, and certainly the bureaucracy, have to spend much more time thinking about Private Members' bills. I commend my friend for taking the time to develop a bill for us to debate. This helps the people of the country see what we are about.

The intent is certainly legitimate. There is absolutely no doubt that there are major abuses of the obscenity legislation as defined in the Criminal Code. We can all recognize them on the extreme end of obscenity. We would all agree that there are abuses and, indeed, the existing Criminal Code does a pretty good job on it.

The problem we run across as legislators, of course, is in the middle where we are trying to draw the specific line at artistic freedom, and between our own personal beliefs of what is right and wrong and what is acceptable and unacceptable. When something crosses the line, we should use the full weight of society—all the police forces and the judicial system—by throwing people in jail for short or even long periods of time for breaking the laws. The longer I have been here, the more hesitant I have become to substitute my view for the many views that exist in the community. I guess it reflects a number of counterbalancing pressures that we find.

Having said that, there is no doubt that it is up to Parliament, after a sufficient amount of debate and consideration of different types of bills, to come up with a decision. Our distinguished friend has put forward his proposal.

To a certain extent, it depends on which area of the country one is from. There is no doubt that my riding has a more small "c" conservative view on obscenity. There are pictures in books which would be more objectionable to more people in my riding than in certain other ridings. That reflects that I come from a constituency with a small city, small towns, many farmers, and some deeply fundamentalist religious groups that are truly and honestly offended.

Having said that, within the city of Lethbridge, a small city of 60,000 people, there are a group of people who are not nearly so offended. Indeed, they would argue passionately about my friend's definition which would define even a picture of a nude as obscene and not allow it to be sent through the mails. They would honestly and legitimately not agree with that because they are in no way offended. They refer back to the long historic development of humans and artistic freedom being able to depict these types of things.

I wish we could have a committee stage because I would ask my friend whether his definition would include even medical books that show a nude person for medical purposes. I know he personally would not intend that to be the case, but as I read the definition, I was a bit worried as to whether that would be covered. Maybe it would not. That is the advantage of the bill ultimately coming to a vote. It would then go off to a committee which could hear lawyers, church people, the artistic community, and ordinary citizens to get their perspective on this bill.

As I say, it depends a bit on whether one is from a big city or a small town. It depends on the region of the country we come from. As well, Canada is becoming more and more part of the global community. There is absolutely no doubt that our young people, having been raised on a diet of television, feel that the world is much smaller and much more theirs than do some of us who are older. That means, of course, with additional trade, commerce, and travel, that the world standard has to be taken into consideration.

As we move up to a broader level of generalization, we know that more individual perversity, odd, and queer things can occur. But in this country, since 1982 particularly, when we entrenched as part of our fundamental law freedom of association, freedom of speech, and freedom of religion, the country has been put into a whole new dynamic. That was eight years ago. Eight years in the life of a nation is a drop in the bucket. In eight years, the ideas of people change.

Fifty years ago some of today's Playboy magazines probably would have landed the publisher in jail. One hundred years ago they would have had their heads chopped off. We all know that in the criminal law we have gone from over 700 offences for which people would be killed by virtue of capital punishment. Canada has no offences on the civil side for which the state can impose capital punishment and we have just one in the military where capital punishment applies during active wars.

Our whole conception on a global basis is changing quite dramatically. Whenever Parliament draws a line, it is almost instantaneously out of touch with that infinite variety of relationships and attitudes that people display as we go from a rural society into an industrial society. Now we are moving into an even more complex type of society which people generally refer to as an information society. It is highly technological.

I think we should be careful. I very much appreciate the effort that my hon. friend has made. I am sure he will continue to push with this bill. I am sure he will put it on the list again and in one of the next sessions it will probably be drawn. Then members of Parliament will have to go through a very detailed process internally. We will have to listen to the witnesses who come to give their perspective on the bill. We will have to consult with our riding associations and people in our riding. Then we will have to stand, be counted, and draw a line. That is the way the system works.

Madam Speaker, I see my time has expired and I thank you for the time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre) moved that Bill C-255, an act to amend the Criminal Code (lotteries), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am very happy to have won the lottery which permits Bill C-255 to be dealt with at this time. I do not know how many Canadians are aware that the order in which bills appear for debate is chosen by lottery. It is something of an irony that the subject of the bill, which I am pleased to be able to address now, is lotteries, not the kind which chooses bills for debate in the House of Commons, but the lotteries which take a dollar or two away from ever-growing numbers of Canadian citizens with a very small likelihood of them winning or making any return at all.

I am not rising to oppose the principle of lotteries, although I do oppose them. All the studies show that lottery contributions constitute for the poorest in society a larger proportion of their income than of the average person or certainly of the well-to-do.

I have recently seen interesting studies which show that of all forms of gambling, including slot machines and horse racing, a person has the least likelihood of winning and the smallest return from a lottery. The provinces of our country and the states of the United States, where a lot of these statistics come from, take an ever-growing portion of the proceeds, amounting on the average to 49 and 50 per cent of all the proceeds while administrative costs amount to 35 per cent.

I am not putting forward a bill to prohibit lotteries. The purpose of this bill is to prohibit the advertising of lotteries. I am hoping to be able to demonstrate to the House in the next few minutes that this second best way of dealing with the social problem would really go a long way to putting lotteries and gambling back into the place to which they should be limited to in our society.

There is no better way to tell the story than to tell the House about my own experience as a member of Parliament when I was first elected in the days when all forms of lotteries were illegal in Canada.

[Translation]

It was during the 70s. There were two kinds of gambling in our society, at a time when lotteries were illegal. There was the Irish Sweepstakes, which was very successful. We had a network of ticket vendors—at least one in each community—who sent the money to Ireland, and we had a percentage of the winners. It was common knowledge at the time that the Irish government used the money to finance hospitals in Ireland.

[English]

That was one of the great forms of gambling that we had in the days before lotteries became legal. The other is the illegal numbers racket which plays a very small part, if any part at all, in Canadian society today. I remember when I had something to do with policing in Canada, taking a more than average interest in how the numbers racket was progressing. I learned that organized crime no longer looked to it as a great source of funds any more. In other words, the introduction of the lottery had achieved two very good purposes which were the evils that I addressed as a legislator when I was persuaded to support the idea of a state-run Canadian lottery.

• (1320)

Why should we export gambling money out of Canada for the purpose of building hospitals in other countries when the money could be kept in Canada and used for our own social purposes?

Second, knowing of a human weakness that leads certain people to gamble, why should we drive them to the underworld for the expression of that personal weakness, allow organized crime to profit from it and foster a criminal lifestyle for all the people who are involved in that illegal way of gambling?

I supported the bill which was presented to the House of Commons. There were lots of moral arguments for and against gambling. In the city of Toronto where I come from, I would say that most people, and I am talking now about a community which is probably more Christian than any other religion, consider gambling wrong. Yet there is no unanimous opinion about that even within the Christian faith.

Since my interest in this subject has come forward I have had arguments with Catholic theologians who want to make the point, if I get them correctly—and I certainly invite them to speak for themselves—that whether gambling is moral or immoral depends on what is done with the proceeds. If the proceeds are used for moral purposes, it is moral. If they are used for immoral purposes, it is not.

For me there is a larger question. In the culture of Toronto, there is a work ethic associated with earning and a sense, which I must say I share, that the best way to make money is to work for it. Societies where that is a value, benefit from the work ethic. In a society where gambling is an equally available way of making money, you find more and more, as I do in my own community, that if you ask the young kids how you can get rich nowadays, the only two things they will suggest are winning a lottery or becoming a rock star.

Part of that comes from the tremendous amount of advertising that lotteries now enjoy in Canadian society. I want to make the point that the level of advertising is just too high and invite the House, which enabled the provinces to run these state lotteries, to change the law so that they will no longer be able to advertise them.

I do not think it is the responsibility of the state to stop people from doing foolish things with their money. It is a free country. If people want to waste their money, if they want to gamble with it, it should be up to them. But I do not think the state should encourage people to do foolish things with their money.

I want to talk about some of the forms of advertising that I have seen. It becomes obvious that having the state encourage people to express a character weakness, encouraging them to spend money on lotteries which have odds that are not usually disclosed to the people who buy lottery tickets, there is really no other conclusion but to say that a small investment, a small gamble by someone who can afford it, is not a very big problem. But as we see the statistics which show who gambles, how quickly it is increasing, and how much is being spent on gambling, what a substantial percentage of some of the low incomes in Canadian society, I really feel we have a responsibility, not to stop people from foolishly wasting their money, but at least, as I have said, not to encourage them to do so.

The advertisement that inspired me to put this resolution together and bring it forward is one from my own province of Ontario. It is an advertisement which asks people who are thinking of gambling to always bet the same number. They tell you to pick your lucky number and run with that number. I have checked with the officials and apparently this works by encouraging people day after day, week after week to always pick their same lucky number and to bet it every time and that they will have a better chance of winning than if they just bet a different number every time.

A mathematician can tell you that the odds of any number winning are exactly the same, whether it is the same one you bet yesterday, or a new one. So in a sense it is a measure of false advertising to tell people directly or indirectly that they have a better chance of winning by betting the same number every single day.

The insidious purpose of having people pick a number and then bet the same number every day is that they then feel beckoned to bet every time a lottery comes along. The next phase of that advertising campaign was that now you have a number, don't let a day go by with a lottery for which you did not buy a ticket because that could be the day that your number came up. If you bet a different number every day, they would not have that argument. It is a powerful argument and one to which more and more people are succumbing, even though the argument is totally illogical.

Last summer, there were a series of advertisements in the province of Ontario that led to this bill being drafted. The advertisements reminded people that even while they were away at their cottages the lotteries were being run. So, even while you are at your cottage, make sure that a day does not go by without you having bought a ticket that day because your lucky number may come up.

When I saw that advertisement, I thought that it just had gone too far. Surely there is a responsibility at the level where these lotteries were conceived, which was in this place, to examine the degree to which lotteries are being increasingly used. I would also like to see an examination of the amount of advertising money that is spent, the percentage of the proceeds that is used for good works, compared to the percentage that is used for ever-increasing amounts of advertising. I want to commend this bill to the House.

I can see by members opposite nodding that they would be prepared to give this bill all three readings today. I would be content simply to see the bill referred to a committee. I think it would be a desirable thing to do because when and if this bill becomes law, it imposes a sanction that applies only to provincial governments. Therefore, since only they are allowed to run lotteries in the country of the sort that I am proposing to limit advertising for, it ought to go to committee.

Provincial governments and their lottery corporations should be given notice of our concerns. We should have research staff and some studies should be done in a Canadian context which would show the extent to which gambling is increasing and the extent to which the advertising of lotteries is becoming a bigger and bigger part of the cost of the whole business.

Also I certainly think it would be worth while to study the impact of buying lottery tickets on the families and on the individuals who are buying lottery tickets.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I thank you, and I hope that this bill will at least be referred to a parliamentary committee.

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am in a little jam on this one. I agree with much of what the member has just said about gambling per se, but I find it difficult to support his motion. I guess what bothers me is that he was part of the government that brought in Lotto Canada and now he wants to restrict the advertising of it. I find that a bit of a contradiction, particularly since the member bringing this measure forward was Solicitor General for about four years between 1980 and 1984 and had ample opportunity at that time to bring forth the kind of measure that he is talking about now. He could have encouraged it in the cabinet at that time. Maybe he did and was not successful, I do not know.

I remember when Lotto Canada was introduced with fanfare. It was our belief that the federal government should not be in the gambling business. I remember that you had to be very well connected to the Liberal Party to get a franchise for selling Lotto Canada tickets. I remember most of all how a colleague of mine whose wife was contacted to be an agent for Lotto Canada. Somehow the communications had got mixed up in the Liberal Party and they thought that she was connected with the office of one of the Liberal members of Parliament. After she had been offered the franchise, they found out much to their chagrin that she was not the person they thought she was. She said "Well, that's fine. I don't really need it. I have an appointment with The Globe and Mail anyway." All of a sudden the franchise was forthcoming. That is the first thing I remember about Lotto Canada. The second thing I remember was the time that boxes of Lotto Canada tickets were missing.

When we formed the government in 1979 we were convinced that the federal government should not be in the lottery business in the first place. We divested ourselves of that under the leadership of the Right Hon. Joe Clark. We divested ourselves of that business because we did not believe that we should be doing it. We turned it over to the provinces for their administration and for their financial profit.

I do not hold to the lottery business at all. I have to say to the member, who was a member of the government at that time, since his government brought the lotto business into Canada, how did he expect the business to be propagated, by word of mouth? You know "Hey, pal, I've got a ticket"? No, no. There was going to be advertising, and there was. If you will recall, there was heavy advertising on television of Lotto Canada tickets at the time. There was no hint that we should not be doing it at the time. Now we have it under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

This is what bothers me most of all about his motion, that at one time it was in the federal domain and there was nothing in the legislation at that time to restrict advertising of the lottery system. Now that it is in the provincial domain, we are supposed to restrict advertising for lotteries. I grant him that particularly lifestyle advertising is injurious and leads people to believe in some fantasies that are unhealthy, and that is not good. He has just cited the reason for bringing in the legislation tabled, and it happens to be Ontario advertising, and it could have been any other province as well, but has he made any overtures to the Government of Ontario, who are his soul mates? Has he asked it about the advertising it is doing so that it does not propagate what could become a disease, a fixation in advertising?

Once one introduces a measure like lotteries—I would rather that it would not be here—and then tells the provinces: "Here is what you cannot do with it," there is an element of paternalism that enters into it. I cannot believe that the provinces are going to be happy with any kind of instruction from the federal government about what is or what is not acceptable about the way they promote what we have already given them the right to promote.

I cannot believe that the provinces think they are so immature in the whole area of ethics, morality and promotion of this that they need guidance from the federal government on how guidelines ought to be set up for the promotion of this industry.

The hon. member's other point is that low income people tend to use their disposable income, of which they have a restricted amount, to buy lottery tickets that they may not be able to afford. This hurts them. If that is the pattern, I agree that it does. Would he then also suggest that, for example, if there is a higher percentage of cigarette smoking among low income people that there ought to be a diminished amount of advertising toward them, or that we ought to take fewer tax dollars from them? Should we increase the taxes for them?

Once one gets into a kind of socioeconomic grouping, I think one runs into trouble. I wonder about penny stocks. If there is ever an arena for gambling, it is in the whole area of penny stocks. Maybe that should be included. I guess the biggest problem that I have is the serious degree to which legislation like this could antagonize the provincial governments. I do not think we need that kind of confrontation in federal-provincial relations.

Now that we have an industry that I do not support and that I do not think is good, but which is entirely within the domain of the provinces, we ought to let the provinces do it and not try to pass legislation that instructs them in a kind of paternalistic way on how to conduct their activities.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, none of us in this House or anywhere in this country would want to support a vice that contributes to poverty or addiction, not even an addiction to gambling.

As we all know, this can very well lead to personal and social problems. This bill is just a little extreme. By legislating against advertising for provincially operated lotteries, we do not address the real concerns that I am certain lie behind this bill. Canadians allow a rather ironic situation to exist in the legal status of gambling.

As the hon. member for York Centre pointed out earlier, most Canadians look at gambling as morally wrong. At the same time, they are willing to accept it if the proceeds are used for socially acceptable uses.

The general approach toward gambling in Canada has been to prohibit all forms of gambling under the Criminal Code, except those that are specifically permitted under that code. At the same time, there are several forms of permitted gambling in Canada. Almost all of us are familiar with the betting that is permitted on games of chance and wheels of fortune at fairs and exhibitions across the country.

In the next few months—I am assuming we will get a parliamentary break and if we do—most of us will be visiting those fairs and exhibitions. We will see the games of chance. We will have our own opinions and moral judgments on whether they should be there or not. The fact remains that they are accepted as part of most of our summer fairs across Canada.

Most of us will also know that private bets between individuals who are not engaged in the business of betting are generally permitted. If I may offer a wager, I would wager that most members of this House participated in hockey pools during the recent Stanley Cup play-offs. Some of us will also have acquaintance with the permitted exception for paramutuel betting operated by race associations on horse races.

This latter permitted exception, as all members of the House will know, incorporates regulation by the federal Minister of Agriculture. These permitted exemptions notwithstanding, it is the permitted exemption for lottery schemes which has become the most well known form of gambling in Canada in recent years.

The Criminal Code creates a permitted exception to the prohibition against lotteries where a lottery scheme is directly operated by a province. As many of us will recall, in 1985 Parliament amended the Code to eliminate the permitted exception that had existed for the federal government to operate a lottery scheme.

Parliament has also enacted in the Criminal Code a permitted exception to the prohibition against lotteries where a province licenses a charitable or religious organization, the board of an annual fair or exhibition, or an operator of a concession, leased by a fair or exhibition board, to operate certain lottery schemes. These lottery schemes include bingos, certain types of casino games and what we would traditionally call a lottery or a draw. In very narrow circumstances, there is a permitted exception to the prohibition against lotteries where a province licenses an individual to conduct a lottery scheme. The cost of a chance to win in a licensed private lottery scheme must not exceed $2, and the value of each prize must not exceed $500.

It is only the permitted exception for a lottery scheme which is directly operated by a province that would be subject to the limitations in advertising contemplated in Bill C-255. If Parliament were to pass this bill into law, it would not affect any advertising that might be done for lotteries that are licensed by a province but which are not operated by a province. Should this bill pass, I fear that we would immediately throw the federal government into a pitched battle with the provinces. If it is passed, any person who broadcasts, publishes or posts an advertisement for a lottery that is directly operated by a province, would commit a crime, with the exception of a person who posts an advertisement inside a retail establishment.

Bill C-255 would also apply to a person who causes these advertisements to be made. The crime would be a hybrid offence. That is, the Crown could elect to proceed by way of the more serious indictable offence, or it could prosecute the offence as a summary conviction offence.

One immediately thinks of the television, radio and print media as contemplated offenders. On a closer look, one might think of provincial government officials and ultimately one would have to think of elected provincial government leaders.

Given that the conduct of lotteries as a permitted exception to the Criminal Code's prohibition against gambling has emerged from federal-provincial consultations, one can expect that provinces would look to the bill as a direct and nefarious attack. Nor is it inconceivable that those members of the public who participate in provincially-operated lotteries would be perturbed by a paternalism that would deprive them of access to information concerning lotteries and prize offerings. Many persons would view this proposed legislation as an attack on freedom of speech that would be difficult to justify as a reasonable limit imposed by law under Section 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I would like to think that this bill is not a mean-spirited attempt to take a deep-cutting swipe at revenues generated by provinces. I remind all that provincial lottery revenues are often used to fund community and sporting organizations. It may well be that the thinking behind this bill centres upon those individuals who become addicted to gambling and suffer the personal, family and professional difficulties, including the commission of crime to finance gambling. I am not insensitive to these problems. However, if this is the thinking that has inspired the bill, it would seem to me that there are better ways to cope with these problems than by invoking society's strongest sanction, the criminal law penalty against the advertising of provincial lotteries. Such approaches would necessarily involve the provinces, academics and therapists in the treatment of gambling addiction.

If there is a need to address concerns of compulsive gambling or gambling addiction, then the groundwork of statistical and therapeutic research should be laid and strategies to address the concern should be developed in concert between the provinces and interested parties. For this, much persuasive effort may be required to convince provincial governments. However, a criminal sanction should not be invoked against advertising the provincially-operated lotteries in order to address gambling addiction. If I am wrong and the intent of this bill is to take a big bite out of the provincial revenues from provincially-operated lotteries, the only conceivable object would be to force provinces to look at other means of revenue generation to make up any shortfall from lottery revenue losses.

Under Bill C-255, provinces could raise revenue through lotteries. However, they would have their lottery income reduced because they could not advertise. The elected members of provincial governments would be told that for the provinces' own good, Parliament had decided that provinces must prefer other methods of revenue generation to lotteries. Without getting into a debate on the morality of gambling in provincially operated lotteries, I simply note that in a society that does not share a homogeneous set of values it is impossible to find a consensus or even a widespread view that the advertising of provincially operated lottery schemes is morally repugnant or individually and socially harmful to the point of requiring the creation of criminal law sanction against the advertising of provincially operated lotteries.

Certainly public participation in provincially operated lotteries could be characterized presently as enthusiastic. This enthusiasm is not novel or is it unique to Canada as government lotteries have existed and flourished for centuries in some European countries.

Unlike many of the arguments against casinos, criticism of the operation of what are traditionally known as draws or lotteries focuses on revenue debates and primarily upon who contributes the revenue. This area is entangled with debate making value judgments about lottery gaming which is attractive to low income persons. The income of the participants is seen by some as a reason to limit the lotteries. Others say that the low income person should have the freedom to enjoy his recreation. These ethical issues turn on the philosophical debate about the individual freedom to participate in lotteries and considerations of government encouragement of consumption in the form of government operated lotteries. I doubt very much that Canadian society could find a consensus in this debate.

I do not feel that Bill C-255 should be supported. It wades into the heavy sea of ethics and philosophy to find a basis for criminal sanction against advertising provincially operated lotteries. Instead, the criminal sanction should only prohibit conduct which carries moral culpability or blameworthiness because it creates a risk of harm or because there is a need to express society's moral rejection of a conduct.

I do share the concern about gambling that was expressed by the hon. member for York Centre and reinforced by the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock, but I cannot support legislating restrictions against provincial advertising.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to rise in the House today to comment briefly on Bill C-255, whose purpose is to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code concerning lotteries.

With respect, I do not think this bill should be supported by the House. I do not question for a moment the excellent motives behind this bill. However, considering what is provided under the Criminal Code, the scope of the bill is such that it would practically wipe out what so far has been allowed. It would be like taking away with one hand what the other has given.

The purpose of Bill C-255 is to prohibit all kinds of advertising, except inside retail stores, for all kinds of lotteries which are authorized, in any case. Madam Speaker, perhaps I might recall for the benefit of hon. members what is provided in paragraph 207(1)(b) of the Criminal Code, to which the bill refers. This paragraph reads as follows:

> 207.(1) Notwithstanding any of the provisions of this Part relating to gaming and betting, it is lawful
> (b) for the government of a province, either alone or in conjunction with the government of another province, to conduct and manage a lottery scheme in that province, or in that and such other province, in accordance with any law enacted by the legislature of that province—

This means that the advertising ban would apply to authorized lotteries operated by any of the provinces. Madam Speaker, I find it hard to understand why only provincial lotteries are covered by this amendment. Why not allow advertising when lotteries are operated at exhibitions or fairs? What is the difference? Is the basis on which a charitable or religious organization operates this kind of system so different that it should be not allowed to advertise but not the province? Madam Speaker, I do not agree. I think both should be allowed to attract the kind of people that are interested in this kind of activity.

In both cases, Parliament wanted to allow the provinces and these organizations to collect funds that in the end are used for the public good. Provincial lotteries enable the provinces to finance other programs for the benefit of local residents, while giving participants a chance to have some fun.

More than 15 years ago, some people called this a voluntary tax. In any case, authorized lotteries are a way for the provinces to collect funds without having to use other, less attractive means of collecting money. At least the customer gets something in return for his contribution!

Obviously, the purpose of advertising is to make people aware of the existence of these games. However, I think the ultimate objective is desirable, which is to let more people participate in order to collect more money for the government.

Madam Speaker, it is hard to understand why we must go after the provinces that are only trying to use one of the means at their disposal to lighten our fellow citizens' tax load. As far as I know, the provinces' use of lotteries has not yet led to such a storm of protest from the public that Parliament has to intervene by using its power under the Criminal Code.

On the contrary, from what I hear, people are telling us that they are pleased with the present arrangements and do not think that they constitute high-pressure sales. Madam Speaker, this means that the vast majority of our fellow citizens would be deprived of a way to find out about games or new games, which in turn would deprive governments of funds they need to finance and manage social programs in their province.

We must be, and of course we are, aware of the good intentions of those who favour such a bill: there is no doubt that they want to eliminate what they consider to be gambling binges. At least, that is what I hope is the purpose of this amendment.

Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, as you very well know, I really doubt that such an amendment could prevent someone who has a need or a compulsion to gamble and he or she will continue to do so in other ways that may be more underhanded and harmful.

It is well known that people who are compulsive gamblers will do what they must to satisfy their gambling addiction to lotteries and games. The absence of advertising on television and in other media will not stop those who are bitten by that bug from finding out about these games and spending money that others do not think should be spent on them.

Our fellow citizens who are filling a need will certainly not be cured by a ban on advertising for provincial government lotteries. Even a total ban on lotteries would do no good in such cases.

No, what must be done for these compulsive gamblers is to provide programs to help them break their habit similar to programs that exist to help alcoholics overcome their addiction.

To continue my analogy, Madam Speaker, what this bill proposes would be like authorizing the sale and advertising of liquor in retail stores while making it an offence to advertise elsewhere, the idea being that this would help alcoholics shake their habit. We know perfectly well this is wishful thinking.

In addition, when we consider that the provinces stand to lose revenue, just because some people hope to abolish what they see as disastrous, it is clear that any chance of success is practically non-existent, while the provinces would run a very real risk of incurring financial losses.

Madam Speaker, so far gambling, when properly managed as it is today, is economically useful to meet the provinces' real needs, while the provinces can then redistribute part of this money for the benefit of their residents.

Madame Speaker, Bill C-255 is a typical example of a piece of legislation that, presented in good faith, unfortunately misses the target and seems to create more problems than it solves.

It seems to me there are many drawbacks and that very few benefits would ensue as a result of this measure. No one is against virtue, nor will anyone criticize a measure to prohibit gambling because it upholds virtue.

However, this measure is faulty because it does not achieve what it was intended to achieve. In fact, it is a threat to a program that is eminently desirable—allowing the provinces to collect certain sums of money that are then put to appropriate use to meet local needs, as I said earlier.

All things considered, Madam Speaker, Bill C–255 should be rejected, while all the requisite programs for gambling addicts should be made available to those who want to stop gambling.

Madam Speaker, psychology teaches us about the risk concept, which covers a very broad area and has yet to be resolved. However, psychology also teaches us that individual needs must be met in some way or other, and advertising is not a factor that will affect the individual's impulse to gamble. These problems can only be dealt with through support programs and programs that promote individual responsibility.

As is always the case with legislators who are asked to approve measures designed for the good of the public, we are confronted with options that are well–intentioned but also have a negative aspect.

In the case of Bill C–255, we feel the negative aspects loom much larger than the positive impact intended by this bill. That is why the bill will not accomplish its purpose. It will not achieve its objective and, Madam Speaker, in that case, the bill should not be passed.

[English]

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, in that I do not have much time, I will try to make my points as quickly as I can.

I have several concerns with the bill. The principal one is my deeply rooted and very sincere belief that legislation should only be enacted when it is absolutely necessary. Many people in this country feel that laws are there to try to make people become something they are not. I am strongly convinced that legislation should only be enacted when it is shown that there is a deep rooted need to have that legislation in place.

The intent of Bill C–55 is to restrict advertising on all provincially—

VILLE–DE–LAVAL

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval): This year, Madam Speaker, Laval celebrates the 25th anniversary of its founding. As a matter of fact. It was on August 6th, 1965, that the 14 municipalities of Île Jésus merged to become the city of Laval.

Since then, Ville–de–Laval has grown economically and seen its population increase from 196 000 in 1965 to nearly 300 000 in 1990.

It is thanks to the dedication of its founding father, Me Jean–Noël Lavoie, Laval's first mayor, and his successors, Mr. Jacques Tétreault, the current member for Laval–Centre, Messrs Lucien Paiement and Claude Lefebvre, as well as Mr. Gilles Vaillancourt, the current mayor, that Laval could experience such development and growth.

My thanks go to its founding father and its leaders! May this 25th anniversary become a corner stone for prosperity in the years ahead!

Finally, Madam Speaker, my colleagues Jacques Tétreault and Vincent Della Noce, join me in wishing all Laval citizens, men and women, a very happy twenty–fifth anniversary.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, rumours have been circulating for several months and today we have confirmation from the Minister of National Health and Welfare that $4 million will be cut from the budget of the National Health Research and Development Program.

This program is the only source of research funding in Canada for public health, preventive medicine, health promotion, health education, and health services research.

I received copies of letters sent to the minister from disbelieving researchers who work in these fields. One such person works in environmental health studying the risk of cancer due to chemicals in the environment.

These researchers tell me that such a cut will have a devastating effect on their work. Some research teams will disband; new ones will be stillborn.

We hear every day about the need to control health-care costs in an ageing society. Cutting funding for research in preventive health and public health research is not the way to do it. It is sheer lunacy. I hope that the government will reconsider this ill-advised decision which is sure to be counter-productive.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, this week the fate of Canada's Constitution hangs in the balance. All reasonable Canadians share the aspirations and concerns of those who seek to advance the security of their respective rights and freedoms in our Constitution, be they men or women, French or English, aboriginals or of any ethnic origin.

In my view, opposition to the accord is not the way to achieve such goals. To the contrary, I believe that ratification of it is an absolutely essential prerequisite to advancing any cause for constitutional reform in Canada at this time.

We must all recognize that from the very moment our Constitution was patriated in 1982 without Quebec's participation there has been virtual paralysis with respect to any change or future development.

The Meech Lake Accord is designed to cure that paralysis and to make it possible for other issues to move forward constructively and to be resolved.

The best way to build our nation for every interest is to affirm the Meech Lake Accord now. The worst way for any interest will be to block it.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, the world, not just Canada, faces environmental catastrophes of a magnitude unknown to human existence.

Twenty thousand species will become extinct this year and half of all species on earth will become extinct over the next 50 years if we continue the human industrial assault.

Two acres of tropical rain forest are clearcut or go up in smoke every second. In Canada one acre is clearcut or burned every five seconds, every minute, every hour, every day of the year.

Our oceans are under assault. In recent days whales, seals, fish, even starfish by the millions, have been washing ashore dead from radiation in the White Sea north of Moscow. The hole in the ozone grows over the Arctic and now over Canada. Global warming continues despite the pleadings of scientists world-wide.

Today the environmental assessment and review legislation is to be tabled. It has long been promised. Consultations went on for a year back in 1987. In 1988 Tom McMillan promised on October 20, "We are prepared to subject every federal undertaking and every undertaking on federal lands to a thorough environmental impact study." Lucien Bouchard promised the same.

Since 1974 the EARP has been based upon a cabinet policy, solely an Order in Council.

Despite strong rulings by the Federal Court on the Rafferty-Alameda and a unanimous ruling by the Federal Court of Appeal on the Oldman Dam, both projects continue without completed assessments.

Assessments must apply to projects, to impacts, to domestic policy and to our international policy and projects as well.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, last week, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said sarcastically and arrogantly that "overstating a case does not make up for not having one". He was referring to opposition requests for action in cancelling the Memorandum of Understanding with regard to the softwood lumber industry in Canada.

When is this government going to realize that its policies are destroying what was once a healthy lumber industry?

The Memorandum of Understanding which slaps a 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber, coupled with current interest rates and the artificially high Canadian dollar, has forced the closure of lumber mills throughout the province of Ontario. In a riding such as mine, where the lumber industry is a major employer, these job losses amount to a disaster.

I urge the government to take action now, before more lumber mills are closed and more people are forced into unemployment by the silly policy of this government.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I am grateful to have this opportunity, coming as it does during Canadian Occupational Health and Safety Week, to recognize the role of Health and Welfare Canada in maintaining and improving the health and safety of federal government employees.

The department's responsibilities are carried out primarily through the Public Service Health Program, which provides high quality and comprehensive occupational and environmental health services to client groups. These services consist of health protection and promotion activities designed to support and enhance the physical, mental and social well-being of clients.

Current priorities of the Public Service Health Program include measures to increase the response capacity to post-trauma stress disorder resulting from serious accidents and incidents in the workplace, continuation of the hepatitis B vaccination program for high-risk groups and continued emphasis on investigating complaints about indoor air quality.

ATLANTIC FISHERIES ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I have reviewed the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program in detail and I am very concerned.

In general, I find that it contains many references to ongoing consultation and continuing discussions with respect to diplomatic talks on overfishing, the provision of assistance to individuals and communities, and the disbursement of assistance for diversification projects. What it does not contain are definite provisions for guaranteeing the long-term future of the fisheries or clearly defined action to assist individuals and communities.

A specific concern I and many of my colleagues have is that the inshore fishery in Newfoundland is particularly dismal and unproductive this spring. People who have been at it for years have never seen it so bad.

The Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program ignores those fishermen and plant workers who make their living from the inshore sector and the communities in which they live. They are understandably and genuinely worked up, while the situation is ignored by the government. They want the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to address this problem now.

LIBERAL LEADERSHIP

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Jean Chrétien, where do you stand on the Meech Lake Accord?

Last week, Mr. Chrétien issued a written statement saying: "I, therefore, will not be making any further statement on the subject at this time".

A Copps campaign spokesman said that his position is insulting to the intelligence of the Liberal delegates. I could not agree more. This week, Canada is at the crossroads; yet, the man who wants to be Prime Minister is silent. Those who aspire to political leadership must stand up and be counted on the great issues of the day.

Mr. Chrétien, where do you stand on the Meech Lake Accord? Yes or no, Mr. Chrétien? Yes or no?

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, tourism operators across Canada have complained that the goods and services tax will make it more difficult for them to compete with their American counterparts.

What about the American counterparts who own resort facilities right here in Canada? Canadian-owned operations right next door to American-owned facilities operating in Canada are stuck with the 7 per cent GST while their American neighbours get off scot-free.

Here is how it works. Many fishing and recreation resorts on the west coast of Canada are American-owned and offer U.S. customers package vacations paid for at their U.S. outlet. They even fly in all their supplies. Because the client pays the money at the U.S. office, he is exempt from the GST which must be paid by a Canadian firm. This puts legitimate Canadian resorts at a 7 per cent disadvantage and puts a lie to the Tory promise of a level playing field. Just like free trade, the GST is going to kill initiative and harm our tourism industry.

LIBERAL LEADERSHIP

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Madam Speaker, the man who this weekend intends to become leader of the national Liberal Party, Jean Chrétien, remains completely silent about the greatest recent national issue, the Meech Lake Accord.

Mr. Chrétien, where do you stand? There will be no place in history for those who in times of great crisis strive to maintain their neutrality. Your leadership rival, the member for LaSalle—Émard, says there are 26 million Canadians who have an opinion on the accord and are prepared to express it. Mr. Chrétien is the only one who is not. Mr. Chrétien, come out of the storm cellar. Do you support Meech Lake, yes or no?

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I wish to congragulate the Consumers' Association of Canada for dissociating itself from the Government's blatant interference by quickly accepting Mr. Nickolas Murray's resignation as its president.

By appointing Mr. Murray as head of the new GST consumer information office without first asking him to resign his position, the government had created a conflict of interest situation with its underhanded interference with the affairs of an independent organization.

[English]

Not only did the government attempt to undermine the Consumers' Association of Canada's credibility, it also managed to embarrass itself once again by creating a legally impotent government agency. The Conservative government has once again deceived Canadian consumers by attempting to appease them rather than to protect their interests.

QUEBEC MINING ASSOCIATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, the Quebec Mining Association's annual meeting has been going on in Montebello since yesterday, on the theme "Quebec's mines in their world and in the world".

Three major thrusts were defined for the future of the Quebec mining industry in the next few years.

Development of new gold mining techniques: the top priority will be the development of a veinstone mining technique.

Replenishment of reserves of common metals: the main resources that now exist will be depleted in the next three to five years and exploration must be undertaken immediately.

Major improvements must be made in the areas of health, safety and the environment. Although the Quebec mining industry is doing a great deal in these areas, much still remains to be done.

CANADA POST

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, this Conservative government is intent on closing down rural Canada. Canadians in rural Canada are being treated as second-class citizens by Canada Post and this government. We now see their secret agenda.

The village of Newbury, Ontario, like many other municipalities across Canada, has asked to be given the right to run its postal service as Canada Post is closing down the local post office.

Canada Post wants these communities to buy the postal buildings but will not allow them a priority bid to continue to provide quality postal service. Why? Because Canada Post is afraid that once the municipalities provide first-class postal service to rural Canadians rural Canadians will rightfully ask why Canada Post could not.

I call on this government to reverse this unfair policy and to provide all Canadians with equitable postal service. I ask the minister today to allow municipalities like Newbury the opportunity to provide postal services to their citizens as an option, rather than go the route of privatization.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, the United Nations is sponsoring an international convention on proper forest policies to be pursued by member countries by the fall of 1991.

The need to recognize forest practices that allow for proper harvesting and the preservation of unique areas must be developed. In Canada, this policy can be developed if we have some signed forest agreements in co-operation with the provinces so that we can obtain and have a truly sustainable forest industry.

I call on the Government of Canada to announce its intention to participate in the development of these policies and hold full public hearings so that we can have a truly sustainable forest industry.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, last week I was pleased and honoured to attend a ceremony transferring responsibility for family and children's services for native people in Nova Scotia from the province of Nova Scotia to the Micmac Family and Children's Services Organization.

This is the first time responsibility for family and children services has been turned over to native people in Canada and it is another important step toward self-determination. This is important because native adults will now be able to apply their standards and culture to family and children services. It is even more important to the children who see the adults managing the plan as role models and show at a very early age the responsibility for their futures is in the hands of native people.

I want to congratulate Joan Gloade, Chief Lawrence Paul, the staff of the regional office of Indian Affairs in Amherst and all others involved with this exciting step forward on the part of native people.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

I understand that this morning Senator Murray, the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, and senior officials of the government met with leaders of the Manitoba Assembly of Chiefs in Winnipeg.

It is reported that Senator Murray and officials presented a new series of proposals to the aboriginal leaders with a view to breaking the impasse over the 1987 constitutional amendment which currently exists in the Manitoba Legislature.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House what exactly was contained in these proposals and what has been the response of the leaders of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs to these proposals?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, if I am provided a certain latitude in the House, I could outline specifically six points that were made in the meeting that took place this morning. With the consent of the House, I would be prepared to table the letter.

Essentially, the undertaking by the federal government was to ensure that a federal-aboriginal process, which set the agenda for First Ministers' conferences, would be established, and that the First Ministers' conference with respect to aboriginal affairs, which was alluded to in the document of June 9, would be accelerated.

The second commitment by the Government of Canada was to full constitutional recognition of the aboriginal peoples as a fundamental characteristic of Canada.

Third, there is an undertaking to have representatives of the aboriginal peoples participate in any future First Ministers' conference held to discuss the recognition clause, or the Canada clause, as it has become to be referred.

Fourth, the Prime Minister would invite aboriginal peoples to further future First Ministers' conference where matters involving aboriginal concerns are directly affected. They would be able to participate at those conferences.

Fifth, a joint definition of treaty rights would be established. Finally, the federal government proposed to establish a royal commission on native affairs which would be broad and comprehensive in dealing with the various issues affecting the aboriginal community.

My understanding is that following this meeting, the chiefs met to consider the proposals. I understand that they are holding a press conference right at this very moment. Our preliminary indication is that they are rejecting this as a move to break the log-jam and they will be expressing a view that they are not interested in pursuing these discussions further.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): In the light of this possible answer from the native leaders, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the government's next step will be, because it is a very serious situation, one that was created by the government, and the Canadian people are asking for a concrete response.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if I were the Leader of the Opposition, I would not be so quick to level blame.

There is a process going on. The undertaking that was agreed to and signed by the First Ministers of June 9 indicated they would use every possible effort to achieve the passage of the Meech Lake Accord by June 23, 1990. I should remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that this is really a matter for the Manitoba Legislature to consider.

There is a procedural problem that is currently under way, and we hope that the Legislature of Manitoba will work towards the achievement of the undertaking that was signed by the premier of that province. I think all we can do is help and facilitate the Manitoba Legislature. That is precisely what we are doing.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Canadians expect a more precise and meaningful response to the question as to exactly what the government intends to do if the concerns of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs cannot be met by the June 23 date. It is time for the government to become a lot clearer on how it intends to deal with this situation.

In fairness, given the delicacy of this particular issue, I think it would be most inopportune to speculate as to what might or might not happen. There is an undertaking agreed to by all First Ministers that they will use their best efforts in passing the Meech Lake Accord by the deadline. We can only assume that that commitment is still firm. We have every reason to believe that it is, and we have every reason and hope that that will be proceeded with.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Following Nelson Mandela's historic visit to this House, I wish the government would tell us whether it intends to make a positive response to Mr. Mandela's request that economic sanctions against South Africa be maintained, and second, could the government explain why, despite its statements on economic sanctions, the level of Canada's trade relations with South Africa still remains very high?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I believe it has already been made clear by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the Government of Canada intends to continue with the present economic sanctions until such time as there is a clear indication that the apartheid system in South Africa has been done away with. I do not think there is any doubt about policy in that regard.

With respect to the question of trade with South Africa, it is minimal with the exception of some very necessary material that we import for use in certain of our Canadian industries. There certainly has been no increase in trade with South Africa.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I differ with the minister because, according to the data that we have, despite all the reassurances given by the government, trade seems to be moving up. Therefore, there is a discrepancy between what the government is saying and what is actually taking place.

As a supplementary question, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he is ready to ask his government to reconsider its decision to refuse to give direct subsidies to the ANC.

The government has instead recommended the creation of a solidarity fund. Through the auspices of Senator Graham, we on this side will participate with others in Canada to raise funds to help the democratic effort that will take place in South Africa. More particularly, we should help the political aspirations of the ANC.

Is the government ready to match dollar for dollar contributions given to the ANC by Canadian citizens?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, one of the constant principles of our foreign policy is that we do not provide financial assistance to any political organization overseas. That is a principle that has been endorsed by all three Canadian political parties and approved on a number of occasions when there has been a parliamentary review of foreign policy. We cannot provide funding for the political work of the African National Congress.

We have provided humanitarian education assistance to ANC members through NGOs here in Canada and international organizations were active in encouraging a funding dialogue between the ANC and other groups in South Africa. We are prepared to provide constitutional advice and assistance to them and to assist as they head into crucial negotiations. We have encouraged private fund-raising initiatives organized by the Nelson Mandela Fund, which is also endorsed by the three political parties in Canada.

The principle, as I say, is clear and accepted up to now by all three political parties that we do not provide financial assistance to any political organization overseas.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Deputy Prime Minister said earlier, in response to a question from the Leader of the Opposition, that there is a procedural problem in Manitoba.

I beg to differ, Mr. Speaker. I think there is a very long-standing problem of lack of respect and consideration for aboriginal issues in the country which has culminated in the problem we see now regarding Meech Lake.

The government has said in its Throne Speeches, and in fact last week the Prime Minister said: "—the first victims of 1981-82 were not Quebecers. They were aboriginal peoples—"

The government has spoken very well about aboriginal concerns but has taken very little action, except the action taken during the budget to cut back on funding for aboriginal communications.

Given the concerns of aboriginal people and the little attention that has been paid to them by successive governments, would the Deputy Prime Minister immediately commit to re-establish the programs that cut back the aboriginal programs in order to demonstrate some good faith to aboriginal people in the country?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as minister responsible for the aboriginal constitutional process, I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that in the Meech Lake Accord, in the companion resolution, and in the proposals that the federal government has put forward just this week with respect to aboriginal leaders in Manitoba, the Government of Canada has taken the lead in trying to ensure that the underlying causes of difficulties faced by aboriginal people in Canada are addressed in a serious way through addressing the question of aboriginal self-government.

It is important for the hon. member to recognize that the failure of the Meech Lake Accord would deal a very serious blow to the aboriginal constitutional agenda. She should be supporting the ratification of the Meech Lake Accord and the companion resolution as the most significant key to the serious and long-term permanent resolution of aboriginal issues in the country.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister once again.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister explain to Canadians and to aboriginal people how cutting 100 per cent of core funding for aboriginal political organizations helps them participate in the constitutional process.

How does cutting 100 per cent of funding for aboriginal newspapers help them participate in the constitutional process? Will the Deputy Prime Minister commit to show good faith to aboriginal people to restore funding for aboriginal political organizations and for aboriginal communications?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in the budgetary process all Canadians have been asked to participate and share in the challenge of reducing the deficit.

• (1430)

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Don't do damage to your jaws over there, or your knees.

With respect to the aboriginal constitutional process, I have already made a commitment to aboriginal groups in this country to fund them in the process leading up to aboriginal constitutional negotiations. They have had that commitment from the Government of Canada already.

At a meeting last Thursday evening and at a previous one on May 28, that commitment was reconfirmed by myself and the minister responsible for federal-provincial relations.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, clearly the government does not want to show good faith to aboriginal people by restoring funding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: I remind the government that 100 per cent of the core funding was cut for the Assembly of First Nations and 29 other Indian organizations, including the First Nations Confederacy of Manitoba.

My question for the Deputy Prime Minister is this. We know that there are only five days left until the June 23 deadline. In Manitoba, the legislation has not yet been introduced in the legislature, and there are 2,000 people on the waiting list who wish to appear at the public hearings.

The Prime Minister made it clear last Monday that he had a master plan. It was his master plan that created the events of the First Ministers' Conference.

Now that the master plan is unravelling and the Prime Minister is having to admit that he has to deal with those people who were treated unfairly in this process, can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us what this government's plan is for the Constitution?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the hon. member will have an opportunity to read the letter that the Prime Minister sent to Chief Fontaine, because I think it clearly outlines two things. First, there is our commitment and determination to deal with the problems of the aboriginal peoples.

Ms. McLaughlin: What about last year, the year before and the year before that?

Mr. Mazankowski: She asks what about last year. Included in here is our commitment and our follow through in negotiating an agreement in principle with the Dene–Métis on their comprehensive land claims, as well as with the Yukon Indians and the Nishga Tribal Council, comprehensive land claims with the Council of Yukon Indians, and negotiations that led to agreements in principle with the Inuit of the Northwest Territories on their comprehensive land claim.

There has not been this kind of progress made in the last 50 years.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: The efforts of the Prime Minister and this government in terms of moving toward self-government saw many First Ministers' Conferences held. Without Quebec sitting at the table, it was very difficult to proceed. That commitment is restated again in this correspondence to Chief Fontaine.

I am sure that when the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party reads the letter she will agree that there has been tremendous progress made. There is progress being made today, and there is that commitment for the future.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It concerns the administration of the port of Montreal.

Now that the government has had the weekend to look into the issue raised in the House on Friday, can the minister tell us by what strange, happy coincidence a Tory fund raiser and friend of the Prime Minister, Mr. Maurice Mayer, got the untendered contract for $225,000 to purchase properties for the port authority?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that port of Montreal expansion has been talked about for several years, that the board of directors narrowed it down to 11 sites, decided upon one and then decided to hire one agent to do the land assembly. My hon. friend will realize that you do not do land assemblies on the front page of the newspaper. You hire one person who is competent in the field to negotiate. Maurice Mayer was that one person competent to do it. He did it to the satisfaction of the board of directors which appointed him.

I would point out to my hon. friend that all transactions were within the range of the estimates of the Department of Public Works and that all Treasury Board guidelines were followed.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, what are friends for?

[Translation]

I have a supplementary for the Minister of Transport. Could the minister or his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, tell the House why Public Works employees were unable to do the work themselves? And is the government prepared to ask the Auditor General of Canada to investigate this matter?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will let my hon. friend in on a secret about assembling land. If you are a big owner you do not go out to try to do the purchasing. Anybody who has something to sell knows they are going to boost the price.

My hon. friend should check with some of his relatives. They know how to assemble land a lot better than he does—and she could tell him how to do it.

BILL C-69

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I will address my question to the Minister of Justice.

The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice will have heard of the decision of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia which ruled that the Government of Canada has no authority for capping its obligations under the Canada Assistance Plan Act as proposed in Bill C-69.

Will the government now do the honourable thing and withdraw this bill from consideration in the other place?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have heard of the decision of the B.C. Court of Appeal. The Government of Canada will be appealing the decision of the B.C. Court of Appeal.

It is important to point out that Bill C–69 contains not only provisions to limit the federal contributions to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan, but that there are other important fiscal restraint measures, including the two–year freeze on federal payments under the Established Programs Financing, which are in the bill. That alone will account for federal savings of $900 million this year and $1.5 billion next year.

Although the government will seek the view of the Supreme Court of Canada in relation to the CAP measures, we will in the meantime respect the views of the B.C. Court of Appeal. But we will consider means to ensure that other provisions in Bill C–69 are enacted as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, Justice Lambert in the Court of Appeal said: "Honest self–assessment by honest taxpayers is the basis of raising revenue in Canada. The foundation on which that type of taxation rests would be removed if Canadians could not trust their government to keep its agreements. I expect that the overwhelming majority of Canadians would say that this country must be as good as its word".

Why will this government not act the way honest taxpayers do, honour its obligations and withdraw this bill?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, with all respect, the Government of Canada differs from the decision made by the B.C. Court of Appeal. But we will respect the decision until such time as the Supreme Court of Canada can review it.

I have made it very clear that the Government of Canada has always observed declarations. The decision is only a declaration; it does not strike down legislation or anything that serious. We will honour the spirit of the judgment of the B.C. Court of Appeal pending our own appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Deputy Prime Minister regarding the Canada Assistance Plan.

If, as the Minister of Justice said, it is the intention of the government to respect the decision of the B.C. courts until such time as it is able to appeal, does that mean that this government believes that its commitment under the Canada Assistance Plan Act is not a binding commitment?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this is the place to relitigate the case that has been heard at some length in front of the B.C. Court of Appeal.

The Government of Canada respectfully differs from the conclusions drawn by a majority of the B.C. Court of Appeal and believe that the issues are sufficiently important to be heard by the Supreme Court of Canada.

We have already indicated that we will respect the spirit of the judgment of the B.C. Court of Appeal while we seek a review by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister is not trying to say that we cannot discuss this matter because it is going back before the courts.

• (1440)

I would like to ask the minister or whoever chooses to answer this question—and it seems no matter who we ask we get a different respondent—this. Did the government not seek a reference from the Supreme Court before proceeding with Bill C–69? What advice did the government get before proceeding, before throwing this whole country into confusion and turmoil over what is going to be put forward to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, obviously the government considered the legal implications of its action and was of the view that what it was doing was appropriate.

I do not mean to get into a long legal discourse here, but some of her hon. friends and colleagues in law could advise her that some of the issues raised in the reference by British Columbia in the B.C. Court of Appeal are novel and different. This is the first time an application of the principle of legitimate expectations has been heard with respect to government activity. With respect, we differ with the conclusions drawn by the B.C. Court of Appeal.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

He will undoubtedly know that Air Canada employees have now joined thousands of other unionized workers across this country in protecting themselves against the goods and services tax.

Further, people are aware that the projections of the Minister of Finance that Canadian workers would lay down and not fight back against this attack on their disposable income has not worked.

Does the government now recognize that this government-fuelled inflation is going to continue to create havoc in the economy, with Governor Crow pursuing his high interest policies? Does it now recognize that that demand for wage and price moderation is not going to hold and that the goods and services tax should be withdrawn?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the short answer is no.

The tentative agreement that was signed by Air Canada and its employees was nothing more than a COLA clause. COLA clauses have been negotiated for a number of years. There is nothing new in this.

Bob White is putting a new name on COLA clauses. He should be given an E for effort in public relations, but it is nothing new.

We still believe, and we have been backed up by three independent organizations, that the inflationary impact of the GST will be somewhere in the 1 per cent to 1.25 per cent range, a one-time increase in the cost of living. That has been admitted from the beginning by the government. It is nothing new.

No, we are not withdrawing it. We are proceeding with the goods and services tax because it means more jobs and more productivity for this country. It is important for Canada.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister just for clarification because I think he has made a very important point. I want to make sure that Canadian workers understand exactly what the minister is saying.

Is the minister saying that the government understands that Canadian workers will have to go out and pursue these kinds of adjustments in their wage settlements to make sure that they can protect themselves against the inflationary impact of the goods and goods and services tax? Is that what the government is recommending?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the government is recommending to all union and non-union employees to moderate their wage demands because increased wage demands are one of the factors forcing inflation up. That has been repeated many times in the House not only by the Minister of Finance and by myself but it has been repeated outside by many economists. The latest remarks were in the paper the other day. Economists stated that, yes, high wage demands do cause inflationary pressures, and that if we are going to wring inflation out of the economy we have to moderate our wage demands. This will ensure that we can wring that inflation out and get interest rates down on a permanent basis. That is the goal.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to whoever is responding for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In January of this year the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced that two areas in my constituency had been designated Community Futures zones. Five months have passed since this announcement and the decision with respect to who will sit on the Community Futures committee has not been made.

Until these committees are established, the program cannot go forward. This has been happening across Atlantic Canada with other Community Futures committees in hard hit areas of Atlantic Canada.

Why has the minister failed to designate these committees so that jobs can be created in communities devastated by fish plant closures?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): In the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to answer? The minister is not here today for personal reasons.

The minister of course has always been very concerned with the development of Atlantic Canada. The best thing that members of the opposition could do with regard to the Community Futures Program or job training moneys for Atlantic Canada would be to suggest to their colleagues in the other place that they pass Bill C-21.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the program was announced in January, at the beginning of the year. Surely the minister and her department had the resources then to finance the project. If they did not have the resources, why was the program announced?

There is a procedure available which is known to the government for resolving the impasse over Bill C-21. The government knows how to use it.

When will the government stop holding Atlantic Canadians hostage over Bill C-21 and live up to its promises?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if I were allowed I would put the question another way. When will the other place stop holding Atlantic Canada hostage and pass Bill C-21? This is the place where people are democratically elected, not the other place.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In light of the comments of the Deputy Prime Minister about the offer made to the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs apparently being turned down, will the Deputy Prime Minister inform the House what the government's plan is now?

There is a lot of concern in the country about the secrecy of the talks two weeks ago and about the process two weeks ago. In order to alleviate the concern that Canadians have about where this government is going with constitutional talks, will the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House what the plan is now that the Assembly of Chiefs in Manitoba has turned down the proposal?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the benefit of listening to the statements at the press conference made by Chief Fontaine or other spokesmen on behalf of the Assembly of Nations. Thus it would be very difficult to determine at this point in time whether in fact there is any hope for further discussions. Perhaps there is.

The Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations is there along with senior officials who are ready, willing and able to sit down to engage in discussions, as well as to engage in further discussions with the Government of Manitoba in trying to break the log-jam.

I am sure the hon. member realizes that this is a very sensitive and delicate stage in the proceedings. I acknowledge his co-operation and support throughout the whole process.

I can assure him and the hon. members of the House that as soon as anything further develops I will certainly be very pleased to take him into that confidence.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, in that regard, I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister can make a commitment today that the Prime Minister will come to the House either later on today or tomorrow to make a full statement to the members of this House as to what the plan is in terms of the impasse we appear to be in right now.

I think it is very important that the Prime Minister is as open as possible during this delicate time in negotiations.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Prime Minister is engaged with the visit of Mr. Mandela, and he will be with him most of the day.

I have attempted to be as forthcoming as I possibly can in my willingness to table the letter outlining all the conditions and the proposals that were put forth.

The Prime Minister has always sought the earliest possible opportunity to come before the House to explain the proceedings. I have no doubt that he will be prepared to do that as well.

I can give the hon. member the assurance that at the appropriate time the Prime Minister will come to the House and advise all hon. members as to the details of the discussions and what may be proposed for the future.

NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. The federal government has closed the Canadian Forces Base in Senneterre, and the mayor, Mr. Gérard Lafontaine, has asked the government to establish a regional administration centre on the premises, since the government will save Canadians $600,000 by locating these offices in Senneterre. The question is as follows: Is the minister or the government prepared to consider seriously this free offer by the town of Senneterre?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I have been advised by the Minister of National Revenue that he discussed this matter with the hon. member before.

On the minister's behalf I can inform the hon. member for Abitibi that the Department of National Revenue is continuing to review this matter, taking both the important representations of the hon. member and the mayor of Senneterre into consideration. He hopes to have an answer for him in the not too distant future.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Minister of Transport said that the records of CN Route are with the trustee in bankruptcy. After Question Period I went to Toronto and visited with the trustee in bankruptcy. I am informed that not all the records that I had asked to be tabled are with the trustee in bankruptcy.

I am more convinced after spending at least three hours with the trustee that the 1,900 employees of CN Route never had a chance. They were doomed from the day the deal took place.

How could this government which had to sign and give its consent to every transaction concerning the sale of CN Route not look after the best interests of those employees?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as has been read into the record on several occasions, including the two letters that I have tabled, the Route Canada situation was this. The company had been losing between $40 million and $50 million a year. You can only go on doing that for so long before you run out of money.

CN had a decision to make. It was either to shut down the company and terminate the jobs of all the employees or to sell it as a going concern to the Fingold brothers in an effort to help the employees maintain their jobs. That was the decision taken by the CN board of directors. I think it acted in all good faith on behalf of the employees who thus retained their jobs.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, we had some discussion in this House a short while ago about the bonuses paid to all of the CN executives. I wonder if those CN executives who were running this company at a $40 million and $50 million a year loss were paid bonuses for running the company so well.

The supplementary that I want to ask is this. How could the government allow the real estate and the equipment, the most valuable assets of CN Route, to be sheltered from bankruptcy so that the employees had no chance of ever gaining their severance pay, their vacation pay and their pension benefits?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that the company mortgaged the assets in an effort to get some cash flow and pay for the business. That is one form of a shelter.

If my hon. friend knows where he can get $29 million without putting up that kind of security, I think there are a lot of people out there who would like to know where it is.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have an article here from The Leader Post of Regina that states: "Former PC minister decries Rafferty work".

Why does the construction of the Rafferty–Alameda dam continue in spite of the fact that the licence to build that dam has been revoked by the courts? What is the federal government prepared to do to stop the construction until we have the results of the environmental impact assessment?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board and Acting Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, we have a panel that is conducting the review. We have made our position very clear to consider only construction for safety reasons. We are talking with all those who are involved in the project to ensure that any construction being done at the moment is related to safety measures. We are awaiting the panel report.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Is there not a great danger that the work begun is so advanced that the provincial government will ignore the results of the federal environmental assessment? In that case, what will the federal government do to ensure that its recommendations are respected and what will it do if they do not take these recommendations into account?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board and Acting Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the environmental review process is well under way. This process is continuing and we await the report. It has been clearly indicated that the only work that was to be done is safety-related.

I think that my hon. colleague will understand that in such a project, some work related to safety must still be done and completed.

So we are maintaining our positions, we are waiting for the report and then I will be able to answer my colleague and let him know what action the federal government intends to take.

SALMON RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Transport about the Salmon River Bridge.

For the past one and a half years the county of Colchester, the province of Nova Scotia and yours truly have been trying to convince CN to replace a badly deteriorated and dangerous bridge near Truro, Nova Scotia.

During that time we have seen CN disregard direct NTA orders, juggle numbers to reduce its portion of the reconstruction costs, stall and delay, and not meet its commitments and obligations with respect to this bridge.

Will the Minister of Transport step in and apply the necessary pressure to get on with this bridge and bring this four-year old soap opera to an end?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, independent of my hon. friend's inquiry today, I have already asked CN officials to honour the obligations that it is under as quickly as possible in order that this particular bridge may be repaired as soon as possible.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance.

I hope the minister is aware that the co-operative sector, representing 12 million co-op members in this country, has been informed that co-op members face paying the GST on their share capital. As the minister knows, the share capital of other businesses will not be subject to the GST. This places co-operative businesses at a serious competitive disadvantage.

Has the minister considered the serious implications of such an unfair and discriminatory practice? If he has, what does he intend to do about it?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the House that officials from the Ministry of Finance met with the co-op organization on June 6, I believe.

At that time we listened to their representations and asked them to put their concerns in writing. They agreed to do so. We have not received those as yet.

I can assure the hon. member that when we receive them they will be studied very carefully. We will co-operate—if I can use that word—with the co-ops in trying to solve any concerns they may have with the goods and services tax.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

The Minister of Agriculture must know that co-operative businesses are a very important factor in the rural areas of this country which are particularly hard hit in these economic times.

Will the minister guarantee today that co-operative share capital will not be treated the same as memberships in a golf and country club? In other words, will the minister guarantee that the GST will not apply to co-op membership and co-op shares?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, not only is the co-op movement very important to the agricultural industry, but the GST is very important to the agricultural industry. I hope the hon. member will get on the bandwagon and start supporting it because it means a savings of a quarter of a billion dollars in farmers' pockets on an annual basis. Why does he not stand up for farmers for a change?

CANADA POST

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for Canada Post.

Tenders are now being called to contract out postal service to 681 homes in the Renfrew—Dacre areas. This enlarged rural route is almost 400 kilometres long and is the result of the consolidation of five present rural routes. Considering the distance to be travelled and the number of customers, this arrangement is just plain silly.

• (1500)

What does Canada Post expect the mail contractor to do: use a CF-18 jet fighter to ensure that all the mail is delivered on the same day? Is Canada Post really committed to providing good service to rural communities? Or, is it simply going to continue to jerk people around?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post is managing its operations in a way to ensure that the service continues to improve as it has, to ensure that stamp prices rise less than inflation, which they have, as well as to return to the taxpayers of Canada a dividend on their operations which I will announce shortly.

The reality is that the kind of political interference the hon. member is talking about was the way it used to be under the Liberal administration. In those days Canada Post received a subsidy from the taxpayers of up to $500 million a year. It is now providing those same taxpayers with a dividend because we let it manage.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, Canadian people are well aware of the kind of political interference that this government has afoot for rural mail carriers in this country.

Canada Post has said that over 5,000 rural post offices are scheduled for closure across Canada. Groups such as the Canadian Federation of Municipalities and others concerned with postal service in Canada have strongly advised against taking this course of action.

This being the case, why is the government insistent on paying no attention at all to Canadians who are affected by the policy imposed from on high by the ministry of this government and Canada Post?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post is going from 12,000 to 18,000 outlets. It is not closing down. It is reorganizing its delivery system to improve service.

Service has been improving. Post change surveys of people affected by these changes have indicated their approval. Perhaps the people in the hon. member's constituency or the drivers who feel they cannot make that distance every day need not apply for the right to do that route, but there are people who will apply.

The service will continue to improve. We will not follow the hon. member's suggestion to butt our noses into the management of Canada Post.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order today to wish a very happy eighty-second birthday to Stanley Knowles who was elected 48 years ago and who has sat as a permanent officer of this House for over 5 years.

On behalf of my party and I am sure on behalf of all hon. members, I would like to wish Mr. Knowles many more happy returns.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government and the Progressive Conservative Party I would join with the Leader of the New Democratic Party in extending our sincere best wishes and congratulations to the Hon. Stanley Knowles.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party I want to join in the birthday wishes extended to the Hon. Stanley Knowles.

LOBBYISTS REGISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–319, an act to amend the Lobbyists Registration Act (financial statement).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to introduce an act to amend the Lobbyist Registration Act.

The purpose of this bill is to strengthen the regulatory regime for lobbying at the federal level. This bill would require that Tier I lobbyists submit to the registrar each year in addition to their name, address, employer, and subject matter a detailed audited financial statement, including fees, expenditures, and related particulars.

I hope all members of the House will support this bill which will provide a real discipline to the activities of a very powerful group of actors who since this government has been elected has acquired great influence with little public accountability.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

M. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Stormont—Dundas (Mr. Kilger), on a point of order.

ABORTION

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present this petition signed by over 1,300 people calling upon Parliament to recognize that abortion is a medical decision to be made by a woman in consultation with her physician and does not belong in criminal law, and to ensure good access to this health service in every province.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege to rise and present a petition from 90 of my constituents in Gambo, New Chelsea and Trinity Bay. These people are very upset with the goods and services tax. They are worried about the 31 taxes that have been imposed in the last six years and they are concerned about what this 7 per cent tax is going to do to them. They are also worried about the burden on small business and they are worried, with unemployment and the fisheries the way they are, that this is another nail in their economic coffin.

Your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VETERANS' BENEFITS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition from members and friends of Branch 8 of the Royal Canadian Legion in Sydney Mines and the Army, Navy and Air Force Club in Bras d'Or. There are approximately 150 signatures on this petition.

In part it states that the Government of Canada has introduced changes that will reduce homekeeping services to veterans and substantially increase the cost of long-term care. Whereas the veterans have already given service to this country and should not be targeted by those measures, the petitioners call upon Parliament to reject those budget measures which deprive veterans of proper services and increase their financial hardships.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs has made some movement away from this very draconian position, but he has not gone far enough. The petitioners believe this is grossly unfair to the country.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member was getting into debate and not reading a petition.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table a petition today on behalf of many Canadian voters who are opposed to the goods and services tax. In spite of the government's explanations, these people find this tax unfair, unacceptable and especially bad for seniors.

[English]

VETERANS' BENEFITS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present petitions from Legionnaires, both men and women, in my riding in the areas of Kemptville, Brockville, Gananoque, Prescott, Cardinal, Spencerville, Lyndhurst, Westport and other communities, all objecting to the cuts the government has proposed to veteran's services, particularly to housekeeping costs for veterans and additional charges for long-term care.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I have a petition regarding the cut-backs in veterans' benefits. There are some 1,042 names on three petitions from Cloverdale, White Rock, Surrey and other places and Legion branches in the Fraser Valley. I also have two petitions from the city of Yorkton, Saskatchewan, which includes the signature of the hon. member for that riding. In addition I have almost 1,000 signatures from people in the city of Ottawa and district.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to maintain the current level of services provided to veterans through Veterans' Independence Programs and to ensure that there is no increase in charges to veterans for board and lodging in institutions of long-term care.

Madam Speaker, the one thing you do not do is cut back on veterans.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I want to table a petition today pursuant to Standing Order 36. This petition follows closely a vote by this government when it refused to recognize the importance of unemployment insurance to eastern Canadians and, in particular, turns down the variable entrance requirements that were proposed in that bill. We regret the position of the government. These people petition the House of Commons and Parliament that whereas the unemployment insurance system is vital to the well-being of Canadians in providing temporary income protection to unemployed Canadian workers; whereas the Government of Canada is proposing to drastically cut unemployment insurance benefits by making it more difficult to qualify and reducing the number of weeks covered; whereas the Government of Canada is withdrawing its contribution of $2.9 billion to the unemployment insurance fund and leaving the financing to workers and employers, these people reject these cuts to the unemployment insurance system and propose more meaningful reforms that should concentrate on labour force development strategy combined with a full employment policy and effective regional development policies.

• (1600)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, like my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, I am pleased to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Newfoundland who oppose the government's proposals to cut the Unemployment Insurance Act. The unemployment insurance scheme was adopted by past Liberal governments and, I may say, Madam Speaker, I am sure these petitioners would be horrified to witness the vote we have just been through in which this heartless government rejected the Senate's efforts to rectify a disastrous situation for them as the petition itself says—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows better. Does he want to conclude?

Mr. Milliken: As I was saying, Madam Speaker, the petition urges Parliament to reject the cuts to the unemployment insurance program, and the petitioners are obviously supporting the Senate's amendments to Bill C-21.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to rise and present a petition signed by hundreds of residents of British Columbia and, in particular, residents of my constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway, who continue to express their anger at the government's proposal to push ahead with the proposed goods and services tax.

They point out that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax while forcing lower and middle income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, the petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to cause the government to cease with a proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform. Obviously, in calling upon Parliament, they are calling upon the Senate to kill the goods and services tax.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by hundreds of Canadians in the riding of Hamilton Mountain. This petition is against the goods and services tax.

The petitioners strongly oppose the goods and services tax and feel it is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians that will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present three different petitions. The first one is a petition in Chinese and English. It is from many persons from the Chinatown area of Vancouver East, both store owners and some of their customers.

The petition states that the 7 per cent goods and services tax will hurt small businesses; costs will go up, incomes will go down and it will be an accounting nightmare. The tax will hurt consumers as the prices of thousands of items and services go up.

Therefore, the undersigned petitioners call upon Parliament and the Government of Canada to withdraw the goods and services tax.

Madam Speaker, I have a second petition which is much longer, and I will summarize.

The petitioners ask that Parliament reject, and this includes the other place, the current proposal for a goods and services tax, reform the tax system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure, that this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab and causes the government to cease with—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thought the hon. member said she would summarize the petition.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, that was only half of it. The final petition that I have is on a different subject.

FISHERIES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, the final petition calls on the government to use every means possible to stop the use of pelagic driftnets in the north Pacific Ocean, including the institution of economic sanctions against the offending countries and the placing of prohibitive tariffs and duties on imports to Canada from those countries. There are quite a number of people, again from Vancouver East and the Vancouver district, who have signed this petition.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions dealing with the goods and services tax, each in a different form but each have been approved under Standing Order 36.

One calls on the government to abandon the goods and services tax and to review the manufacturers' sales tax and ensure that there is real tax reform of the tax system to provide a healthy climate for small business in Canada.

The other takes the point of view of all taxpayers and all consumers and makes similar requests to the government to abandon the goods and services tax because it is a regressive form of tax and calls on the government to set up a commission to make certain that we have real tax reform.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition on the goods and services tax. These constituents express concern about the tax. They are petitioning Parliament to see that the tax is removed, and that of course includes the Senate where they fear that the Liberals will just pass the GST anyway.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of my friend from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception who happens to be the only retired admiral on this side of the House. His constituents humbly pray that the restrictions placed on unemployment insurance be withdrawn by the government.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I have in my hand a petition signed by many Canadians, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

I shall try to summarize the petition very briefly in French. These people are against the over 31 tax increases of various kinds. The manufacturers' tax has gone from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. They think that the new 7 per cent GST which is now proposed will be a hidden tax. It will have a serious negative impact on buyers and will strike a heavy blow to small businesses.

Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present this petition.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present these petitions in accordance with the Standing Orders.

[English]

The first petition rejects the $2.9 billion cut to the unemployment insurance, and asks for meaningful reform for a labour force development strategy that is comprehensive and for a full employment policy.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I also have a petition condemning this nefarious goods and services tax, the thirty-second Tory tax increase.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I have another petition which condemns the brutal and insensitive cuts to our veterans.

AIR INDIA

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present to the House 38 separate petitions containing some 2,500 signatures gathered through the good offices of the hon. member for York South—Weston.

The petitioners note that June 23 next will be the fifth anniversary of the tragedy of Air India flight 182 in which 329 people were killed. While recognizing that the investigation is continuing, the relatives of the victims and all Canadians have not yet been told of all the facts and causes of the tragedy. The petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to institute a royal commission of inquiry to make these facts known and put in place the final chapter of this most sorrowful event in Canadian history.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition of many pages signed by hundreds of petitioners in Dawson City, Whitehorse, Sioux Lookout, Dryden, Kamloops and Prince George which reminds the House that the government has eliminated funding for the native communications program which eliminates 11 aboriginal newspapers, two magazines and the National Aboriginal Communications Society. It also eliminated radio maintenance funding for native community radio stations, as well as a life-saving high frequency radio used by aboriginal trappers as a lifeline to local communities. It also reduced funding for the Northern Native Broadcast Access Program.

The petitioners point out all the cuts or reductions in support for aboriginal programs and call on Parliament to consider the advisability of reinstating both the Native Communications Program and the Northern Native Broadcast Access Program at full funding levels.

Further, they humbly pray that the Department of Secretary of State conduct consultations with the groups funded under the said programs in order to devise plans for the future that will serve the needs of the department as well as aboriginal peoples and their media programs.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on another matter, it is my honour again to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents in Kamloops, British Columbia, who are opposed to the government's goods and services tax.

They point out that it is a very regressive tax. It is an unfair and cruel tax. They ask the government to drop the tax as soon as possible and begin real fair tax reform.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE SENATE

The House proceeded to consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-28, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, today, when tabling their petitions, a number of my colleagues opposite embraced the position of the Senate. I have nothing against the Senate, a Chamber which no doubt has its purpose in life, but I hope that in future we will be able to improve on that purpose. Meanwhile, the Senate remains a non-elected chamber, and it was very surprising that, in our own democratically elected House of Commons, we should see colleagues turning to the Senate to try and amend decisions made in accordance with rules that have been in effect in this country for more than a century.

[English]

Madam Speaker, today I would like to raise two major issues with the actions of the Senate in returning Bill C-28 to this House. First, I would like to discuss the role of the Senate in proposing amendments to income tax bills. Second, I would like to take this opportunity to comment on the amendments themselves.

Madam Speaker, I would like to comment briefly on the role of the Senate in proposing amendments to income tax bills.

Section 53 of the Constitution Act, 1867, one of our fundamental laws, provides that bills to raise taxes must originate in the House of Commons.

Madam Speaker, I think I can say this rule is well founded. Tax legislation is one of the government's basic instruments for regulating the economy and financing its operations. What we have here is a basic tool the government can use to regulate the economy and finance its operations, on which all successive governments have been dependent. Therefore, the government's prerogative to determine the content of tax bills, based on its majority in the House of Commons, reflects the clear mandate the government received by being democratically elected.

Consequently, Madam Speaker, any attempt to amend the provisions of a tax bill passed by this House with a view to reducing the amounts the government expects to collect under those provisions, any attempt by the Senate to amend those provisions will weaken and undermine the scope of that mandate.

In his ruling of May 31, 1990—a very recent ruling—on the amendment concerning indexation, the Speaker of the Senate, your colleague, Madam Speaker, says in fact that the Senate may amend a tax bill as long as the amendment does not increase the amount or the scope of a charge.

Nevertheless, I maintain that even if the Senate has the power to propose amendments to tax bills, it would be more in keeping with the spirit of sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867, our basic statute, if the Senate refrained from exercising that power. The Senate may draw attention to aspects it feels could be improved—in that case the government has the option of either ignoring or acting upon the recommendations by tabling amending legislation—but the fact that it should demand the power to make its own amendments constitutes a serious transgression of the government's financial prerogatives.

[English]

Turning now to the substance of the amendments proposed by the Senate, Bill C-28 implements the changes to the Income Tax Act announced in the April 1989 budget by the Minister of Finance. The major goal of that budget was to reduce the deficit. Accordingly the measures in this bill must be viewed in the context of that goal and the fact that in introducing the budget the Minister of Finance emphasized the need to bring Canada's large and growing debt under control. This is the environment in which this bill was introduced. Bill C-28 is indeed a major contributor in this regard.

I would like to stress that controlling the growth of the debt is not some abstract crusade that has no real meaning for ordinary Canadians. Rather, it is essential if we as a nation are to be able to maintain social programs, achieve lasting economic growth, create jobs, and remain internationally competitive.

Let me remind hon. members of the serious problem our large and growing public debt represents. Only 20 years ago there was no deficit. Only 12 cents of every dollar in taxes went on interest payments. The total accumulated public debt was $18 billion. By the time this government came to power in 1984 this debt had risen to $200 billion. The annual deficit was $38 billion, and 32 cents of every dollar of taxpayers' money went to pay interest on the debt. We could not start to pay back the debt because we had a current account deficit as well; that is to pay our current accounts we needed to borrow an additional $16 billion.

It has taken us some years and we have achieved our objective of turning around by $25 billion the spending of the government, and now we have a surplus in the current account that we can apply to the debt.

Mr. Milliken: That is rubbish.

Mr. Loiselle: You don't like facts. There is a $25 billion turnaround from a current account deficit of $16 billion. Of course the hon. gentleman does not understand these things. That is why his party put us in the position we are in today.

When we came to power the current account deficit apart from the debt was $16 billion. We could not start paying back the debt. We had to make up this deficit. We now have a surplus of $10 billion, and now we can start repaying and catching up. We can see the light at the end of the tunnel.

Obviously, Madam Speaker, the deficit situation could not endure. Having decided to put an end to it, the government was forced to make difficult decisions concerning expenditures and taxes. Some programs have been cancelled. Waste and inefficiency have been curtailed. Tax loopholes—a considerable number of loopholes indeed—have been eliminated.

These measures enabled us to make a sizable dent in the deficit, but it is not enough. Bill C-28 is a major lever of our deficit-reducing efforts, implementing as it does a number of changes to tax regulations governing individuals and corporations. However, public attention has been focused sharply on the recovery of social transfer payments, specifically family allowances and old age benefits.

I want to indicate that this measure is fully consistent with the role of the personal income tax system with respect to ensuring that government assistance be properly allocated. Family allowances and old age benefits are already taxable, and their recovery does nothing more than extend current practices.

Madam Speaker, the Senate made two recommendations with which I should like to deal briefly. The senators suggest that the income threshold be fully indexed to the cost of living, and that the OAS benefit repayment be reduced by $75 for ten years.

Concerning the indexation of the threshold, the Minister of Finance did say that the decision will be monitored and changed as needed. This flexible approach has been used in other circumstances —I will get back to that later on—to soften the impact on individuals and households.

For instance, when the refundable sales tax credit was established the threshold for maximum benefit eligibility was $15,000. It has since been raised twice, to $16,000 in 1988 and to $19,000 this year. Had it been fully indexed as suggested by the Senate, it would now be about $17,800 instead of $19,000. In other words, the government did better than full indexation when it chose to adjust the transfer payments.

Although it is indexed to the consumer price index less 3 per cent, the refundable child tax credit has been increased periodically and today it is $575 per child, compared to $474 if it had been fully indexed; in other words, the government has given over $100 more than indexation. It is therefore obvious that a flexible approach is more beneficial than the automatic indexation proposed by the Senate.

[English]

The facts on the incomes of the elderly also suggest that there is little to fear from the fact that the threshold is only partially indexed. Just over 4 per cent of seniors have incomes in excess of $50,000. However almost 90 per cent of them have incomes below $30,000. Thus, even if a flexible approach were to result in no increases in the threshold, it would be many, many years before the vast majority of seniors would become subject to recovery.

Therefore, for those who are concerned at the eventual outcome of partial indexation, there are two assurances. First, this government's record, which I have just illustrated. These are facts again. Second, the fact that the threshold has been set at a level where very few seniors are affected now or are likely to be affected in the foreseeable future.

The second recommendation from the Senate is that the amount of OAS to be repaid should be reduced by $75. This is what the senators propose. This, they argue, recognizes that Canadians contributed to the old age security fund between 1952 and 1972.

Let us look at that. It is true that such a fund existed and earmarked taxes were paid. However during the period 1952 to 1972 old age security benefits were improved significantly, but the earmarked taxes were not increased to fund these increased benefits. As a result, the fund operated at a deficit on an annual basis so that when it was eventually wound up in 1976 the accumulated deficit was $121 million. Thus, during this period, OAS did not operate like an insurance scheme where benefits were based directly on individual contributions.

Indeed the Debates of this House when the fund was introduced make it clear that the intention was simply to make the cost of OAS clearer to taxpayers, not to have an insurance program like the Canada–Quebec Pension Plan.

In summary, the flexible approach to indexation has actually resulted in a greater increase in benefits than if automatic indexation had been in place.

Consequently, I would argue that this government's record is a sufficient guarantee that the $50,000 threshold will not erode over time.

In addition, the argument that the existence of an OAS fund at one time means that there is a moral obligation to recognize this in designing the recovery of OAS is based on a false premise. That premise is that the OAS fund operated like an insurance scheme. It would be very costly to these people to have to pay back this $121 million. In fact it did not.

Finally I would like to point out one consequence of the way in which the amendment to clause 48 has been drafted. This is not without its importance.

The Senate version would split what is now found in Bill C–28 in proposed subsection 180.2 (1) of the Income Tax Act into two new subsections: subsection 180.2 (1) which would impose a tax to recover federal family allowances and subsection 100.2 (2) which would impose a tax to recover old age security payments. Consequently, the Senate amendments would apply the income test separately for family allowances and Old Age Security. By contrast, Bill C–28, as originally proposed, applies the income test against the total of family allowance payments and Old Age Security. As a result, the Senate amendment could lead to an increase in tax payable in cases where someone receives both allowances.

• (1630)

For example, suppose an individual received $300 of family allowance payments and $600 old age pension payments in 1989, and that the individual's net income is $53,000. Under the existing provisions of Bill C–28, the total tax payable as a recovery of family allowance and old age security would be $150. Under the provisions proposed by the Senate, the total tax payable would be $175. Thus, as this example demonstrates, the Senate proposals could actually increase the amount recovered. For this reason, they should be regarded as being out of order under the criteria set out by the hon. Speaker of the Senate in his ruling on May 31, 1990.

Under the criteria signed by the Speaker of the Senate in his ruling, the amendments should be regarded as being out of order. According to his own criteria, they are out of order.

An hon. member: I thought they were in order.

Mr. Loiselle: According to his own criteria, they are out of order.

An hon. member: But he said they were in order.

Mr. Loiselle: That is not what he said. He did not say that. He ruled differently. His criteria does not allow for this picture. There was some confusion there. If you look at it, indeed the amendments do not apply.

[Translation]

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, the proposed amendments are inappropriate to the Senate's legislative authority to propose amendments for tax bills. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I do not think that this House should accept such an attempted exercise of legislative power by the Senate.

[English]

In conclusion therefore, I move:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House disagrees with amendments numbered 1 and 2 made by the Senate to Bill C–28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related act, because the amendments violate the traditional legislative role asserted by the Commons in fulfilment of its obligations under Sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867, because the amendments contradict the principles of the bill by generally decreasing the amount of revenues to be raised by the bill, and because amendment numbered 2 in some cases increases the amount of the charge.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the speech by the Hon. Minister of State for Finance is simply incredible. I think that in preparing for today, he looked for his old speech on the 1989 Budget and he gave almost the same speech, with changes to reflect the amendments proposed by the Senate.

I must therefore make a few comments on his speech in particular and then on the amendments proposed by the Senate.

[English]

In dealing with Bill C–28, the government has repeatedly tried various tricks. It has had difficulty with this bill in the House. I could go through its legislative history in the chamber, but hon. members are well aware of that history. It is a bill that we in the opposition have consistently opposed.

The government has rammed it through the House. It was debated in this chamber on second reading on October 11, 17, and 18, and on November 20 the government brought in closure and forced the bill from the second reading stage to committee. It was reported back to the House and debated at report stage on December 15. On December 18, the government moved a time allocation motion. Allocation allowed for one additional day for report stage and one day for third reading. The debate at report stage was concluded on December 19 and third reading on December 20, and the bill was sent on to the Senate.

There was very limited debate in the House on this measure, which was one of the principal measures contained in the government's budget of 1989. We are still discussing it today. I know the popularity of this measure has not increased, either here or anywhere in the country.

Seniors groups throughout Canada are outraged at this clawback. I have filed if not in the hundreds, certainly dozens of petitions, in this House in opposition to this clawback. It is widely opposed by seniors groups across Canada.

Social workers regard it as a threat to the universal social programs that Canada has enjoyed as the result of enlightened administrations—and I may say they happen to have been Liberal administrations over the years.

What the minister and the government are now doing is destroying the universal principle in these social programs through the back door. In the 1989 budget papers that describe this clawback tax, it is not even referred to as a tax, it is called transfers to persons, and appears under the rubric "repayment of social transfers". So, it is not considered a tax increase in the budget papers. It is referred to as a repayment of social transfers. No one in Canada regards this as anything but a new tax, an unfair tax, and one the government should be ashamed to support in the House.

We have been through this debate before. The House has dealt with the issue. Fortunately we have an opportunity today to revisit the issue since the Senate, which I know the New Democratic Party has taken to supporting, is now sending this bill back with modest amendments. I am disappointed they are not more drastic amendments, but the fact is they are modest amendments with which we have to deal.

In speaking in support of the Senate today, I do so, not out of any great sense of pride, but I am glad that at least somebody in this country is taking some steps, as we took and were outvoted, to support the seniors of this country who are having their rights chiselled away by this government and its policies.

In going back to the earlier part of the minister's speech, which as I said was unbelievable, he spoke about the public debt in 1984 when his government took office. He will correct me if I have his figure wrong, but I think he indicated that the public debt when the government took office was $280 billion. That is not accurate. The minister knows that is inaccurate. That was the figure at March 31, 1985 after six disastrous months of Conservative rule. The minister knows, as well as I do, that what the government did in those six months was spend, spend, spend.

For the first time in office for years since the nine-month Clark government, the Conservative Party decided that the best thing to do was to spend the taxpayers' dollars with what could only be described as gay abandon. It went handing out money right, left and centre, spending like crazy. It ran up the national debt to $280 billion by the end of the year from $252 billion in September of that year. My hon. friend from Ottawa South is more knowledgeable in the figures than I am, but I believe that was the figure when the Conservative Party took office.

Mr. Manley: We're off by $100 billion.

Mr. Milliken: It was $180 billion, I am sorry. It was $180 billion and $150 billion, because it is about $300 billion now.

• (1640)

The Minister of State for Finance may not have been in the cabinet at the outset of that period, but in any event he is supporting that lavish spending. The government tries to blame the $38 billion deficit that was run up during that year on the bad, old Liberals. The Liberals were out of office for six months of that year, and it was during the last six months that spending went right out of control. The hon. Minister of State for Finance knows that full well. He knows that his colleague, the Minister of Finance, is fully responsible for that absolute orgy of public spending that was precipitated by the election in 1988.

The Minister of State for Finance laughs, but that is the fact and he knows it.

The motion which he proposed in the House today deals with the Senate amendments. I am concerned that his motion states that one of the reasons this House ought to reject the Senate amendments is that the amendments, "contradict the principles"—and I stress the word principles—"of the bill by generally decreasing the amount of revenues to be raised by the bill".

Everyone who has studied parliamentary procedure knows that bills do not have principles. They have a single principle, one principle. And Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms, Sixth Edition at citation 659 reads:

> The second reading is the most important stage through which the bill is required to pass; for its whole principle—

Singular "principle".

> —is then at issue and is affirmed or denied by a vote of the House.

I do not need to go into the rest of the citation, but every citation that Your Honour will find in Beauchesne's dealing with bills and the procedure for dealing with them in the House of Commons refers to the principle of a bill, not principles.

Yet, this government has taken into its head that every policy that it puts into a bill somehow becomes one of the multitude of principles in every one of their bills. We have this nonsense in the motion today saying that this amendment contradicts the principles of the bill. The government clearly does not know what the principle of this bill is. It think it has more than one. It does not have one more than one. It can only have one under the rules. If it has more than one, it should have been divided into several bills.

We did not hear the Minister of State for Finance offering to split this bill into various categories. The bill has one principle, not violated by these amendments. What these amendments seek to do is modify the outrageous taxes that this government has sought to impose. I know the Minister of State for Finance finds this humorous. He thinks that the taxation of Canadians is funny, but I assure him it is not. Canadians do not think so. As my hon. friend in the New Democratic Party says, Canadians certainly do not think so.

Mr. Butland: What friends?

Mr. Milliken: My hon. friend knows, as well as I do, that his party is going to support us in our opposition to this bill. It has done so consistently so far, and I am sure the hon. members of that party are going to support the Senate, as they do now on almost every occasion, in rejecting government bills. I am delighted to see that they have had this change of heart, and I am delighted to know that we will have their support later today in the vote on this particular matter, should it come that soon.

I also want to deal with the minister's comments on the government's record of assurance. In discussing how seniors should look at the situation, he said: "Looking at the government's record, there need be no worry that the government itself would adjust the amounts of the base for the clawback purposes".

In other words, the government would adjust the $50,000 upward, to keep pace with inflation. That had to be one of the most bold-faced statements I have ever heard. There is not a senior in this country who will trust this government with his or her money. This is the government that proposed deindexing their pensions. This is the same government.

Mr. Kempling: I am a senior citizen. I know.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member knows perfectly well that it was his government that proposed to deindex pensions. The hon. members says no, he was here. He must have been ashamed of the way his cabinet carried on. Certainly it withdrew the proposal after the Prime Minister was called unparliamentary names outside the precincts. The fact is it had that proposal on the books. That is what the government wanted to do. If that was not enough, it indexed all the deductions for income tax, the sneaky, hidden tax that it has applied to every Canadian by taking away the indexing of the deductions under the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Kempling: Senior citizens in Canada are better off than anyone in the world.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Burlington thinks that seniors will be better off under this government and its rules. They are not better off. Their taxes have been increased 31 times. Their taxes have been sneakily increased by reason of the deindexation of their deductions and now they are being taxed by this Bill C-28 by having their old age security pensions taken away from them.

The hon. member for Burlington should be ashamed of his support of the government and so should the hon. member for Macleod whom I see grinning in the back. I will go on—

Mr. Kempling: I'm a senior citizen. I know.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Burlington protests that he is a senior citizen and he knows. Well, he has not started paying this tax yet because the bill has not been passed. Wait until he starts paying the tax, then he will know differently.

The other point I wanted to make is that the minister says we should trust the government because after all their record has been so great. If the statements and facts that I brought to light are not enough to convince people that the government cannot be trusted in this, I do not know what more evidence we need.

It is not something that the Canadian taxpayer is willing to trust the government on and I would like to look at the budget papers presented on April 27, 1989. This was the leaky budget as I recall.

On page 9 the Minister of Finance penned these words. I assume he or someone under him wrote this. He certainly took responsibility for it once it got leaked. It says:

> For 1990 and subsequent taxation years, the $50,000 threshold will be indexed on the same basis as other indexed brackets and thresholds in the tax system.

In other words, the rate of inflation minus 3 per cent.

> The level of the threshold will be reviewed periodically and adjusted as appropriate.

What the Senate has done by one of its two amendments in this case is say to the minister and to the Canadian people that this thing should be adjusted automatically with the rate of inflation.

If the minister is going to fix the situation periodically, why will he not agree to this amendment which is so reasonable? All it does is say that the $50,000 figure will be fully indexed with the rate of inflation. It does not propose this 3 per cent extra tax grab for the government. Surely the minister is not trying to squeeze seniors out of another 3 per cent of their money every year. Yet that is what it appears from the way he has drafted this bill.

The Senate has said we would prefer to amend this. They have proposed a very reasonable amendment on that score and I invite the minister to read it again and see if he will not change his motion and agree with this very reasonable amendment. I stress the word "reasonable". It does not do anything that is drastic, it does not deprive the minister of a great deal of revenue, it is virtually revenue neutral. There is no reason why the minister for this class of citizens should not offer the full indexation that is fair.

In fact, as the Senate pointed out so ably in its report, the government itself appeared to support this whole old age security tax system. I would like to quote:

> In January 1985, the Government released a Consultation Paper on Child and Elderly Benefits, which concluded that a special surtax on Old Age Security payments would "seriously disrupt our retirement income system" and "would unduly penalize those most affected by reason of retirement income resulting from private savings in earlier years." Thus, the provision for clawing back OAS benefits in Bill C-28 as the committee went on to say, represents not only a change from the policies of previous governments but also a direct repudiation of this government's earlier position.

The minister talked about trust and how seniors should trust this government and yet, having stated in 1985 that a special surtax on seniors' incomes would seriously disrupt their income system and unduly penalize those most unable to afford it and most undeserving, the government now backs down on that promise by bringing forward Bill C-28.

When the other place comes forward with some amendments to try to ameliorate the dreadful consequences of this bill, the minister stands up and says the Senate is out of order, that the amendments violate our constitutional traditions, and that he will not have it.

Surely the minister has an obligation to consider these very reasonable amendments proposed by the Senate. Surely he cannot expect Canadians to believe the pious nonsense he uttered about the government's record being a firm indication of trust. The government's record, if anything, is exactly the opposite.

The Consultation Paper on Child and Elderly Benefits, published in January 1985—which the government is breaching by this bill that is being forced through this House and is now trying to get through the Senate and which, no doubt, it will force through this House later today—is an indication of a complete breach of faith with senior citizens in this country and frankly, with the parents of children who receive the child support payments under this act.

The other aspect I wanted to deal with is the unfair and secret tax increases that the government has already imposed by deindexing deductions. I mentioned that earlier. The government claims that there is no tax increase this year. Indeed, in the budget speech the Minister of Finance announced that there were, in fact, no new taxes. We all know that there are two ways the government has increased taxes on Canadians this year that I could name right off the top of my head. One of them is included in the 1989 budget and it is this very clawback provision.

As Your Honour knows, the clawback provisions go into force, one-third, one-third, one-third; one-third in the first year of operation which was last year, one-third this year and an additional third next year. If that isn't a tax increase, then I don't know what is. Yet, the Minister of Finance had the unmitigated nerve to stand in this House during his budget speech and say there would be no new taxes this year. Well, that was one. There is an extra third being taxed away from these people because of this bill.

Of course, the second, the sneaky, hidden tax increase is that the government did not index deductions under the Income Tax Act. Where the budgets, introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, our former leader, indexed these deductions so that Canadians did not face an automatic increase in taxes every year if there was inflation, this government has done the opposite. It is proposing to take that right away for those who have to pay this clawback tax, this special tax on their pension income.

I submit that this is inappropriate and that the government ought to fully index this. The failure to index increases is an automatic increase in taxes every year for the person having to pay taxes under this kind of provision. While it may not be a tax that is obvious and there may not be an increase in the rate, by reason of the increase in the income of the taxpayer, additional taxes will be paid because of the failure to index these amounts.

The minister knows this and tries to pretend that it is not so. I invite him to have another look at the facts and see if he cannot change his attitude and support the amendment that indexes this part, at least. These people will pay enough additional taxes, in my view, since their basic deductions will not increase with inflation and we do not need to go through the additional tax imposed by reason of the failure to index the $50,000 threshold.

At the end of his remarks, the minister expressed surprise that this amendment was even before us. He seems to suggest that for some reason the Speaker of the Senate ought to have ruled these amendments out of order. I question whether it was even relevant for the minister to bring up such a silly argument in this House.

The Speaker of the Senate set out his criteria. He made it clear what he was going to do. He ruled one amendment out of order but he did not rule this one out of order. For the minister to say he should have, is frankly ridiculous.

The Speaker of the Senate, as Your Honour knows, is appointed by the government. He is not elected as is the Speaker in this House, he is its nominee. His decision was not appealed, as it could have been in that House, and have the Liberal majority turn it down. The Speaker of the Senate made a ruling that, I submit, was correct under the circumstances, that met his criteria, and ruled that this amendment was in order.

The amendment is before this House. The minister has moved a motion that purports to suggest that the amendment is somehow improper. In this case I suggest what is improper is the government's unwillingess to consider changes in this legislation, changes that will make it more fair and equitable for the taxpayers of this country who are going to be burdened with additional taxes as a result of this government's short-sighted policy. I quoted from the Senate committee report that cited the government's consultation paper released in January, 1985. I could go on with more statements from the report, but I think it fair, having regard to what the Senate said, to look at the last part of that report. I quote from page 2088 of the Senate Debates for last week.

The report is appended to the Debates, Madam Speaker. I would not want you to think I was reading speeches. It reads:

> While the Committee does not favour the clawback in principle, nevertheless, it is reluctantly prepared to accept this provision in recognition of the serious fiscal circumstances facing the Government. This said, the Committee believes that there are serious deficiencies in the design of the clawback provision which must be corrected. We believe that our report's recommended amendments address the inequities contained in the legislation without substantially affecting the Government's budget deficit.

I submit the committee is right.

My hon. friend from Sault Ste. Marie persists in interrupting and suggesting that he does not agree with this part of the report. I regret it, too. The Senate could have, and perhaps should have, done more, although I am reluctant to say that. I would have liked to have seen them do more. I think the Senate takes a very responsible approach in these matters, and I invite my friend from Sault Ste. Marie to consider that.

This is a money bill, and he knows as well as I do that under our Constitution the Senate has limited powers in relation to money bills, while perhaps not legally spelled out that way in the British North America Act or the Constitution Act, as it now is, at least based on the general practice under our law and Constitution.

In recognition of that fact, the Senate has said no, it has to approve the principle of this bill. It is a major bill coming from the House of Commons and has to be dealt with as such. The Senate is entitled to make some amendments to improve it, and I think that is what the Senate has done. I laud their efforts.

Like him, I would prefer that this bill not be introduced in the House at all. I would prefer to defeat it. Both our parties voted against this legislation, and I am delighted that the New Democratic Party supported us in that attempt. I would not want him to suggest that the Senate should be chastised for not having done more in the circumstances given the nature of the bill.

The point that we have to look at here is the other Senate amendment. I think it goes to the very notion of trust. The minister talked some time back about trust, how important it was, how seniors could trust this government, and their record was evidence of that trust. Let us look at the record again.

The government is preparing to impose a special tax on persons who have contributed to the old age security fund in Canada, many of them for a 20-year period. From 1952 to 1972 there was a special tax collected as part of the income tax, but labelled as an old age security tax. I can remember it. I remember seeing it on tax returns. That may seem odd, perhaps. If Your Honour does not, I am sure given Your Honour's age, it was long since abolished before Your Honour had to pay tax.

I might have filed a tax return before 1972, I am not sure. The fact is I recall the tax was there. It was a special tax levied on Canadians across the board. The money was put into the old age security fund. I am sure the minister remembers that fund. The money went into the fund and the old age security pensions were paid out of that fund.

If there were insufficient moneys in the fund it was replenished by the government out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. If there was not enough the government paid all the pensions. The purpose of this was to make Canadians feel that they were paying for their pensions. That is why it was there. It was to drive the cost of pensions home to Canadians.

In 1972, the government did away with that. It said it would collect the money and pay pensions out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. That was done and Canadians lost the notion that they were paying for their pensions because it was all paid in general tax revenue. Fine and dandy.

Now the government is saying, regardless of whether you contributed to that fund all those years, whether you paid in for 20 years or not, you now have to pay the money back when you get it if you make more than $50,000 a year. That is what it is saying.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he would be the first one to say that I did not do what I should do before five o'clock.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, trade; the hon. member for York Centre, justice; and the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, Meech Lake Accord.

I do apologize to the hon. member but the rules are the rules.

• (1700)

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I fully recognize the need for Your Honour to interrupt for that purpose, and I am sorry that it interrupted my particular flow of reason. I know the Minister of State for Finance was hanging on every word and thought.

To go back to my notion of trust as I was discussing it, the fact is the government collected all these moneys in the old age security fund and paid the pensions out of that fund to Canadians. It now says that Canadians will have to give that money back when they receive it.

What the Senate did by one of the two amendments is to say that some recognition should be given to the fact that Canadians paid this money under the mistaken belief that they could trust the government to pay them the pensions, and let them keep the money.

The government talks about trust, saying seniors across Canada know they can trust us. On the other hand, the government says that the seniors who contributed to the fund for all of these years will now have to give the money back when it gets it out. It is a breach of trust. Any other government would be ashamed to bring in such legislation. It is taking money away from people who have paid for the privilege of receiving this pension.

The Senate proposed a special amendment to deal with those who contributed to this fund before 1972 so they will get an additional $75 break on the tax. I submit that that is fair, reasonable, and is a recognition of the fact that people contributed money on the understanding that they would receive money back in the form of a pension.

I cite the most recent example of abuse of trust by this government, Bill C–69, which we dealt with the other day, and which the British Columbia Supreme Court last week said is a breach of the government's obligations to the provinces. The provinces sign agreements, and the government comes along and unilaterally tears them up—just rips them up.

Can you imagine any citizen of this country behaving in this way? The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie would not go and tear up an agreement he had signed, saying he was not going to honour it. The hon. member for Ottawa South or the hon. member for York Centre would not do that. I do not think the Associate Minister of National Defence, in her personal capacity, would even think of doing a thing like that. Yet, for some reason, when these members become ministers of the Crown, they run about gaily tearing up agreements right, left and centre saying: "We are not going to honour our obligations anymore. We do not have to, we are ministers. Somehow we are exempt from the law. We do not have to do this. We can just rip up agreements, willy–nilly, throw them to the four winds and ignore our contractual obligations".

I submit in this case the Senate has brought the government to account. It said that it will not let the government breach its obligation to the seniors of Canada, which it proposes to do. It will not let the government get away with this breach of undertaking. The government will have to pay back the money paid into the fund. It will have to make allowances for people to keep the money they contributed to the fund. They are entitled to receive the pensions and are entitled to keep the pensions, not have them taken away by the whim and will of a government that ignores, and is bent on ignoring, public opinion in Canada.

The Minister of State for Finance in his consideration of these matters has put forward arguments to turn down the Senate amendment that are technical, narrow and highly procedural. He has not put forward substantive arguments to say these amendments are unfair and diminish the value of this legislation in any way. I suggest they are designed to improve the situation of seniors in Canada who are being forced to pay this unfair, regressive tax. It could be made fairer and less regressive. he threshold could be fully indexed to taxation and there could be an allowance made for those who contributed to the old age security fund for up to 20 years.

These are the amendments that the Senate, the other place that the government keeps saying is so undemocratic and so autocratic, has proposed to the bill. Surely the government should look at them and say that that institution is really something. It is doing something for Canadians. It is doing something for the taxpayers who are being treated unfairly in Canada. Instead of that, the government comes up with this motion that says the Senate violates the traditional legislative role asserted by the House in the fulfilment of its obligations under the Constitution Act, and say they contradict the principles of this bill. There is only one principle in the bill, the principle of which is to tax the subject. These amendments do not violate that principle, they lighten the burden and, as the minister said, in some cases they increase the burden.

The minister says they are spending money they are not authorized to spend. The minister should read this bill again because there is no expenditure of money contemplated in this bill. It is simply a reduction of taxes in these amendments. The bill itself does not authorize expenditure of money. It grabs money from Canadians unfairly, improperly, and, I submit, it should have been defeated when it was in this House. Like the New Democratic Party, we hope that the Senate might defeat this kind of bill but unfortunately, I am not sure it is something that it ought to be engaged in at least to that extent.

As I said, we in this party support the very logical amendments that the Senate has moved to this bill. We believe that the record of the government when it claims it has acted fairly and in the interests of all Canadians is wrong. We believe that the statement of the minister that the government has managed the financial affairs of this country well is wrong. We believe that the statement of the minister that it will make adjustments as appropriate to this threshold and that Canadians can trust them to do this is not accurate. We do not believe that Canadians can trust this government to do that and we do not believe it will do it.

I submit that the record of the government actions in proposing to reduce the indexation to cut the indexation of pensions, in proposing this very tax and in objecting to these amendments, in deindexing the deductions under the Income Tax Act and numerous other examples of unfair practices in regard to taxation in Canada, all indicate that the government cannot be trusted to do anything it says in relation to fairness or equity for taxpayers.

What the government has done, and I could go through a lot of figures but I am sure some of my colleagues are going to do that, is increase personal taxes on Canadians at an absolutely astronomic rate. For the government to talk about fairness in the tax system is completely ridiculous. It is not the government that should be discussing that. It has increased taxes 32 times since it took office. Many of them are enormous tax increases. I need only cite the goods and services tax as a perfect example of that which we complain about in this House on a regular basis.

As an example, and perhaps the hon. member for Burlington will be interested in this figure, personal taxes, sales taxes and excise taxes accounted for 67 per cent of government revenue in 1987 and 1988 while corporate taxes accounted for only 11 per cent of those revenues in that same year. I think it is an indication of the way the government has gone. It has reduced the taxes on corporations and increased the taxes on ordinary Canadians. This particular clawback tax, this unfair and very regressive tax, this treatment of pension income as something special and worthy of particularly high taxation, is an indication of the unfairness of the tax measures this government proposes.

I submit that the Senate amendments are fair and reasonable. They are not onerous on the government. The Minister of State for Finance should be supporting these amendments. I invite him to vote against the motion he has proposed so that the Senate amendments can be adopted in this House and we can proceed with the bill as amended.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I congratulate my friend from Kingston and the Islands. I think we agree, probably 90 per cent of the way, with what he has said. As far as bills having a principle or principles, he suggested that a bill can only have one principle. I suggest that the principals behind this legislation do not have the principles, not the bill.

It is quite an honour today to rise in the House, not because of Bill C–28, but because of the visit of Mr. Mandela. I think it was a moving experience for all of us. It is a privilege to be here to hear a remarkable individual with a great, great cause.

We in the New Democratic Party believe that freedom should be universal. We also believe that old age pensions and family allowances should be universal. Certainly fortuitously, last evening I went into a bookshop and picked up a book written by Susan Mann Trofimenkoff. It is a book about Stanley Knowles.

• (1710)

Little did I know last evening that today is Stanley's eighty–second birthday. I could not put the book down last night. I recommend this as good reading for the government and the Official Opposition because it chronicles which party and which individuals, in particular Mr. Woodsworth and Mr. Knowles, championed over the years Old Age Security, Canada Pension and pensions that were escalated. The word at that time was escalated. They had to be escalated. They were not indexed, they were escalated at 2 per cent per year. I know know it makes excellent reading. I know the members here would bear with me for probably the remaining 15 to 17 minutes that I have because it shows without a doubt that this party in a minority government in the twenties pledged support to whichever party would come through with pensions for Canadians. Eventually the Liberals came through but they screamed all the way. Would you believe in 1926 the House of Commons passed a pension bill but it was defeated in the Senate. I just wonder, if bills could be defeated in the Senate in 1926, why bills could not be vetoed by the Senate in 1990.

Mr. Knowles suggests in his book that the Senate should be abolished and we certainly concur with his indication of what should happen to the Senate. We have difficulty, let there be no doubt, in our party with the Senate. It is some sort of three–headed beast but it is not a creation that we really know what to do with. There is no doubt that we are at cross-minds as to what do we support and what do we not support.

This time the Senate has made it quite easy for us through its amendments. The member for Kingston and the Islands said that they were not severe, that they were almost innocuous amendments. He said he wished they would have gone further. We, too, wish they would have gone further because it proves beyond a doubt that the New Democrats are the only party which stands for universality of social programs. The Senate has played its hand. Should this bill pass, God forbid, the Conservatives will end the notion of universality. The Liberals will be accomplices. The Senate will be partners with the Conservative government.

I am surprised that the member for Kingston and the Islands said: "We expected they would go further". I am told that they had a strategy meeting between the Liberal MPs and the Senate and they said: "What exactly are we going to do"? We now know what they did. They said: "Let's come through with some innocuous, not-too-severe amendments", knowing full well that the government would not accept them anyway. They should have played hardball with their friends and said: "Look, we are going to kill this bill". That is the least they should have done.

Poor Mr. Knowles, it is his eighty-second birthday. It took him 25 years to bring pension reform to this country and now, in 1990, the government is taking it back. The Minister of State for Finance has introduced a new term. It is called flexibility. The flexibility now is that you have a longer arm so that what you put into one pocket, you can take out of the other. I think that that is the only way that we can discuss what flexibility really is.

We had difficulty in our party trying to define what universality is because the government members never spoke of universality. I have heard the Minister of State for Finance speak three or four times. He very seldom talks about what is universality. I took the opportunity to go to the thesaurus, and the word "universality" means cosmic, global, infinite, pervasive, usual. Obviously what you give with one hand and take back with another is not universal.

The Liberals have defied the definition of "universality" as well by some of the amendments. They have pretended to defend this universality. I should turn to what the Liberals have said in this House to remind them of what they have said.

The hon. member for Halifax said: "A clawback is a clawback," and we agreed. With the amendments it is still a clawback.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North said: "I call on the government to exercise a conscience to withdraw this bill in the interests of all Canadians, in the interests of Canadian families, and in the interests of Canadian seniors." He should have called upon the Senate to do the same.

My good friend, the hon. member for Ottawa South, said: "There is only one solution for this bill and that is to remove the discriminatory tax." Remove it, the clawback tax; we agree whole-heartedly.

What did the senators say? Senator Kirby said: "I have become a little disturbed by the way a number of organizations are using universality as an emotional code word. I am not in favour of the clawback, but I am troubled by the argument that is used. As much as I dislike the clawback, I have difficulty with the argument that clawback is destroying universality." Also the Liberal senators cannot define "universality".

What the term means is very clear. It is very clear that Bill C-28 takes away the concept of universality for this country, one that we have enjoyed for so long and one that people have worked so hard to get. We are now repealing that right.

In this party we believe that it is a right of every Canadian. This is reverting to the means test: You don't deserve this because you have this much income. We believe that that is a demeaning exercise for any Canadian despite what that person may have as income.

One senator was responding to the statement of Jean Woodsworth of One Voice that as Canadians we should be ashamed of the clawback. We agree.

The Senate committee chairman says: "The government says it needs money. What it is doing in Bill C-28 is raising nearly $500 million through the old age security clawback and family allowances when the program is fully operative." That is a lot of money. It is half a billion dollars. For the most part, it is coming off the backs of senior citizens, which is part of the problem. We agree with that, but we do not agree that deficit reduction should be made on the backs of families and senior citizens.

This amount of money is a pittance. This amount of money could be raised very easily by increasing the upper margin on the income tax from 29 per cent to 32 per cent. This would raise more than the $500 million rather than use this discriminatory tax on seniors and families.

The final justification for the amendments from the Senate: "While the committee does not favour the clawback in principle, nevertheless it is reluctantly prepared to accept this provision in recognition of the serious, fiscal circumstances facing the government." The Senate has said to the government: "We agree with you. You have got a real deficit problem."

In principle we do not like clawback, but I think we are going to have to go ahead with many of the measures in Bill C-28. One could say that there might be some duplicity, but I do not accept that fact. I really do not.

One senator has been attributed as saying: "I passed around a copy of the amendments to the shareholders, the directors—I am sorry, I mean the senators." Surely at this point in time a Senate that spends $40 million per year could have done a bit better. It could have come forward with much more stringent and severe amendments to this clawback bill and we could have easily endorsed it.

We are the only party left that will defend universality in its totality. Those words are not necessary side by side because they are one and the same, but we are the only party that defends it.

Perhaps I am going backward because the member for Kingston and the Islands has already referred to it, but the chronology of this bill was an horrific experience for a new member and it would be an horrific experience for an experienced member. I will not bore the House with the details other than to say that no witnesses were to be heard. It was very important that we pass Bill C-28 before Christmas. Five witnesses out of a possible twenty-two were heard. Time allocation was used at committee stage and time allocation used in the House.

I on behalf of the New Democrats introduced nine amendments, six of which were in order, I am proud to say, and none of which the government would accept. The government introduced 125 amendments to its own bill. This is unheard of; I could not find another precedent for it. The government said that it would introduce another bill in the new year and look after those amendments.

Mr. Manley: Were they in order?

Mr. Butland: No, they were ruled out of order. My hon. friend from Ottawa South asks if they were in order. No, the government's amendments were ruled out of order. That is some indication that this bill was flawed from the beginning and remains flawed. I do not know where these amendments are, and I suspect the government does not know either.

This is destroying the vision of Canada as we on this side understand it: a caring, compassionate Canada. Although this is an almost trite expression now, but this is a change in the watershed of social policy for this country. It follows in the footsteps of the UI bill. We have grave reservations as to what may come in the future. We believe that big business is having its way. It wants to attack the social programs of this country in order that it can compete and that it will have a level playing field with the Americans. At whose expense will this be? This will be at the expense of seniors. This will be at the expense of young families.

The argument is always proffered that it will only affect 4 per cent. They have never extrapolated as to what will happen in the future. By the year 2000, we say that 25 per cent of seniors will be affected. It is not only the 65-year-old. We are talking about the 55-year-old. We are talking about the 45-year-old. We are talking about all Canadians who will be affected by this clawback.

I think I have given our party's position on this matter. I will conclude by saying that we are quite disappointed in the Senate that has the authority, we believe, to come back with a much stronger message. We do not agree with the Senate's presence. It is not one of us; there are none of us over there. If it is going to be there, it might as well do something and do it with principle and will. The Senate knew full well that it was only a delay and that this government would not accept any of the amendments whether they were innocuous or severe.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I would just like to ask the member, who has effectively pleaded with the Senate to take even stronger measures than it has in reviewing legislation such as that before us, if he does not think it is a trifle inconsistent for a party which has maintained the position that the Senate should be abolished to say that in light of the fact that it is there it should take stronger measures. Surely his theory for its abolition is based on the non-elected nature of the body. It would be therefore far more consistent for him to say that if it is not abolished the Senate should be careful not to interfere in any way with legislation that comes out of the House of Commons.

Does he not think it is rather inconsistent of him to recommend to an unelected and therefore unrepresentative body that it takes very drastic action and castigates its members for not having stopped the bill altogether although having recommended improvements?

Mr. Butland: Madam Speaker, I certainly anticipated that question, but it does not make the answer simpler or easier. I said in my speech hat we are not too sure what to do with this beast, this three-headed monster, but we say that if you are there, for heaven's sakes exercise what you can do rather than bring forth wimpy, non-stringent amendments. They should make a statement. Let me assure you of our policy. I certainly agree with Mr. Knowles, who I am sure still believes very much what he said 40 years ago, although I am not supposed to do that, that the Senate has no place.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part once more in a debate on Bill C-28. I believe that it is at least the second time I have spoken on this subject. I participated in the debate on third reading and on the legislative committee studying this bill.

[English]

I find it rather amusing, to say the least, to hear the NDP wax so eloquent about the pro-active role it sees for the Senate in dealing with this sort of legislation. I must say I could not disagree much more with the comments made by the member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Frankly I think that the Senate has demonstrated in the way it has dealt with this bill exactly what kind of role it should be playing: a very useful and thoughtful role without at the same time interfering totally with the government's mandate or plans.

In the case of this bill, in spite of the evidence it was able to hear in its legislative committee, which we were unable to hear in the House of Commons committee because of pressure from government members who are no longer government members, having left the governing party since then for other reasons, in spite of that pressure we had in the Senate committee the opportunity to have a very broad variety of evidence presented. The senators were able to hear the concerns of Canadians that should have been expressed to members of this House, but the government would not permit that.

The Senate then came forward with two very reasonable amendments to address two of the extreme problems with this bill. I agree with the member for Sault Ste. Marie that that does not address the essential iniquity of this bill which is to undermine the principle of universality in the most indirect, underhanded fashion.

The issue is simply whether or not Canadians should be given the opportunity to debate that fundamental principle of our social policy, universality, in a comprehensive way so that when we decide what kind of country we want to be, not just this year but this decade and the decades to come, we do so on the foundation of thorough debate in the House of Commons and hearing the views of the people of this country.

What we have in this clawback measure is a fundamental change in social policy disguised as an income tax measure. As an example of how devious the government has been in presenting this measure we had the Minister of Finance before the finance committee, not three weeks ago now, criticizing the fact that the Senate took time to study this bill and saying: "Look what they are doing. They are holding up the large corporations tax." The Minister of Finance had the nerve to come in and parade the fact that he was willing to tie together a fundamental social policy change in Canada, the end of universality, with a revenue-generating scheme, the large corporations tax, and then say that one was being thwarted by some effort at studying the other.

I think it is a disgrace that we have reached the point in Canada where things that were described as sacred trusts by a man who wanted to be Prime Minister of Canada can be tied to measures like the large corporations tax and be made to look like they are mere fiscal measures.

The Minister of State in his remarks really admitted the idea of this measure has nothing to do with fairness or equality. It has to do with reducing the deficit.

Reducing the deficit is what drives the policy of the Government of Canada these days. It drives it in science and technology. It drives it in everything else. There is a failure to consider what is important, to consider what kind of country we want to have.

While there is money to spend on propaganda advertising, while there is money to buy food tasters for the Prime Minister, there is not money to spend on seniors.

As I say, the essence of this debate that should be had about universality is essentially this. If it is believed that the principle of universal pension payments for persons in their senior years should not apply to those in higher income categories, then that proposition is a simple one. It is very easily debated in this forum and other forums across the country. If that is the principle, why do we not say that and go forward and devise a social policy that meets the needs of the 1990s and beyond?

Instead, this tax is meant to disguise what it actually is. This tax is described as not affecting universality. The Minister of State says that himself. We are giving the money to everybody. They can pocket it. They can put it in their right hand pocket. What they do not realize is that there is another hand in there already waiting to take it back out. Is that universality? On the contrary, this is a tax measure directed at seniors.

Who else in Canada, other than senior citizens, pays an extra tax on old age pensions? No one. No one else receives it. It is simply a tax based on age.

Similarly, the tax back on family allowances is a tax based on family size, not on income. If it were on income, it would be subject to the usual marginal tax rates. No, these are tax measures directed at families and seniors. They have not been subject to debate on the basis of the social policy that underlies them.

The member for Sault Ste. Marie was right when he quoted me as saying that this provision should be deleted from Bill C-28. If the government wants to introduce this policy, it should be introduced as part of a new piece of legislation brought forward, probably by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as part of the whole income security arrangement for Canada. Then let us debate it as a matter of social policy.

I remind the government that the previous Minister of National Health and Welfare back in 1985 introduced a discussion paper in which he said the clawback of old age pensions—he did not use that terminology of course—would not be acceptable. Why? Because seniors plan on this. They expect it. Therefore it would not be fair.

The senators have made two minor proposals. They did not undo the clawback, as maybe they should have, they proposed to mitigate its effects to some extent, with two measures. The first would index the threshold at which the clawback applies. That surely to goodness is the minimum.

The government says two things. It says: "Trust us. We have always raised thresholds before. Who is to say we will not raise them again?" If it is going to raise them again, then why not index them? It is as simple as that.

The government then says: "It only affects 4 per cent of seniors". Yet it justifies it on the basis of the deficit. If it only affects 4 per cent, then surely indexing it would not have that much impact on the deficit? Yet the measure of fairness that would be brought by indexation is well worth the modest cost involved.

What about the minor amount of tax credit that the senators propose to people who at least in their minds bought and paid for their old age pensions? Under the proposal from the Senate, qualifying individuals, that is, people who have reached age 65 now, or will between now and 2006, are going to get a minor tax credit that they can apply against the clawback. This reflects the fact that these people for many years understood that when they paid the Old Age Security tax on their tax forms they were going to get an old age pension. That is what they were paying for.

I have the 1971 T-1 General Tax Guide in my hands. It states on page 17 under "Old Age Security Tax" that all taxpayers whose taxable income is over $500 are subject to the Old Age Security Tax. The tax is 4 per cent of taxable income, a maximum of $240.

That tax was in place since 1952. It was brought in for very good reasons. It was brought in to convince people that the Old Age Security measures introduced by the government were not some kind of charitable giveaway, or a gift to seniors who were poor. This was not some kind of hand-out. It was every senior citizen's right as a citizen of Canada, it came with their citizenship. Even today citizenship is a necessary qualification to receive the old age pension in Canada. It was part of the national fabric. It was part of what bound us together as Canadians.

The government wants to do away with that as a universal measure. We think it is wrong. What the Senate asks in its proposed amendment is simply that as a minimum, as a minor gesture to fairness, the government recognize the fact that seniors in this country paid for this over the years. They understood they were paying for it. Governments accepted the money on the basis that it was a contribution to the Old Age Security that that person was going to receive. Why not introduce this temporary measure? It has a sunset clause. It does not go on forever. It really only affects a small number of people, namely, those who contributed to the Old Age Security tax. Those people who are in the clawback category would receive some contribution from the moneys that they had put in previously to pay for this pension.

These are not unreasonable propositions that the Senate has sent back. They may be less than some of us would have liked, but I think they represent the very best that the Senate could offer, while still being very careful to exercise on itself constitutional moderation. It is a way to say to the government that they understand it will object strongly if they delete the clawback. They do not like it but propose these modest, reasonable measures to introduce an element of fairness. They are meant to introduce an element of confidence for seniors that the threshold will not be totally eroded by inflation, and to say to those who have paid in the past that we recognize that you thought you were getting a pension that you were paying for. We will help to compensate you for what you have lost by recognizing that through a tax credit system. These are not large amounts of money, but they are very important amounts of money when we consider the importance of maintaining the integrity of the system that Canada has been built upon.

Surely, at a time in Canada's history when our national fabric is being strained as it is, this is not the time to turn to our seniors and say: "Whatever the government says to you, do not count on it. Do not count on it, because we will look to you, just as we will to everybody else, to pay more than your share. Don't count on promises. Don't count on sacred trusts. Don't count on Prime Ministers who are willing to display their mothers on election platforms in order to generate confidence among senior citizens. You cannot believe any of those things".

Is this the message that the government is trying to send out? If so, the government is doing a very good job at it. It has convinced Canadians that it cannot be trusted. This, of all times, is a time when national trust and confidence needs to be established. Canadians need to have a government they can believe in.

What I suggest is that the government reconsider the motion that it has put forward. It should reconsider it in light of what the Senate might have done with this proposal, in light of what it was justified in doing with it, and in light of the fact that the government has put before us the most major change of social policy in a generation in Canada and has sneaked it through as part of an income tax bill. The Senate let the government do it, reluctantly, but provided minor justifiable amendments to make the new system at least a modicum more fair.

Rather than the motion it has put forward, the government ought to be considering accepting these modest amendments and acknowledging that the chamber of sober second thought has looked at this, has found some reasonable way for it to regain some of the confidence that senior citizens in Canada ought to have in it. Therefore, in the interest of trust, in the interest of co-operation in Canada, the government should say it will accept those moderate changes and and will move forward on that basis.

That is what I suggest to the government. Now is the opportunity. Revoke this motion. We can have Bill C-28 through this afternoon by accepting the very minor amendments that have been proposed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richardson): Are there questions or comments? The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I agree again with 90 per cent of what my hon. colleague said. He took the New Democrats to task for what appeared to be our inconsistency with the Senate.

He himself suggested that the Senate, and I will use his words, was an undemocratic body. I am just wondering how we are to take these amendments brought forward by the Senate. If he recognizes the Senate as undemocratic, then do we accept one amendment but not the other? I am not quite sure.

The basic logic here is that if you defend the actions of the Senate the corollary would be: Do the Liberals support the $153 per diem pay raise for the senators?

Mr. Manley: As always, Mr. Speaker, the NDP is long on rhetoric and short on thought.

It seems a very simple proposition to me. The Senate has sent us a proposal. Here it is. It has emanated from an unelected body. Therefore, I agree, it is not democratic.

As my friend knows, we also had proposals that came from various groups and organizations in Canada when the committee sat. They are not democratically organized groups. They represent interests.

Each one of us as members of the House of Commons can read what is proposed, evaluate its merits and say whether it is good or bad. I do not really care that the senators have done things now or in the past that I agree or disagree with.

My question earlier to the member for Sault Ste. Marie was based on his philosophical position that the Senate should be abolished. If it should be abolished, then why would he urge it to take stronger measures than it has already taken?

Rather what I am asking all members of this House to do is to say that, yes, we have a Senate. It has put something forward. I am capable of reading and understanding what it put forward. I know the member for Sault Ste. Marie is also capable of reading and understanding it. If it is good, then we should simply apply it. It is as simple as that.

I do not think that it has to be implied that because it came from a body which is more largely one party than another that therefore you take these things totally on a partisan basis. I think that we should be willing to sit in this House and to say: "Let's look at the merits of the proposal".

The National Council on Welfare made propositions. I think some of them show great merit. I do not even know what political party that association may be affiliated with, if any.

It seems to me that the minimum we are called upon to do in this Chamber is to use whatever native intelligence we might have and evaluate proposals that come forward. That is the challenge I have, not only for the NDP, but in these difficult days for the government. If they would at least read them, then perhaps it would find them less offensive.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, first, I want to thank my colleague for the very eloquent remarks that he made today. Seldom, if ever, has such eloquence been heard in this House. We can really tell that our learned and distinguished colleague obviously knows this subject very well.

I want to ask my colleague about the old age security tax of which he spoke with such knowledge and eloquence and of its application in recent years.

Our equally eloquent colleague from Kingston and the Islands today in Question Period raised an issue which involves a court which has decided in relation to another bill that the trust of a government is so fundamental to our system that if Canadians do not believe that their governments can be trusted when they have made commitments, then, similarly, how can we ask Canadians to pay their taxes voluntarily based on the same kind of trust that should be there?

I think there is an analogy here. There is definitely a parallel. These are, in certain cases, the same people who are paying income taxes now from whom a number of years ago we collected moneys. At that time we promised them certain benefits under the old age security tax.

I want to ask my colleague who is so learned in the law if he will not agree with me that there is something inherently wrong from a justice point of view, as well as everything else, with a government that makes promises and does not keep them. I ask our colleague, the Minister of Health who is diligently taking notes of all of this as we are speaking, to listen very attentively to the answer of my colleague from Ottawa South.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I am up to the standard of eloquence that has been requested of me.

I think the essence of this is the concept of voluntary compliance that really underlies our income tax system. What we know is that in Canada we have had a very successful history of encouraging our citizens to comply voluntarily with the income tax rules, which sometimes have been pretty complicated. But people have shown a willingness to pay their taxes.

However, what is happening now, this year, in this particular measure is a request to Canadians to comply not only voluntarily, but to comply voluntarily with laws that have not been passed.

We have been told that these clawback measures are going to be in effect for 1989, no matter when this bill is passed.

• (1750)

People had to file their income tax returns by April 30, 1990. Although we were under no legal obligation to pay the clawback, the government is going to come after us later and try to take it out of our pockets. I do not know how many people realize that that is going to happen, that that retroactive feature is in this bill.

Meanwhile we have the government saying: "Even though you paid us in advance for your old age pension benefits, we are not going to let you have them". Surely, with the layer of GST put on top of it all, at some point people will get fed up and say: "That's it. Voluntary compliance, out the window. If they can catch me, they can have me. Until then, I'm keeping the cash in the pocket". The danger that this government is getting into is the danger of undermining voluntary compliance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richardson): Is the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands rising on a point of order?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I have discussed this matter with the other parties. Because of my enthusiasm in preparing my speech this afternoon I forgot to serve notice of my intention to raise a question on the late show at some future date with regard to a question I raised today in Question Period.

I wonder if the House would agree to allow me to file the application now. I apologize profusely to the House for having missed this very important point. I think that a seven-minute discourse on justice matters will be of interest to the House later.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we expressed some amazement that that was a prepared speech and that it should be used as an excuse.

However, we felt that if our hon. colleague opposite is willing to admit that it was a prepared speech, then the least we could do is grant unanimous consent for his request.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richardson): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richardson): Resuming debate with the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, after the Minister of Finance introduced the clawback provisions in his budget I asked him during Question Period one day about what guarantee Canadians have that these clawbacks would not affect them in terms of the mounting cost of living, and that their pensions in fact would not be clawed back.

The finance minister said not only to me, but to all Canadians: "Trust us".

Canadians trusted this government on free trade. Look what we got. Canadians trusted this government on unemployment insurance. Look what we got. Canadians trusted this government on child care. Look what we did not get.

The Prime Minister said to us that his mother is proud of him, she is not worried, she trusts him. I can tell the hon. members here assembled and the Prime Minister who may some day read Hansard that there are an awful lot of moms and dads, in this country who do not trust him or his government. They do not trust anymore that their interests are the concern of this government.

We have had one piece of legislation after another come before this House that begs that trust. In fact that trust has been ignored. The government's actions have flown in the face of Canadians who not only trusted it but who voted for it giving its members a mandate to protect their interests.

When Bill C-28 was debated before it was sent off to the Senate, the Liberals in this House talked very eloquently and passionately about the sanctity of universality.

The member for Winnipeg St. James was very clear when he said: "This has been an attack on seniors". He said: "It is a betrayal of the senior citizens of this country. They do not deserve this kind of treatment. They deserve our respect. They earned the right to this pension".

The hon. member for Halifax said: "A clawback is a clawback".

The hon. member for Hillsborough said: "Parents and pensioners make a special invaluable contribution to our society in the past, present and future. These clawbacks imply that such contributions are unimportant and that some are worth even less than others".

The hon. member for Stormont—Dundas said: "I urge the government to rescind the clawback proposal contained in C-28".

The hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River said: "Canadians do not support the clawback and they will never accept it".

The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said: "For me as a Liberal that kind of thinking is wrong. There is no way that senior citizens should apologize to the members across the way and beg to get money from this government".

I am absolutely astounded with that kind of presentation from the hon. members on the Liberal benches that a Liberal-led Senate is indeed sending back to this House Bill C-28 with minor amendments that in fact still attack the universality of pensions and family allowances.

It is important to consider some of the things that senators said when the Senate was discussing this bill in committee. Senator Grafstein said: "I think the committee and the Senate has a responsibility to ensure that the Charter is maintained". This is in reference to Bill C-28. He continued: "If in fact this clawback runs afoul of Charter considerations because it discriminates on the basis of age, we should give it careful consideration. We are obliged to ensure that any laws that pass the Senate meet the contours of the Charter".

Senator M. Kirby said: "I should like to say at the outset that I think this is a fabulous brief". He is referring to a brief presented to the Senate committee hearing. He said: "You have summarized the objections to this part of Bill C-28 more clearly and more briefly than anyone else who has appeared before us and I congratulate you for that". It was a presentation and a brief from One Voice which categorically condemned the clawbacks in this legislation.

I could go on. I have a whole list of both Liberal opposition members and Liberal senators who have spoken very eloquently about the sanctity of the universality of social programs in this country.

We have before us two amendments sent back from the Senate. We have members of the government getting up and giving eloquent speeches about how fair this legislation is to seniors and to parents. They give us a whole lot of numbers and bafflegab like: "It is only going to hurt a little bit. The richer you are, the less it will hurt you".

If we were to look very carefully at the statistics as time goes on and as the clawback moves along, we would find that a mother today who is 20 years old and earning $20,000, by the time she retires would find her pension clawed back, assuming that everything else was equal and that she was in the same job. Is the minister over there agreeing with me?

No, he is not agreeing with me. Maybe we should put your statistics, Mr. Minister, and my statistics together and see if we cannot find out just who is stating the facts in this case. Maybe we could give them to the Senate and it could figure it out.

This clawback discriminates against one-earner families. It is both unjust and illogical. A one-earner couple at $56,000 will pay back all of its family allowance.

Mrs. Dobbie: Are you suggesting we discriminate against married couples?

Ms. Langan: The hon. member opposite will have her turn later. She can certainly get up and rebut what I have said to her heart's content when I am finished.

A one-earner couple earning $56,000 will pay back all its family allowance. The two-income couple earning $80,000—$24,000 more than the one-earner family that I just spoke of—gets to keep over half of its family allowance. I would like to ask hon. members opposite how that can be considered fair. That is what the government introduced. It is still there with the Senate amendments. I would like to ask all hon. members assembled if they believe that that is fair. Not only have we abandoned universality, now we are creating inequities.

The clawback will add to the complexity of the child benefit system. After the clawback, there will be four types of families receiving family allowance: one, who will keep all of their family allowance because they are too poor to owe income tax. The second will be those who keep part of their family allowance, because they pay regular income tax on their benefits. The third group consists of those who keep part of their family allowance because they pay regular income tax and the clawback is going to take place on their benefits. Fourth, those who will pay all of their family allowance back because of the clawback.

Fairness and equity apply. As the hon. members on the government side of the House know, the clawback will not redirect benefits from the rich to the poor. That is the basis on which the government is trying to sell this bill. They are telling people in Canada: "We will take it from the rich people who make $50,000 a year and we will give it to the poor."

I have never ever believed and I do not think anybody in this House believes that the Conservative government from across the way is Robin Hood, taking from the rich and giving to the poor. Never, never, never has this government taken from the rich and given to the poor.

The clawback on family allowance and old age pensions will save the government about $500 million a year when this game is fully in effect. When I finish speaking, I would like to have the hon. minister who spoke earlier tell us how that $500 million a year will be given to the poor in this country. I defy him to get up and tell us that that $500 million is going to go to the poor.

We believe that the federal government should abandon the clawback proposals in Bill C-28. There is no question that those clawbacks put an end to universality both in pensions and in family allowance.

The National Council of Welfare, a citizens' advisory body to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and appointed by the cabinet to advise the minister on matters of social policy, believes that this legislation should not have ever occurred. It believes that this legislation is putting the death stamp on universality in this country.

The other point is the absolute shock when one starts looking at where this government introduces its social policy. This government does not introduce social policy through the Minister of National Health and Welfare or through other ministers in this government. Where does it introduce social policy? It introduces it in the budget, buried in figures so that people have no realization of how bad these amendments are.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare does not stand up and say: "We are going to grab back part of your pension or part of your family allowance." The minister responsible for pensions does not jump up and say: "We are going to grab back part of your pension." Never. This government introduces it in a budget with figures that even the most astute people in the media and in this House along with their advisers take days and weeks to figure out.

The government expects ordinary, average Canadians to figure out that they are getting the shaft from this government. I have news for you, Mr. Speaker. The average Canadian could never figure out what is in those budget documents. It is absolutely shocking that this government hides its dastardly deeds in the confines of huge budgetary documents.

This country introduced universality in the family allowance, medicare, old age pensions, the programs that are so important to what makes our society special as caring Canadians. Nobody ever dreamed that we would find ourselves faced with a government that through the guise of trying to achieve a level playing field—and maybe that is the reason—gives us reasons for balancing budgets. Yet, it spends on the other end and takes it away on the social programs. We give it on the other end. We give tax breaks to corporate friends. Nobody ever believed that this government—

An hon. member: How about our co-operative partners?

Ms. Langan: We can talk about that. Let's talk about that. You can ask me questions about that when I am finished speaking, hon. minister.

I do not have to make any apologies for the basic principles of New Democrats, nor will I make apologies. I would like to ask hon. members some questions about their basic principles, but this is not the place to do it.

The kind of thing we need to discuss in this House is how we find ourselves faced with a piece of legislation from a Tory government that supposedly grabs back from the rich today.

An hon. member: That is right. Today.

Ms. Langan: I have already stated, and I will state it again. If you are earning $30,000 today and you are 30 years old, by the time you retire your pension will be clawed back. If you earn $40,000 today and are aged 40, by the time you retire, your pension will be clawed back. Do not tell me that it is being clawed back from the rich. It is the well-to-do. Fifty thousand dollars is not rich today. It is the well-to-do today, and tomorrow it is the poor. Do not try to fool Canadians.

An hon. member: That's who they are after.

Ms. Langan: Do not try to fool Canadians by saying that you are taking this money from the rich. You are taking this money today from middle-income Canadians and tomorrow from the poor Canadians.

It is absolutely critical for Canadians to take a look at the fact that this Tory government has yet again tried to fool Canadians into believing that they are doing them a favour by taking from the rich when in fact their intent is to take from average and poor Canadians. At the same time we have a Liberal Senate that claims in the loftiest of terms to be committed to universality coming back with a couple of measly little amendments when in fact it has the power to stop this legislation.

There are those who have said to us: "Well, suddenly New Democrats are embracing the Senate". Not true. In fact, what we are saying is if there is a Senate there, let's put that Senate to work to protect Canadians. If there is any kind of heart in this government, if it can get its act together—and there seems to be a little bit of difficulty over there even figuring out what we will do from day to day around here—I would plead with it not to rely on the Senate to withdraw this bill, but to have the courage and respect for the Canadian people, the people who are building this country, the people who have indeed built this country in the name of our pensioners, and withdraw this bill.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I congratulate my hon. colleague for her fine speech.

I do not think Canadians ever get tired of hearing what a heinous group this group opposite really is. When talking about unjust, iniquitous, obscene legislation, the member cited that one particular clause where a married couple, each earning $49,000 for a total of $98,000, will not be clawed back on their family allowance, but a single parent earning $50,001 will have his or her pension clawed back. Why would the government allow this obvious unjust legislation to come forward without an amendment of its own? Second, why would the Senate not introduce an appropriate amendment?

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

First of all, why would this government introduce such an unfair piece of legislation? God only knows why. This government is becoming infamous. It will go down in history as being the government that has consistently, time after time after time, introduced legislation that is not only outrageous and iniquitous and all of those things, but is indeed unfair.

• (1810)

As to why the Senate has not done something about it, I cannot speak for the senators, but I am quite surprised that the Senate, in its proposed amendments, has not addressed that subject. The most frustrating thing about all of this is that this government and this minister who is backing the motion not to support the amendments of the Senate would not, after all this government has heard about the inequities and the unfairness in this legislation, have addressed these inequities. I would hope that when I sit down the hon. minister would get up and do just that.

An hon. member: He will.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I would like to say that the greatest threat to the people the hon. member was referring to would be for us to run away from a very difficult responsibility, which is to bring the deficit and the debt down. Otherwise it is our very capacity to deal with our programs and to support our programs on a continuing basis that will be threatened.

It is all very nice to live in a land where these problems do not arise when you have access to any amount of money. We are dealing with a very precise situation where Canadians are contributing a huge amount of money to our programs. They want us to deal, and I am sure that every member in this House would like us to deal in a responsible way with the finances of this country and this is what we are doing. We are cutting and trying to make savings where we are spending.

The government, of course, spends in areas which are always of great importance. I do not deny that we do not live in an ideal world. We are trying to manage the finances properly and protect the capacity of the government. If we do not do that, in a few years time it will not be what the hon. member called clawback; it will be the disappearance of these programs. Money does not grow on trees. We have to work in a responsible way to make sure that these programs are preserved because they are important.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for commenting. I remind him that the term clawback is a term created and put forward by the finance minister, not by this hon. member.

The hon. minister says that the responsibility of the government is to reduce the deficit so that we can continue to have social programs. I suggest that if this government is serious about reducing the deficit, why are we reducing the deficit on the backs of seniors, on the backs of parents and on the backs of children in this country? Don't give me the argument that it is to protect our children's future. What about the present? Starve me today so I can live well tomorrow? Come on.

What this government needs to do is talk about taxing corporate Canada fairly. If we took all of those deferred taxes and put them in the coffers of the government, we would not have to tax from kids and we would not have to tax from pensioners, like he is proposing. What about doing something about the artificially high Canadian dollar or the interest rates in this country? If we could get the finance minister to do something about the interest rates in this country, we could take care of that billion dollars that this clawback is going to grab for the government.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak on this bill and to speak on the issue of fairness. There has been a lot of back and forth about the provisions of the bill and the clawback and whether or not the government is Robin Hood or the Sheriff of Nottingham.

The question that we must deal with is strictly one of whether or not governments are supposed to be fair to the people they govern. The answer with regard to this bill, and with all due deference to the hon. minister opposite, is no. The answer is no.

We look at this bill and we see that those families which earn in excess of $50,000 a year will be clawed back on their old age pension and on their family allowance.

First of all, I am astounded by the insinuations of some hon. members opposite that $50,000 a year creates the aura of riches. If we are talking about a family of four or five, if we are even talking about two senior citizens with a pensionable income of $50,100 a year, we are not talking riches. I come from, admittedly the poorest region of the country, so there are not a whole lot of people in my region who fall into this category. Even I being from the Atlantic region know that $50,000 spread across the average Canadian family is not a huge amount of money.

In regard to the old age pension, many of the people who are going to be clawed back on their old age pension are not receiving it as some gratuitous frill. This old age pension was something that many of them contributed to in the beginning and middle years of their working lives, because this pension was a contributory pension. Consequently, when these people, as most of our senior citizens do, planned for their retirement years, they included at least in a ball park way the old age pension as part of the funds they would have in their retirement years and used them in planning how they would spend those years. What they are dealing with is a breach of trust by the government and a loss of income.

The same can be said for those families receiving family allowance. It is already taxed back on a reasonable level. People who make over a certain income will lose a certain percentage of their family allowance. That is fair. That is what we expect. That is what the program was meant to do.

I listened with interest to the hon. minister's comments about the deficit and the business that if we do not take care of the deficit now we will not have any money for social programs in the future. That is fine, but he has already received suggestions from my hon. colleague from Kingston and the Islands, my hon. colleague from Ottawa South, my hon. colleague from Mission—Coquitlam, and a host of other opposition members of other ways in which he can reduce this deficit and not to do it by a direct attack on the elderly and on children.

I can remember several years ago at a Liberal Party convention where some people, misguided though they were, brought forward a resolution to create a means test on the family allowance. I am happy to say that it was voted down in a social policy workshop by somewhere in the vicinity of 370 to 3, because we did not stand for means tests on social programs in the Liberal Party. We stand for universality and for universality that benefits everyone at least a bit.

I recall an hon. member of the other place, a very senior senator, who had been involved in the government of this country for a long time, standing and making an emotional plea in that workshop and saying that even in the dark days of the depression when the Liberals regained the government in 1935, when things were pretty hopeless in this country, we instituted social programs on a universal basis. We did not take them away.

That is what a government that is fair and a government that cares about its people does. It does not turn around and say to elderly people who have planned their retirement years that it is suddenly going to claw back their old age pension. I just ask members opposite how easy they think it is for one wage earner making $50,100 or whatever a year to provide for a family of two, three, or four children, to try to plan for the future, for the children's education, and to try to provide a few of the extras in life. We talk about taking back from the rich. We have already established that this salary level does not make one rich. I would suggest to you that most members of Parliament could attest to that. Is there some sort of method in the government's madness that, if this amount of money makes one rich or if it does not, somehow we should penalize people who have children? Effectively that is what this is doing.

There is a whole issue relating to the family allowance which gets passed over by certainly the government members and, to a degree, even by members on this side: that women receive the family allowance. It is money that comes to women. If the women are at home and are not wage earners outside the home but have husbands, the tax for that family allowance comes off the husbands' salaries.

Almost any woman in this House—certainly many women across the country—know for a fact that in every one of our cities, towns, and villages across the country there are women in distress, women in abusive situations, women in untenable situations who have saved those family allowance cheques month to month, year to year until they have enough money to make an escape. I have seen it. I suggest that many of us have seen it.

There is a fiction created that the clawing back of this benefit is not going to create a hardship. It is going to create a hardship. We know that abusive situations, wife abuse and family violence, are not limited to the homes of the poor. They are not limited to certain regions of the country. We know that the spectre of family violence raises its head in every possible socio-economic bracket in Canada. We know that.

Anybody who works in social work, in the legal profession, or in any of the social professions dealing with people on a day to day basis will say that women use this money for an escape hatch. For many women in this situation it is already difficult to hang on to this money because in spite of the income levels of many of their husbands the response is: "I am being taxed on this. It is my money. You give it to me." Many women are coerced into endorsing over the cheques.

I have seen situations where women have just been told: "Sign it and hand it to me or I won't be responsible for the consequences." Women already have a difficulty in maintaining that which is theirs. If an abusive husband is going to be taxed at a higher rate, how much narrower a window of opportunity is his wife going to have to hang on to this money?

I reiterate that this happens in every corner of this country. It happens to women in tenements. It happens to women in mansions. It happens to women from coast to coast to coast. It is not something that we should be prepared to slough off or gloss over lightly. It is an important and frightening aspect of what this bill can do to worsen a situation for women who are already in desperate circumstance.

I know very well that the hon. minister is a compassionate man. I have heard him on many occasions. I know he cares about things like this, but I suggest that the government in its planning did not think of this aspect of what this bill can do.

I agree with my colleague from Kingston and the Islands; I very much wish that the Senate had sent back even tougher amendments. However I think the amendments that it has sent are eminently reasonable. I do not understand why the government sees fit to speak against them. What the Senate is effectively saying, if I may be so bold as to interpret it, is that this clawback should be indexed in such a way that within 10 years the level of clawback will not go to an income that is worth effectively $35,000 in today's dollars. By the way, may I add that I am delighted to hear the change of heart by my colleagues in the New Democratic Party with regard to the other place. Every year under the current legislation more and more people are going to fall into this trap, more and more people are going to be facing real hardship.

Everybody in this House who grew up since the inception of the family allowance has stories to tell as to what the money was used for. I recall as the only child of a widowed mother that the family allowance cheques which came to my mother for me were used to pay for insurance benefits.

I recall other friends whose parents in the pre-medicare days used the family allowance to pay for things such as glasses and shoes in many cases. That money that came in, even back in the days when it was $6 a month or $8 a month, made a real difference to families who were not considered to be poverty level. They were considered to be ordinary middle-class Canadian families. At $50,000 a year that is what we are talking about in 1990.

In the year 2000, if this bill keeps on, where do you think the poverty line will be, Madam Speaker? I suggest that it will be a lot closer to $35,000 than it will be to $50,000 today.

Let us look at the reasons that social programs were put into place. They were put into place because of the spirit that is Canada, because of the raison d'être of this country.

Most of us in the House, with the exception of perhaps my colleague from Nunatsiaq, my colleague from the Western Arctic and another colleague from Alberta who is not here, came here through our parents, our grandparents, our ancestors, to live a better life. That is why we came here. Whether we came from eastern Europe, western Europe, from France, the British Isles, that is why we or our ancestors came to this country. We came because we wanted to see a system of government that was fair, equal and democratic.

We also knew that not everybody, in spite of the opportunities that Canada offers, can take full advantage of those opportunities. There are some people so caught in the cycle of poverty that without massive assistance they cannot break out. There are some people because of other socio-economic difficulties who cannot realize their full potential.

Consequently that was the reason in the dirty thirties the government of this country said that we needed social programs to assist, that we needed to ensure the elderly and families had something to help them along.

It was not considered—and certainly it has not been in my lifetime—a temporary measure to be thrown away because of economic exigencies in other areas of government delivery of services. That is the way, sadly, this government is treating social programs today.

The Prime Minister referred to universality as a sacred trust. It is a sad day for Canada that the words sacred trust have become base coinage.

The people of this country have a right to believe that the things they helped fight for, that they contributed to through their tax dollars, and that they contributed to through their building of this country would be there for them and for their children. The trust, sacred or otherwise, has been broken.

In the last election a number of my colleagues in the Liberal Party and I were faced with the accusation that we used scare tactics particularly when we talked to senior citizens about pensions.

If we used scare tactics, what is this but the realization of what we talked about? When I talked to senior citizens in Halifax in the 1988 campaign, we talked about how safe their pensions were and we talked about the old age pension. I did not ask every senior citizen who I talked to in the 22 senior citizens' complexes across the riding of Halifax or in the houses and apartment buildings where I met them door to door, what their income from all sources was and say that if they fell into this category they may lose something. Almost every one of those seniors to whom I talked had contributed to that old age pension. They felt that it was a part of an investment that they had made in themselves and in this country and they are angry and disappointed that the tables have been turned on them and that they are going to lose this money.

I began my remarks tonight by talking about fairness. It has been said before by practically everyone who has spoken this evening on this side of the House, but it bears repeating. Where is the fairness in a couple with a joint pension income of over $50,000 but individually of $26,000 a piece, for example, being exempt from this while another couple where one person has the income is getting clawed back? Where is the fairness in the family where there is one wage earner who makes in excess of $50,000 and therefore gets clawed back, while in a family where there are two wage earners whose aggregate salary reaches this figure does not get touched?

There just comes a point, Madam Speaker, where it goes beyond the question of fairness and becomes a question of common sense. Every member on the other side of the House has examples of this in his or her riding. Every one of them has people who are going to be distressed and upset about this. It does not seem to me to make any kind of sense either in the realm of fairness or in the realm of good policy or good politics. I guess in the long run it is somewhat akin to the commercial that says, "You can't fool mother nature", and mother nature is going to be a little upset when mother nature goes to the polls.

However, I think that there are so many reasons for upset at this point that it may well be that the government just figures there is nothing left to lose. Just as an aside, I must say I was happy to see that in the province of Nova Scotia—and I say this to make the members opposite feel better—the federal Conservatives are doing much better than the provincial Conservatives, the federal Conservatives being at 14 per cent and the provincial ones being at 13 per cent.

Mr. Duhamel: What are the Liberals at, 68 per cent?

Ms. Clancy: I think it was 68 per cent, it might have been 70 per cent.

We talk about fairness; we talk about families. I have listened to the members on the other side of the House who on occasion seem a little bit afraid of some of the developments of modern history particularly relating to the status of women. I can only say to a government that claims to be family oriented and claims to be in favour of the family, that if this is the way that it treats its friends, it is no wonder that it has so few.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Halifax for her intervention. She made reference to 1935 when the Liberal government introduced universal programs. Is she was aware that in fact it was as a result of A.A. Heaps, J.S. Woodsworth and Agnes Macphail and others in the Ginger Group who forced the Liberal government, when they held the balance of power as CCFers, to introduce that legislation?

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam. Liberalism goes back many generations in my family and we have never been averse to using other people's good ideas. We have never been averse to using those ideas for the benefit of the people of Canada. We have never been averse because, being a party that gets into power fairly frequently, it is lucky that somebody will use these ideas.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for her perceptive and insightful comments. There are three points I want to make.

You will recall the attempt on the part of the government to bring about deindexation. A lot of people are saying that the bottom line is really the same when one looks at clawback and deindexation. I would like a comment on that.

A number of my constituents, seniors, have said that the old age pension that they paid into was really an investment, the point that the member made, and that if they had paid it to a private company and that private company were trying to claw it back now, it would be sued. Is that a possibility? Also this clawback affects women more than men because there is certainly a larger proportion of women who are seniors today.

I have just one final point with respect to the unemployment insurance bill. You will recall that during the election campaign a certain minister, who is not present in the House right now, checked with the Prime Minister with respect to whether or not there would be any kind of changes that would negatively impact upon Canadian workers. Does the member recall that conversation?

Is this then not a very misleading bill as a result of what occurred during the election campaign?

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from St. Boniface. First, there is no question that seniors are again feeling absolutely betrayed. This did not work when it was tried by this government previous to 1988 because the seniors stood up and made it stop. But this time the government is coming at it through the back door and effectively, over time, unless this tide can be stemmed, it will achieve much the same result. Seniors are angry, upset, distressed. They know what the words "sacred trust" mean.

With regard to the question about the investment, suppose you put money in an RRSP at one of the chartered banks and then they said to you: "Hey, we are sorry, we told you that we would pay you 11 per cent interest but we have decided now we are only going to pay you 2 per cent interest". I think your cause of action, and I suggest the hon. Minister of Transport would agree with me, would be something that you would be fairly willing to take a run at.

The hon. member's third point was again on a question of trust, the fact of a minister, to whom he referred, checking with the Prime Minister about the UI bill in this particular case but about any changes that would go to the fabric of our universal social programs system. In response to that I can only say that Canadians sit back in holy horror and say: "How can we put our trust in people who say one thing and do another?"

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

TRADE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade on April 23, I asked the Minister of Agriculture a question about the dumping of subsidized soybean oil from the European Common Market on to the Canadian market.

At that time it had been confirmed that a large Toronto based vegetable oil refinery had purchased 10 million pounds of subsidized soya oil from Spain. Spain imports soybeans from Brazil and the United States to crush and then exports the oil at a subsidized rate to protect its olive oil producers. At the same time they use a soybean meal as a livestock and poultry feed protein supplement.

Although I am disappointed to notice that while it appears as if the problem may be resolved the minister is not in attendance. I am sure there will be someone here to answer in detail the questions I raised that day.

At the outset I would like to remark that although the particular import question may not be repeated because of the promise of the company involved, the government has not yet provided any assurances that such an import will not be repeated by any other corporation. To that end, I look forward to seeing just what the minister proposes as a remedy and just what his investigation into this matter revealed.

I should point out that there was no shortage of soya oil in Canada at the time this import was made. It was definitely a subsidized import. This can happen to other commodities where a large company will bring in a shipment of a product that is not really needed, simply to break the price structure.

I also noticed that the government has not undertaken to decrease the tariff on soybean oil imports which are currently set a 7.5 per cent, a full 15 per cent less than U.S. tariff. This figure is ironic as the soya oil in question was produced from U.S. beans exported to Spain from the U.S., and possibly under a subsidy program, then crushed in Spain and exported under yet another subsidy program.

The export enhancement program, which is the United States' main but not only export subsidy program, funded U.S. agricultural products exports to the tune of $1.5 billion in 1988, $0.7 billion in 1989, and $566 million this year. In addition to those moneys, the U.S. proposes to spend over $900 million in the program in 1991.

The minister has indicated in the past that he may use the article 19 of the free trade agreement to challenge the United States export enhancement program. I wonder if the government's statement today will indicate a willingness to use that route in view of its investigation into the dumping of this oilseed product into the Canadian market. The Canadian market under this government has become a real dumping ground for subsidized agricultural products.

For example, according to industry sources, 1 million pounds of no-roll beef a week was imported into Canada from the U.S. last year, and it is expected to double to 2 million pounds a week in 1990. This is low grade beef that because of the government's refusal to change our import regulations competes directly against our high grade quality beef in Canada. This meat is not graded when it leaves the United States, and it is unacceptable that our exports have to be graded.

This beef is in addition to the influx of imported Nicaraguan beef being dumped into Canada at the present time. This in turn has impacted negatively on our beef industry. According to the latest published Statistics Canada information, in 1984 Canada exported 230 million pounds of dressed beef. We should compare that to 1988 when Canada exported only 181 million pounds of dressed beef, a decrease of 21 per cent. In 1984, 254 million pounds of beef was imported into Canada. By 1988 that figure increased dramatically to 345 million pounds, an increase of 35 per cent.

Further, in 1985 beef exports represented 34 per cent of all red meat exports valued at $218 million; in 1986, 20 per cent with a value of $198.8 million; in 1987, 25 per cent with a value of $198 million; and in 1988, the latest date for completed figures according to Agriculture Canada, beef exports accounted for only 18 per cent of red meat exports at a value of $173 million.

For 1987-1989 the number of cattle on farms is currently lower than in any previous five-year average since 1970, and 632,000 head less than at the turn of the decade.

This is the net effect of such dumping in just one sector of the agricultural industry. The over-all effect of this government inaction has been dramatic.

The Canadian Wheat Board initial price for spring wheat in 1984 was $170 a tonne. The initial price recently announced by the government for 1990, in equivalent dollars, is only $126.73, a real drop of $43.27 a tonne, indicating that real incomes for 1990 will be considerably worse.

Producers of corn in Ontario, the province's largest single crop, said the western grain farmers are not the only ones under siege. The income of Ontario corn producers is now only 28 per cent of what it was prior to 1985.

The over-all effect of the government's polices or lack of policies is that in 1984 the average net farm income was $15,461 in equivalent dollars. The average net farm income in 1988 was only $13,224. On average since 1984 producers have seen their real incomes drop by 15 per cent.

Agriculture Canada optimistically predicts farm incomes will drop $2.77 billion this year from $4.33 billion last year, a 37 per cent drop in one year.

In spite of the incredible decline that these figures represent, I say optimistically as a report in this morning's Financial Post cites a U.S. agricultural analyst predicting a 20-year record low realized net farm income in Canada of only $1.85 billion, which would be a decline of 58 per cent.

The study finds that half of the decline is due to depressed prices for agricultural products. The other half is due, the analyst argues, to direct government action: the wholesale removal of agricultural support programs. That is the legacy of this government's agricultural program. Indeed, the government openly admits that it plans to cut government spending on agriculture to $3.2 billion this year from $5.6 billion last year and $6.1 billion in 1988, a 50 per cent plunge in two years.

I would like to remind Canadians just how many support programs for agriculture the federal government has removed in a simple budget in 1989: crop insurance, $200 million; rail branch line rehabilitation program, $48 million; grain crop advance payments, $54 million; dairy export, $12 million, commodity based loans, $15 million; Canadian Dairy Commission, $10 million; grain and flour, the at and east legislation, Bill C–26, $60 million, for a total of $399 million. In fact, since this government came to power in September, 1984, the family farm in Canada has been under siege.

We have the most efficient producers in the world, but they cannot compete by themselves with the treasuries of the world, especially when the government allows other nations to dump heavily subsidized products such as soya oil on the Canadian market. The products are so cheap, as with soya oil, that they can cross the ocean twice and still be cheaper than the product produced here.

It is time this government presented some concrete plans to deal with this situation. I would specifically request the minister to take action, not just in the situation of the soya oil dumping, but also in other commodities that are being dumped on our market here and we have to compete against their export markets that are financed under the Export Enhancement Program.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, it is almost impossible in the time allotted to reply to the many concerns that the hon. member raised. We were supposed to be talking about soybean oil and and the importation of soybean oil.

But the member has touched on at least four or five different topics, such as the Canadian price for wheat, the initial price for wheat and beef, items like that. Those are all concerns of ours.

He also mentioned the cuts in payments to agriculture. I would not say that that is true. There has been a realignment in agriculture spending and we have to look over the last number of years at the amount of money with which this government has supported agriculture, the Special Grains Programs, drought assistance, and as recently as this year, the government's special $500 million program with which we are all familiar.

I do not think it is fair to say that we have abandoned the farmers in any way. We have fully supported farmers. I just wish that we had about half an hour to respond to the questions that the hon. member raised because I am sure we could have quite a good debate in that area.

The question the hon. member does raise about the trade practices of the European Economic Community illustrates an issue which causes a great concern to the government and the Canadian agriculture community. There is no question about that.

The EEC uses its export subsidies more than any other world trader to sell its agricultural commodities. The recent sale of that Spanish soybean oil to a Canadian company that the member spoke about, although not large in the over–all context to our Canadian market, is significant because it has caused concern within the Canadian oilseed industry.

Another important factor is that the 8 per cent tariff barrier imposed by EEC member states expires January 1, 1991. This will increase opportunities for Spain to dispose of surplus soybean oil within the European community.

Madam Speaker, this government is prepared to assist its oilseed producers. The industry stopped the countervail action after the importer of the Spanish oil stated publicly that they were unaware of the existence of this subsidy and promised not to make any further purchases of subsidized oil.

In the meantime our concerns were brought to the attention of the EEC and the Spanish authorities through our missions in Europe.

Before closing I want to address as well the question raised regarding the use of pesticides in imported soybean products. Maximum residue tolerances are established under the authority of Canada's Food and Drugs Act. I would like to make it very clear for the public that the same standards are applied to both Canadian and imported produce. However, the health and safety of Canadians is protected by the tolerance provisions of the Food and Drugs Act and through the monitoring by Health and Welfare Canada and Agriculture Canada.

I want to say again that this government is totally committed to support of agriculture and will assist whenever, wherever, however we can.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, on Thursday of last week my leader, the member for Yukon, the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, and myself all urged the federal government to ensure the full participation of aboriginal peoples at the First Ministers' Conference in December during the discussion of the so-called Canada clause.

I said at that time,

> —in view of the fact that an essential component of the Canada clause is the recognition of aboriginal peoples as distinct societies with distinct cultures and languages in this country, it is fundamentally unacceptable for First Ministers to sit around the table and discuss that issue without the participation of aboriginal peoples.

I called upon the Deputy Prime Minister to ensure that aboriginal peoples would, in fact, be at the table at the First Ministers' Conference in December. In his answer, the Deputy Prime Minister said that this would subvert the process. The Deputy Prime Minister talked about the leadership that the Prime Minister of Canada had displayed during the process of constitutional change.

This was the same Prime Minister who bragged in a display of breathtaking arrogance that he had manipulated the whole process. He said, "I told them when this thing was going to take place. I told them a month ago when we were going to start meeting. It's like an election campaign. You've got to work backward. You pick your dates and you work backward. And I said, that's the day I am going to roll the dice. It is the only way to handle it." Madam Speaker, that approach has been described eloquently by the Conservative member for Annapolis Valley—Hants as being "bluff, bluster and blackmail".

When the Prime Minister rolled the dice, when he played with the future of our country like a constitutional crapshoot, he forget one important element, one group of people who have historically been forgotten and betrayed in this country; the aboriginal people of Canada. In his cynical wheeling and dealing with the First Ministers at the Conference Centre, the Prime Minister left aboriginal peoples feeling degraded and humiliated; reduced to the status of observers with their noses pressed up against the window of the Conference Centre.

It was not until the Leader of the New Democratic Party insisted some four days after the conference had started, that aboriginal people were even given a briefing by federal officials as to what was taking place inside the conference centre. It was not particularly surprising, when you look at the appalling record of this government when it comes to aboriginal peoples in this country.

The Canadian north is currently under massive assault from hydroelectric projects, oil and gas development and the military. I am thinking particularly of the assault on the Innu people of Labrador. Above all, there are the forestry companies. Subsidies for northern postal services have been slashed and education funding for native students has been effectively cut. This is happening at a time when a young native person has a better chance of going to prison than going to university.

Also, native communication funding has been slashed. Core funding to the Assembly of First Nations was eliminated. Organizational money for the James Bay Cree, B.C.'s Nishga, the Gitksan Wet'suwet'en and other vocal critics, was dropped; the Manitoba inquiry into aboriginal justice, the Marshall Inquiry and the Alberta inquiry into the Bloods has demonstrated that the justice system is steeped in racism.

Indeed, as a brief submitted by the Assembly of First Nations stated: "All of the institutions of our culture are under attack. Our languages are disappearing as our elders die. Our religions are disappearing with the spread of religions from other parts of the world. Our hunting, fishing, trapping and gathering lifestyles are disappearing with the wanton killing of animals, pollution, forestry clear cutting, encroachment upon wilderness areas and megaprojects all in the name of progress and development".

Given all of this, is it not surprising that aboriginal peoples are feeling betrayed by this process of constitutional change. It has left them out and they, and I, salute the courage, the dignity and the eloquence with which Manitoba Cree New Democrat MLA, Elijah Harper, has been forcing the Government of Canada, indeed, all governments, to finally pay attention to the demands of aboriginal peoples for constitutional justice and respect.

On the weekend, the British Columbia Provincial Council of the New Democratic Party passed a motion announcing its full support for Manitoba native leader and New Democrat MLA, Elijah Harper, in his efforts to ensure that aboriginal people achieve full constitutional recognition. As the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs stated in their presentation before the Charest committee: "The Meech Lake Accord distorts historical reality in Canada by not affirming that aboriginal peoples are distinct societies that also constitute a fundamental characteristic of Canada."

• (1940)

We did not listen to the aboriginal peoples when they appeared before our committee. For example, Gary Gold from the New Brunswick Aboriginal Peoples' Council said: "We are being completely shut out of the process of consultations. We were promised by the federal government only three months ago that we would be consulted fully."

Ron George from British Columbia said: "We have shown good faith by developing the idea of a companion resolution approach. We must not be excluded from the process once again." They were excluded from the process. Northerners were betrayed. The north has a substantial aboriginal population. Once again, the process of constitutional change in Canada has left aboriginal peoples behind.

We could have done it right. We could have said "yes" to Quebec and said "yes" to aboriginal peoples. Indeed, aboriginal peoples have made it very clear that they share the concern about closing the circle of Confederation to include Quebec. In an open letter sent by the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs to the premier of Quebec, they stated that:

> Historically, the Aboriginal people in Canada and French speaking people have had close ties.
> We want to make it very clear that we have chosen to oppose the passage of the—Accord: not to deny your position as a distinct society but to defend our right and to protest the lack of recognition of Canada's First Nations.

In closing, I want to quote briefly from the words of National Chief George Erasmus who said:

> We are tired of explaining to our children why we must continue to wait for a new dawn in white–Indian relations before we are treated with dignity and respect in our own land. We do not want to wait for our turn. When we wait, our turn never comes.

It is time for this government and for all governments to recognize that aboriginal peoples have been left out of the process, that their concerns must be addressed not in some distant future but now, and that they must be involved. If there is to be an extension of the deadline, they must be involved in the new process of constitutional change to ensure that they are there at the table when those concerns are being raised. It must be ensured that they are at the table, as my Leader and I called last week, at the First Minister's Conference in December.

Justice demands that we listen to the voice of Elijah Harper and of all aboriginal peoples and that we not once again betray them in the process of constitutional change.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, in spite of the political rhetoric that we hear so often delivered in this House, I am sure that the hon. member has the same interest that all Canadians have, that is to keep this country together so that we can, together, address the concerns of the aboriginal peoples and others.

In that spirit, today the Prime Minister wrote to Chief Fontaine, the provincial leader of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs in Manitoba, to respond to the concerns raised by him about the Meech Lake Accord and the Constitutional Amendment, the companion amendment.

In his letter, the Prime Minister made six commitments. First, he stated that he intends to invite representatives of aboriginal peoples of Canada to participate in any future First Ministers' Conference where there is discussion about the recognition of aboriginal peoples, the so-called recognition clause.

Moreover, the Government of Canada is committed to recognizing the aboriginal peoples as a fundamental characteristic of Canada in the Constitution. As hon. members are aware, the companion constitutional resolution agreed to by the First Ministers at the June 9 meeting would reinstate the process of First Ministers' Conferences on matters of interest to the aboriginal people of the country.

These conferences, in which aboriginal peoples would fully participate, would entirely be dedicated to aboriginal constitutional matters. They would be convened every three years.

Further, the Prime Minister informed Chief Fontaine that the Government of Canada is prepared immediately, after proclamation of the Meech Lake Accord, to sit down with the representatives of aboriginal people and to set the agenda for these conferences.

Further, the Government of Canada is prepared to accelerate the timing of such a conference, which could be held as early as 1991, next year.

The Prime Minister also stated that, in addition to the First Ministers' Conferences on aboriginal constitutional matters, he would intend to invite representatives of aboriginal peoples to participate in all First Ministers' Conferences where matters are being discussed that directly affect the aboriginal peoples. This would include such things as the future provincehood for Yukon and the Northwest Territories. This represents a very significant commitment to address the constitutional concerns of the aboriginal peoples in Canada, in a manner that involves their full participation.

Recognizing that aboriginal peoples have other serious concerns, the Prime Minister also stated today that the Government of Canada is prepared to establish a major royal commission—and that is something that has been requested by native people—on native affairs. This commission would undertake a thorough and fundamental review of the relationship of aboriginal peoples with other elements of Canadian society. The terms of reference of such a commission would be drawn up in consultation with aboriginal peoples. The Government of Canada would be prepared to consider significant native participation on this body and the appointment of a mutually acceptable chairman.

The Prime Minister noted the government's expectation that the impact of such a commission would be as far-reaching and beneficial as that of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

Madam Speaker, I am sure that members are aware that in 1981–82 significant constitutional changes took place, which included the recognition of the existing aboriginal and treaty rights set out in section 35 of the Constitution Act, and that this is of capital importance. Recently it has led to the far-reaching judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada. It has sharply influenced the actions of the Government of Canada in matters as diverse as fisheries regulation, the appointment of the treaty commission in Saskatchewan, and the design of our taxation systems. This will affect Canada's approach to land and resource management for the future.

The Government of Canada is committed to protecting treaty rights and stands ready to join the representatives of the aboriginal peoples in a joint effort to define those rights.

Once the Meech Lake Accord is ratified, the Government of Canada will be enabled to, and stands ready to act on and provide financial resources for these six commitments.

of

MR. NELSON MANDELA,

DEPUTY PRESIDENT OF THE AFRICAN NATIONAL CONGRESS to

Both Houses of Parliament in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

Monday, June 18, 1990

Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Mandela were welcomed by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate and the Honourable John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons.

[English]

Hon. John A. Fraser (Speaker of the House of Commons): Order, please. The Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, colleagues, mesdames et messieurs, we meet here today to mark the historic visit to Canada of Nelson Mandela. We know, Sir, that many challenges await you at home and we our honoured that you have come to Canada to speak to this Parliament about the heroic struggle of South Africans to achieve democracy.

For 27 years South Africa had been deprived of the full benefits of your leadership and that of many of your colleagues, such as Walter Sisulu and Govan Mbeki. But your compatriots Oliver Tambo, Thabo Mbeki, Archbishop Tutu, Reverend Boesak and so many others kept up the struggle. And your friends throughout the world kept faith with you and your cherished ideals, as you kept faith with them.

Your steadfast courage nurtured and strengthened everyone's resolve. For all who treasure freedom, your walk through the prison gates last February brought an unforgettable moment of joy and anticipation.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Because if Nelson Mandela was liberated, surely South Africa itself could not be far behind. But the celebration was also tinged with sorrow—sorrow that so much still needs to be put right, sorrow at the precious time that has been lost and the lives that were broken and wasted. Sorrow, too, that your own children grew to adulthood without the reassuring presence and the gentle guidance of a loving father. No one can ever repay such a deeply personal loss.

Being deprived of the affection and comfort of one's own family day after day, year after year, is another of the inhuman costs of apartheid—perhaps the most brutal one of all. Mrs. Winnie Mandela, then a young wife and mother, showed uncommon courage as she struggled, often alone, in the most dehumanizing of systems to meet both the obligations of her young family and the objectives of her cause. I offer on behalf of all Canadians a special word of welcome to Mrs. Mandela today.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Your presence here today, Mr. Mandela, is a tribute to the unbreakable spirit of man, and all Canadians join me in welcoming you warmly to Canada and to this, our own special chamber of freedom.

[Translation]

Canada's involvement in the struggle against apartheid has deep roots, extending far beyond the efforts of this government and this Parliament and encompasses a multitude of Canadians who have assisted the people of South Africa, individually or through churches, trade unions, educational institutions and non-governmental organizations.

For all Canadians, your visit here is a most gratifying confirmation that they were right to care, that they chose the proper course and that their efforts, so modest in comparison to yours and those of your colleagues, were not, nonetheless, in vain.

The fight against apartheid has long been a central element of Canada's foreign policy, both because the cause is so compelling and because we believe this is one of those issues where Canada can help make a difference.

[English]

I remember, Mr. Mandela, with pride, the stand taken by Canada's Prime Minister, John Diefenbaker, at the Commonwealth Conference of 1961 which resulted in South Africa's withdrawal from that body. Prime Minister Diefenbaker brought the Commonwealth to declare unequivocally that racial discrimination was totally contrary to its fundamental principles and that, if South Africa did not change, Mr. Diefenbaker said, then South Africa must leave. He did so against some considerable opposition, but with the strong conviction and the certain knowledge that it was right.

Mr. Diefenbaker's action marked the beginning of international pressure on the apartheid regime, pressure that was then sustained and intensified in Canada by the governments of Prime Ministers Pearson, Trudeau, Clark and Turner. And this, to the great individual personal credit of these leaders.

If I may be allowed a strictly Canadian note: outside South Africa itself there are few international leaders, in my judgment, who have made a more sustained and a more effective commitment to fundamental and beneficial change in that country in recent years than the present Secretary of State for External Affairs of the Government of Canada, the Right Honourable Joe Clark.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Almost a quarter of a century after Mr. Diefenbaker's stand, I had the privilege, along with Mr. Clark, to take Canada's seats at the 1985 Nassau Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting and at the follow-up meeting in London in 1987.

Again, the Commonwealth was determined to provide moral and practical leadership to the international community's campaign against apartheid. We launched an Eminent Persons Group, which included Archbishop Ted Scott of Canada, to determine whether Pretoria was serious about fundamental change. When the Group's comprehensive and thoughtful proposals were capriciously rebuffed by the Government of South Africa, all Commonwealth countries, except one, agreed to a common package of economic and other sanctions.

This action was later followed by the European Community, the United States of America and others and the screws on Pretoria were tightened as never before. That policy was reconfirmed and reinforced in subsequent Commonwealth meetings in Vancouver and Kuala Lumpur and Foreign Ministers' meetings under Mr. Clark's chairmanship in Lusaka, Toronto, Harare, Canberra and Abidjan.

[English]

The political changes those sanctions were designed to bring about have started to happen. Determined internal resistance, supported by international pressure, convinced the white community of the need for negotiations toward a new and democratic South Africa.

These are promising times in South Africa. The African National Congress and other political organizations are no longer banned. Less than two weeks ago President de Klerk terminated the four year old state of emergency everywhere in South Africa, except Natal. The Separate Amenities Act is slated for repeal in October. And a victory for all South Africans was achieved when your meeting early last month with President de Klerk produced a mutual commitment to a peaceful process of negotiations.

Mr. Mandela, I believe the world is remarkably fortunate to have a person of your rare qualities at the helm of the movement for equality in South Africa at this particularly crucial time in your country's history. To emerge from prison after so long an incarceration and to retain an understanding of the concerns of your jailers is truly extraordinary. To resume your life and your leadership with neither bitterness nor malice is a powerful compliment to the strength of your character and to the soundness of your values.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Likewise, I think it is pretty clear that President de Klerk has demonstrated both leadership and courage by recognizing the need to come to grips with the crucial issue of the equality of all people before the law.

[Translation]

In reflecting on the momentous changes of recent months, however, it is important at the same time to recognize the realities on the ground and the challenges ahead.

Apartheid in all its repugnance is still the law of South Africa. And violence from different quarters—white and black—threatens the movement towards a peaceful settlement.

No one should underestimate the difficulties ahead. The time will no doubt come, sooner rather than later, we hope, when clear and hopefully irreversible change has occurred and it will be appropriate to ease some of the pressure that has helped bring it about.

[English]

But at this crucial juncture, the Government of Canada, and I believe all members of the House of Commons, believe that the way to advance the process of democracy in South Africa is to maintain the existing economic sanctions which have contributed substantially to the advancement toward social justice in South Africa thus far.

• (1130)

Mr. Mulroney: The ultimate goal is negotiations resulting in an end to apartheid and the creation of a pluralistic non–racial democracy. No one knows better than Canadians these days that constitution–making is complex and requires enormous measures of creativity, tolerance and trust. We wish you well in your own most challenging constitutional endeavours.

The thirst for democracy now being slaked in eastern Europe and Latin American is spreading to other parched areas of the world. Pluralistic democracy is a stepping stone to economic prosperity. You cannot have one without the other. Fundamental rights and freedoms, including free economies, are universal concepts with universal validity irrespective of continent and irrespective of culture. South Africa is no exception.

And so, Sir, we take your presence here today as a signal of the freedom and the democracy that we know will soon grace your majestic land and brighten the future of all of South Africa's children. A free and a democratic South Africa will find in Canada, will find in members of this House of Commons, a true friend and a committed ally whose fundamental goal is the peace and the well being of all of your people irrespective of colour or creed.

Mr. Mandela, it is with special joy that I, as Prime Minister of Canada, now invite you to address the Parliament and the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nelson Mandela (Deputy President of the African National Congress): Mr. Speaker, honourable Prime Minister, distinguished leaders of the opposition parties, representatives of the people of Canada, ladies and gentlemen, we would like to thank you most sincerely for granting us the honour and privilege to speak from the podium of the House of Commons of Canada, an eminent example of the democratic perspective toward which our people aspire.

The fact that we have not had the opportunity to do the same thing in our own country, even as guests, emphasizes the inequity of the apartheid system which we are all determined to abolish without delay.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mandela: Like young people everywhere, as we grew up in South Africa, we embarked on an exciting voyage to discover the world. We were driven by a consuming desire to know the truth about people, about society, about the world of nature and always centred to that search was the need to find out whether there was anything in human nature and society, and whether there was anything in the universal order of things which predetermined the place of a black person and the African in society. Instinctively we embarked on this inquiry because we felt that there was something in our society which was wrong, unjust and unacceptable.

We had, after all, listened to and responded with warm hearts to passionate sermons which proclaimed that God made man in his image. We had observed and were moved by school lessons which spoke of men being created equal. We had searched, as in a trance, as we learned of white men and women who had fought tyranny in order to establish societies based on the principles of liberty, equality and fraternity.

Our own life experience and that of all other black people around us and beyond the borders of our country told us that all these precepts and experiences were not meant to refer to or include men and women of colour. Whatever God's purpose might have been, it seemed clear that the white race had decreed that only its members were fit to assume the image of the Creator. Such liberty, equality and fraternity as there were, were but bonds to unite the white people around the common purpose of denying the black majority these privileges.

That youthful inquiry into the essence of social reality was, at the same time, the spark that came to the fire of rebellion in many a heart among our peers. And life, this scorching heat of soldering iron, bonded the rebels together as in a fist of steel. Where an oath was sung, it was simply said that men would rest and none would spare their lives until the people had regained their liberty, equality and fraternity. Many have died in the effort to honour that commitment.

For three and a half centuries, each generation of our people has supplied its due share of matters. An entire people has learned not to mourn the death of heroes and heroines but to steel itself for new battles. An entire people has known what it is to recognize the fact of defeat while rejecting the demand that it should surrender. So it came about that even those who had not even reached puberty knew that they, too, had a place in the ranks of those who challenged the hypocrisy of a degenerate system which claimed the part of western civilization while its very existence was predicated on the repudiation of everything to which attaches the word civilization.

Today the hope is abroad among our people, that those in our country who saw themselves as the master race have learned the error of their ways. There is hope that perhaps at last they have seen that injustice will not triumph. There is hope that perhaps at last they have realized that tyranny is part of the progenitor of the forces of its own destruction. There is hope that perhaps at last those who sought to deny the humanity of others have understood that by that act they also dehumanized themselves.

If indeed these are the results that have been achieved, a salute is due to those who struggled in the name of all humanity to ensure that the noble vision of liberty, equality and fraternity, includes all and excludes nobody on any basis whatsoever, be it race, colour, creed, or sex. Therefore, as we stand here today, Mr. Speaker, and acknowledge the priceless honour you have accorded us in person, we know that we are merely representatives of a people that can truly be called heroic. We come from a people who, because they would not accept to be treated as sub–human, redeemed the dignity of all humanity, everywhere.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mandela: We represent countless matters who have walked into a hailstorm of bullets, not because they wanted to die, but because they wanted the millions of our people to live. We have sat in prison with great African patriots and noble examples of the human race, who faced torture and did not flinch, who met the hangman's noose with songs of freedom, who accepted their affairs as but a school out of which they would emerge with their convictions, their determination and their willingness to sacrifice immeasurably strengthened.

We are deeply moved that today you honour all these noble offspring of our people by allowing us, who were outcasts only yesterday, to experience, if only fleetingly, what it means to stand and speak at a place whose existence is based on the recognition of the right of all the people to determine their destiny and whose purpose is to ensure that the right is guaranteed in perpetuity. We are made better human beings by the fact that you have reached out from across the seas to say that we too, the rebels, the fugitives, the prisoners, deserve to be heard.

Our message, for whose propagation and realization so many have suffered so much, is indeed simple. It is that South Africa should be transformed into a united, democratic and non–racial country. We wish to see every adult South African enjoying the right to vote and having the possibility to be elected to all organs of government, without discrimination on grounds of race, colour or sex. Its Balkanization into Bantustan, the so–called homelands and group areas, has to end. Given our bitter experience of oppression and repression, we are determined that our country should be a truly thorough democracy in which the rights of all its citizens will be inviolable and in which all will be equal before the law.

Accordingly, in addition to a democratic constitution there should be an entrenched and justiciable bill of rights fostered by an independent judiciary.

As reflected in our historic document, the Freedom Charter, we are committed to ensure all our citizens enjoy equal rights to their languages, culture, and religious freedoms. These provisions among others will address the issue of so–called white fears while meeting the aspirations of the people of South Africa as a whole.

We also visualize an agreed constitutional arrangement whereby there is devolution of power to regional and local levels of government to ensure the broadest possible participation of the people in government themselves.

At the same time we are opposed to the idea which some in our country advance that we should opt for a federal state. We believe that there is nothing to federate. Certainly we do not accept that we should accept the fragmentation of our country as a given fact on which we should try to build the new reality.

Any attempt to do this would merely perpetuate the racial and ethnic divisions whose abolition stands at the core of our struggle. We cannot seek to end apartheid by continuing to maintain the structures of the apartheid system under any guise whatsoever.

We know that you have just completed a gruelling round of negotiations dealing with constitutional reform in this country. We are inspired by the fact that you were able to find compromises which make agreement possible. We believe that we too must be inspired by this manner of proceeding so that we also reach agreement about our own constitution as speedily as possible in the interest of all the people of our country.

We are convinced that as part of this process in South Africa there will have to be elected a constituent assembly to draw the new constitution as happened in Namibia. This will ensure that we use democratic means in our search for a democratic result. It will also create the situation whereby the result of the negotiations enjoy legitimacy in the eyes of the people, to the extent that they would have chosen the representatives to whom the task of drawing up the basic law of the country would be entrusted. We are also determined that the political freedom of which we have spoken should go side by side with freedom from hunger, want, and suffering.

It is therefore of vital importance that we restructure the South African economy so that its wealth is shared by all our people, black and white, to ensure that everybody enjoys a decent and rising standard of living.

We do not seek to impoverish anybody or to redistribute such poverty, but the new democratic society will obviously have to address the issue of the impoverishment of millions of our people as a matter of urgency.

It is also clear that the issues can only be properly tackled in a situation in which the economy is growing and producing more wealth at a rate higher than the growth of the population. In this respect we should make the important point that once the democratic transformation has taken place we will need your assistance to achieve these economic results.

We believe that we can and should build on the bonds of friendship and solidarity that we have built up in the course of the continuing struggle against apartheid to build a partnership for the reconstruction of both our country and our region which have been devastated by the apartheid system.

Southern Africa has the human and material resources which will combine to give millions of our people a bright future and which will make it profitable and worth while for the rest of the world to enter into a mutually beneficial system of co-operation.

For many decades the ANC sought a peaceful resolution of the problems facing our country. In the period since 1986 we redoubled our efforts to persuade the South African government to enter into negotiations with us. We consider it a victory for all South Africans that a meeting between ourselves and the government took place in Cape Town at the beginning of last month. As you know, we agreed to remove the obstacles to negotiations which the ANC had identified. We are determined to ensure that this agreement is implemented and believe that the government is of the same view as well.

It is only fair that we indicate to this august assembly that we see President de Klerk and his colleagues in the leadership of the National Party as men and women of integrity. We believe that they are honestly committed to participate in a peaceful process which should result in the fundamental political transformation of our country.

The effect of our agreement to remove the obstacles to negotiations has thus also served as a demonstration of the bona fides of the de Klerk leadership. Yet the progress achieved, including the unbanning of the ANC and other organizations, the release of some political prisoners, and the lifting of the state of emergency over the greater part of our country, should not lead us to conclude that the apartheid system is ended. It should not lead us to believe that fundamental and irreversible change has taken place leading to the emancipation of our people.

The fact of the matter is that the apartheid system is still in place. The state's instruments of repression, in particular the police, continue to kill and maim the opponents of this system. In defence of an apartheid law and order, many among our white compatriots are armed and are forming themselves into commando groups with the stated aim of physically liquidating the leaders and members of the ANC. They are joined by similarly armed black vigilante groups which are ready and willing to serve their white paymasters.

Therefore we still have a struggle ahead of us. The situation requires that both you and ourselves should not relax our vigilance. As a result of continuing struggle, we must ensure that the movement forward toward the final abolition of the apartheid system is not interrupted. It is in this context that we have raised and emphasized the importance of maintaining sanctions.

Sanctions were imposed to help us end the apartheid system. In the light of what we have, it is only logical that we must continue to apply this form of pressure against the apartheid system. Any move at this stage toward lifting or relaxing international pressure would create a situation in which white South Africa would feel comfortable with the minimal changes that have taken place and once more regress into their opposition where they felt that possible pressure had not reached sufficient strength to oblige them to move forward.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mandela: I would like to take this opportunity to salute the great Canadian people whom you represent and with whom we believe you are in full accord on the question of South Africa. They have proved themselves not only to be steadfast friends of our struggling people but great defenders of human rights and the idea of democracy itself. They are to us like brothers and sisters from whose warm embrace we shall never be parted.

We salute and thank them all: political parties, the anti-apartheid movement, the trade unions, the churches, the native people of this country, non-governmental organizations, students and intellectuals, elected representatives who serve in this Parliament and elsewhere, the press, the children and many others who raised the flag of solidarity because they knew that the absence of freedom for ourselves reduced their own liberty as well.

In this context, I would also like to pay special tribute to the Prime Minister of this country, Brian Mulroney, who has continued along the path charted by Prime Minister Diefenbaker who acted against apartheid because he knew that no person of conscience could stand aside as a crime against humanity was being committed.

Mr. Mandela: Mr. Prime Minister, our people and organization respect and admire you as a friend. We have been greatly strengthened by your personal involvement in the struggle against apartheid tyranny and the leadership you have provided within the United Nations, the Commonwealth, the Group of Seven and the francophone summits. We are certain that you will, together with the rest of the Canadian people, stay the course with us, not only as we battle on to end the apartheid system but also as we work to build a happy, peaceful and prosperous future for all the people of South and southern Africa.

Mr. Speakers, that future is still ahead of us. As for now, and to make certain that our common hopes are realized, we must together continue to struggle. We seek your support to sustain the international pressures which you in this country and others in the rest of the world have imposed. We seek your agreement that Canada and the rest of the international community should abide by the perspectives contained in the Harare and United Nations Declaration on South Africa, including the vision of a truly democratic, non-racial and united South Africa.

In the aftermath of the agreement we reached with the government at the beginning of last month we also require your support to help us repatriate and resettle those of our compatriots who were forced into exile by the apartheid system. We require your material assistance to help us conduct the extensive political work among the 38 million people of our country which is such a vital and central part of the process of drawing these millions into the common effort to arrive at a just, permanent and negotiated solution of the South African question.

We trust that among other things you will do everything in your power to encourage the people of Canada to contribute to the solidarity fund which has been set up under the leadership of His Grace Archbishop Ted Scott, a great friend of our people and a man I am proud to know.

Mr. Speakers, distinguished representatives of the people of Canada, it has been given to us to be present and to participate in the final struggle to end the evil system of apartheid. An historic moment is in sight. It will not be long now before we, as South Africans, stand up to proclaim that the apartheid fountainhead of racism throughout the world is no more and that political power has passed into the hands of the whole people. These masses must and will exercise this power with all the sensitivity that is due in our situation.

In this context certain matters are as clear as the light of day. Never should racism in our country, from whatever quarter, raise its ugly head again. All of us as South Africans, both black and white, must build a common sense of nationhood in which all ideas of vengeance and retribution are impermissible.

Our country must, by its deeds, take its place among the nations of the Earth as the champion of peace, a defender of freedom and democracy, an enemy of poverty and human degradation.

You have been and are with us as we struggle to end the system of white minority domination. As an expression of our common humanity, and not an act of charity, we ask that you continue to walk the last mile with us. As your future partner, you will have a society whose hallmarks will be tolerance of all views and respect for the life and dignity of every person, both young and old.

We thank you that you bent every effort to secure our release from prison. You gave us the possibility, whose importance to us is without measure, to join hands with our own people, with you and the rest of humanity to bring about the change in our country and our region which even the mute but blood-stained stones in the killing fields of southern Africa demand must come and must come now.

We shall forever be obliged to you for this and for this unforgettable moment you have given us to speak to you about our dreams and to contribute a little to the everlasting friendship between the Canadian and South African people.

Our common victory, the victory of democracy and non-racialism, is within our own grasp. Liberty, equality, and fraternity shall reign supreme in our country as well. Thank you.

• (1210)

Hon. Guy Charbonneau (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. Mandela, Madam, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Prime Minister, distinguished guests.

[Translation]

On behalf of my colleagues in the Canadian Senate, I want to thank you, Sir, for honouring us with your presence and addressing this joint assembly, despite your busy schedule.

[English]

You are a constant amazement to the world. Hardly had you tasted the joy of liberty when you resumed your struggle to win for your victimized fellow citizens their full entitlement of rights.

To hear the words of a leader who has had his convictions tested by the fire, as yours have been, is an extraordinary and, indeed, humbling experience.

Your message touches us deeply because as we listen to you we hear the voice of a pilgrim of freedom, an inspired evangelist who has been physically imprisoned and morally banned from his belief.

It was for justice and morality that you undertook the campaign against the evil of apartheid, a fight which seemed to us all the more arduous and courageous because at the start it was against the fanaticism which claimed devine sanction.

[Translation]

To fight the doctrine of racial segregation, it was necessary to stand firm, both morally and intellectually. When your detractors sounded off their dogmas, you reacted by revealing the truth. When they tried to gag you, the truth you revealed was echoed throughout the world.

[English]

We have followed with anguish your implacable fight for justice, truth and humanity which you conducted with such courage, patience and self-denial. As you have pointed out, it is a fight which must be won. Those who would have us believe in biological pollution must be brought to see that biology is a science, not an obsession with race or skin colour.

Your endurance has proved to be the most effective of exorcisms. The imminent victory of the cause for which you and others have fought so hard and so long is a vindication of your convictions and resolution, and one in which all who love liberty will rejoice.

In your wisdom you are ensuring that the gains so hardly won will be consolidated and built upon. The signs of progress are encouraging. Reason seems at last to want to play a role in the politics of your country.

For the free world, and especially for the South Africa that is coming to birth, you are one of the standard bearers.

We are with you in your progress toward hope and fulfilment for your people, and we thank you for your inspiring words today.

[Translation]

On behalf of the Senate, I wish to thank you for your visit.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Speaker Fraser: Mr. Mandela, Madam, members of the House of Commons and the Senate—

—very distinguished guests.

Mr. Mandela, on behalf of my colleagues in the House of Commons and other honoured guests presents, I wish to thank you for your speech and to extend warmest greetings to you and your compatriots.

It is indeed a great honour for us to have in our midst a man whose courage and dedication has won the admiration and respect of people young and old throughout the world.

[English]

Canadian parliamentarians and the people we represent have for many years demonstrated their strong opposition to the system of apartheid in South Africa and the enormous suffering that it has caused.

Canadians and others urged your release from prison. We rejoice at the fact that you are here with us today. Your presence here is tangible evidence that there have been positive developments in South Africa and that there is now more than ever real hope for a peaceful transformation of South African society which will guarantee racial equality and justice for all South Africans. This is, to many of us, crucial because, unless there is justice for all, there is little chance of justice for anyone.

At a time when the human race is more and more aware of the fragile nature of our planet's environment and of the necessity of working together to ensure our survival, the need to resolve our differences without bloodshed and to guarantee the respect of the basic human rights of all individuals should be clear to all men and women of intelligence and good will.

We have seen the democratic ideal become stronger than ever, even in regions where until recently there appeared to be little chance that it would flourish in our lifetime. Thus, we are approaching the end of the 20th century with some quiet optimism which not so long ago might have seemed out of place.

However, this by no means implies that every problem will now be resolved with little difficulty and we listened carefully, sir, to your remarks in this regard. We are not ingenuous here. We have watched your struggle for many years and we know how much of a struggle lies ahead.

Much more will need to be done before apartheid is finally abolished, and much more will need to be done before equality is established for all people in your country.

These negotiations toward the creation of a non-racial democracy will be complex and arduous, but we are encouraged by the progress made in talks between the government and the African National Congress toward the removal of obstacles to formal negotiations.

We are certain that your contribution to these negociations will be central in keeping with the significant role your have already played in South Africa's march towards a non-racial, free and democratic society.

Rest assured that we will follow the course of the negociations with great interest and that our wish is for successful negotiations which will transform South African society and do away with the evils of apartheid.

[English]

As you enter the most important phase of your illustrious life, sir, we convey to you our best wishes for success in your mission and confirm our admiration for your courage and dedication.

We ask you, sir and madam, to return and take our prayers with you. God bless you.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 19, 1990

The House met at 11 a.m.

Prayers

[English]

POINT OF ORDER

HOUSE OF COMMONS—PRAYERS

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, for reasons that I will briefly outline, I want to challenge the validity of the Standing Orders and the practice of reading prayers in the House of Commons.

During the course of the great debate on the Meech Lake Accord, those who would destroy this constitutional achievement claimed that the distinct society clause would deny Canadians the protection of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Charter must govern and dominate in all circumstances. It is the paramount law, a kind of legal sacred cow displacing the creator.

This legislative body approved the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and made it law. I, like others, added my vote to the concurrence but not without grave doubt. The Charter is a two-edged sword. To protect society, the guilty may go unpunished and subversives may walk free.

The Charter was intended to enhance the law, not render it sterile. I believe the distinct society clause will enable the Charter to be applied in a sensible and constructive way so that Quebec society can maintain its character and not regress under the burden of restrictive laws.

That is why I challenge the right or obligation to say prayers in the House of Commons. Had the Charter proclaimed Canada to be a society that acknowledged the Almighty, the courts would not have ruled school prayers illegal. Here is the judicial reality stated by the Chief Justice of Canada:

> In an earlier time, when people believed in the collective responsibility of the community toward some deity, the enforcement of religious conformity may have been a legitimate object of government, but since the Charter, it is no longer legitimate. With the Charter, it has become the right of every Canadian to work out for himself or herself what his or her religious obligations, if any, should be and it is not for the State to dictate otherwise.

Having passed the Charter, a constitutional law that denies school children the right to seek the intervention and assistance of the Almighty, how can we possibly claim the benefit of prayers in this House of Commons, the most public and democratic forum in Canada?

I believe in God. I acknowledge the power of prayer and I seek divine intervention, but I cannot claim a right I have denied to school children, because I helped enact a law that purports to enhance Canadian society by excluding the Almighty.

Accordingly I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule that section 30(1) of the Standing Orders and the practice of saying prayers in the House of Commons, particularly the Lord's Prayer, violates the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Canadians can better judge the law that governs all of us.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may have a point which he obviously feels is important, and I am not diminishing the heartfelt conviction that he has in this regard. However, I do not believe, Sir, that Mr. Speaker should be unilaterally scratching out one of our Standing Orders.

If the member feels that one of our Standing Orders is inappropriate, he should perhaps stand on a question of privilege instead and ask that the matter be referred to the standing committee responsible so that that committee could look at the issue.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, when we reform the Standing Orders of this House, if the member feels that this Standing Order is wrong, he could again recommend to the same committee that it consider revoking the Standing Order in question.

As far as I am concerned, and not withstanding what the Charter says, the Standing Order should remain. However, I am only emitting a personal opinion. However, that is not what is at issue here. What is at issue is whether or not Mr. Speaker has the authority or whether Mr. Speaker should, notwithstanding any authority, decide to unilaterally revoke one of our Standing Orders.

If I may be so bold as to suggest, I do think that Mr. Speaker would probably not want to do that.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to echo the comments of my friend who has just spoken. The point he raised is appropriate. There have been a lot of questions from various members about the propriety of Standing Order 31.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there are a number of alternatives. One is to follow the advice of my hon. friend to simply drop Standing Order 30(1). The other, of course, would be to keep it in place. On the other hand, perhaps there is a compromise, that at the beginning of the day some other appropriate statement be read. We realize the benefit of a statement, a prayer or perhaps some other form of comment that sets the tone and establishes a certain guideline for the procedures and the behaviour of the House.

However, to ask you to set this aside would be inappropriate. The House Leaders are presently meeting and evaluating a variety of Standing Orders. They are examining whether they ought to be modified to suit the changing times. Perhaps my hon. friend could refer his concern regarding Standing Order 30(1) to that regular process which will determine whether it should be dropped, whether it should be kept or if there is another alternative to consider in its place.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to speak very long to this particular point of order. I agree that my hon. friend who has brought the point of order forward has a legitimate concern.

However, there are a couple of factors that we have to take into account. First, the Americans have a Charter of Rights which has had a similar impact in their country. However, their Congress has a chaplain who daily delivers a prayer. I think that shows that it is consistent with a charter of rights. I would think, therefore, that in our own Parliament that same consistency would apply.

The second point I would like to make, which I think has been made already, is that this is more properly a decision of the House. It is not, I think, a decision of the Chair and the Chair should not be put in a position of having to making a ruling on a particular Standing Order and its validity or its lack of validity.

This has been a tradition in this Parliament for a long time. It is also a tradition that has come under discussion on several occasions, including throughout the hearings on the McGrath task force. I can remember we spent a good deal of time on the issue.

In each case the end result has been that we have come back to the tradition that we practise today and that is what I would encourage the Chair to allow to continue at this point. I think the Chair would be in a very difficult spot were it to make an arbitrary decision that a particular Standing Order is in violation of the Charter.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised a matter which relates to Standing Order 30(1) which reads:

> The Speaker shall read prayers every day at the meeting of the House before any business is entered upon.

That is a rule which, of course, binds me as your Speaker. It also happens to be a rule that has been in place, not just for a few years but for generations. The hon. member urges me to make a decision that it is somehow inconsistent or contradictory to the Canadian Charter of Rights.

First, it is not the role of the Speaker to make that kind of a declaration because my jurisdiction does not enable me and does not ask me to make decisions concerning the law of the land. My jurisdiction is to make decisions concerning the procedural rules which this place has put in place and which govern us.

I have to say to the hon. member that whatever his concerns may be, and they may be the concerns of other people, I cannot comment upon the rule that instructs us to say prayers daily on the basis of whether it does or does not infringe the Charter of Rights.

What my personal opinions might be matters very little at the moment because I am asked by all of you to interpret the rules of this place, not to give you my personal opinions about the appropriateness of prayers or the inappropriateness of prayers. Whatever temptation I may have to make some comments thereon, I, of course, have to restrain myself from saying anything.

However, if hon. members wish either to change the form of the prayer or, for that matter, make a decision that prayers will not be said, it is not for me to do. That is up to members. I am sure that if that matter comes under discussion the sensibilities and the sentiments of the vast majority of Canadians would be taken into account.

I think that is probably where we ought to leave the matter, except I think I can say the following to hon. members, many of whom have been able to be with me at official and less than official occasions in this House when we have dined together. Hon. members will remember that I always ask members to join with me in the blessing. Hon. members will also note that, while I am Christian, I was raised to have great respect for other people's views and the blessing always commences the same way, in such a way that the vast majority of us can join in it with respect and gratitude. I always say: "Lord, whose children we all are—". That seems to gain some considerable acceptance. I mention it for your consideration.

PLAIN LANGUAGE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-320, an act to promote the use of plain language in federal statutes, statutory instruments and regulations.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: Explain.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should advise hon. members and the public who is watching that at this point the hon. member is entitled to a brief statement. How any member is, in a brief statement, going to explain how we are going to promote the use of plain language in federal statutes is beyond me, but the hon. member can have a try.

Mr. Waddell: Well, with the help of the Lord and other people, maybe we can do it.

Mr. Speaker, this bill attempts to require that all federal government statutes, statutory instruments and regulations be written in plain language and the object is quite simple. Canadians should be able to clearly understand the full intent of government action—dare I say it—without the help of a dozen lawyers. I do not want to be mean to our common profession, Mr. Speaker, but I want to cite what Napoleon once said. He said that constitutions and the laws of France should be drafted so that every peasant in every village in France should be able to read the document and understand what it meant.

That is what I attempt to do in this bill with respect to Canadian laws so that they will be clear, simple and straightforward and all Canadians, not just lawyers, will understand them.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will remember what Shakespeare said about lawyers: "The first thing we will do, we will hang all the lawyers".

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

POSTAL SERVICES REVIEW ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-321, an act to provide for the review of postal rates and services and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to ensure that the public has an opportunity to play a role in the establishment of postal rates and the provision of postal services in Canada. It would also establish a postal services review board similar to the one that was cancelled by the Minister of Finance in the last budget.

This bill would ensure that Canada Post no longer has the right to shut down post offices in the indiscriminate manner that it is doing at the present time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ELECTIONS, PRIVILEGES, PROCEDURE AND PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

CONCURRENCE IN NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved that the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business presented to the House on Friday, December 29, 1989, be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to rise to debate the adoption of the ninth report of the present Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections which formerly had a longer name. This committee laboured extensively last autumn to prepare a report on televising of the House. Committee members made a trip to Washington last summer and reviewed the television arrangements which were in place for the United States Congress. It met with various media representatives in Canada. It met with members of Parliament and conducted fairly extensive hearings on this issue before submitting this ninth report.

Since the report was tabled last December, very little progress has been made in dealing with the recommendations and they appear to have fallen on deaf ears insofar as the House is concerned. I wanted to take this opportunity today to move concurrence in this report so that we could draw the attention of members to the committee's recommendations with a view to having them adopted in this House.

The first recommendation dealt with the control of the Canadian parliamentary channel. It recommended that a consortium composed of representatives of the cable television industry and the CBC, a partnership in fact between the two, should be formed and authorized to take over the operation of the channel in so far as broadcast of non-House of Commons proceedings is concerned. That particular recommendation has been adopted in this House already. It is now before the CRTC where hearings will be held and the CRTC may or may not grant a licence to the partnership.

It is clear that that recommendation is on its way and there is really not a particular concern for this House arising out of it except for the monitoring committee. It has been recommended by the privileges and elections committee that that committee be appointed as the monitoring committee to assist the consortium in its duties.

I do not believe that report has been presented to this House, or if it has been it has not yet been concurred in. I am optimistic that that will be done in the next short while.

• (1130)

However, the other major components of this report, I submit, are important for the House and for Canadians and it is those that I want to address my comments to today so that we can consider them as a group of MPs.

There are two principal recommendations that form the basis of this report. The first, and the one that I think is the most significant, is the recommendation that committees of this House be televised.

I would like to read the committee's recommendation in this regard because I think the wording of it is very apt. It is that each committee of the House of Commons shall determine whether any meeting or meetings will be open to the electronic media. Each committee may impose any arrangements that it deems necessary to ensure the decorum of the meeting. This freedom for electronic media would apply in Ottawa and throughout the country.

The committee's intention was to allow committees to make their own decision with respect to television and radio broadcasting. In my submission that was a reasonable exercise. Indeed, since this report was tabled last December, we have witnessed in this House and certainly on our television screens, the spectacle of certain committees of this House having their proceedings televised and made available nationally. I think particularly of the Standing Committee on Finance which held extensive hearings last year. There was another committee that went on on a cross-country tour and also received extensive national coverage for that reason.

In my view the public interest was well served by seeing those committees in action. I think the point that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections wished to make in presenting its report was that Canadians want to see what else Parliament does. Parliament is made up of this House, but it is also made up of a group of committees. I am using Parliament in its expression in terms of application to the House of Commons alone. I have no intention of excluding the Senate from this, but this is a report to the House of Commons and deals with the televising of this House only.

The committees of the House are an important component of it. Indeed it is said by many that much of the very important work of Parliament is done in committee, and I concur. The fact that this report was prepared by a committee composed of representatives from all parties in this House is an indication in my view of the importance of committee work in itself. I note for the record that the committee recommendations were unanimous on the part of all parties, except in one particular, and that deals with the financial provisions for CPaC. I am not dealing with that in my arguments today.

In other words, members from each of the three parties in this House met, discussed, extensively reviewed, heard witnesses, and came up with this unanimous recommendation, that is that committees be masters of their own procedure in so far as televising is concerned.

It was our view that the television media would seek permission of committees to televise proceedings where they felt that the televising would be appropriate. We were of the view that the committees could decide, if they wished or declined, to proceed with televising of their proceedings. The chairman would have ultimate jurisdiction over the way the television cameras would be operated in the committee room, that is the chairman could determine whether or not, subject to appeal of the committee, cameras would be permitted to roam in the room or be at fixed locations and how the shots would be arranged, given the varying nature of televising of proceedings, particularly where the committee is holding meetings outside Ottawa.

Obviously the rooms that would be available in other parts of Canada might not be the same as the ones here and different arrangements might be necessary for that reason. Certainly the committee chairman is free to make arrangements as are necessary with the local media to ensure coverage of the proceedings. It was our intention as a committee, that is the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, that our recommendation would allow for the committee proceedings to be shown on the parliamentary network.

It was agreed with CPaC that in the event of official televising of any House of Commons committees, the proceedings of those committees would be shown on the parliamentary channel after the day's proceedings in this House were complete. Then Canadians would have an opportunity to watch committees in action. Particularly we felt this would be of interest in local communities where a local mayor or other representative of a community was appearing before a committee in Ottawa and making representations. The proceedings of that committee would be of particular interest in the community from which the witness had come to make his appearance. We felt it only fair that those proceedings be available by television and possibly radio in the local areas. On certain national issues it was our view that the work in committees is important. Witnesses come from across Canada to give testimony, for example, on national issues. We think Canadians should be able to see what goes on in those committees.

In watching this House the public is able to see members of Parliament from all regions of Canada discuss various issues. However, in committees it is more than members of Parliament who are appearing. We have Canadians who come from their communities to give evidence. Experts in all fields come to give evidence. Canadians could see that evidence being given. They could hear many of the arguments that help shape our views as members of Parliament.

As a committee we felt that this was extremely important and that therefore the televising of committees was in effect televising the other half of the work of this House. I urge members to consider this issue. The government might have some reservations. I understand there may be reservations on the part of hon. members on all sides.

I want to deal with the reservations briefly at this point. I may say quite frankly that when television was introduced in this House many years ago, as an outside observer of Parliament I had my reservations about how effective it would be. I was afraid that television would undermine the spirit of co-operation that existed in the House and perhaps make relations among the parties more difficult.

It may be that it has done that; I don't know. Some members think it has; some members think it has not. In any event the thing that has changed—and I think it is a fundamental change in the way Parliament works—is that it has brought Parliament into the living rooms of Canadians. I am surprised how many people in my riding of Kingston and the Islands watch the proceedings of Parliament. I get comments on it repeatedly from members of the public who come to visit me here and to whom I talk on visits to my riding.

An hon. member: Who are they watching?

Mr. Milliken: They may be watching me. They are watching all members. I am sure the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie is well watched, he is such an eloquent speaker. I am sure his constituents enjoy his speeches to no end. Certainly those of us here in the House do. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie was a member of the committee. He is well versed in his arguments. Perhaps that is why he is being a little loquacious this morning. I know he will make a speech later.

The important thing was that television brought the House to Canadians in a way that was never done before. On the whole I think therefore it is better for Parliament. It has brought Canadians closer to this institution. It has given them considerable appreciation of the way it works. For that I am glad. I realize that it may have caused changes in the way we deal with one another in the Chamber. It may have brought about increased partisanship in the Chamber. I regret that. I am not sure that it is so. I am not sure that that would not have happened whether or not television was admitted to this place. But it is here and the committee recognized that it is here to stay. We feel as a group that the logical extension of that kind of publicity for Parliament is that committees also be televised.

While it may present the opportunity for members to act in a more partisan and less fair or less objective way in dealing with committee matters, we feel that given the amount of televising that goes on in this House already and given the lack of partisanship on many issues that exist, it is not going to change the approach in the committees. Where hon. members want to be partisan in committee because there is a genuine fight about a principle of legislation that the government is proceeding with, they will be partisan whether or not the television cameras are present.

In my view television cameras are not going to alter radically the way we conduct business in committee. Certainly, I think, that was the view of the members of the committee. If there was to be a change it was our view that the publicity television generates in committees would more than offset the disadvantages. In other words, the advantage to Canadians in seeing what was going on was more important than the thought that perhaps we would act differently in committees than we now do. I do not think it will make a radical change in our approach.

I commend this recommendation to the House. It has not changed the committees where we have had television. In my view they have worked quite satisfactorily. I have no reason to believe that televising all the committees, should the media wish to have them televised, would change that.

I stress the recommendation. Committees are masters of their own procedure in this regard. If a committee chooses to have its meetings without the television cameras present, each committee will be free to make that decision. I think that is an important part of the recommendation.

The second major recommendation of the committee was to establish a programming director. I will read recommendation No. 3. It says that the programming director should be responsible for the production and direction of the broadcasting of the House of Commons subject to the over-all direction of the monitoring committee of the House. The Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections recommended that it be the monitoring committee, at least for the time being.

The significance of this recommendation was to change from the guidelines that now restrict the television cameras and their operations in this House to allow for a more general and fairer representation of what is happening in the House on camera.

People who are watching now will see that I am standing here in my place and will not see anything else in the chamber. I think it is unfortunate that they are unable to see the other members from a wider angle. I am sorry they are unable to see some of the empty seats.

I do not consider the absence of members today different from any other day, but certainly I do not consider it unusual. I am not surprised that many members are not here. There are committees meeting this morning. There are other meetings and businesses to which members have to attend. I think Canadians should not be surprised to know that there are a lot of empty seats in the Chamber. I think that is a normal feature of parliamentary life. If that is the reason for not widening the angle on the camera lens that is now facing me, then I do not think it is a good reason and I think we should abandon it.

The proposal we made was based on the experience in the Ontario legislature. I urge hon. members to tune in to the Ontario legislature to see how its proceedings are televised because in our view as a committee the televising there is more interesting than our television. It is not because their speeches are necessarily better, although heaven knows there are many very capable speakers in the Ontario legislature, particularly on the government side. We know that they are extremely capable. I would not in any way suggest that watching the Ontario legislature would be any less interesting than watching this House. With all respect to my colleagues there, they do a better television job in making a speaker's presence in the House more obvious. There is a wide-angle shot normally when the speaker stands up, either from behind the speaker or from in front of him, that shows how he is standing, where he is standing in the House, and where he is in relation to the Speaker.

Ms. Clancy: Or she.

Mr. Milliken: Or she. I am sorry. I am just shortening my remarks because of the time. I recognize the hon. member for Halifax is very right. I am using he in its generic sense, including members of both sexes.

Once the speech commences the camera then normally moves in on the speaker and follows the speaker very closely.

I am not suggesting that we have wholesale reaction shots. The Ontario legislature has difficulty with that, as the programming director there told us. There may be a speech going on. I might have been the first speaker and I might be addressing my remarks to the parliamentary secretary across the way and making direct reference to the parliamentary secretary. In Ontario the cameras are very reluctant to go to the parliamentary secretary in case he is having a discussion with the chief Whip and is laughing uproariously while I am making a serious comment. It is not fair to the parliamentary secretary, nor would it be fair to my speech.

I hear the hon. member for Halifax getting overwrought again.

Ms. Clancy: Halifax West.

Mr. Milliken: Halifax West, I am sorry.

An hon. member: He hasn't got a prayer.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Ottawa South says he hasn't got a prayer.

In any event, to go back to my comments, I was suggesting that reaction shots are not always easy to do because members are often carrying on discussions of other kinds in the House that do not relate to the person who is speaking. They are very difficult to do.

Members seem nervous at the concept of reaction shots. I think there will be very few of them. The programming director, in doing his or her work, will not be able to take advantage of that facility very often because of the risks involved in getting the wrong kind of shot. We also would have the normal restriction that proceedings in the gallery would not be filmed. We are not here to show disorder in the galleries or any of that kind of thing. That would not be part of the television program. It is not part of the television program in Toronto.

I think the experience the committee came away from Toronto with was that their television is working extremely well under much, much looser guidelines. The structure is that there is a programming director who makes the television decisions and there is a complaint procedure available whereby members who feel aggrieved by what has been shown can make a complaint. There have been no complaints in over two or three years of this system being in place. We feel that if it can work there, surely to goodness it can work here in Ottawa.

We ought to consider this. We ought to relax our guidelines and give this responsibility to someone else, subject to a review procedure, so that the Committee on Privileges and Elections could be charged with the responsibility of hearing complaints from members where there has been something gone wrong and dealing with the issue to ensure that that kind of error, if that is what it ends up being, could be dealt with, and restrictions placed to ensure that that does not happen. We do not think it will happen very often. We think that hon. members on all sides will be delighted with the results of this change and we illustrated our suggestions with small illustrations in the report, which I again commend to hon. members for reading. Those are the two essential and basic recommendations of this report.

The one other that I think should be borne in mind is, if the report is to be adopted, the whole system is to be reviewed after two years of operation. In other words, we are not locked into something that will not change or is somehow immutable. What we have done is adopt a new system for the committees and a slightly modified system for the House, which we feel will enhance television coverage of this House and make it more interesting for Canadians watching it.

I am not suggesting that it is boring now, but it would make it better television. It would make it something that Canadians would get more pleasure out of watching because they would see more about what is going on in the House. They would see more of the reaction of the House to events and see where members are speaking in relation to the proceedings of the House. In other words, they would have a sense of the presence of this place that I feel, frankly, is lacking by the idea of having only the member who is speaking fill the screen and that be the sole picture that is shown of the House and its proceedings.

We also felt that special occasions could be televised more aptly by showing, again, wider expanses of the House. Cameras in different locations could show Your Honour, for example, but can show about half of the chamber in the same picture as well, so that the Speaker would have an opportunity to be shown in situ in the entire House. We think that is an excellent recommendation. We feel that the whole report is one that is deserving of serious consideration by the House. I hope that members, today, will have an opportunity to discuss it and that we can then adopt the report and proceed with those recommendations, put them in place, and start using them fully next autumn.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I was otherwise engaged during Routine Proceedings and I had a responsibility to be in the chamber during Routine Proceedings to present the forty-sixth report of the Striking Committee.

I understand, according to our Standing Orders, there is reason for the two committees to have organizational meetings this afternoon and I understand that is all they intend to do at this time.

I am wondering if I could have unanimous consent to revert to that aspect of Routine Proceedings so that I can present this forty-sixth report.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion made by the hon. member. There is unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

ELECTIONS, PRIVILEGES, PROCEDURE

CONCURRENCE IN NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Milliken.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the comments of my friend, opposite, vis-à-vis televising committee sessions and I would like to put a different perspective to him.

Before the major change where committees were set up, all bills, whatever category, went through this Parliament. That did not work because Parliament could never come to an agreement as to the time allocation for debating bills. Contrast that with Britain and France and unitary states, where one Parliament has the whole range of legislative jurisdiction. That would mean all that we have federally as well as provincial legislation.

They found that the only way it works is to be able to have agreement. Even major bills might have only three or four speakers at second reading, then it would go into Committee of the Whole, with agreement. I like that model because I think it would keep us together much more as parliamentarians in this House, which should be the focus of power. However, that has not been the way. When television came to the House, nobody could be seen to be compromising on the television, so we had to set up committees. The compromises are made at committee stages because television is not there and people's constituents are not seeing them make compromises. My fear is that if we put television in the committees people will simply not be able to compromise and therefore will have to move to the steering committees and the power will be exercised there, again behind closed doors.

I would like my friend to comment on that because the other model would be to return the focus completely to this House. As we all know this House is absolutely meaningless other than when we stand and ratify a decision by way of a vote. It is totally meaningless. None of us attend. None of us read Hansard any more because this is not where the power is. Opinions are not changed in this House. It is only where the final vote is made.

Minds are changed at the committee level. I would rather see that back here. I know it is a radical model but I would like my friend to comment on it. If the parties would come together and agree to limited fixed debate in this House we could return the focus, the excitement, and the dynamism of politics to this House where I think it should be.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the hon. parliamentary secretary has raised many interesting points and I do not know where to start because I disagree with him on several issues.

First, the shift to committees was to take consideration of the committee stage of bills out of the House, out of Committee of the Whole. Frankly, I think that was a very sensible decision.

Committee of the Whole is quite unworkable and it was not satisfactory for hearing witnesses. I think the thrust of our committee work on bills now is to hear expert witnesses on the bills so that we can consider much more about bills than ever could be done before in Committee of the Whole. I feel that that change has been an extremely sensible one and very beneficial to both government and opposition.

The legislative committees that I have been on, and I admit it has been a very limited experience, have been excellent. There have been changes made in the committees on a non-partisan basis, there has been agreement after extensive work. Witnesses have been called, and various groups wishing to make submissions have been invited. The legislative committees I have been on have been very worthwhile experiences. I felt we made some real contribution to the bill. In some cases there were no amendments but at least the public had some input which we could never have had in Committee of the Whole in this House.

I disagree with him on that point and I think that while it would be nice to think that putting bills through all stages here would somehow refocus attention to this House, I do not think that is so. I think that members who are interested in discussing a bill are here for the debate, by and large.

The suggestion that no one is here is wrong, I think. I am here hour after hour, day after day, and I love being here. I am sorry that more members do not find the same pleasure in it. I feel it is my job to be here and I enjoy being here.

I realize other members have other commitments. I do too, but I tend to do more of those at night I guess and spend more of my days here. I find it great. I enjoy participating in debate with any member, particularly the government Whip and the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. I am always pleased with them.

The Minister of Transport is always entertaining. He has a string of jokes when he makes a speech and I am happy to be here to listen to those.

An hon. member: Does it change anybody's views?

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member asks if it changes anybody's views. I agree. The views may not change visibly in this House, but invisibly I believe they do. I think the speeches that are made here influence ministers; I think the fact there is going to be an extended debate on a clause that is unpopular forces the government to consider changes.

They will not stand up and say that as a result of the representations of the hon. member for Mount Royal, or Ottawa—Vanier, or Kingston and the Islands they are changing their views. They will not announce that but we feel that the views are changed as a result of what we do, and I think that if the hon. member looked at the schedule of bills that has been dealt with in this House for the last two months he will see there has been considerable co-operation between the government and the opposition parties with a view to allocating time among those bills to ensure an orderly transaction of business.

I think there has been excellent co-operation. There has been no closure. I believe there has been no time allocation for the last two months and I believe it is primarily because as a group we have worked together to try to provide some orderly progress in dealing with government business in this House.

We do not always agree with the business, but we recognize that the government has a majority, that it is going to force the work through in any event and we have worked together to achieve that.

I do not know why that same co-operation would not continue in committees whether or not they are televised. Certainly it did not change the committees that were televised during the past year which, in my view, worked extremely well and provided an excellent opportunity for Canadians to see that aspect of Parliament at work. I hope he is thinking very positively toward this report.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a comment and a question.

I have been in the House 11 years, and because I was energy critic perhaps I have been in more legislative committees studying more bills. I went right up and down the national energy program with many bills. I am now in communication. Probably I have been amongst a group of parliamentarians who have had more experience in committees than a lot of people in the House.

Committees can be very boring, but they can be very exciting also. There are a lot of people who perform very well in committees who you do not see in Question Period in the House of Commons. I think Canadians are going to be pleasantly surprised when they see the committee work.

However, my question is: How are you going to decide which committees to televise? At any one time, we have 10 or 15 committees sitting. Do we decide on the environment committee hearings on the new regulations on environment, or do we want to hear the legislative committee on the new broadcasting bill, one that we have been sitting on for a long time? I believe that Canadians are interested. If one looks at the TV channels, people want information.

People will get more information from the committees than from the speeches made in the House of Commons. Material that they could follow can be sent to them. They could follow the bill clause by clause. With modern communication, modern television, it is amazing what can be done. The NDP believes it should be open to everyone. How are we going to choose which committee? How do you see that working?

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the question that the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has raised is a very good one. Certainly, it is one that exercised the committee considerably, because we recognized that with up to 20 committees sitting on a day it is difficult to know which committee or committees should go on the air, one on one.

Our view was that there should be committee rooms established on the Hill so that the committees sitting in those rooms would be automatically televised. Which committees would sit in those rooms? There would have to be some choosing. In Toronto, the committee that sits in the one committee room equipped for full television coverage is automatically on the parliamentary channel. They are working on a second committee room to be equipped for television coverage.

I think we recommended a total of four rooms. The committees that sit in those four rooms would automatically be televised at staggered hours. We felt that the committee chairmen would decide among themselves which ones should be there. In almost every case, we felt that the committee chairmen would be able to work out either alternate times of sitting to accommodate the room or would decide that one committee is of greater national interest than the other and should be televised.

That would be the first level. If the committee chairmen could not work it out, then the chairman of chairs of committees which is made up of all the committee chairmen or the "liaison committee" as it is called—we like to refer to it in more exalted terms—would make the decision on behalf of the group. In other words, a decision would be made at that point.

The other committees could all be televised. The committees that are in the four rooms would be televised automatically by House staff, but television cameras would be admitted to the other committees if the networks wished to cover them. For example, a television station in Vancouver might hire somebody in Ottawa to cover a committee on which the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam was sitting because the people in Vancouver were interested in the issue that was being discussed on a particular day.

Those people could get a tape of the committee proceedings done and broadcast in Vancouver subsequently. All those would be available because of the openness in committees as long as the committee itself allowed its proceedings to be televised. We are not stopping—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have to interrupt the hon. member. The time for questions and comments is now over.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, as a member of the committee on Privileges and Elections, I am pleased to rise today to address some of the issues.

When we entered into this study there was a lot of apprehension about how this would affect the role of a member of Parliament and the collegiality of committees. Would it distort the proceedings of the House? Would it give Canadians a biased view of what we were doing? We ourselves had many of these apprehensions.

• (1200)

The committee received a reference on June 8 of last summer. It had a few preliminary meetings and then it travelled to Washington to look at the C-SPAN television station. C-SPAN is the televising of Congress. There is C-SPAN 1 for the Congress itself and C-SPAN 2 for the Senate.

We went there with many apprehensions. We talked with Democratic and Republican Congressmen, interest groups, and a number of players and lobbyists. We asked them how they felt about the television station C-SPAN, if it was biased, or if there were any problems with it.

Every person we talked to said that the television station was not biased and was very fair.

In the United States politics is a little more polarized than it is here in Canada. People said that the station gave as much time to the left as it did to the right, to this issue as to the other, and that it all works out in the end. There were a few Congressmen who said that they had apprehensions at the beginning. The Republicans said it was a Democratic enterprise, and so on.

We asked them, after several years of experiencing the television channel and station, was it biased now. They said no. We asked them if it portrayed any Congressmen in a bad light, and they said no. We asked them if it was beneficial to the debate of public policy in America, and they said yes, it was.

C-SPAN is the channel that we would propose to model our broadcasts on in the House of Commons. It would have a basic schedule of televising the House during the day and then wraparound programming. The wraparound programming would include news conferences, provincial legislatures, if they were speaking on national issues, party conventions, conventions, conferences and committees. It would be gavel to gavel so there would be no editorializing by the producers. It would also cover special ceremonies.

This has worked extremely well in the U.S. After Congress rises at 6 or 6.30 in the evening, they replay sittings or play taped committee meetings or taped news conferences. They may play them two or three times. They may take out one news conference which was of very great importance and play it. If it originated on a Monday, perhaps it will be replayed a couple of times on the weekend. They opened up the process and Americans are able to participate, view and understand public policy in the United States.

We went to C-SPAN and the biggest question that we wanted answered was, who decides what goes on air? Who decides which committee hearings should be broadcast? We felt that this would give whoever decided a great deal of power and influence. We asked to go into the producers committee where the decisions were made.

At the committee meeting it was decided what went on the air at what times. There were about six or seven journalists in the room, or people who had professional journalism backgrounds. Some had worked as assistants and some had worked in different capacities with interest groups or with public service organizations.

Each morning they would meet and go over what was going on during the day. Basically they would make a decision on what would interest the public most. For example, what was of topical interest? Who was speaking? How important was the subject matter? They argued it out among themselves and came to a decision as to what time this programming material would go on air. It was done very easily without a lot of haggling or production.

What amazed me was that after all was said and done, members of Congress and people across the U.S. would look at what had been decided by six or seven very young people and say that it was very fair; it was not advantageous to either the Democrats or the Republicans. That was very important.

I wish the parliamentary secretary, the government House leader and members who are apprehensive could have sat in with us as well, because it certainly allayed a lot of the fears of our committee.

There was apprehension about televising the House of Commons. In 1977 when TV was first introduced, there was a long and protracted debate. When it was introduced, the camera angles were a little wider and the guidelines were a little looser than they are today. Gradually members complained and we came up with a form of electronic Hansard.

The hours in the House were changed to cut out evening sittings, and the House was televised during the day from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. We then had many hours of dead air space. The CBC was paralysed for 12 years, not being able to fill this time with public policy broadcasts because of apprehension of the members of the House of Commons and others.

Finally last year, as an interim measure, we replayed broadcasts of the sittings the House of Commons. Some members have said that it is all government time, others have said that it is all opposition time, or that one side is favoured over the other.

In my view, and in the view of most Canadians after seeing what goes on in the House, other than Question Period, the House of Commons is basically just a record of how members feel about different matters.

Last year our committee struggled to write a report and get concurrence in that report. I would like to thank all members of the House for giving us concurrence. We were able to replay the proceedings of the House of Commons and that is very important.

We have this channel with dead air time on it, there is a lot of important business going on, and we would like to share that business with the Canadian public.

Following the McGrath reforms, a lot of important work is done in committee. Committees have been bringing out reports that have had a lot of influence on government policy. We would like to share with Canadians those deliberations and discussions. Canadians are not participating in one of the more important democratic reforms that has been undertaken by the House of Commons in many years. We must open up the House so that Canadians can share in that.

Committee chairmen have come to the House and asked: "Will you please televise my committee?" The chairman of the finance committee has come before the House on several occasions asking for permission to televise his committee and sometimes he has received it, other times he has not. The chairman of the communications and culture committee has come before the House asking for permission to televise his committee. Other committees have been asking for the same permission. The pressure is building. This report is asking for the right to organize how we are going to do it so it is fair to everyone.

Another point I would like to make is that the McGrath report said that committees were the masters of their own destiny. Why should committees be beholden to the House of Commons for permission to share their proceedings with Canadians? That is very unfair and it is time that we as members of Parliament in the House of Commons gave concurrence to this report and allowed committees to be the masters of their own destiny. We need to foster the independence and the spirit of goodwill that committees have in trying to influence public policy and allow Canadians to see how influential committees have become and perhaps Canadians will come forward and share their ideas and concerns with those committees.

Committees presently allow print journalists into a committee room. It is very unfair that committees exclude the electronic media. Under this system, the electronic media would not be excluded. Networks could come in with the permission of the chairman and the committee itself and take some clips, and I would hope that they would be longer pieces, and broadcast them if they wanted. That is very important.

In asking for concurrence, we are saying that we in the House of Commons take some control over what should be broadcast. There are a few recommendations of importance, one we have already concurred in, and two or three which are very important which I would like to address.

One is that a programming director should be responsible for the production and direction of the broadcasting of the House of Commons, subject to the over-all direction of the monitoring committee of the House of Commons.

What we as a committee have said in this report is that the Speaker controls the House of Commons broadcasting, but the Speaker is in no position to make editorial decisions or deal with complaints. That should be vested within the privileges and elections committee which ordinarily deals with complaints, revising the Standing Orders, and how committees operate.

The monitoring committee would be able to work with the C-PaC organization and come up with over-all policies and programming guidelines that would be satisfactory to everyone. Members of the House could easily approach the privileges and elections committee. A programming director, under the supervision of the monitoring committee, would make the day-to-day editorial decisions such as what goes on and when, in co-operation with the liaison committee when it comes to the televising of committees. I presume this programming director would be meeting with a number of programmers because it would be too big for any one person to handle.

Each committee of the House of Commons shall determine whether any meeting or meetings will be open to the electronic media. I have already covered this and, as I said, committees should be masters of their own destiny.

Recommendation No. 5 is that the House of Commons should equip two committee rooms. We felt this is very important. We have seen the televising of committees on an increasingly ad hoc basis with wires strung all over the place. They sometimes interfere with the proceedings of the committee. We would recommend to the House that two committee rooms be set up and wired and that this be done at an appropriate time in appropriate rooms so that the television cameras would be very discreet. Committee chairmen could then opt to go into those rooms. For instance, the Charest committee could be assigned to that room, or the finance committee when it is doing something important as it did with the GST hearings.

The first recommendation of the committee is that the Canadian Parliamentary Channel proposal as presented by CBC and the Canadian cable television industry should be accepted and endorsed as proposed, provided that four members of the board of directors are appointed to represent the public interest.

By concurring in this report, we are sending a signal to the CRTC that we agree with this proposal and we want the CRTC to accept it, but we want to have some control over it. We want to have some input. We believe that it is important to appoint four people who are not a part of the CBC or the cable industry to represent the public interest, four notable Canadians who would be noble in thought and with ideals about what we wanted to achieve with the channel. This channel could be a great instrument of Canadian unity. It could show public policy debates across the country and open up the process to Canadians of what is going on in Quebec, Newfoundland, and elsewhere.

I should remind the House that the Canadian CPaC would be a non-profit organization and that the people who would control CPaC, the board of directors, the consortium, has said that if revenues from the channel exceed what they spend, they would delay further increases as inflation came, or this money would be used to enhance the service. It is important that it is a non-profit organization.

In summary, I believe that we in this House should be concurring with this report. It is a simple report. It is not asking us to do anything radical, but to open up the process a little bit to allow committees to make their own recommendations, to use the facilities that we presently have in place such as the channel and the satellite air time, which is dead air, to broadcast news conferences, special committees, committees of the House or conventions, whether they are political conventions or an important address at the Canadian Medical Association convention.

I urge members of the House of Commons to give consideration to this report and bless it with their concurrence.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On question or comments, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, a question was put to me that I did not finish answering. I know the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona is a very capable member of this committee and perhaps he could explain.

The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam asked the question as to how the committee recommended it would be decided which committees would be televised when there are so many sitting. I got part way through the explanation. I had not dealt with the committees that were not in the four rooms. I wonder if the hon. member could have specific comments on that part of the question to complete that part of the answer because I know he is as familiar with it as I am.

Mr. Thorkelson: This is a very important question and I thank the member for it.

Under this proposal there would be two or perhaps four committee rooms equipped with television cameras. Committees could book themselves into these rooms and the liaison committee or the chairs of committees would make the decision as to when the committees would go on the air or if they would be repeated.

CPaC has also stated that it would have three or four camera crews so as many as eight committees could be taped at one time. They could all be televised, subject to the discretion of the liaison committee or the chairs of all the committees. Let us say that on a Wednesday there are 15 committees and eight, seven, or six are of great importance and should be on television. Four of them would be booked into committee rooms with recording capability and CPaC would bring in portable television crews to the other two or three. Then the chairs liaison committee would work with the production director and decide which committees go where.

One other thing we could do with this television channel is string two or three committee hearings together so viewers could see a progression of witnesses address an issue, unless they put it on a Sunday morning or Sunday afternoon and committees could be kept in the can, as it were, and strung together so viewers could see the full debate all at once and be better able to understand what we as a House of Commons are doing.

I concurred in this report, but it was my feeling that we should allow the decision-making authority to go to the consortium itself, subject to the review of the monitoring committee or the privileges and elections committee because, in my view, it is the professionals who are non-partisan who can best make the decision whether it should be a news conference or a committee of the House, what is topical today, what is hot today, what is of great interest to Canadians. We as a committee felt that we needed a little bit more control as things work themselves out and it should be the chairs of the committees who make that decision.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have been following this discussion and debate rather carefully. I want to raise a question and I want a confirmation or denial. I believe that I can get a confirmation of the following.

My understanding is that the most important thrust here, the bottom line, is that we are trying to bring Parliament closer to the people. We are trying to help Canadians understand, perhaps better than they do now, the whole question of governance as it pertains to the nation, and how decisions are made. We want to help citizens understand government, understand what it does and how it does it, perhaps even better than they do now so that together we can help build a nation. We can improve governance and decision-making generally.

Is that a reasonably accurate description of perhaps the most important objective that we are trying to reach here.

Mr. Thorkelson: I would say that is true. We would like to help Canadians understand government. When Canadians turn on their TV and view this channel, they are only seeing one-third or one-quarter of what goes on on Parliament Hill and in Ottawa.

A lot of important decisions are taken at committees. We can see the development and the thinking evolve as committee members hear witnesses, as they themselves are influenced, as they sift through information. Canadians should have access to that information.

News conferences are held and people will see a 20-second clip or a five-second clip on national television that evening. If they were able to see even 15 minutes of that hour-long news conference and the questions asked and how reporters were trying to elicit that information, their understanding of that one issue and their understanding of the process would be so much greater.

The process not only means committees and the House, but political conventions, conferences, and interest groups trying to bring pressure on government. I would agree totally that we want to foster a greater understanding of governance of this country and an appreciation of Canada as a nation from sea to sea. I believe this could be a fantastic instrument of national unity.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise and report on the report from the elections and privileges committee entitled "Watching the House at Work". I am sure some Canadians out there would wonder about the title of this particular report.

Before we get any great illusions as to the number of people watching us, this Environics poll taken in 1986, somewhat dated, shows that 86 per cent of people favour parliamentary television; only 13 per cent are opposed.

If we take that poll one step further, we find that 3 per cent of the population watch our channel each and every day. I guess we would call those the political junkies of Canada. Ten per cent watch it once a week and 37 per cent watch it occasionally. I guess that leaves about 50 per cent who never watch it at all. So let us be assured that we are no competition for the Cosby show, Rosanne Barr, or even any of the soaps.

Nevertheless, it would appear that from all the reports from the MPs, the vast majority said it must continue. Many had reservations about relaxed or loosened camera coverage of the House. Very few feel it should be removed altogether, but there were some members of Parliament who said there should be no coverage whatsoever in the House. I suggest that Canadians would not accept that kind of decision. It is here now and has been for 12 years. Canadians are used to it. If we took a step back, I am sure citizens would accuse us of doing everything behind closed doors or somewhere where at least they could not see us at all.

Of the Canadians who wrote to the committee, and there were several hundred of them, the vast majority said yes, indeed, we want relaxed, loosened, enhanced coverage of parliamentary television. The vast majority were also concerned with the cost. They did not want to be burdened with any further cost for the showing of the House of Commons proceedings or committee proceedings.

As far as working in committee and the televising of committee, I think Canadians will see a different aspect. Many of them are tuned in only to Question Period and they see the show time for 45 minutes. That is not the real world. There is a lot of work done in committees, probably the majority of the work. We keep saying this but I think Canadians have to see that.

Also, they would see that there is some collegiality in committee work and there are some non-biased decisions made. I am loath to say this, but you can even make a few friends in committees. Even with their politically warped philosophies, you can still make a few friends in committee. In that light, you are assured that some work can be done. Whereas in the House, especially during Question Period, it is much more confrontational.

As far as the partnership between Cableco and CBC, when I asked the representative from the cable company, why do you want to get involved with this, just for the betterment of Canadians? He said: "Yes, we have only altruistic motives in mind". I had some hardship, and I do not want to be cynical, but I was not too sure of that.

My colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam tells me that from 1984 to 1988 cable prices went up 6 per cent, which is almost acceptable. However, in 18 months in 1988 to 1989 they went up 29 per cent, which is not acceptable. Canadians wrote in and said that they were getting programs that they did not ask for but have to pay for. I am sure they are having the same reservations about the work in the House and the work in committee.

We would much prefer that CBC go it alone, restructure its priorities, but in reality they are not going to do that. Mr. Veilleux and Mr. Watson were witnesses at our committee and said that they were very excited about this partnership. I am rather convinced that this enhanced coverage will not go ahead unless we okay the partnership.

We had another reservation and I put in a minority report on behalf of our party. The C-SPAN that we saw in operation in Washington works extremely well. However, I hasten to point out that there are professionals working for C-SPAN alongside professionals from CBS, NBC and ABC who are working at half the rate. We do not believe it is fair that professionals work side by side at different wage scales. We would like very much that the workers, the professionals who work for this consortium be equally paid with those of the CBC, and that those who work for CBC not be threatened with their positions.

I believe that now the coverage in this House is somewhat sterile. Boring, perhaps, is a better word to describe it. I reviewed the tapes this morning of the visit of Mr. Mandela yesterday. I wanted to see how that was covered. It was covered in its usual sterile way. If Mr. Mandela was not waving his arms in front of the Speaker, we would not have known that Mr. Mandela was there. This is most unfortunate. It did not show the somewhat awe inspiring scene in this House yesterday. Certainly, I felt it in my seat. The Canadian public were not able to share with us that sense of exhilaration and awe that proceeded. As much as we revere the Speaker in the House, the poor Speaker has to be alert at all times because he is in the Chair in front of whoever is speaking, whether it is the Prime Minister or Mr. Mandela. This enhanced coverage would allow the senators in the middle aisle here to be shown on television—and everybody wants to see the senators, I am sure—and the House basically filled on one of the few occasions that it is filled.

As I speak now, I want to tell Canadians that they are not seeing the real thing. They are probably anticipating that there are a lot of people listening to me here. I am glad to see that you are at least smiling, Madam Speaker, which must indicate that you are listening to a certain extent. The member for Mackenzie is listening. I am sure that the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam is listening, at least with his right ear, but there are many people who are not listening to me.

This is the fruit of the committee work. We did a lot of work in committee, and this is an opportunity for us to tell the Canadian citizens what in fact we did at the committee level.

When we were in Washington there was a scenario that really pointed out to the Americans what was wrong with their television coverage. They have I guess what one could call a late show in Congress. It takes place one hour after the sitting of the Congress is over. You put your name in and and wait in line to give an hour speech on any topic you want to give a dissertation on. Everybody did it and it was going along fine until one night a congressman decided to put on a good show, a real grandstand exhibition.

He was in the House all by himself but proceeded to admonish the President of the United States. He said: "You, Mr. President, are going to have to answer to this". He referred to a number of people as if they were in the Congress when in fact there was not a soul save for himself.

At that point in time, Tip O'Neill, Speaker of the House at that time, saw this going on and said: "What is this man doing? I want it stopped immediately". He instructed the camera crew to pan to show who was really there, and there was not a soul. The real situation was exposed.

We have nothing to be afraid of. Let us expose what this is. There are people talking about other things, although perhaps some Canadians may think this is important. I personally do think it is important. Let us show them the real House.

As I speak I understand that there are probably 50 members sitting in committees. So members are working as there are 25 members in the House.

I suggest that if we provide enhanced coverage of the House more members would probably want to come to the House. They would want some more exposure. When you are here in the House you are able to ask questions in the comment and question period after someone has spoken. You can get some coverage, if that is what you are after. Also, if the cameras are allowed to pan, then probably not everybody would read their newspapers or do whatever they are doing. It would almost obligate them to pay some attention to what is going on in the House.

There are some who have grave concerns. I think that they are unfounded. This situation will be monitored by our own, if you will. Some people may have difficulty with people policing themselves. I think we are going to tread slowly. I would be much less conservative, small "c", and we would take a bold step.

I read carefully who expressed concern. It seems that the majority of people who expressed concern are from the government side. They said that this would allow for more grandstanding. They seemed to say that opposition members would have just another forum to get more exposure, allowing us time to rail against government policy. Being a member of the opposition I can understand that. With the enhanced programming, phone in programs and other avenues, government back-benchers will be given more opportunities as opposed to fewer.

As far as reaction shots are concerned, I think that when someone asks a question of another person with great acrimony and indignation and after the camera moves to the one who is answering the question it behooves the questioner not to break into a smirk or a smile after having asked that acrimonious question. Again, this will be a self-policing device for members in the House of Commons.

In conclusion, I think this does work very, very well in the United States. It works very, very well in the province of Ontario. Our gravest concern with this whole issue is in terms of the pricing. We do not believe that Canadians should have to pay to watch their democracy, their elected members at work. If they come here in person, they can see it free of charge. The galleries are filled each and every day. We do not believe that they should be obligated to pay, but I say that in the full understanding that this measure will not go forward unless there is some charge.

I have suggested in the minority report, without knowing if we have the authority, that we put a cap on it for heaven's sake. I think it is eight cents now and ten cents after the next five years. We are suggesting maybe five cents and cap it at fifteen cents because it is supposed to be non-profit and the cable companies are going to pour all the excess revenue back into enhanced programming for Parliament.

I do not want to be too cynical but we are somewhat cynical about this matter. This is our only concern with this entire report. Otherwise we are indeed in favour of enhanced coverage of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I did not sit on this committee. My friend opposite seems to have much more detailed information on the matter than I do.

I am wondering if he can elaborate on the cost. He seems to want to have the service provided without people paying more than eight, ten, or fifteen cents at the maximum. Surely the question is whether the users pay for it or whether it is the taxpayer in general who pays for it. I think he is saying that he would rather have the taxpayer at large subsidizing this operation rather than the users.

I would like him to expand on that point. My own starting point would be that the people who decide they want to take the channel should be paying for it, rather than imposing it on seniors and poor people who are not watching it. They would subsidize the few who are watching it.

Mr. Butland: Madam Speaker, that is a good question. It is one that we wrestled with. Canadians who wrote in said that they were willing to pay eight or ten cents a month.

The cable companies are enjoying a good rate of return. What they have done time and time again lately is they have inflicted these MuchMusic channels, the sports network channels, with no choice to the people. They have also inflicted NewsWorld, I might add, at 50 cents a month. They have done it with great regularity. As I have already pointed out, the profits are great.

Probably unrealistically we would anticipate that the cable companies should do it free of charge. We believe that CBC could restructure its priorities because this particular media coverage of the House of Commons has been long neglected for the whole 12 years it has been in place. It just has not been addressed.

There were recommendations made previously that would have been rather costless, but no one moved to react to them. It has been on the back-burner for a long time.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, if I recall correctly the comments of my hon. colleague, he indicated that a majority of members appear to be concerned about the opportunities the opposition would have to condemn government initiatives.

I would ask him the following. If these initiatives on the part of the government are extremely sound, is that therefore not a minimal risk? In fact, is not democracy as we know it, as it has evolved, gravitating toward greater openness?

• (1240)

Mr. Butland: Madam Speaker, yes, I certainly concur. It is a minimal risk for the government to take. It anticipates that we are going to criticize and probably condemn most of its policies. This is not the time or the place to say that most of them are condemnable, but I throw it in anyway. I do not think it is a great risk for the government to take. The enhanced coverage will give it opportunities.

The hon. member's last comment was the key. It is toward more openness that I think the Canadian public is after. Certainly many say now that that is the problem with Meech Lake: it has not been nearly open enough.

I am certainly a long-time educator and a short-time politician. Education of members of the Canadian public is extremely important. I think they will appreciate the openness and what really goes on here, rather than providing them with somewhat of an artificial situation much of the time.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague, the member for Sault Ste. Marie, first, on his participation in this committee which is yeoman's work and, second, on his analysis which I think is excellent.

The hon. member for Lethbridge asked my colleague whether or not the users should pay. No, the taxpayers should pay, in general, because it should be open to everyone. It is like medicare. You can use it if you need to use it. You can tune in if you want to. This is the Parliament of Canada. This is not MuchMusic or soap opera. It should be open.

The cable companies can afford to put it on. They are making a 28 per cent rate of return, twice the amount of the phone companies. The CBC gets a budget from Parliament. It should be for nothing that it is on. We in the NDP and the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie in his minority report said that we should not have to pay for this.

I do not want to end in a controversy. I will pass along a little story to my friends. A couple of years ago I was on holiday. I was in California. I rented a car and drove the highway by Big Sur from San Francisco to Log Angeles. I pulled in at Big Sur, which is pretty remote. There was a little tavern where I wanted to have a beer. I went in. There were two old hippies, probably my age, standing there at the bar.

I sat between them and had a beer. I noticed outside that they had a TV satellite dish. One fellow said: "Where are you from?". I said: "I am a Canadian". He said: "Canada, Canada. I saw that House of—". I said: "The House of Commons, Parliament". "Yeah, Parliament," he said, "I watch it on TV. They are really strange dudes, really strange dudes". I did not have the heart to tell him that I was a member of the institution.

The point is, as my friend said, that it should be open to all. Maybe there are junkies, as the hon. member called them. I think there are a lot of people who watch us and approach us on the street.

The point is that there should be an opportunity for everyone to watch it. The point we are trying to make in the NDP is that it should be free. It should be paid through general taxes and not paid by people once again being asked by the cable companies to pay more money when they are already making big profits. They should put this on free of charge.

The House of Commons should have instructed the CRTC to require that. I hope the CRTC, the group that governs television and the price that people pay for their cable, requires that it be free.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate. At the start I must admit, as most of us do, that I was not a member of the committee that looked into this matter. Thus, first, I would like to pay tribute to those members of Parliament who looked into this topic and issued the report that we are debating by way of a concurrence motion today.

I did make a presentation by way of written correspondence to that committee. I must say that the committee did not accept my perspective. While I speak against the report, it is not with any malice because I do respect the parliamentary process whereby people come together to form committees that look into different topics. They invite the public to comment. They invited us as members to comment, and we all did.

They then went through a process of negotiation and discussion and came up with the report that we are debating today. The fact that I disagree with the committee does not in any way take away from the respect I have for the members of the committee and the thanks I have for them doing this good work.

Our differences are, I guess, in perspective. My perspective would be for us to get back to this House being more meaningful in the life of Parliament.

By that I mean I wish we could have debates here, as used to happen in earlier days, when people would actually change their mind as a result of hearing a debate in the House of Commons. The reality today is that no views or opinions are ever changed as a result of a debate in this House.

Where peoples' minds are changed is at the committee level. Once television hit the House of Commons nobody could be seen to be compromising because that leads to all sorts of problems from your own supporters out in the ridings who do not appreciate the nature of Canada and the nature of Parliament. This is a body where we come together to broker in a sense the honest and legitimate interests that are held out across this broad country with our very different populations, whether they are in Newfoundland, B.C., Alberta or Quebec. The role of Parliament is to broker those differences and to come up with compromises.

Compromises never meet the needs of the extreme group, the people who feel so strongly. The fact of the matter is that if you are going to survive in life you simply have to compromise. The fact of the matter is that none of us know every issue perfectly and we are not as smart as we think.

I can remember giving my maiden speech in this House some 11 years ago and really pounding forth the view of southern Albertans as to how we held our opinions on certain issues. I then listened to other members and realized that they were far smarter than I.

They just as honestly and fervently held their view which represented the perspective of their constituents.

The point is that once television hit this House the power flowed out to the committees where people could debate the issues, make compromises and send them back to this House.

Another point I would like to make is that in the United Kingdom, in France, in many other parliaments and in the United States, the vast majority of the full legislative jurisdiction is in one parliament. The legislation that is considered in Britain and in France is the equivalent of all of the legislation that we consider in this House plus everything that is done in the provincial legislatures.

That means they have had to come up with routines that make the House far more efficient. In Britain, a major bill, whether it be like the National Energy Program that we had in the last Parliament, or free trade or the Meech Lake Accord as we had in this Parliament, would be allocated four speeches, perhaps two hours in all. They then go to a legislative committee where it is looked into by a committee, and comes back.

The point is that during that major debate opinions can change because people know that it is a significant speech. Madam Speaker, as you well appreciate, in this House, and it does not matter who is in the government and who is in opposition, the fact of the matter is that when you are in opposition, and we were exactly the same when we were in opposition, you try to use up as much time as you can.

Yet beyond the first speech it is all repetition. That is why this House has lost its meaningfulness. The vast bulk of the speakers just repeat what the first speaker said on behalf of the party, whether it is the government party or the two opposition parties. It is an enormous waste of time here and it does not change anyone's mind.

I speak from the perspective of someone who has been here for some 11 years. I have sat as a back–bencher in the opposition. I have sat as a critic of a specific department in the opposition. I have been a back–bencher on the government side. I have chaired standing and special committees. I have been a parliamentary secretary and all that involves at the committee level. The fact of the matter is that the most satisfying part of being a parliamentarian is committee work.

What might have been an imperative driving the members on the committee was to be able to give members of Parliament more visibility back in our ridings, for those many, many hours we all spend at the committee level where we really make a substantial contribution to the public life of Canada. There is no doubt about that. I fervently believe that.

I know of all sorts of occasions when committee members of all three parties have made substantial changes to bills. On the standing committees they have input policy that has then showed up later on in a statute that comes out. The problem is that we get no credit for it. But why should we expect credit for it? We are elected. We have a term as long as the Parliament exists. We have an obligation. We are very well paid at $80,000 a year, $20,000 of which is tax free. We do have an obligation to come and work hard, and the vast bulk of members do.

If I could have my choice, I would rather be an independent. Independents do not have any responsibility. They never have to go to committees. They do not ever have to compromise their views. They can sit there in all their pristine virginity and never compromise. But they have absolutely no power. They never change one thing in this House. If you want to be here, get very well paid and not do anything, then you want to cross the floor and sit as an independent. It is a marvellous life of freedom with no responsibility. The fact of the matter is that government members and opposition members do have a responsibility. I think that it is at the committee stage.

I remember being the Parliamentary Secretary on the legislative committee which studied all the deregulation bills on transportation. It studied the National Transportation Act, the coasting trade and other statutes. As a Parliamentary Secretary I could see the logic of dozens of amendments that came from government members and from both parties in the opposition. As I recollect we accepted some 118 amendments.

When I became convinced that it was a good amendment, as the Parliamentary Secretary I would go to the minister, who happened to be the present Minister for International Trade, and say, "Look, minister, if we can get these amendments I think I can negotiate a package with the opposition to be able to get the bill through in a reasonable period of time at report stage and third reading". That is exactly what happens.

If that committee was televised, I do not think opposition members would be able to make those compromises. They would be seen to be co-operating with the government. Again, I say that whether or not I am in the opposition. If I were in the opposition the same pressure would be on me as an individual.

If we televise committees, then the power will have to move to a steering committee. That will mean we will spend far more time at steering committees where we will make those compromises. I would rather not do that. I would rather see us have a totally new orientation that would bring more influence and power back to this House, even where there is television. I think we could become less partisan if we had agreement on fixed hours for debates. Bills could still go off to a legislative committee where the technical changes could be made from the expert witnesses. They could come back here for the policy debates. If government had a fixed agenda, it would be much more amenable to accepting amendments from the opposition parties.

That is my perspective. I do not claim to be a total expert, but I feel strongly on that perspective.

I want to respond to the point made by the NDP members who feel that this channel should be provided free. It has often and long been the NDP model that something be free.

Canadians know that nothing is free. Under the principle of offering something for free, this nation built up a national debt that is now over $400 billion. When we came to power the deficit was $38 billion, $22 billion of which was interest on the national debt, and $16 billion was surplus spending on programs compared to what was being taxed from people. By borrowing $16 billion, we were able to offer programs to people for free.

But the young people of this nation in particular surely realize today that nothing is free, and that in fact what we successfully did was to pass on to their shoulders this huge national debt that they are either going to have to pay for directly by way of tax dollars, or by a very substantially reduced income and standard of living.

Madam Speaker, what would you and I think today if our grandparents had done to us what we have done to our children and grandchildren in a mere 20 years? The fact of the matter is that this country went from 1867 to 1968, fought two world wars, came through a major economic depression, purchased the west, developed the north, built roads to resources—developed the whole of this country—and the national debt was only $18 billion. Maybe only six cents out of every tax dollar went to service that debt.

But in the last 20 years we have offered people a whole host of programs, all of which are very attractive and which we like to have. At the same time we have maintained low taxes in order to have a good cash flow in our pockets. For that we went out and paid too much for land if we were farmers, too much for businesses if we were business people and too much for our homes. The secret is that collectively we were borrowing it on the side and under the table from rich people who had lots of money who had nothing to do with it except lend it to the government. We borrowed it from people from other countries and we built up this debt. As I say, at first it was six cents to service the debt. In 1968, it was 12 cents. Then it went to 15, 20, 25 and 30 cents. Now 35 cents out of every tax dollar that comes in has to come right off the top to service the debt.

As I say, some people argue that we owe it to ourselves so it does not make a difference. It does make a difference because people with lots of money rather than investing it in plant and equipment and taking the risk of going belly-up, sit back and lend it to the government. They have a guaranteed rate of return. But that money is not then available for putting out into social programs or developing new mining ventures so our young people can get great jobs as engineers and technicians. It is just not available.

If our grandparents had done that to us, Madam Speaker, we would not have the very high standard of living we have today. I think it is really wrong what we did to our children and our grandchildren. Thus I make the point that when the NDP continue to offer to our fellow Canadians something for free, surely to goodness that concept has been totally discredited as, indeed, I think it has. We notice that when people are polled between elections they like the NDP but when they actually have to decide if they are going to give the socialist philosophy their votes only one in five ever come to that decision.

I am privileged to speak on this matter. I would like to refer to Conclusion C which states: "Broadcasting committees would relieve some of the pressure that is presently put on Question Period and would permit the public to better understand the roles played by members".

I do not think there is any solution to the Question Period. Question Period is very important in our society in terms of being able to hold the Cabinet accountable. I know it is a raucous period and all of that. It not being a congressional forum we do not have real solid journalists who are well educated and penetrating in their investigative journalism. We do not have that. The National Press Gallery in this country really does not measure up to a professional—

Mr. Dick: It's a joke.

Mr. Thacker: It is a joke, as my colleague says. It is a real tragedy in the nation. It is one, I suppose, that will only be solved over time with better education.

In the meantime we need to have Question Period. It is going to be partisan because politics is a quest for power. Whoever has it wants to hang onto it. Whoever does not have it wants to get it.

I do not apologize to my constituents when they say that Question Period is childish and raucous. I just explain to them that yes, it is a battle for the late night journal, and it is too bad, but they have a responsibility as a citizen to be able to appreciate it. It is 45 minutes. You have the responsibility as a citizen to put it into proper perspective and to see it for what it is. When there is a stupid question followed by a stupid answer, people should realize that, yes, it is a stupid question and a stupid answer.

ABITIBI INTERNATIONAL BICYCLE TOUR

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the cyclists' federation of the Soviet Union will send a junior team to the Tour cycliste international de l'Abitibi, from July 24 to July 29. The 22nd Tour de l'Abitibi, in which all races will start and finish in Amos, will be presided over by the honorary chairman, reporter Léandre Normand.

The Amos organizing committee is ready to receive teams from France, Czechoslovakia, the United States, Canada, Quebec and several provincial teams.

Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Marie-Claude Audet will be honorary chairwoman.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, Amnesty International has just released a shocking report showing that Brazilian authorities are implicated in the torture and murder of Brazilian street children.

In a news release, Amnesty states that police officers in Brazil are torturing and killing suspects in and out of custody, including youth, secure in the knowledge that they will not be punished. Off-duty police officers are running many of the growing number of death squads—vigilante groups acting as judge, jury and executioner—and many of its victims are vulnerable, destitute street children. Indeed, death squad killings accounted for one-third of the violent deaths of children.

Brazilian authorities are overlooking these gross violations by not punishing those committing these atrocities. Few effective investigations or prosecutions are carried out for serious abuses such as torture and extra-judicial executions. Canada must call on the Brazilian authorities to stop these gross human rights violations.

The situation in Brazil further demonstrates the urgent need to ratify the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. This convention is a standard by which all nations will be judged.

I urge the government to press for early ratification of the convention, both here in Canada and abroad so that we can legitimately press other governments, such as that of Brazil, to commit to the survival, protection and development of the world's children.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post's annual report and five-year plan were tabled yesterday. They are enough to outrage even the most cynical.

Canada Post gloats over its recent $149 million so-called profit. It is not profit, it is the blood of rural post offices slashed from Canada Post's roster. This comes from the cruel harassment and intimidation of its employees on sick leave, from denying Canadians door-to-door delivery, from cutting back service to Canadians everywhere. Nowhere in Canada Post's mandate is there a call for a national postal service to turn money over to the government at the expense of service—nowhere.

But our new Canada Post has decided to gift wrap itself for the private sector, by turning a profit and cutting back on such costly ventures as providing service to rural Canadians, or delivering mail to people in sizeable communities door-to-door as it always has, and at the expense of providing a humane workplace.

However, the criminal is not Canada Post. It is this government's cowardly failure to confront our Crown corporation, its refusal to stand up for rural, suburban and urban Canadians, its abuse of postal workers and disregard for the future of our national postal system.

Shame, Mr. Speaker, shame on the government.

LIBERAL LEADERSHIP

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Jean Chrétien, where are you?

Earlier this month, speaking in French, Mr. Chrétien said clarifications to the accord seemed to have been made, and he hoped that the accord would pass.

Last week, in English, he would not say what he thought the legislatures of Manitoba and Newfoundland should do.

Well Mr. Chrétien, you should say the same thing to Canadians in English and in French.

Do you think the Meech Lake Accord should be adopted this week or not?

Yes or no, Mr. Chrétien? Yes or no?

ENERGY

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise this House that there is an alternative fuel that is renewable, which will not only reduce global warming but whose production might even contribute to the reduction of carbon in the atmosphere.

It would reduce urban ozone and polluants, and would require no new technological breakthroughs and would assist in providing our agricultural producers a better income. It was first used in the 1930s.

The fuel is ethanol, and its use has been studied time and time again.

A recent report commissioned by the Department of Grains and Oilseeds calls on the government to set an ethanol fuel policy. The energy committee report, Alcohol Additives, in 1986 called on the government to encourage the use of ethanol.

While this government dithers, other countries are gaining a huge lead in the use of ethanol. There are as many litres of ethanol blended fuel sold in the United States as there is gasoline sold in all of Canada. The U.S. spends close to $400 million a year fostering its ethanol industry at a net saving of $25 million a year according to its General Accounting Office.

It is time this government provided action on global warming instead of contributing to it by talking about the problem rather than implementing the solutions staring them in the face.

VOLUNTEERS

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, several years ago, the municipality of L'Ancienne-Lorette started a very positive tradition.

Annually, the town's authorities organize a special evening to thank volunteers who work day in day out to make life easier for fellow members of their community, of all ages.

These people who donate their time and skills and certainly do not advertise the fact, are invited to a special evening where they are offered entertainment, have a chance to talk to other volunteers and are given public recognition for their dedicated work.

I believe this is a wonderful example of how we can give merit when merit is due.

LIBERAL LEADERSHIP

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the man who would be king, the man who intends to assume the mantle of national leadership this weekend, has gone underground on the greatest national issue of the day.

His leadership rival, the member for LaSalle—Émard said: "One could not ask for a better demonstration of his failure to exercise leadership." Mr. Speaker, I agree. This is a total failure of leadership. The man has nothing to say to his Liberal colleagues in Newfoundland and Manitoba.

Mr. Chrétien, if you are to be a leader, it is time to show leadership. Do you support the Meech Lake Accord? Yes or no?

TRANSPORT

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that some months ago the Minister of Transport commissioned a study into the implications of a year round ferry service for Argentia.

Since the release of that study in March, the minister has been looking at his options. In the meantime, private shippers in just about every municipality in southwestern Newfoundland including Port aux Basques, Stephenville and the city of Corner Brook have opposed the move toward year round service, and with very good reason.

It is widely felt in Newfoundland that even a slight variation from the existing system would lead to major disruptions and major problems regarding transportation and that the idea of a year round service to Argentia should be scrapped altogether.

• (1410)

I call upon the minister to let his decision be known and to not displace the obligation under the terms of Confederation, which places Port aux Basques as the main point of entry.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, the agricultural voice of CBC Radio has retired.

On behalf of thousands of farmers who are faithful listeners to the CBC's farm broadcast, I would like to thank George Price for the valuable service that he provided for so many years. His informative, succinct reports and interviews will be missed, as will his presence at national and regional agricultural conferences, at which he was regarded both as a celebrity and an institution.

In wishing George Price well in his retirement, I would also like to urge CBC Radio to appoint a full time successor. Although the CBC as a Crown corporation should carefully regulate its expenditures just as government departments must do, the information which George Price provided was too important for his position to go unfilled. Canadian farmers need the daily agricultural reports which George Price so faithfully provided.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is blaming Canadian workers for causing inflation, and his latest scapegoat has been women. His targets have included teachers, nurses and social workers, jobs that are traditionally female oriented. Yet, since this government came to power, real wages have fallen almost 4 per cent while salary increases for fat cat executives of Canada's Crown corporations have been nothing short of unconscionable.

Last year, the government allowed salary increases of $40,000 to $84,000 for the top brass of CN. These are increases that are more than the average Canadian worker earns in a year. Why is the minister attacking reasonable wage settlements for ordinary workers, while remaining silent on these pork barrel payouts to senior government executives? Why does he not wake up and smell the coffee? The minister should stop blaming others and look to his own financial policies for the cause of Canada's economic woes.

LEADERSHIP OF LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the silence maintained since Sunday by the number one candidate for the leadership of the Liberal Party of Canada, Jean Chrétien, is a blatant insult to the intelligence of Canadians and shows contempt for the democratic process.

The man responsible for the Meech Lake crisis is lying low in his cottage.

For two years he has been urging the Wells, Carstairs, Doers and Filmons to fight Quebec.

The Liberal Party of Canada is about to choose as its leader a man who has shown contempt for Quebec.

Quebecers are proud through and through. They have not forgiven Jean Chrétien for the role he played during the referendum campaign, the contempt he has shown for my province and the humiliation he imposed on Quebecers in November 1981, when Quebec was isolated from the rest of Canada, at his instigation.

On June 24, the national day of Quebecers, the people of Quebec will be mindful of their motto: "Je me souviens".

Jean Chrétien has shown many times over that he has betrayed Quebec.

"REACH FOR THE TOP" CHAMPIONS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, once again Cape Bretoners have proven that they can compete with the best and come out on top.

Last weekend, the Reach for the Top team from Memorial High School in Sydney Mines captured the North American championship in Houston, Texas. They defeated American champions from Richmond, Virginia and captured this tremendous honour.

Team members Jay Boutlier, Patrick Sutton, Anthony Serroul, Jennifer Morawiecki, Robert MacDonald and Karl White demonstrated outstanding mental agility under tremendous pressure. I know I join with all Canadians, including members of this House, in congratulating them on their victory.

To this group of young scholars and their coaches, bravo for a job well done, and a very best wish for an enjoyable and rejuvenating summer holiday.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, if this environment committee report about the hazards of CFCs and halons accomplishes nothing more than to communicate a public call to action as contained in its text, then it will have served a very important purpose.

I am convinced that neither the average citizen nor the average legislator truly appreciates the very significant hazards which atmospheric pollution poses for our world.

Certainly in my own case, until I became involved in hearing the expert advice and opinions made available to our committee, the serious prospects of ozone depletion or global warming seemed very far off in dreamland. I was largely unaware of the problems or the causes. To quote from the CFC report:

> The members of our committee reached one overpowering conclusion, not just a consensus but a unanimous opinion, that ozone depletion is a threat for the continuation of life on earth.
> Literally we must declare war on all those elements which cause that risk.

This CFC report is well worth reading.

BILL C-21

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, countless Tories have risen in their place to decry the delay to Bill C-21.

As recently as yesterday they rose to a member to defeat a motion that variable entrance requirements be implemented. They try to divert our attention by staging a mock battle with the Senate. In the meantime it is Canadians who are being wounded and it will be our highly effective unemployment insurance system that is the casualty.

In British Columbia, New Brunswick, and Alberta the section 26 training option has been suspended, with Ontario and other provinces soon to follow. The Tory back-bench continues to applaud the commitment of the employment minister to job training while she steadfastly refuses to release additional funds for this valuable option.

New Democrats have consistently asked the Government to bring in the variable entrance requirement so workers in economically depressed areas or in seasonal jobs can more readily qualify for benefits. This plea has been ignored.

Again, New Democrats demand the government withdraw Bill C-21, bring in the variable entrance requirement and grant the much-needed additional funds for the Section 26 training options.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister's latest attempt to break the Meech Lake impasse in Manitoba has clearly failed. In fact it is clear that the envoy sent to Manitoba did not understand the significance of the statements made by the Manitoba chiefs.

I ask the Prime Minister, given the extraordinary nature of the problem which he must take responsibility for creating, will he undertake to meet personally with the aboriginal leaders in Manitoba in an effort to come to grips with the fundamental issues which are at the heart of this very serious crisis in Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on June 9, in the final communique of the Meech Lake discussions the undertaking was as follows:

> The Premiers of New Brunswick, Manitoba and Newfoundland undertake to submit the Constitution Amendment, 1987 for appropriate legislative or public consideration and to use every possible effort to achieve decision prior to June 23, 1990.

That was 10 days ago, 10 days ago, and the premier of Manitoba had agreed to use every possible effort to achieve a decision prior to June 23.

Inasmuch as the premier has, and all people acknowledge it, a unique minority situation, the comments of the leaders of the opposition that same day were also important. I think my hon. friend would agree.

Mrs. Carstairs, the leader of the Liberal Party, said that day: "We are prepared to meet all days and all nights, long into the nights, early into the mornings, if need be weekends, in order to make it happen and we think it will happen.

Mr. Doer, the Leader of the NDP, said:

> We felt it was the best we could do under the circumstances and that we should move on in our constitutional process and get onto the real issues that are facing Manitobans and Canadians and take this proposal to the legislature—

The obligation clearly rests upon the signatories of the agreement to deploy their best efforts to get this passed by the twenty-third because the unity of Canada very much depends on their seeking to honour that undertaking.

With regard to the chiefs, I think it is generally acknowledged that Senator Murray led a very significant delegation to Winnipeg.

We put forward what is described in the press today as a most generous and attractive package in favour of the aboriginal peoples by the Government of Canada. Phil Fontaine, leader of the Assembly of Chiefs, said that the aboriginal people were not swayed from their strategy, and I am quoting him, "—to do everything we can to kill the accord and its companion resolution." I am saying to the premier of Manitoba, to the leaders of those two parties, to Phil Fontaine and all the chiefs with whom we want to work: do infinitely more on behalf of aboriginal justice in Canada; do not take the position that it is time to kill the Meech Lake Accord; work to get the Meech Lake Accord passed because it is the instrument whereby aboriginal justice can come to the peoples of Canada.

• (1420)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, nevertheless the fact is the envoys of the Prime Minister did not address the cry of heart that came from the aboriginal leaders.

It was told to the Prime Minister during the meetings in Ottawa by the premier of Manitoba that there was not sufficient time to allow the democratic process to be heard, and the Prime Minister decided to roll the dice. Will the Prime Minister now undertake his solemn responsibility, as the First Minister of this nation, to meet directly with the aboriginal chiefs of Manitoba and come up with concrete proposals, not promises, but proposals that would meet their concerns?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I bring to my friend's attention something that he may have missed. In a statement on June 18, the Manitoba Métis Federation representing, I believe, 80,000 people, said it wants the debate on the Meech Lake Accord, and the companion resolution, to be allowed to proceed in the Manitoba Legislature.

Yvon Dumont, president of the federation today called on MLA Elijah Harper to end his procedural blockage of the resolution. Here is a very distinguished aboriginal leader who is saying: "Let the people decide. Let the people who are elected get to the legislature and let them take cognizance of the package that has been put forward".

Mr. Simmons: Answer the question.

An hon. member: You are shifting the blame.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the Liberals say I am shifting the blame. I am quoting a very distinguished aboriginal leader, and I am not shifting the blame to anyone.

I took the liberty of calling Phil Fontaine directly. I called Mr. Fontaine, notwithstanding the fact that the statement he made on Saturday was negative. The statement was: "We want to kill Meech Lake. No matter what you say or what you do, we want to kill Meech Lake". I called him and asked him, given the great importance of the Meech Lake Accord to Canada and the fact that the Meech Lake Accord is an instrument that is so vital to unblock further instruments that will provide justice for the aboriginal peoples, if he would undertake to meet a delegation from Ottawa led by Senator Murray. Senator Murray went out there and put forward a package pursuant to my conversation with Chief Fontaine which this morning, for example, in The Montreal Gazette is described as follows:

> Even in their own terms, the leaders of Canada's native leaders have probably made a serious mistake in not accepting the large olive branch that Prime Minister Mulroney held out to them in exchange for passage of the Meech Lake Accord.

It goes on:

> That offers the native people as much as Meech offered Quebec. And just as Meech is the best offer Quebec is likely to put to the rest of Canada for many years, so the native people may find that having spurned this chance, they may not get another, in such a favourable climate, for a long time.

We want and we stand for justice for the aboriginal peoples. That is what I conveyed to Chief Fontaine. That is what I convey to him today on the floor of the House of Commons.

I know that my hon. friend wants that justice for aboriginal peoples. It can only be secured in these circumstances by passage of Meech Lake. I ask my hon. friend from Winnipeg: call your friends in Manitoba. Ask them to ensure the passage of Meech Lake so that the aboriginal peoples of Canada can finally get justice.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I say very simply: I do not understand why the Prime Minister is evading his own responsibility in this case. It does not matter how many editorials he reads, how many other people he quotes, the situation is of his making and, therefore, he must take responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Why will he not simply meet face to face with the aboriginal chiefs, put concrete proposals to meet their concerns and break the impasse. The power is in your hands, Prime Minister, why won't you do it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know whether this line of questioning is going to continue, but I want to advise both sides of the House that I am not going to let liberties be taken on this issue.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is asking me about why I won't, I suppose, go out and see the chiefs myself. I asked Senator Murray to head a delegation composed of Paul Tellier, the secretary of the cabinet and Clerk of the Privy Council, Norman Spector, the secretary to the cabinet for federal–provincial relations and Stanley Hartt, my chief of staff. All of this, by the way, was approved by Chief Fontaine and by his lawyer in Winnipeg.

They went out and put forward the proposal that has been described in today's media as probably the most generous ever put forward by a Government of Canada. Inasmuch as my hon. friend is asking me to do more, before he says that, perhaps he should understand what has already been rejected.

What was put forward was that my government is ready to act expeditiously in relation to and provide financial resources for each of the following, as soon as the Meech Lake Accord is ratified:

1. a Federal–Aboriginal process to set the agenda for the First Ministers' Conference on Aboriginal matters; and the acceleration of holding the first Conference;

2. a commitment by the Government of Canada to full constitutional recognition of the aboriginal peoples as a fundamental characteristic of Canada;

3. a participation of representatives of the aboriginal peoples of Canada at any future First Ministers' Conference held to discuss the "recognitions clause";

4. an invitation to participate in all First Ministers' Conferences where matters being discussed directly affect the aboriginal peoples;

5. the joint definition of treaty rights, something that the aboriginal peoples have been seeking for a long time, and;

6. the establishment of an historic royal commission on native affairs of the dimensions and the power of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism that could bring about historic and sweeping changes that would benefit the aboriginal peoples well into the next century.

That is the offer that is on the table. Having seen the offer, Phil Fontaine, the leader of the aboriginal people, says: "We want to do everything that we can to kill the accord and the companion resolution." By taking that attitude, Chief Fontaine is killing off a tremendous opportunity for the aboriginal peoples to move very swiftly and effectively along the road to justice for the aboriginal peoples, which is what this government and all members of the House want.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

A number of observers on the constitutional scene think it will be extremely difficult to find a way to resolve the constitutional deadlock by June 23.

What alternatives, what options is the government considering at this point?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a formal document was signed by the Premier of Manitoba and the other Premiers, and by virtue of this document, the Premier of Manitoba, seconded by the two opposition leaders, is committed to making—and I will quote the English text—; —to use every possible effort to achieve decision prior to June 23, 1990.

Ten days later, because of dilatory action by one MPP, they have not even had a chance to hear witnesses, let alone discuss it and vote on it!

When people say they are going to make their best effort, this implies leadership. It implies acting responsibly and exercising leadership. My friend from Winnipeg, who knows what the situation is, should be interested in this statement by the Manitoba Métis Federation, where we find the following:

• (1430)

[English]

"Any action in the name of aboriginal people affects the Métis equally", said Mr. Dumont. "We have considered the latest undertaking by the Prime Minister and believe that it is now in our interests, more than at any other time in the past, that we take advantage of the provisions now before us and which are possible following the approval of the accord."

My message to the premier, to Mrs. Carstairs, and Mr. Doer is: "Follow the wishes of the Métis people in Manitoba, pass Meech Lake, and move on to justice for the aboriginal people".

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Notwithstanding what the Prime Minister has already said, I do not think it takes a rocket scientist to figure out that the Manitoba legislature cannot deal with the Meech Lake Accord before the Saturday deadline. There are legislative procedures to be followed, and some 3,000 Manitobans have indicated they want to speak at pubic hearings.

What does the Prime Minister do now? After all, it is his responsibility and he got us into this mess in the first place. He said he rolled the dice and he even bragged about it, and now we see the result: a complete mess. What is the Prime Minister going to do now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will read for my friend from Winnipeg the formal undertaking that says:

> The Premiers of New Brunswick, Manitoba and Newfoundland undertake to submit the Constitution Amendment, 1987 for appropriate legislative or public consideration and to use every possible effort to achieve decision prior to June 23, 1990.

That was 10 days ago, and notwithstanding that formal undertaking on a matter of the greatest concern to Canada that deals with our unity and the ongoing well-being of this nation, the Government of Manitoba and the Legislature of Manitoba has not even yet taken formal cognizance of the matter so that members can rise and speak and vote yea or nay on it.

I say that the question of leadership is important in the province of Manitoba. The Liberal member there is asking me where I stand. My stand on the Meech Lake Accord is very well known. I have been standing in the same place on it for three years, which is more than some people who aspire to lead political parties can say.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

As he has indicated in his remarks, the document signed on June 9, 1990 committed the Governments of Newfoundland, Manitoba and New Brunswick to "use every possible effort to achieve decision prior to June 23, 1990". Despite this, the government has indicated its intention to exert further efforts on these provinces by a motion in this House.

Does the Prime Minister not trust the commitment of those first ministers from those provinces? What is he trying to accomplish by this? It is the Prime Minister himself who chose the unrealistic deadline despite the warnings about that deadline. What is the Prime Minister's purpose in trying to bring forth further pressure on the people of Manitoba and Newfoundland?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in causing the government to introduce this resolution is to invite the House to do that which it was called upon to do in previous circumstances.

Ms. McLaughlin: This House?

Mr. Mulroney: Before the hon. member arrived in this House there was a motion in regard to Manitoba. It was supported and seconded in a very eloquent speech by the member from Fort Garry when there was a problem in Manitoba. It called upon people to stand up and be counted and to make sure that documents once signed are honoured, and that is what we want.

It was asked for in the past in regard to serious questions in Manitoba. We have a serious question now. All the Canadian people want is for parliamentarians to stand up and be counted and to make sure that this passes in Manitoba and that Canada can go on to the great work that awaits us all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Prime Minister.

Is the Prime Minister saying that he wants this House to do something which he was evidently not able to do in his own negotiations? He rolled the dice, as he said, and set a deadline that could not be met. He is now trying to have this House pass another motion four days before the June 23 deadline.

I have asked repeatedly in the House of his government what the Prime Minister's plan is to deal with ongoing constitutional talks, and I ask the Prime Minister again today. We know what the Prime Minister's plans were in the past and they failed. What is the plan today? You owe it to the people of Canada to tell them.

Mr. Speaker: I indicated that I was going to be very careful about allowing any liberties in this exchange. I would ask the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party to co-operate with the Chair.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out to my hon. friend that on two occasions, some 48 hours after I first entered the House in 1983, Prime Minister Trudeau, supported by his Liberal colleagues, quite properly introduced a resolution that the House support the Government of Manitoba to cause to give effect to an undertaking that had been reached. The House spoke on this, I believe almost unanimously. I would have to go back and check the record.

Sometime thereafter, in February 1984, Prime Minister Trudeau communicated with me again, and he communicated with Mr. Broadbent, and called upon the House to debate again a resolution that would call upon the Government and the Legislature of Manitoba to honour its commitments given to the French speaking minority in the province of Manitoba.

On both of those occasions I rose and stood in my place, notwithstanding some difficulties, and I was counted. As I said to my hon. friend, it is important that all Canadians know where all those who seek to be leaders and who are leaders stand on these great national issues. That is all that we seek to do by this resolution.

On June 1 the leader of the NDP was asked: "Did the Prime Minister show you any polls or anything like that kind of information that would obviously jolt the two of you into coming out with this sort of unity-country scare scenario here?"

The leader of the NDP said: "I don't think we are coming up with a scare scenario. No, the Prime Minister didn't show us any polls. All of us read the papers. All of us have contacts in every province and territory in this country. I think we are all very well informed about the feelings in this country, the kinds of objectives in every part of the country. It wasn't necessary for the Prime Minister to create a crisis scenario—I know there is a crisis in the country."

That is what the leader of the NDP was saying three weeks ago. We are trying to deal with that crisis, and I ask her to stand and support us in that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, neither the New Democratic Party nor anyone in this caucus needs to enter into a debate about the importance of the unity of this country. The bottom line for the New Democratic Party is the unity of this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that I ask the Prime Minister this question. He told this country publicly last week, after the First Ministers' Conference, that he had a plan. We know now that plan did not work. We cannot have any more secret plans.

Will the Prime Minister tell the people of Canada, in this House today, what his plan is? Not the history of other debates, not what happened in 1984, but what is going to happen in 1990 about the unity of the country? What is he going to do? What plan is he presenting to the people of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, three years ago, in June 1987, we managed to secure a unanimous agreement, signed by 10 premiers and the federal government, which was then passed twice in the House of Commons. It was a process welcoming Quebec back into Confederation.

In the intervening three years, the time frame provided by section 39(2) of the 1982 Constitution, three governments changed. Two of them did not follow through; one revoked the consent given. I then had to work with my colleagues and with many of you to bring them together again, as we did last week. Again we achieved what appeared to be the consent, if not the binding obligation of 10 out of the 10, plus the Government of Canada.

At this moment, as we speak, eight legislatures representing 94 per cent of the population of Canada have already ratified the Meech Lake Accord. Newfoundland is going to vote on it, and Manitoba has yet to even take cognizance of it, irrespective of and notwithstanding the undertaking signed by the premier of Manitoba and the other premiers.

This is the history. I do not know why my hon. friend—

Some hon. members: What's the plan?

Mr. Mulroney: The NDP is yelling: "What's the plan?" The leader of the NDP said that the bottom line—and I do not quarrel with her statement—for the NDP is the unity of Canada. If that is the case, perhaps she could talk to the NDP member in Manitoba and ask him to pass the Meech Lake Accord.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post.

It concerns the tabling of Canada Post's annual report yesterday through which Canadians discovered that this government has sold off $118 million worth of assets of Canada Post in order to achieve the sought after phoney profit this government is looking for.

Will the minister announce immediately that he will stop the closure of rural post offices in Canada, stop the selling of the furniture of Canada Post, and cancel the next stamp increase?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad the hon. member cannot join the rest of Canadians in applauding Canada Post management for its spectacular success. It would seem the hon. member was happier with Canada Post when it had a $500 million subsidy from the taxpayers.

The profits from postal operations were up $107 million last year. They were higher than the previous year, a spectacular performance. The hon. member talks about recoveries from the sale of some assets. He forgets to mention that Canada Post self-funded a $470 million investment program in fixed assets and other management systems and product development.

If he is going to talk about proceeds on sales, in that context he should also recognize the capital expenditures and most of all he should recognize the spectacular performance of Canada Post.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing spectacular about shutting down post offices that are serving ordinary Canadians.

[Translation]

In its last Budget, the Tory government abolished the Postal Services Review Board, the so-called watchdog for Canadian consumers. Is the Minister now prepared to at least reinstate the Board to protect consumers from the catastrophic policies of this government?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member forgot to mention that Canada Post has also forgone a planned increase of 1 cent.

He forgets to acknowledge that stamp price increases since 1984 have been less than inflation, therefore down. He forgets to acknowledge that the number of postal outlets have increased from 12,000 to 18,000. He forgets to acknowledge that everywhere, including in rural Canada, people by way of opinion surveys are saying that service has improved. He forgets to acknowledge that on all counts things have got better. I guess that is tough for a Liberal to bear.

JUSTICE

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. The Parliament of Canada Act prohibits senators from doing business with the federal government. In light of the police affidavits alleging civil and criminal offences against Senator Cogger, will the minister tell us what measures she plans to introduce to prevent even the appearance of such activities in the future?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am just a little confused by the member's question which appears to relate to something that is under police investigation. I do not quite understand her question. Perhaps she would be prepared to restate it.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to repeat the question. I will repeat it in French or in English.

[Translation]

I repeat, this abuse of confidence is intolerable. Mr. Speaker, I will repeat my question to the Minister: What measures will she take to prevent similar scandals from occurring?

[English]

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in either of our official languages I do not believe there has been any determination of this process. I think the hon. member's question is totally inappropriate and presumptuous.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board in his responsibilities for the environment. Yesterday the minister tabled Bill C-78 to establish the federal environmental assessment process. As the minister knows, it regrettably does not provide for an adequate review of government policy and it deliberately excluded reference to existing environmental legislation such as the Fisheries Act.

Could the minister explain to Canadians why, after two years of drafting and a year of public consultation prior to that, cabinet chose not to include in the regulation section those trigger mechanisms, those pieces of environmental legislation such as the Fisheries Act that are necessary for the legislation to work?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague has raised two questions, the question of policy and the question of the Fisheries Act. In terms of the question of policy I also tabled yesterday a fairly detailed statement of how government policy would be assessed from an environmental point of view. Those assessments will form the basis for a statement when government policy is announced. They will be referred to the Standing Committee on the Environment for full public airing should the committee decide to do so. I believe that is a very open process, a very fair process, and a process that provides the necessary forum for any concerned Canadian to make his views known.

In terms of the Fisheries Act, as in any other act, it is very clearly stated in the legislation that those will be determined by regulations. My hon. colleague is asking why. It is for a very good reason. This is a dynamic act. It will change over time and we want to have the possibility of including more and not less. If we cast it in stone at the beginning it will be a restrictive act and we believe very strongly that the environment is too important to be subject to an act that is restrictive. We want it much broader.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The act is so dynamic that it is like a car with no gas in it. I think someone in this House had experience with that kind of a situation.

Everyone, from environmentalists to industrialists, was hoping that some kind of certainty would come from the legislation and it has not. The minister does have the chance here in the House today, though, to give assurance that the 1984 cabinet guidelines order upon which the Rafferty–Alameda decision was made by the Federal Court and the Oldman decision was made unanimously by the Federal Court of Appeal will stay in place and will not be tampered with by his office or by cabinet between now and the passage of Bill C–78.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think the government's commitment is very clear. If my hon. colleague opposite would take the time to read the legislation, he will see that Bill C–78 goes well beyond what we have in terms of environmental protection today.

All major projects will undergo mandatory assessment. Mandatory assessments are to include cumulative effects for the first time. Public registries will be maintained for all assessed projects. I could go on and on.

• (1450)

When we compare Bill C–78 to existing legislation in other countries which are advanced, as we are in this area, which we have done on 12 of the major elements of the legislation, we see that Canada ranks number one in the world.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs stated that the wage settlement arrived at for Air Canada employees which included protection against goods and services tax inflation up to 2.5 per cent was nothing new. Also yesterday the Minister of Finance stated that rising wages, especially for women, nurses, teachers and social workers, were among the leading causes of increased inflation.

In the wake of huge increases and bonuses paid to the Governor of the Bank of Canada, heads of corporations and senior officials, does the Minister of Finance really believe that Canadian workers, especially women, are going to sit back and not protect their families against the goods and services tax that is coming into effect next year?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I challenge the hon. member to show where I said that which he attributed to me as a quote. He will have to show me precisely where I said that because that was not said by me at all.

I did say that at the provincial government level there have been settlements which have been leading the private sector and also have been higher than the rate of inflation. It is precisely that which is causing pressures on other parts of the economy, to which my hon. friend has referred on other occasions in this House, in the resource sector and the manufacturing sector.

If these pressures from the provincial sector put the competitive position of the resource and the manufacturing sector under pressure and cause us to lose jobs, we all suffer from that.

That is the precise point that I am making. That is the precise point that I think Canadians should take into account when they go into wage negotiations or when they are making pricing decisions, because we must get our costs under control in our economy if we are going to maintain a healthy future.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I certainly will undertake to get that information to the minister. It is taken from newspaper reports of his speech yesterday in St. Andrews.

Mr. McDermid: Read the speech. You might learn something.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for privatization learned something yesterday in his answer.

I want to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. The Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance, David Dodge, has publicly criticized the Conservative government's legislation, specifically the pension reform bill, Bill C–52. He has said that that legislation was very unfortunate.

Is it the intention of the Minister of Finance to retain the services of David Dodge in order that he can second guess the minister's judgment as well as the government's legislation?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am still looking for the quote that the hon. member has said that I made. I know what I said yesterday and I know that I absolutely did not make the statement that he is attributing to me now.

The key point here is that we have a slower economy. We have some pressures in the economy today but the point that all Canadians have to take into account in coming to decisions is that if we try as a country to take more out of the economy than it is capable of giving, we will all suffer. We will suffer through higher interest rates and through lost jobs.

It is for these reasons that I say to Canadians that we should use some good common sense in approaching these decisions so that we do not undermine the competitive strength of the economy.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Bankruptcy proceedings reveal that Route Canada owed the federal government $1.7 million in taxes and employee deductions. That amount has mysteriously become a mere $500,000, a reduction of $1.2 million. The minister assured us last week that a majority of the funds owing to the Government of Canada had been recovered.

Will the minister please explain to the House and to the former employees of Route Canada why the debt was reduced by $1.2 million? Where is the cash?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as I told the hon. member's colleague on the Liberal benches last week, if they do their homework—and this is all public knowledge—they would find out that the federal government debt from Route Canada in fact was eliminated. Most of it has been collected. The remaining approximately $200,000 is guaranteed, held in trust by the agent for the Royal Bank.

As well, I am happy to repeat to my hon. friend that all back wages of employees have been paid in consultation with the agent. Having studied this case very carefully from day one, I can assure him that Revenue Canada made every effort to support the benefits, wages and wishes of the employees of Route Canada, all of which have been satisfied.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, we know from the bankruptcy proceedings that the government filed a document which reduced the amount from $1.7 million to $500,000. This would only benefit the directors of the company, Ruhland and the Fingold's, and other secured creditors like the Royal Bank will save, in effect, $1.2 million, with the only losers being the Canadian taxpayers and the workers.

Why would the government give a gift to its friends and sacrifice the workers?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how I can make myself any clearer than to say that all of the elements of the pensions and all of the back-wages of the employees have been satisfied. There were no gifts by this government, by Revenue Canada or any other department, to the principals of Route Canada.

In fact, as the hon. member knows, the situation is that some of the $200,000 is still outstanding. It is guaranteed by the agent. At the end of the day we could and would assess the directors under the directors' liability provisions, should those provisions be required. At this point in time we do not expect that to be the case.

INDUSTRY, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. As he knows, NRC has announced some considerable restructuring today with the creation of five new research institutes.

Gerhard Herzberg, the NRC's only Nobel laureate, says he does not know what it all means. We know what it means. It means that cutbacks have occasioned the need to function within restricted resources, as they keep telling us.

How many sections and projects such as medical engineering are to be lost? How many more scientists are to be laid off, and how many important, significant researchers of Canada are going to flee the country because they have lost their jobs because this government has cut back at NRC?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I will indeed not be as pessimistic as my friend is, but that is something that we are used to seeing on the other side.

Those institutes which will be created at the NRC today are for micro-structural sciences, national measurement standards, environmental chemistry, molecular sciences and information technology. All those institutes will reinforce the capacity we have to do research. It is based on the result of an arduous evaluation process involving the staff and experts from industry and the scientific community.

I believe that the NRC decision is a good decision. It will reinforce what my friend reproached the government for many times, a basic research sector. I believe it is good for NRC and it is good for Canada.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, that is all very nice. There may be some merit in these changes, but my question to the minister was how many scientists are going to lose their jobs, how many scientists are going to leave the country.

There has been in process the development of a five-year plan at NRC. When will that plan be available? Will the minister allow the House Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology to have some input into evaluating that five-year plan before government chops it up and fires some more scientists?

• (1500)

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, first of all, in reply to the question about employment or staff cuts further to the restructuring announced by the National Research Council: they are completely out of the question. No staff cuts are involved.

Secondly, as for the NRC's five-year plan, I think it will be tabled when the science minister sees fit to do so. The minister will carry out the required consultations to the extent that he thinks advisable, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. One of the Canadian negotiators of the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement, Michael Hart, recently predicted that Canada would eventually conclude a trilateral free trade agreement with the United States and Mexico. Moreover, he came out with a positive report on it yesterday. He also maintains that without a trilateral agreement, the benefits that Canada derives from its free trade agreement with the United States will disappear as the Americans look south.

Can the minister assure this House and Canadian industrialists that Canada will participate in these negotiations so that it can adjust to any new competition that might arise?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has not yet decided whether or not we wish to participate in any discussions or negotiations that occur between the United States and Mexico on a possible free trade arrangement.

As I explained to the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs yesterday, we intend to consult the provinces, the business sector, the labour movement, and members of this House before we make a decision on that. Of course we do not know whether or not there will be a free trade agreement between the United States and Mexico. There will be no decision made as to whether negotiations will be entered into likely until December. We certainly have, I would suggest, until the end of September to make up our own minds as to whether we wish to be involved or not.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It concerns the vacancy in the riding of York North, created by the decision of the Supreme Court of Ontario on May 28, 1990.

The Prime Minister has already called two by-elections, one in Oshawa and one in Laurier—Sainte-Marie in Montreal, for August 13, 1990. I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell the House today if the people of York North will have a chance to vote early on a representative in the House of Commons. Will he call the election on August 13 for York North? He has until June 25 to call the election. Will he do it before that?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for the comment but I have not had a chance to give it the thought it deserves. I will and get back to him. If I thought that the soon-to-be leader of the Liberal Party were interested, I would like to see him in the House as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: A point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

REQUEST TO REVERT TO ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on two points of order. Earlier in the day, the government whip sought unanimous consent to revert to Routine Proceedings for some government business. Consent was naturally given. Because of the proceedings this morning, we missed the presentation of petitions. I wonder if I could seek unanimous consent to revert to petitions to allow members to present their petitions before we get on to other business of the day.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has asked the House for unanimous consent to revert to petitions. Is there agreement? The hon. member for Calgary West on the same point.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, as the whip of the government party, I asked for unanimous consent this morning to table a committee report. I am not quite clear on the request. Is this a request to put a single petition on the table or are we looking at a whole lot of petitions that might eat up an hour or two? What is the nature of the request?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have not done a count but I assume there might be half a dozen members presenting petitions and since we missed it earlier, we may want to conduct the business in the usual way if there is unanimous consent to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present some 12,500 signatures from across British Columbia on petitions certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 36, co-ordinated by Greenpeace and the Alliance Against Low Level Flights.

These petitioners join with organizations representing hundreds of thousands of British Columbians, First Nations, labour, churches, peace groups, environment groups, and disarmament groups, in calling upon the government of Canada to cancel all low-level military flights in B.C. Such flights escalate the global arms race and cause pollution, noise and accidents that are harmful to people, wildlife, and the environment.

In light of this significant public concern in B.C. about flight route I.R. 910, the Minister of National Defence must refer the matter to a full environmental assessment and review. The minister has never given proper written reasons for refusing to refer I.R. 910 to an EARP and surely the Federal Court rulings on Rafferty–Alameda and the Oldman dams, combined with the significant public concern in B.C., determine that this matter deserves such assessment and review process.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member was getting into debate and not just presenting petitions.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have a series of petitions from Coquitlam, British Columbia; Port Coquitlam and Port Moody, British Columbia, and other places in the lower mainland of British Columbia.

The petitioners say that cable companies made an average 32 per cent profit on fixed assets in 1988, more than twice the level of the telephone companies. The reason is that the telephone companies are regulated and cable companies are not.

The petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to adopt Bill C–284 which I have presented, and which applies a rate of return regulation to the cable industry. In other words, regulate the rate of return to the cable industry, which will reduce the costs people pay for their cable television.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, the fight goes on against the goods and services tax from coast to coast to coast. People in Canada do not want this particular tax and they have requested a number of us to continue to present petitions asking that this government come to its senses and stop the tax and bring in a tax that is fair to all Canadians.

SCALLOP FISHERY

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition under Standing Order 36, certified correct as to form and content by the clerk. The petitioners state that the offshore scallop fishery in Nova Scotia, initiated some 30 years ago, has been continuously the most economically viable fishery on the east coast.

They are urging that there not be changes made. If it ain't broke why fix it. They are urging that there not be an increase in the 12–day trip limit, that there not be a licence for factory–freezer processing vessels, and that we do not allow the banks to be decimated as were done in Norway by freezer trawlers.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions I would like to present today. First of all, I have many hundreds of petitions from residents of the national capital region, calling upon the government to withdraw the proposed goods and services tax. People continue to be very concerned about this.

VIA RAIL

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, another 350 petitioners are calling upon the government to restore passenger rail service in Canada through VIA Rail.

CLEAN–UP OF RIDEAU RIVER

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I have a very important petition from this region calling upon the federal government to enter into an equal partnership with provincial and municipal governments to implement a plan of action for the clean–up and maintenance of the Rideau River, one of Canada's most important historic waterways.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, finally I have approximately 6,000 petitions from people all over Canada objecting once again to the proposed clawback of Old Age Security and family allowance benefits, a matter which is still before this House.

• (1510)

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Madam Speaker, I would like to present three petitions under Standing Order 36 in which the petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the report of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas.

The petitioners are residents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior, and are from the towns of Nakina, Geraldton, Terrace Bay and Manitouwadge.

On behalf of the 303 petitioners who rely on this isolation tax benefit, I must reiterate the importance of this tax deduction to northern communities. On the average, food and gasoline prices are 25 per cent higher than in any heavily populated area of Canada.

This tax benefit is the only compensation these people have. It should not be taken away. The government is presently studying the report. It is imperative that it rejects the recommendation presented in that report.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present two petitions today signed by residents of the province of Newfoundland.

The first petition concerns the cuts that the government has proposed to the unemployment insurance scheme in Canada. It recites the promises made during the last election campaign in which the government promised that it would not change Canada's social programs, particularly the unemployment insurance program.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject changes in the program and to propose more meaningful reforms to concentrate on labour force development strategy, a full employment strategy and a regional development policy, all of which have been abandoned by this government through its proposals in Bill C-21. The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject these proposals.

I am sure that had the people had a petition updated, they would have asked us to pass Bill S-17 yesterday instead of having it defeated by this cold-hearted government.

Point of Order

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the second petition deals with the goods and services tax.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax, which is the thirty-second unfair tax imposed by this government since it took office in 1984. It represents an absolute grab of money from Canadian taxpayers' pockets.

These taxpayers have had enough of these Tory taxes and call upon Parliament to reject this bill.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I have several petitions to present here today pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition is signed by hundreds of Haligonians who asked that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, the other petition on which I have in excess of 4,000 names is from women across the country who are asking that unnecessary legal restrictions which abrogate the reproductive rights of women and encourage disrespect for the law be removed.

ACCEPTABILITY OF MOTION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask for a ruling on the acceptability of the motion on today's Notice Paper under the name of the Minister of Justice.

Specifically, I ask you to consider, Mr. Speaker, whether the motion which urges other legislative bodies to follow a certain course of action is properly in order, in light of the parliamentary convention restricting debate on matters before the other House.

Our House operates on a tradition, a philosophy which was developed over centuries in the British Parliament. From them we have inherited a wisdom of self-restraint in matters which should not properly be discussed in this House. For example, we restrain ourselves from rehashing questions that are already decided, from making personal charges against one another, from casting reflection upon the conduct of judges and from referring to debates in the other place.

There are good reasons for this last category of discretion. We do not discuss Senate debates because we understand the importance of the two parliamentary Chambers not interfering with one another's decisions.

As Erskine May points out in the twenty–first edition at page 375:

> Members are restrained by the Speaker from commenting upon the proceedings of the House of Lords.
> The rule that references to debates of the current session in the other House are out of order prevents fruitless arguments between Members of two distinct bodies who are unable to reply to each other, and guards against recrimination and offensive language in the absence of the other party.

This important guide is adopted in Beauchesne's fifth edition in citation 314:

> The rule that allusions to debates in the other House of the current session are out of order, prevents fruitless arguments between members of two distinct bodies who are unable to reply to each other, and guards against recrimination and offensive language in the absence of the party assailed;

We inherit this rule from a country with only two parliamentary chambers. Britain, not being a federal state, does not have independent legislatures with their own distinct areas of responsibility as we do here in Canada. This means that in applying this parliamentary tradition, it is important to not only apply the letter of the convention but also to apply the logic. How does this logic apply in a country with 14 legislative bodies? If we want, as Erskine May cautions, to prevent fruitless arguments between members of two distinct bodies which are unable to reply to each other and to "guard against recrimination and offensive language in the absence of the other party", does it not then make sense to apply the restraint on debate exercise with respect to the Senate to the debates of other independent legislative bodies?

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider how inappropriate it is for this House to pronounce itself on something which is outside the administrative competence of the government or the legislative authority of this House. If this motion is in order, and the House is permitted to debate the independent decision–making of the legislatures of the provinces of Newfoundland and Manitoba, we will have destroyed this useful and important parliamentary convention. We will go beyond our legislative authority and we will infringe upon the rights of members of provincial legislatures. In essence, this House will be guilty of legislative battery, of assault by motion, and I ask you to safeguard the integrity of the relations among Canada's legislative bodies.

I think it is important that we recognize the comments of the premier of Manitoba, who last evening indicated clearly that he thought it was appropriate for the Parliament of Canada to be telling his government, his legislature and Manitobans what they should do on this very critical matter. I suspect that if others get in this debate, they might refer to the October 1983 decision when this House decided to pass a motion regarding language rights in Manitoba. That I do not think is a reasonable precedent because at that time we introduced and deemed the motion passed based on unanimous consent, which is not the case before us now. We also know that it provoked animosity and resentment in Manitoba regarding the interference in provincial affairs and the provincial legislature by the federal government and the federal House.

Mr. Speaker, I urge you to give this serious consideration and ask you to rule this motion out of order.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am intrigued by the hon. member's assertion in his point of order that the motion that is on the Order Paper would be out of order.

His argument is one that I find very interesting in that he alludes to the fact that it would be out of order for this House to comment on or make decisions on procedures in the other place or in other legislatures. Yet virtually every day in this House the hon. member and other members put questions to the government relating to issues that are before other legislatures that are a matter of debate or concern in the other House of this Parliament. In fact, often we have questions put to us here that deal with matters before the courts. Also, I think that there are ample precedents for this motion. The hon. member refers to one particular one, that is the debate in Manitoba concerning the language laws. He says that somehow, because it was deemed to have been passed unanimously by this House without debate, that therefore makes it an exceptional case.

Mr. Speaker, the absence of debate does not in any way detract from the fact that the House was seized of the motion. The House was given the motion, it was found to be in order and it was agreed to unanimously, even without debate. Nevertheless, the motion was considered to be in order.

There is another case, if my memory serves me right. The hon. member on reflection may want to withdraw his point of order. It seems to me that on another occasion in this House, Parliament made a decision regarding the Moresby Island park in the province of British Columbia. If I recall correctly, not only did the House have such a motion encouraging the legislature of the province of British Columbia to make a decision or to at least be supportive of this issue, I think it too was supported unanimously. Even more important, if my memory serves me correctly, I believe it was seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops who has just brought forward this argument. In fact, if we look at the precedents before this House, including one in which he was an active player—we were all very complimentary of his efforts at that time—his own precedents refute his argument.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kamloops and I should add that the notice as presented not only asks another legislative assembly to ratify an agreement as is but it also suggests holding a second constitutional debate on which this House has not yet taken any position at all. I note, among other things, the following "open the process for Canada's future constitutional development including the important issues of Senate reform, of aboriginal rights and languistic rights". We could talk about the Canada Clause and all these other major amendments to the Meech Lake Accord. So I do not think that we can ask another legislative assembly to take such an approach and basically distort the whole debate that has gone on in eight other legislatures in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I simply want to say in response to my hon. colleague regarding the South Moresby motion in the House that there were actually two differences in that case.

One was that we were calling upon the government for a certain course of action. In other words, it could take that action in any way it wished. We were not calling upon the legislature in the province of British Columbia to act. I think it is quite a different matter to be calling upon a government to take some action or to be virtually committing the legislature to take action.

Second, at that time we were calling for federal-provincial negotiations in order to carry out the establishment of the park.

I want to use this opportunity to say that we remember what happened when the federal House involved itself in the language issue of Manitoba when the premier of that province publicly stated that in no way did he wish the federal government to involve itself in the very sensitive issue at that point. There was animosity and resentment of the infringement upon what they perceived to be their jurisdiction.

I think it is not only dangerous to be horning in on an area where we ought not to tread and where our views are already well known at this point and at the eleventh hour, at a critical point in this very sensitive process, but inappropriate in terms of parliamentary practice.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has raised a matter of interest.

So that all hon. members can fully understand what is placed in front of the Chair, I draw their attention to the Order Paper and Notice Paper wherein the government has indicated by notice of motion placed on the Order Paper that, although it has not been called for debate yet, a resolution relating to the constitutional accord and the results of the discussions of a week or so ago.

I will not read the whole preamble, but I will read the substantive part, which is the basis of the complaint brought to us by the hon. member for Kamloops. It reads:

—the House—

That is, this House of Commons.

> —urges the Manitoba and Newfoundland Legislative Assemblies to exert efforts to bring about full ratification of the Constitution Amendment,

The hon. member has said that this ought to be ruled out of order because, in one way or another, it seems to trespass into the realm, the area, or the jurisdiction of another legislative assembly within the Canadian Confederation, within our federal system.

First of all, he has put forward to the Chair one citation of Erskine May and another, I think, in Beauchesne's fifth edition, if my memory is serving me correct.

I would point out to begin with that if we try to take Erskine May or even Beauchesne's, if it is referring back into British practice, we are dealing there with comments which involve the appropriateness of the British House of Commons debating what is a subject matter of debate in the House of Lords.

What is being asked for here by the government, although as I say the government may not even call it, but that is not for me to say, is that this House urges the Manitoba and Newfoundland legislative assemblies to do something.

The question is whether or not that is an inappropriate trespass into the jurisdiction of another legislature.

It is not the first time this has happened and I draw attention to the motion in 1984 which, if memory serves me correctly, was urged upon the government of the day by members. It related to a matter which was divisive in the nation and in the province of Manitoba. I quote the motion.

It is true, as the hon. member has pointed out, that it was done by unanimous consent. That is of interest but I do not think that it is a matter that takes away from this precedent. I quote: "The House urges the government of Manitoba to persist in its efforts to fulfil the constitutional obligations of the province and protect effectively the rights of its French-speaking minority."

It goes on: "The House urges the legislative assembly of Manitoba to consider such resolution and legislation in an urgent manner so as to ensure they finally pass it."

We are not a unitary state as is the United Kingdom. We are a federal state. Under the British North America Act, which brought in our constitutional position in 1867, property and civil rights and a number of matters were given to the provinces and other matters were retained by the House of Commons and the Parliament of Canada.

So it is absolutely true, as the hon. member points out, that within the provincial legislatures there are a number of matters that are the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures across the country and of course that has to be respected.

The issue here is whether a motion like this is a trespass into the debate of another legislature. The motion relates to something which is absolutely fundamental to the whole nation and is just as important at the provincial level as at the federal level because it concerns the amendment of the Constitution of our country. It is not something that is exclusively related to the jurisdiction of a provincial government.

Even if it was, and I point out that distinction, what is being asked for here is nothing more or less than an expression of this federal House on a matter of great national interest in which it says:

> —the House urges the Manitoba and Newfoundland Legislative Assemblies to exert efforts to bring about full ratification of the Constitution Amendment—

• (1530)

It is not for me to say what reaction there may be in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador and the province of Manitoba if the House decided to do this, but I have to say on a procedural basis that it is very hard to be persuaded that that is some kind of a jurisdictional trespass into the appropriate workings of a provincial legislature.

As I say, this is a national issue. If the House of Commons chooses to express itself on a matter of national import—and it has in the past done so—I would think that it would be inappropriate for me to rule that it cannot do so.

I also want to bring to members' attention the debate of 1987 to which the hon. parliamentary secretary referred, in which there was a motion from the New Democratic Party debated on an opposition allotted day which stated: "That this House calls upon the Government of British Columbia to co-operate in setting aside the South Moresby area of the Queen Charlotte Islands as a National Park Reserve". It goes on.

That particular motion was debated in this House. Some hon. members will remember there was such unanimity within the chamber on it that long before the day that had been allotted for the full debate was over, at the suggestion of the then hon. member for Winnipeg—Bird's Hill and the then Minister of the Environment for the Government of Canada, the motion was put to the House at that point and the motion was passed. Debate then continued, but it was a unique and unusual day; there is no question about that.

I must say that that motion did have an effect outside this Chamber. It had an effect in terms of the province of British Columbia, the province from which I come. Of course there was an effect.

Again, what the House did here was call upon the Government of British Columbia "to co-operate in setting aside". One could say that that did not call upon the legislative assembly. Perhaps not, but it is a very direct plea from this House to a legislative assembly in a province to do something.

I think I have to take the position that it is not an invasion into the jurisdiction of another legislature. There is a difference here which probably distinguishes the case from those set out in Beauchesne's or in Erskine May because this is a federal state, not a unitary state.

Third, it has clearly been done before not just once in a while but quite often. Some members who have been here for some time will remember that it has been customary. It has happened again and again that members have risen in the House and urged the government of the day, whatever government it might have been, to make a public statement on matters of great national importance, and invited the government of the day to put motions to this House in order to make such a statement.

The hon. member for Kamloops raises a point which causes me concern, and that is that this process, if abused, may very well cause some difficulties and some resentment in some places. That is of course a political question, not a procedural one, and it is not for me to rule on that, but I have listened carefully to the point.

I also thank the hon. member for Kamloops for having given some indication to the Chair in advance that this point would be raised. It gave me a few minutes reflection in advance, which is always helpful and helpful to the House itself.

I see the hon. member's point. There may be political considerations that ought to be taken into account. I am always advised not to put my political hat on, so it is not for me to say, but procedurally I find that it is not appropriate to rule it out of order.

[Translation]

We also have an important statement from the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead. He took a position in support of the point raised by the hon. member for Kamloops. I understand the hon. member's position, but I believe there is a difference between the precedents in Beauchesne and Erskine May and the situation before us today. However, I wish to thank the hon. member for his statement, which of course is still helpful to the Chair.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CUSTOMS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-55, an act to amend the Customs Act, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jelinek moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Madam Speaker, I will be very brief in making a few additional comments on Bill C-55, an act to amend the Customs Act, which will benefit many Canadian businesses, particularly the import sector of our economy.

We have a situation where the rate of duty on certain imported goods is reduced retroactively. Consequently it is only fair and equitable that importers of those goods receive a refund from the duties that they overpaid during the period of retroactivity.

Over and above these refunds, importers should be paid interest on these sums since their financial resources have been tied up for a period of time through no fault of their own.

The act also provides for appeal rights where a departmental decision adversely affects an importer.

I believe these same provisions should be applied uniformly in all cases. In order to ensure equity and fairness, the appeal provisions should also apply in these circumstances. In essence this bill gives the Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, the mechanism to grant the full benefits arising from orders made the Governor in Council. Unless this legislation is passed, importers will not receive fair and equitable treatment.

We have had some debate in the House on this matter over the last two or three weeks wherein members of all three parties participated, including some comments by myself. The bill then moved on to the appropriate standing committee where it was dealt with. It is now back in the House for third and final reading.

I hope that it will be passed forthwith since this is not a contentious piece of legislation but one that does indeed benefit a very important segment of our economy.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, several years ago the government introduced the harmonized tariff system in Canada which involved a reclassification of our tariff system along the lines of the harmonized system employed throughout the world.

Some importers or manufacturers that import products suffered an injury simply as a result of the reclassification in the new tariff system which was introduced. Several years ago the current government sought authority from Parliament, from the House of Commons, to compensate importers affected by this change in systems.

The previous legislation gave the government with the authority to provide such compensation for a limited period of time. As I understand it, this bill is to extend to July 1992 the date by which changes can be made to the tariff schedule to assist manufacturers or importers inadvertently injured by this reclassification of tariffs.

When this bill was debated at second reading we indicated that we fully supported the goals of this legislation, that our party was in favour of more liberalized trade internationally, and that this harmonized system of tariffs was indeed designed to ensure more liberalized international trade. Therefore we extend our support for the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MESURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-54, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (joinder of counts), as reported by a legislative committee with amendment.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are three motions set down on the Notice Paper for the Report Stage of Bill C-54, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (joinder of counts), two standing in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway and one in the name of the hon. member for York Centre. All motions are in order. They will each be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-54 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out lines 5 to 8 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"repealed."

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to extend the scope of the proposed Clause 1 effectively to strike out the whole of Section 230 of the Criminal Code.

The reason for this is that four courts of appeal in Canada, the Ontario Court of Appeal, British Columbia, Alberta and Manitoba provincial Courts of Appeal, have all declared subsection 230(a) to be unconstitutional.

In the Vaillancourt decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, subsection 230(d) was struck down by the Supreme Court. It was held to be unconstitutional. However, during the course of that decision the Supreme Court of Canada also criticized the balance of Section 230. They did not strike it down, but certainly they were critical of the other provisions.

Briefly, Section 230 deals with so-called constructive murder. This means that the mere act of killing another person during the commission of the underlying offence, even if death or serious bodily harm are not intended, would subject the killer to a conviction for murder and a mandatory life sentence. This is the so-called felony murder rule.

The Law Reform Commission has criticized this provision very seriously. Indeed, the Law Reform Commission, during their appearance before the legislative committee that studied this bill, recommended the repeal of all of Section 230 of the Criminal Code. That is the effect of the amendment which is now before the House.

I would hope, in view of the fact that this provision and the remaining provisions of Section 230 have been struck down by four courts of appeal in Canada, and have been seriously questioned by the Supreme Court of Canada, that we could show some leadership in these circumstances and repeal the whole of Section 230 and not just Section 230(b) which has already been struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Vaillancourt decision.

This will in no way weaken the criminal law and it will certainly reduce the risk of an injustice occurring.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, the government opposes this motion at this time because it would have the effect of pre-empting the Supreme Court of Canada's consideration of the constitutionality of Section 230(a) in cases now before it.

We would prefer to proceed in this very technical area only after we have the full benefit of the Supreme Court's views in this matter. Should the Supreme Court of Canada rule that either Section 230(a) or Section 230 generally is unconstitutional, the government would move quickly at that time to repeal the subsection.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Robinson) negatived.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will now proceed to Motion No. 2.

Mr. Milliken (for Mr. Kaplan) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-54 be amended in Clause 2 in the French version by striking out lines 13 and 14 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"a) le chef d'accusation visant l'acte criminel autre que le meurtre découle de la même affaire qu'un chef d'accusation de meurtre;".

He said: At the present time, Madam Speaker, under Sections 591 and 589 of the Criminal Code, a person can be tried at a single trial for any number of murders or for any number of non-murder offences, but murders and non-murder offences cannot be tried in the same trial.

As indicated in committee, the principal purpose of this bill, as set out in Clause 2, as expressed in the English version, is to amend Section 589 to provide that where a person is being tried for one or more murders, he may be tried at the same trial for any non-murder offence that arises out of the same transaction as the murders for which he is being tried.

Unfortunately, in our view, the French version of Clause 2, as reported from the committee, fails adequately to convey the full meaning expressed in the English version of this clause. Hence, my colleague, the hon. member for York Centre, has proposed this amendment. Unfortunately, he is unable to be here to move it and I am pleased to be able to move it in his name and to speak briefly to the amendment.

This amendment would have the effect of bringing the French version into conformity with the English version so as to fully express the intent of Parliament in adopting the bill.

The English version states:

> No count that charges an indictable offence other than murder shall be joined in an indictment to a count that charges murder unless
> (a) the count that charges the offence other than murder arises out of the same transaction as a count that charges murder;

The present French translation of that is as follows:

• (1550)

New section 589.

> 589. No count that charges an indictable offence other than murder shall be joined in an indictment to a count that charges murder unless:
> (a) both charges arise out of the same transaction;

The hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) has proposed the following amendment to the French version of paragraph (a) only:

> a) le chef d'accusation visant l'acte criminel autre que le meurtre découle de la même affaire qu'un chef d'accusation de meurtre;

Madam Speaker, the French text now is the same as the English text. That is not the case in the bill presented by the government and I ask the parliamentary secretary to support the motion by the hon. member for York Centre that I have the honour to present to the House this afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I recognize that this is a friendly amendment to do with translation rather than substance and does not propose any change in the substance of the subsection. It seeks to substitute for the present French version of the subsection a word for word translation from the English.

The wording of the present motion has been carefully considered by the legislative drafters. In their view, after considerable reflection, the French wording of the bill as passed in committee is still to be preferred.

I might add that when it comes to translation each version and each element of each version has to be read in its entire context in conformity with the normal rules applicable to each language. The French and the English text must be read vertically, and it is essential that no comparison be made horizontally between an element such as a paragraph, because the logical and grammatical structure might be different from one version to another.

In the present case the word les does not refer to all the counts that might be found in the indictment but to the counts that are specifically mentioned in the opening part of the proposed Section 589. Although taken out of their respective context, paragraph (a) and alinéa a) do not have the same content, their respective meaning comes not from a direct comparison of the two paragraphs, but from a reading of the entire section. Therefore, we feel that the amendment is superfluous.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Kaplan) negatived.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved:

Motion No. 3

> That Bill C-54 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 17 and 18 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:
> "transaction as the count that charges murder, and the additional count is either manslaughter, attempted murder or criminal negligence causing death; or"—

He said: Madam Speaker, this amendment would have the effect of deleting subsection (a) from the provisions of the proposed Section 589. That would mean that effectively the section would read: "No count that charges an indictable offence other than murder shall be joined in an indictment to a count that charges murder unless the accused signifies consent to the joinder of the counts".

The effect of this would be to delete the possibility of substantial prejudice at trial should the government's amendment pass.

I want at this time to pay tribute to the work that was done by the criminal lawyers association and in particular by a very distinguished advocate, John Rosen, on this issue. Mr. Rosen drew to the attention of the legislative committee that studied this bill and to the House some of the very serious implications of passage of the amendment as has been proposed.

It has been suggested that the criminal accused can always apply for severance, but of course the onus in an application for severance in a criminal trial is in fact on the accused. I suggest that this could work serious hardship to the accused.

There are a number of reasons for supporting this amendment which would in effect ensure that when an individual is charged with murder other offences are not being tried at the same time. There are three or four reasons for this.

The first is that there is a real possibility that the jury might be distracted, might lose its focus because of a number of other counts which are included in the indictment and will fail to appreciate the profound importance of what is at stake in the case of a murder charge.

The second is that an accused who faces a multiple count indictment which begins with the offence of murder will be viewed by the jury, even before the evidence is called, as a person of disreputable character with this long string of other possible offences.

As well, the rule concerning admissibility of similar fact evidence could be circumvented by the prosecution. Once again, this could lead to prejudice to the accused.

Finally, the evidence of other related criminal conduct which may be admissible as part of the narrative relating to the homicide will now be used to convict the accused of specific offences rather than permitting the jury to consider the evidence and its weight, if any, only on the issue of liability for murder.

As well, this proposed legislation could have a serious negative impact on police investigation in Canada. In most major police forces in this country there is a homicide squad, or at least a major crime squad, which deals with homicide investigations. Routinely, the police will tell witnesses, people they want to get co-operation from in murder investigations, that that person does not fear any possible prosecution for other offences. That in fact encourages people to come forward to co-operate with the police. This could be jeopardized in fact if this government proposal becomes law.

Some people have argued, including the Law Reform Commission, that we can now allow joinder of counts because we abolished the death penalty and thus it is not as serious. The fact is that murder is singled out in the Criminal Code as a very serious offence indeed. It is the only offence for which there is a life term of imprisonment with a minimum time served before parole of 25 years. The criminal law recognizes that. I believe that criminal procedure should recognize that as well by not allowing a joinder of counts.

The reality is that probably the major objective of this bill is to ensure that a person who is involved or may be involved in an offence leading to a homicide is convicted of some serious offence, particularly in light of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Vaillancourt.

I suggest that we adopt the amendment which I have proposed which would in fact delete the possibility of joinder of counts and that we as a Parliament look at more carefully defining the offence of manslaughter.

Those are my comments with respect to the amendment. I hope that the House will give it favourable consideration.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, if I can put my finely trained legal mind to this, I would point out to the member that any prejudice to the accused can be dealt with by severance of counts by the trial judge. I think he understands that.

This amendment is intended to restrict the number of offences that can be joined to a count of murder.

The Law Reform Commission, as the member has pointed out, initially took the position advanced by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway as recommendation 13 in its Working Paper 55, the charge document. But as it testified before the legislative committee on this bill, it has had occasion to reconsider its position and now favours an expansion of the number of offences that can be joined to a count of murder. It testified at the committee that it has now come to a position similar to the one contained in this bill.

On the basis of consultations held, the government is of the view that the subsection as approved by the committee is in accordance with the overwhelming weight of current views on this issue.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 3 (Mr. Robinson) negatived.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before putting the concurrence motion to the House, it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing—Post-Secondary Education; the hon. member for Burin—St. George's—Fisheries; and the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell—Government Advertising.

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe we are at the concurrence stage. Is there a minister in the House?

Mr. Friesen: The ministers are in a cabinet meeting and one will be in the House shortly.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. Perhaps it might be appropriate to suspend the sitting of the House for five minutes or so if there is unanimous agreement.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Madam Deputy Speaker: The sitting is suspended to the call of the Chair.

At 4.03 p.m., the sitting of the House was suspended.

[English]

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 4.05 p.m.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Dorin: I believe that you would find, Madam Speaker, that there is consent for the House to suspend the sitting until 5 p.m. for Private Members' Business.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to call it five o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gérin: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If there is not unanimous consent to suspend the House until five o'clock, may I call it five o'clock?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead has the floor.

Mr. Gérin: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I was not consulted in any way, although I am here. I left my riding to come to sit in the House of Commons and I see that the government has no bill to present to us. I, who have not been consulted, am being asked to wait around in the corridors, I suppose, until the government—Well, I think I am here to sit. So let the government sit or adjourn until the fall!

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am in the hands of the House. The government can either call whatever other bill there is or the House will adjourn.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, I think there is general agreement that we suspend until five o'clock for Private Members' Business.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I think it was clear from discussions among the three parties in the House—the government party, the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party—that there was an agreement to call it five o'clock. But, under the Standing Orders, should a single member rise and object to that, then we as a House have no choice but to continue our work or to adjourn.

• (1610)

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Madam Speaker, you know and my colleagues know that I am always willing to consider such arrangements.

There are seven independent members in the House of Commons, and several more are expected to join us within the next few days. The government will have to get used to consulting with independent members if it wants unanimous consent.

Unfortunately, I was not consulted, and I am here to do my job. There are motions that could otherwise be tabled, but they should tell me, they should come and discuss and explain what the government's business will be for the next few days, and then I would be able to give my consent. Until that happens, however, I will not give my consent.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, may I ask that the House suspend proceedings for about five minutes and subsequently resume sitting?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Considering what was said by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, there may be unanimous consent for suspending proceedings for a few minutes to let the desired consultations take place, and subsequently, the House could resume sitting.

The Chair is in the hands of the House. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Yes, I think five minutes would be adequate, Madam Speaker. I don't want them to use this as an excuse to do indirectly what I did not want them to do directly.

If we want to have a discussion, perhaps this could be done while you are in the chair, for two or three minutes. If they explain what the future business of the House will be, in two or three minutes we can resume.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I fully agree with the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead. We are in the House today to discuss bills and to engage in debate, and all of a sudden there seems to be a hiatus, apparently due to the absence of members on the government side and also to poor organization or failure to table certain business.

For the past few minutes, we have been wasting our time instead of getting on with the business of Parliament.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member's response to the suggestion that we suspend the sitting of the House for five minutes, one of the difficulties right now is that the House leaders of the three parties are meeting, presumably to deal with the very question as to what the order of business will be for whatever time it is we will continue to sit here in Ottawa.

I am not sure whether in five minutes the member will be able to receive the kind of answer that I think all of us are looking for in terms of the over-all plans of the government for the next two, three, ten days or whatever.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I agree with my colleague who has just spoken. There is a certain irony here. It seems to me that colleagues have been handling legislation and matters of the House with dispatch in order to clear the decks, as it were, for certain events that are taking place in Calgary, and to prepare for the closing of the session.

The fact that there seems to be a hiatus, as it has been referred to, I think is a sign of co-operation and nothing else. I would say that perhaps the Chair might consider taking a short recess in order to consult with the House leaders and to see what the situation is.

There are many events going on at the present time, some are of critical importance. I think the House has been handling matters with the kind of despatch that many of us have—

Mr. Friesen: Longed for.

Mr. MacKay: —longed for, as my colleague says. So I would urge that the Chair consider the matter, taking whatever time the Chair needs in order to bring clarification to this particular situation.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I can confirm that the House leaders are meeting at this moment to discuss the business for the rest of the week and what may or may not happen.

I am sorry that I missed the intervention of the hon. member.

Normally, what we do when we have completed a couple of pieces of legislation and people have had adequate opportunity to speak, knowing full well that we would normally start Private Members' Business at five o'clock, is that we would seek the consent of the House to suspend until five o'clock. I am sure that in this case the hon. member, knowing his care for the institution and his experience in it, will not have a major problem with that.

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, I would certainly like to assist the government in dealing with this apparent paralysis of the institution.

There is, as I understand it, legislation pending which deals with the question of firearms control in Canada. If the Minister of Justice wants to come into the House now and bring that legislation forward, we can debate it right now and deal with it. The people of Canada want this legislation. Let us bring it on now.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, I would like an undertaking from the government that the notice of motion in the name of the Minister of Justice which concerns the constitutional question and urges the legislative assemblies of Manitoba and Newfoundland to proceed with ratification of the Meech Lake Accord will not be tabled either today or tomorrow.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House puts the Chair in a very difficult situation.

Our Standing Orders are very clear. Government Orders are to be debated until five o'clock, at which time the House will proceed to Private Members' Business.

If the government does not present some business, the Chair normally, as the hon. minister said, would ask for consent to suspend the sitting until five o'clock. I have asked for that consent. I have not received it as yet.

There seems to have been an understanding at one point that if a short recess were called hon. members could speak together and hopefully come to an understanding.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, there have been discussions. I can tell the Chair that we are prepared at this moment to proceed with Bill C–74, the amendments to the Fisheries Act.

We have chosen that particular bill because the minister is here. I want to assure hon. members that it is not our intention in any way to complete second reading of that bill, but simply to make sure that the House has some valuable work before it until five o'clock when we can proceed with Private Members' Business. I want to assure hon. members of the other parties that we will co–operate in keeping the debate alive until five o'clock.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans) moved that Bill C–74, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I thought the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead was here to work. He has already left—

An hon. member: He has gone—

Mr. Valcourt: In any case, Madam Speaker— Aha, he was hiding behind the curtains!

Madam Deputy Speaker: I realize the hon. member rose. However, I am sure he noticed the Speaker had risen before he did to call the minister to order for making a comment he should not have made, and he knows that perfectly well. I think we can proceed. The minister has the floor.

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker.

An hon. member: You can leave!

Mr. Valcourt: Okay, you can leave, François!

An hon. member: Gone again!

• (1620)

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, hon. members are aware that a few days ago, the government tabled in the House a bill to amend the Fisheries Act in order to achieve certain objectives, which are entirely in line with the commitment our government made in the Atlantic region not long ago, when I had an opportunity to announce the fisheries adjustment program.

As you know, Madam Speaker, I have been Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for slightly more than three months. Upon my appointment, I immediately went to the Atlantic region where I had consultations with people in the fisheries industry. I spoke to fishermen, plant owners and unions representing plant workers, and I met various ministers representing provincial governments throughout the Atlantic region. Everywhere it was clear from the situation in the fisheries that certain provisions in our present legislation were not really adequate to allow us to meet the objectives we, as the government, wanted to pursue in the Atlantic region.

When I went to regions like —

[English]

—whether it is Lockeport, Canso, or any area of Newfoundland, including Gaultois or wherever, people made the point to me and my colleagues that if we were going to really try to rebuild the fish stocks, then certain measures had to be taken. These must be measures not only in terms of putting more money into rebuilding fish stocks, or trying to put more scientific effort into trying to rebuild these fish stocks, but conservation measures would also have to be taken.

Among these measures outlined by fishermen in Atlantic Canada and also on the Pacific Coast, where I went a couple of days after, was the need for us to take steps to reduce the over-fishing, the discarding, the high grading at sea—things that happened in the past which had a bad effect on the stocks.

I am talking about the minority now, very few people, but for too many still a fine under the Fisheries Act was the equivalent to a cost of doing business. Looking at the dispositions in the Fisheries Act, the government decided that incurring a fine when the Fisheries Act is violated is not a cost of doing business. It proposed increased fines under this bill. Some will claim that they are very large, and they are. But that just goes to show how serious this government is about protecting the fish resources. At a time when Atlantic Canadians especially depend on this resource, it is unacceptable that we would continue to consider violating the Fisheries Act or a fine ensuing the violation of the act simply as a cost of doing business.

The bill before the House today proposes to increase dramatically these fines so that those who choose to violate the act can no longer consider that these heavy fines are simply a cost of doing business. Quite literally, the magnitude of these fines will ensure that violating the act will not be considered as a cost of doing business. Tribunals and the courts will conclude the importance that Parliament attaches to this act because of the range of fines prescribed in these amendments. We could literally wipe those who violate the act out of business with this range of fines.

The other aspect of these increased fines is that, and you know too often, Madam Speaker—

[Translation]

—there are people who want to take the credit for certain projects, especially in politics. There are people who like to brag and take the credit for what happens. Of course my government wants the credit for introducing amendments to the Fisheries Act, but my point is that the fishermen themselves initiated the amendments that were introduced today in the House. The fishermen asked our department, my colleagues and various members on both sides of the House to introduce strict measures to preserve this resource. Madam Speaker, I must admit that when the Prime Minister asked me to go to Fisheries and Oceans, I did not have a clear picture of our fishermen, either on the Atlantic or the Quebec or the Pacific coast, and I had not really stopped to think what life was like for these people.

Before, I often travelled in the Acadian peninsula, in my own province of New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia, around St. Marys Bay, in the Evangéline region of Prince Edward Island and in Newfoundland, but I never stopped to think how attached fishermen were to their line of work. People who want to believe that the proposed amendments to significantly increase fines will meet with opposition from the fishermen are wrong. They are wrong, and I must admit I was both surprised and relieved when during my visit to the Atlantic region, in every community, all the fishermen, all the groups I met showed this tremendous sense of responsibility. Our Canadian fishermen, wherever they are from, are very responsible people.

For instance, last year, quotas for northern cod were reduced. Of course, a number of experienced politicians in this House preferred to put the blame on foreign overfishing outside our waters or even inside Canadian waters, but the fact is that our own fishermen have also been guilty of overfishing. And this fact, together with foreign overfishing, has contributed to the significant decline in fish stocks in our waters. Once our fishermen realize that, if we want to rebuild these stocks and conserve them, we must take the proper steps to do so. My point is that the fishermen do not object to our increasing fines for those who want to plunder our resources and violate our fisheries legislation, because they are responsible people.

They are responsible people who, throughout the Atlantic and Pacific regions, know that unless the government takes clear measures to show its intention to conserve and rebuild these stocks, they will be out.

Why should these people make the sacrifice involved in going through the present perilous situation of the fisheries in the Atlantic Region if the government and Parliament do not support their efforts? And the best way to support our fishermen is to take action to update a law that has not been amended in quite a while.

Madam Speaker, I am sure that you will hear people say that these amendments to the Fisheries Act are not enough. Certainly, we could have waited months or years to develop a consensus within the industry and address all the evils besetting the fisheries. Of all the provisions in the Act that could be re-examined and amended, we have a series in this bill that will be eliminated because they are no longer relevant, quite simply, to the industry in the present circumstances.

Just because the law as a whole would need additional study does not mean that we should delay adopting these amendments that are an important step towards resource conservation.

[English]

We have to look at what this bill is really all about, what are the highlights of the bill before the House.

In May 1989, recognizing that resource and industry were undergoing dramatic adjustment, the government under the leadership of my predecessor undertook to develop amendments to the Fisheries Act to meet the realities of today's complex fisheries.

The amendments in this bill are urgently needed, and that was the point I was making. It is not because other areas of the bill could also be subjected to amendments that we should refrain from moving now on these urgent amendments. These amendments are urgently needed. As a result, they are specifically focused to provide greater deterrence for fishing violations and for fish habitat offences, and to strengthen the effectiveness of fishery management including the collection of accurate fishing statistics.

I have talked about the increase in fines for fishing violations. We are going to be the country which will have the more stringent fines for fishing violations. It just shows how important we see this issue to be.

In terms of general fishing offences I use as an example what the trawlermen in Canso told me. They talked about illegal dumping of fish at sea. Another example is the misreporting of catch. People would go out to sea and fish for a period of time and then come back and misreport the catch. Today, before these amendments become law, if someone is caught illegally dumping fish at sea in a period when we know the fish are scarce and we have to reduce quotas or if someone is greedy and wants to pick up fish that will pay him more, to dump fish at sea illegally and maybe to bring back a load of fish worth $50,000 or $60,000, we will charge him with violating the act for illegal dumping and he will be fined $5,000 at most. That is a joke. If he brings in a load of fish worth 10 times that amount, what is $5,000?

When I referred earlier to the cost of doing business, that is what I was talking about. If he brings in that amount of fish for big dollars and all he has to face by way of a fine is $5,000, then why not? The present act is almost equivalent to encouraging the illegal dumping of fish at sea.

That is what the trawlermen in Canso told me when I visited them in February and March after my appointment. The trawlermen in Newfoundland talked to me about misreporting northern cod. Given the fact that we had to reduce drastically the quotas in order to protect the future fishery, we literally encouraged these people to do so by not imposing penalties high enough. It was simply considered a cost of doing business.

This is why it is proposed in the bill that for these offences the current maximum of $5,000 be increased to $100,000 on summary conviction and $500,000 on indictment. That is a drastic increase. Those who choose to violate the Fisheries Act and jeopardize the future of fishermen in Atlantic Canada, as well as on the Pacific coast, those who choose to take the livelihoods away from the kids in Atlantic Canada who may become fishermen, and some of them will, they will pay for it.

I think the decision as to the laying of an information from summary conviction offence which can bring a fine of up to $100,000 to one by indictment which would bring a fine of up to $500,000 is an important step in our efforts to try to rebuild and conserve the fish stocks.

There are also options in this bill for second and subsequent offences to include fines and/or imprisonment of up to one year on summary conviction and up to two years on indictment.

The government decided because it was asked by the fishermen. I do not want to pretend that I am standing here as the great minister of fisheries who has decided all alone to do this. No, this is the Government of Canada, and this was started by my predecessor, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to answer the concerns of the fishing industry all across Canada that these fines for general fishing offences should be increased.

• (1640)

A lot of people complained about the fact that fishery officers were not really helped by the present act in that you could obstruct a fishery officer and get a fine of $100. Anyone wishing to violate the act knowingly could obstruct the fishery officer. The cost of doing business for the fun of it would be a maximum fine of $100. This will go up to $100,000 on summary conviction and $500,000 on indictment. There will be a big difference. I just cannot see the effect this will have on our fishery officers.

It is normal that when people talk about the fisheries they only look at the fishermen. They never look at the whole apparatus behind the fishing industry that makes it work. The real people out there whose livelihood is tied to the fish resource have to rely on good fishery officers. The officers themselves need support and need to know that what they are trying to do is worth something. Fishery officers attempt to prevent violations.

Or observe violations of the Act. If that person, Madam Speaker, in presenting himself to do his job is faced with people who say, "Oh, you're just a fisheries official! I'll give you a punch in the mouth," would the penalty be a $100 fine? Come on! What support do we give our officials? If our officials enforce the provisions of the Act, and they will do so professionally, I do not think they will take advantage of the situation to hurt people. On the contrary, they will know that when they discharge their responsibilities and do their duty under the Fisheries Act, whoever hinders them will be liable to a fine of up to $100,000 on summary conviction and $500,000 if found guilty after being charged. I sincerely believe that these measures will improve the enforcement of the Fisheries Act.

Now, Madam Speaker, there is another aspect of this legislation before us today that I would like to talk about a bit. It concerns the protection of fish habitat.

[English]

The bill before the House also entails amending provisions for those who violate the act by committing the offence of altering fish habitat. We know that in some places it has occurred.

For example, someone close to a brook or a river decides to construct a road or a bridge to gain access to his cottage, camp, or wood lot to cut wood, or a big company does so to gain access to its lodge or whatever. Why bother about this little brook or the river? They build a road or bridge across the river and literally not only alter but destroy the fish habitat.

How does the act deal with some who violate the fish habitat section of the Fisheries Act? The current maximum fine is $5,000 on summary conviction, and $10,000 for second and subsequent offences.

I submit, with all respect to my colleagues in the House, that this is ridiculous. We are a generation of Canadians in this Parliament who see people every day in Canada, Canadians young and old, concerned about our environment. Today everyone wants to be seen as a proponent of environmental protection.

Political parties and governments throughout Canada are addressing the issue. We can see it. It is an important one. We realize that this fragile environment in which we live is important for us, our children, and the future Canadians who will enjoy it. We have to protect it.

Under the Fisheries Act we have the sections dealing with fish habitat. Those who violate the act and destroy fish habitat will be fined $5,000.

In this bill we propose to increase the fine on summary conviction to $300,000, and on indictment, to $1 million. For those who choose to violate the act, who decide that they can destroy our fish habitat, it will not simply be the cost of doing business any more.

If you want to build a road across a river to access your camp or woodlot, you had better not destroy the fish habitat because you are going to be liable on summary conviction to a $300,000 fine, or indictment to $1 million.

Some will argue that these are steep fines.

—they are much too high! No, they are not. If you do not want to comply—We can all talk about protecting our environment—Of course, in the back of my mind, when I talk about protecting fish habitats, I am thinking about my environment in general, but I am also thinking about fishermen and people who must depend on those resources. When I talk about people who build roads across the river or bridges over streams, I can also talk about people who fish on the high seas, who literally throw harmful material in the water.

People will have to look seriously at how they treat fish habitats in future, because those who decide not to pay attention, who just do not care, will be liable to very heavy fines: $300,000 and $1 million—that is real money, even in Saint-Quentin! It is a sizable amount anywhere.

Once Parliament, with the consent of all parties, I hope, has endorsed these amendments to the Fisheries Act, it will send a message to the courts, to our system and to people that the Parliament of Canada is serious about wanting to protect our fish habitats.

[English]

We also know that people are guilty of dumping chemicals which are harmful to fish. It has happened in the past and it happened again recently. This was a little more serious. Currently, the fine is $50,000 for dumping chemicals that are harmful to fish. There is a fine of $100,000 on second and subsequent offences. There are no provisions for indictment. Not everyone out there is a lawyer and people should understand that when we talk about an offence under summary conviction, it is a less serious charge. It is going to be serious enough in terms of the fine or the jail term that can be imposed. Usually, though, the summary conviction offences are those that are less serious.

• (1650)

Those by indictment are more serious because of the act itself and the greater importance Parliament decided to put on those offences. For those who decide to dump chemicals that are harmful to fish, the maximum fine is $300,000 on summary conviction, as proposed in this bill. So we take it from a $50,000 fine to a $300,000 fine. On indictment, we take it from $100,000 up to $1 million. Court options, which do not exist under the present act, include up to three years imprisonment on indictment.

The present fine for failure to provide habitat information is a maximum of $5,000 on summary conviction, with a maximum of $10,000 for second and subsequent offences. We will increase this maximum to $200,000 on summary conviction and $200,000 and/or six months imprisonment for second and subsequent offences.

When one looks at the range of all the amendments and all offences dealt with by the courts, it gives increased flexibility for the courts to make additional discretionary orders on conviction such as payment of clean-up costs. When we talk about protecting our environment and those who deposit harmful substances, the court will be able to impose a clean-up cost on the accused person or corporation.

Let us deal with the area of tagging. The salmon is a species which is dear to the people in Atlantic Canada. If the salmon is not tagged, the current maximum fine is $100. The government proposes in this bill that the maximum fines be $1,000 and automatic forfeiture of the fish and gear seized. Again, we are sending a signal. The government and the Parliament of Canada are ready to live up to its responsibility toward the fisheries but we also have to take the steps to, as some say——put our money where our mouth is.

[English]

That is what we are doing with these increased penalties.

Another important aspect of this bill concerns the management of the fisheries in Canada. One can understand its importance especially when one reads the Harris panel report. This is the panel of learned Canadians, with one American and one Englishman, both of whom were very helpful with regard to forming this report. A lot was said.

There are two aspects to our discussion about the Harris panel report. There is the report itself for those who care to read it, and there is what the media says about it. A lot of people seem to think that the scientists in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans were severely indicted by the Harris panel. The media accused the scientists of having blown it, that they were wrong. The media seemed to attribute this conclusion to the Harris panel. I read it in the media, but Mr. Harris never said that.

Anyone who cares to read the Harris panel report will find that the Harris panel confirmed what the scientists in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans had said, but it pointed to the lack of good, solid data. It pointed to the inadequacy of good, solid information allowing the scientists to do their jobs more accurately.

In order to rely on our scientists, we have to allow them to get the proper and correct information on the quantity of fish out there, on the catch rate, on the effort and on the landings. Data is required. That is why in terms of statistical provisions, Section 61 of the act is rewritten to define who may be required to provide information and keep records. It defines the type of information required, the responsibility to keep records as prescribed by regulation or licence and how information may be sought.

In addition, fisheries officers will have the authority to examine records and books of accounts to verify accuracy of information.

Mr. Speaker, you are indicating to me that my time is running out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member can wind it up at 5 p.m.

Mr. Valcourt: That is Section 61. It is being rewritten to define who may be required to provide this data. This information will help our scientists to manage the health of those stocks better. We will be able to have much better information for our scientists to analyze and to rely on in order to assess and inform the government on what the situation really is.

There is another aspect to these proposed amendments to the Fisheries Act that I consider very important. It is in terms of enforcement and management processes. In this bill, there are provisions for broader liability for offenders. According to these amendments, license holders can be held liable for offences. Officers and directors of corporations can be held liable for offences.

That reminds me of Pat Fougère, a trawlerman in Canso who was telling me that on certain vessels—I will not say which ones—they were receiving instructions from the corporate headquarters to do things that were in violation of the act. We have corporations holding licence with the board of directors being responsible. Under the present act we cannot do anything against these people. They are the ones saying that something be done in violation of the act and because of the structure of the present Fisheries Act we cannot prosecute them. Under the proposed amendments, officers and directors of corporations can be held liable for offences.

I hope that I will have a chance to continue when the bill is next before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. minister's time has expired.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington) moved that Bill C-260, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (spousal agreement) be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to seek the consent of the House to pass Bill C-260 through second reading and on to a committee for study.

This bill has been more than three years in the making, so it is really interesting after that time to see it finally on the floor of the House of Commons.

Bill C-260 is intended to amend the Canada Pension Plan. The Canada Pension Plan was established in 1966 to provide a source of retirement income for Canadians. Since 1966, Canada Pension Plan benefits have been improved on a number of occasions. Canada Pension Plan credit splitting legislation came into effect on January 1, 1978.

The objective of credit splitting was to recognize that pension credits earned by one or both spouses during a marriage were a joint asset. It is recognized that both spouses contribute to the accumulation of the Canada Pension Plan credits during their marriage, either directly by virtue of their both earning credits, or indirectly by one contributing through work in the home.

We recognize that work in the home does contribute to family income and therefore to the Canada Pension Plan credits accumulated by the spouse who is in the labour force. The 1978 amendment, by permitting the splitting of these credits, assured each spouse a fair share of the assets to which they both contributed.

For five years it was believed that the division of pension credits was outside the jurisdiction of the courts. Waivers in separation agreements or other similar orders which renounced future property claims were not binding on the Canada Pension Plan administration in that they did not affect the division of pension credits. This understanding changed as a result of an appeal to the Pension Appeals Board in the case of Preece v. Preece.

The Pension Appeals Board is the third and final level in the appeal process. Section 86(d) further states that the decision of the board, unless provided for elsewhere in the act, is final and binding.

In the June 30, 1983 Preece ruling the Pension Appeals Board decided that the division of pension credits is subject to an agreement or a settlement that may have been reached by former spouses.

A February, 1990 report on pension reform by the National Council of Welfare states that as of September, 1989, only 21,267 applications for splitting under the Canada Pension Plan have been approved since the option was first made available in 1978. During those years there were approximately half a million divorces that should have led to splitting. Informal estimates by the Department of Health and Welfare suggest that at least 15,000 spouses could benefit from Bill C-260.

It is my understanding that since the Preece v. Preece judgment the Department of National Health and Welfare has been seeking a solution to restore the legislation to its original intent prior to the Pension Appeals Board ruling.

In the last Parliament the government introduced Bill C-116, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan and the Federal Court Act, which came into force January 1, 1987. The passage of Bill C-116 restored the division of pension credits as a non-assigned right, unless a waiver is allowed under a provincial statute.

Unfortunately for the drafters of Bill C-116, those spouses who signed a separation agreement between January 1, 1978 and June 4, 1986 were still left out. It was determined at the time that the information they received was correct. In 1978, when the original credit splitting legislation was put in place, I recall writing to all the lawyers in my constituency advising them of the credit splitting. In fact, National Health and Welfare and National Revenue continued to advise people that credit splitting was automatic and non-assignable for at least two years after the Preece v. Preece decision. Bill C–260 will correct this administrative error.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare informs me that his department is reviewing its files on a case–by–case basis and in certain circumstances is using the Canada Pension Plan erroneous advice provisions to restore rights to a division of pension credits. However, the credits are not being split, they are being extended to the disentitled spouse creating an additional financial burden on the Canada Pension Plan. Bill C–260 would give the minister the statutory authority to credit split Canada pensions to those who were disentitled between 1978 and 1986.

The chairperson of the National Council of Welfare, on behalf of the council, has written to the Minister of National Health and Welfare endorsing Bill C–260.

I remember, Mr. Speaker, the excitement in 1978 when credit splitting was introduced. It was really a step forward for women. As a member of the 30th Parliament that introduced the credit splitting amendment I recall that it was the intent of Parliament that Canada Pension Plan credit splitting would be a non–assignable right. This private member's bill, Bill C–260, restores the original intent of Parliament.

This whole matter came to my attention several years ago as a result of a case brought to my office. I learned of several personal tragedies that resulted from a decision to waive the Canada Pension Plan splitting after the Preece v. Preece decision. To my surprise, once the word got out among some women's groups that I was working on this, I was inundated with correspondence from a large number of women who found themselves in the same position. In other words, they had been denied their rightful half of their spouse's Canada pension. So I began to gather information and discuss the matter with officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare. That is where we ran across what we refer to as an administrative error in the drafting of Bill C–116.

We worked away at it and had a good deal of consultation with officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare. I want to thank the minister and his staff as well as several people in the department for their aid and assistance. They worked closely with my office and went so far as to assist in the drafting of this bill.

• (1710)

As well, I want to thank the critics for the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party for their consideration. When I was speaking to them I noted that as soon as I mentioned Preece v. Preece they immediately grasped the thrust behind Bill C–260. The National Council of Welfare immediately supported this bill and wrote to the Minister of National Health and Welfare supporting its passage.

I recently read again a study on poverty that was produced in 1988. It clearly stated that most elderly—and I use that word very broadly because when you are a senior citizen you are not elderly—unattached women are among the poorest in Canada. The passage of Bill C–260 will be of assistance to many of the women who, unfortunately, fall into this category.

I am pleased that everyone I have spoken to on the bill has realized that an injustice occurred. It was the result of an unfortunate error in the drafting of a bill. This bill, I hope, will return some equity and justice to the women who have been hurt by this.

I want to thank members who have spoken to me and told me that they support the passage of this bill. I have the support of the minister and his staff.

I believe the plan today is to have a member from the official opposition and a member from the New Democratic Party speak, and then I believe it is the intention of the House to pass the bill on to a legislative committee where, hopefully, it will move on and amend a federal statute. If it goes through that course, I believe it is going to be one of the first private members' bills ever to amend a government statute. We look forward to that. I thank you very much for your close attention.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Kempling that Bill C-260, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (spousal agreement) be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today in support of my colleague's bill, Bill C-260, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan. I wish to congratulate my colleague from Burlington and thank him on behalf of many women who will benefit from this proposed change to the legislation.

The member for Burlington pointed out that among those most in need in Canadian society are senior, single women, many living below the poverty line. As he said, the intent of the original legislation was that the division of pension funds would not be subject to any agreement or settlement by spouses.

He pointed out today that half a million divorces have occurred in the period of time since this legislation originally came into being and a total of perhaps 15,000 spouses may be affected by this legislation. So we are not talking about isolated cases nor are the cases of senior women living in poverty isolated cases in this country.

I think that all of us here wish to do everything possible to try to support women in need as those needs exist. It is very regrettable that the Preece v. Preece case caused this source of problem in our society. We are grateful that there have been members in this House who were aware of this instance and who have worked effectively to try to correct the error that has existed for these last five years.

When this bill comes back from the legislative committee and we deal with it here in the House, those who have been disentitled will be grateful for this change. We must all do everything we can to support this proposal, Bill C-260, as presented by my colleague from the riding of Burlington.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of the New Democratic caucus to support this Private Member's Bill, Bill C-260, which would solve one of the problems with the application of the Canada Pension Plan to women. The New Democratic Party advocates mandatory, automatic pension credit splitting. We would like to see even greater pension reform than is represented in this bill, but this is a good start and it does address one of the inequities.

In 1978, pension laws were changed so that Canada Pension Plan credits of spouses could be split upon divorce or annulment. A 1983 Pension Appeals Board decision declared that the division of credits was subject to separation agreements or settlements. Apparently some women signed away their pension rights without even realizing it as CPP credits were now interpreted as part of other assets not enumerated. This had the effect of disentitling those spouses who signed a separation agreement between the years 1978 and 1983 and who were granted their divorce decree between 1983 and 1987. Legislation introduced to remedy this problem applied only to those divorced after 1986.

The bill before us allows for pension credit splitting for those who were disentitled by the Pension Appeals Board after the Preece v. Preece case. It is estimated that 15,000 individuals may be eligible to benefit from this bill being enacted. Upon divorce the accumulated credits of both spouses are added together, divided and distributed equally to each spouse.

Both spouses contribute to a marriage. However, if a woman stays home to raise children, at that time only her husband accumulates CPP credits. Credit splitting recognizes that work that women do in the home is important, that that work in the home raising children does have value.

As a result of the Preece case, women could trade away about $10,000 worth of pension income for a few pieces of household furniture.

The statistics, of which the member for Burlington made some mention, concerning the poverty of older women are really frightening. One out of every two single, divorced or widowed women over the age of 65 is currently living below the poverty line here in Canada. The situation is especially bad for women who have spent long periods of time doing the nation's most valuable work, I would submit, that of raising children.

It is not likely to improve drastically with women spending the majority of their lives now in the paid labour force because the average earnings for women in the full year, full time labour force is only 65 per cent of what men earn. This has become worse, not better, over the past few years. According to the National Council of Welfare, the average man in the labour force has a reasonable chance of retiring with a full CPP pension. The average woman will be lucky to get 60 per cent or 70 per cent of what is now the maximum.

Women are poorly placed in Canada's pension system, whether they are part of the paid labour force or not. Many of the women who have retired in recent years are getting meagre benefits from the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans. Occupational pension plans only cover 37 per cent of women in the paid labour force, compared to 52 per cent of men. Women have a much lower average income than men and most cannot afford to put money aside into an RRSP.

Often women are made to rely solely or primarily on inadequate old age security cheques. That is why so many older women are poor. After a lifetime of contributing to society through raising children and performing paid and unpaid work, many are sentenced to poverty in their older years.

Our pension system is unfair to women and this Private Members' Bill we are discussing today is only a drop in the bucket of change. Even after this bill is passed, there remain many problems with the Canada Pension Plan in relation to women.

The government claims that mandatory, automatic CPP credit splitting is already in place. But this is really not the case. Spouses must apply to Health and Welfare for credit splitting. So few women know to apply for it that only 4 per cent of those who are eligible do apply. This is hardly automatic.

The National Council of Welfare, in its most recent report on pensions, says that as of June 1989, only 20,482 applications for credit splitting had been submitted and approved since this option was first made available in 1978. During that same period there were approximately half a million divorces in Canada.

One solution would be to improve the Department of Justice's collection of divorce statistics and information so that enough information could be collected by Justice to allow for truly automatic, mandatory credit splitting upon divorce. That way, one divorced spouse would not have to apply for credit splitting.

It is more complex to have mandatory, automatic credit splitting for common-law spouses as there may be no record of these relationships. The time limit for application, however, could be removed so that women who hear about the credit splitting option several years after the break-up could still apply for the credits accumulated during that relationship.

Divorced people have unlimited time to apply for credit splitting, but common-law spouses who separate have only four years to apply for credit splitting. After four years their pension rights are forever waived.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. I am quick to point out that when the House resumes the hon. member will be able to complete her remarks. I hope my intervention has come at a point where the tenor and sense of her speech will not be lost. I thank her for her co-operation.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Kempling that Bill C-260, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (spousal agreement) be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby has four minutes left in debate.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I was not sure what was going on when the knock came at the door, so I am sorry if I did not stop when I was supposed to.

To continue, in 1988 Saskatchewan passed a law to override mandatory credit splitting. The pension rights of women in Saskatchewan are subject to separation agreements, which goes to show just how seriously further pension reform is necessary. We know that we must look more carefully at homemakers' pensions. The National Action Committee on the Status of Women advocates homemakers' pensions and set up a special lobby session with a few MPs on this issue. I was pleased to participate in that session.

New Democrats stand for pension reform that would guarantee an adequate pension for every Canadian. We have a record of achievement in pension reform of more than 50 years. In 1926 the old age pension was enacted because J. S. Woodsworth, the first leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, the parent party of the New Democratic Party, insisted upon it in a minority government situation. It was New Democrats who placed unceasing pressure on another government in 1966 to bring in the Canada Pension Plan. In 1973 New Democrats won from a minority government the full indexing of the Canada Pension Plan to help pensioners keep up with inflation.

This is something that the Conservative government tried to take away in 1985. I would like to see a commitment from this government to real pension reform. Seniors are demanding decent pensions for their lifetime of work in our society. Instead this government is clawing back at their income security programs and the old age pension. I am pleased to support the bill. The New Democrat caucus is pleased to support the bill. It will solve one of the inequities women in our society face. What we need is real comprehensive pension reform.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Burlington for the work done over the past three years on this issue. He indicated some surprise at the number of women who contacted him who were in the same situation as the first constituent who contacted him. Also, he indicated some surprise at the lobbying received from women's organizations that contacted him once it became known that he was working on this issue. I would say that that goes to show the power, the advocacy and energy of women in this country once they know that someone is taking up an issue of real concern to them.

I offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Burlington. I am pleased, as he indicated, that the government plans to support this bill and he has the support of all three parties in the House.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I was just going to see if there was another member who wished to speak. I do not want to use all the time. I would be prepared to allow the other member to share the time remaining in this—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Why do you not split it up? You have 15 minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton–Northeast rose first. I am prepared to yield to him. I will take whatever time is left.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say to the hon. member who said he would speak later that we have an arrangement with other parties to pass this bill to committee. I hope it is not the intention of the hon. member to talk it out.

[Translation]

Mr. Kindy: The hon. member for Burlington need not worry for I support his bill. I think it is a good measure and I have no intention of killing his bill. I think it is a good bill.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might make a small suggestion to the House which, I think, will solve the problem. We might hear the member for Calgary–Northeast (Mr. Kindy) and, when he finishes his remarks in a few minutes, we would listen to the last member on the conservative side.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In that case I recognize the hon. member for Calgary–Northeast.

Mr. Kindy: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First I want to congratulate the hon. member for Burlington for introducing this bill which will certainly help women in distress. As the previous speakers so eloquently pointed out, there is a lot of divorced women. Apparently there are half a million divorce cases in Canada. Quite a few women live under the poverty line. This is why I think the bill afford fairer treatment to those who must share pensions.

I wish the situation of people living under the poverty line would improve because it is essential. I would suggest that the government now has a bill which will solve this pension problem. I am sure this legislative measure will be effective and help people who need money.

The hon. member for Burlington was chairman of the committee when I submitted my bill on the referendum and he did not have the courtesy to support it, as I support his bill today. He said then it was not necessary, that we did not need referendums in Canada. I point out to him that a referendum right now in Canada could resolve the constitutional problems Canada is facing.

• (1750)

For this reason, I hope he will grant me the courtesy of supporting my motion on referendum when it comes before the House. So I congratulate him once more. I think Bill C–60 is a excellent piece of legislation and I support it wholeheartedly.

[English]

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate at the outset that after a few brief remarks I intend to allow this bill to move forward to a legislative committee where it can be examined in greater detail.

As members speaking on this bill prior to myself have talked about the need for it and how it came about, I might give a little additional background in the area that was not addressed so far in regard to the court decision.

That is something that the legislative committee will have to examine very carefully when it deals with this matter. In principle what we seek to do in this House is to redress unfairness. Speakers prior to myself have managed to demonstrate that circumstances were unanticipated both when the original bill was put forward as well as when the amended Bill C-16 was later introduced with the result that people who thought they would be eligible to receive benefits from the Canada Pension Plan have found that they cannot.

I think we must be careful in trying to redress that unfairness that we do not, in any way, set a precedent where we restrict people from entering into agreements which they, with full knowledge, would like.

Presumably what the original bill intended was that Canada Pension Plan benefits were not assignable rights. In other words one could not waive the right to receive them.

The question we would ask ourselves is if an individual who is knowledgeable of their own situation, has proper legal advice, and decides to enter into an agreement, under what circumstances is it appropriate for this House and this Parliament to restrict a Canadian from entering freely into that agreement.

It was in that vein that the court in reviewing this case stated the following: The facts show that the former spouses have, in three instances, entered into settlement agreements or minutes of settlement, whereby they have undertaken not to make further demands on the property of the other. The fourth has the order nisi approbating the division of property and granting maintenance after a hearing but on the basis of a consent judgment.

The decision of the minister purports to overlook or set aside such agreement or adjudication. The facts show that the parties to the minutes of the settlement and agreements were sui juris.

All parties were represented by counsel in the negotiations, culminating in the settlement agreements or consent judgment and are thereby presumed to have had proper advice and instruction as to the intent and effect of the agreement into which they entered.

There was no allegation of fraud or undue influence. Essentially, we are considering whether an agreement made properly between parties who are sui juris, can be altered by the provisions of a statute. Here we are dealing with divorce cases and under ordinary circumstances in divorce the jurisprudence is clear that an application under Section 2 of the Divorce Act can succeed to vary the terms of a decree nisi and settlement agreements for minutes of settlement, but that is a specific statutory provision and, in our view, is not applicable in these circumstances.

They went on to discuss this case and I do not want to go on at great length here today because I want to ensure that this matter can go forward to the appropriate legislative committee to be discussed. But I would urge that that legislative committee, in considering this, does review very carefully the findings of the court because I think they point out something that has been of historic understanding within the common law system and that is the right of parties to enter into contracts. We should be careful that nothing in this House destroys that basic principle under which we have been guided for many, many years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

FISHERIES ACT

The House resumed consideration at second reading of Bill C-74, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak to Bill C–74 amending the Fisheries Act. I was not expecting to speak today because I thought we would examine this bill sometime next week. However, the debate has started, the Minister has explained his bill and we are now ready to discuss it.

As the Minister has explained, this bill proposes changes to the various fines faced by fishermen who violate the law. The first amendment is designed to increase fines for general fishing violations. At the moment, offenders are liable to a $5,000 fine or a 12 month prison sentence in some cases. The new bill increases that fine to a maximum of $100,000 on summary conviction and $500,000 on indictment.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that many representatives of the fishery industry had requested such long-awaited changes. When the minister introduced these amendments last week, he said there was an urgent need to adopt them because the people in the industry had been waiting for quite a while. That is true, they did.

Well then, I have only this simple question to put to the minister: Why has it been so long? It is not the first time that we talk about making those changes. Other changes will deal with, as the minister was telling me, people who obstruct or hinder a fishery officer. At the present time, such people are liable to a fine not exceeding $100 or six months of forced labour on summary conviction. With the amendments, the maximum fine would be $100,000 on summary conviction and $500,000 on indictment.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, our fishery officers need some protection. They also need some degree of authority and the means of carrying out their duties. Of course they need protection, and I think that everybody in the fishing industry—fishermen, plant workers and trawlermen—recognize that need, since the fishery officers are in fact working for the protection of the fisheries, that is the protection of a resource on which the Atlantic fishing communities depend so much.

Pollution of fish habitat is also mentioned. There again, an increase is proposed, from $50,000 to $300,000 upon summary conviction and up to $1 million for an indictable offence. All those who are concerned about the environment, and I mean all fishermen, all men and women who work for plants in my riding, in the Atlantic area, on the west coast, worry because the dumping of harmful substances in the oceans, and in rivers, threatens the very resource they depend on to earn their living and put food on the table. So I agree the measures brought forward must apply.

Other fines are provided, and there are clauses on information returns. As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, we expected to debate this bill later, in weeks to come, and we did not have the time to make a complete and thorough study of it.

According to a provision on information returns where changes are proposed, people could be required to provide information or keep books up to date, and it could be specified what type of information is required, the responsability of keeping books as required by regulations or conditions of licences and how to collect the information. I have some reservations here, Mr. Speaker, because that could become a very heavy burden for small undertakings and for some fishermen who have small boats and manage what are in fact small businesses. So we would have to know.

[English]

The bookkeeping requirements of Bill C–74 are extremely stringent. For instance, Section 61(2) states that fishermen and purchasers shall be required to keep records of the number, sex, size, weight, species, product form or other particulars of any fish caught. Other information required will include the time and place of landings, the type of gear, buildings, and other equipment used in the process.

Now, of course, Mr. Speaker, when we have to determine the situation of our stocks, the number of fish in the oceans and in different species, we need as much information as we can get. But I am concerned that these requirements will be a heavy, a very heavy burden to carry for some companies, and we reserve the right to take a second look at this and move amendments in due time.

Now, as I was saying, generally speaking, this bill meets a certain need. This bill will make happy some people active in the fishing industry. It is certainly not perfect and of course we will try to improve it when we examine it so that it better meets the needs of the Atlantic coast or the Pacific coast.

We are talking about penalties and surveillance, but we must have the personnel to carry on that surveillance. That is where the shoe pinches on the Atlantic coast as well as on the West coast.

We have heard a lot about surveillance recently and especially about the inadequacy of that surveillance in relation to the ground fish crisis and, above all, the northern cod. The control was inadequate simply because we did not have the boats and vessels to ensure that the Canadian laws concerning catches and quotas were respected. There was nobody there to stop foreign fleets from coming and plundering—yes, plundering is the word, Mr. Speaker—our fish stocks. Those people were coming and going as they pleased in and out of the 200 mile limit and we did not have the personnel or the boats to stop them from doing so.

By the way, the Harris report to which the minister alluded earlier mentions that and proposes some recommendations.

To go back to the matter of surveillance, the minister, when asked questions here in the House on several occasions, talked about a contract recently awarded to a private firm. That firm would do surveillance within the 200 mile limit, a job that was performed previously by tracker aircraft based in summerside.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you know that the $28 million contract that was awarded will not replace the surveillance work that the tracker planes did for the fishing industry, although the government says it will do more than that. And you also know that, when the contract was awarded, the call for tenders was done in a such a way that only one firm had the equipment required and could in fact provide those services to the government. Naturally, Mr. Speaker, that $28 million contract went, we are told, to friends of the government who are now giving us surveillance services. But that was mentioned in Recommendation 22 of the Harris report which says, I think, that the governement of Canada should have additional patrol boats for its offshore surveillance operations in order to take immediate actions when offences are reported by trackers or observers, and that helicopters should be used in conjunction with smaller patrol boats for inshore surveillance.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, even if we have trackers to fly over our fishing banks at the 200-mile limit, allowing us to see what is going on in those areas, those planes unfortunately cannot land and arrest anyone in breach of the law. So, we need patrol boats which could react on the spot to what the pilots see from the trackers. That is exactly what Recommendation 22 in the Harris report is all about; a small increase in the number of patrol boats. Even if the minister increases the fines imposed on anyone committing an offence, first the fishing officers and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans have to be able to arrest the offenders on the spot. What good is it to observe an offence being committed if we do not have the means to arrest the offenders; it's a waste of time and energy. We can come back to base and say: "Well, we did see offences being committed, but there was nothing we could do about it." Unfortunately, that is what is happening with the northern cod and other species.

When the minister spoke earlier, he did mention the Harris Report, but he also alluded to the effort made by scientists. Apparently, scientists were blamed in newspapers and in reports for having supplied inaccurate information to the various committees whose mandate it is to establish the total allowable catches. These committees need a great deal of information on the health status of fish stocks, something which is not easy to gather.

What the minister meant, of course, was that these scientists are not to be blamed, and I agree with him, even though the information they supplied was not completely accurate. They had to make do with the means available to them. And that is the problem, for in the last few years the Department of Fisheries and Oceans did not put the necessary funds into this scientific endeavour. People had to make do with limited means, which could only give results at some variance with hard facts. And that is exactly what happened; we got into a situation where the information available to us was at a very large variance with the catches, with real numbers. That is when we realized that our stocks of northern cod were in a very bad shape and that we had to reduce fishing as soon as possible.

I wanted to make that point, Mr. Speaker, in order that we do not attack the scientists. They have done the best they could with the means available to them.

Speaking about his bill, the minister also said that he had tabled it as part of the Atlantic fisheries adjustment program. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, when that program was announced, that the government spoke very highly of it and said of course that it was the solution to many of our problems. We talked about $130 million, $426 million and even about a program worth $150 million, which were of course comprised in the $426 million for the restoration of our fish stocks. We talked about the amount of $130 million for an adjustment program to today's context, and about $146 million for economic diversification.

The government used a lot of numbers twice, Mr. Speaker. They were announced more than once, and it seems to be a lot of money. People believe we will just solve all the problems. Well, such is not the case. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that, at the time being, nothing much is happening in terms of the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program.

When the announcement was made, certain communities were mentioned; it was said then that the governement would give millions of dollars to people, that is the workers of St. John's, the employees of fish plants, the people of Grand Bank, of Trepasse, and even communities of Nova Scotia like Canso, North Sydney, and Lockeport. However, Mr. Speaker, you know that in the Atlantic, these are not the only communities that have to deal with the serious problem concerning fisheries. And they asked the Minister why so many communities had been forgotten? In certain cases, fishermen cannot yet go out to sea. They are locked in by the ice. I remember very well the questions that my colleagues of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia were asking te Minister: What are you going to do for those communities not specifically identified in the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program? Mr. Speaker, you heard it yourself, they were telling us that the solution lies in Bill C-21, the bill that proposes very major changes to the unemployment insurance program.

Mr. Speaker, it is really unfortunate that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans chooses to hide behind this false argument that bill C-21, if passed, would solve the probelms of these people. I suggest that, on the contrary, Bill C-21 would only make people's lives in the Atlantic area more complicated. Why? Because it is a high unemployment area. It is certainly not as developed as other areas in Canada and although we are not resentful, we should like to get our fair share. But even before setting up the mechanism to help us catch up with the other areas, the government has decided to deprive us of our livelihood. That is exactly what Bill C-21 is doing, a bill meant to reduce the unmemployment insurance benefits available to various people in Atlantic Canada. Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that back home, in my own Beauséjour riding, it is going to hurt. It is going to hurt badly.

Why? Because now people are just stuck in a one way dead-end street. As you know, in Atlantic Canada, it is difficult, if not outright impossible, to get over ten weeks of employment. No matter how hard people try, the jobs are simply not there. They simply do not exist.

As a matter of fact, as recently as last week, I received several calls from people who were wondering what was going to happen with the unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Plourde: Ask the senators!

Mr. Robichaud: No. The senators just sent us Bill S-17 on which we voted yesterday and which would have made it possible for people in Atlantic Canada to qualify with ten weeks of employment entitlement which was the rule in the past. Why would they now no longer qualify with ten weeks? Well, the government has refused on several occasions to renew this bill dealing with variable entrance requirements as was done in previous years. It was done every year. Before the end of the year, they would renew this bill and people in areas with high levels of unemployment would qualify with 10 weeks of employment entitlement. This was the case back home. If you work in the lobster industry, the working season is limited to 10 weeks. It is out of the question to go fishing and say: "Well, this year, because we need to qualify for unemployment benefits, we are going to fish for 15 or 16 weeks." It is impossible. The lobster season only lasts 10 weeks and for a number of reasons, mainly because a longer season would deplete the resource.

• (1820)

Even though our factories process lobster from other areas, because the fishing season is not the same everywhere, there is hardly enough work for 12 weeks. But the government seems to be completely unaware of that fact. I can assure you Mr. Speaker that those workers do want to stay home, they have no other choice. We prevent them from earning entitlement to unemployment insurance benefits. Like all the members of this House, nowadays families need two salaries to get by. Even with two pay cheques it is hard to make both ends meet. So, you can imagine what happens to the people working in greenhouses who called me last week-end. They were among the lucky few who could work for 14 weeks.

They called the Manpower Centre, the unemployment insurance office to find out what was going to happen to their application. They were told that they were not eligible, that they needed 20 weeks. Then they called me and said: "Well, what do I do with this?" I am out of a job, I am not eligible for unemployment insurance, I called everywhere but I couldn't find a job". I know people called, because they asked my office for addresses. But the truth is, there are no jobs to be had. These women were telling me: "What are we going to do? Are we going to stay home? And if so, who is going to put bread on the table? How are we going to clothe the children, run the household? We cannot work and we are not eligible for unemployment insurance". All they can do is wait until the unemployment rate reaches 11.5 per cent. At that stage, they will be eligible with 14 weeks.

But if the government had agreed every time it was presented with a bill on the variable entrance requirement and had passed this bill as in previous years, these people would not now find themselves in such an untenable situation. You must talk to these people. You must talk a little with them to understand what they are going through. I certainly would not want anyone here to be in such a situation. Mr. Speaker, unemployment insurance is not big bucks! Say you work for $6 an hour 40 hours a week, that makes $240 a week. If you work for 10 weeks, you earn $2,400 gross. Well, $2,400 is not a lot of money! You apply for unemployment insurance and if you are fairly lucky—but now, with 10 weeks, you do not qualify. That means that you will have to try your best to make ends meet with that money. In many cases, it is just impossible.

Mr. Speaker, just to make you aware of the government's insensitivity, yesterday, it again refused to support Bill S-17, which was intended to do what people in my area expected, namely to change or apply a new regulation for the variable entrance requirement. Too bad it was a wasted effort.

I was talking about the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program. We had warned the government several times about the impending crisis. We saw it coming.

We were asking them, in fact, to do an indepth study of the situation and they assured us that consultations were going on with all those involved. But when you take a look at the program, you realize that it contains serious deficiencies. The lobster industry has been completely left out of it. Everyone knows that the industry is in a crisis. Last spring, at the opening of the fishing season, that is on May 1st, in the Acadian peninsula, in certain areas of Prince-Edward-Island, lobster traps were launched and a few days later fishermen brought back lobster which would be sold for $1.25 a pound. M. Speaker, no fisherman could make a living selling lobster at $1.25 a pound. It would be better for him to leave the traps at the bottom of the water. But they have no choice. They have to bring them back to the surface and, in spite of those low prices, sell them at $1.25 a pound.

It does not even pay for costs. Fuel costs were higher, and I must say again here that the government made things worse by repeatedly raising the excise tax on fuel. We cannot buy a boat, of course, at the same price as in the past. This increased, too. Fishing gear and lobsters traps that we could make for 5 dollars cannot be had for 5 dollars anymore. It is now 40 or 50 dollars. Where in the past we could buy bait—normally, a fish of lower quality we used to have for almost nothing—we now pay 30 cents a pound. And how much do we need every day? On average, between 200 and 300 pounds, depending, of course, on the catches, on the weather which may swing the traps around on the bottom. With those costs fishermen can absolutely not survive when the price is at $1.25 a pound.

We had warned the government against the low prices that we saw coming. Why? Because many factors were telling us that prices would drop. We had heard that the Americans would limit imports into the United States of lobsters less than 3 1/4 inches long. We talked about it here in the House last September. We had drawn this situation to the attention of the Prime Minister who was going to meet with the President of the United States shortly thereafter. You certainly remember that meetings in Kennebunkport. The Prime Minister had assured us, here in the House, that he would raise this question with the President and that he would see to it that this measure would not be implemented. Well, it was not a surprise because, in many cases, we have good reason to question the Prime Minister's efforts. His plan did not work.

The Minister for International Trade also gave us the assurance this measure would not go any further. He could have saved himself the trouble. It just did not work, which means that today, the lobster we used to be able to export to the United States—a little under three and a quarter inches—which was marketed live, is now a glut on our own market and has to be processed either by freezing or canning. It means adding to the inventories packers already have. Of course, U.S. distributors knew perfectly well what was going to happen if this measure was passed. They were just waiting, not buying. Not until recently did inventories start to go down. Prices are now increasing. We would have liked to see the government intervene, but not by throwing money at the problem. I agree that money is not the solution.

In this case, however, the government could have intervened through the Fisheries Prices Support Board by setting a minimum price for lobster. This wouldn't have cost hundreds of millions of dollars. Inventories weren't that high. The government could have intervened. This would have had the effect of immediately stabilizing the market. We could have raised the prices, and the fishermen would have been paid $1.25 per pound.

Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, if you were a fisherman, and this summer—in my area, the season starts on August 10 and goes on until October 10—you realize you will have to do all that hard work, and fishing is hard work. You get up with the sun to be on the fishing grounds early in the morning. Then you do all that hard work and sell your lobster for $1.40 or $1.50 a pound— I must say, Mr. Speaker, that is not very encouraging.

No more so than for the plant workers who will have to return or have already returned to the labour market and who are unable to work more than 12 to 13 weeks, and even after working in these factories, they are ineligible for unemployment insurance. Imagine how you would feel in such a situation. It is not fun. The future is not too promising. Nevertheless, those are the situations facing people, fishermen and plant workers in the fishing industry. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will be sensitive to the needs of these people and will do the right thing so that the unemployment insurance bill does not punish the people in these regions.

• (1835)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, to return to Bill C-74, we will certainly continue to discuss it and, as I was saying, even though the bill will make some people and interest groups happy, we reserve the right to study it thoroughly and to make the required amendments and corrections.

[English]

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, as the minister pointed out, is designed to increase the fines for infractions of fishing regulations in particular, something which is supported generally. Certainly I have heard no reaction from anyone in the ministry opposed to this measure. Perhaps the only concern is that the fines we have had in the past have been almost ignored.

When I raised this one day with the minister in Question Period, he said that that was the fault of the judges. One has to wonder, then, if simply doubling the fines, or even increasing some of them tenfold, will really make any difference unless somehow or other the message gets across to the judges that it is important the fines provided for in the legislation be at least considered when fines are levied against offenders.

The minister also said that the fishermen as a group support the regulations and conservation. That has certainly been my experience in the time that I have been fisheries critic for the New Democrats. Fishermen as a group want the fish to be conserved. They do not want to lose the resource. I think that is probably the same in every resource industry that we have. The people working in those industries recognize the importance of preserving the resource, whether it is agriculture, forestry, or fisheries. They recognize it.

There is always the bad apple, of course, who will try to take advantage of the situation for personal gain, out of desperation, or for whatever reason. There are people who will step beyond the bounds. There have to be fines or legislation that will give the authorities the power to deal with that situation. Unless they are going to be supported by the courts—and this does not apply just to fisheries; it applies to many other activities—increasing the fines is not going to mean very much. Unfortunately that has been the experience so far.

When I spoke on this subject, again in Question Period one day, I quoted from several references to the effect that fisheries officers themselves are ignoring the regulations. They are not levying fines. There are examples of fisheries officers condoning and even encouraging the dumping of fish so as not to exceed the quota of a particular species. We have had reports from the east coast concerning observers turning a blind eye to what is happening. I will say a good deal more about that a little later in my remarks.

As the minister said, he has been in his present job for just over three months. One of the first things I was aware of that he did was he sent me an invitation to meet with him in Vancouver. That was within days, if not within hours, of his appointment as minister of fisheries. Perhaps it was even before I knew that he was appointed.

I received his invitation, but unfortunately was unable to attend. I did appreciate and made it known to him that I appreciated the fact that he was inviting me to meet with him in the west on my own ground, so to speak, where I could get some impression of him and his attitude toward the west coast fisheries.

More recently, when this legislation was introduced, an invitation came from his office to attend a briefing in his office on the amendments to the Fisheries Act and regulations. I was able to accept that invitation and attended. I appreciate the minister's invitation to so do.

He told us that since becoming minister he has worked to get to know the people in the fishing industry. I have spoken to fishermen and to people in the processing industry, the processors themselves on both coasts, and I give him credit for doing that. I know he has done that from my own experience and from the reports that I have received. The question is whether he is really listening to the fishermen with whom he is meeting. We can only hope that he is.

He said that it was not just a case of throwing money at the problem. There are other questions of rebuilding the stock. I think this is more serious on the east coast than on the west coast. We have some species problems in the west, but certainly nothing to compare with the dramatic events with respect to the northern cod. There is a real question and problem dealing with the sad, sorry and tremendous depletion of the cod stock resource off Newfoundland in particular.

The minister said that it was not enough to pour money in, that we had to rebuild the stock. The only way that we know of to rebuild the stock is to relieve the pressure on the stock; not just the fishing pressure but in part the fishing pressure. That is not just a matter of the people who are out there catching the fish. It is the technology. Over and over again when I travel to Newfoundland I hear complaints from the fishermen and the people in the fishing industry that it is the technology and the new kinds of equipment that are doing the damage.

Dr. Harris talked about this in part in his report. A group of us had people talk to us when we were in Newfoundland. One of the people in the fishing industry to whom I listened said that we had the technology now and within five years, unless the government really takes some drastic action, we could be looking for the last cod off the Grand Banks in Newfoundland. We have the equipment to find them. They tend to herd together. We also have the equipment to catch them, to pick them up, and to harvest them. So there will not be anything left, the way the pressure is going.

The scientists generally have been recommending that we cut our quotas drastically. Not just this government but also preceding governments, both Liberal and Conservative, have been very reluctant to reduce the quotas to the levels recommended by our own scientists because they did not want to inflict economic damage on the processing plants, the owners of the processing plants, perhaps even on the people working in the fishing industry, the fishermen, and the people working in the processing plants.

They were afraid of doing that politically and economically they did not want to do it, so they have been hoping that the fish would come back. If they failed to reduce the quotas to the extent that the scientists were saying, they were hoping that the scientists were wrong, they were hoping that the scientists did not have the information that they needed, and in blind faith they were hoping that the fish stocks would rebuild.

It is necessary to rebuild the stock. The minister is right in that regard, but it will not happen unless the government is prepared to take the drastic action recommended by Dr. Harris, by everyone who looks at the situation, and by the fishermen themselves. They have told me that the only way to relieve the pressure is to stop fishing in some areas. It is that serious. In some areas it is too late to stop fishing because there are no fish there to fish.

Off the southwest bank of Newfoundland, when I was visiting the communities there, I saw the boats coming in. I saw three boats that had made trips out, set 12,000 hooks, and caught nothing of commercial value. They caught two catfish and one very small cod that was not worth bringing back from 12,000 hooks in areas where they used to make a good living catching cod.

It is necessary to take some drastic action. However the point I want to make is that it is not only the regular fishing, but it is also the technology. The auto-trawlers seem to be able to scoop up everything and what they do not want they cast aside dead. They are destroying it, not because of the actions of the fishermen but because the government regulations have allowed this to happen, indeed have encouraged it. If we let one do it, we have to let another do it. We cannot apply different regulations to different vessels, different fishermen.

There has been a complaint that the foreigners, the Portuguese and the Spanish, are overfishing. I do not doubt that they are off the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. However, I was in Europe with members of the fisheries committee. When we told them what they were doing, they came right back at us and said that we were also overfishing the quotas set by our own scientists. The same scientists were setting the NAFO quotas and urging the Spanish and the Portuguese to do what they were telling us to do. We are overfishing. They are overfishing. Everybody is overfishing, and the stock is depleting in all areas.

Until we clean up our own act—and I know we are working at it but not fast enough or not well enough—it is pretty hard for us to go to some other country and say: "We want you to cut down on your overfishing. We want to keep going at the present rate ourselves, but you cut down on yours so that we can do a little more of it ourselves". It is not good enough, and it is not going to provide the kind of rebuilding of the stock the minister has talked about.

Conservation is the same thing in this instance. We have to conserve the stock. There is the danger of wiping it out. Those are not my words. Those are the words I hear in Newfoundland from the people who are talking and are knowledgeable about the industry.

I mentioned the high grading, the fact that in many cases dead fish are thrown overboard. There are observers on the boats, but this may be done while the observers are asleep. Or, who can tell? An observer might just feel that it is wise to turn a blind eye so that he does not find himself washed overboard during the night. It is a pretty desperate situation sometimes, and these were the fears that were voiced to me. I am not making this up. These fears were voiced to me in Newfoundland, that some observers sometimes do not dare deal too forcibly on the boats on which they are working.

The minister did not mention it today, but on other occasions I have heard talk about the under-utilized species and the fact that we should be making more use of some of them. I have said it before in the House and I will say again that one of the most under-utilized species, one that has tripled in numbers in the past seven or eight years, is the seal herd. No one really knows just how much fish it consumes. However they do know that it is eating some of the same food that the cod are eating, so it is certainly competing with the cod for food. It is also known that it is eating some of the cod, at least the nice soft cod belly. Most cod do not seem to get along very well without that portion of their anatomy, so they might as well be eating the whole cod.

Representatives of the industry in Newfoundland have come to Ottawa to encourage the government. The price for seal leather is so low right now that they need some kind of financial help to encourage the building of that industry. We should be making use of that resource in the same way that we are making use of the fish resource. Let us husband the fish resource by taking away some of the competition from the seals in particular.

Off the west coast the problems are different. In the same way that the problems on the east coast have been created by government's reluctance to set quotas that would deal seriously with the situation, on the west coast it is government action or inaction in a different way.

The Americans attacked us under GATT for some of the actions of our processing industry in buying salmon from U.S. fishermen off the Alaska waters and for enforcing regulations which state that our salmon and herring be landed in B.C. before they could be shipped anywhere else. They made that stick with GATT.

There was a way out. The industry, the union, and the people involved in the fishing industry at all levels urged the government to impose an export tax. That is GATT compatible. We support GATT, but that is GATT compatible. They could have imposed an export tax. The only reason I can imagine for the government not doing that was that it was waiting for the free trade agreement to come into effect so that it could then go to a free trade panel hearing and show everyone how well the free trade deal is working for Canada.

Whether that was what it planned or not, that is the route we took. We said that we need it for conservation purposes and for management of the resource, quite apart from maintaining employment in the industry. Several cabinet ministers, both past and present, guaranteed that there would not be job loss in the processing and in the fishing industry in B.C. as a result of the GATT attack and the free trade deal attack upon our landing regulations in B.C.

What were those guarantees worth? I remember Alex MacDonald of the B.C. legislature saying that a verbal promise is worth the paper it is written on, and that is all those promises by the government cabinet ministers were worth. They achieved nothing. The promises were totally worthless. One can only hope that they acted in good faith when they made these promises, but it certainly did not work out that way.

Nevertheless we went to the free trade panel which said that if we held back only 80 per cent and allowed 20 per cent to be exported it might be all right. Of course the Americans were not prepared to accept that. The Americans finally accepted 20 per cent for one year, then 25 per cent for the next three years, and then they would see what happens after that. There is no that question—and Carla Hills on behalf of the Americans has made it quite plain—that they want total, free, unrestricted access to all salmon and herring caught in B.C. waters.

I raised this matter with the minister in Question Period as well. His response was that the B.C. fishermen do not have to sell their catches to the American processors or to the American boats that are purchasing them. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is true.

I spoke at a fisheries union meeting in B.C. and said that the only way we were going to be able to stop the export of round salmon and round herring to the Americans was for the fishermen themselves to stop it. They are going to have to police their own organization and the people who do not belong to their organization, if there is going to be any control of the export of round salmon and round herring from B.C. to the Americans. They want it. They are going to get it. The government is going to stand idly by as has proven to be the case several times in the past 18 months.

It is going to let it happen. It does not really care. It is prepared to write it off. That appeared to be the case when it was negotiating the deal. That was one of the arguments that we used in the election campaign, one of the reasons B.C. sent 19 New Democrats to this Parliament, as opposed to about half that number before. It was the concern about what the free trade deal was going to do to us. The evidence is there that it is doing it. There seems to be no question about that.

The legislation before us is oriented primarily toward increasing the fines, and we can accept that. I have not heard any quarrels about that. As far as letting it go to second reading and to committee, we are in favour of that.

There are so many problems in the fishing industry associated not just with the fines but with the actions against which the fines will be levied that we want the legislative committee to take this legislation and go to the east coast and the west coast to listen to some input from the people who are working in the industry.

The minister says he has listened to some of it. I do not doubt that he has. As a member of the fisheries committee I want this legislation to be referred to committee, and at the end of the second reading stage I hope that will be the outcome. If the fisheries committee will travel to both coasts, it must listen to all people—the fishermen, those who work in the processing industry, and the people who are not organized in unions but are organized in associations or whatever.

It is important that when this legislation is passed that it have the support of the people working in the industry or it is not going to work. Even this legislation depends to a large extent upon the willingness of the people who are affected by it to observe the regulations. The best scenario would be for us never to collect a fine because there is never any infraction of the regulations. In the past our attitude has been to levy the fines or find people guilty and fine them a nominal amount which, as the minister said himself, is a licence to keep on doing what they have been doing.

The best scenario, as I say, would be to encourage people to live with the regulations. We must convince them that everyone is living within the regulations. If the fishermen themselves know that, they are going to accept it. They are that kind of people. However, if they know that there are other people getting away with it, it will encourage them to try and get away with it. The best scenario would be if we never collected a dime, but if there is an infraction we would collect an amount that will be a lesson to the person who went against the regulations in that instance. This would not only be a lesson to him, but it would convince the other people that the legislation and the fines are being taken seriously.

Under the provisions of the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act fines have been levied in the past against foreign vessels for infractions of regulations. When this act was being passed in this Parliament in 1985-86, the then fisheries critic for the New Democratic Party, the member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands, Jim Manly, raised the following points in a debate. Unfortunately what he said was quite prophetic.

He said that it was not enough for us to raise the maximum fine, that there had to be some way of getting the message through to the courts that they had to raise the level of fines they were imposing because in some parts of eastern Canada the courts were imposing very low fines when compared to the current maximum. If we are going to raise the maximum, we must send a message to our courts that the international fisheries violations are serious enough that they should be considering imposing the maximum fines in a number of those cases.

There is a range. There is a low and a maximum. The maximum is there so that the court, if it is convinced that it is in the interests of conserving that resource, can impose the maximum fine. They cannot go any higher but they can impose the maximum. To the best of my knowledge that has not been done, but there should be times when it would be considered at least.

It is not just that. Dr. Les Harris in his final report on the northern cod, issued just four months ago in February 1990, indicated that the warning given by Jim Manly was not one listened to by the present government. The provisions of the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act allow for severe penalties.

I quote from the Harris report in that regard: "However, in practice penalties have not even approached these levels. We cannot escape the feeling that the violation of fishery regulations are regarded as mere peccadilloes, as if the whole matter of enforcement were a game".

I have another point with respect to the fines and what is happening in this regard. On May 7, 1989, some 13 months ago, the federal government announced its long awaited adjustment package which was to address the crisis in the Atlantic fisheries. Contained in that package was a reference to the intention of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to increase its surveillance and enforcement capability.

At that time, as a member of the fisheries committee, I referred to the annual report of the DFO to the effect that it just did not have the capability to do the surveillance it was presently being asked to do, let alone increase it. It did not have the vessels or the personnel, and it was being cut back. It is being cut back again this year, according to the budget.

The minister tells us that he is going to increase the enforcement. He says that he is going to get the extra money, but he could not tell us from where it is coming. Is he going to get it by cutting back on some other service in DFO? Is he going to get new money given to him from the government? I doubt that very much. So far the government has not given any indication of backing down on any other of its cut-backs. Thus it seems unlikely that there will be no money.

It seems very unlikely that he is going to be able to get it by scrimping and saving within his ministry. I have great concern that as much as the minister may want to increase surveillance and enforcement he is not going to be able to do it. These increases in fines and penalties are going to look good on paper but will have very little effect because there just will not be the enforcement and the surveillance.

He announced in April that there was $28.5 million to be allocated for air surveillance. Now, unfortunately, we have seen privatization. We used to do this with the air tracker service from Summerside. That is gone, or going. So we are going to privatize it.

The entire air surveillance system will now be in the hands of the private sector. Now that of itself is not necessarily bad, but the minister himself in talking about observers said that with what he is doing now he is going to be able to hire DFO officials who will be the observers. The implication of that was that they are going to do a better job than the private staff, the people who were hired on a part-time basis or whatever to do the enforcement.

Certainly, as he put it to us in the fisheries committee, it was his opinion that it would be better to have trained officials, people who are dedicated to the work, determined to proceed efficiently with enforcing these regulations, so that it would be of service to the industry and the people working in it.

I wish to refer now to a document entitled Vision 2000 prepared by the Pacific Advisory Group. Unfortunately, this minister was not minister at the time of its preparation. I am hoping that it will not be his policy. That document clearly forecasts the erosion of the DFO. The activities of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans will be cut back.

That document states in part:

> The cost of Pacific fisheries management will have declined to 70 per cent of the level of the mid-1980s and will be totally recovered from the industry in increased fees and royalties—by the year 2010.

There is a system of levies being proposed for the east coast. The minister has talked about that.

• (1900)

I raise this question with him as well. He said: "If it is going to help the fishermen, if it is going to help the industry, then why should they not pay part of the cost at least, and perhaps even the whole cost?" This is not the time to go to the fishing industry and to the fishermen on the east coast and ask them to put more money into the pot. They are being laid off. In some cases, they are being told that the plant will never reopen.

The quotas are being cut year after year, and there is never enough to deal with the problem. There are going to be more cut-backs. How can the government ask the people who are trying to get by on very minimal incomes to pay more? Who knows what is going to happen with the UIC changes being held up across the hall? We cannot wait until they are ready to pay to do the kind of job that we have to do with the east coast fisheries, much less the west coast.

I mentioned the observer program. Bill C-74 talks about strengthening the observer program. In his final report, Dr. Harris found that: "Even in respect of vessels carrying Canadian observers, we have been informed by what seemed reliable sources, that under reporting of 25 per cent is not at all uncommon." Twenty-five per cent under even when we have observers. If there are no observers, then who knows? Certainly, the situation would not be any better. Again, it is bad apples that are spoiling it. But people are going to be encouraged to cheat when they know that others are getting away with it. Word gets around.

Appearing before the Senate fisheries committee in May, officials of the DFO acknowledged that observers who are charged with reporting and monitoring the activities of the fishing vessels of the large companies are paid by the industry. I found this out when I was in Newfoundland. They are employees of the industry. They are the processors. They are the very people who are going to benefit from the wrongdoing. The employer is the one who benefits if the employees are not doing a proper job of observing what is happening to the resource.

The master is paying the observer. What can one expect those people to do? If they do not do what the employer wants, they know they will be looking for another job. How can we get proper surveillance, proper control, proper management of the resource with that kind of situation?

Also in May, representatives of the trawlermen of Canso appeared before the Senate fisheries committee and described the failure of the observer program. They estimated that only 40 per cent of the observers are "honest, sincere, hard-working and caring" individuals. The minister is going to beef up the observer program. I ask: is doubling, tripling or quadrupling the observer program going to help if it continues working as in the past, unless there are going to be some changes?

That is when the minister brought in his proposal. They are going to be employees of the ministry who will do, in his opinion, a much better job of observing than has been the case in the past. Along with the observer program, the hope is that there will be a lot more technology used. That is good.

The suggestion of the federal government is that it will institute a full surveillance program that would include the use of transponder devices enabling DFO to monitor every movement of these vessels. On March 19, 1990, officials with DFO were saying that a pilot project was planned which would see up to 10 offshore vessels being outfitted with these devices.

However, according to the director of Atlantic operations, before there could be any wider application of this program "there would have to be a lot of consultation with the industry". The passage of Bill C-74 will turn a pilot project into permanent legal requirement, which may have to be accommodated regardless of consultation. We do not know.

In 1981, in a study prepared for the Economic Council of Canada on the public regulation of the commercial fishery, the role of technology was limited. "We are impressed with the important role that voluntary compliance must play if any schemes, including the present ones, are to be successful." Earlier in my remarks today, I made that point. That depends upon voluntary compliance and upon people being assured that the regulations are working and being observed, with proper fines to make sure the system is working.

Even with new technology such as automatic log books and electromagnetic transponders, it is more difficult to monitor compliance with rules on the high seas than elsewhere. With this in mind, we urge that control schemes will encourage voluntary observance and provide incentives for enforcement against third parties.

When the minister talked about fish habitat, he mentioned a small stream. Yes, there are small streams and certainly small streams do get impeded, people build small bridges and small roads. That is not the habitat that is really of great concern to people. The habitat on the west coast is being disturbed by industry.

You will recall when the minister of health and the previous minister of fisheries announced in the House the curtailment of the harvesting of clams and oysters from eight different sites on the coast of British Columbia because it was suspected that they had been polluted by the pulp mills and were not safe for human consumption.

At that time I tried to find out how serious it was. Was it safe to eat stocks already on hand in grocery stores and in homes? The response from the minister of health unfortunately was not satisfactory. He said he would not feed it to his grandchildren because he did not have any. That is not much comfort to the people on the west coast who might be wondering, is it safe to feed to their children? Unfortunately, I did not get a proper answer from the government and have not to date.

Pollution is serious on the west coast. We do not know how serious or how important this is. We do know that regulations are being imposed to make people and industries clean up their act. It is not just industry. The city of Victoria, for example, is dumping raw sewage into the Straits of Georgia. After all this time, the capital city of British Columbia is still dumping untreated sewage from the whole greater Victoria area, not just Victoria itself. Something has to be done to clean up that kind of pollution, as well as going after industry.

It is not just enough to talk about small bridges and small roads. We have to look at the larger picture. Doctor Harris indicates that while much of our fishery, specifically the offshore fishery, is conducted during the spawning season, other country's fisheries prohibit such activity, based upon the information available concerning that fishery. This is one of the problems I have been told exists with respect to the cod fishery in the Atlantic. The fish are being harvested during spawning season in the spawning areas.

In B.C. we know better than that. To the extent that we are able to control it, we do not let people harvest salmon in streams while they are spawning. But, apparently the cod is fair game because there is lots of them around. You find them. You go after them. It does not matter that they are spawning. That does not seem to be important.

Will the protection of the fish habitat apply to that kind of situation? We do not know how bad it is right now. We do not know how effective it is at decimating the cod population. We may find out something tomorrow. The fact is we do not know today and this legislation does not provide for it. The regulations are flexible enough that we can impose them upon this new situation, and to the extent that we get new information, one would hope that the regulations could accommodate the new situation.

We will support the legislation. We hope that the fines will mean something, that the judges will take cognizance of the fact that Parliament has thought it important to make dramatic increases in fines and levies. We hope that the observer program will work. We will be watching it. We wish the government would do something about the landing regulations in B.C. but that will only happen when there is a change in government.

Nevertheless, we support the legislation and are quite prepared to go to committee, have the committee listen to the people involved, the people that know what is going on in the fishing industry and the ones who can help make it work. Then we will pass it through the final stages.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is consent to call it ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.09 p.m.

UNION DES PRODUCTEURS AGRICOLES

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to pay tribute to the Union des producteurs agricoles on the 60th anniversary of its founding. For many years, the UPA has defended the interests of farmers in the region of Nicolet—Drummond—Bois Francs, and it has a great deal to be proud of.

With 225 officers working in 14 sectorial unions and 14 unions specialized in areas such as milk, beef cattle, eggs and so forth, the UPA's real challenge is defending the socio-economic interests of its 5,000 strong constituency. The Fédération de l'UPA de Nicolet is synonymous with the many services that have become available to producers over the years.

Mr. Speaker, this is thanks to the perseverance and energy of farm producers who take part of their precious time to defend the interests of other farmers, and I want to congratulate them for their dedication and the tremendous job they have done.

TRACADIE MILITARY CAMP

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, this week the commission responsible for examining the consequences of expanding the Tracadie military camp received the report on the environmental impact study prepared by National Defence.

After waiting for five years, residents of the region of Tracadie and Allardville—Saint-Sauveur are very worried, considering the many questions that have some unanswered.

We are all aware of the drawbacks of being near a firing range that would allow National Defence aircraft to train in low-level flying near inhabited areas.

The federal government should immediately identify, clearly and precisely, all the components for an economic development program for the region directly affected by this project.

I am willing to listen to all parties, but I repeat my commitment to the people of my riding: I will be the most difficult person to convince that expanding the Tracadie military camp is a good thing.

BILL C-21

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, today I rise to draw your attention to an article which appeared in The Financial Post on June 14, regarding Canada's jobless. It stated the statistics of Canada's contribution toward job training in relation to other industrialized countries.

Canada falls behind Germany, Japan, Britain and Italy, to name a few. I believe if the Senate was acting for the good of Canada, like it says it is, then it would pass Bill C-21 so that the government can begin to address the need to do more in the area of job training. Of course, this is only one area of concern that is being held up in the Senate.

I continue to hear from many expectant mothers who had planned to take advantage of the extended maternity leave benefits offered in Bill C-21. They are most upset that the stalling of the Senate is playing havoc with their lives and those of their unborn children.

The Senate's partisan gamesmanship is certainly not in the best interests of these mothers-to-be.

HERITAGE LANGUAGE CLASSES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, many members of Parliament have received letters and petitions from Canadians who are concerned about the funding cuts to heritage language classes.

I have here hundreds of letters from constituents which state that the total Secretary of State budget has been cut by only 5 per cent, but heritage schools have been cut by 100 per cent for a total of $4.1 million. There are 129,000 students across the country enrolled in heritage schools receiving instruction in 60 languages.

By cutting heritage language schools the government is destroying the most cost-effective program ever offered for the delivery of an effective language training program.

In Vancouver East over $138,000 has been cut from 30 heritage classes, many of which will have to close or charge a higher tuition fee making them inaccessible to children from low income families.

I call on the government to reinstate full funding for heritage language classes today.

WORLD CHILDREN'S FOLK FESTIVAL

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, from June 23 to July 1, the city of Beauport will host the 4th World Children's Folk Festival, a major event of the summer in the Quebec City area.

Nearly 100,000 spectators are expected to attend this great popular festival featuring ten young folk troupes from eight countries, including France, Mexico, Hungary, Colombia and the Soviet Union.

Today I would like to pay tribute to the organizers of this festival, especially to the president, Marc-André Touzin, and the hundreds of volunteers throughout the riding of Montmorency—Orléans who will house the 400 young dancers and singers who are to perform in a dazzling display of rhythm and colour until July 1.

Mr. Speaker, I invite the people of Montmorency—Orléans and all the Quebec City region to join in this great festival of children of the world.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, we witnessed the Prime Minister put on a pathetic performance in the House yesterday.

He tried to blame everyone in the country except himself for the Meech Lake mess. Well, he won't get away with it, Canadians will make sure of that.

Who decided to leave the First Ministers' Conference until it was too late? Was it the premier of Manitoba? No. Was it Sharon Carstairs? No. Was it the NDP leader in Manitoba? No. Was it Brian Mulroney? You betcha.

In fact, he admits the timing was all very deliberate. He said he rolled the dice. He bragged about it. He even gloated over it. Now we know the result. The Prime Minister blew it. He has made a complete and utter mess of Meech Lake.

It is time the Prime Minister stopped looking for scapegoats. It is time he accepted responsibility for his own actions. Canadians do not deserve such a poor performance from the Prime Minister.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the first nominee for the corporate welfare bum of the week is Consolidated HCI Holdings Corporation. It had profits of $20 million in 1988 without paying a penny of tax.

The second nominee is Cairn Capital Inc. which had profits of $17 million in 1988. For producing these profits, it received a tax credit of $243,000.

The third nominee is BMO NT Financial Corporation. It did not pay any tax on profits of $8 million in 1988.

The envelope, please.

And the winner is: From these financial corporations that play shell games, the winner is BMO NT Financial, because the "NT" stands for "no tax". BMO NT Financial is the corporate welfare bum of the week.

VETERANS' BENEFITS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Veterans Affairs announced that maximum rates payable for funeral expense assistance for eligible veterans has been increased from $2,000 to $2,940, a 50 per cent increase.

This announcement is yet more positive news. Hon. members will recall that last week the Department of Veterans Affairs signed an agreement with British Columbia for 200 long-term beds for veterans worth up to $35 million.

In addition to this, there will be increased income protection for spouses of veterans who are in long-term care centres, a special trust fund for the benefit of needy veterans, using moneys left unclaimed on the death of a veteran, payment of attendance allowance to widows for one year after the death of a veteran, and interest on moneys administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs on behalf of veterans.

These continuing improvements are evidence of this government's high regard for veterans and their families.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this month and the following summer months in Prince Edward Island will be exciting times for Islanders.

Numerous festivals and events across the province will take place to celebrate the heritage and tradition of the Island.

From Anne of Green Gables to our Malpeque oysters to fresh lobsters and potatoes, the Island has so much to offer.

Visitors keep coming back because the quality and richness of Island life is hard to match.

Islanders make visitors feel at home. Our glorious beaches and beautiful landscape make it even harder to leave.

1990-91 is special in the tourism industry as we remember our rich Celtic heritage and celebrate a special Irish homecoming. The theme for this celebration is We're Akin to Ireland.

I would like to take this opportunity to invite my fellow colleagues on all sides of the House to come to Prince Edward Island and enjoy one of the world's greatest Islands.

CITY OF AMOS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for several months, the Mayor of Amos, Jean-Paul Veilleux, council members and the general manager, Réal Bordeleau, have been trying to obtain justice from CN with respect to renewal of the lease for a community parking lot.

The City of Amos does not agree with the rent increases proposed by CN management; it considers them to be excessive and unfair. The City of Amos is prepared to accept a normal rent increase based on the cost of living, especially since the city receives no revenue from this community parking lot.

Once again, CN property management in Montreal show that they could not care less about the people of Amos by charging an exorbitant price for this community parking lot.

Mr. Speaker, I ask CN property management to consider the request of the City of Amos for the welfare of the people of Amos and surrounding areas.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to Dr. Helen Graves, organizer of the 1990 Comparative Political Internship Program and the 26 university students from Michigan who have worked with us in Parliament as our interns since May 9.

For the record, these interns are: Nawal Amori, Jennifer Bednar, Paul Berg, Kristen Brown, Lee Columbino, Renu Daga, Darrell Donakowski, Jeremy Efroymson, Elizabeth Gnegy, Jodi Goldman, James Green,

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, as our constitutional problems unfold, Canadians are rightly asking how we got into this mess. The people in my riding, like the rest of Canadians, do not understand all that is happening. I do not understand it either. It leaves me frustrated and angry. I want my country back; I want my country back from the extremists; I want it back from the regionalists; I want it back from the special interest groups; I think all Canadians want their country back right now.

Premier Peterson said in Newfoundland this morning that what unites us is our ability to solve problems, not to create them.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious, it is common sense, it is now time for all Canadians to say: Long live Quebec! Long live Canada! Our country first and foremost!

[English]

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the critical path which the Prime Minister established for resolving the constitutional impasse continues to unfold, I would like to ask him for an update on developments in Newfoundland and Manitoba.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the latest developments of which I am aware are that Premier Peterson accepted the invitation of the premier of Newfoundland and Labrador to visit the Newfoundland and Labrador House of Assembly this morning.

I believe I can fairly say that he made one of the most impressive speeches that has been my pleasure to listen to on behalf of the unity of Canada and the desirability of passing Meech Lake.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: It was clearly an accurate statement because the member for Willowdale is in agreement.

It was a most impressive statement in which Premier Peterson, who had participated at the 1987 Meech Lake Agreement, and then the 1990 agreement, brought forward arguments on behalf of the unity of Canada and the compelling and urgent nature of concluding Meech Lake so that the country could move on to other important matters such as aboriginal concerns that we wish to deal with on an urgent and comprehensive basis. I understand that Premier McKenna is before the legislature in Newfoundland and Labrador as we speak.

My hon. friend will remember that Premier McKenna was the first to have some reservations about Meech Lake, but those were fully satisfied in the meetings in Ottawa 10 days ago. He went back, and the legislature of New Brunswick passed the Meech Lake Accord, bringing the number to eight legislatures representing 94 per cent of the population of Canada that, as of this moment, have already passed the Meech Lake Accord. I think that is very good and encouraging news.

With regard to Manitoba, I understand that the House is meeting, or will be meeting very shortly. I know that there is a unique situation in Manitoba because of the difficulties inherent in a minority situation. It has the only one that exists in a legislature in Canada. So there have been special problems for Premier Filmon and for Mrs. Carstairs and Mr. Doer that we recognize and seek to accommodate. I think on behalf of all Canadians, and in the same spirit of generosity that Premier Peterson put forward this morning in Newfoundland and Labrador, we simply ask the leaders of the three parties in Manitoba to please, on behalf of Canada, make an extra effort to make sure that the Meech Lake Accord is ratified.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, considering the very real problems with the time frame in Manitoba, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has considered the various suggestions that have been made for extending the deadline for ratifying the accord, and whether he sees any possible solutions?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I can say in a non-critical way without any recrimination, I think it is probably fair to say, at least the reports were, that the problem 11 days ago originated from a procedural fault in the introduction of the original motion. That was used to delay by some 10 or 11 days consideration of this important matter by the legislature of Manitoba.

Human mistakes do occur everywhere. They occur in this Parliament, they occur in all freely elected Parliaments. But, it is our belief that this flaw of procedure can be corrected. I believe the premier and the two other leaders wish to have it corrected and that there is time under the rules of the Manitoba legislature to correct this situation and to move on and to cause that legislature to do within the timeframe, namely, before the twenty-third, what legislatures are elected to do, to be seized of a problem and to vote it either up or vote it down.

I believe that if it comes to the Manitoba legislature for a vote, pursuant to the undertakings given by the three leaders that the Manitoba legislature will substantially support the Meech Lake Accord with the companion resolution because of what it does for Canadian unity and what it does for aboriginal justice in Canada.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, certainly no one in this House denies the importance of solving the problem. Can we take it from the answer the Prime Minister has given that the government, having examined all of the various proposals made for ways of extending the deadline, is not able to propose any way which would be effective for doing that?

I want to ask the Prime Minister further whether he is prepared to meet with aboriginal leaders to see if he can earn their co-operation in seeing the constitutional impasse resolved?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend asks about extending the deadline. I have just tried to indicate to him that the present deadline suffices. Irrespective of the fact that the Manitoba legislature has already lost 11 days from what appears to have been a defect in the procedure in the bringing in of the resolution on June 11 after the signing ceremony, it is our advice that under the rules of the Manitoba legislature, if the three party leaders and the three parties are in agreement, while time is short, it can be done. It should not be forgotten that the Manitoba legislature and the people of Manitoba have had and have taken a great deal of time by committee to consider the implications of Meech Lake over many months prior to June of this year. There have been very extensive public hearings held on Meech Lake already. Under the rules of the Manitoba legislature, we are informed that the Meech Lake Accord could indeed be passed by the twenty-third with ample time left for public hearings in respect of the companion resolution which would ensure that all Manitobans are heard again, if need be, on the implications of the companion resolution.

It should never be forgotten that full and complete hearings have already been held on the Meech Lake Accord. Meech Lake, we are told, could be passed within the present time frames. There would be ample opportunity for public participation in respect of the companion resolution and so Canada would conserve and strengthen its unity and Manitoba would have done its duty toward the people of Manitoba by ensuring that they are heard again in respect of all the considerations in the companion resolution.

CANADA DAY CELEBRATIONS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. I want to ask if it is now a condition for getting a grant for Canada Day celebrations that a mayor or other official must have their picture taken with the local Tory MP. In this respect, has the minister received a complaint from Mayor Steve Olynik of Greenfield Park in Quebec that the member of Parliament for Saint-Hubert made such a request, made such a condition for delivering the Canada Day cheque? Does the minister think that this sort of behaviour is consistent with the spirit of Canada Day?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, there were some 270 projects approved by a remarkable Canada Day committee under the chair of Mrs. Geraldine Doucet.

The committee worked very hard and I think brought forward some very excellent proposals which were all, of course, approved and will bring great credit to our ability to celebrate together a very important Canada Day.

From what I understand, there were on some rare instances, opportunities for an MP to deliver some of the larger cheques. I am not fully conversant with how all of this takes place, nor am I really conversant with what took place between the mayor and the MP. I personally have not spoken to the mayor. He has not called me on the subject.

I will certainly look into the matter and get back to the member at my earliest convenience.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister when he or his department decided to have these cheques delivered by local Conservative MPs instead of having them mailed, and why is he making assistance for Canada's national day into a partisan act? What is the rationale for this abhorrent policy?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the committee operated in a very honourable fashion and examined all of the projects that were brought forward. Those projects were all approved by this independent, impartial committee and it is my understanding that all of the projects that will go forward will be carried out with a great deal of enthusiasm and will be very helpful in celebrating Canada Day this year in the country.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Last week, the Prime Minister admitted he had planned the countdown, rolled the dice and then convinced first New Brunswick, then Manitoba, and finally Newfoundland. Clearly, his plan has fizzled. I therefore want to ask the Prime Minister when he will show some leadership. What is he going to do next? What are his plans today? Canada deserves a definite reply today!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, inadvertently, the hon. member misrepresented what I said because she refused to go on and quote the rest, when I said we had no intention of isolating anyone, and that we proceeded this way because it seemed reasonable to do so, and because by doing so, we were pursuing the fundamental goal of Canada's unity. In any case, you have to have some idea where you are going when you get involved in complex negotiations, and we abided by some very important principles which were hailed as such, not only by the hon. member but also by other members of her political party, following the successful outcome on June 9.

Today, the hon. member is asking me about our plans for the future. I can inform the Leader of the New Democratic Party that we remain confident that MPPs in Newfoundland and Manitoba, who still have enough time, will agree to vote for the Meech Lake Accord. There will be a vote Thursday evening or Friday morning in Newfoundland. According to the Standing Orders of the Manitoba legislature, they still have enough time to proceed with the required vote. I am therefore confident that the leaders of the three political parties in Manitoba and the premier and the Leader of the Opposition in Newfoundland and Labrador will ensure that these votes take place, so that Canada will be able to preserve and reinforce its unity by the evening of the 23rd.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister talks about the confidence he has in other legislatures to take the action to further the constitutional process. I would then have to question the Prime Minister as to why his government wants to bring forward a resolution today that talks about exerting influence on those legislatures, if he has such confidence.

The Prime Minister talks about what Manitoba can do, and I want to remind the Prime Minister that the agreement that was signed on June 9 by the premier of Manitoba, clearly states underneath the premier of Manitoba's signature: "subject to the public hearing process". I will further draw to the Prime Minister's attention the Standing Orders of Manitoba which state:

> (2) Prior to the sixth day of debate on such a motion, that motion shall be referred to a Standing or Special Committee of the House ordered to receive submissions from the general public and to report back to the House.

Clearly Manitoba has Standing Orders, and I guess the Prime Minister is asking Manitoba to break this agreement.

Is the Prime Minister saying, by his comments today and by the resolution he wants to bring forward, that Manitoba should break its own rules and the rules that the premier signed with the agreement of June 9, 1990?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not want Manitoba or anyone to break any rules. I indicated to the member from Toronto in an earlier exchange that it was the view of the Government of Canada that, notwithstanding the fact that 11 days have already been lost because of a procedural defect in the introduction of the original motion, there still remains under the rules of the Manitoba legislature time to pass the Meech Lake Accord by June 23.

That is not just the view of the government. I would point out to my hon. friend that on June 11 in the Winnipeg Free Press the NDP House leader stated:

> The rules for dealing with constitutional amendments are quite clear, (NDP House leader Steve) Ashton said, adding none of the votes in the process require unanimous consent—
> A simple majority vote is required to move the legislature into committee, he said.

Since that time there has been paralysis in the Manitoba legislature, not because of anything that has been done by my hon. friend or a member of this House. But I ask her to reread the statements made by the House leader of the NDP who said on the 11th that a majority was all that was required, the implication being that one person could not and should not be allowed to hold up such an important, vital, national matter.

My hon. friend asks a question about the matter coming for consideration before the House this afternoon. On October 6, 1983 the then Prime Minister of the day introduced a resolution in this House which concluded with the House inviting the government and Legislative Assembly of Manitoba to take action as expeditiously as possible in order to fulfil their constitutional obligations and protect effectively the rights of the French speaking minority of the province.

On February 24, 1984 the same government introduced another resolution which concluded with the House urging the Government of Manitoba to persist in its efforts to fulfil the constitutional obligations of the province and protect effectively the rights of its French speaking minority, and so on.

This is not an intrusion into the rights of a legislature of another jurisdiction. This is simply, with ample precedent to guide us, the Parliament of Canada saying to the nation and saying respectfully to the legislators in Manitoba that "there is a most serious constitutional matter before the nation. You have it within your power to resolve this matter within the time frames of the 23rd, and please, in the interests of Canadian unity, use your best efforts to make sure that it is done".

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister would like to quote from 1983, I too would like to quote from 1983 from a book entitled Where I Stand by the Prime Minister, in which he said that he was concerned about the constitutional process and he felt that the debate should be open to the public at all times. He stated:

> There would be no sessions behind closed doors.

At that time the Prime Minister also stated:

> The test of great leadership is to harmonize divergent views into an eloquent and thoughtful declaration of national purpose.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I can understand the government wanting to applaud because I think any of us could applaud that fine statement. But I want to ask the Prime Minister: in order to live up to those fine words, what is rthe Prime Minister's plan now? We are now just a couple of days away from the deadline. Canadians have a right to know what is the plan of the leader of the country for the constitution of the country.

Mr. Gauthier: You have answered that.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend, the member from Vanier, says that I answered that and he is quite right, but I will be happy to try again.

I should tell my hon. friend that I thank her for that quote. It was one of the finer ones.

I want to tell my hon. friend that the resolutions from Mr. Trudeau and his colleagues, supported by the member for Winnipeg South Centre, then Winnipeg—Fort Garry, led the debate on both of these important resolutions.

• (1440)

I supported both of these resolutions because I thought it was important that the Parliament of Canada send a signal, however respectful, to the legislature of Manitoba or to any other legislature that in the national interest the time had come to act to protect minority rights, and in this case, to help bring about a more united Canada.

I think it is entirely appropriate that this be done by the Parliament of Canada. That is what we are here for, to speak for Canada, and now is the time for all Canadians to speak for Canada.

I tell my hon. friend that one of the things she might do, and I say this respectfully, is to call the member of the Manitoba legislature of her own political persuasion, Mr. Doer, who is doing a tremendous job, and call the others who may have doubts and ask them in the national interest to support Meech Lake so that we can move to questions of aboriginal justice.

PORT OF MONTREAL

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister and it concerns the administration of the Montreal Port Authority.

The Prime Minister will know of reports whereby the insurance firm of Charbonneau Dulude acting as consultants for the port authority recommended the awarding of a contract to Pratte–Morrissette, a company having as chairman one of the partners of the consulting firm recommending the award of the contract to start with.

Has the Prime Minister verified these allegations? Is he satisfied that the Parliament of Canada Act and the spirit of the conflict of interest rules have been strictly adhered to?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I read the same article in The Globe and Mail today, and quite frankly, I saw nothing in it that would cause me to believe that there had been any conflict of interest or that the insurance contracts in question went to anybody other than the lowest bidder back in 1984 when, as my hon. friend knows, there was a Liberal administration in the land up until September 4, 1984. My hon. friend knows those contracts were let before September 4, 1984. I see no reason to go back into my hon. friend's administration to investigate.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Transport or the Deputy Prime Minister the following supplementary question in the same regard.

This is the third time in less than a week that the Port of Montreal Corporation has been the subject of controversy for the way it awards contracts, for its purchasing policy and, earlier last week, for wasting public funds.

I would like to ask the government opposite if they are prepared to ask the Auditor General of Canada to investigate the contracting and administration policy of the Port of Montreal Corporation.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend should appreciate that we realize that there were three articles coming forward. We thought if there had been anything to them they would have come forward last week. Obviously they have come forward in a progression. The question has been asked one day and not followed up the next day.

My hon. friend will know that Ports Canada and the Port of Montreal are fully audited by professional auditing firms and that they in the course of their audit would report to the audit committee of the port in question. They found no irregularities.

We see no reason to cause a witch-hunt to take place, and under the circumstances we are fully satisfied.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

In its report tabled Monday the Tory dominated House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations denounced the Government Information Bureau on the GST as having an impossible, time consuming and costly task.

Will the minister show respect toward the consumers of Canada and simply call off this ridiculous and excessively expensive PR job that members of his own party disagree with and that now clearly lacks credibility?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised by the hon. member's comment. I have here the report that was tabled by the standing committee and I would just like to quote the summary, Mr. Speaker, where it says that the committee believes that competition and consumer information are the best assurances of protection from business people who might abuse the GST. That is exactly what the government has done.

A little further, it says: "The government should subsidize an independent body with full power to educate consumers on the effects of the GST on prices with the elimination of existing federal sales taxes. This body would be composed of representatives from business and consumer groups; of limited size, it would be active for a short period and should be profitable."

Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what we have done.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

By accepting his position, Mr. Nickolas Murray clearly put himself in conflict of interest. Given his lack of judgment—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bellemare: —and therefore lack of credibility, should the government not at least now withdraw his appointment as chairman of the government's GST information office?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I find it quite inappropriate for a member of this House to accuse here in this Chamber the chairman who just resigned from the Consumers Association of Canada.

Mr. Boudria: Why did he resign?

Mr. Gauthier: Why did he resign? Tell us why.

Mr. Blais: He worked on behalf of consumers, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Boudria: He was dismissed!

Mr. Blais: —for fourteen years. The hon. member should especially look at the work Mr. Murray did for fourteen years. The government appointed him chairman of the information office because it believed he was able to protect consumers' interests over the next year and a half as he did in the past fourteen years, Mr. Speaker.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Prime Minister. His government's February budget launched another in a series of vicious, ideological attacks on aboriginal peoples and brutally slashed the government's program for native peoples in this country.

How can the Prime Minister now blame aboriginal leaders for delaying approval of the Constitutional Accord? Does he not see that their position is a direct consequence of his actions in the February budget?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I think my hon. friend would want to correct a serious misstatement. I never once blamed the aboriginal peoples for anything. I have believed from the very beginning that, if anything, the aboriginal peoples were, are and continue to be victims of historic injustice which this nation must seek to correct.

As a result of which, my hon. friend will recognize that this year the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will have a budget of in excess of $3.5 billion, up nearly $200 million from last year, and total funding for aboriginal peoples from all departments will be over $4 billion, which is the largest amount ever expended in history by the Government of Canada, and we plan to do more each year on behalf of the aboriginal peoples.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister says that the native people in this country have been victimized for years and years. How does he expect cutting their media budget this year will reverse that victimization? How does he expect cutting programs for their language retention and for their cultural organizations will reverse that victimization? How does he expect that cutting the funds for their representative organizations, which also assist natives in making representations to constitutional debates, is going to reverse that victimization?

He did blame Phil Fontaine of the Manitoba Chiefs yesterday.

When the roll of the dice was taking place, did the Prime Minister expect that the native people of this country would be paying the price?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary. My hon. friend continues to do a disservice to the facts by suggesting that I blamed Chief Phil Fontaine. I did no such thing and the record will sustain what I have just said. I also said that the Manitoba Métis Federation, representing approximately 80,000 native Manitobans, on June 18 actively supported and called on the Manitoba Legislature to stop the procedural blockage of the resolution. I quote Mr. Dumas who stated: "We have considered the latest undertaking by the Prime Minister and believe it is now in our interests more than at any time in the past, that we take advantage of the provisions now before us which are possible following the approval of the accord".

• (1450)

The Manitoba Métis Federation is calling on the Manitoba legislature to pass it now because there are untold benefits to come from the proposals.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): What about aboriginal organizations in this country? What about the cuts?

Mr. McKnight: What about the SFIN? Check the SFIN.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to my hon. friend that the Government of Canada now expends in excess of $4 billion a year, up $200 million from last year.

My friend talks about communications programs. Let me talk to him about the negotiations which led to the final agreements with the Dene-Métis on their comprehensive land claim, and others in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. The Government of Canada has concluded all of these agreements—

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): What about money for representative organizations?

Mr. Mulroney: I ask my hon. friend to listen to this. The Arctic claims will put 575,000 square kilometres of land firmly and irrevocably under Indian and Inuit ownership and transfer $1.3 billion to the native peoples of Canada, making the natives the largest single land holders on the North American territory. That is what they wanted. That was refused for decades.

As Le Devoir states this morning, and my hon. friend should listen to this—

"By saying no to Brian Mulroney, the Manitoba chiefs have turned down the only hand that was seriously extended to them in six years. The Conservatives have an undeserved reputation as shallow, unscrupulous business people, but it was under their administration that the historic wrongs done to native people began to be righted. It is Brian Mulroney, 'the company lawyer' who gave back to northerners the land that Mr. Trudeau, 'the father of the Charter', reserved for the oil companies."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, and it is about a problem that will not go away, and that is the sale of Route Canada.

The records indicate that the workers are owed over $9 million. Will the minister offer some assistance to all of those workers and their families who are deprived of their economic livelihood because of the failure of this company?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of the question not going away. It is just that my hon. friend keeps repeating the question. There is nothing new in the question my hon. friend asks.

The bankruptcy trustee is in a position to look after the employees of the company. The government is not in a position to do that for every company. In fact, we have no reason to believe that the bankruptcy trustee is not looking after the interests of the company with respect to wage settlements, vacation pay and pension entitlements.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, at the invitation of the minister last week, I went to the bankruptcy trustee and the records indicate that Revenue Canada, as the Minister of National Revenue stated yesterday, is almost all paid up. Royal Trust has been paid well over $38 million. The Royal Bank has been paid in excess of $15 million and Triathlon Leasing has been paid millions. It seems that all of the lawyers and the trustees and the receivers are being paid their legal fees and there is close to $9 million owing the workers.

The question is very simple, Mr. Speaker. Will the government that is supposed to be showing care and compassion for the workers of this country show some care and compassion for the workers of Route Canada and reimburse them for their lost wages, their seniority and their pension benefits?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada will respect its obligations under the law, as my hon. friend would expect. We do not change the law retroactively to look after one company or another in accordance with my hon. friend's wishes.

I understand that prior to the bankruptcy employees received all wages owing and vacation pay to labour code standards. They were owed pay in lieu of notice and severance pay pursuant to the labour code and also extra vacation pay.

Labour Canada has advised the bankruptcy trustee of labour code indebtedness and the employees are being represented by their unions in the bankruptcy proceedings.

In other words, we have lived up to our obligations as the Government of Canada, as we are expected to, and we are waiting until the bankruptcy is wound up to see what other obligations there are.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for Science. This week, the National Research Council announced sweeping organizational changes without yet having made public its five-year plan for the council.

We know that the minister has had that plan in his possession for over a month now. Will he explain to the House why he is holding up the NRC five-year plan, and why has a major reorganization of the council been announced without a long term plan in place?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the organizational changes at the National Research Council are meant to strengthen their ability to do research and to do long-term directed research, which is what I understand the member really wishes to have.

With respect to the five-year plan, I do have that plan in my possession. I have asked for some very minor changes. I hope the council will agree to those very shortly.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary concerning the NRC's Industrial Research Assistance Program, which has an outstanding record and is probably a perfect example of government assistance to research in the private sector. However, when it brought down its budget, the government decided to turn subsidies to businesses into loans. Could the minister give the House the assurance that this decision will not affect IRAP and that the NRC will remain in charge of this program?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, IRAP will stay with the National Research Council.

Mr. Manley: As a grant?

NATIVE LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the question of land claims in northern Canada and other parts of Canada were raised earlier in the Question Period today, I wonder if the Prime Minister could clarify the question of the status of some of the land claims that have been dealt with recently and the direction that they are moving currently.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have reached with the natives an unprecedented number of agreements. There was an agreement in principle with the Council of Yukon Indians on their comprehensive land claim in March of 1989, and then a final agreement in March 1990. In April of 1990, there was an agreement in principle with the Inuit of the Northwest Territories.

The native land claims go to the heart of the fundamental and historic grievances of the native peoples in Canada. By way of illustration, the Arctic claims put 575,000 square kilometres of land firmly and irrevocably under Indian and Inuit ownership and transfer more than $1.3 billion to the communities. Together the land area passing into Indian and Inuit ownership is more than the combined areas of the four Atlantic provinces, and will make northern natives the largest land owners in North America.

In addition, these three agreements contain arrangements for a guaranteed native share in land and resource management outside of the areas of ownership.

I wish to make two final points. In the proposal that was made to the natives this week, a fundamental and historic grievance was dealt with when the government undertook to resolve the joint definition of treaty rights and the establishment of a royal commission on native affairs of the stature and the impact of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

This could bring historic changes to the native peoples. It is to be built on a 50–50 proposal, 50 per cent native, 50 per cent named by the Government of Canada. The chairman is to be sought from among distinguished Canadians, my own preference being someone with a long–lasting knowledge of this issue, and although presently occupied, I hope that we would be able to persuade him to accept the chairmanship of this historic royal commission into native affairs, namely, the Hon. Ed Broadbent.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the best thing, it seems to me, that the Prime Minister could do at this time to help the situation would be to begin to admit to himself and the nation that he has been part of the problem, rather than part of the solution.

I ask the Prime Minister whether he remembers the resolutions that he recalled in the House today of 1983 and 1984 in which this Parliament was asked to pass a resolution, and did, with respect to Manitoba, that these resolutions did not have the desired effect, that they were counterproductive. The Prime Minister does not mention that. He does not mention that what he is trying today did not work in the past.

When will the Prime Minister stop misrepresenting the history of these kinds of resolutions and when will he stop misrepresenting the situation in Manitoba. The leadership of Manitoba signed the document here in Ottawa a week or so ago subject to political hearings, subject to public hearings. It is right in the document and yet the Prime Minister gives the impression that that is not the case.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not misrepresented a single thing in regard to the resolutions of 1983 or 1984. I indicated that they were brought in by Prime Minister Trudeau. I believe they were supported by all parties and that was the extent of the comment. I indicated that they were designed to encourage the Legislature of Manitoba to take cognizance of a very important problem and to pass something pursuant to an undertaking.

I can remember my discussions with Premier Pawley at that time. I was the new Leader of the Opposition. I had discussions with Prime Minister Trudeau, with Mr. Broadbent and Premier Pawley. Premier Pawley felt very strongly that it would be appropriate and helpful for the Parliament of Canada to speak out on that issue at that time, which is why I was honoured to be able to rise, as the new Leader of the Opposition, and commit the entire support of the Progressive Conservative opposition to the proposal brought forward by Prime Minister Trudeau.

We seek to be helpful. We are not seeking to exacerbate any difficulties whatsoever. I think, however, it is appropriate that the Parliament of Canada have an opportunity to speak out, not with nastiness, not with malice, but to try to encourage fellow Canadians to understand that there is a most serious matter in play and that we have a unique opportunity between now and Saturday to bring Canada together in a firm and unequivocal manner that will make all Manitobans and all Canadians proud of our citizenship.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the point is that the Prime Minister was only telling half the story with respect to 1983 and 1984.

If he really wants to be helpful—

An hon. member: What were you doing, Bill?

Mr. Blaikie: I do not need any lectures about standing up for Canada. I am not the one who sold the country out in the free trade agreement. I am not—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister, instead of recounting history partially, instead of bragging, instead of being so full of himself, why does he not meet—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Papineau—St. Michel.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Today, a number of countries decided to boycott the inauguration of the new Romanian president, Mr. Ion Iliescu. Since it is now clear that the election in Romania was marred by many irregularities and that the new government may be as dictatorial as the previous one, what explanation does the Prime Minister have for Canada's decision to approve this brutal regime by attending today's ceremonies? And will the government continue its CANDU program, after two Canadian MPs who visited that country made it abundantly clear that there were incredible problems to be overcome before the program could become operational?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel knows perfectly well, about a year or a year and a half ago, the Canadian government, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, was one of the most vigourous critics of the former administration in Romania. And at the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, Canada was one of the countries that spoke out most vigorously against the previous regime. We assisted the democratic process, but we are also disturbed about certain developments. The state of democracy in that country remains precarious, and we are doing everything we can to ensure that the positions taken by Parliament are respected by the administration in Bucharest.

The hon. member's comments are well taken, and I can assure him that we will be consulting actively with the opposition parties on this important question, and he may rest assured that we will always continue to abide by the basic principles that have always governed Canada's international stance in this particular area.

FIFTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present to the House of Commons the fifteenth report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT (FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS) ASSISTANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-322, an act to amend the International Development (Financial Institutions) Assistance Act.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to ensure that Canadian representatives on multilateral development organizations such as the IMF and the World Bank cannot vote in favour of any project unless there has been an environmental impact assessment done of the project and unless that assessment has been made available to members of the public.

This bill was patterned after a similar bill in the U.S. House of Representatives, the Pelosi bill, and is meant as a means of ensuring some accountability and good judgment on the part of these Canadian representatives.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of a number of people from Kamloops, British Columbia, who are very concerned about the government's intention to move ahead on the proposed goods and services tax. Although 80 per cent of Canadians oppose the tax, the petitioners point out there are various objections to the tax and ask that the tax be dropped, or that the Liberals in the Senate vote against the tax this afternoon, and defeat it that way.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in another petition I have, the people are concerned about the government's cut-backs to VIA Rail and are asking for full passenger rail service to be implemented.

CANADA POST

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition from people in Westwold, British Columbia. They point out that their town has been in existence more than 100 years, and that the government has closed another post office when the post office indicates that they received a profit last year of $149 million. They feel this is wrong and that these profits are being built on the backs of communities like Westwold, British Columbia, and consider it to be very undemocratic and, quite frankly, anti-western Canadian.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have here a petition from several hundred workers, most of them residents of Hearst, Ontario, a petition that, like so many others, is against the GST.

Your petitioners say that the goods and services tax proposed by the Minister of Finance is an unfair form of taxation because it does not consider the ability of taxpayers to pay.

I wish to table this petition, and I hope the government will listen.

[English]

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to rise once again pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present this petition.

The constituents are asking me to present this petition in opposition to the goods and services tax. They point out that they are very aware of the unfair taxation system in our country, and are asking the Parliament of Canada, both the House of Commons and the Senate to kill the bill, so that there can be a system of taxation introduced that respects all Canadians and does not favour the favourites of the government.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present five petitions, signed by some 235 persons, which have been approved by the Clerk of Petitions as being correct in form and content. Some 45 of the petitioners come from the constituency of Kootenay West—Revelstoke, approximately 150 from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and another 40 from Edmonton, Alberta.

They are petitioning Parliament to reject—and Parliament of course includes the Senate—the government's proposal for a goods and services tax. Instead, the petitioners are suggesting that we reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations. They ask that Parliament ensure there is no tax on goods and services such as hair cuts, fast food, piano lessons, skating lessons, and other non-luxury items. They ask that the government cease with the proposal which will tax diapers and coffins, taxing Canadians from the cradle to the grave.

CANADA POST

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have one further petition signed by some 340 persons from the community of Robson, British Columbia, in my constituency of Kootenay West—Revelstoke. That is virtually every home within the community of Robson.

These petitioners have pointed out that the existing full service post office in Robson fills all the postal needs of the people in that community, whereas other types of services that have been proposed offer only reduced service from that which is now enjoyed, and the interests of the community can best be served by maintaining the existing or equivalent postal service.

They ask the Parliament of Canada to urge that the existing essential postal service in Robson be maintained, at least until such time as there is a bridge built to replace the Columbia River ferry that has been abandoned.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have seven petitions to submit to the House today with approximately, as close as I could count, 1,500 additional names. I might add that this brings to a total of 337 the number of petitions that I have submitted on behalf of residents of Okanagan—Shuswap against the goods and services tax, with over 16,900 signatures or approximately 32 per cent of the registered voters in the constituency.

They are calling upon the government to reject the goods and services tax as an unfair and Draconian tax measure. They are asking the government to ensure that there is a process of fair tax reform that will provide a healthy climate for future economic growth in Canada.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to stand, pursuant to Standing Order 36, and once more present a petition against the goods and services tax.

This particular petition is signed by quite a number of residents of Kapuskasing, Ontario, and I add their signatures to those of thousands of others that I presented before the House. People have not given up the possibility that this government will come to its senses, stop the goods and services tax and bring in a tax that is fairer for all Canadians.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. The attached petition is certified as correct.

The petitioners think that the Minister of Finance's proposed goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because of the lack of regard for taxpayers' ability to pay. The government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place, which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax, while forcing lower and middle-income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden. The government is now trying to tax reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels. Whereupon the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and honour to table petitions from Hill View, Newfoundland, and other parts of Canada.

The petitioners argue against the proposed GST. They strongly oppose this tax. They claim that it is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and it will hit them with higher taxes, higher interest rates, higher unemployment and higher inflation. We already see that the unions in their negotiations are building in protection against the 7 per cent GST.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition from people in many parts of Ontario who are concerned that the government's proposed goods and services tax is unfair, especially because it does not address the unfair taxation system currently in place, which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax while forcing lower and middle-income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

Therefore, they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations to ensure that when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab. Therefore, they ask the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden to ordinary Canadians through this regressive consumption tax.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of residents of Vancouver, British Columbia. Interestingly enough, it was signed before the present constitutional crisis in Manitoba.

Whereas the government, through the Department of the Secretary of State, has eliminated funding to the Native Communications Program thereby eliminating 11 aboriginal newspapers, two magazines and the National Aboriginal Communications Society; and whereas the department has also reduced funding to the Northern Native Broadcast Access Program by 16 per cent, thereby cutting back the possibility of aboriginal television and radio to reach people.

The petitioners ask for the reinstatement both of the Native Communications Program and the Northern Native Broadcast Access Program at full level funding, and pray that the Secretary of State conduct consultations with the groups funded under the program to devise plans for the future that will serve the needs of the department as well as the aboriginal people and their media.

I am pleased to table this petition. I hope the Prime Minister is listening to it.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions from several hundred petitioners from communities throughout the Algoma-Manitoulin area, including Gore Bay, Chelmsford, Manitowaning, Richard's Landing and Blind River, in which the petitioners make representations to the government concerning the planned reduction in housekeeping services to veterans and substantially increasing the cost of long-term care. The petitioners note that veterans have already given service to their country and call on these budgetary measures to be rejected by the House of Commons.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the persons who signed this petition would have been dismayed to witness the government's callous disregard of the Senate attempt to solve the unemployment insurance problem that they have petitioned Parliament about in the form of Bill S-17, which was defeated at first reading by the government members the other day.

The petitioners are concerned about the cuts in the unemployment insurance program in Canada and they petition Parliament to reject cuts in that program. They urge the government to propose more meaningful reforms, concentrating on labour force development strategies and a full employment policy with effective regional development policies.

I submit that these petitioners, all from the province of Newfoundland, have a legitimate grievance that they present to this Parliament and would ask the government to agree to the Senate amendments to Bill C-21 and get the bill passed promptly.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a number of petitions from my constituents who oppose the goods and services tax.

[Translation]

They are vigorously opposed to the new goods and services tax because it constitutes an unprecedented attack against the incomes of Canadians and will not only force them to pay higher taxes but also expose them to higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition that has been certified correct as to form by the Clerk of Petitions.

This petition was signed by approximately 50 individuals from all parts of Canada. I think it is safe to assume, given the subject matter of the petition, that they were riding VIA Rail.

They call upon Parliament to maintain VIA Rail's national network and to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment. They want a passenger train act giving VIA Rail a firm legislative mandate and a revised costing arrangement with the railway companies. They have joined with Transport 2000 and Rural Dignity of Canada in order to obtain justice and satisfaction to legitimate demands.

I suspect that those people who are riding the Much Music VIA Rail train will also be sending in these petitions.

UKRAINIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first one calls upon the government to acknowledge the injustices done to Ukrainian Canadians during the First World War and after.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the second petition concerns Mr. Yih-Sheh Leo and his situation in Taiwan and calls upon the Government of Canada to take several measures.

EXPENDITURES ON R, D&D, ENERGY EFFICIENCY AND ALTERNATIVE ENERGY

Question No. 293—Ms. Callbeck:

For each year since 1984, has the government contributed in cash or through preferential tax treatment, to (a) research (b) exploration (c) development (d) each of any other aspects of energy and alternative forms of energy (e) energy efficiency and conservation and, if so, what amounts and, in each case, leading to what economic spinoffs, including job creation, and how do these expenditures compare to those made in (i) Europe (ii) Japan (iii) the United States?

Hon. Jack Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): (a)–(e) See attached tables.

The major benefit of federal government expenditures on Research, Development and Demonstration (R, D&D), energy efficiency and alternative energy has been the conventional energy fuel expenditures saved. For example, about $9 billion per year in conventional energy expenditures have been estimated as being saved as a result of consumers' response to energy price increases and efficiency and alternative energy program activities since 1973. This corresponds to a saving of about 20–25 percent in the nation's annual fuel bill. The government's expenditures on R, D&D have contributed significantly towards this goal by developing more technically and commercially attractive products and technologies. In addition, these expenditures have contributed towards the country's energy diversity, in part by reducing the use of oil/oil products and by exploiting viable energy alternatives to oil/oil products. For example, the contribution of renewable energy (excluding large scale hydro) to Canada's primary energy supply has increased from about 4 percent in 1975 to about 7 percent in 1986. The equivalent oil value of this energy is almost $2 billion per year.

The major spinoff associated with efficiency and alernative energy expenditures has been in terms of the economic activity generated. In less than ten years, Canada has established an impressive array of diversified energy management and renewable energy companies. This industry is comprised of approximately 4,500 firms, employing 77,000 Canadians with annual sales of about $7.5 billion. While several of these firms are small, the employment and sales are well distributed across the country. In general, this industry is relatively labour intensive. A 1987 consultant study concluded that an expenditure of about $38,200 (1984 dollars) generated one person–year of employment in the energy management industry. For the period 1978 to 1984, approximately 142,200 person–years of employment were generated as a result of energy management investments of the seven specific areas studied.

PREPARATION OF THE DOMESTIC SUBSTANCES LIST AS REQUIRED BY THE CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION ACT

Question No. 299—Mrs. Gaffney:

1. Has the government awarded a contract to the American Chemical Society of Columbus, Ohio entitled "Preparation of the Domestic Substances List as Required by the Canadian Environmental Protection Act" and, if so (a) for what amount (b) did any Canadian companies bid on this contract and, if so, which ones (c) was the American Chemical Society the lowest bidder and, if so, what was (i) their bid (ii) the bid of each of the other bidders (d) was there a call for tenders and, if so (i) in what location (ii) at what time was it announced?

2. To the knowledge of the government, does the American Chemical Society possess any specialized expertise or knowledge of "Canadian domestic substances" beyond that which would be found in Canadian companies and, if so, of what kind?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (Acting Minister of the Environment): 1. Yes.

a) Environment Canada has awarded, on a sole-source basis, a $1.8 M contract (Preparation of the Domestic Substances List (DSL) as required by the Canadian Environmental Protection Act) to the Chemical Abstracts Services (CAS) of the American Chemical Society to assist with a very specialized requirement.

b) No

c) N/A

d) No

2. The use of the Chemical Abstracts Services (CAS) is necessitated by the recommendation of the Consultative Committee that the Domestic Substances List (DSL) be formatted on the basis of Chemical Abstracts Registry Numbers and Chemical Abstracts nomenclature. Industry was particularly insistent on this point. Chemical manufacturers and importers now operate in a global market and, consequently, it is important that any Canadian regulatory scheme identify substances in a manner consistent with that of our major trading partners, particularly the United States and Europe. Chemical Abstracts Services has been asked to evaluate the name of each substance accepted for the Domestic Substances List in order to validate nomenclature and registry number acceptability. As the originators and owners of the Chemical Abstracts Services Registry Number system, only Chemical Abstracts Services can certify substance name/registry name equivalency and, when necessary, generate new numbers.

Chemicals Abstracts Services is not tasked with the provision of any information relative to the import, manufacture, use, distribution or availability of substances with Canada.

Background Information

Environment Canada is in the process of building the Domestic Substances List (DSL) required for the Canadian Environmental Protection Act (CEPA). Until this list is finalized, the new substance notification provisions of the Act can not be implemented.

In compiling the DSL, the Department has adhered as closely as possible to the recommendations of the Environmental Contaminants Act Amendments Consultative Commitee, a multistakeholder consultation group consisting of representatives of the federal government, the provinces, labour, industry and non-governmental environmental interest groups. Accordingly, all substances considered for the DSL are based on nominations submitted by Canadian industry. Environment Canada evaluates these submissions to determine their consistency with statutory and administrative criteria for inclusion on the list. Consequently, Canadian industry and the Department jointly determine the ultimate contents of the DSL.

In order that the Domestic Substances List (DSL) required by the Canadian Environmental Protection Act (CEPA) be prepared as expeditiously as possible, Environment Canada has contracted Chemical Abstracts Service (CAS) of Columbus, Ohio to assist in its compilation.

Environment Canada is committed to formatting the DSL in terms of CAS Registry Numbers and substance names structured according to CA nomenclature rules. As CAS is the originator of the CAS numbering system, it would be impossible to proceed without their involvement.

CAS has also advised Environment Canada on approaches to the collecting and compiling of DSL data and is assisting with the development of publication procedures.

Five contracts ($3.8 M total) have been awarded to CAS on a sole-source basis.

CAS has a unique experience in the area of chemical substances inventory development as a result of its participation, as prime contractor, in the two main inventory exercises that have been carried in the world so far, namely in the U.S.A. (U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, Washington) and in Europe (Commission of European Communities, Brussels).

Environment Canada has been advised by both these agencies that the involvement of CAS in the Canadian inventory project must be viewed as a necessary and essential condition for the success of the exercise and the credibility of its output.

One country, Australia, has attempted to prepare a similar list without the benefit of outside expertise. The effort has been in progress for four years and has been less than successful. To our knowledge, the level of expertise and highly qualified assistance required to build the DSL is not available from any other source, neither in Canada nor elsewhere.

The comprehensive assessment process specified in CEPA for new substances, imported into or manufactured in Canada, cannot be implemented until this list is completed.

CAS is owned by the American Chemical Society and operates on a non-profit basis.

INDIAN POLICING POLICY REVIEW

Question No. 301—Mr. Nault

1. Can the government provide the specific details of any consultation process to be undertaken with respect to the Indian Policing Policy Review Report and, if so, what are they?

2. Can the government provide the total cost of the Report, including (a) salaries and travel of public servants involved from all departments (b) translation, design and printing (c) distribution and, if so, what is it?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1) In February 1990, the Task Force Report on Indian Policing Policy was sent by the then Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Honourable Kim Campbell to the chiefs and councillors of Indian bands across Canada indicating that there would be another round of consultations with the organizations contacted and other interested parties. The letter also invited comments. Subsequently, a letter was sent by the Assistant Deputy Minister of Indian Services to the people involved in the development of the report: tribal, provincial and other Indian organizations; police commissions; chiefs of Indian police forces; RCMP commanding officers located at detachments across Canada; and solicitors general and other provincial ministries involved in Indian or policing matters. This letter indicated that consultations on the implications of the principles and conclusions of the report would begin this spring.

The first of the consultations were held in Halifax, with the chiefs from the four Atlantic Provinces (May 9) and in Toronto (May 10) with the representatives of the Province of Ontario and the Ontario First Nation organizations.

The consultation process is being co-ordinated through the Indian Affairs regional offices in the provinces and territories. The timetable is still being developed. The process will involve meetings across Canada with the Indian, provincial and federal representatives involved in the development of the report as well as other interested parties. To date DIAND has received three written responses to the report.

2) The estimated cost of the report is as follows:

$23,100.00 -Travel for cross-country consultations variously involving a representative of the Ministry of the Solicitor General, the RCMP, the Department of Justice and 2-3 DIAND representatives.*

$51,900.00 -Contract to prepare draft findings.

$43,825.15 -Translation, design and printing of report.

$2,371.88 -Distribution.

*To serve on a Task Force forms part of the duties of a public servant, therefore there are no additional salary costs associated with this task.

FUNDS, GRANTS OR CONTRIBUTIONS TO "MANITOBANS FOR MEECH LAKE"

Question No. 303—Miss Grey (Beaver River):

Has the government provided, directly or indirectly through any Crown Corporation, funding or any grants or contributions to an organization called "Manitobans for Meech Lake", headed by Mr. Patrick Riley of Winnipeg, Manitoba?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): To the best knowledge of the Government: No.

CANADIAN EMBASSY IN WASHINGTON

Question No. 306—Mrs. Gaffney:

1. In the Canadian embassy in Washington, D.C., has renovating and redecorating been done since the appointment of Mr. Derek H. Burney as ambassador and, if so (a) what work has been done (b) what is the cost of each of the renovations and redecorations?

2. Is there any art in the Canadian embassy in Washington, D.C. donated by Imperial Oil and, if so (a) what is the estimated value of the art (b) in what locations is it displayed in the Embassy (c) who is allowed to view it?

Right Hon. Charles Joseph Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Burney was appointed Ambassador in January 1989. The new Embassy building was not open at that time. The first staff moved into the building in February 1989 and the official opening was held in May. A great deal of work remained to be done to complete the building even after occupancy began. This work was in conformity with the specifications of the project. In the period January 1989 to the present, the total costs have amounted to $1,350,940.

The Canadian Embassy in Washington has been the beneficiary of loans and donations of Canadian art from Imperial Oil and 15 other Canadian corporations or individuals. In addition, Canadian corporations are actively sponsoring exhibitions of Canadian art and artifacts in the Embassy Gallery (and the Canada Room) and performances by Canadian artists in the Embassy theatre.

The art is distributed throughout the Embassy, together with works commissioned/purchased by the Government. The Imperial Oil collection is featured in the dining room on the sixth floor where it can be seen by guests at breakfast, lunch, dinner and receptions. As it is on loan to the government, the value is not known by the government.

PENSIONS

Question No. 312—Mr. Harvard:

The 1985 Budgetary pamphlet entitled "Securing Economic Renewal, IMPROVED PENSIONS FOR CANADIANS", on page 7, regarding survivor benefits, said "that benefit will be no less than 60 percent of the full pension that was being paid;—": does the current benefit level conform to that statement and, if not (a) what is it (b) if it is less than 60 percent of the full pension, are there particular reasons that it has not been adjusted to the 60 percent rate, and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Michael Holcombe Wilson (Minister of Finance): The Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985, which came into effect on January 1, 1987 established new minimum standards for federally-regulated pension plans. It included a requirement that pension plans provide a survivor benefit. Hence, since January 1, 1987, the pension benefit paid to a plan member or former member who has a spouse at the time the pension benefit commences, must be in the form of a joint and survivor pension benefit. Plans are allowed to reduce benefits on the death of either spouse to an amount not less than 60 per cent of the amount payable when both were alive. Further, the plan sponsor is permitted to reduce the initial pension benefit payable provided that the actuarial present value of the benefit in joint and survivor form is no less than the actuarial present value of the unreduced initial pension benefit payable in the normal form provided by the plan. At the same time, plans may be more generous, i.e., have no reductions on first death, have no actuarial adjustment for the joint and survivor provision, etc.

A plan member or former member may elect to receive pension benefits as though there were no spouse. This option requires, however, that in cases where such an election would reduce the pension benefit on the death of the plan member or former member to an amount less than 60 per cent of the amount which would have been payable if both spouses were still alive, that the non-member spouse sign an agreement which effectively waives his/her entitlement to a joint and survivor pension benefit. This written agreement must be deposited with the pension plan administrator.

In cases where a separation or divorce has taken place, a pension plan may provide for the payment of a joint and survivor pension benefit as two separate pensions. When this occurs, the actuarial present value of the two pensions must not be less than the actuarial present value of the joint and survivor pension benefit.

In cases where a plan member or former member dies before becoming eligible for early retirement, the surviving spouse is entitled to that portion of the pension benefit credit to which the plan member or former member would have been entitled to on the day of death, (calculated as though termination of employment and not death had occured) and attributable to that member or former member's membership in the plan after December 31, 1986. A pension plan may provide for an immediate pension benefit equal to or greater than what is provided by the pension benefit credit just described. Where a member or former member of a pension plan died before payments begin but after becoming eligible for retirement, the person is deemed to have retired for purposes of the survivor benefit and to have been entitled to a joint survivor pension benefit.

In cases where the surviving spouse is entitled to a payment under a group life insurance plan on the death of a spouse, the pension benefit payable may be reduced by an amount equal to that part of the group life insurance payment that can be considered to have been paid by employer premiums. There are two conditions placed on this reduction: the actuarial present value of the reduction may not be greater than the amount of the payment to which the surviving spouse is entitled under the group life insurance plan; and if the pension plan is a contributory one, the reduction may not lower the benefit payable to the surviving spouse to an amount which is less than the member's required contributions plus interest.

When the new act came into effect on January 1, 1987, plan sponsors were given a period of grace to actually re-draft the texts of their plans, providing they gave an undertaking to make the benefit changes effective to the date of the new act. Hence, the new provisions of the act are now in place.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Motion for the Production of Papers No. 16.

GOVERNMENT TRAVEL

Motion No. 16—Mr. Milliken

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all receipts for DND Administrative Flight Services used by Ministers of the Crown during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1988, together with all correspondence concerning such flights, the dates, times, costs and duration of each such flight, the origin and destination thereof, the names of all persons on each flight and the reason for the use of the government aircraft.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the President of the Treasury Board stated in the House on October 24, 1989, the present practice of reporting ministerial travel expenses was established by a cabinet decision in 1963 and has been followed by every successive government.

Under new guidelines announced by the President of the Treasury Board in the House of Commons on October 24, 1989, the Comptroller General of Canada will make available on a regular basis: (a) travel expenses of each minister, (b) the number of times that each minister used the government aircraft, (c) the date, the itinerary and the names of all passengers on each trip in a government aircraft, (d) the reason for the use of the government aircraft, (e) the cost of the government aircraft.

The system is in place as of April 1, 1990. When completed, the first quarterly report will be made available through the Comptroller General's office.

Regarding the use of government aircraft during the period from November 1988 to August 1989, 220 trips were made totalling 1,413.2 hours of flight.

The first report was tabled under this on, I believe, June 18, 1990. I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion or to transfer it for debate.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the material requested in this Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers was the same material asked for by the Auditor General in the preparation of his report to Parliament.

I do not feel the request is an unreasonable one. Since the government is refusing to disclose this very important information, I have no alternative but to ask that the matter be transferred for debate. I say that the stonewalling should stop.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 97(1), transferred for debate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before we finish Routine Proceedings, there have been discussions among the three parties as well as the independents of the House. I believe you will find unanimous consent for the following motion to take effect tonight after the House adjourns at the conclusion of its debates.

The motion is this:

That the sitting be suspended until the Call of the Chair;

That, when the sitting is resumed pursuant to this Order, the House shall revert, if requested by the Government, to Routine Proceedings and, otherwise, shall consider Government Orders;

That, if at any time during the suspension of the sitting the Government so requests, the Clerk may publish a Special Notice Paper and, notwithstanding any Standing Order, no later than twelve hours after any notice shall have been given, the Government shall be deemed to have leave to proceed with it; and

That, if at 11.59 p.m. on Monday, June 25, 1990, the sitting has not been resumed pursuant to this Order, the House shall be deemed to have been adjourned until 11 a.m. on Tuesday, June 26, 1990.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I just want to indicate that we have been involved in the consultations. I am advised by the staff of the NDP caucus that we are to say yes to this motion because they would like us out of their hair for a while.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I think I was somewhat instrumental in getting that order to the House. I would like to thank the government and the members of the New Democratic Party for their graciousness in allowing for the Liberal caucus to attend a very important convention in Calgary, choosing the next Prime Minister of this country. For that I thank them very much.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary referred to discussions among party leaders and others. I think he mentioned independents. I am not sure just exactly, and that is why I say "others". Also, I am very glad the government has brought forward this motion to heed to the convention that we have had in this House since the Second World War to pay respects to national conventions, be they of the Liberal Party, the NDP, the Conservative Party.

I was also getting irritated when I read some of the statements of my House leader about why we were going to sit the rest of the week when we could not do a crazy thing anyway about some of the problems that affect the nation.

I am very glad we are using common sense in this case. I certainly think the motion should carry with all the qualifications imposed by the parliamentary secretary.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I am in agreement with that. I would like some clarification, although I appreciate the logistics of the 12-hour clause.

I am wondering what may be made available for those of us who live farther than 12 hours away to get back to Ottawa in an emergency situation, if that arises.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, being one of those members who lives farther from this august institution than does the hon. member, I know the problems of which she speaks.

We will do everything in our power to assist members in the event that the House is called back for any reason. I can also assure members that we will do all in our power to make certain that there is adequate notice.

Under the conditions of the convention and other items, we do feel that it is important that we have this time slot available, just to provide the House with the opportunity to deal with important issues of the day.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestions which have been called both modest and full of common sense.

Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

POINT OF ORDER

PROCEDURE IN DEBATE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, before we begin Orders of the Day, there have been consultations among the parties and it has been agreed that it would be appropriate, if a party wishes, to split its 20-minute speeches and 10-minute question and comment periods among members.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that there have been those discussions. We have no problem with any party splitting its time.

However, I want to indicate at this time that the government, certainly in the initial stages, will be using the full time allotted to each speaker.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to give my support to this proposal.

Of course, I wish I had all my caucus members here and could say the same thing, that we would like to share time, but we will take up the required 20 minutes plus 10 minutes for questions after the first round.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987

RATIFICATION BY MANITOBA AND NEWFOUNDLAND LEGISLATURES

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved:

That:

Whereas the Prime Minister of Canada and ten Premiers reached an agreement in principle at Meech Lake on April 30, 1987;

And whereas eleven First Ministers of Canada signed the 1987 Constitutional Accord on June 3, 1987;

And whereas the House of Commons has twice adopted the Constitution Amendment, 1987;

And whereas by June 3, 1990, seven legislative assemblies representing 91 per cent of the population of Canada had also authorized the proclamation of the Constitutional Amendment, 1987;

And whereas in the light of the national debate over three years and public hearings by the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons, and hearings in Prince Edward Island, Ontario, New Brunswick and Manitoba, and hearings by the Special Committee of the House of Commons on New Brunswick's proposed Companion Resolution, concerns of Canadians have been identified;

And whereas First Ministers met on June 3, 1990 to address the concerns of Canadians and determine the basis for completing the ratification of the Constitution Amendment, 1987;

And whereas First Ministers reached the 1990 Constitutional Agreement on June 9, 1990 which committed the Premiers of New Brunswick, Manitoba and Newfoundland to submit the Constitution Amendment, 1987 for appropriate legislative or public consideration and to use every possible effort to achieve a decision prior to June 23, 1990;

And whereas the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick unanimously authorized the Constitution Amendment, 1987 on June 15, 1990;

And whereas eight Legislative Assemblies representing 94 per cent of the population of Canada have now authorized the proclamation of the Constitution Amendment, 1987;

And whereas the Legislative Assemblies of Manitoba and Newfoundland have not yet authorized the Constitution Amendment, 1987;

And whereas it is important for the elected members of the Legislative Assemblies of Manitoba and Newfoundland to exercise their role under the terms of Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 and to vote on the Constitution Amendment, 1987;

the House urges the Manitoba and Newfoundland Legislative Assemblies to exert efforts to bring about full ratification of the Constitution Amendment, 1987 by June 23, 1990, so that Canadians can complete an important act of nation-building and thereby open the process for Canada's future constitutional development, including the important issues of Senate reform, of aboriginal rights and linguistic rights, of territorial participation in the federation, and of providing a process for a continuing review of the operation of the Constitution of Canada.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to introduce a resolution urging the Manitoba and Newfoundland legislative assemblies to exert all possible efforts to bring about the full ratification of the Meech Lake Accord by June 23, 1990.

By doing so, as the resolution states, Canadians can complete an important act of nation building and thereby open the process for Canada's future constitutional development, including the important issues of Senate reform, of aboriginal rights and linguistic rights, of territorial participation in the federation, and of providing a process for a continuing review of the operation of the Constitution of Canada.

As Minister of Justice it has been my pleasure and privilege to speak to Canadians many times about the Meech Lake Accord but, as I have said before in this House, I first came to speak about the Meech Lake Accord as a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of British Columbia. In June 1987, when the final version of the accord was initialled, I was a member of my province's legislature. At that time I welcomed the Meech Lake Accord, and in the ensuing three years I have continued to believe in and to support the accord. I continue to believe that it is important for my province, for western Canada, and for Canada as a whole.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, the accord has been a subject about which there has been a great deal of public mystification. As often as possible I have tried to demystify it. I believed in 1987, as I do now, that the Meech Lake Accord is good for all of Canada. As a British Columbian, I believe it is good for western Canada.

[Translation]

The Meech Lake Accord brings Quebec back into the Canadian family under very reasonable conditions. It puts an end to the bitterness and ostracism experienced by Quebec since the patriation of the Constitution in 1982, and makes Quebec a full-fledged Canadian province.

The Meech Lake Accord paves the way to a stronger Canada in which the federal government will work with stronger provinces, not against them, and in which all provinces will be treated equally.

The Meech Lake Accord recognizes the distinct identity of Quebec society within Canada. It gives the provinces a voice in federal institutions such as the Supreme Court. It confirms the power of the Canadian government to establish new shared-cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction and the right of the provinces to withdraw from such programs and receive reasonable compensation, provided they offer their own programs on a basis compatible with national programs.

[English]

The Meech Lake Accord recognizes the need to move on to the next phase of our constitutional reform, to close out the agenda of the 1980s so that we can get on with the agenda of the 1990s.

I believe passionately and deeply in the importance of the accord as a device for enabling us to continue the kind of nation building that has created the most extraordinary country in the world today.

The accord will allow us to deal with the kind of problems and issues that a dynamic society like Canada constantly faces with each new generation.

I also believe that failure of the accord would be deeply injurious to the future of our country. That is not to say that the accord is perfect and could not be improved.

Indeed, at the recent first ministers' meeting, Meech Lake was improved as a result of proposals put forward by Manitoba, Newfoundland, and New Brunswick and the negotiations of all First Ministers.

Newfoundlanders and Manitobans have every reason to be proud of the contributions that they have made to this process.

As a British Columbian, I am keenly aware of the vital importance of Senate reform to western Canada. It is clearly of great importance to many Canadians in Atlantic Canada as well. The Meech Lake Accord guarantees Senate reform will be on the agenda at annual conferences on the Constitution.

Pursuant to the 1990 constitutional agreement, Senate reform based on agreed objectives will now be the key constitutional priority. The process will be accelerated and an intergovernmental commission will hold hearings based on objectives approved by all First Ministers, leading to a First Ministers' Conference on Senate reform by the end of this year.

If Senate reform is not achieved by June 1, 1995, the representation of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Newfoundland in the Senate will automatically rise from six to eight.

As Premier Filmon noted, this provides a commitment to Senate reform every bit as strong as the commitment that was originally given to Quebec for the current round of constitutional negotiations.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, another important issue discussed at the First Ministers' meeting was incorporating in the Constitution a general clause stating the fundamental characteristics of Canada.

The First Ministers made a thorough review of this question and took note of repeated and unsuccessful attempts over the past twenty years to draft a clause that would satisfy all concerned.

Finally, they agreed to refer drafts submitted by the federal government and Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Ontario and British Columbia to an all-party Special Committee for public hearings.

Premier Filmon called this "a major step forward" and noted that we now have "an open process that allows Canadians to actively participate in the definition of their national identity".

At the urging of Manitoba and Newfoundland, First Ministers also re-examined the distinct society clause and, in particular, its relation to charter rights and its impact on the distribution of powers.

The view of the federal government and the vast majority of legal experts has always been that inclusion of the distinct society clause in the accord does not endanger charter rights or alter the distribution of powers, as some have claimed.

Reassurance was provided by six eminent jurists that charter rights will not be infringed or denied by the linguistic duality distinct society clause, and that the clause will not create new legislative authority for Parliament or any provincial legislature.

The 1990 agreement also improves the possibilities for resolution of the concerns of the aboriginal peoples. As minister responsible for aboriginal constitutional matters, I restate this government's commitment to completing unfinished business in this area. As we stated in the last Speech from the Throne, aboriginal matters will be among the government's top constitutional priorities following ratification of the accord.

If all governments sit down at the same table and break the constitutional impasse, the accord will make it possible to achieve progress on the constitutional amendments required to meet the native people's concerns.

Furthermore, as a result of the agreement reached in 1990, it will be possible to establish a separate constitutional process for native peoples; a constitutional conference of first ministers will be held every three years, the first one in the year following proclamation of the Accord.

Obviously, the solution to questions affecting native people is closely tied to passage of the Meech Lake Accord.

[English]

Its failure is the real threat to making progress on aboriginal matters and on other important constitutional matters, as our present constitutional impasse would continue and the environment for constitutional discussions would likely be polluted for many years.

The consequences of the failure of the Meech Lake Accord should not be overstated, but neither should they be ignored.

I am deeply concerned that many people across Canada underestimate the effect of the rejection of the accord. Three times in the last decade—in the referendum, at Meech Lake, and most recently at the first ministers' meeting, Quebecers have said "yes" to Canada.

[Translation]

In 1980, Quebecers voted strongly for Canada. Imagine their disappointment when an agreement was negotiated in 1982 without their signature, without the province that is the homeland of one of the two founding peoples of this country.

Quebec's constitutional proposals are the most modest ever put forward in modern times.

Two provinces have yet to ratify the Meech Lake Accord and time is almost up. We are at a turning point in our national life and the stakes are high, very high.

We are at a critical period in our history. Without the accord, our existence as a united country and our will to continue to live together will be in question.

We do not want to leave this problem as an inheritance to the next generation of Canadians; we do not have the right to do that.

[English]

Let us not jeopardize the gains made in the Meech Lake Accord and the 1990 constitutional agreement. More important, let us not jeopardize the future viability of our nation.

It has struck me in the course of the public debate about the Meech Lake Accord how young we are as a nation when it comes to constitutional amendment. It is only since the repatriation of the Constitution in 1981 that Canadians have had the opportunity to enter into this process in a serious way and that the final decision about amendments to our Constitution has lain in the hands of our own governments.

The amending formula that was part of the repatriated Constitution in 1982 requires that constitutional amendments be put into effect through a ratification process in the legislatures of this country. The process leading up to the Meech Lake Accord is perhaps the first serious, nation-wide use of the process that came to us through the 1981 constitutional repatriation.

We have discovered in this process that there are difficulties with it. In the course of the negotiation of the Meech Lake Accord and the process that arose after it leading to the negotiation of the companion resolution just recently, there have been critics who have said that the process is not sufficiently open, who have criticized the meetings of First Ministers in attempting to come to a solution to our constitutional problems.

We face before us a challenge of trying to reconcile, on the one hand, the desire of Canadians to participate broadly in the constitutional process and, on the other hand, the requirements of the Constitution that at some point consensus be reached and ratified through the legislative processes in the Parliaments of the nation and the provinces.

This requires that at some point during the process responsible, accountable, political leaders must take the responsibility to articulate what they have heard from Canadians in resolutions and present those resolutions before the legislatures.

Clearly, for constitutional amendments to take effect, those resolutions must be similarly worded in all of the legislatures of the country. Therefore, there has to be consensus reached among First Ministers as to precisely what they will present to their legislatures.

We have learned a great deal from the process leading to the Meech Lake Accord and the companion resolution. I believe that the challenge of trying to reconcile these two broad concerns, on the one hand to be able to use effectively the amending process set out in the 1981 Constitution to achieve constitutional gains through the ratification of amendments by our legislatures and, on the other hand, to involve a broad range of Canadians, will be a challenge that will continue to be with us for some time ahead.

But what I find most difficult to understand about the process since the ratification of Meech Lake is the concern of some Canadians to somehow deal at once with every issue of constitutional reform that faces us as a country.

We are new to this process. In many ways we are children in the area of constitutional development. This has not been something that we have had solely in our hands for a long period of time in our country, unlike many of our neighbours and associates around the world. So we have to learn that there are processes of setting an agenda, of establishing priorities, of dealing with issues one at a time and gradually, over the years, building a corpus of a made-in-Canada Constitution.

My concern is that many Canadians have lost sight of precisely what it was that the Meech Lake Accord was intended to accomplish. The Meech Lake Accord is in many ways a small chapter in Canadian constitutional development. The Meech Lake Accord was designed to address a very specific problem, and that was the exclusion of Quebec from the constitutional process in 1981.

My own province was a very active participant in the negotiations leading to the repatriation of the Constitution. In fact, my province and other western provinces were very strongly concerned about the implications of a repatriated Constitution on the ability of those provincial governments to continue to operate.

There was much concern in the early 1980s about the effect of an entrenched Charter of Rights, for example, particularly the effect of that Charter of Rights to impose upon the prerogatives that under our system of parliamentary supremacy had been so important to the Parliaments of Canada's provinces.

So, in the impasse that existed around the repatriation of the Constitution, there was a deadlock at that time as well. My province, the province of British Columbia, contributed very significantly to breaking that deadlock when it brought to Ottawa an expert in constitutional matters who devised the compromise which was at that time the nothwithstanding clause.

For my province, as well as others, the notwithstanding clause was the key to reassuring them that the patriation of the Constitution of Canada and the entrenchment of the Charter would not infringe upon their legislative prerogatives.

Mr. Speaker, we may have a different view about the notwithstanding clause now, but in the early 1980s it was hailed by many as a great and classic Canadian compromise, notwithstanding the fact that it permitted provincial legislatures and the Government of Canada to clearly override charter rights.

I believe that at the time, because it permitted repatriation of the Constitution and permitted the beginning of a process that has matured us in many ways, that has created enormous legal challenges for us, that has created great challenges to all governments in trying to work and operate consistent with the principles of the charter, that it was a positive contribution. But I would be the first to recognize that it may be a contribution that Canadians want to rethink.

What is important is that at that time there was a spirit of give and take and a willingness to make concessions on the part of the federal government and the governments of most of the provinces in order to ensure that there was support for the repatriation of the Constitution.

What we have been asked to address in the Meech Lake Accord is infinitely more modest than the challenges that faced us in the repatriation process. We are asked to recognize the aspirations of Quebec to ensure that it can defend and protect its own particular cultural entity.

So the process that led to the Meech Lake Accord was initiated at the instigation of the other nine provincial premiers who wanted to deal with that unfinished business. It is of great concern to me that there are those now who criticize the Meech Lake Accord because, in fact, it was designed only to deal with a limited agenda. The Premiers at that time recognized that the limited agenda addressed by the Meech Lake Accord was of fundamental significance because once dealt with it opened up the possibility of dealing with serious, fundamental, broad-ranging issues in Canadian society, that it was the key to unlocking a door that would open up a bright, constructive and fruitful future in Canadian constitutional development.

I think it is important at this time to remind Canadians that the Meech Lake Accord is simply the step in a long path that will continue to occupy us as long as we are a dynamic, changing, growing and developing society.

So, Mr. Speaker, we should not jeopardize the gains made in the Meech Lake Accord and the 1990 constitutional agreement. More important, let us not jeopardize the future viability of our nation.

[Translation]

As Premier Wells said in his closing remarks after the meeting of First Ministers, we must think of Canada first, consider the national interest first and our individual regions second.

That is why we are here today to take a stand for Canada, not as westerners or easterners, not as British Columbians or Newfoundlanders, but as Canadians.

[English]

Now is a time for Canadians to come together. It is a time for bridge-building and nation-building by all Canadians. It is time we came together in this country, not for the sake of Meech Lake but for the sake of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the legislatures of Newfoundland and Manitoba to put Canada first and ratify the Meech Lake Accord.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by taking the minister up on her closing remark. I agree it is time to come together and to see the Meech Lake Accord proceed to get through this constitutional impasse. I rise to support this resolution which urges the two provinces which have not yet ratified the Meech Lake Accord to do so.

The minister recalled her own situation when the Meech Lake Accord was first introduced three years ago when she was a member of a legislature. I, myself, at that time was a member of this House. I served on the Meech Lake committee with my colleague the member for Papineau—St. Henri in the summer of 1987 when we reviewed the Meech Lake Accord. I sat again with the committee of the House of Commons, now called the Charest Committee, which reviewed the McKenna resolution submitted by the province of New Brunswick and which made recommendations unanimously supported by the House. So, like the minister, I have had some association with the process of this matter over the last three years.

I wish I could agree with the minister that the problems which she acknowledges so fully, the crisis to which she has alluded several times during her speech, are the result of us being new to the process of constitutional amendment, of us not having had the responsibility of amending our Constitution under present rules except since 1982.

But from where I sat I could see a very different problem. When I see this resolution, which may be interpreted by some as positioning two provinces for holding out, being brought before the House now, although I support the resolution, I feel bound to say in my remarks that I think the problem lies somewhere other than with two provinces and somewhere other than where the minister has suggested, with inexperience.

I suggest that what has gone wrong—and so much has gone wrong that I think even members of the government are hastening to characterize this as a critical situation with serious implications for financial markets, with serious implications for the future of our country—has been the approach that the Government of Canada, under the leadership of the Prime Minister, has taken since the Meech Lake Accord was passed to try to make it part of the Constitution of this country.

In light of the strong feelings that I and so many Canadians have on that subject, on the subject of how this file has been handled for the last three years, it is appropriate for me to put on the record my own experiences and some of my own observations about this very sorry story.

We all knew from the time of patriation in 1982 that it would be essential that the province of Quebec, as a government in Canada, give its approval of the patriation and of the establishment of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, not for the legalities of it or for the constitutionality of it, but because we knew we had a lot of constitutional work yet to do and we knew that the participation of the province of Quebec was an essential element in that.

It was with joy, for my own part, that I received, as we all did, the agenda put forward by the Government of Quebec after the Bourassa government took office. It put forward five points for what could be called, in the context of the debate, renewed federalism. I had been here for a while and I recognized that this list, these five points, were a reasonable agenda. Unlike past sets of agendas put forward, this was a reasonable agenda that could work in a federal system, and I supported it as a basis for negotiation. When the Meech Lake Accord resulted, I looked forward to the work that the committee would do to try to assure that the Meech Lake Accord would lead, as the patriation had, to a kind of consensus in the country and, even more, to an act that would unify the whole country. However, the strategy that the government, under the leadership of the Prime Minister, adopted was the opposite.

The minister tried to answer the critics about the idea that constitutional amendment can be done by a small group of men sitting behind closed doors. I do not have too much difficulty with that idea. I agree with her to a point. It is impossible for the amending procedures to be met unless there is some element of negotiation and compromise to produce a resolution that has a hope of acceptance in all the legislatures of the country and in the Parliament of Canada. So there has to be an element of what you could call executive federalism.

It took place back in 1981, that famous "kitchen cabinet" meeting at which representatives of three governments sat together and worked out compromises which resulted in the patriation and the Charter of Rights. You need something like that. I am not critical that Meech Lake was produced at a meeting like that. But to say that the Constitution limits the process to that is a misrepresentation. It is obvious that a strong element of public participation, support and contribution needs to be part, in any democratic society, of the amending of the constitution of a country. Ever since the Charter of Rights and Freedoms became part of the constitution of this country, for the first time the Canadian people began to feel that they owned the Constitution of Canada. It did not just belong to governments to adjust, to wheel and deal, to pass powers back and forth. It belonged to the people of this country.

• (1600)

I recognize that some kinds of compromises cannot be made in public and need to be made in private. However, I do not believe that the whole deal should be one from which the public is excluded. That just will not wash.

Mr. Speaker, you might think—I see you looking a little suspiciously—that this is something I gained by the wisdom of hindsight, looking back at this process. I want to say that my Liberal colleague and I, when we sat on the Meech Lake committee, saw instantly, as I think most Canadians did, that there was room for improvement of the Meech Lake Accord.

I think I can quote the minister and what she said a few moments ago: "The week long meetings of First Ministers resulted in substantial improvements in the Meech Lake Accord."

Well, you know something, Mr. Speaker? The Liberal caucus recommended in August, 1987, a list which contains all of the improvements that she says occurred to First Ministers a few weeks ago when they met to see if they could improve the Meech Lake Accord.

We called for public participation. We recognized something so important that I think it is worth putting on the record. Although you could say that Quebec's problems, Quebec's demand for renewed federalism, Quebec's agenda, should be given priority it is a mistake to have a constitutional round that is described as the Quebec round.

I will tell you why. In a country like this with so many regions, every round has to be the Canada round. You cannot tell people we are just looking at Quebec's priorities now and as soon as they are finished we are going to look at yours.

Most Canadians, and I say this with respect to my fellow Canadians, tune in late. They may not be aware that in August, 1986, the premier of their province agreed that we would deal with Quebec's problems first and then deal with Manitoba's, Alberta's, New Brunswick's, or Newfoundland and Labrador's, or some other province. They tune in late and they see that the only thing on the agenda is the Quebec issue.

We in the Liberal caucus knew that and recommended in our minority report, which the government would not even allow us to include in the majority report, a broader agenda, not to take anything out of Quebec's list. We wanted Quebec's list to be there and you can see that from the record. We also wanted every region of this country to have its own reasons for supporting the Meech Lake Accord.

We urged the government to broaden it, to have public participation. People can read our report. It is a short report that we wrote back in 1987 which shows that if the government had not taken the tactic that it did, and if the minister is right in saying that the thing was much improved a week ago, I think we would have achieved those improvements two and a half years ago. We would have had broader public participation and a package in which every part of the country could see something of their priorities. It would have been truly a Canada round.

I am not sure how far she meant to go in her remarks, but I was pleased to hear the minister saying that we should think again about the notwithstanding clause, whether that has any place now that the constitution has been patriated.

In the Liberal minority report in 1987 we recommended seeking to remove the notwithstanding clause. That would have been a good item on the agenda for that meeting, not for the next one.

I know you cannot completely reform the Constitution all in one step. I know that. It cannot be done. You cannot deal with a thousand different items in every kind of detail. The goal would have been, as we recommended, to give every Canadian and region of this country a reason for wanting to see the Meech Lake Accord succeed. You know, that is what happened in 1981. After the executive federalism feature, real public hearings were held, very different from the public hearings that this government allowed on the Meech Lake Accord where only egregious errors could be admitted.

In 1981 an honest committee sat. Opposition members, the public, and others made suggestions for amendments and they were taken. They were taken in order to give the people who submitted those ideas a real sense of participation in their Constitution.

I want to come now to the Charest Committee. The Charest Committee which had a majority of government members referred back to the meetings that took place in 1987. I am quoting two sentences from page 7 of the report: "The First Ministers who signed the accord back in 1987 took the position that it should be passed, unchanged, unless there was some egregious error. The body of evidence presented to your committee"—that is the Charest Committee—"is that most Canadians perceived at least one such oversight and that was the failure to include the Yukon and the Northwest Territories in the selection process".

Well, we saw many more egregious errors and so did the rest of the Canadian people, but for a committee with a government majority to put out a report recognizing even one egregious error is, I think, some support for the thesis I am advancing here that the problem has been the leadership provided by this government since the Meech Lake Accord was achieved.

I want to move forward to the work of the Charest Committee and close my remarks as quickly as I can. If there was one thing we concluded from the public hearings when we went all over the country in such a great rush, and where we sat late on nights when the public was willing to appear at eight or nine o'clock in the evening, it was that there was nothing wrong with their country. They told us they were proud of our country, that they wanted our country to stick together, that they were not fed up with having to accommodate regions with different ideas, different values or a different language. They told us the opposite, that they could not understand how we could have been led into so much trouble for a country where the desire for national unity was so strong.

They told us what is, in a sense, the explanation for why I am standing to support this resolution today. They told us that they wanted their political leaders to solve these problems. They did not fully understand whether June 23 was a real date, or whether it was an arbitrary date, perhaps imposed by Quebec. In our report we were able to explain the significance of June 23 and why it is so important that the constitutional impasse be resolved, if it can be, by that date. They want the political leadership of this country to keep this country going, not to lead us into further division.

I recall so well the arguments that this government made to try to stick-handle or manipulate the support for the Meech Lake Accord that the constitutional process requires. I remember when the government accused the opponents of Meech Lake of being anti-Quebec. I remember when it accused them of being anti-French. I remember, and I am glad the minister did not do it today, the government using a heavy reliance on the disaster scenario, that if we do not support this accord and if we do not see it go through, there is going to be a terrible disaster, one argument after the other put forward to try, in a way, to force support for the Accord to take us through the constitutional impasse.

The reason that these extreme means have had to be used is because of a refusal by the government to follow a more democratic process, to open this process to public participation and to open it to improvement. The agreement was reached on a Saturday night, which in many ways can be called the Saturday night special because people felt, and some premiers have said, they had a gun held to their heads. Subsequently, by the Prime Minister's own admission, we learn this was a calculation of his and a belief he had. I did read today's Globe and Mail, and I saw very clearly that one counts backwards. The idea was to put maximum pressure on participants. I am characterizing this as putting maximum pressure on the participants so that the agreement would go through.

I rise to support this resolution. I hope that the constitutional impasse will be traversed and that Canada will get through it. But also, I cannot believe that the Canadian people will ever forget how we were led here. I believe that the government will be held to account for it.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Standing Orders provide for the first speaker from the government and the first speaker from the Official Opposition to have unlimited time. The Leader of the New Democratic Party does not have that opportunity.

There has been some discussion, and I am wondering if the House would be prepared at this time to give unanimous consent to allowing the member for Yukon to have her speech with unlimited time. I can assure you there will be no intention of abusing that, should permission be given.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government not only do we welcome that proposal, but we look forward to the comments of the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to the motion before us. Before I get into my remarks, I would like to mention what the motion is. This is not a debate on the Meech Lake Accord. The Meech Lake Accord was passed by this House in 1987. It is not a debate on the package that was signed on June 9, 1990 by the First Ministers.

The motion clearly states and asks this House to urge the Manitoba and Newfoundland Legislative Assemblies to exert efforts to bring about the full ratification of the Constitutional Amendment of 1987.

First of all, I think it is very important to bring to the attention of those watching and to the people in this House that we are not debating the merits of the Meech Lake Accord. That has been done in this House. Therefore, I want to say that I feel very strongly that the bringing forward of this resolution at this particular time is simply another manoeuvre by this government to manoeuvre a process, rather than to show leadership on this issue.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my opposition to this motion. I am not expressing opposition to the content of the Meech Lake Accord, the companion resolutions and what is in the June 9 agreement. That is not the object of this motion. But I do object to this motion which is brought at this time simply as a manoeuvre, rather than this government showing some leadership.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the government is trying to put the blame on someone else. That is clear. It is a cynical approach and it won't work.

Canadians have watched the constitutional process evolve. For three years, Canadians have been on the outside looking in. They wanted to participate but the government refused to let them.

[English]

Canadians have expressed legitimate concerns. They have proposed imaginative solutions but have been told by the government that they are causing problems and getting in the way. Canadians have been shut out of the constitutional process, and they know who shut them out. They know who has brought Canada to the brink. The government can try to shift the blame, but the people of Canada know that it is the Prime Minister who is responsible for this crisis. He must accept that responsibility.

Instead of wasting the House's time with yet more manoeuvres, perhaps he should be looking for solutions and providing leadership, working to unite and not divide this country.

The Minister of Justice spoke about building bridges. Well, I suggest to the Minister of Justice that the Prime Minister is not building bridges, he is blowing them up.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party voted for the Meech Lake Accord in 1987. It did so, fully aware the accord was not perfect. My party voted yes, although it was unable to get the amendments it had proposed through the House, and today it still thinks these amendments would have improved the Accord. Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party voted for Meech Lake because it supports Quebec's five conditions, including the one on a distinct society.

We have not changed our position during the past three years, Mr. Speaker. At its convention in 1989, the NDP confirmed its support for Quebec's conditions. At the same time we realized it was necessary to deal with other issues in the Meech Lake Accord, so that Canadians would be able to support the accord. We made some sound proposals.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, in 1987 we made specific recommendations, not a long list, three simple recommendations for amendments. Had they been adopted at the time, I believe we would not be in the situation we are in today.

These amendments address three basic issues; the ability of the north to become a province in consultation with the federal government when the people of the north felt that this was an appropriate time. Second, to acknowledge the multiracial, multicultural heritage of our country, to address the issues of aboriginal people, as well as to ensure that minority rights and sexual equality were maintained.

Throughout, our criticism of the accord has been a criticism of process. Three years ago, 11 men signed an agreement which would have incredible ramifications for the future of Canada. We believed that it should be the Quebec round. We wanted to see Quebec fully in the Constitution of Canada because we believe in a united Canada, of which Quebec is a part.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: But, those 11 men who signed that constitutional amendment in 1987 did so without understanding just exactly what it was that would cause the people of Canada to raise questions in subsequent years. It is crucial to emphasize that it was 11 people who signed that accord, 11 people of privilege in a nation that is 50 per cent women, with a multicultural population, and with aboriginal peoples who were here long before any of us.

The 11 people around that table could not fully comprehend how the Meech Lake Accord would affect these Canadians. Input should have been invited, but it was not. Instead, the Prime Minister and the other First Ministers came out of that meeting and said: "We have formed a seamless web. We will only discuss egregious errors". The first egregious error was that nobody knew what egregious meant. It seems to me that at least politicians should speak in a language that people can understand.

Excluded from the process were native peoples, women, the north and Canada's multicultural and multiracial population.

In 1987 there were public hearings. There were hearings for one month, August, in Ottawa. If there was ever a process designed to ensure that very few people would be able to come, that was it. Not only was a wide diversity of groups from across Canada excluded from that limited process, but following that, in each subsequent budget in 1988, 1989 and 1990, this government has made those excluded groups the victims of its attacks in the budget.

Women's groups saw their funds slashed by the government. The budget for the communications programs of aboriginal peoples was slashed. The Assembly of First Nations, a principal organization representing the aboriginal people of this country, had their core funding completely eliminated as did 29 other aboriginal organizations. What kind of a message is that to aboriginal people when this government is saying that it wants to include them in the process and we decimate their organizations so that they do not have the ability to be in that process?

This government has systematically silenced the voices of women and the voices of aboriginal people and, at the same time, it is saying: "Trust us, we will look after you". Canadians do not trust this government, and that is quite clear. It is my belief that if there had been an open constitutional process from the beginning, one in which all Canadians were included, we would not be in the situation we are in today.

I believe there would be much more understanding between Quebec and the rest of Canada. We are a large and diverse country, and we often do not know each other well. That is true for all provinces and territories of this country. The Constitution of Canada must be written by the people of Canada.

[Translation]

After the proposals by the NDP and those by Mr. McKenna, the Conservative government decided to appoint a constitutional committee. The Charest Committee, although it had very little time, did a remarkable job. It heard witnesses and answered their questions. The Charest report contains a number of important proposals.

It was really encouraging for our caucus, Mr. Speaker. However, we soon realized that the Prime Minister had no intention of taking the report's recommendations seriously.

[English]

When the Charest report was being written, the New Democratic Party tried very hard to ensure that it could be a unanimous report, and it tried to negotiate in that report a way to address the concerns that the witnesses had expressed to that committee. We tried to be as conciliatory as we could because we felt that it was important for the country at that time for all three parties to be unanimous in saying: "yes" to Quebec at the same time as addressing the other outstanding issues.

The NDP felt that it could be done, that it was not an impossible task to do. We did not have a list of many things, but there were a few essential issues.

The Charest report should have been followed up by an immediate, open and public meeting of First Ministers. Time and again in this House I urged the Prime Minister to call for such a meeting. The Prime Minister continually responded that the time was not right and that there was not enough consensus among the First Ministers.

We now know that the Prime Minister had no intention of calling a meeting until a crisis situation was created. He had no intention of holding open public meetings where the people of Canada could see what was going on. I think we make a big mistake here if we say that the flaws in the process were just the flaws of the last two weeks. It is the flaw from 1987. It is the flaw of not beginning to deal with the issues, to listen to the voices that were out there throughout Canada: in Quebec, in the provinces, in the maritimes, the Atlantic, the west and the north. It is the flaw of ignoring all those voices and continuing to say: "This is a seamless web".

During those three years, there was time to have adequate public hearings so that we would not have the situation now in Manitoba where apparently there is not sufficient time to complete the process, a process under their regulations.

When the Prime Minister finally called the First Ministers together at the beginning of this month, we saw the same mistakes repeated over again; closed doors, long sessions and isolation for the First Ministers.

The environment and the process created is not a rational process for deciding the constitution of a democratic nation, and subsequent events have certainly shown that. This motion today serves no purpose. We have no authority to tell Manitoba and Newfoundlanders what to do. We have made the statements in this House about how we feel about the Meech Lake Accord and what our position is as a House of Commons. Are we now proposing, through this motion, to tell the people and the elected leaders of Manitoba and the people of Newfoundland and the leader of Newfoundland, what they should do? I can tell you, coming from an area of Canada that is not central Canada, if you wanted to inflame the regions in this country and say your democratic processes, your First Minister who signed that agreement cannot be trusted and tell them what to do, this will assure it.

We could support a motion brought forward by this government that enhances the positive process of constitutional development. We cannot support a motion that ensures there will be a negative result in those very two provinces which are mentioned in this motion.

[Translation]

Once again, Mr. Speaker, an agreement has been forced on Canadians. Although this agreement was an improvement over the initial accord, we could not expect Canadians to support it without reservations. Many Canadians who were excluded are sceptical about the results. They would have liked a chance to examine these changes.

Native people are sceptical more than anyone else, Mr. Speaker. They know better than anyone what it means to be excluded from the decision-making process. They understand the consequences of that exclusion. They have had that experience.

[English]

The aboriginal people of Canada sought a role in the process of constitution making for many years. The federal government was not interested and aboriginal concerns were set aside. The Prime Minister has warned time and time again that the government of Manitoba was warned time and time again that the Government of Manitoba required adequate time to hold public hearings. Just as he did not listen to the people of the north and just as he did not listen to the aboriginal people and to the women of Canada, he did not listen to Manitoba.

If Manitoba is running out of time, we take no joy in that. But if Manitoba is running out of time, it is the fault of the Prime Minister and no one else. The actions of Elijah Harper representing aboriginal people are actions that he can take as a democratically-elected member of the Manitoba legislature.

Mr. Harper is a member of a group who for too long has been ignored. We cannot as a nation in any way point the finger at aboriginal people for what is happening. It is not just the Constitution or the Meech Lake Accord. It is the accumulation of decades, a century of neglect, stealing the land, and acting like a conqueror, although there was no war and aboriginal people were not conquered, that has created this situation. Finally, it is the lack of respect with subsequent governments, and on this I will say it is not just the responsibility of the Prime Minister, it is the responsibility of all those Prime Ministers who went before him as well. This is how they have treated the aboriginal people and this is the result.

The constitutional process followed by this government has been shameful. The people of Canada can see through this process. Now the government is wanting to present a motion which will have no effect and does not enhance a positive process but simply points the finger at Manitoba and Newfoundland to share the blame. I suggest to the government that it might look in the mirror if it is looking for someone to blame.

The Prime Minister, in his wisdom last week, talked and bragged about his negotiating skills.

An hon. member: Shame.

Ms. McLaughlin: When he talked about rolling the dice, it was like talking about the Constitution as a game of Trivial Pursuit, not the pursuit of a just Constitution.

Now is the time to try to move forward. It is time to show leadership and to find solutions. I believe as a country we are capable of that, but I do not believe and Canadians increasingly do not believe, that the Prime Minister has shown that he can lead this country.

[Translation]

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am discouraged by this resolution. It is destructive. It is vindictive.

The government is imposing a constitution on Newfoundland and Manitoba. For a constitution to be valid, it must not be imposed; the people must support it.

Together we must find a way for all Canadians to support our Constitution.

[English]

We must find a way together to address in a meaningful, concrete way the concerns of aboriginal people, the importance of Quebec being fully in the Constitution and recognizing the distinctness of Quebec. We have to go beyond empty promises. We have to find a way to ensure that the five principles that Quebec put forward are maintained, and we have to find a way together to reunite this country.

With all its flaws and all its injustices, our country is nevertheless a marvellous achievement, an achievement of diverse cultures coming together, of peoples creating great bonds against very wide geographical distances. We have to work together with a common purpose. We must maintain the country that is Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: If we are to save this country, if we are to move on and build another society, we need to find a resolution to the crisis. This motion put before us today is not a resolution. The decision has been taken in this House. It is simply a cynical way of trying to out-manoeuvre. We do not need more manoeuvres. We need some real leadership.

I call once more upon the Prime Minister to make immediate and positive efforts to find that solution. It is in his hands. I assure him, if he does, that he will have the whole-hearted support of my party.

We have to look at a new process, a meaningful constitutional process. I want to make a suggestion because, yes, it is easy to criticize. I was not a part of that process in 1987, 1988, 1989, or 1990. We have to look for a new process because this one is not working. I would like to make a recommendation because at our last convention the New Democratic Party called for the establishment of a standing committee on the Constitution which would look at such things as public education, the funding of conferences to bring together a cross-section of people to discuss the Constitution, the requirement to hold hearings, and the encouragement of public participation in forming the Constitution of this country.

Constitution building is not an ad hoc crisis oriented process. I think this is a positive suggestion. I would like to say that over 43 years ago F. R. Scott and David Lewis in their book Make This Year Canada suggested the notion of a constituent assembly in order to construct a just and fair Constitution.

I would suggest to the House that this is a notion worth considering. Executive federalism is not working. We see it now; we have seen it over the last three years.

I remind the House that this is a system that France used in 1958. It was interesting when I met with Nelson Mandela this week that he raised that this was a proposal he had for his country, that there be an elected constituent assembly to form the constitution of his country, a constitution formed by the diverse groups in his country that would reflect that.

It is an issue and a suggestion that I think requires some study. That is again why I propose that this House consider such a standing committee and this proposal because it is clear that we need a new process. Yes, the existing process is fatally flawed, but I feel as leader of the New Democratic Party that I have a responsibility. I have a responsibility to show some leadership, even if the leader of this country is not prepared to do so.

Now we must turn to looking at a new process that will involve all Canadians. Whether or not Meech Lake and the companion amendments, we are going to be continuing constitutional talks. I want to suggest that there is great validity in looking at how we are going to do that in the future.

In summation, I cannot support this motion because this motion is presented cynically, not to advance any particular cause, not to advance constitutional discussions, and I would assume not to debate the merits or the demerits of Meech Lake. That decision has been taken in this House. For that reason I cannot support this motion.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have before us today a motion which is a motion of encouragement, a motion whereby members of the House of Commons urge the members of the legislatures of my province, Manitoba, and the province of Newfoundland to exert their efforts to bring about full ratification of the constitutional amendment, 1987 by June 23, 1990. However the motion does not stop there; the motion goes on.

The reason for it is so that Canadians can complete an important act of nation building and thereby open the process of Canada's future constitutional development, including the important issues of Senate reform, of aboriginal rights and linguistic rights, of territorial participation in the federation, and of providing a process for a continuing review of the operation of the Constitution of Canada. It is the body of that motion which I want to address this afternoon.

There are those who would say that this motion is inappropriate. While I speak today I remind my colleagues that both in the House of Assembly of Newfoundland and in the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba the leaders and elected members of those two provinces in their respective Houses are debating the same issue.

I have just heard the speech of my premier, Mr. Filmon. In my mind, as he made his address to the legislature, he put before members of that House the achievements that were made respecting Meech Lake, the need to bind the wounds of our country, and the need to pass Meech Lake. The issues discussed in Ottawa some two weeks ago resulted in the companion resolution. He just made the recommendation that members of the Manitoba legislature should adopt the Meech Lake resolution.

As I stand here I know also that the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the Liberal Party of Manitoba, is addressing the legislature on the basis that we are not only members from specific or particular provinces and territories, but that we are Canadians first.

I thank both of them for the manner in which they are conducting the debate. I know that members in this House would want to conduct the debate on exactly that same level. It is also important to note that we are elected members of Parliament. In this Chamber we have the right and indeed the responsibility to speak for our constituents, to speak for the entire country, and to bring to the issues of the day a spirit, a vision, or an experience which has been moulded by the fact that we sit in a national House and that we are from day to day on the great issues of the day confronted or faced in debate, in conversation and in association with the aspirations of the people of Canada from the various regions.

• (1640)

It is always easier to take a specific view and hold to that view. It has been my experience over the some 18 years I have been here that it is always more difficult but extremely necessary to mould one's views on the basis of what one has heard from one's colleagues and what one has experienced throughout the breadth of our wonderful country.

It is not the Parliament of Canada telling Manitoba legislators or members of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland what to do. Rather, Parliament speaks for all Canadians. I believe that we cannot simply seek public office in order to hold office, but the requirements of office demand us to speak on the great issues of the day.

In 1981 I had the opportunity as the then spokesperson for the Official Opposition to lead our committee in the long debate on the patriation of the Constitution, both during the special House of Commons and Senate hearings as well as in this House.

There were three issues which faced us at that time. One was patriation of the Constitution. Should the Constitution be in Canada and should we as Canadians and as a mature country have the opportunity to discuss our Constitution, to debate it, and to change it?

I was a strong supporter of patriation. In those days as well, I had some misgivings and indeed criticisms of the process. We also said that if we had a Constitution in Canada we had to have a method, a formula, whereby we could amend the Constitution.

Colleagues will recall that there was a proposal at that time which was generally referred to as the Victoria proposal. It found its way also into the 1980–81 proposals. Through the process the amending formula was changed. I had the privilege in committee to move the 7/50 formula which today is the central part of the debate as we look at unanimity and what effect it would have as we try to change the Constitution.

The third issue was the matter of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms and how we balanced a charter and the protection it gives or, more important, the symbolic protection it gave to those Canadians who did not have the heritage of the British parliamentary system? How did we blend a Charter of Rights and Freedoms with the supremacy of Parliament?

At that time I had disagreements with some of my Conservative colleagues in the provinces. I say that and take this historic journey but for a moment is for this reason: After we were through the process and after we had been through the Supreme Court where, as members will recall, there was a reference made as to how much support a government needed in order to change the Constitution and bring it from England, a decision had to be made.

The decision that had to be made was that after the process is complete, despite the criticisms whatever they may be, there was only one decision that every member of the House had to decide upon and that was: Were these constitutional amendments right for Canada?

I remember the debates within the caucus. Members know that we cannot discuss those debates here but I remind members that a decision was made at that time by the opposition party that we would support patriation, we would support the amending formula and we would support a Charter of Rights of Freedom. The issue at the time was, what in our hearts and our minds did we believe was right for Canada.

There were members of the House at that time and they are still here as members today, who opposed it at that time. One of the reasons they opposed it was the unfinished business. Primarily, there were two examples of unfinished business in 1981. This is not put forward as criticism because I am a sincere believer that, through the British parliamentary system, constitutions evolve and develop. One never has, at any point in time, the perfect document.

There were two issues that concerned us. One was the fact that the province of Quebec was not a signatory to the constitution. There are those in this House and especially members opposite who, at that time, convinced me that the signature had to take place because the government of the day, in the province of Quebec, would never sign the constitution. You have to remember that that came one year after there had been a referendum, and a solemn commitment on the part of all of us, that we would ask what was Quebec's expectation and how could we mould them into the constitution. That was the Meech Lake Accord.

Second, was the matter of aboriginal rights and how to bring the aboriginal people into the Constitution. I remind members that during one Saturday morning sitting of the special committee there was a proposal from one of our aboriginal members at the time. Today, that proposal is section 35 of the Constitution. It recognized, for the first time, the aboriginal people and the equality of those people in the Constitution, apart from section 91(24), which refers to Indians and land reserved for Indians. I remember asking the leadership at the time if this is what they want? Did they want us, as elected members, to support this proposal? The answer was yes. They also said that it does not go far enough and there will be another day when they will want to have their issues more fully addressed and placed in the Constitution.

In fact, in the Supreme Court decision relative to native rights, one could argue that section 35 is given more Native rights within the constitutional framework than possibly what was even contemplated by those of us who wrote it, back on that Saturday morning.

There were these two unfinished pieces of business, which takes me to Meech Lake. What I find interesting about Meech Lake is that virtually everyone who has addressed Meech Lake agrees with the principles of Meech Lake. They agree with the five principles. That does not seem to be the major issue. When I speak to my friends in Manitoba and in other provinces, that generally is the position they take.

Second, there is the argument relating to process and the arguments relating to the fact that this is the opportunity to meet that requirement to fulfil unfinished business. Since 1984, I have been a member of a government caucus. With the exception of a nine month period in 1979, I was always in opposition. Also, since 1984 I have been a member of a caucus that has a large number of members of Parliament for the province of Quebec. That was a unique and new experience for most of us who have been around here for some years as members of the Conservative Party. What I have discovered is that they have a love for Canada, a love for country, a love for their province equal to that of mine. They might express it in Canada's other official language more often than I do. But, the fact of the matter is that the Meech Lake Accord for them, and for me, and therefore for other Canadians, was simply a recognition not only of the reality of Canada but the need to bind old wounds.

While I know that politics involves a confrontational system, I believe that political life and public debate too often emphasizes the negative. It emphasizes the conflict and that is what makes the news. That is not a criticism. That is also the manner in which the media has to operate.

I believe the test of the validity of someone in public life is not whether they are controversial but when he or she must a decision for the good of the country. That is when we are tested most, and this is one of those moments. that is this moment. That is this moment for us in Manitoba. That is the moment for us in Newfoundland and that is the moment for us in Canada.

What has come out of the Meech Lake process is not an argument about its fundamentals but an argument about process. Let me address that first.

The Prime Minister and the Premiers of the ten provinces, as well as the leaders of the Territories, have clearly stated that this should be the end to the type of process and, quite frankly, debilitating manner in which we have had to change our Constitution. I remind you that this is still the first decade in which we, as Canadians, have had to wrestle with the process of changing our Constitution. Before that, it took place in England. I take great comfort in the communique on the companion resolution which states that this process will not happen again. I take great comfort in it, and for that very reason commend the Meech Lake Accord, not only to this House, but to my fellow Manitoba citizens and legislators in Manitoba.

My second point concerns the aboriginal people. I had the honour to be the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for nine months. Those of us who have at all been exposed to the aboriginal plight in Canada know that if we want to speak in international fora on human rights, on dignity, on equal opportunity, we have to address the aboriginal question.

There has been much work done. I remind members that in 1987 we came very close to settling the aboriginal question. I believe sincerely in my heart that if the province of Quebec had been at the table we would have had the required numbers to get the constitutional amendments for aboriginal people that the Prime Minister and other First Ministers were seeking in 1987.

I said in my earlier comments that I am a great believer in the development of constitutions. Let me use a personal example, if I might. In 1979 we wanted to bring about changes to the Northwest Territories Act and the Yukon Act. Our government did not have a long term in the House. As Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I wrote a letter to the Commissioner of the Yukon and the Commissioner of the Northwest Territories. In that letter, as Minister of Indian Affairs, I said that I expected him to choose his executive council from his elected members, and I expected the commissioner to address the executive council on the basis that they are the members who are responsible for the governance of the Territories. That is what we refer to as responsible government.

The Liberal governments in the 1980s did not change the letter either. Why not? First, I sincerely believe they believed in that process. Second, once one has given responsibility to people, one sees the development, the evolution and the growth of these people. All one has to do today is to take a look at the manner in which these two territories were represented by their spokespersons, their premiers or their leaders at the First Ministers' Conference. The companion resolution makes a commitment not only to their participation but the further development of the Northwest Territories and Yukon, specifically the aboriginal people.

In the last number of months there have been agreements signed north of 60° with the Déné people, with the Inuit Tapirisat, with the Council of Yukon Indians. Progress has been made. I believe there had to be a long period of time in which difficult discussions and negotiations took place, but I do not want to lose the opportunities, the progress, the growth that is now being realized not only by those people but for us as Canadians.

The Prime Minister put forward proposals before the Manitoba native leadership to move the aboriginal agenda forward. They include a federal-aboriginal process to set the agenda for the First Ministers' Conference on aboriginal matters and the acceleration of the holding of the first conference; a commitment by the Government of Canada to full constitutional recognition of the aboriginal peoples as a fundamental characteristic of Canada, the so-called "Canada" clause; the participation of representatives of the aboriginal peoples of Canada at any future First Minister's Conference held to discuss the "recognitions" clause; an invitation to participate in all First Ministers' Conferences where matters being discussed directly affect the aboriginal peoples; the joint definition of treaty rights—so important and so long asked for by Indian leadership—and the establishment of a royal commission on native affairs.

I say to our native friends that it is a proposal and an offer given freely and willingly by the Prime Minister not simply to break the Meech Lake impasse, but rather because I have seen how the Prime Minister has attempted, both in 1987 and in the post period since 1987, to bring forward a conclusion with honour and dignity for the aboriginal people of Canada.

There is a third point I want to make. It relates to Senate reform. Based on agreed objectives, this will now be the key constitutional priority. I remind members that, in 1986, the Premiers in Edmonton said that we had to get Quebec within the Constitution. I believe sincerely the former Liberal speaker when he said: "We always have to have Canada aroused." That is correct. But along with the Premiers in 1986, all of us sincerely believed that we had to end the constitutional exclusion of Quebec.

Second, for us in western Canada particularly, we believed that we would have Senate reform. To us, Senate reform is important because it is a recognition by the other parts of Canada that there has to be a change from those earliest days when we entered Confederation.

It is not my purpose today to talk about the grievances relating to the ownership of natural resources. All of us who have grown up in western Canada could regale the House I am sure for hours on end about some of the perceived and real wrongs respecting that history. That is not the purpose today.

The purpose today is quite simply this. We have two legislatures who are struggling at this moment with passage of the Meech Lake Accord. I wish them well. I believe sincerely that at the end of the day prior to June 23 as the legislatures face the awesome responsibilities, as we in this House have had, they will make a decision not only to pass the Meech Lake Accord but to do it with honour.

• (1700)

Second, this will open the door for Senate reform. It opens the door for consideration of the manner in which the Territories could become provinces, to join in a greater way the constitutional family of Canada.

It brings about the possibility of examining the Canada clause and more fully expanding in definitional form what is the nature of Canada and what is the multicultural heritage of our country. Obviously, from that background I look forward to its inclusion at the appropriate time.

In conclusion, there is finally only one question before us. It is this. Canadians look to our American friends to the south and sometimes shy away from the manner in which they project their nationalism. I think from time to time, Sir, it is good for us to speak about Canada, not about the provinces or the regions from which we come, but the fact that we all share a heritage, a citizenship which is the envy of the world.

I am not here today to tell you about the dire economic consequences which I personally feel could come if Meech Lake is not passed. I know one thing. As in a family so in a country, when there is division you are weaker. Even when you patch up the differences the knowledge of difference remains.

This Parliament and the legislatures have a responsibility to remind Canadians that our Canadian citizenship is based on tolerance, on democratic values and an international obligation. The international obligation is simply this. It is to convey to the rest of the world that we are people who have learned to grow together, who celebrate our differences but who always remember that we are not living in a cheque-book confederacy, that at the end of day I mark up what I receive for my area as against what the next fellow receives for his or hers. Rather, we contribute to the country and in so doing we get benefits which are the envy of the world.

Sir, I commend not only Meech Lake to the legislatures of the two provinces as they wrestle with this issue, but also that they see this as an opportunity to address some of the grievances that have been exposed and also to see themselves as the nation builders which I know they want to be.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. minister. I appreciate the depth of his remarks and have long admired him in the House, even though I do not agree with him on Meech Lake.

He supports a resolution that calls upon the provincial governments of Manitoba and Newfoundland to pass Meech Lake basically because their premiers have agreed to it. Then he went on to say that we have to end this type of process, that is, the process that led up to Meech Lake. He has acknowledged the difficulties of that process. That process has been called executive federalism. That is to say the Premiers and the Prime Minister get together and basically make the decisions to the exclusion of Parliament, some critics say, and to the exclusion of people in the provincial legislatures.

I want to ask the minister this. Is it not inherent in Meech Lake that this process is going to be perpetuated? For example, every year there will be a premiers' conference at which will be discussed the Constitution.

It seems to me what will happen at those premiers' conferences is that we will see more and more the erosion of federal power. I predict that the next one will be on telecommunications, followed by the environment and other areas. The provinces will come to say: "We want these powers. We want a change in the Constitution". All the federal government will do is say yes or no, but it will still create a pressure to take away federal power.

Today the Leader of the New Democratic Party suggested a different process. She quoted Nelson Mandela. She talked about recommendations made by Frank Scott and David Lewis in the past. They talked about constituent assemblies involving people. She gave a modern update, that is, in the form of a standing committee of the House that would continue with education of people so that they could understand these constitutional processes and so that they could participate.

The minister has had a lot of experience, as he mentioned, in Constitution-making in this House. Does he not think that this process will never really be changed until we get into the Meech Lake pattern of executive federalism in which the Premiers and the Prime Minister do most of the constitutional governing of this country at the expense of the House of Commons which, today, is almost irrelevant in terms of the constitutional debate?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I know the phrase "executive federalism" has found new usage in Canada, especially since the week long closed door debate.

I think it is important in a federal state that First Ministers come together regularly to discuss the issues of the day. As the hon. member will know, we have had regular conferences, for example, on the economy. I think it is very important that that take place.

I also believe that we should have the First Ministers discuss constitutional issues. I do not think that that is the issue.

I think the question is this. Do we expand that process to one which will allow discussions by Canadians before the fact as opposed to after the fact?

If we look at the Meech Lake discussions in August of 1987 here in Ottawa and, for example, at the Charest Committee report, many people would argue that they were more processes of ratification rather than developmental processes of the Constitution, even though people were very sincere in the approach and the work that they did.

I believe that all First Ministers, both provincial as well as the Prime Minister, have now gone through a process whereby they recognize, as they did in their communiqué, that they must change the process. I cannot project that it will be a constituent assembly. But I do know that on issues concerning aboriginal rights, for instance, the Prime Minister gave directly to the aboriginal people in his communiqué of Monday last their legitimate participation at the table.

Whether or not this could be expanded beyond that point, I think would need discussion. I am not opposed to it, but I think it would need some agreement.

We do not want to falter again on the process. I ask my hon. friend to look at the American system and to consider the Continental Congress in Philadelphia in 1790. He knows how long a period of time was involved there. It was not an open process, yet it involved elected members. But out of it came a constitution and a willingness not only to respect it but also to try to change it. The Americans have a method to change it, just as we are now developing a process for change in our country, especially in the last decade.

I say to the hon. member that I would not foreclose any of the options. I do not think we should be opposed to Meech Lake and the bringing of Quebec into the Constitution or, for that matter, bringing aboriginal discussion into the Constitution and hopefully finalizing it, or Senate reform simply because the process we have been through has not been totally to our satisfaction.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, when I began my remarks, I was informed that the Prime Minister might come to the House in a few minutes. I will be pleased to interrupt my speech as soon as he arrives, with the hope that you will let me speak again later in this debate to conclude my remarks after he and the opposition leader have made their speeches.

I want—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I believe there is unanimous consent to allow that.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Kindy: No.

Some hon. members: Shame!

Mr. Kindy: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I said no, there is not unanimous consent.

• (1710)

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, at the outset, I would like to say that I will support this motion because I think that it is important and useful at this time when not only elected federal officials but also representatives of the various provincial governments are involved in this great constitutional process. I think that this resolution is in no way unfair to the legislature of Manitoba or Newfoundland. And unlike my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, I think that the Parliament of Canada can very well express its wishes and hope that two provincial legislatures support a constitutional process approved not only by the Prime Minister of Canada but by the ten provincial premiers as well.

That being said, I nevertheless remind you that the present constitutional impasse goes back several months, I would even say a few years. As soon as a new government was elected in New Brunswick, it was clear that it would be difficult to obtain from this legislature the same consent given previously by the former premier of the province. I can only regret that it took so long to decide to seek an appropriate compromise in response, first of all, to the questions of Premier McKenna, and subsequently to the objections raised by the Manitoba legislature following an election that produced minority government with Premier Filmon, and finally, to the objections raised by a newly elected government in Newfoundland. In any event, I want to say, first of all, that I voted for the Meech Lake Accord, probably because I felt that Quebec's five demands were and still are reasonable, moderate and a good basis for arrangements that would benefit all Canadians.

It formed the basis for negotiating a constitutional agreement which at the time received the unanimous support of the First Ministers. If the proposals made by the Government of Quebec were reasonable and still are, as I believe they are, then why did the present text of the Meech Lake Accord cause such aggressive debate, such dissension, suspicion and distrust? Why did this draft accord a rouse greater anxiety about the future of our country than any other event or initiative had done in the past years? Having watched the Meech Lake debate very closely, I am convinced that the problem was not the five demands of Quebec but the process by which these five demands were met. The Prime Minister, who I am sure was acting in entirely good faith, thought that, by giving the other provinces the same terms he gave Quebec, he would be able to settle this constitutional problem. Unfortunately for the Prime Minister, although many Canadians are prepared to accept a strong Quebec, there are many people in this country who do not necessarily want a weak Canada. Personally, as a Quebecer and a Canadian, I feel it is very important to obtain the full consent of the Government of Quebec to the provisions of the Constitution Act, 1982, which was and still is the objective of all parties.

Unfortunately for many Canadians, the Prime Minister of Canada abdicated his role as defender of the interests of the Government of Canada to obtain a constitutional accord, apparently at any price. However, I was delighted with the action taken by Premier McKenna of New Brunswick, who on March 21 proposed a way to try and resolve the constitutional impasse.

This suggestion, which I think came very late in the day, was a praiseworthy initiative that should have come, not from a provincial premier but from the Prime Minister of Canada himself, many months ago.

The Government of Canada, in response to the companion resolution proposed by the Government of New Brunswick, appointed a parliamentary committee, commonly referred to as the Charest Committee, which held public hearings across the country, heard hundreds of witnesses, received thousands of written submissions and made a series of suggestions not to undo Meech Lake but to renew the support previously given by the Parliament of Canada through the three party leaders in the House. There was support for Meech Lake, but the report also recommended some additions and improvements, somewhat along the lines of the suggestions made by Premier McKenna, to resolve this constitutional impasse and thus ratify the Meech Lake Accord.

I am glad to say that throughout this political process, the Liberal Party of Canada set aside political considerations and fully co–operated with the government. From the outset, the Leader of the Liberal Party, the Right Hon. John Turner, supported the government's action on Meech Lake. Subsequently, the vast majority of Liberal members in this House voted in favour of the accord when the debate on Meech Lake was held. And quite recently, when the Charest Committee was appointed, all four Liberal members signed the Charest Committee's proposals and joined forces with the government and the New Democratic Party to seek a solution to the constitutional impasse.

There were those marathon meetings that lasted nearly a week between the Prime Minister of Canada and the provincial premiers to try to find a compromise that would enable the various legislatures that had not yet ratified the Meech Lake Accord to do so.

I must say that some of the suggestions made by the members of the Charest Committee were accepted and I think that is an important factor which made it possible for the Prime Minister of Canada to obtain the co-operation of all First Ministers who were present at those week long negotiations. An agreement was finally reached because some proposals that had been unanimously accepted by all members of the parliamentary committee chaired by our colleague, Jean Charest, were acted on.

But I must say that I had a feeling right after this agreement was reached following that long week of negotiations among the first ministers— I say that because I saw in the newspaper the day after the agreement that some representatives were very disappointed with what had happened. I quote from an article in The Globe and Mail that said:

• (1720)

"Agreement is faulted by women and natives". The article states:

> But Judy Rebick, president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, said she was "disgusted" by the process. "Women, aboriginal people and multicultural groups were excluded. The decisions are still being made by middle-class white men in Ottawa".

The article goes on to state:

> The Assembly of First Nations, which represents native groups, was not available for comment. But Ethel Blondin, Liberal MP for the Western Arctic and a leading native spokeswoman, said she feels betrayed by Mr. Mulroney.

[Translation]

It is obvious that what is now happening in the Manitoba Legislature is a reaction quite similar to the spontaneous reaction of our colleague, Ms. Blondin, who found it wrong that at the end of this long discussion that lasted nearly a week, the Prime Minister invited the representatives of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon in to talk and publicly consent, in front of the nation, to this process that had just been accepted by the First Ministers of Canada. But those who were most conspicuous by their absence from that happy Saturday evening were of course the representatives of the native peoples. I wonder why the Prime Minister of Canada did not have the good idea to bring these people into the final moments of this long discussion that lasted nearly a week, so that they too might accept this compromise in Canada's interest.

I must say that the recommendations of the Charest Report, in particular recommendations 9, 10 and 18, were not followed up either by the Prime Minister of Canada or probably by the provincial premiers. If more serious, sustained attention had been given to these recommendations of the Charest Report, I do not think we would have the objections now being raised in the Manitoba Legislature. In any event, I can only regret what is happening.

I sincerely hope that the legislatures of Manitoba and Newfoundland will approve this compromise agreed to by the Prime Minister of Canada and the provincial premiers. What is at stake is our concern that each and everyone of us can live in harmony in our country. The original objectives of the 1987 constitutional exercise must be realized. I think that if the Prime Minister makes it a point of honour to say that the 1982 round was incomplete, he too must admit that the 1987-1990 round is also incomplete.

The resolution before us clearly indicates that if, on one hand, we hope for the ratification of the 1987 Constitution Amendment before June 23, 1990, on the other hand there is also an important step which will have to be taken in the future constitutional development process with a view to dealing with, as the resolution puts it, the important issues of Senate reform, of aboriginal rights and linguistic rights, of territorial participation in the federation, and of providing a process for a continuing review of the operation of the Constitution of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it is a very heavy program which leads me to conclude that the effort of this government and of the Prime Minister to improve and finish the 1982 constitutional undertaking is neither perfect nor complete and that there is still a lot of work to do. I hope we will be able to do it, that we will be able to take that step and to deal with the following stages with enthusiasm and honour because we find the incidents of the last few weeks very unfortunate. I hope that on the evening of June 23 all Canadians will be able to celebrate the completion of this constitutional stage which, in my estimation, is very important.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened to as much of the hon. member's speech as I possibly could and found it very interesting.

One of the comments the hon. member made toward the end of his remarks was about some of the difficulties we are facing in the land right now with this whole process of constitutional reform. That is to say we seem to have a lot of people with their own agendas, which is understandable. I do not mean to speak of that in a derogatory manner. But people have individual concerns that they want raised as constitutional issues. The difficulty we seem to be facing today is that there is a sense in the country that unless we are successful in doing all of this in this process that somehow in some way we end up limiting the constitutional possibilities in the future.

I am just wondering if the hon. member could comment on that concern in the sense that we can build the nation using this as the first of many steps of constitutional reform that we need to see.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I will respond very briefly to the question because I believe my time has almost expired and I know the members of the House want to listen to the Prime Minister.

I think the hon. member is quite right. There is not much point in considering future discussions on Senate reform, aboriginal rights, multicultural linguistic minority rights and territorial participation in the federation if this constitutional exercise is not concluded this coming June 23.

I share the views of my colleague. At this stage of our constitutional discussions it is essential that we complete this round first. It is obviously not perfect, but it is essential if we want to deal with other issues in coming months and years.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have just come from a meeting with the agricultural leaders of Canada in preparation for the Houston Summit. I was advised of the very gracious gesture by the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel in accommodating my speaking here today. I wanted to thank him personally for that.

It is with some poignancy that I recall it was some 30 years ago that the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel and I as fellow students at Laval University in Quebec City were discussing at great length some of the same constitutional problems that are before this House today.

I remember the member as an active participant in those debates. Some of the questions raised then, as I think back, have bedevilled Canada ever since. I think some of the solutions that he and other members have put forward have been incorporated into a broader perspective that we all hope will bring greater unity and harmony to Canada.

[Translation]

I personally thank the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, former minister in the Liberal government, for his kindness in offering his place so that I could take part in this debate today.

[English]

This week, as few times before, Canadians feel the weight of our history. After a long and sometimes difficult journey, we are now only three days away from June 23. Today, the past of which we are all so proud is balanced against the future that we all so ardently desire.

In April 1987, in the Gatineau hills, we began a voyage that has led so far to the ratification of the Meech Lake Accord by eight provinces representing 94 per cent of the Canadian population and by the Parliament of Canada. The path has led us to the legislatures of Newfoundland and Labrador and Manitoba, on whose steps an anxious nation now waits.

When First Ministers met on June 3, the concerns raised in the three years since the accord was first signed were all part and parcel of the problems that were on the table for resolution. For seven difficult days these issues were debated, analysed, and discussed at great length. Proposals were exchanged and ultimately an agreement was arrived at. This agreement is reflected in the final communiqué dated June 9, 1990, with the appropriate caveats as expressed by the premier of Newfoundland and Labrador and the premier of Manitoba.

The Premiers of New Brunswick, Manitoba, and Newfoundland and Labrador undertook to submit the Constitution Amendment, 1987, the Meech Lake Accord, for appropriate legislative or public consideration and "to use every possible effort to achieve decision prior to June 23, 1990".

Since then the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick has unanimously adopted the Meech Lake Accord, together with two companion resolutions.

Today, with this motion, Mr. Speaker, we as members of the Parliament of Canada simply and respectfully urge the Legislative Assemblies of Manitoba and Newfoundland to bring about the full ratification of the Meech Lake Accord.

There is no attempt by the Parliament of Canada to intrude upon anyone else's jurisdiction, but the national Parliament, using precedent from past decades and past years, has both the opportunity and the obligation from time to time to speak out and respectfully urge other legislatures to take cognizance of important matters, and this is one that is important to the future of the country.

We all appreciate the heavy responsibility which now rests on our fellow legislators in those provinces who must complete the ratification process. We have the greatest respect for the rules of their legislatures and for the procedures to which they have chosen to subject their decisions. But there is a compelling national interest that the Meech Lake Accord be brought to a vote before June 23.

As all parliamentarians know from experience, political will can always overcome procedural obstacles.

I am advised by Premier Wells that the free vote which he plans for the Newfoundland and Labrador House of Assembly will take place either late Thursday evening or early Friday morning. I salute him on selecting this method which included consultation by the members of the House of Assembly with their electors for voting on the accord and on the companion resolution. True to his signature, he has asked the members of his legislature to express their opinions and to vote on this crucial question before the deadline.

Premier Wells has extended an invitation to myself and to the other First Ministers who signed the communiqué to address the Newfoundland House of Assembly on the subject of the Meech Lake Accord.

Earlier today I had the opportunity to watch part of a quite remarkable address by the premier of Ontario to the legislature of Newfoundland and Labrador, a very compelling and eloquent statement on national unity, strongly urging the ratification of the Meech Lake Accord in the interests of Canada's well-being. Premier McKenna, I understand, was there this afternoon.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have accepted the kind invitation of Premier Wells, and I will be speaking in the legislature of Newfoundland and Labrador tomorrow.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: The situation in Manitoba is obviously less clear-cut. The Manitoba legislature and the three party leaders in particular face a difficult choice. Nothing is more difficult to manage politically than a minority government situation. To have done so while dealing with a constitutional provision of enormous importance is for Premier Filmon a great challenge. I know that all Canadians wish him well in this very challenging endeavour.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Both Mrs. Carstairs and Mr. Doer in fact played significant and helpful roles during the Ottawa conference, and they will no doubt deploy every effort to ensure passage of the Meech Lake Accord.

If they accept, as I do, that the adoption of the Meech Lake Accord is essential for our future unity, they will of course weigh carefully the meaning of the words "every possible effort" and do everything in their power to allow the elected members of their legislature to express their views on our constitutional future before June 23. They will want, I am sure, as many of us will, to reflect again on why it is so vitally important that the Meech Lake Accord be ratified.

What must be remembered is that in the referendum campaign of 1980 Quebecers were promised a renewed federalism. They voted for a new Canada, proud of its past and confident in its future, to which everyone would contribute their own particular values and their convictions and their dreams in order to build a better Canada for themselves and for their children.

Yet, in 1982, Quebec, which had only two years earlier chosen to keep its destiny linked to that of Canada's, was not a signatory to our Constitution. Canadians know in their hearts that one cannot build a strong, durable country on such questionable foundations. Clearly, a new effort on another day was required by all of those who love Canada to make this nation whole again.

What happened at Meech Lake was precisely that: ten premiers representing four different political parties from Newfoundland and Labrador to British Columbia, and the three leaders in this House of Commons, overwhelmingly said that a new day had arrived to make Canada whole again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1740)

Mr. Mulroney: Provincial first ministers recognized this in Edmonton in August, 1986 when they issued the unanimous declaration designed to bring about Quebec's full and active participation in the Canadian federation.

[Translation]

The unanimous decision by the provincial premiers in Edmonton to promote Quebec's return to the constitutional fold was an intelligent and generous response to the legitimate demands formulated by the Bourassa government.

[English]

In 1985, with a federalist Liberal government in office in Quebec, five principles for the resolution of our problem were laid out and the way began to be cleared to continue to build our common destiny. The success of Meech Lake in 1987 was, above all, a gain for Canada, for all of Canada, for the strength and unity of Canada. That is why I think that this House twice adopted the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

Meech Lake affirms the principle of the equality of the provinces. It clarifies and confirms the spending power of the federal Parliament in respect of programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. It strengthens through entrenchment the Supreme Court of Canada as the highest court in the land. It provides the provinces with a say in the selection of senators, although in all cases the final decision on appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada and appointments to the Senate rests with the Government of Canada.

[Translation]

Like many of my colleagues in this House and like many Canadians, I realize that this agreement, essential though it is to our country's future, will never be able to respond to all the aspirations nor appease all the fears of certain groups or individuals.

Mr. Speaker, that is not its purpose. As a Parliament cannot be defined by the stones used to build it, no constitutional text can ever contain the entire soul of a nation. It is my profound conviction that we can judge the effectiveness of a Constitution by its ability to inspire respect for institutions and affection and compassion for humankind.

Like thousands of Canadians, I felt the breath, the spirit of Meech Lake on that Saturday night, on June 9, 1990, when the Premiers of all Canadian provinces and the leaders of the Northwest Territories and Yukon appeared in turn before the television cameras to express, in terms most eloquent, their pride in having been able to contribute to the unity of this country, a country we all love: Canada.

Through the voices of the Premiers the same message came through, loud and clear: Canada is a magnificent country, and we have a responsibility to future generations to preserve it and make it grow. And that is exactly what we are doing with the Meech Lake Accord.!

[English]

With our constitutional process unblocked by Quebec's return to the table, we will be able to turn our attention to an agenda such as Senate reform and aboriginal constitutional matters.

Premier Penikett of Yukon said on June 9:

> After three years of debate and discussion it is clear to us that constitutional evolution is not a series of discrete steps but a fluid process. We will meet again as we have in the past and I hope work together to create a Constitution which all Canadians, aboriginal and non-aboriginal, French and English, east and west, south and north recognize as the sum of this country.

If, despite the agreement reached at the Ottawa Conference Centre, the remaining ratifications were not obtained, no one here or anywhere else can say for sure what our future might be. I for one, cannot tell this House if or when another opportunity to make the changes so important to so many Canadians—Senate reform, further gender equality rights and aboriginal rights—would present itself again.

Quebec, in confidence and maturity, has proposed to return to the Canadian constitutional family. If we do not seize this chance now, if we do not seize this glorious chance now, who can say if and when it would arise again.

The uncertainty caused by the failure to resolve our constitutional problems could harm our chances to regenerate the outstanding economic and employment growth that we have known in the recent past, and I believe are poised to achieve again over the next few years.

I am deeply encouraged that the legislators of Manitoba and Newfoundland and Labrador are now debating this historic accord. I express the fervent hope of members from all parties of this House that they will pass it within the time frames.

I also call upon the other legislatures to ratify the companion resolution agreed to in Ottawa which provides progress toward the goal of Senate reform; the protection of gender equality rights; a fairer deal for the territories and for linguistic minorities; and important gains on aboriginal constitutional issues.

The aboriginal peoples have the assurance of a separate constitutional process dedicated to aboriginal constitutional matters that would involve their participation in First Ministers' Conferences every three years.

We placed before a meeting of the representative group of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs on Sunday a proposal that would provide for, first, a federal–aboriginal process to set the agenda for the First Ministers' Conference on aboriginal matters and the acceleration of the holding of the first conference.

Second, a commitment by the Government of Canada to full constitutional recognition of the aboriginal peoples as a fundamental characteristic of Canada.

Third, the participation of representatives of the aboriginal peoples of Canada at any future First Ministers' Conference held to discuss the recognition's clause.

Fourth, an invitation to participate in all First Ministers' Conferences where matters being discussed directly affect the aboriginal peoples.

Fifth, a most important historic matter for the aboriginal peoples, the joint definition of treaty rights.

Sixth, the establishment of a royal commission on native affairs of the scope and the impact of the historic Bilingualism and Biculturalism Commission that made such a beneficial change 25 years ago, and this new royal commission on native affairs can do at least as much to advance the cause of aboriginal justice now and into the future in Canada.

This six-point proposal is, I think, generous and comprehensive in response to the legitimate demands of aboriginal peoples. It highlights as well the consequences to all of us in not succeeding in restoring the full constitutional family to the table.

I have said in this House, and others have remarked upon it as well, that I remember well under the 1982 Constitution being called upon as Prime Minister of Canada to chair a First Ministers' Conference seeking an amendment to provide for justice for the aboriginal peoples of Canada. I believed then and I believe today that that amendment so vital to the well-being of the aboriginal peoples of Canada would have been achieved had Quebec been at the constitutional table at the time, because the government of Quebec had clearly signalled that it would support that kind of an aboriginal initiative for justice.

The absence of Quebec already at that time had taken a terrible toll on something that we all hold dear, and that is the promotion of instruments of greater justice, greater fairness and greater equality for the aboriginal peoples.

In spite of the very comprehensive nature of the proposal that we have put forward on behalf of all parliamentarians to secure greater justice for the aboriginal peoples, clearly a condition precedent to this taking place is the return of Quebec to the constitutional table because Quebec is an ally of the aboriginal peoples and it is in Canada's interest and in the interest of the aboriginal peoples that Quebec come safely home to the constitutional table and thereafter the first matter that will achieve greater justice and greater dignity will be the aboriginal peoples themselves.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1750)

Mr. Mulroney: So, Mr. Speaker, we can either reap the benefits of constitutional evolution or pause with regret to contemplate what might have been.

I respectfully urge the political leaders of Manitoba to honour the commitment given solemnly on June 9, 1990, to use every possible effort to achieve a decision on the Meech Lake Accord prior to June 23, 1990.

Ten days hence, on July 1, I believe that we will all be able to celebrate together a new beginning of our future as a more united and more confident Canada, the kind of Canada that will engender greater social justice, greater equality of opportunity, greater prosperity for our children, greater dignity for all of its citizens, and a Canadian citizenship that will be a source of pride for all the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have to begin by saying that it is very clear, in spite of the Prime Minister's words and the applause of his supporters, that it is his mishandling of Canada's present constitutional situation that has created a serious and difficult circumstance for our country.

It did not have to be this way. Three years ago, we of the Official Opposition, offered a number of amendments, proposals regarding the constitutional accord of 1987, which, if they had been accepted, would have removed the concerns about that accord which had been expressed by many Canadians.

These amendments that we proposed were consistent with Quebec's five proposals, proposals which have been acceptable, generally, to parties in this House.

This Prime Minister and his government stubbornly rejected these proposals. They rejected, out of hand, these Liberal amendments. If they had been accepted, it is high likely the constitutional impasse that has worried Canadians for the past several months would not have occurred. This is one reason why I have to say it is because of this Prime Minister and his government's mishandling of the constitutional situation that we have the current atmosphere of crisis and impasse.

We believe the Prime Minister showed a lack of essential leadership by waiting to try to resolve the constitutional impasse until after Premier McKenna had made his proposal for a companion resolution. It was clear from the time that proposal by Premier McKenna was made, and even before, that only the dynamic created by the Prime Minister and all the Premiers sitting and talking around the same table could lead to the development of a consensus for a solution to the constitutional impasse.

We know all too well how the Prime Minister absolutely refused to convene a meeting of First Ministers even though we of the Official Opposition Had been calling for just such a meeting for months for the reason I have just given.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister always answered our requests for such a meeting with basically the same argument. He said it would be premature to call a meeting of First Ministers and that Senator Murray was still out there somewhere, searching for common ground.

We now know and Canadians now know that was not the reason for the Prime Minister's delay or his refusal in convening a meeting of First Ministers. No, Mr. Speaker, that was not the reason at all.

On Monday, June 11, the day after the signing of the communiqué for the 1990 companion accord, after a week of discussions at the Conference Centre between himself and the provincial premiers, the Prime Minister gave an interview to The Globe and Mail of Toronto, and in that interview he said he had held a strategy meeting with his advisors and in talking about that meeting stated:

> And so I decided after consultations with my colleagues, mostly with Senator (Lowell) Murray and Paul Tellier, Norman Spector, people like this, that—I remember when I told them, I called them right here, I asked them to come and see me, and I told them when this thing was going to take place. I told them a month ago when we were going to start meeting. It's like an election campaign, you've got to work backwards. You've got to pick your dates and you work backward from it. And that—and I said that's the day that I'm going to roll all the dice. It's the only way to handle it.
> Q: And this was a month ago?
>
> A: About a month ago.
> Q: Roll of the dice, this was a conscious, obvious decision.

A: You had to roll all the—the only way that this could be done was to roll all the dice.

Mr. Speaker, what a shocking admission. Is this the way to run a country, much less reach a decision on its constitution? Obviously, in the view of Canadians this is not the way to run a country or a constitution; it is not even the way to run a crap game.

The timing of the First Ministers' meeting had nothing to do with finding common ground among the First Ministers. But by the Prime Minister's own admission, it had everything to do with creating the crisis atmosphere which sometimes works in labour–management negotiations.

But as I have said before in this House, constitutional negotiations are not labour negotiations. They are matters of much greater consequence and much greater sensitivity. They should not, they must not be left to the last minute as the Prime Minister did, as a conscious and deliberate act. Also, the Prime Minister has no right to stake the future of this country on the roll of the dice. You do not roll the dice with the future of Canada as the stake.

The Prime Minister well knew that there was a time limit, a June 23 date. He well knew, or should have known, that Manitoba's legislature had a debating and a public hearing process it had to go through under its rules in order to deal with and make a decision on constitutional matters.

The Prime Minister well knew, or should have known, that in any legislative body, in any legislative process, there is a risk of procedural problems and procedural hang–ups. In the case of Manitoba, there was a requirement for public input and all of these things. The working out of the procedural problems, the requirement for public input could and would use up precious time, time that was all too short and limited.

Yet, by deliberately waiting until the last minute, the Prime Minister invited these problems, the very problems he was talking about in this House just a few minutes ago. He invited them himself. I could say that he created them through his delay and his devious manipulation of the constitutional discussions.

In the way he did it, he did not ensure there was adequate room, beyond all question, for the legislature of Manitoba to work its way through any possible constitutional problem or to have the hearing process that the degree of public interest in that province would warrant and which its own legislature rules required. The Prime Minister and the Prime Minister alone, must bear the responsibility for the mess that has been made by him and his government of the constitutional situation. It is his mess and it is his responsibility. He cannot shift any blame or responsibility for that situation to anyone else. He should look at himself in the mirror and recognize that he is responsible for the difficult situation the country is in during this current constitutional impasse.

• (1800)

By his own admission he created this difficult situation and this mess in a deliberate way. He did so, as he told The Globe and Mail, in a way for which he has no apologies at all for the process he organized, one carried out in secret, one without participation of the public, one done in a crisis atmosphere and at the very last minute. For this, as he told The Globe and Mail he has absolutely no apologies.

He certainly owes an apology to Canadians for the mess he has made of Canada's constitutional situation. He owes Canadians more of an effort than he has been making up until now to try to clean up that mess.

I welcome, and we welcome, his announcement that he will speak to the Assembly of Newfoundland. But another of the major areas of concern is that of the aboriginal peoples of Canada. The Prime Minister sent Senator Murray to talk to the aboriginal leaders in Manitoba but they were not satisfied with what Senator Murray had to say. Yet the Prime Minister has for days refused to take the extra step we recommended, to go himself to meet and talk with the aboriginal leaders in Manitoba.

Today in his speech the Prime Minister spoke about the generous package which was offered at the last minute to the aboriginal leaders. But the Prime Minister has not explained why that generous package was not put forward to the provincial premiers and the aboriginal leaders during the week of discussions in the Conference Centre here in Ottawa. If that had been done, we might be in a very different situation today when it comes to whether or not the impasse will be broken and the accord will be adopted and proclaimed by June 23.

If he is going to meet and speak to the House of Assembly of Newfoundland, the least he could do is also go and meet with the aboriginal leaders of Canada and talk to them about their concerns and what he and his government intend to do to respond to them in a meaningful way. This is an aspect of leadership, and if he expects to be looked upon as the leader of this country, he must take more meaningful action than he has done to resolve this difficult situation. Yet, we see he has left himself with almost no time to spare to work it out.

[Translation]

As I said on June 11 when I spoke in this House in response to the Prime Minister's statement in which he reported on the discussions that took place between him and the provincial premiers:

> We understand the importance of the 1987 constitutional amendment, the purpose of which was to make Quebec a full member of the constitutional family. With Quebec back in, we can fully discuss all the constitutional changes being called for by groups and regions throughout our country.

[English]

We recognize there is much more still to be done in order to have a Constitution that responds to the needs and concerns of our aboriginal people, women, minority language groups, multicultural groups, the Territories and those who want a reformed Senate. As I said in the House last Monday, if we stay together as a country, then everything and anything is possible by way of constructive constitutional change, by way of working out how we can live together in a better, more secure and more constructive fashion. If we do not stay together as a country, then nothing is possible and everything that we have concerns about in regard to how we live together will be meaningless and irrelevant. Therefore, we must strive to maintain the unity of this country in spite of what I believe the Prime Minister and his government have done to weaken this unity and the strains they have put upon it.

The Prime Minister came into office pledging that he would bring about a new and greater national reconciliation. Yet, especially in the past three years under his Prime Ministership, we have had a great and troubling increase in the divisions and tensions between regions and groups and in expressions of disunity among some of the people in this country. It is now clear that the Prime Minister must take the blame and the responsibility for these divisions, tensions and disunity. It is now clear he created the conditions for it by the way he mishandled our constitutional situation through delay, manoeuvre and manipulation.

All of us must work to ensure the preservation and the strengthening of Canada, in spite of its present Prime Minister and government. We must work to ensure it stays united until and long after the people of Canada can and will exercise their judgment in an election and make the changes it is already clear that they want to create and to ensure a better and a more united Canada with a welcome place in it for all its people and all its regions.

On June 11, I said in this House we believe that the final communiqué setting out the accord of 1990, signed by the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister, during their week-long conference, can provide the basis for the successful resolution of that constitutional impasse. I went on to say that I hope the New Brunswick, Manitoba and Newfoundland legislatures will accept this agreement, this accord of 1990, and thereby will approve the 1987 constitutional amendment before June 23. New Brunswick has now done so. The Newfoundland House of Assembly will vote tomorrow or Friday, but the matter remains before the Legislature of Manitoba.

I want to say that, as far as I am concerned, in being asked to make a decision on the motion before us, we are being asked to deal with a motion which requests that the legislatures of Newfoundland and Manitoba take prompt decisions on the constitutional accord of 1987. This motion does not ask this House to pronounce itself again on the constitutional accord of 1987. This is something it has already done. Also, this motion, this resolution, does not ask this House to lecture or to instruct the members of the legislatures of Newfoundland and Manitoba on how to go about their business, how to carry out their responsibilities. It gives no instructions or advice on procedures they should follow.

I do not think that the members of the legislatures of Newfoundland and Manitoba need to be lectured by the Prime Minister or his ministers in this House. As I said on June 11, I am confident that the members of the legislature of Manitoba and the House of Assembly of Newfoundland are very much aware of their responsibilities for the future of Canada and I am sure they take these responsibilities very seriously.

In this connection, I want to remind the House of the words of Clyde Wells, the Premier of Newfoundland, to the House of Assembly of that province on the morning of June 11. He said: "I am confident that the members of this honourable House and, indeed, all Newfoundlanders and Labradorans will express their views on the basis of their own sincere convictions and with the future of Canada foremost in their minds and their hearts".

I say now as I said June 11 that calling upon us, the people of Newfoundland and in fact all the people of this country to keep the future of Canada foremost in our minds and in our hearts are wise and welcome words from the Premier of Newfoundland. They should serve as an example and a signal for all of us.

I believe it would be in the best interests of this country and its future, if the present impasse could be resolved by June 23. It would be better if the uncertainty created by the Prime Minister's mishandling of the constitutional situation could be, if not removed, at least lessened and not extended beyond June 23 if at all possible.

For these reasons, I support the motion before us, not because it is necessary in any constitutional or legal way to resolve the current impasse but because we Liberals want to send a strong message that Canada is worth preserving, that Canada must be preserved. We should all give priority to making sure it is preserved in the interests of all its people, all its regions, for our children and the future generations.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but leave my notes as I start this speech, which I had not planned to do. I am forced to do it by the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition in the House who I think has made a bit of an incredible statement in the present circumstances.

I find it a bit awkward that he would ask the Prime Minister of Canada to take the blame for any problems we would have had with the present constitutional debate while the future Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada takes to hiding from the present constitutional debate. In fact, the context is unique in itself as the Leader in the House of Commons for the Liberal Party today says that he supports the resolution put before the House, but the future Liberal Leader who is now in Calgary cannot tell Canadians where he stands on the most important issue before us today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Charest: It is quite an incredible situation for all of us. Canadians will be the judge.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Canada has been in a state of constitutional crisis for the past several weeks and even months. It is not the first time in our history that our young country is going through such a crisis. In fact, 25 years ago, the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, the Laurendeau–Dunton Commission, made public an interim report saying that Canada was facing the worst crisis in its history. Well, 25 years later, we are once again facing one of the worst crises in our history.

Between 1965 and 1990, the Canadian people have debated constitutional issues a number of times. In 1967, our centennial year, Ontario Premier John Robarts called a conference to discuss the future of the Canadian federation. In February 1968, Prime Minister Pearson called a constitutional conference to discuss findings contained in the report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. They talked about the formula for amending the Constitution, the Supreme Court of Canada and the possibility of involving provinces in the appointment of Supreme Court judges, which we find in the Meech Lake Accord that we want to see ratified in 1990. They also discussed linguistic rights and regional disparities, issues that are just as important today.

At the famous constitutional conference held in Victoria in 1971, they went back to the issues discussed in 1968 and reached a consensus on the condition that the First Ministers consult their respective legislatures within 12 days and return with their opinion.

We know today what happened after that constitutional conference, when Mr. Bourassa made an important decision and said on behalf of the Quebec people that he was not satisfied with what they were offering him.

We always think of the failure of 1971 when studying the Meech Lake Accord. In 1976, Mr. Trudeau proposed another constitutional initiative, based this time on the patriation of our Constitution. In fact, Mr. Trudeau was always true to himself: after 1976, every constitutional initiative that he proposed had the patriation of our Constitution as its main objective.

At that time, he proposed three options for the patriation, but the provinces—and Mr. Lougheed from Alberta was their spokesperson—gave him the following answer: "There will be no patriation of our Constitution until we have the opportunity to discuss the roles, the jurisdictions and the powers of our provinces. We have to discuss the substance before we can discuss the form." The premier of Alberta said at that time—and it is interesting to note that today because, after all, we are talking about things that were said and written in 1976—that the provinces wanted more power, Mr. Speaker, in the area of immigration. Imagine, in the area of immigration!

What does the Meech Lake Accord do if not precisely respect the wish of the vast majority of provinces in 1976? At that time, Premier Lougheed told the Prime Minister of Canada that he wanted to discuss language rights and other powers. He also said, among other things, that he wished that a requirement to hold annual first ministers conferences on the economy be written into the Constitution.

That request, Mr. Speaker, was presented in 1976, not in 1987, not during the Meech Lake negotiations three years ago. That was the wish Premier Lougheed of Alberta expressed in 1976 on behalf of his colleagues, the other premiers.

In 1976, Mr. Speaker, the Parti Québécois was elected. That election completely redefined the constitutional picture in Canada. In 1977, Mr. Trudeau reiterated his intent to patriate the Constitution, and he also put together a royal commission of inquiry, known as the Pépin–Robarts Commission. In 1965, we had the first interim report, by the Laurendeau–Dunton Commission and in 1977, the idea was revived by the Pépin–Robarts Commission.

In 1978, a White Paper was tabled. That White Paper, Mr. Speaker, prepared in 1978, stipulated that the Canadian Senate was to be replaced, or reformed by July 1st, 1979! The federal government intended to reform the Senate within a year. What was planned? A House of Federation House where half the senators would be appointed by the provinces, and half, by the federal government.

I refer to that, Mr. Speaker, for all those who are shocked today because the Meech Lake Accord gives the provinces a say in choosing senators. Can you believe that in some areas of Canada, people are shocked because the provinces will now be able to submit names—even if, as the Prime Minister pointed out, the final decision is still going to be made by the federal governement— whereas in 1978, Mr. Trudeau was planning to let the provinces appoint half the members of the new Senate.

Nothing new there, Mr. Speaker. All this to tell you that there is not much that is new in the Meech Lake Accord. And this is only up to 1978. As well, in 1978, as in 1968—there seems to be a 10-year cycle here—the Supreme Court of Canada was an issue again. In 1978, Mr. Trudeau also proposed that the provinces play a role in the appointment of judges to the Supreme Court of Canada. This is not very surprising in a federation where the highest court of the land makes the final decisions and is the arbitrator between the provincial and federal jurisdictions. It is not surprising that we can expect the two levels of government to have their say in the appointment of those arbitrators. Don't you think that is only good common sense? In any case, I do. Mr. Trudeau thought so in 1978, Mr. Pearson thought so in 1968 and I believe Mr. Mulroney's opinion on the matter is the same in 1990 as it was in 1987–1988.

In 1980, Mr. Speaker, there was the referendum in Quebec. I do not wish to drag on on this subject. Suffice it to say that a commitment was taken, a commitment to a renewed federalism, a clear commitment, in any case, clear enough so that the vast majority of Quebecers could understand it as such. And several important politicians in this country went to campaign in Quebec, including our colleague from the House of Commons, the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is here today. He was among those who went to Quebec, with the Prime Minister of Canada, to make this commitment to Quebecers. But, unfortunately, for all sorts of reasons, it was not possible to respect fully the commitment made in 1980.

I do not want to go into detail; suffice it to say that two things happened in 1981–1982. First of all for the first time in its history, the Quebec National Assembly had its powers curtailed without its consent. That was the reality of the year 1981. We can look at it from every angle and try to blame it on whoever we want, but it is a fact and no one can deny it. Second, that curtailment of powers was decided against the will of the province of Quebec and of the Quebec National Assembly which had passed a bipartite resolution agreed to by both the Parti Québécois and the Quebec Liberal Party condemning these action of the federal government. It is in the history books and it is what we will remember about 1981–82 in the years to come.

In 1984, a new Federal government came to power, and in 1985 a new provincial government was elected in Quebec. Mr. Bourassa came into office and had his mind set on an important décision which was to be expressed in a speech delivered by his Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Mr. Rémillard, in the spring of 1985 in which he stated the will of the governement of Quebec to get the province back again into the constitutional family. Indeed, Mr. Bourassa felt at the time that such an invitation was being extended to his province. And at that time, the Governement of Quebec did state the five demands to be laid on the table, that is the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, some additionnal powers as regards immigration, which was part of the 1975 discussions, entrenchment in the Constitution of the three seats on the Supreme Court that Quebec holds today, another proposal that was discussed in 1968 and in 1978, certain conditions to the spending power of the federal government and also a veto power for the province of Quebec.

In August 1986, the provincial premiers, without the federal government, decided to go along with this and set as their top constitutional priority the return of Quebec to the Canadian fold, based on Quebec's five conditions. This was not much of a surprise. Later on, Mr. Speaker, there was in 1987 the Meech Lake Accord negotiation, the Langevin Accord negotiation on June 3, 1987, and sometime later, more specifically on June 23, 1987, the ratification of the Meech Lake Accord by the Quebec National Assembly, which brings us to June 23, 1990, because it must be said that the three-year time limit was not chosen by Brian Mulroney or anybody else, but by the rules set in the 1982 Constitution which provided that when a legislature adopts constitutional amendments, they must be dealt with within the next three years. There was, therefore, no discretion there.

Since then, the accord was ratified by the House of Commons not once but twice because, apparently, once was not enough, it had to be done twice. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, this accord has been widely debated in Canada ever since.

Since 1987, there were a number of parliamentary commissions. Were there three? No. Were there four? Do you think there were four, Mr. Speaker? You are not sure? Let me tell you how many. You can double this figure. There were altogether eight commissions! In British Columbia, the Meech Lake Accord was debated and adopted. In Alberta, it was debated and adopted. In Saskatchewan, it was debated and adopted. In Ontario, there was a parliamentary commission; the accord was debated and adopted. In New Brunswick, a parliamentary committee held a very very long debate. The Meech Lake Accord was adopted there this week; it was also debated in the legislature. In Nova Scotia, it was debated and adopted. In Prince Edward Island, there was a parliamentary commission and the accord was adopted. In Quebec, there was a parliamentary commission and the accord was adopted. In Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, I think there was a parliamentary commission, but I am not sure; the accord was unanimously adopted and later on almost rejected. It was rejected recently and now, it is debated for the third time.

This is the point we have reached in the debate on the Meech Lake Accord. In Manitoba, Mr. Speaker, there was a parliamentary debate, a committee, a task force, the so-called Manitoba Task Force on Meech Lake—I have the document here. What they heard, which is worth repeating, is what appeared on page 2 of the English version which read:

[English]

The hearings conducted in Manitoba were the most extensive held in Canada. Over 300 Manitobans made presentations before the task force. Over 40 individuals and organizations for Manitoba who did not appear before the task force submitted written briefs. All of the presentations of briefs are listed.

The Meech Lake Accord, the companion resolution, everything around this constitutional debate has been debated extensively for the last three years. In fact, by going through the chronology of events I have just gone through since 1968, most of the issues debated today in the Meech Lake Accord have been debated in this country for close to the last 30 years.

There is no issue. I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no issue in this accord that is new to Canadians. There is no issue that has not been extensively debated, including the committee that I chaired that heard more than 160 witnesses. We received close to 900 briefs, travelled to Yellowknife, Whitehorse, Vancouver, spent three and a half days in Winnipeg, Manitoba, spent several days in the national capital region here, and spent two and a half days in St. John's, Newfoundland.

This debate and these accords have been extensively debated as well as all the issues that are found within them.

I think it is important today to remind ourselves of these debates, what they contain, and what we have said. The question put today before the House of Commons is extremely important. The House of Commons is in fact calling upon the legislatures of both Newfoundland and Labrador and the legislature of Manitoba to put this question and this issue before their legislatures for a vote.

That is what is most fundamental in our country and consistent with the commitment made by the premier of Manitoba, Mr. Filmon, on June 9, when he signed the agreement with the other premiers of this country and the Prime Minister of Canada. That is what is being asked by the House of Commons today of these two legislatures so that we can finally get over this debate.

One of the questions that has come up more recently is that we should extend the delay. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that that question has also been studied extensively and in fact the committee that I chaired studied that question very closely.

The first recommendation that we made in our own report published on May 17 says very clearly, and it is not by accident that it is the very first recommendation made, that your committee is of the opinion that June 23, 1990, is a political reality.

There is a reason for that, Mr. Speaker. This debate has gone on long enough. There have been eight parliamentary committees. The issues debated within these accords have been debated close to 30 years. The moment of truth has come. Legislatures must face up to that moment and put this accord to a vote.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I think there are some lessons we can learn from the present debate.

[Translation]

There are conclusions to be drawn from this debate, Mr. Speaker.

• (1830)

In any case, I drew my own conclusions, which bind no one. After chairing a committee that produced recommendations which were received with much emotion, mind you, I can tell you that I had a chance to think. One thing I observed is that the amending formula we used this time had its first test, because it is only eight years old, at the expense of the Meech Lake Accord. It is unfortunate, but that is a fact. The Meech Lake Accord paid the price of being the first test of an amending formula that we did not fully know or understand. That is the price. It means that next time, constitutional agreements will be negotiated differently, not in the same way.

The second thing I observed is that Canadians everywhere want to take an active part in developing and amending their Constitution. That is very clear from the experience we just went through. It came out clearly from the hearings we held.

The third thing I observed, and it is worth mentioning, although it may seem obvious to you, but some Canadians who have not yet realized it must be told that Canada is a land of regions, a vast country where people live differently from place to place. We do not always share the same experiences. We do not always perceive things, events and even documents in the same way. This means that Canada as a country is cut out for federalism.

Mr. Speaker, here is the fourth point: Although Quebec will not be reconciled constitutionally, in spite of my hopes, it will be reconciled in other ways. It will be reconciled in Canadian political circles. And this was made apparent in the experience the government of Quebec went through recently with the government of Canada which stood by Quebec on this constitutional issue till the end. Quebec also had unfailing ally in the person of the Premier of British Columbia, Mr. Vander Zalm, for whom it might have been relatively easy in political terms to oppose the Meech Lake Accord, in view of the upcoming elections in his province. There was also the Premier of Alberta, Mr. Getty, who was under pressure from his own party to oppose the accord following a convention held a few months ago. In spite of the pressures, he stood up for Canada and he stood up for Quebec too. That has to be pointed out.

Premier Devine of Saskatchewan, who will also run in a provincial election in the next few months, stood up for Quebec and for Canada. He went all the way, Mr. Speaker, on June 9 this year, as he had on June 3, 1987, in the Langevin Building. In Ontario, Quebec had Premier Peterson's unfailing support. I may not be Liberal, but such facts must nonetheless be recognized. There was also Mr. Rae, from the New Democratic Party, and Mr. Harris, a Conservative, for whom it might have been easy to object to the whole thing— But no, Mr. Speaker, they stood up for Quebec all the way, as did Premier Buchanan from Nova Scotia. Premier Ghiz, from Prince Edward Island, who is very articulate—I know that for a fact, having heard his testimony before our committee—took a passionate stand for Quebec. These things must be said. It is unfortunate that Quebecers can not be reminded of that enough. After all, they were not always there to witness those moments of passion and demonstration of commitment to Canada and Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I also came to the conclusion that our country is one of the few countries in the world, though I do not know them all, where the feeling of belonging to one's country is not the same from one area to the other. Let me explain that, Mr. Speaker. We must admit that a Quebecer will feel like a Canadian only inasmuch as he or she can be recognized as a Quebecer first and that is true for francophones and, in some cases, for anglophones.

The natives of our country offer another example of different feelings of belonging between individuals and between groups, Mr. Speaker. I think that we have come to realize in the last few days that a native will only feel he is a Canadian if he or she is recognized in our Constitution.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that my time is up. I really wanted to say that because we, as Canadians, are different from the Americans who, it appears, have a single allegiance to their country, their flag and their national anthem. We are only beginning to sense these great changes, these things which make us different.

Mr. Speaker—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, as you and others may remember, I was part of the 1983 debate when this House unanimously passed a resolution encouraging the Manitoba legislature to pass legislation on constitutional changes which would entrench French language services within that province.

Those motions, presented at two different times, were passed unanimously by this House. That was done in a non-partisan manner and with acceptance from all quarters of the House of Commons. That was done because we believed that the minority rights of the French speaking population in Manitoba must be protected.

It was not an easy task for many of us from the province of Manitoba. It was very obvious at that time that the resolution put forward by the Pawley government was not accepted by the majority of people in the province of Manitoba.

This House decided to intervene and passed the resolutions I spoke about. We could not have done anything more destructive. Not only did it not change the minds of the provincial Conservative MLAs in the legislature of Manitoba, because they continued to ring the bells and they continued to prevent the passage of that legislation, but it made it very difficult for those of us who were standing up for French language services in the province of Manitoba to explain our position within our own province.

I spoke after the present Prime Minister and after the present member for Winnipeg South Centre, the then member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry. I thought we were doing the right thing at that time, but I can tell you that the two motions passed by the House of Commons at that time did not have the desired effect.

I can tell you, after spending a week in my riding, that if this motion were put to a vote tonight it would have exactly the same effect in the province of Manitoba this week. There are people in our province who would like to see Meech passed. There are others who have grave reservations about the Meech Lake Accord but are willing to accept it because they believe it might be the right thing to do to promote the unity and the strength of our nation. But the one thing they will not accept is the interference of the Prime Minister of Canada.

I say that in a non-partisan way. I listened to the leaders of all three parties in the Manitoba legislature when they spoke on national television earlier today and they were saying exactly the same thing.

People in Manitoba, for whatever reasons, feel they have been manipulated when it comes to Meech Lake. The member of the Conservative Party who spoke just before me said that we have already had public hearings in Manitoba. That is true. However, it was known by the Prime Minister and this House that the three provincial leaders in Manitoba had promised that there would be further hearings after the first ministers' meeting which took place two weeks ago. That was known. That was not a surprise. That was known before those people came to the week-long meetings at the Conference Centre. It is part of the written agreement signed by the premier of Manitoba. It was stated when those same three people left Ottawa to promote Meech Lake and the companion accord in the province of Manitoba.

• (1840)

The technical slip-up by the Attorney General of Manitoba, which resulted in longer and longer delays occurring in that province, does not give any one party or all three parties the right to cancel public meetings in the province of Manitoba. No attempt to rewrite history in advance is going to be acceptable. No attempt to cast the blame ahead of time is going to be acceptable to the province of Manitoba.

When I spoke in 1983 on the French language services issue I spoke with emotion. I said that the people of my province were not bigots. Certainly, some people may have opinions which we would not find acceptable. That is the state within our nation. People have different views. People have unacceptable views from time to time.

The vast majority of those people want to have Quebec stay within our Confederation. The vast majority of those people would make accommodations if they saw that happening, but they cannot be manipulated time after time and expected, as a result of the motion here on June 20, to pass major constitutional amendments within the next three days. They cannot be expected to go against their word with regard to public hearings.

The Prime Minister, in his infamous countback from June 23, miscalculated. He made a technical mistake of his own. He made an error, and no bullying tactics by the House of Commons is going to do anything to help the public mood in the province of Manitoba.

As I said, in 1983 I spoke for French language rights in the province of Manitoba. That was not popular. I voted for Meech Lake in 1987. I spoke in favour of Meech Lake in 1988 during the election campaign. Those were not popular stands. I continue to believe that the Meech Lake Accord is the basis of a real accommodation for Quebec within our society. I believe it is an acceptable accommodation for Canadians, albeit at great emotional cost to many Canadians.

Some are concerned about the erosion of central powers by the federal government, a belief that the federal government has given up too much of its decision-making role to the provinces, especially in the area of social programs. There are others in our society who believe that there has been a loss of charter rights through the Meech Lake Accord. Those are valid opinions. I do not happen to share them, but they are valid opinions.

Those of multicultural and multi-ethic backgrounds in Canada feel excluded. They were ignored in Meech Lake, and they have been basically ignored in the three years since June 23, 1987.

However, as has been very evident over the last week and a half, it was the aboriginal Canadians who most severely and personally felt that they were being ignored. There is no one in this House who would ever deny that they are a distinct society. They are our first distinct society, and they should have been recognized. There should have been efforts to accommodate their concerns within Meech Lake within the last three years. A letter sent to Manitoba chiefs by the Prime Minister two days ago was not acceptable.

During the last three years those same aboriginal Canadians have felt threatened by this government. During Question Period today the government talked about its accomplishments in Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Government members talked about other of its accomplishments, but they did not talk about how native people feel about this government. They did not talk about what is happening out there.

Let me give you an example. It is a personal example but it hits home very well. Last night I was speaking in Thompson, Manitoba, at a gathering of students in the Access and NTEP programs, two programs that will lose their funding this fall. This program has existed in a number of forms over the last ten years. It has promoted and helped to educate native people as teachers, nurses and social workers. Last year that joint federal–provincial program was dismantled by the federal government. There was one year of extended funding. Some students in that program do not know where their funding will come from as of August 1 of this year, one month from now. Because of the federal government's cutbacks, there will be no new students accepted in those programs as of this fall.

We have a shortage of native teachers, native nurses and native social workers. We need more natives in engineering and other technical areas. How do you expect those people to take the great leap of faith to sign Meech Lake on the basis of some future goodwill by this Prime Minister when those same people are being denied their educational potential this coming fall? The government has made many other such cutbacks which have hardened the resolve of native people in this country.

Elijah Harper is one of my MLAs and I am very proud of the stand he took last week. He and I have both spoken in the past about the need to accommodate Quebec. He and I have both spoken about the need to protect native rights. We have said that those are joint common causes that should be worked on together by our nation. Elijah Harper, by the way, was one of those people who spoke in favour of the entrenchment of French language services. He did that in a riding which is 90 per cent Saulteaux and Cree. He spoke out about the need to defend the French minority and let that message go home to the province of Quebec.

For the last three years many native Canadians have been willing to accept the Meech Lake Accord. They had hoped that in that time the Prime Minister and others would take the necessary steps to show good faith. That did not happen.

The manipulative way that the province of Manitoba has been treated, the way that the native people feel they have been treated over the past three years, has made it very difficult to pass the Meech Lake Accord in the province of Manitoba in the next three days. I do not believe it will happen.

It will be a sad day for our nation. I am very concerned about what will happen on June 24, 25, and afterwards, because we do need to show goodwill. We do need to show faith. We do need to show a desire to bring this country together. But, unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the last three years were wasted.

Many people spoke out. Many people kept their own personal concerns to themselves. But there was not enough goodwill, not enough work, not enough honesty by the Government of Canada and it will have to accept the blame for the failure.

• (1850)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let me begin, if I may, with the words uttered by my friend from Churchill as he concluded. He is, as he knows, a member whom I respect in the House. He said that the work of the last three years has been wasted. I think that is precisely the question that we are debating here tonight, whether or not the work of the last three years has been wasted. I think that there is a genuine feeling throughout this House that it would not just be a shame, it could almost be a tragedy if that work were wasted.

There has been talk here, rather to my surprise, of bullying and of blame. As someone who has been involved in these discussions and these negotiations, and who is not myself blameless, I can certainly say that if blame were our purpose I could give you a list as thick as the Toronto telephone directory of people to whom blame can be ascribed.

But surely that is not our purpose because that takes us nowhere. What we want to do now in these last hours of this debate is find some way in which we can bring Canadians together to achieve, not an end, but to achieve a beginning, first, of constitutional renewal but then, and I think this is a much larger question, the beginning of a process of national renewal because none of us who has lived these last months can doubt that there are profound problems in this country that go beyond disagreements that arose in a particular negotiation among First Ministers.

These are the last hours of this debate. It is a question that is of fundamental importance to the whole country. By the turn of events the last debate will occur not in this Parliament but in the legislatures of Manitoba and Newfoundland and Labrador. I certainly do not take my place in this Chamber to try to lecture the elected members of those two legislatures. I know better than that. I tend to share something of the view of my colleague from Churchill with regard to the counter-productivity of one legislature trying to lecture another legislature. It is not any more helpful in politics than it is in other aspects of life for people to undertake that sort of conduct.

But, Sir, I think it is, on this question that is so fundamental to the country, legitimate that we express our views in these final hours in the hope that our views might be useful to the individual members of the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba and the individual members of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland and Labrador who have this final decision to take.

Let me begin with four propositions which inform my approach to this crisis in our national life. First, I believe that we are the luckiest country, the luckiest people in this world. Some of that good fortune we have earned ourselves. Some of it was given by God or was earned by others before us who surely have a right to expect that we would treasure and respect what it was that we inherited.

Second, there is an anger and a distemper in Canada that is more widespread that I can ever remember before. Hatred, Sir, is not too strong a word for some of the emotions that I have seen and heard. Obviously, anger that strong reveals a frustration that is profound and that is personal and we must all ask ourselves seriously why people are so angry and what we need to do to rebuild the basic bonds of goodwill that any community needs to hold itself together. We cannot repair anger by blaming others for it, but if we do not repair that anger it will feed, it will grow and it will tear this country apart.

Third, Meech Lake has become far more than a document signed by First Ministers. It is a symbol. More accurately, it is several symbols. For Canadians who oppose it, it is a symbol of something they dislike—a process, a government, a perceived unfairness; for some, unfortunately, a people.

For the wider world it is a symbol of the stability of Canada, whether we are a country the world can count on or a risk. For many Quebecers the symbol is direct and it is personal. Acceptance or rejection of Meech Lake is seen as acceptance or rejection of Quebec; not Quebec as the author of five conditions, not Quebec as a participant in an amending process, but Quebec as a partner in this country.

I have heard opponents of Meech Lake tell me that if Meech Lake is rejected Quebecers would be angry for a while and then would forget. Well, Sir, I do not believe that. Of course, I can be wrong, as we all can. But I have spent three decades in national affairs trying to understand what makes our different communities work and work together. All of that experience tells me that this rejection of Quebec as a partner in Canada would damage this country permanently.

I have no right to decide for others, but I pray that Canadians whose decisions might affect Meech lake would consider my view and would consider the consequences if I happen to be right.

The fourth proposition concerns aboriginal rights which appears to be the issue which was causing people to urge Elijah Harper to stop constitutional reform. I have some history on the question of aboriginal rights.

In 1973, Flora MacDonald, Frank Howard and I moved a motion that caused the first acceptance by a parliamentary committee of the concept of the legitimacy of aboriginal title. I have been involved throughout my public life with native people. I simply cannot understand the logic which says Meech Lake must be killed in order to advance aboriginal rights. Killing Meech Lake has the opposite effect. It makes action on aboriginal rights more difficult to achieve.

Aboriginal interests are, by definition, constitutional interests. If there is a constitutional impasse, nothing will be done on aboriginal rights. That is not theory, that is history, that is recent history. That is what happened when we tried to deal with aboriginal rights in 1985 and did not have the votes because Quebec, which would have voted for change, was not a part of the Constitution.

The only way to make progress on aboriginal rights, on Senate reform or on the other priorities agreed to by the 11 First Ministers is to start with what we have. To reject Meech Lake is to reject progress on aboriginal rights. Anyone who takes that action should be fully aware of the consequences.

Sir, I can fully understand why the National Citizens Coalition would act against aboriginal interests, but I cannot understand why Indian leaders themselves would do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the situation is critical. There is not much time left. But there is still time to succeed if we really want to. Meech can still be signed by Manitoba and by Newfoundland and Labrador. It is not over yet.

In the last three years, many have said that Meech was dead. Yet, it made it to this day. Maybe there are still some nice surprises left in Meech, one last time! I wish it were so with all my heart, for our greater benefit and for the benefit of our country, Canada.

• (1900)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, all of us watched, some of took part in that long discussion of seven days and seven nights. The most poignant moment on that ninth of June was when the pen passed to premiers whose earlier positions had put the Meech Lake Accord in doubt. Those premiers, Mr. McKenna, Mr. Filmon and Mr. Wells put their pen to paper at the end of the day, and in so doing demonstrated the best of Canadian qualities.

They had travelled far, they had strong views, principled positions and deep concerns. But in the overriding interests of keeping this country together—and I trust that is the overriding interest of all members of this House—they compromised, and all First Ministers compromised. They vowed to take Meech Lake back home, to put it to the representatives of their peoples and to let democracy take its course.

Other societies and other countries do it differently. They deny legitimacy to the concept of compromise. They do not accept that different parts of their societies can hold different things to be true. They prefer to resolve their differences through fiat or through fighting. That is not Canada. That is not the unique achievement which is admired around the world without reservation or without caveat. That has not been our experience, and it never can be if we wish Canada to continue.

Eleven days ago, eleven First Ministers made a solemn pledge to each other, to the Canadian people and to future generations. The three Canadian premiers who had travelled so far promised to use every means at their disposal to allow their people to decide on their Constitution. That was eleven days ago. Three days from today, Meech Lake will pass into history. It will either pass into history as a moment when Canada came to terms with itself and decided to move forward, recognizing that, of course, all was not perfect, but the perfection could not be approached until the country was whole once again. Or it will pass into history as a serious step backward for our country.

As was indicated in debate earlier today, and as I believe Premier Wells has now indicated, Newfoundland will vote, either tomorrow or on Friday in the House of Assembly. As the House knows, debate has now begun in the Legislature of Manitoba. That debate was delayed longer than anyone anticipated by procedural difficulties. The fact of that unanticipated and procedural delay has created a special situation that nobody anticipated. There was a commitment to make every effort to ensure that the agreement reached, after careful compromise and discussion in the best Canadian tradition, would be moved through the legislatures of the respective provinces. It is clear that the country is counting on that.

Just as procedural moves delayed debate in Manitoba, so surely procedural ways can be found to move debate forward so that the word of the three leaders of Manitoba can be honoured and so that the country can move forward to other priorities, whether those priorities are constitutional or whatever they are.

Just prior to the conclusion of the last conference on the Constitution in Ottawa, I spent two days in Europe in separate meetings with the foreign ministers of NATO and of the Helsinki process. Naturally, whatever point I tried to make in advancing the foreign policy of Canada, I was asked about Canada's problems at home. I was asked by incredulous ministers from Hungary, Germany, the United States, United Kingdom, and Yugoslavia.

They could not believe that a country as envied and respected as Canada would put itself at risk, and particularly, that we would put ourselves at risk over the question of how we deal with different cultures. Because that is the signature of Canada, that is the success that is admired around the world, the success the new governments in Czechoslovakia, a united Germany, and a new South Africa, will want to copy.

Nelson Mandela left Canada this morning. I had the privilege of bidding him bon voyage. He spoke to this House and to the people of Canada of his hopes for his people. He spoke of a country which would discover tolerance and compromise, which could learn to live in unity, which could consecrate itself anew as a nation among the leading democracies of the world. He spoke of the bitterness, the intolerance, the hatred and the prejudice which have governed South Africa. He spoke of Canada as a society to be admired, a concept which inspired him as he faced the enormous challenges which lie ahead.

Nelson Mandela was right. What we have achieved here has been achieved nowhere else on this earth. We are a society of many cultures, many regions, many races. It is a society that has always said yes to compromise and no to intolerance. It is a society which says that different cultures, different regions and different races can more than co-exist; they can thrive and prosper in community with diversity.

The history of this remarkable land has been a continuous act of affirmation. We can never forget that the existence of this country was not a given, that the building of Canada has been a task accomplished against the greatest odds; geographic, economic and demographic. Tending the community that is Canada requires great care. How ironic it would be, how wasteful if, at a time when the rest of the world was thrusting forward with vision, the people of this country were to turn away from our strength and our future.

The Parliament of Canada has spoken. The Parliaments of eight provinces of Canada have spoken. The premiers of all provinces are committed to letting their people speak. Let that process proceed. Let history judge the results. Let us all pray for Canada. Then, together we must define new shared goals for Canada which reflect the new realities of this new world in which we live.

Everywhere in this world, there are dramatic changes that shake old conceptions and raise new hopes. People everywhere are hoping to become what we are. That is the reality.

There are serious differences in this country. There are serious issues to resolve. We have to find ways to define this country that make sense to all of its people. We have not yet succeeded in doing that. That is what the bitterness of these recent months has demonstrated. In doing that, if we succeed we can preserve one of the most respected nations in the world. That is the issue now.

This is the challenge that faces us, the legislature of Manitoba and the House of Assembly of Newfoundland and Labrador who have the right of the final vote to decide the future of this accord, of this process, in many ways perhaps of this country. The next step is for them. I say this as only one member with some experience here; the work is not over for us. Then the challenge to all of us is to recognize that this country is not as united as it needs to be, that the goals we have set for ourselves are not as contemporary as they need to be, that the definition of this nation does not mean as much as it should to people in different parts of the country.

This is not something which should not cause us to lay blame or to distribute retribution. It should be a challenge to us all, to get on with the redefinition of this extraordinary country. But I fear deeply that, if we fail in the challenge that is before us now, we will not have the opportunity to move to that new agenda.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I appreciate the viewpoints expressed by my colleague and I appreciate many of the things that he said.

I have a couple of questions about some of the phrases that he used in terms of anger and intolerance, that he sees across the country and I have certainly have seen that, as well, in our home province of Alberta.

The hon. member used the words bitterness and intolerance. He stated that Nelson Mandela and he talked about where we say in this country yes to compromise and no to intolerance and that we should be proud of community with diversity.

In his wide experience with people from these countries where they are experiencing pain and are undergoing reform situations, as Nelson Mandela in South Africa, as well as in eastern Europe, what do they see as an example of democracy in Canada? We are seeing that the government cannot handle community with diversity, when people feel that they should represent their constituents and they were excommunicated from the caucus within a matter of 12 or 14 hours. Also, what do they see when the Prime Minister says he rolled the dice as we have heard about so much.

When the First Ministers were brought to Ottawa they were physically beaten down with tiredness. After seven days and seven nights—we all saw it on TV—those of us who were not allowed to witness those meetings, saw those men were so physically exhausted that you could almost see them at the point of saying, I'll sign anything, I'll do anything, just let me go home to bed, please. What do these other countries feel and think when they see such things in our country?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two comments that I would like to make in response to that question.

The first is, I think the hon. member will admit that she exaggerates and she, perhaps unwittingly, makes comments that are insulting and demeaning to the Premiers of the country. They are elected leaders of their provinces. They are accustomed to pressure. If she stays here longer, she will grow more accustomed to pressure too. They are accustomed to pressure and they are accustomed to making decisions under that kind of pressure. They did that. Theirs is not a leisurely life. Nor is the procedure of making decisions at federal-provincial conferences in private, a new procedure. It is the procedure that has, in fact, prevailed for some very long time.

The second comment that I would make responds directly to the question that she asked. I cannot answer for Nelson Mandela but let me quote a leading Canadian, Paul Desmarais, who has had experience not only in this country, but around the world. I do not always quote him with approval, but he said, the other day, that he wished the citizens of Canada would show the same respect for this nation that foreigners do.

Yes, it is true that there are imperfections in this country. It is true that there are faults in the way this House of Commons works. It is true that our democracy works imperfectly. It is true that we need to have changes. It is also true that the system here is better than what it was. It is not what it should be but it is better than what it was. It is true that there is a serious problem in the country, a serious lack of a national will that can bring people together. In part, that is because people define their constituencies too narrowly. In part, that is because people who come from one part of Canada speak only for that part of Canada and not for the whole nation. In part, it is because we are too focused upon narrow interests and not enough upon the larger interests.

My part of Canada and hers would not be as strong as it wants to be without the context of the whole country. Special interests that too often define and narrow debate in this country, would not be preserved as much as they need to be, without a whole nation that is marked by tolerance and by growth. Those are some of the questions that are at issue. She and I will disagree about particular instruments that might be used. We do not disagree about the fact that there is a distemper in the country that must be addressed. I hope that she will try, as I will try, to rise above party affiliations, to rise above particular commitments that we might think we have, to look at the whole country. That is what I ask the members of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland and Labrador and Manitoba to do tonight.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): I would simply like to say to the right honourable minister that his experience and reputation with regard to national unity are already well established. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is the one who has listened to and understood for the longest time the wishes of official language minority groups. He established in 1979 the House Committee on Official Languages, and I would like to thank him for that and tell him how useful this committee has been to advance the cause of linguistic minorities. I would also like to tell him that his speech deeply moved me. With regard to the exercise we are or will be completing within a few days, it is for us Canadians the first time we are going through the exercise of amending our Constitution. This is the first time since its patriation in 1982 that Canadians are called to amend substantially the Constitution of this country. Like him, I regret very much that in 1982 the process was flawed and that Quebec did not feel welcome.

Today, we have a provision inviting Quebec to join the Canadian family by signing this resolution or constitutional amendment. Since I am deeply concerned as he is that we might be living the last hours of a very important and misunderstood process, I would like to ask him here in this House how he sees the Canada of tomorrow. I know it is not easy, but is he seeing a united Canada on June 24 and 25? Is he seeing a Canada whose elements stick together, a Canada respectful of minority groups, a Canada without resentment nor hate towards anyone? If Meech lake fails, does he think that Canada will say on June 24 or 25: This is how it happened, there is nothing we can do about it! Or, is he, like me, preoccupied by the seriousness of the matter and does he try, as I know he does, to explain to all Canadians that this is a critical time for Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the tone and substance of my honorable friend's remarks. The answer depends on the results of the vote in Newfoundland, Labrador, and Manitoba. I hope it will be a success, I believe it will be a success. But it is not the end of all things. Among the things we have experienced and discovered these last few months, there is, in the first place, the fact that some of our achievements are not shared strongly enough throughout the country. I think, and I am not speaking as a minister but for myself, we must reexamine our own ideas on the country. We must do it in a really open way. It is time to speak again of national objectives for Canada, of objectives which can reunify all Canadians, but we have to do it in the context of the profound changes which await us in our country and internationally.

• (1920)

[English]

I remember, if I may be allowed a partisan recollection, a time in the life of the party in which I have worked my life when just after the debate on the flag when my party was deeply divided, when it risked becoming a captive of the past. Leaders in the party at that time had the sense to draw our membership together to focus on what was then called a national conference on Canadian goals, not to talk about what we had been, but to talk about what we could become.

The party of the hon. member underwent a similar experience in Kingston after the election of 1958. It may be in this time of such disrespect for our political parties there is a lesson that the country can learn from them. It may be that it is time for us now, together and without agendas written in advance, without too many assumptions, to try together in this country to define what the national goals of this country as we enter the next century should be.

As the hon. member will know, whatever doubts one might have in Canada about our good fortune, those doubts are not held elsewhere in the world. Our imperfections are known. If they are not known, my friend from Spadina will raise them in the House of Commons and others will, which is part of our democracy. Our faults are known. Our weaknesses are known. But there is no question that we have both the responsibility to establish leadership in the world and an extraordinary opportunity to demonstrate that people of differences and people of genius can build things together.

I think that is a goal that is worthy of the next century of Canadians. I believe that that is a goal that Canadians in this House of Commons of all parties would want to pursue. I do not see the Meech Lake debate as ending things. I do not see this, in fact, as a constitutional question. I think this is a question that has to do with the purpose and the nature of the country.

While these months have been terribly difficult for all of us, I think that they may well have driven us more quickly than we might otherwise have arrived to face that reality and to undertake that kind of searching of the soul of this country, that attempt to define what it is we want to become that is overdue.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the motion which is before us tonight urges the legislative assemblies of Manitoba and Newfoundland, and I quote from the motion, to:

> —exert efforts to bring about full ratification of the Constitution Amendment, 1987—

That is the Meech accord.

> —by June 23, 1990—

In this motion we are not discussing once more the value of the Meech accord. We will not be voting on an approval or disapproval of the Meech accord, nor will we be discussing or debating the value of the new accords reached on June 9 after a long week of discussion by the First Ministers of this country. No, we are not discussing those new accords either.

What we are discussing here today is a plea from this House to the legislative assemblies of Manitoba and Newfoundland that they pass as quickly as possible the Meech accord.

Why is such a motion necessary before this House? Does the government doubt the good intentions of the political leaders in Manitoba and Newfoundland? Why is this motion necessary?

Mr. Speaker, to fully understand this motion I think we have to look at it in conjunction with, first of all, Senator Murray's expedition to Manitoba on Monday when he preached to the aboriginal leaders of that province and to the legislators in their provincial assembly.

We also have to look at this motion in conjunction with the answers that the Prime Minister gave to questions in this House yesterday when he also put the blame for the situation which the country is in on the backs of the political leaders of Manitoba. As far as I can determine, the purpose of this motion is an attempt by the Prime Minister to re-establish his credibility because of the mess we are in, the fact that he caused a lot of that mess, and to shift the burden to other individuals.

If there is a constitutional crisis in this country today, and I believe there is one, it is principally due to the cynical and scheming actions of the Prime Minister.

According to the interview that he gave to The Globe and Mail on June 11, he admitted that he deliberately delayed the calling of a First Ministers' Conference in what appears to be an attempt to create a pressure cooker atmosphere. It worked to a certain extent. It certainly worked to the extent that he was able to get an agreement on the night of June 9, an agreement that all premiers signed, some of them conditionally. We now see that that agreement was fraught with great difficulties, in particular the procedures required in several of the provincial legislatures.

Here we have a Prime Minister who waited to the last possible moment to call the First Ministers together. Despite repeated calls from members of the opposition parties in this House and from the Premiers of several provinces, including Manitoba and Newfoundland, who said to the Prime Minister that they needed time to steer corrective or add-on resolutions through their legislatures. But no, the Prime Minister took a casual approach. He said that all was well, that the three legislatures in Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Manitoba would pass the accord as it was, that no change was necessary, that no First Ministers' Conference was necessary. It is now clear that he was wrong.

I hope that the accord will still be passed, but the crisis we are now in was not necessary. If the Prime Minister had called the First Ministers together last year when many of these issues were known, or at the latest in January, February or even March of this year, rather than on June 3, there would have been time to work out the difficulties that we see today, difficulties with respect to aboriginal peoples, with respect to women, and with respect to the Charter of Rights.

The Prime Minister, until Premier McKenna, made his proposals in March, was totally inflexible and arrogant. Worse still, we now find that he almost plotted and planned the delay in calling the First Ministers together, as he said, to roll the dice on the right day, all of which is set out in the article in The Globe and Mail of June 11.

There is also in the attitude shown by Senator Murray, the Prime Minister, and some other members of the government, an attitude that parliaments and legislators do not really count. What really counts is the executive side of the government. In other words, if the premier signs, that is it, it should be done, that there should not be time for adequate debate and discussion, that rules in parliamentary systems are not really necessary. If it is necessary, you suspend them. Well, we know that this government is probably the worst for that sort of thing in the history of Canada. According to my records, this government has imposed closure 34 times since 1984, which is more than any other government prior to 1984 going back to Confederation.

This government also day after day suspends the rules. If they feel they do not want to listen to petitions from hon. members, they just suspend the rules and move that we go right past them into other business. Senator Murray is up in that other place, but he was preaching to the people in Manitoba the other day. They have this attitude that procedures, rules, traditions, parliaments, and legislative assemblies are not really important.

Those rules and procedures are there to protect the liberties of members of the House of Commons, in particular members of opposition parties and independent members. There is a reason for those rules, and you do not suspend them without reason.

When we go back to the beginning, we see that after he was elected to office Premier Bourassa of Quebec made five proposals, five demands which he thought were necessary for Quebec to sign the Constitution of 1982, and all parties in this House agreed to those five proposals. I agreed. My political party agreed. We all agreed. Those proposals, of course, then were agreed to at the first Meech Lake conference by all the provincial premiers, and they signed a document to that effect.

It was only after the document was written up in legal language, when those five proposals agreed to were put into legal language, that some objections began to arise. Objections arose because while people agreed to the five proposals they saw impacts that the document made on other areas of Canadian life and on other Canadians that were not expected, and they did not want those sort of impacts. While they agreed to the five proposals, they did not want any other rights or traditions reduced.

There was also objection because many Canadians, and especially the aboriginal Canadians, felt that things were left out that should have been put in. Canadians who came here from other countries, other than Britain and France, thought that they should be recognized in some way or other. There were objections to the way in which the Meech Lake Accord was drafted and the way it impacted on other things and what was left out.

This is the sad part of this whole debate: individuals, parliamentarians, and legislators objected from time to time to the Meech Lake Accord, but it never meant that they were against Quebec, or against the legitimate aspirations of Quebec, or that they were against Quebec as a distinct society. No, they supported those things, but they wanted their own rights, their own qualities, and their own expressions protected in the Constitution as well.

During the debate in 1987 the Liberal Party put forward nine amendments to the accord. They were all defeated by the government. They were not even listened to seriously. They were defeated. They were tried once again in the Senate. They were defeated once more. For most of us in the Liberal Party—and this was the official position of this party—despite the flaws, despite the inadequacies in the Meech Lake Accord, we thought it was best to vote for it for the greater good of this country and for the unity of the country. I was one of those who voted for it. I felt that what I did was right then and I support my position, although I still feel that the accord has flaws.

Once the debate was over in this House and the accord was passed by eight of the ten provincial legislatures, the discussion went on. It went on in New Brunswick. It went on in Manitoba. It went on among Canadians throughout the country, many of whom were not satisfied with the accord, continued to campaign against it, and wanted amendments.

Despite the fact that questions were raised in this House, demands were made of the Prime Minister and of other ministers to do something about the impasse that was continuing in Manitoba, in New Brunswick, and later in Newfoundland because Newfoundland rescinded its agreement to the accord. There were continuous demands of the Prime Minister to go out there, to call the premiers together, to do something to break the impasse, to consider some amendments, to be flexible, and to make some changes that would meet the aspirations and the requirements of other communities in Canada. Nothing was done.

Time went by, month after month, until March of this year when Premier McKenna tabled a resolution in his own House to provide for a companion accord. He proposed that we accept the Meech Lake Accord fully as it was, but he put forward another accord which would add on other provisions to satisfy the criticisms that were being made by certain Canadians.

Following that, the Prime Minister set up the Charest committee which studied Mr. McKenna's proposals and other alternatives. The blockage started to come undone and everybody was happy. Those of us who wanted to see the country united were quite happy and pleased with some movement forward, all of a sudden, to save the accord, to save the country, and to meet the aspirations of Canadians who were not happy with the accord.

What seemed to make many of us in this party happy was that the recommendations of the Charest committee of this House contained many of the proposals that we had in our amendments of 1987. Many of the things that we said were necessary in 1987 were recognized in April 1990 as being essential to get the Meech Lake Accord through.

We know the history. Finally the Prime Minister calls the First Ministers to supper on June 3. They sit in a pressure cooker atmosphere for one week, in private, with most Canadians not knowing what was being proposed and counterproposed. They came up with the two companion accords of June 9.

We in the Liberal Party feel vindicated to a certain extent, because once again many of the provisions in these companion accords were similar to the amendments we made in 1987.

Once again those of us who loved this country and wanted it to stay united were quite pleased with the results. We did not like the process. We did not like the way it was done, but we were happy to see all the provincial premiers and the Government of Canada agreeing on how to resolve the crisis.

As I said, now we are faced with the procedures in the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba. We see that we have only three days left to meet the deadline. The Prime Minister is putting pressure, and it seems putting the blame for that situation, on the leaders of Manitoba and the leaders of Newfoundland. I think that is wrong.

The fact of the matter is that one year, two years, two and a half years went by when something could be done to resolve the differences and to resolve the pleas of many Canadians with respect to the accord. Nothing was done. Unfortunately, it was left to the last minute. I think the Prime Minister and the government must take responsibility for that. If the Prime Minister had not been so inflexible, the process which led to the Charest committee and to the companion accords of June 9 could have been done at an earlier date.

Then again we have the situation with our aboriginal people. As I said, the other day Senator Murray rushed to Manitoba with a six-point program. As a former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I examined that program. It looks very good to me, but to expect our aboriginal people to be presented with six proposals in the morning and to give an answer at the end of that day, or even the next day, is totally unacceptable.

Our aboriginal peoples have been betrayed over and over again by governments in Canada, both federal and provincial. Even when we have put our signatures to paper on treaties and other documents, we have done the very opposite of what we said we were going to do. One can easily understand how our aboriginal people could look on those six points put forward by Senator Murray on Monday as something of a Trojan horse.

Their experience has led them to believe that they cannot trust us. They are suspicious of every sort of proposal that we make to them. Even when it looks as good as a Trojan horse, they do not want to accept it right away. They want to look at it over and over again. They want to discuss it with their own people. They want to know what it will really do for them. Why at the last minute are those proposals, as good as they might be, being put forward to the aboriginal people of this country?

Even in the companion accords of June 9, all that was given to the aboriginal people was the right to have more First Ministers' Conferences with respect to their issues. On June 9, the aboriginal people only got promises of more constitutional conferences. On June 18, they got a six-point program but no time to consider it as a people should be able to do. We have to remember that most of the associations and tribal councils in this country do not have the resources behind them that the Government of Canada has. The do not have the lawyers, the accountants, and the specialists to examine and look at those things in the same way the Government has, so when they are up against the government of Canada they react with suspicion and with doubt.

Another area where the Prime Minister bears a lot of responsibility with respect to the situation we are in is the way he went about this country promoting a disaster scenario with respect to the Meech accord.

How many times have I heard the Prime Minister say to those who in good faith put forward or suggested amendments to the accord: "Why are you against the province of Quebec? If you defeat this accord as it is, you will drive Quebec out of Confederation" or words to that effect.

Either you do it this way or there will be a constitutional crisis; therefore you had better do it this way and no change is possible. By repeating that over and over again—and some of his ministers did the same thing—it led Quebecers to believe that the Meech accord was absolutely essential for them, that if they did not get it their province would be in ruin, and that it would be an insult to their province.

I have spoken to many Quebecers. They have not read the accord, but the accord has become a symbol for something much greater than the contents of the accord itself. It is like a flag. It represents the following for many Quebecers: if you are for the accord you are for Quebec; if you are against it you are against Quebec. There is no consideration for the fact that most of the provisions in the accord apply to all the provinces, not just to Quebec.

The Prime Minister by his rhetoric over the last three years in trying to get provinces and individuals to support the accord went so far that he created this disaster scenario. Now we are faced with a disaster because it is not being approved in the manner which he would like and which I would like.

He threatened those who opposed. Those who questioned and wanted amendments he accused of rejecting Quebec.

I want to make it very clear that many people who accepted the five proposals of Premier Bourassa, including the distinct society, were quite ready to agree to most of the Meech accord but simply wanted changes that would take into account their own special place in Canada.

As an anglophone Quebecer, if I can call myself that, I have never had any problem with the distinct society. I accept totally that Quebec is a distinct society. It is the only jurisdiction in all of North America with a majority of French speaking people. We have the civil law. In Canada we collect our own income tax. We do not use the RCMP, nor does Ontario, as a provincial police force. There are many other distinctive qualities. This goes back to 1774 in the Quebec Act when the British recognized Quebec in a very distinctive way as opposed to other colonies in their colonial empire.

There is a long tradition of recognizing distinctive features about Quebec. Some Canadians say: "Well, other provinces have distinctive traits as well." That is true, but some people are not anxious that their distinctiveness be recognized and others are not anxious that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us is about nothing less than the fate of our country. No one should underestimate the seriousness and urgency of our situation.

One thing I heard consistently as I crossed this country was the clear, unequivocal statement by all Canadians of how important it is for us to stay together, to stay whole, to stay unified. How good we feel as Canadians, how proud we are, how respectful we are of the kind of nation we have become, the nation of freedom and opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, through this very difficult period that many of us have lived one thing was very clear. The situation had to be addressed and addressed with a great degree of urgency. The time for healing had really come upon us. We really had to start coming back together in a very important manner. This is not a time for procrastination, it is a time for decision. The Fathers of Confederation faced the same challenge 123 years ago when the very idea of Canada was tested.

[Translation]

Different leaders, different parties and different provinces, but they all understood that the great nation they were looking for simply could not be unless there was a will to compromise.

[English]

Our greatest successes have been achieved when we put Canada first. . .first in our hearts. No obligation is more compelling than the duty we have to this great nation of ours. Canada is a precious land of boundless energy and promise.

My family came to Canada and made Montreal their home. They raised me to value my heritage, to seize the promise of Canada and to cherish Quebec. I am an anglophone Quebecer. I have lived all my life in Quebec. I have seen all the changes that have occurred in that time, along with the emergence of a new Quebec. I have also lived through the moments of tension and crisis. I cannot forget the presence of troops on the streets just 20 years ago. These memories are etched in my memory forever. I cannot speak for all Quebecers, but if you ask me if Quebec should be called a "distinct society", how can I answer anything but yes. Quebec is a "distinct society". It is a fact and an integral part of that distinctiveness is, as the Meech Lake agreement makes absolutely clear, the anglophone Quebecer.

My riding of Pierrefonds—Dollard is a microcosm of Canada. My neighbourhood, half English-speaking and half French speaking, with people of origins from all over the world, ask me to send their message to the legislators and the people of Manitoba, Newfoundland and Labrador. They say: Put Canada first, protect and defend this glorious and magnificent country of ours.

[Translation]

Canadians everywhere convey the same message and keep saying: Together, we will go far!

Mr. Speaker, constitutional speeches may help promote unity, but it cannot be achieved unless people have confidence.

Quebecers sought our confidence when they said no to independence and yes to renewed federalism. With the Meech Lake Accord we wanted to express that confidence to honour Quebec and Quebecers, and to enable them to regain their dignity and their place in Confederation.

But this promise has yet to be fulfilled and time is running short.

[English]

Now, more than at any other moment in our history, we must keep our faith with each other. Only then, can we go forward to build a new, vital and dynamic Canada of the 21st century. The world is watching us. They witnessed our evolution as a nation, one that stands firmly on the side of justice, fairness and of freedom. Nelson Mandela appreciated this and so should we all. We cannot throw away all that we have built and all that we can be. We must not fail our own ideals. We must not compromise ourselves by pursuing anything less than the excellence which only a strong united Canada can achieve. Across the continents and around the world, the gentle breeze of liberty is blowing. Old walls, old barriers and prejudices are being dismantled, not by powerful dictators and their armies, but by ordinary people. This is the world of Lech Walesa, Vaclav Havel and Nelson Mandela. In this dawning of a new era, hope lives. Today, civilization cries out, not for a narrow, limited view, but for generosity, understanding and true vision.

• (1950)

We are at a crossroads. Down one road, the high road, lie unity, prosperity and greatness. Down the other, the narrow road, we and our children face division, intolerance and despair. That high road is beckoning us now. It is the only choice we can make.

We have so much to offer each other. Together we can continue to build a strong foundation of courage and hope for all Canadians. We can continue to free our society from the shackles of bigotry and racism and advance the noble cause of equality. Is it possible that we have forgotten all that unites us? Have we forgotten what makes us unique among all the nations of the world; our two official languages, our aboriginal heritage, our multicultural fabric, our dedication to peace and human rights, and our caring and tolerant traditions. These are among our proudest achievements, achievements which set us apart and which can lead us to excellence. They are what make our Canadian citizenship among the most sought after in all the world.

The Prime Minister told this House a few days ago what is at stake. He said: "There is a new world to be won. Canada needs to turn the page, at last, on a long, controversial and crucial period—we need to recapture the sense of tolerance and common interest and common purpose that lies at the root of our success as a nation".

For me, our greatest duty as Canadians now is to truly know and accept each other better. Wherever we live, wherever we come from, we are all Canadians. We have worked to build a house of freedom and compassion, with a strong foundation to support newcomers from all over the world. Ours is an "open house", to every culture and every origin, where equality and justice are a promise made to each other. Erecting barriers of ignorance or fear is not the Canadian way. Instead, we build bridges to truth and understanding. Our tradition is to heal wounds, to correct injustices and to right wrongs.

There is only one way to dispel fears and misconceptions in a democratic society. It is to reach out to individual Canadians of good faith. It is to stand up and be counted and not to yield to lesser obstacles. Canada is more than earth and mountain and stone. Canada is a state of mind, a quality of life.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the motion now before the House is a strong appeal to the two legislatures to maintain confidence in Canadian unity.

[English]

We respect those legislatures and the people they represent. We acknowledge legitimate concerns and aspirations. We have pledged that they will be addressed fairly and resolved speedily. Once again, as has been the Canadian way, we ask that trust be exchanged for trust.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier called Canadians to that duty a century ago. Speaking in Quebec City, he said, and I quote:

> What this country needs above all is peace, concord and union between all the elements composing its population. Let us show to the world that if we reverence the past, we also have regard for the future. Let us show to the world that unity does not mean absorption, and that autonomy does not mean antagonism. . .and in all the vicissitudes of our situation, let us always remember that love is better than hatred and faith better than doubt, and let hope in our future destinies be the pillar of fire to guide us in our career.

Let us all be faithful to that duty in the hours to come. That is our answer, our only real choice.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the issue we are discussing today is among the most difficult that Canadians can face or that Parliamentarians can ever have to deal with. It is an issue which must be beyond partisan politics, because it is an issue which divides parties. It divides families. Canadians are not united on the issue about which we speak.

The Constitution is probably one of the most difficult of all issues we have had to face throughout our history and, indeed, our Constitution has been an issue that has been with us since before Confederation and will be with us for many years to come.

Let us look, however, just at the recent history, the past decade. I was there, as were many many members of this House, when the referendum of 1980 was being decided. I went to Quebec at that time to fight to keep Quebec in Canada. Part of the promise delivered by those who voted against separation, the promise of those who were fighting to keep Canada united, was that Quebec would have a renewed federalism. This manifested itself in the Constitution accord which a separatist premier of Quebec refused to sign. It manifested itself in the Meech Lake Accord, which all 10 premiers and the federal government signed. Then it manifested itself in the companion agreement signed just recently.

This companion accord made changes to the Meech Lake Accord in an effort to deal with some of the problems contained in it. Canadians had many concerns about Meech Lake, and the First Ministers, having heard these concerns, met. All of those concerns were represented at the table. This is why the companion accord was signed, dealing with these issues in a way that Mrs. Carstairs, Mr. Doer and Mr. McKenna, who had previously been opposed to Meech Lake, were able to give their support to the package.

We recognize, on all sides of this House, that this may not be the perfect package. It does not have all the answers to all of our constitutional problems, but is merely one step in a process of constitutional reform.

Probably, most of the debate over Meech Lake has focused on the so-called distinct society clause for Quebec. It is simply a recognition of Quebec's unique problems as the home in Canada of the largest portion of Canada's francophones, francophones who are still in a minority in Canada. It is a recognition that they have different cultures and different institutions which have been part of the Confederation agreement for more than 123 years.

• (2000)

But this distinct society clause has caused much anguish. I believe that the companion accord has dealt with it in a responsible manner. They have attached a legal opinion from some of the best jurisprudential minds in Canada saying that the distinct society clause does not overrule individual charter rights.

I may be accused of some bias, Mr. Speaker, but I could not help but be impressed by the words this morning of the Premier of Ontario when he spoke to Newfoundland.

He indicated there that even if this legal opinion were wrong and at some point in our future it were held that it could be used to impinge on certain individual rights, it could only be done in the province of Quebec. It would only be Quebec legislation which, in furtherance of protecting its unique and distinct status, might be able to overrule certain charter rights at a certain point.

Quebec is a province that wants the distinct society. The distinct clause is also supported by the major leading women's group in Quebec, so who are we to say that even if our legal opinion were wrong, that Quebec should not be able to determine certain rights to protect its own distinct francophone status.

A lot has happened that is causing us dismay. Bill 178 and the use of the notwithstanding clause were not appreciated by the rest of Canada. There is some evidence that some Canadians want to get even. Even the Premier of Manitoba changed his mind about Meech Lake after Bill 178 was passed.

Maybe we can criticize Quebec, but surely let us look at the signals we have been giving to Quebec: tromping on the flag in Brockville; Ontario municipalities passing English only by-laws. What signal does this send to a people who are Canadian, who are our brothers and sisters?

Quebec has said yes to Canada three times in this decade: once at the time of the referendum, once at Meech Lake, and once on the companion accord. How many more times is Quebec going to say yes to Canada if Canada says no to Quebec?

The political reality is that if there were an election in Quebec and Mr. Parizeau were elected, Quebec would be leaving Canada. He has said that he is there not to keep Canada united, but to break up Canada.

There is a symbolic mythology, apart from its meaning, which pervades the whole Meech question. It has come to be a symbol of whether we want Canada to stay together, whether we are prepared to say yes to Quebec after it has said yes to Canada three times in this decade.

Do we know with certainty whether Quebec voters will reject a separatist alternative? Can we say for certain that they will come back to the table? Can we afford as a nation to start this process all over again? Should we not be getting on with other issues as well, not only the companion accords and further enhancements to our constitutional process, but dealing with the severe economic challenges we face?

We have so much to do. Perhaps in the past we have said that in Canada our unity was founded on the rail from coast to coast. But perhaps we have put too much stake in ribbons of wood and steel and not enough in the great human spirit of humanity, sharing and caring about our nation. Together we can be strong.

The risk of not standing up for this accord is enormous.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Liberal Party has split the last 20 minutes. The hon. member for Willowdale and the hon. Member for Glengarry–Prescott–Russell have both taken 10 minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is with a certain emotion that I am addressing this House tonight. So far I am the only francophone outside Quebec who has had the opportunity to take part in this debate.

I listened carefully to the speeches made by some of my colleagues, the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the Secretary of State who, as usual, has enriched this House with his eloquence. I must say that I share many of his feelings. It is perhaps unusual for us to talk this way about our colleagues opposite but that is what is called for today, I think.

Mr. Speaker, ever since I was a kid, I have been hearing about our national unity and how it is threatened. I remember very well the October crisis of 1970, the election of the Parti Québécois in 1976 and the fears it gave rise to, the 1980 referendum on the future of Quebec and all of Canada and, let us not forget this component of the referendum, the patriation of the Canadian Constitution in 1982, that I had hoped for and agreed with, and finally the defeat of the Parti Québécois in Quebec and the renewed interest in national unity not only in Quebec but throughout Canada.

[English]

We in this Parliament did not invent the subject of discussing our Constitution. Canada has had 24 constitutional documents, Orders in Council, Acts of the British Parliament, Acts of our Parliament. I want to take a moment and describe perhaps a component of one of these acts, namely, the Statute of Westminster of 1931, which, after all, is the law that gave this country its independence over foreign affairs and its independence generally.

At that time Canada, New Zealand and Australia were granted this independence. We in this country, of course, could not take advantage of all that was given to us and all that we had earned at that time. We could not do it because we had not yet resolved a difficulty within our own country as to how it was that we would amend our Constitution in the future and how we would deal with such issues as constitutional amendments. So our constitution stayed in Britain.

I suppose in typical Canadian form of compromise and sometimes delay, 51 years later it finally came home. That was a very historic day, April 17, 1982. I was a member of the Ontario legislature at that time, a brand new member, and I had the privilege of viewing, like many other Canadians, what was happening before us on that great historical day. Of course, many of us said at that time that it was not over, and it certainly was not. We were back almost immediately talking about constitutions again.

• (2010)

On April 30, 1987, the First Ministers of our country, the Prime Minister and his provincial colleagues signed the Meech Lake Accord. I was watching television that night when I heard of the signing of the accord. I was really taken by the fact that, at last, we would see an end to some of the disagreements that we had had. I was so optimistic and so pleased, not only for myself but for my family, for my children and for my country.

Within a few days things looked as though they were unravelling again, but finally they got back on track and on June 3, the Langevin document was signed, if that is what we call that document. Let us call it that for the purposes of this discussion.

Then I became very optimistic again, as I think all Canadians were, about the process and the possibility of putting this national unity issue finally behind us and working towards the great potential that we have as a nation.

We in this House, after much debate and some difficulty—difficulty within my own political party and all political parties and I do not think that we were the only ones who had difficulty—adopted this accord. It was adopted in the other place and then finally it had to be adopted again by this House. It was adopted by legislatures right across the country save and except two. Then there was the subsequent withdrawal of a ratification. We got to a point that was what I would call very close to that eleventh hour. The concern then heightened.

Constituents of mine in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell a few weeks ago were having very serious reflections on just where we were and where we were going.

[Translation]

My constituents, Mr. Speaker—and I know I have the privilege of representing a special riding, almost surrounded by Quebec, but still an Ontario riding where French-speaking people are in a majority—worried about their future, the future of Quebec and the future of the whole of Canada.

[English]

The electors I represent understood one point very well. Perhaps not all of us in this House and in other legislatures, or even some Canadians understood the following point. Heaven forbid that this country were ever to become divided by the withdrawal of one of the provinces, namely Quebec. It would not only be Quebec withdrawing from the rest of the country, but a big component of the country would not be there. There is no question Canada would not be a member of the G-7 group of nations without 25 per cent of its population, a great proportion of its riches and everything else that would be gone if that were to happen.

It is not just one part of the country that loses, Mr. Speaker. The whole country would lose were that to happen. It is you and I and everyone out there listening to the House of Commons debates tonight, all Canadians. Perhaps some regions of the country would suffer financially more than others. I do not know. But very few, if any, would ever gain from that kind of proposition and disunity.

[Translation]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not saying either that if the accord is not ratified this is the end of it all. This would be irresponsible on my part. What we have to do is try our best to ratify, and encourage others to ratify the Meech Lake Accord. As far as we are concerned, in this House, it is done. We are not being asked, tonight, to ratify the accord, but simply to urge others to do it, as agreed between the various government leaders.

Mr. Speaker, if all Canadians do this kind of soul searching about our future, I am convinced they will realize, as I did, not that the agreement is perfect, it is not—however, the previous one was not perfect either, nor the one before it—they will realize that having amended our Constitution so often, having had that kind of debate in the past, we will continue to do so in the future.

[English]

In conclusion, let us remember that this accord is not the end of constitutional discussion, it is merely a component of the continuing process. We have had discussions in the past.

Let us pass this accord. I hope that it passes. If it does not, I do not want to pretend that it will be the end of the world. That would be irresponsible. We will all have to work together after June 23, pick up the pieces and try to build again. I am sure that we would. I am confident that we would. But why at this point would we want to risk it. This is no time to play Russian roulette with the future of our country.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with a very grave concern in my heart about the future of Canada, the future of this country. I have heard people say that those of us who have that concern are fearmongering. I cannot believe that anybody could characterize the concern that all of us feel here in this House and across this great nation as fearmongering because there is ample reason for that concern.

I believe that those who raise the spectre that fearmongering by raising concerns is counterproductive to this process are putting their heads in the sand and misunderstand the very deep feelings in Quebec and the gravity of the situation with which we are faced. Those who would say that our concern is fearmongering are doing a disservice to this country.

I believe that we in Canada right now are at a crossroads of choice. Either we can open our minds and our hearts and generously embrace our future as one Canada, one single country, one entity, a Canada that is rich in diversity but bound by a common determination to survive against sometimes incredible odds or we can continue to pursue a debate that will only lead us to a mean and bitter end, an end not worthy of the country that we have come to expect Canada will be in the future and has been in the past.

During the recent discussions at the Congress Centre in Ottawa, some wise soul in the audience made a sign which read very simply: "Nine plus one equals ten. Ten minus one equals zero". No more words need to be said because I believe with all my heart that that is so. We cannot have a Canada that lacks a great and vast geographic part of our country and still have a Canada that is a Canada at all.

In Manitoba, where I come from, the skies are clear and wide, bright and blue and to me they symbolize the spirit of the people of Manitoba. I believe that Manitobans are warm. I know that Manitobans are generous. I have watched as Manitobans over the years have embraced new ideas and other cultures with gladness and with joy. Manitobans, I also know, love this country with a great profundity and they want to see it stay together more than anything else in the world. I also believe that Newfoundlanders want the same and have the same warmth and generosity of spirit in their hearts.

So what are we to do about this awful pickle that we are in? How are we going to solve the dilemma that we find ourselves faced with? I do not believe that the way to do it is by attributing blame. History will take care of that, if there is any blame to be attributed.

Instead, we have to search actively for answers, for solutions that will keep this country together. That is our job as leaders and we cannot rely on process to substitute for that responsibility either.

We must exercise the leadership that has been vested in us by the people of Canada, be it at the federal level or at the provincial level, or wherever it might be. If it is only the leadership of a group or a society, we must exercise that leadership, too, to find a way out of this dilemma that we are in.

There comes a time when personal political fortunes and personal political dreams become very insignificant in the greater scheme of things when we are faced with something like this. There also comes a time when heavy though the mantle of leadership might be, it must be borne bravely, or it must be cast aside and left for others to pick up and carry on.

The Meech Lake Accord is a simple document. There is nothing terribly complex about it. It is an affirmative document. It is a positive document. It says yes in almost every line. It says yes to the aspirations of seven million Canadians first of all. It says yes to the federal government in the matter of the spending power. It also says yes to the provinces and it respects our diversity and our differences in the same manner. It says yes to the provinces on the question of immigration. It says yes to the provinces in the matter of having a veto. It says yes to the provinces on the matter of appointing judges and senators.

I cannot think of a single thing in the accord that says no to anyone in this country. In fact, the accord even says yes to those who are not mentioned in the Constitution at this time. It says yes to those who have constitutional aspirations for the future because it is only by completing the unfinished business of 1982 and by embracing Quebec and bringing Quebec back into the circle of Confederation that other reforms can be initiated; other reforms that will allow Canada to say yes to those who have constitutional aspirations.

It is a simple fact that we cannot undertake any other constitutional reform until Quebec is brought back into the circle of Confederation.

Aboriginal concerns about constitutional recognition cannot take place without ratification of the accord. The addition of other recognitions must also wait until the accord is ratified. We cannot deal with things like Senate reform, if we determine in the future that that is what we want to do, until Quebec is back in the Constitution.

So why would we not want to do everything that is humanly possible to achieve that simple goal, to bring our country back together, to knit it into one 10–province family with two territories waiting in the wings, looking for a future that they will develop and be able to reach and aspire to in a whole and complete Canada. Why would we not want to do everything within our means, within our reach, to ultimately accomplish that goal?

If the accord is the affirmative statement that I really believe it to be, why would we ever want to turn it down? Why would we not want to say yes immediately, openly, freely, and hold out our arms and embrace the opportunity that is afforded to us here today.

I cannot believe that we are so narrow and so warped in some sort of selfish dissatisfaction—maybe we are overfed, maybe we are over rich, or maybe we are over lucky, but I do not believe that we are so steeped in that kind of narrowness that we cannot endorse a document that I understand most deeply to be a confirmation of everything that we hold dear as Canadians. It is confirmation of all those things that we like to think of ourselves as being: open–hearted, generous, warm, kind, tolerant. Canadians have a conceit that we are all those things, and I have that conceit as well. But if they are true, if indeed that is what we are and that is how we see ourselves, and if that is what our identity is, then how can we turn down this opportunity to use that character to embrace the very simple aspirations of Quebec and get on with running the country?

I believe in my deepest heart that we are all those things. So it is with the utmost astonishment that I have watched the debate these past 16 months over something that is so generous–spirited as the inclusion of the distinct society designation for the one province that by its very existence lends so much to the roots of that Canadian character that I just spoke of. It is because of Quebec, because of the fact that a country had to learn to live with differences at a very early stage in its development that we have that conceit of being tolerant, open, generous and kind.

Oddly enough, nobody else seems to disagree that Quebec is indeed a distinct society. As a matter of fact, I have listened one after another to provincial leaders across this country tell us that Quebec is a distinct society, and that they agree that is so. That includes premiers who are having difficulties right at this moment.

What appears to bother us is the fact that somebody wants to write it down. We want to write the words "distinct society" and to us in English Canada that sends a thrill of fear to the very core of our being and we believe that will have some negative impact on us.

This might be understandable. In the weeks that I spent travelling across the country with the Charest committee, I came to understand something about us in Canada that I did not understand before. This discussion about two Canadas, the two solitudes, two nations, is not only steeped in language, although we often point to language as being the one to blame, it also is based on the fact that we have two very distinct approaches to the way we do business in our provinces and the way we deal with the business of writing laws and rules.

English Canada lives by the common law, the unwritten law, the rule of the understatement. We have a profound and deep understanding that what is not written down sometimes means more than what is.

French Canada lives by the civil law, the written law, which demands that things be written down, because if they are not in writing they have no legal meaning. Those people are steeped in that cultural understanding. It goes very deep.

It seems to me that these two ideas are at the very centre of the discussion about the distinct society and they come into conflict time after time after time.

I believe that this is what was at the root of the western premier's insistence in 1982 on the inclusion of the very much maligned notwithstanding clause. It seems to me that Mr. Lyon and Mr. Lougheed were also steeped in their very deep understanding of the unwritten law and they feared being hemmed in by the words in the Charter of Rights.

In fact, is there anything to fear from the words "distinct society"? I have every profound belief that there is nothing to fear in those words.

In fact, at this very moment, if the Supreme Court were to be studying a matter of the Constitution, they would take into consideration the fact that Quebec is a distinct society in making a judgment. They did so when they handed down their decision about the signage law in Quebec. The words "distinct society" were written into their decision when they said that while both languages must be placed on the signs, French could take precedence and English could appear in smaller type.

People also seem to worry that the distinct society will give Quebec an advantage over other provinces. That simply is not true.

• (2030)

It states what is a fact: Quebec is distinct. For purposes of the law in Quebec that is a very important fact. Something many women's groups have said is that somehow the words "distinct society" will affect their rights under the charter. I do not know how that could be when the distinct society clause affects only the people in Quebec and the women of Quebec are not worried about the inclusion of that clause.

I really have no understanding of where those fears come from. We must put them aside and come to the understanding that the words "distinct society" do nothing at all to hurt, abrogate, or denigrate anyone else in Canada. They are a statement of fact and they are necessary to the people in Quebec in order to interpret their law.

If in some corners of the country we are going to ask any question at all, and if we are still confused about whether we should pass the Meech Lake Accord, in my opinion there is only one question that we should be asking: Is there anything at all in the Meech Lake Accord that hurts anyone in Canada? I have to say: "No, there is nothing. There is not a word that hurts anyone in Canada."

That is the question that the people and the leaders of Newfoundland and Labrador must ask themselves: Is there anything in the Meech Lake Accord that hurts the people of Newfoundland or Labrador? The answer is no, there is nothing that hurts the people of Newfoundland or Labrador in the Meech Lake Accord.

The people in Manitoba must ask themselves: Is there anything at all in the Meech Lake Accord that hurts Manitobans? The answer is no, there is nothing in the Meech Lake Accord that hurts the people of Manitoba in any way.

There is something that does have the possibility of hurting the people of Labrador, Manitoba, Newfoundland, Quebec, and all the rest of Canada. That is the lethargy, the lack of positive will, the inability to grasp this opportunity and take the responsibility to pass the Meech Lake Accord, to say yes, to take affirmative action, and to overcome whatever processes, problems or barriers which might seem to be in the way. If that is not done, it could have a very profound effect on all of us.

In closing I want to say that I know that all the leaders of Newfoundland and Labrador, all the leaders of Manitoba understand this issue very well. I feel very strongly for the terrible trauma they are going through and for the dilemma they are in. Even at this moment I know that they are wrestling with these very heavy questions and the tremendous burden of responsibility that they bear for the future of this country.

I believe, with all my heart, that they will come up with the right answers and that they will find the solutions we all seek. My appeal this evening is not to those leaders. My appeal tonight is to the people of Manitoba and to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador to support their premiers and to support their representatives in doing whatever it is they must do in order to pass the accord so that we can get on with the business of building this wonderful nation.

My appeal is to the warm, generous, tolerant people of those two provinces and the rest of this country to support our provincial leaders in their search for solutions, to say "yes" to Quebec and to say "yes" to Canada.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for her remarks.

The hon. member closed her remarks by saying that she is appealing to the people of the provinces of Manitoba, Newfoundland, and Labrador. Unfortunately the people are the ones who have been left out of it because of this heavy-handed, top down approach. It is up to the politicians now to decide what will happen. We see quite clearly that the fundamental flaw of the Meech Lake Accord is that the people themselves have had very little to do with it.

The hon. member also mentioned in her speech the rhetorical question: is there anything in the Meech Lake Accord that hurts Manitoba or Newfoundland and Labrador? Possibly, at this point, it would be academic to say no, there isn't really anything wrong with it because once we bring Quebec into the constitutional family all will be well.

I would argue, being one member of the family of Canada and certainly a western Canadian, that I am a brother or a sister in the family of Canada, that Quebec is in the Constitution, that it is in the family of Canada and always has been, quite clearly, legally, and constitutionally since 1867.

Maybe nothing now will hurt Manitoba or Newfoundland and Labrador, but I would like to ask a short question about the comments made that the Meech Lake Accord says yes to everybody and everything. I would just like the hon. member to make a couple of comments regarding whether there is anything in the Meech Lake Accord that should hurt these other two provinces if Meech Lake is not ratified?

Yes to Senate reform, is that a possibility with the unanimity clause as it stands right now? Are we saying yes to a person like Elijah Harper who is exercising his constitutional right to do what he is doing now because he believes in it, whether we agree or disagree with it? Are we saying yes to Elijah Harper's constitutional right? Are we saying yes to this because of vetoes to all linguistic groups in Canada of whom we should be proud rather than only saying yes to the main two linguistic groups?

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her questions. I know she wants to understand the accord. I think her questions were searching and appropriate.

I am pleased to answer again—and I do not want to sound repetitive—that the answer to your question is yes. In fact the Meech Lake Accord and ratification of the Meech Lake Accord allow us to proceed with Senate reform. Yes, ratification of the Meech Lake Accord allows us to proceed with responding to the needs and the constitutional aspirations of the aboriginal people. Yes, ratification of the Meech Lake Accord allows us also to proceed with the constitutional aspirations of other minority groups in Canada who may want to be included in the future.

Until constitutionally we bring Quebec's signature to the document, we cannot proceed with any of these reforms. In the interests of this country and in the interests of all the people I know the hon. member represents so well and so whole-heartedly, I know she would want also to help us make that appeal to the people of Canada, the people of Manitoba, Newfoundland and Labrador, to support their leaders in searching for answers and solutions, to say yes to. . . Quebec, and to say yes to Canada so that we can get on with the rest of the business of the country.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank all members who have participated in this debate for a very positive and progressive debate. The feelings communicated to the people of this House and to the people of Canada were strongly held on the part of those members, sincerely and honestly held on the part of those members.

I have always been a supporter of the Meech Lake Accord, as have many members in my party, but I have always had a number of concerns about the process, about what was included in the accord, and about what was excluded from it.

I do not think any constitutional document, no matter where you look in the world or even the constitutional documents of this country, can fully address the aspirations of the people of Canada. It is widely recognized that these are imperfect documents, but they are vital documents as well, documents always being corrected and improved upon.

The process in Canada is always a little difficult, but as we move toward protection over the hundreds of years we have been in existence more and more we will see the Constitution reflect the aspirations of the people of this country.

I also recognize the importance of Quebec becoming a full participant in the Constitution, a signatory to the Constitution, and a full participant in future constitutional discussions and developments. It is extremely important for this country to claim to exist as a national state when 25 per cent of its population has not agreed to the fundamental law of the country and does not make any sense at all. We have to strive to make sure that Quebec is a signatory and is a full participant.

I also argued over the months since the accord was signed that there is really nothing in the Meech Lake Accord that is inconsistent with Canada's constitutional tradition dating back, not only to the Treaty of Paris in 1763 or the Proclamation of 1763, but even to the edicts of the military government that took over Quebec after 1759. Those military governments recognized, in order to maintain the security of Quebec and North America, that the right of Quebec to its religion, its civil law, and its language, were critical elements. Back then even the successors in terms of military government to General Wolfe, recognized the distinct society in Quebec and the importance of that society to the continuation of British North America.

I think there has been a problem and I think there is some blame that has to be laid. After the signing of the Meech Lake Accord and the endorsement of the accord by the eight provinces and by the Parliament of Canada, I think there was an obligation on the part of the federal government or an obligation on the part of the government that sits opposite to cross Canada and to explain to the people of Canada exactly what that accord was all about. This is where the initial failure of leadership took place.

I can say as a person who represents the most western province, British Columbia that there was an absence of any government representatives in that province to explain to people exactly what the Meech Lake Accord was about, why it was a good thing for Canada, why it was a good thing to recognize the distinctiveness of Quebec society within the accord, and why the accord should be adopted, not simply by every legislature and the Parliament of Canada but also by the citizens of Canada who could take up that document and that Constitution as their own, be proud of it, and have nothing to fear from it.

That is where the initial failure of leadership came because the Prime Minister of this country did not go around and talk to the people of Canada, explain what was in the document, and explain the advantages of that document to Canada: the advantage of bringing Quebec back into the constitutional family and the advantages which would proceed in the future in terms of addressing other constitutional requirements if this constitutional amendment were passed in the time set out for it to be passed.

That is when the debate was hijacked by western extremists, by people like APEC. People who wormed their way into the debate eventually took the leadership of the debate and turned this document, in western Canada at any rate, into something that the people of that region feared, loathed, and wanted to see defeated.

Also I think some people had the worst intentions in mind. They wanted to attack the French speaking people of this country, were intolerant, and wanted to use the intolerance that was growing in Canada at that time as a vehicle to defeat the Meech Lake Accord and to defeat the constitutional amendment. I think the blame for that hijacking of the debate around the Meech Lake Accord by extremists on the language issue and by extremists who wanted to force Quebec out of Canada can be put squarely at the door of the Prime Minister of this country.

As one Liberal member suggested, rather than going around the country and saying "you must accept this" and "not to accept this is to be anti–Quebec" was not the argument that registered well with the people of Canada.

My finding, when explaining this document to the people in my constituency, was that many of them had not even read it. Many of them had not seen the document. Many of them who had scanned the document did not understand it and needed some explanation. They needed the authorities there that they could consult, trust, and rely on to explain the document to them.

Who did they have? They had Preston Manning, they had the Reform Party, they had APEC, and they had a whole series of people who wanted to use that document for their own purposes, whether political or whether to increase the intolerance between groups in this country. I think it was a shame that those people were allowed to hijack the debate because of the failure of the leadership on the part of the Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. Speaker, there are other things that have contributed to the disunity of Canada. I think that those contributions to the disunity of this country, again, rest squarely on the shoulders of the Conservative Party opposite and the Conservative government opposite.

My family has been in this country since before it was a country. They moved to Canada east in 1819 from Ireland. They did not consider themselves English Canadians because Irish was the language that was taken away from them by the English in Ireland and they did not see themselves as English Canadians. But they did see themselves as Canadians nevertheless.

They have been here since 1819. They drilled in the Rebellion of 1837, on the side of Canada. They fought in wars, both in western Canada and in Europe on the side of Canada. My family, over the five generations that they have been here, have committed themselves to Canada and we hope will be able to commit ourselves to Canada in the future. That is certainly my commitment and I know the commitment of one other Skelly in this particular House.

We are concerned about what is happening with this country because this country was put together contrary to all the predictions of the experts on how a country should be put together. The geographers told us that the natural lines of trade are north and south with the various regions of the United States and that you could not pull a country as large and diverse as distant from shore to shore as Canada, together. Yet, Canadians and Canadian governments over the years, through the active involvement of government in the process, managed to turn this country into the nation that everybody predicted could not exist and would ultimately fall into the jaws of the United States.

The fathers and mothers of Confederation actually put this country together and it is always a problem keeping this country together. It is a problem that those of us who enter public life, whether at the provincial, municipal or federal level, always must address ourselves to. We know if we neglect this country at any particular time or neglect the sinews and glue that hold this country together, then it is going to spring apart. We have to take good care of the sinews and glue that hold this country together.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs talked about Canadians as being some of the most fortunate and luckiest people in the world. To some extent, some of us are the luckiest people in the world. Some of us are, but not all of us are.

I think that some of the policies of this government, over the last few years, have contributed in a very dangerous way to disunity in this country and contributed to disunity in such a way that the country is being pulled apart to the point where it is not willing to accept the Meech Lake Accord.

I look at this government's action in destroying the VIA Rail system. It was that railway that pulled this country together from sea to sea and Canadians are proud of that railway. It is a railway that served virtually every region of the country and a railway that could have been held together by government not simply dismissed and destroyed. That railway was perceived as being a symbol of Canada, and an important symbol that pulled the people of this country together in recognition of this country, Canada.

This government has attacked senior citizens through the clawback program. The one thing that this country stood for was that pensions would be the same, whether you lived in Nova Scotia, Newfoundland or on the coast of British Columbia. The value of universal programs in this country was to maintain this country and to maintain social programs at a certain standard in every region of the country. By undermining the universality of those programs, the government again has removed some of the sinews and glue that keeps this country together and keeps us thinking as Canadians. Some people suffered as a result of that. Other people did not suffer.

• (2050)

Another example of what the government has done is the unemployment insurance legislation. Some people in Canada are going to be paying a greater penalty than others as a result of what that legislation will do. You cannot have a country where everybody pulls together, where everybody considers themselves fortunate, where everybody contributes and has the same aspirations for the future when some people pay greater penalties for being a Canadian than others. That is a serious problem which is a result of the policies that this government has brought down.

If this government had been more sensitive to the need to maintain programs in Canada, to maintain the symbols of what this country is all about, then I think there would be stronger support for this government and for the Meech Lake Accord and for keeping this country together. I do not think we would find ourselves in this House of Commons, at the eleventh hour, trying to talk two legislatures into approving something which on the one hand they see as against their best interests but, on the other hand, feel they are forced to accept in order to keep the country together.

I think that the Prime Minister and the government in the last two years have contributed, to a great extent, to the disunity of this country. As a result, Meech Lake tends to fall on deaf ears, especially for the people who are paying a higher penalty for being Canadians than others because of the inequality in the legislation that has come down as a result of this government.

I do not think there has been any more important group that has been hit by this than the aboriginal people of this country. In the February budget these people were the hardest hit by the budget reductions. Why did the government focus its attack in the budget on the native people of Canada? The government cut back native print media so that newspapers used by native organizations and tribal councils are now being forced to shut down. Newspapers like the Micmac News that first brought to the attention of this House and to the Nova Scotia Legislature the injustice practised by the Nova Scotia justice system against Donald Marshall; newspapers that in the north and in western Canada are agents for providing literacy training and providing retention of native languages were totally eliminated because their budgets were cut 100 per cent. Many of them will be gone by the time this summer is over. Why were aboriginal people singled out by this government, by the vicious Thatcherite kind of budget that this government imposed on native Indians?

Native broadcasting was cut by 15 per cent. Native people, with an oral language tradition, relied on native broadcasting, both radio and television broadcasting, again to preserve their traditions, to preserve their languages. Yet this vehicle for preserving the language of native people in this country and for keeping their traditions intact was cut by the government. Natives do not see this government and its proposals as supporting their aspirations. They see themselves as being singled out for an attack by Canada. How can Canada now expect native people to want to support the Constitution of a country that they feel does nothing but marginalize them, force them to the outside of society, both in economic and social terms. Now they want native people to endorse the Constitution?

I think it would be a matter of good faith on the part of this government to reverse those cuts, to say they were wrong because they were an attack on native people. I think that would be absolutely necessary in order to get the native people on side, because right now they feel the most attacked of any group in our society.

The Prime Minister sent his agent, Senator Lowell Murray, to talk to the native people and to MLA Elijah Harper out in Manitoba and made them a whole series of offers about involvement in the first ministers process, so that they could be involved in the first ministers process. Why did the Prime Minister not make that offer before? The Prime Minister went to Manitoba and offered a royal commission into aboriginal issues, a royal commission that would be the equivalent to the biculturalism and bilingualism commission of years ago.

The natives have specifically asked not to have a royal commission. The Prime Minister has offered any number of things. Native people remember when this Prime Minister made promises to them coming out of First Ministers' conferences. Those promises simply were not kept.

This is a release by the Prime Minister of Canada in 1985. He promised after a First Ministers conference in 1985:

> My policies and those of my government are based on certain principles:
> —the special relationship between Canada and the aboriginal peoples should be strengthened;

How? By cutting their budgets? By making it more impossible for them to operate their media and their representative organizations? Is that how the Prime Minister is going to strengthen the relationship between aboriginal people and the Government of Canada? In fact, this promise was not kept and the native people in this country are suspicious of this Prime Minister keeping any of his promises to them at all.

Aboriginal rights, especially the right of self-government, should have constitutional protections. In the land claims settlements just discussed by the Prime Minister in the House today, the rights of self-government were not, specifically not, constitutionally protected.

Current funding levels of programs designed to correct the serious inequities which exist for native people and native communities will be maintained. In fact, the inequities have grown as a result of cut-backs in funding for native people from the Secretary of State's department. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development says the funding for Indian Affairs is increased. In fact, for certain native programs it has been capped.

Because of the growing population of native people, the amount of money going to native people in this country per capita has been going down. How can the Prime Minister expect the native people of this country to believe him when he has certainly not kept the promises he has made in document after document after document. They are tired of listening to promises that are not going to be kept.

If the Meech Lake Accord is to pass and be accepted by Canadians, we must have some kind of change in the kind of leadership that has been shown by this government. We have to see policies brought down in this House that do not protect some Canadians and punish others and then expect to see those Canadians pull together at a time of need for national unity.

If we are going to see the Meech Lake Accord passed and accepted by Canadians in the future, we will have to see a government that embarks on policies that brings this country together and holds this country together and treats some people much better than this government has.

[Translation]

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I want to say, first of all, that I am not particularly joyful as I rise in the House this evening, at the eleventh hour of a great constitutional debate, to speak to the motion before the House, a motion that urges the Manitoba and Newfoundland Legislative Assemblies to ratify the Constitution Amendment, 1987. Nevertheless, I am optimistic, and I am convinced that the accord, as negotiated, will be ratified on time.

Mr. Speaker, today we are discussing, as we have been for the past three years, a constitutional document, but we are also talking about the future of our country. As a Quebecer, I want to be a full participant in Canadian society. As a Canadian, I want a united country from coast to coast.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, in politics we must have a number of goals. The question that often arises is the following: What do we, as leaders of a country, want to leave to future generations, to our children and grandchildren? My list is not very long, but I think it will meet with the approval of all members of this House. We want to leave a country that is strong and united. We want to pass on a prosperous country; we want to pass on a country which is fair; we want to pass on a country where every citizen, man or woman, can find respect. And we want to pass on a country which gives its citizens the opportunity to realize their potential.

Mr. Speaker, I think that Canada, on those five scores, is showing a rather impressive record, but still incomplete, a record that the accord we are discussing today could enable us to improve in a major way, while enabling us to realize in a more concrete way the goals we had set for ourselves. Of course it has to be done by welcoming Quebec in the great Canadian constitutional family, and this will enable us to go forward to realize some of the goals that we had set for ourselves and that still need more improvement.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I rise today not as a minister, but as an ordinary member of this House, as an ordinary citizen, as a French-speaking resident of Ontario whose ancestors came from Quebec. Throughout my life, Mr. Speaker, I was given several opportunities. First, when I was very young, I had the opportunity to learn both official languages of Canada. I was given the choice, and I made a decision. I can say today that I have no regret.

I also had the opportunity to study in Ontario and in Quebec, and I still consider myself fortunate today. Afterwards, I had the opportunity to study in the United States with the assistance of two institutions, Hydro-Québec and the Arts Council. The two levels of government helped a young student to develop and reach his goals.

After graduating in the States, Mr. Speaker, I had the choice either to stay south of the border, or to come back to Quebec, and to Canada. I decided then to come back to my country, because of the values we share here, the tolerance, the openness of mind, the faith in our future, the willingness to build a country, to assert ourselves, all of which I could not find anywhere else. I willingly made those choices, Mr. Speaker, I made those decisions, I said yes to Canada.

Nowadays, we are discussing a constitutional agreement, one in a series of several such accords. It is not the first of its kind, nor the last, Mr. Speaker. We have to realize that a Constitution is a dynamic, living instrument, one that reflects our society.

Today, we are discussing a document approved by all the First Ministers of the country, a document which would allow us to pursue our constitutional evolution. The requests dealt within the document—I will not read them to you because they are quite well known by now—were the minimum demands of a people, one part of our country which had been excluded from the constitutional agreement of 1982. By ratifying the accord, we could proceed to a new round of constitutional review.

Then, as Canadians, the question we should ask, and probably the question many people outside of the country are asking themselves, is what will happen if the accord is ratified and what will happen if it is not? Where will we go after the signing of the accord? How can a single piece of paper take such a vital importance for the future of our country?

Mr. Speaker, all of us Canadians have made tremendous progress in dealing with many problems to make Canada more competitive and put the country back on the right economic track. We have won greater confidence in our abilities and more respect internationally as a member of the Group of Seven or G-7, the world's leading industrialized nations. Mr. Speaker, there is a new entrepreneurial spirit in Canada, a new economic vitality, supported and encouraged by all levels of government that represent the key to a strong, dynamic and competitive nation. We must not forget that a good economic performance is what guarantees fair and generous social programs for the country. The Canada we are building for this decade and the next century will have to meet society's demands for a higher standard of living, environmental protection, better health care and a better education system.

How can we maintain our momentum and reach these objectives that will enable Canada to play an important role in the world economy? The answer is obvious. We must remain a united country. Social justice cannot exist without economic renewal. Economic renewal cannot exist without national reconciliation. This goal can be reached by ratifying the Meech Lake Accord, thus ensuring social peace and economic prosperity for Canada. Not only will the accord allow Quebec to regain its place in the Constitution but it will strengthen all of Canada. A strong federal government with strong provinces is essential to the country's success. The accord gives all provinces without exception an equal voice in changes to national institutions, important institutions like the Senate and the Supreme Court. That defines the new federalism. We believe it is the only way a country as big and as diversified as Canada can find its place on the international market and in a global society.

Meech Lake will unite the Canadian family while enabling all Canadians to proceed to the next stage of their constitutional and economic expansion. We will turn the page on the 1980s and open a new chapter on the 1990s. Meech Lake will give us the economic stability that is essential to attract foreign investment and prepare Canada for the international challenges of the coming years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question: Should Meech fail, should Meech not be ratified—and I think we are now well into the eleventh hour when, as political leaders of the country, we have to entertain the possibility that the Meech Lake Accord might not be ratified before June 23—we must seriously consider what might become of Canada after June 23.

Nobody can really predict the outcome of such an eventuality, and I must confess that, like anybody else, I do not have a crystal ball to gaze into the future. For sure, the sun will rise in the early hours of June 24. Still, Mr. Speaker, we have heard a number of possible scenarios, most of them not overly optimistic. I can tell you that if Meech Lake is not ratified, unfortunately I am among those whose outlook on the days ahead is rather grim. The signature of the Meech Lake Accord is a unique accomplishment which several former Prime Ministers have been unable to achieve. It is the result of efforts of goodwill and of a spirit of compromise and fairness which have been the hallmark of our country's history. And I am sorry to say that, should Meech Lake fail, that spirit will be the first victim.

The accord was initiated when Premier Bourassa put his five basic conditions on the table and the other nine premiers accepted to take Quebec back into the constitutional family. It was said repeatedly that those five conditions are the most reasonable ever asked by a premier from Quebec. Jack Pickersgill had this to say about Quebec's willingness to compromise, as shown in its conditions, and about the consequence of failure: "If Quebec is rejected, if this agreement becomes a disagreement and if such an opportunity to get the approval of Quebec's constitutional authorities is lost, I believe that we will not get another chance before another generation and never with such reasonable terms." As I was saying, that willingness to compromise will be the first victim of the failure of the accord. And the message that Canada will send to the rest of the world if this accord fails, after three years of discussions and after being signed by all eleven First Ministers, will be most disconcerting. How will the international community react? Economic impacts are already being felt. Several foreign investment projects are already being delayed or shelved.

If the accord should fail, Mr. Speaker, what we would lose next I am afraid would be the confidence of other countries which do business with Canada. A major force is at stake, although we cannot assess its impact just now. I can assure you that there would be an impact both nationally and internationally. Political uncertainty and disagreement are not conducive to foreign investments. This burden would be made heavier as a result of our constitutional situation. The progress we have made so far in the area of Senate reform, Indian rights, women's rights, as well as the constitutional expectations raised in other groups would be short-lived. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to carry out further constitutional reform in the absence of Quebec around the constitutional table.

Mr. Speaker, I have listed three major victims of a possible failure of the accord. However, I sincerely believe that what would suffer most would be our pride, pride in ourselves as a people who have always shown understanding, compassion, justice and tolerance, pride in our own country, this great and magnificent land which is the envy and admiration of many other nations. Those who would cause this accord to fail, for whatever reason—and I will not mention any name—would have difficulty explaining to Quebecers on June 24 that Canada said no to them once more. They would find it difficult to explain to Westerners and Atlantic Canadians that the Senate reform is impossible. They would find it difficult to explain to our trading partners that while walls are crumbling down all over the world, that nations are seeking a global market, we, as Canadians, have erected new barriers to make us less competitive. They will be hard pressed to explain to their children how they could let Canada drift apart.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, earlier this evening I spoke of options, of opportunities. In the next few days, we will have the option and the opportunity to say yes to Quebec and, as much if not more important, to say yes to Canada. Mr. Speaker, as a Canadian and a Quebecer, I would not want to intrude in any provincial jurisdiction, but I simply want to support the motion before the House this evening and urge all Canadians from coast to coast to take that step ahead, to say yes and proceed to the next stage, to continue to build this great and magnificent country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, the Meech Lake Accord was a flawed document from the very beginning. It is flawed both in process and in substance. This document has torn our country as it has never been torn before, and that is the result of its flaws and the Prime Minister's penchant to conquer by discord.

There is no doubt that Quebec should be brought into the Constitution, but this document, with all its flaws, I believe will not work. That is why I must oppose it.

This discord was hatched in darkness and nurtured on fear. It has nothing to commend its passage. Moreover, it ignores Canada's first people and that has nurtured anger, fear, discrimination and despair. It has been a classic example of how a constitutional document should never be undertaken. Its genesis occurred in secret and grew on doubt, confusion, suspicion and misinformation.

For three years the Prime Minister repeated over and over again that the document had to be accepted as it is. Not an i could be undotted or a t uncrossed. Then we had that marathon, week-long spectacle here in Ottawa where the Prime Minister rolled the dice. What a cynical way to build a nation's most fundamental document and to build respect among colleagues. Not being satisfied with rolling the dice, he had to brag that he did it deliberately and thus inflamed the atmosphere to the awful state we have today.

A constitution must involve the people of a nation, not just the First Ministers. It must reflect the views, the aspirations, the hope and the will of all of the people. It cannot be hatched in darkness, in secret, in manufactured desperation.

The people must have a constitution that takes into account all of the people and especially our aboriginal peoples. By any ethical standard, they should have been the very first to be consulted and to have their grievances adjudicated in fairness and generosity.

I want to say, and I will do so briefly, something about this canard that Quebec was left out of the first round. Sir, this is just not true. It is true that Quebec was not there, but Quebec was not there because the Lévesque government chose not to be there for its own reasons.

We must have a complete, proper and functional constitution, but it must be consummated for all of the people, born in light, and approved by all. Anything less, Sir, I can neither support nor accept. A valid constitution belongs to the people, not to the government.

Mr. Speaker, we come to life and sometimes forget that we are finite beings, but we are not. However, our country should outlast us all for many generations after all of us will have been forgotten. The world may little note nor long remember what we say here, but our descendants will long remember what we do here. Let us not fail them.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Miramichi for giving me the opportunity to use the rest of the time allowed to the Liberal Party to take part in this important debate. I think it is appropriate to put the debate into the context of a motion that the government is proposing and that urges the Manitoba and Newfoundland legislatures to complete the ratification of the Constitutional Amendment, 1987 before June 23 1990, Saturday of this week, so that Canadians can complete an important act of nation-building and thereby open up the process for Canada's future constitutional development, including the important issues of Senate reform, of aboriginal rights and linguistic rights, of territorial participation in the federation and of providing a process for a continuing review of the operation of the Constitution of Canada.

• (2120)

Mr. Speaker, that is more or less what the motion proposes and we, on this side, hope that the two provinces that are still hesitating will hear the message that members of this House are sending and accept by the deadline of June 23 the constitutional proposals known as those of the Meech Lake Accord. This motion reminds me of moments in 1986 and 1987 when the Meech Lake Accord was discussed in this House and at the Liberal Party Convention held here in Ottawa. In November of 1986, the National Convention of the Liberal Party approved a proposal very similar to the motion which is before the House today. I want to remind the House that it was we of the Liberal Party that proposed to amend the Meech Lake Accord precisely to strenghten that accord and to give it a national relevance. Here is, in substance, what was contained in the resolution proposed in November 1986 by the Liberal Party. We proposed adding a preamble to the Constitution to preserve and promote the linguistic duality and to recognize Quebec's distinctiveness, the multicultural character of Canadian society, the contribution made by native people, as well as the advantage of developing the Canadian economic union.

We introduced in this House nine constitutional amendments which were all defeated by the government. It has now come back with a motion very similar to what we were proposing three years ago.

[English]

History will say that this Liberal Party proposed three years ago some important amendments to strengthen the constitutional amendment. We do not have the pretension that we knew all about the process and that we would be able to propose things that would be perfect. I am not that naive. It is the first time since 1982, since we patriated our Constitution, that we Canadians go through the process of amending our Constitution. It is a lengthy process, a complicated one, one which, in my opinion, and I guess it is an opinion shared by many Canadians after this experience, is faulted, is in need of change.

Over the last few years in trying to explain to people in my riding, at the University of Ottawa, in my meetings with constituents, in meetings even with public servants not very long ago, I asked the simple question: "What does Meech mean to you? What does Meech mean to us? What does Meech mean? What does it encompass?"

I issued the challenge that if anybody in the room could tell me what the five conditions of getting Quebec into the constitutional fold are, I would buy him or her and a guest a supper at the Parliamentary Restaurant.

I never lost that bet, never once, and I made it umpteen times at the University of Ottawa. Nobody could give me the five conditions. Yet here we are wondering today why we are getting that kind of reaction. Well, I share the blame with all of us here in this House. We did not succeed in getting the message across to Canadians. We did not succeed in making them understand that we are not trying to make Quebec any better, greater or more powerful than any of the other provinces, but are trying to recognize the distinctiveness of that province.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the majority of Quebecers speak French. Quebec is the only province with a French majority. It has a different Civil Code, which has applied since Napoleon and is unique to this province. It has cultural and social traditions—as evidenced, for instance, in its music and its poetry—it is a distinct society in the Canadian context. It might not be the only one, but it really is one. I recognize it, and so did my party.

Secondly, it was said that Quebec would have its say in immigration matters. The Cullen–Couture agreement exists since 1976 or 1977, I think— It was agreed that through the Meech Lake Accord, all provinces would be given that same right. That does not strike me as such a big deal! These powers already existed under our statutes, but now they would be enshrined in the Constitution, for all provinces if they agree. I think that was pretty clear.

Third, Mr. Speaker, there was the matter of veto rights for Quebec on constitutional amendments. There was also the federal government's spending powers in areas under provincial jurisdiction. There was a desire to restrict those powers. There is nothing new here. It was discussed in 1970, in Victoria, and in 1976 here in the House. This is not new. There was the question of Senate reform and giving the provinces the right to submit a list of candidates, and also that Quebec, since it has a different legal system—the Civil Code—would from now on be entitled to appoint three justices to the Supreme Court.

That is what Meech boils down to, and that's all. However, many Canadians are still very hazy about all this. Today I heard some very eloquent speeches in which it was said that the whole issue had been so poorly explained that today, Mr. Speaker, there is resentment and hatred in this country, and it's true, and it is just because people don't understand. I find this very depressing, because once properly explained, it is a matter that is certainly not difficult to understand.

[English]

In affirming the constitutional role of the elected legislators of this federation of ours, and their right to decide, which is what we are going through now in this process, all this motion does is urge that Manitoba and Newfoundland exert efforts to bring about full ratification of the constitutional accord of 1987.

We have affirmed that deep commitment to this country. We would like to reaffirm that constitutional amendments can be made with care, understanding and generosity.

• (2130)

I think people have read into Meech much more than is actually there. I have heard some of the speakers on the government side today say that will be a disquieting and worrisome on June 25, June 26, or thereabouts, but I join some of my colleagues on this side. I think that if we do not get Meech it may not be the end of Canada. I hope and pray that it is not, but it will be a different Canada, Mr. Speaker. I can tell you that. I believe that strongly.

Will it be more generous, more understanding to the native people and their rights, to the minorities and their rights? Will the majority of Canadians, English speaking, be more understanding of the minorities after if Meech does not pass? I do not believe that.

Will they be more caring, more generous? I do not believe they will be. I do not think that if Meech is defeated that that will make the majority more understanding of the minority expectations, dreams, or rights, for that matter.

A Constitution is made for minorities, because we are all in some sense part of a minority. God knows we have minority rights now in our Constitution; minority rights are there. They are not always applied, I agree. I could give the House possibly a long speech on minority rights in this country.

I was the one who got up on my feet the day after the Prime Minister announced the Meech Lake Accord, the Langevin Meech Lake Accord, and asked the Prime Minister about promoting minority rights across this land. I thought that was the normal thing: preserve, yes, but promote also because preserve means status quo, promote looks forward, moves. I was told to be patient, that it will come in the second round. I was very disappointed.

Since then I have asked the Prime Minister in this House many times to convene a federal-provincial conference and get on with solving our constitutional impasse. I was told: "Wait, it is not the time. My emissary, Senator Murray, is out there consulting with the provinces". I understand that process.

However we are now at the eleventh hour. I say to the Prime Minister: if this thing does not go through and if they do not hear our plea in Manitoba and Newfoundland, there is only one person that I will blame and that is the Prime Minister of this country.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the hon. member's remarks. I certainly have to agree with him that we are at the eleventh hour. In fact, on June 27 last year, the last day that the House sat, I asked the very same question: "We are less than one year now from Meech Lake. What is to be done about it?" The answer was: "Wait, everything is under control." We have seen that that obviously has fallen flat.

People who come to Ottawa and watch, people who are watching their TVs tonight, people who are watching to see what is going to happen in effect with Manitoba and Newfoundland and Labrador, and people across the country are frustrated about the whole process.

I am hearing over and over again the problems with the Meech Lake Accord. First, there are objections to the process whereby Meech Lake was developed and this whole top down approach that I have mentioned so many times in this House. As I said, people feel frustrated. Second, there are objections to the high priority which Meech Lake gives to Quebec's constitutional demands while failing to address the constitutional demands of other groups. I just heard from my hon. friend that everybody is talking about minority rights. I think it is very interesting to note that that is so important. Finally, there is this rigid amending formula that I have mentioned in this House so many times as well.

I would like to ask a question of my hon. friend. Come June 24 or June 25, can we say as members in the federal Parliament of Canada that Canada is bigger than Meech Lake, or is Meech Lake so overpowering that absolutely nothing can be done? Will the Meech Lake Accord, in his estimation, solve all of Canada's problems?

• (2135)

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the answer can be anything else but that this will not resolve all our problems. It never had that pretension anyway.

The Meech Lake agreement, like the 1981 constitutional patriation documents and the Charter of Rights, never had the pretension of answering all Canadians' expectations or answering all of our hopes and dreams, although I believe it is a step in the right direction.

I must admit that I agree with the hon. member that the process has proven incredibly difficult and possibly flawed. I have a quote from the Prime Minister, himself, when he said in the House on June 11 of this year: "This process has proven to be increasingly unsatisfactory in several respects and must be changed. There should, first and foremost, be ample opportunity for Canadians to participate in the process".

That process is flawed; let us change it. As far as I am concerned, on the 25th we must stand together in this country, go forward and continue to build this country of Canada in a way that it is generous, open, free, and absolutely democratic, for the sake of our kids. I do not think that we can do it in one shot.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House for debate today is that:

> The House urges the Manitoba and Newfoundland Legislative Assemblies to exert efforts to bring about full ratification of the Constitution Amendment, 1987 by June 23, 1990, so that Canadians can complete an important act of nation-building and thereby open the process for Canada's future constitutional development, including the important issues of Senate reform, of aboriginal rights and linguistic rights, of territorial participation in the federation, and of providing a process for a continuing review of the operation of the Constitution of Canada.

I want to stand and speak in support of the motion. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I am probably the least partisan member in this House and I think all members recognize that. On the question of the future of Canada, I cannot find it in my partisan heart to actually see this issue in partisan terms. I cannot see the issue in partisan terms, so I am not going to involve myself in assigning blame. I am not going to blame the Prime Minister and I am not going to blame the provinces. I want to spend my time trying to explain why I would recommend to the legislatures of Manitoba, Newfoundland and Labrador that they support and pass the Meech Lake Accord with the attachment of June 9.

I do this because I recall very vividly three years ago. I remember the meeting at the Langevin building and I remember that weekend very well. I am not a betting person but I was prepared to take bets and I did not give the Prime Minister a snowball's chance in hell of coming out of that weekend meeting with any sort of agreement. I recall that very vividly.

I think I speak for all members in this House when I say how surprised we were that a unanimous agreement came out of that. In fact, on Monday morning, following that culmination of the Meech Lake process, everyone stood in this House and gave the Prime Minister a standing ovation. I did, and my colleagues in this party did. We all stood because we recognized that finally Quebec was pulling up its chair at the constitutional table and was going to participate now in the building of this nation.

• (2140)

It was an important element in the whole process of constitutional development. We were all very pleased. There were 10 premiers' signatures on that document, and the Prime Minister's signature. Ten and one; 11 signatures.

I have talked to a lot of young people. What they cannot understand at all in this country is whether a person's signature is worth anything any more. Is not the person's word and signature a bond any more? That is what young people say to me.

I was talking to a young chap the other day who said: "Well, if they signed it, they should stick by it, and if there are things you don't like, you work to change them". And all of this malarkey about process. Every Canadian has a different process, probably a lot better process than was followed. But that is the process that was inherited. You talk about process in 1982? It did not even go to the provincial legislatures.

If one were to examine in retrospect the document that former Prime Minister Trudeau gave to the country, people today would find fault with the notwithstanding clause. Where has there ever been a perfect constitution? Name the constitution that is perfect. Name the law that is perfect.

I saw a law come through Parliament—one page, two clauses—and we did it all in 15 minutes. It went to the Senate, and it found there that there was a comma in the wrong place which changed the whole meaning. It had to come back to Parliament and go through the process again in 15 minutes. It is not a perfect document and nobody says it is.

The Meech Lake Accord, of course, is not a perfect document. I want to say that I cannot accept the fact that it was made by 11 elitist people, 11 people of privilege. Of course not. They are elected. The premier of Ontario, whether I like it or not, he is not in my party, he was elected by the majority of people in the province of Ontario. Therefore, he represents the people of Ontario. The integrity is in the fact that he is elected. This is a democracy. They are not people of privilege. They are people who are elected.

So those 11 people signed the document, and eight legislatures ratified it. Two have not; Manitoba and New Brunswick.

There was a change of government in Newfoundland and that government deratified it. What a cockamamie way of making a constitution. Can you believe it? Who would ever come back and sit at the table thinking that there is integrity in this group and they would stick with what they have agreed to? By the time the ink is dry on the document, you find half the governments have changed. They have new stripes, new motivations, new politics and they do not like it. Throw it out. What a heck of a way to operate a country.

I have talked to people who are not from this country. They are absolutely amazed that we are risking the breakup of this nation, as we know it today, over this question: How many angels can dance on the head of a pin?

When one province came into Confederation, it was written into the Constitution you need to have a colour for the margarine. Believe it or not.

I say that the people who signed the document have a responsibility to have it ratified. They had a responsibility. I do not think it is out of place for us, as a federal Parliament, with elected members to have a national vision of Canada. I represent the riding of Nickel Belt, but my first commitment is to Canada because I am in a national Parliament. Therefore, I do not think it is beyond the realm of possibility for the federal Parliament to ask two of its confederated partners, namely Manitoba and Newfoundland and Labrador, to pass the Meech Lake Accord. I think it is quite within our responsibility to do that. I have no compunction whatsoever in asking those two provinces to ratify the Meech Lake Accord.

• (2145)

There is no question in my mind that the whole process of Meech Lake was to bring Quebec into the constitutional family. The Edmonton declaration where the nine premiers of the provinces—the Prime Minister was not present—declared that the next round of constitutional talks was to bring Quebec into the constitutional family. That was the purpose. If we do not fulfil that commitment, we put in jeopardy any future changes to the Constitution of this country.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, the offer made to aboriginal peoples is a fair one. I ask them, through the medium of this television, to reconsider. It is a fair proposal.

Meech Lake was signed and the ratification was supposed to take place, but it did not take place. Then started the dance. I could find a lot of fault with the way the Prime Minister may have handled it, but that is beside the point. The whole process of bringing the premiers together was to reach some consensus on getting this passed. The whole purpose is the welfare of the nation. That is the overriding concern. I cannot fault the Prime Minister for attempting to use every opportunity to make the premiers recognize their responsibility.

I have been really impressed with some people in this whole process. I want to tell you that I was very impressed with the Premier of Alberta, who actually stuck to his guns at one of his conventions in the Province of Alberta. He stuck to his support for Meech Lake, and won. If ever a person had as a concern Senate reform, it was Don Getty. He went into the Meech Lake Accord with the concept of a Triple E Senate. He did not come out with a Triple E Senate. I suspect he recognized that the greater concern was to bring Quebec into the constitutional family.

I think people are putting their heads in the sand if they do not sense the mood across the river. It is not one of frenzy, but it is quiet certainty.

I recall very well the referendum debate. I was sitting on the sidelines. I saw all the municipalities across the country passing motions and sending them to Quebec. My municipality sent a motion which said: "Oh, Quebec, we love you, we love you. Just say no, and we will make it all right". That is what we hear. Just ask: "Will you love me as much tomorrow as you love me now?" That is what happened. I see the same dance happening again. We are sending all the cards saying: "We love you". Well, I do not think it will work this time. Once caught, twice shy. We have a responsibility as federal parliamentarians. That responsibility is the question of seeing Canada whole, as it is.

• (2150)

Meech is not the end, Meech is the beginning. It is promised in the attached document that we will look at and correct the process. That is fine. We will do that. But I think the first priority, and one that we owe the next generation of Canadians, is to deliver this country as we know it today on to them so they can build on this and make it a better country.

That is why I stand and speak in favour of the motion. It should be approved and, God, I hope it is.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments and then I would like to ask the hon. gentleman from Nickel Belt a question.

Mr. Speaker, I share his view. I absolutely support the Meech Lake Accord and I am convinced it is not only the right move, it is the best move for the country at this time.

I also share his view and recommend to all Canadians, particularly those in Newfoundland and Manitoba, and our aboriginal citizens everywhere, that we consider that the truly positive and constructive benefits of the Meech Lake agreement will bring a common direction for our country, committed at last to new constitutional progress, a new Senate, aboriginal reform, aboriginal rights, pride in a common vision of our country, common identity, economic stability and new prosperity, a renewed international strength and influence and the time and energy for other things, other challenges such as the environment and the economy.

I would like to congratulate and commend all those Canadians such as the hon. gentleman from Nickel Belt who have participated in this debate on the Meech Lake Accord over the past three years and who have stood so solidly behind it.

In particular, tonight I would like to commend and congratulate those legislators in Newfoundland and Manitoba who are wrestling with this issue at this very moment. I am confident that they will discharge their duty in the best interests, not only of their provinces, but of all of Canada.

In the final analysis when we talk of certainty, there can only be certainty where there is trust. Surely we have now learned that only where there is trust is it possible that a great country such as Canada can find its true potential and its destiny.

In these final days we do place our trust in our fellow citizens in Manitoba and Newfoundland. I do not believe they will let us down.

I believe there has been a paralysis in the constitutional affairs of Canada ever since the patriation of the Constitution. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman from Nickel Belt if he believes that the constitutional paralysis that we have endured for so many years will now be cured with the passage of the Meech Lake Accord and with the existence at the one constitutional table of all the provinces and the federal government of Canada.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his question.

I want to respond appropriately because when the Constitution of 1982 was negotiated in the kitchen of a room in the Chateau Laurier it seemed that René was not in the kitchen with Dinah in the discussions on the constitution.

René Lévesque was not there and all the other premiers who were there came up with a deal. They did not hesitate to say that Lévesque was in high dudgeon and left. That is too bad.

But Quebec was out of it and did not attend constitutional conferences after that. In fact the ones the Prime Minister referred to with respect to aboriginal people failed, with five provinces and the federal government voting for it, and Quebec was not there.

• (2155)

A major player represents six million people. How could we exclude six million people from the negotiating table? If they are not at the negotiating table, in fact our family is not complete. There is somebody missing at the table.

I think the Meech Lake Accord brought Quebec in. Certainly after the Meech Lake Accord was signed, it was a departure to see the Premier of Quebec talking about our country, our Canada. Meech Lake provides the opportunity for further changes to the Constitution and the accompanying document. Now all these things can go forward. I think it is very important that Meech Lake be approved.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Nickel Belt for his support of the motion.

Above all, I would like to thank him for the very eloquent and noble way in which he has reminded us all of the real purpose of Meech Lake. I would like to ask him one question. Does he not find it surprising that our Liberal colleagues across the floor keep saying that they are hesitant about Meech Lake because it does not do enough for the promotion of minority rights, for aboriginal people and so on?

They have been in power for all but six years of the last 50 years, why did they not do it then?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I started out by saying that the one thing that I will not do is attach partisan politics to my view of Meech Lake and the wholeness of Canada. I will not comment on whether Liberals did it better than Conservatives. I think that is falling into a trap.

I can find a whole zillion things such as tax changes and social programs about which I am the most partisan member in this House. As a group, Tories are an acronym to me. Individually, some of them are not too bad. The same with Liberals. On this whole question of Canada and Meech Lake, I cannot project an image to Canadians that I want to get down into the specific, partial gutter and start throwing snowballs at the Liberals or Tories.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, with only a couple of minutes left, I must say that it is a great privilege for me to have the opportunity to be the last speaker in this debate.

As the hon. member who has just finished said, and as Churchill said: "We are near the end and we are at the end of the beginning", for Canada is still a very young nation. We have only just begun our constitutional development.

There are three days left, and two provinces are in final debates leading toward ratification of the Meech Lake Accord. I have always had a sense of faith about this issue. Sometimes it does seem to defy logic. This evening they are still debating in Manitoba and Newfoundland the ultimate destiny of this accord. If we want to contemplate the worst, we can be very worried about it. For Canada, I prefer to believe in the best.

These great issues bring out the best in us. For Manitoba, for Newfoundland and for every province, obviously there have been some difficult concerns subject by subject, clause by clause, word by word. There is compelling evidence that Meech Lake is good for Canada. Therefore, if it is good for Canada, it is good for every province and for every Canadian.

As we in Canada continually struggle for a common sense of national vision and identity, we sometimes lose sight of the very distinctions which make our nation great. Canada is comprised of many different meanings for many different people. What distinguishes this country, though, is its very capacity to promote and protect such differences while remaining true to the ideal of one united land.

As we look to Canada's future with this vital issue still to be resolved in the next few days, let us reaffirm our common commitment to building this country in tolerance and respect for one another. I believe and I feel sure, Mr. Speaker, that you believe that that is what Canada is really all about.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 10 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day, this sitting is suspended to the call of the chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CHANGE OF AFFILIATION OF MEMBER FOR RICHELIEU

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, never in all my life have I ever faced a more crucial decision, as a member of Parliament and as a Quebecer. For Quebecers the time has come to choose, and when all is said and done, I must choose Quebec.

Our ambiguous position as a people is not new. Since the earliest years of cohabitation with the anglophone component of this country, we have been treated as a conquered people but, nevertheless, citizens of this great country.

In 1763, James Murray, the first British governor said, in referring to our ancestors, that if they had left it would have been a great loss for the British empire. But what has been done since then to urge us to become full-fledged members of this empire?

Since the Royal Proclamation of 1763, the avowed goal of our new conquerors was to assimilate us. However, out of fear for the Americans and to soothe our feelings, we were recognized as a distinct society, several years later, in the Quebec Act. When at the end of the eighteenth century, repeated demands for our own legislative assembly were finally met, it was without the powers normally bestowed on that body. How magnanimous! How democratic!

We built this country with our blood and sweat. Our thanks was to be humiliated and treated as a people without history and without a culture. As the founding people of this country, we shall never forget the many times we have been humiliated in this great country we thought was ours: the Conquest, Louis Papineau and the patriots, the Act of Union, Louis Riel, the conscription question in both wars, the War Measures Act, the 1982 patriation of the Constitution without Quebec, and the defeat of the Meech Lake Accord.

History seems to be repeating itself today. I am thinking of that memorable motion presented before the Quebec Legislative Assembly in 1917 by MLA Francoeur. He pointed out that the province of Quebec would be willing to accept the break-up of the federative pact of 1867, if the other provinces felt that Quebec was a barrier to Canada's unity, progress and development.

I never thought I would see the day that we would be considered a barrier to Canada's progress and development, despite the "night of the long knives", in 1982. I really believed the risk was worth taking, and that is what made me go into politics in 1984, like most of my colleagues in the Quebec caucus who wanted to defend the interests of Quebec. I was prepared to follow this through to the very end, and I did.

Mr. Speaker, I also believed that the Premiers of the other Canadian provinces would abide by the Meech Lake Accord. I believed that all these politicians were men of their word and would abide by what they had signed. I believed they would never let themselves be manipulated behind the scenes by the Chrétien-Trudeau clan. You do not build a country on weakness, and Quebecers will no longer be satisfied with a vision of Canada that, as far as I am concerned, goes back to the Dark Ages.

For weeks I have been literally torn between my loyalty to the Prime Minister and my desire to respond to the imperative interests of Quebec. However, Mr. Speaker, the fact that Quebec was unable to re-enter Canadian Confederation with honour and enthusiasm is certainly not Prime Minister Mulroney's fault. If there ever was a prime minister in the history of Quebec, since 1867, who has done everything to try to give Quebec its proper place in Confederation, he is certainly the one, and I want to take this opportunity to thank him for doing so. We cannot reverse the course of events, however.

• (1110)

Mr. Speaker, I have far too much respect for my compatriots to give them a false impression of the way things stand today. No more expressions of trust in Canada! No more compromises that would be even more humiliating! My pride and dignity need time to heal, and from now on, I want to devote my energies only to Quebec. Quebecers are experiencing a time of extraordinary solidarity, and I would have lifelong regrets if I were to miss out on this new rendezvous with history.

From now on, Mr. Speaker, I intend to sit in this House as an independent, in a Quebec bloc where I will continue to serve the interests of my constituents in the riding of Richelieu, while at the same time serving those of Quebec. I will never forget the trust and encouragement I received from the people of Richelieu during the past weeks. I want to thank them and can assure them that I will continue to devote the same energy to all issues in my riding.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Prime Minister and my Quebec colleagues for the great satisfaction I had in working with them. All good things must come to an end, however and now the curtain rises on the federal tragi-comical farce. Mr. Speaker, a good memory is essential if reason is to prevail. I remember, and I want our descendants to remember. I will never accept the legacy of Lord Durham. And above all, I want Quebecers to look to the future with pride, dignity, determination and without any constraints on their aspirations.

CHANGE OF AFFILIATION OF MEMBER FOR ROSEMONT

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I think that today we must draw conclusions from the events of recent weeks in Canada.

Obviously, the utmost was done to make the whole country accept what all Quebecers always considered to be a bare minimum. I want to say that I am not criticizing Mr. Mulroney; he has full marks from me for his tenacity and his efforts to bring Quebec into the Constitution with honour, although the enthusiasm disappeared several weeks ago.

It is very clear that Mr. Bourassa went as far as he could possibly go in being open to the efforts made. We must admit that we have all failed. We were unable to repair the constitutional mess that Pierre Elliott Trudeau and Jean Chrétien left us. We must begin again, on a different basis, the thorough reform of this country's political institutions if we want them to correspond to the ideas of the distinct societies that make them up.

Most Quebecers who joined or supported the Progressive Conservative Party did so as part of what René Lévesque called the beau risque, or risk worth taking. I think that we were right and I trust that all our efforts were not completely in vain. Several provincial premiers seem to understand Quebec's aspirations better, and that is a gain. They will really need this understanding in the coming months to explain the consequences of the failure of the Meech Lake Accord to their fellow citizens! Quebecers have now begun to take a different approach, with realism, dignity and determination.

Like them, I am now convinced that beyond party politics, we will give ourselves a country in our image. I am convinced that it will be open to the world, ready to co-operate with its neighbours and all who want to leave their children a country they can identify with.

At a time of globalization of trade, such a move may seem inappropriate at first glance, but how much energy and time have been wasted repairing a constitution that divides us! Perhaps a broad political and social consensus is as necessary for economic development as an abundance of capital and technology. To meet the challenges facing us, we must soon acquire political institutions that express and harness our collective will.

With this deep conviction that is widely shared by my constituents in Rosemont, I have decided to fully support the non-partisan movement launched by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Bouchard).

I therefore announce my resignation as parliamentary secretary and my decision to sit henceforth as an independent member.

PETITIONS

BILL C–21

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise in accordance with Standing Order 36.

It is my privilege to present on behalf of my constituents from Bonavista, Catalina, Amherst Cove, Keels, Port Rexton, Port Union, and other communities on the Bonavista Peninsula, a concern that my constituents have with regard to Bill C–21. I do not have to remind the House about the status of that bill at this particular point in time.

My constituents continue to concern themselves about the fact that the government is going to get out of the unemployment insurance business. They are worried that it will cost, by the latest statistics, the average Newfoundlander $2,500. They are very concerned about the fact that they will now require 14 weeks of unemployment qualifying time at a time when the economy of Newfoundland is probably at a very low point, particularly with respect to the future of the fisheries.

They are very concerned. They humbly pray and ask Parliament to withdraw this bill so they can rely on unemployment insurance for the social support that it was meant to be when it was introduced in 1940.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by veterans from my constituency. They are concerned about the actions of this government.

The petitions reads: "Whereas the Government of Canada has introduced charges that will reduce housekeeping services to veterans and substantially increase the cost of long-term care, whereas our veterans have already given service to this country and should not be targeted by these measures", these veterans call upon Parliament to reject the budget measures that deprive veterans of proper services and increase their financial hardship.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to the House a petition certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions. It contains the signatures of hundreds of Canadians, residents of my riding of Hamilton West. They call upon Parliament to reject the budget measures that deprive Canadian veterans of proper services and increase their financial hardship.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition to present, which is certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions. It, too, contains the signatures of many hundreds of Canadians who are strongly opposed to the new goods and services tax. In their opinion, it is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment. Therefore, they call upon Parliament to reject the proposed GST.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted and honoured to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, petitions on behalf of some 80 of my constituents who ask Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to table two sets of petitions today. The first petition is from a number of residents throughout Canada who are still concerned six months later after the demise of VIA Rail. The petitioners call upon the government to not only restore funding, but upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger services.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a second group of petitions signed by hundreds of residents throughout northwestern Ontario, Thunder Bay, Atikokan, Kenora, Dryden, Sioux Lookout and a number of other communities who totally reject the government's goods and services tax and indicate in very strong language that they want it scrapped.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I too have the honour to table petitions. On behalf of Canadians from various parts of Quebec and Ontario, these petitioners cite in their petition that the people of Lithuania require the assistance of the various governments in the world to support their desire for freedom and independence.

The petitioners call upon this Parliament to act upon the all-party resolution of March 12, 1990, and recognize and support the right of the Lithuanian people to the clarity and dependence of the Republic of Lithuania.

ABORTION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents, I present a petition on abortion, pursuant to the Standing Orders of the House.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of petitioners in the Ottawa area, I have the pleasure to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, their request to this House that as the Government of Canada has seen fit, since Confederation and without hiatus, to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers and now propose to include them in the GST, the government please withdraw the tax on all matters that have to do with the historic principles embodied in the printed word with respect to legislation in this House.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to table a petition that calls upon Parliament to drop this legislation dealing with the imposition of a new sales tax on goods and services that Canadians will be purchasing after January 1, 1991.

The petitioners, and there are about 125 on this petition, feel strongly that this new goods and services tax is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians that would hit them, not only with higher taxes, but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, I have just come back from Calgary, and I will tell you that the people in Calgary are pretty angry about this.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 265, 309 and 311.

ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING

Question No. 265—Mr. Young (Gloucester):

Does the government expect, during the next ten years, to make cash payments to each of the provinces and territories under the Established Programs Financing and, if so, in what amounts?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): No detailed forecasts of such payments are made beyond five years, due to the difficulty of accurately forecasting factors such as gross national product, basic federal tax, and population for these years.

Projections of total EPF entitlements, including the cash and tax components, for the program years 1990–91 to 1994–95 are shown in Table 1. All figures are on a basis consistent with the February 1990 Budget. These projections are also subject to the difficulty of estimating transfers based on economic and demographic variables well into the future.

MR. ALLAN GOTLIEB

Question No. 311—Mr. Harvard:

1. Since his appointment as Chairman of the Canada Council, what number of days has Mr. Allan Gotlieb worked for the Council, for which he has received pay?

2. Are there objective criteria which must be met in order for Mr. Gotlieb to receive a full day's pay for Council work and (a) if so, what are they (b) if not, if Mr. Gotlieb claims a full day's pay, is his word accepted?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications):

THE CANADA COUNCIL

1. Since Mr. Allan Gotlieb's appointment as Chairman on February 1, 1989, he has received honoraria for 44 days of work.

2. The Council's regulations provide for payment of a full day's honorarium to Council Chairmen, Vice-Chairmen, and all Members for qualified activities. This regulation takes account of the fact that incumbents must travel to attend Council meetings and that no honorarium is paid for travel time, telephone consultations, reading, briefing and preparation time for meetings.

All Members, including the Chairman, submit expense forms and abide by the Council's regulations, which are based on those of Treasury Board, governing payment of expenses.

All 44 days for which Mr. Gotlieb was paid an honorarium involved his participation at meetings such as those of the Canada Council, Parliamentary Committees, the Advisory Council of the Order of Canada (of which he is member by virtue of his chairmanship of the Canada Council), official Council prize presentations, etc. Moreover, Mr. Gotlieb has devoted a great many additional hours of work to the Council for which honoraria were not paid.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Pierre Cadieux (for the Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C–78, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, who is attending the vitally important London conference on the ozone layer, a conference at which I hope that he and other ministers from around the world will have a great deal of success in terms of strengthening the protocol, it gives me a great deal of satisfaction to begin second reading debate on one of the most important pieces of legislation to be placed before this House in many years.

The Canadian Environment Assessment Act will be the cornerstone of this government's commitment to environmentally sensible decision making. This bill will change the decisions we make in the future by changing the way we make decisions. It will enable this government to give real effect to the concept of environmentally sustainable economic development.

We will ensure, by implementing the requirements of this bill, that the environment and the economy become unified as an integral concept that will allow us to leave for our grandchildren an environment capable of satisfying their needs.

During the last two decades, Canadians have become increasingly aware of the importance of maintaining both a strong economy and a healthy natural environment. To help satisfy these goals, Canadian governments, both federal and provincial, established environmental assessment processes. Environmental assessment is a systematic method of identifying potential environmental consequences and their impact on people. By identifying adverse environment effects before they occur, plans can be altered so that unwanted environmental impacts are minimized or, ideally, eliminated. In some cases proposals must be abandoned if negative impacts are unacceptable and cannot be mitigated.

• (1130)

Environmental assessment as a planning tool has been practised by the Government of Canada since 1974. It has been used to predict the potential environmental effects of proposals requiring a federal government decision. The process was updated in 1977 and reinforced in 1984 when the environmental assessment and review process guidelines were issued by Order in Council.

These processes were never adequately implemented because a series of governments failed to provide a substantive legislative footing for them. The process was never more than a cabinet directive until 1984, not adequately resourced by government and not sincerely implemented by departments. After 1984 it was still very difficult, even for a government dedicated to environmental values to implement fully the poorly conceived and ambiguously worded guideline order, frantically introduced at that time in a futile attempt to bolster the sagging fortunes of the government of the moment.

In 1987 the government asked the Minister of the Environment to consult the public on the need for and manner of reforming the environmental assessment and review process. The minister issued a Green Paper to serve as a basis for that consultation.

Six months of public meetings were held in major centres across Canada, followed by a national consultative workshop in March, 1988. Broad consultations were held with a wide spectrum of Canadians including governments, the private sector, native peoples, environmental and other special interest groups, the legal profession, and environmental assessment professionals.

Participants in the consultations called for an accountable and administratively simple process based in law that is effective, efficient, fair, and open.

This government has responded clearly and strongly to the needs of the country and of the Canadian people. As a reflection of the consultative process and its promise during the last election campaign and subsequent Speech from the Throne, we are proud to introduce a substantive, important package of reforms to Canada's environmental assessment system which will, as the Minister of the Environment stated last week in launching the initiative, make this the most comprehensive and effective environmental assessment process in the world.

The key element in these reforms is the bill we are discussing today—the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act; for the first time, a comprehensive, legislative commitment to good decision making. While the focus of our debate will be on the legislation this House is being asked to consider, I wish to point out to members of this House that the government is going even further to ensure that this package fills the needs of today's Canadians. We are not stopping with the introduction of Bill C–78.

Beginning immediately we are requiring that environmental factors be integrated into all government policy decisions. This is an unprecedented step. I cannot overstate its importance to government decision making. Government policies are often the determining factor regarding what economic development projects are conceived and implemented across Canada. If the policies are not environmentally sensitive, it is much more difficult to ensure that the resulting projects will be, even with tough assessment legislation such as we are introducing.

Henceforth, all decisions of cabinet will require the potential environmental effects to be assessed and considered. To help build public confidence that this is being done consistently and well, the responsible minister will be required to make a clear statement about the environmental effects of the policy initiative at the time it is announced. Also, to help ensure consistency and to enable the public to see the rules under which government is functioning in this regard, the Minister of the Environment has been asked to develop a set of clear guidelines for use by all departments, and the Privy Council Office has been asked to amend cabinet procedural manuals accordingly.

Further opportunity for public scrutiny can be reinforced by the House of Commons Standing Committee on the Environment which can request any minister to appear before it to explain the environmental implications of any new policy or any new program. The government will encourage and welcome this form of public accountability.

This is a great step forward. It is one which is virtually unprecedented in the world, let alone in Canada. We do not hide the fact that neither we nor any other country in the world have all the techniques fully developed for environment–economy integration in policies, but we are going to do it as well as it can be done and improve our techniques along the way. Leadership almost always requires breaking new ground. We have the strength and the resolve to do that.

A second vitally important element of our reform package is a consistent and predictable program of financial assistance to participants in public reviews that may be required in the process set out in Bill C–78 and, for that matter, any public reviews that may be undertaken under the present regime until Bill C–78 is able to be implemented. This is going to be introduced, immediately after funds are approved by Treasury Board. We have learned over the years that whenever financial assistance is provided to review participants the issues are debated much more cogently and the results achieved are much more satisfying to all concerned.

The funding is usually directed as a matter of priority to communities and individuals most directly affected by a proposed development. This enables them to study and understand the issues thoroughly and to prepare well considered submissions to review panels. It minimizes antagonistic rhetoric and promotes useful dialogue.

For each public review the funds for this purpose will be allocated according to strict criteria and on the basis of applications submitted. Allocation decisions will be taken by special committees established for each review made up of credible individuals largely from outside government to help ensure independence. This again is almost unprecedented. The Netherlands, according to my understanding, is the only other country we know of that has a public review participant funding program. This will help build partnerships among decision makers and those affected by the decisions.

A third point I wish to raise at this time before returning to the details of the proposed legislation is a major international initiative the government intends to launch formally very soon to help increase awareness and action on environmental issues world-wide.

Canada, along with many other industrialized nations, provides a variety of forms of support, financial and otherwise, to goods and services exported abroad. To be consistent with its domestic policies, Canada must also consider the environmental effects of its actions affecting other countries. It does this formally with respect to bilateral aid initiatives and will continue to do so. To do this unilaterally with respect to export support actions would be highly unlikely to result in environmentally better decisions in the receiving country. What is more likely to happen is that Canadian exporters may not be able to compete effectively. In fact, it is probable that Canadian exporters may not even get invited to the bidding table if they are alone in carrying environmental demands.

An alternative course of action, and one which we believe is more likely to obtain environmental benefits while not cutting off international markets for Canadian goods, is the development of an international accord in this area with the other countries in competition for the same export markets.

This has the potential to be of great international significance from an environmental point of view. While we cannot set a firm deadline for this process since that would pre-empt the negotiations, the government has requested that the Minister of the Environment and the Secretary of State for External Affairs report back to cabinet in three years on the progress made by that time. The expectation is that there would be substantial progress.

Mr. Speaker, as you can see, even though we know that Bill C-78 is a strong and comprehensive piece of environmental assessment legislation, we are not letting the matter rest there. The additional initiatives that I have outlined this morning demonstrate clearly to the Canadian people that this government is strongly and irrevocably committed to making all its decisions based on sound environmental criteria and to ensuring that the affected public has a fair opportunity and the means to influence those decisions.

I wish now to return to the bill itself. I would like to characterize the key features of the bill in order to give members an appreciation of the impressive advances it is introducing to the field of environmental assessment. Other government speakers during the course of this debate will certainly go into more detail about the process described in the bill. My intent is to touch on the highlights.

The stated purpose of Bill C-78 is to ensure that project decisions by responsible authorities are based on an informed appreciation of the likely environmental effects, to encourage project decisions by responsible authorities that promote and maintain a healthy environment and a healthy economy, to ensure that projects in Canada do not cause serious environmental effects outside the jurisdictions in which they are located.

This is in the context, as the bill itself states, of providing an "effective means of integrating environmental factors into planning and decision-making processes in a manner that ensures that present needs are met without compromising the ability to meet the needs of future generations". This is the concept of sustainable development that is the driving force behind this bill.

The bill requires government departments and agencies to give projects for which they have decision-making authority the degree of assessment warranted in the circumstances. If projects are determined to have no environmental relevance they will be excluded. It is important to note, however, that the bill is designed to have very broad application. Any exclusions require specific decisions based upon narrow criteria to avoid abuse.

All projects characterized in a list, which will be issued by regulation, as having potentially major environmental significance will be required to undergo mandatory environmental study and reporting. The Minister of the Environment will then make a decision as to whether a formal public review will be needed. All such mandatory environmental studies will entail consultation with the public and a review by government agencies with appropriate environmental expertise. It is anticipated that this provision will have a profound effect on the way developers interact with those potentially affected by development. They will have to start talking at an early stage to those affected in an effort to find mutually acceptable solutions to identified problems. Developers will want to do all they can to submit a mandatory environmental assessment report to the minister which identifies solutions, not just problems. Dialogue of this kind will improve, trust will build, and better solutions will emerge.

For other projects, that is those not on the list, an environmental screening will be required which may lead to a public review or to the project proceeding with appropriate mitigation measures.

If a public review is needed, the environment minister may choose between a mediation and a public review by a panel. In certain cases both may be needed.

A new agency will be created to administer the legislation and to advise the Minister of the Environment in the implementation of the process. The agency will be called the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency and will be fully independent of Environment Canada, unlike the present federal Environmental Assessment Review Office.

A new provision is being introduced in this bill designed to safeguard the environment of one jurisdiction from actions initiated in another. With this provision, if the trans-border environmental issue is serious and the parties have been unable to come to an accommodation regarding the way it should be assessed, the federal environment minister may require a federal review and may issue a stop work order on the project in question until the minister is satisfied that the trans-border environmental effects are acceptable. This is a potentially very important provision, not only because of the trans-border safeguard but also because it contains authority to protect certain lands of interest to Indian people which are not necessarily on designated reserves.

I would now like to summarize the important advances being made in Bill C-78 for the whole field of environmental assessment in Canada.

First, the Minister of the Environment makes the key process decisions regarding the need for a public review. This decision is currently taken by the minister responsible for the project and sometimes leads to accusations of the fox guarding the chicken coop. Bill C-78 places this responsibility where it belongs.

Second, all major projects must undergo mandatory assessment which must include public consultation. This is currently discretionary.

Third, assessments of major projects must include a consideration of cumulative environmental effects of the project relative to other projects affecting the same environment, alternative ways of carrying out the project, the reasons for proposing the project, and effects of the project on the sustainability for future generations of any renewable resources that might be affected by the project.

Each of these requirements on its own would be seen as very significant improvements. Taken together, the advance in my opinion is truly impressive.

Furthermore, public registries will be created and maintained for all assessed projects and will normally be located in the vicinity of the project so that those who might be affected by it can understand it and influence it.

Moreover, public review panels will be fully independent of government. Currently, although most members of panels are from outside government, the chairman or chairperson is a public servant. In the future the chair will also be from outside government.

Public review panels will have subpoena powers, enforceable by the Federal Court. Currently it is necessary to rely on the goodwill of participants, and from time to time not all useful information is made available.

A new provision will be introduced to enable appointment of a mediator to resolve environmental disputes when the conditions are right and when there is a willingness on the part of all key parties to find a solution.

All major projects will require the preparation of follow up and monitoring plans. Until now this has been one of the most significant deficiencies of environmental assessment processes everywhere in the world. To our knowledge, there are only two other countries in the world which allow for follow up. According to my understanding they are the Netherlands and the United States of America.

Opportunity will be provided to assess the effects of projects on lands off reserves in which Indian people hold interest. This has never been recognized before.

The ability to ensure protection of the environmental interests of one jurisdiction against the actions of another is a very important advance which will do a lot to ensure harmony among jurisdictions, if only to keep the federal government out of their hair. I am sure that many provincial jurisdictions will applaud this innovation.

Many opportunities are provided in the bill for co-operation with provinces through joint public reviews and administrative agreements to avoid duplication and confusion.

Special procedures will be adopted for Crown corporations to ensure coverage by the law. Currently, coverage is voluntary. A new agency, separate from Environment Canada, will be created to administer this process.

I scarcely need to repeat that this is a very impressive package of reforms. No one who has followed environmental assessment evolution over the past 15 years can deny the advances which are represented in Bill C-78. These improvements constitute in many ways a bold move for any government since some of the requirements set out in the bill and in other parts of the reforms will require the introduction of as yet unproven methodologies.

But we believe that the issue—survival of the planet—is so important that we must push our knowledge and our capacities to the very limit. This bill will do exactly that. The government is proud to have introduced it. For that reason I am confident that members opposite will also be eager to join with us in the legislative committee in ensuring that the bill gets the speedy passage which it deserves.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House also welcome the arrival of this bill. We think it is at last a step in the right direction, and a highly desirable one considering some recent events which reflected very badly on the Minister of the Environment, who preceded by two the present one, of this government, and also on other ministers of the Crown who were involved in two major projects which have had an important role in ensuring that the government finally would introduce this legislation in the House.

I am referring specifically to the Rafferty-Alameda project, Mr. Speaker, with which you are certainly fairly acquainted and to the one with which you are most acquainted because it is in your region, namely, the Oldman River dam.

Unfortunately, the parliamentary secretary decided to give a political and partisan connotation to his intervention and referred to political convenience. We will analyse that after we put this bill into the proper framework.

This bill does not come forward in a vacuum. It is the result of several steps which date back several years, in particular to an important step which was taken in 1983 which provided the groundwork and the foundation for two important decisions by the Federal Court. It was the EARP guidelines order which was promulgated in the summer of 1983 and provided the foundations to which I am referring.

• (1150)

It is interesting to note that it was during the election campaign of 1984 that the Progressive Conservative Party promised an environmental assessment process. The promise, however, was readily forgotten. I submit it would still be forgotten in the large bag of unfulfilled promises had it not been for Rafferty-Alameda and the Oldman River dam.

Therefore it is important to put on record in order to substantiate what I just said part of the decision that was made by the Federal Court on April 10, 1989, when it made its decision on a case between the Canadian Wildlife Federation and the Minister of the Environment and the Saskatchewan Water Corporation. The judge on that day concluded that, in his opinion, the federal Minister of the Environment is required before issuing a licence under certain legislation to comply with the guidelines order that govern environmental assessment.

The judge went on to say that by not applying the provisions of the order the minister has failed to comply—imagine a judge indicating that a minister of the Crown has failed to comply—with a statutory duty and that he has exceeded his jurisdiction and therefore the applicants, namely, the Canadian Wildlife Federation, are entitled to their order.

The judge went on to comment further that the EARP guidelines order indicates that certain procedures, namely, the preparation of an environmental assessment and review, must be carried out when dealing with a proposal that may have an environmental effect on an area of federal responsibility. The project being such a proposal, and the minister being a participant in that he issued the licence and by not complying with the order has, in the opinion of the judge, not performed his duty. Therefore the applicants were entitled to the order and costs after taxation. It was Judge Cullen who gave this decision.

The references to the Minister of the Environment are for the one who failed to be re-elected in the 1988 election.

It is also important to refer to another decision by the Federal Court of Canada handed down on January 24 of this year. The applicant in this case was not the Canadian Wildlife Federation, but Friends of the Oldman River Society. The respondents were two federal ministers, that of Transport and Fisheries and Oceans. At the provincial level, it was the minister of Public Works, Supply and Services of Alberta.

On page 19 of the decision the judge concluded that the guidelines order, which is the order that had been promulgated by the preceding government—in other words, the Liberal government—was intended to bind the minister in the performance of his duties and functions. It created a duty which is super-added to the exercise of any other statutory power residing in him.

The judge went on to state that the source of the minister's jurisdiction and responsibility to address environmental questions in areas of federal responsibilities springs not from that statutory law but from the guidelines order itself. The judge concluded that the minister had a positive obligation to comply with it.

It is against this background that today, six years later, we engage in this debate on second reading. When the parliamentary secretary makes reference to political convenience, it might be not only desirable but charitable on his part to look in his own backyard before pointing the finger at others.

In examining the bill, and we will have ample opportunity to do that in committee, we come across certain passages which I would like to highlight so as to express, at least at this point, certain reservations that might then facilitate discussions later which are of certain substances. I would refer you, first, Mr. Speaker, to the preamble where it states: "—the Government of Canada seeks to achieve an appropriate balance between economic development and the preservation and enhancement of environmental quality".

This balance referred to in the preamble is the thinking that prevailed long before the Brundtland report. It is dangerous thinking if the government is, as the Parliamentary Secretary proclaimed a few minutes ago, committed to sustainable development. That commitment—and I wish the parliamentary secretary could find a moment to listen—is in conflict with the preamble in which this balance is described. If you pursue a balance between the economy and the environment, you are not really pursuing sustainable development. You would instead be pursuing a balance between two factors which are seen in the mind of the writers of this preamble as being in conflict with each other, something which they should not be.

I submit to the parliamentary secretary that the preamble ought to reflect the policy of this government, as it should, and rightly so. I am glad in a way that in his speech the parliamentary secretary made reference to sustainable development which is not included in the bill itself as a concept. We cannot find it in the preamble. We cannot find it in clause 4, the clause that relates to purposes.

Instead, we see a regression in thought by way of this reference to a balance between economic development on the one hand and the preservation and enhancement of environmental quality on the other. The two, I submit, are not separate entities. The two are not objectives that have to be held in balance. One is the premise to the other and, therefore, one would want to have an economy that is tailored and flows from the environment, rather than an economy that is in balance with the environment. We will not achieve sustainable development by looking at the two as separate entities, as is spelled out in the first part of the preamble.

I must give credit to the government for the second part of the preamble which is very well put. It is almost word for word taken from the Brundtland report.

The third part of the preamble is as a result of a conceptual flaw, so to speak, which sees the environment as separate from the economy. It reads:

> The Government of Canada is committed to exercising leadership within Canada and internationally in anticipating and preventing the degradation of environmental quality and at the same time ensuring that economic development is compatible with the high value Canadians place on environmental quality;

Not only is this very vague, but it would have read much better if it had read, from the second whereas: "and tailored to environmental requirements". That concept would give future ministers and the courts a clear idea as to what the government intends to achieve with this particular bill.

• (1200)

The concept of a balance in the preamble sets the government off on the wrong foot. It is unfortunate. We will erase it in committee and, I hope in co-operation with other members, we will attempt to rectify this faulty preamble.

In clause 4, there is the very important set of purposes which need to be addressed. First, what is not there is a reference to sustainable development. Again, the parliamentary secretary did make a reference to it in his speech. I am glad he did. I hope that the reference in his speech today will somehow provide enough political motivation for a modification of clause 4 so as to include the concept of sustainable development in the purposes of the act.

Second, the clause dealing with the purposes reads: "to ensure that the environmental effects of projects receive careful consideration". I submit it should read: "to ensure that the environmental effects of projects are fully assessed and understood". That would mean more than just receiving careful consideration. Careful consideration can be given to anything and then just ignored. Having gone through that process and having gone through the motions, consideration has no doubt been given. What really matters here is a full assessment and a full understanding of the project.

The second purpose under paragraph (b) is fine, as well as the third. I would like to congratulate the parliamentary secretary on paragraph (c) because it commits Canada internationally in a manner that, as he mentioned in his speech, may have been done by the Netherlands and another nation but not by the United States of America. This is to the best of my knowledge and I stand to be corrected.

Once this section of that act is promulgated and proclaimed—the portion that commits Canada to assuming a high standard of environmental responsibility with respect to its neighbours—I urge that it is taken up, promoted and advanced at international fora, not only the UN, but also the OECD and at any other opportunity where we would want to have a reciprocity to our own domestic legislation, particularly on the part of the United States, Mexico, or any other major industrial nation of the world.

I would add that there is one purpose that the Government of Canada subscribed to only a few weeks ago at the Bergen conference. That is the "precautionary principle" agreed upon by 34 ministers of the environment. This is missing. I urge the parliamentary secretary to use his access to the corridors of power to see if the precautionary principle could be included as a purpose of this bill. It is missing but would make considerable difference if adopted as a purpose and guideline in the legislation.

In this context, it is also interesting to note that just a year ago the member of parliament for Ottawa South, despite valiant efforts, failed to have an amendment adopted in committee and also in the House to introduce the concept of sustainable development when the bill creating the Department of Industry, Science and Technology was voted upon. We were stunned, even at that time, to see the Minister of the Environment of the day voting against such a sensible amendment, consistent with the policies the government of Canada has embraced at home and abroad.

At that time the member for Ottawa South was told in debate that only Environment Canada should promote sustainable development and he should not mess around with other departments. This was, and still is, an admission of failure on the part of the government to understand what it has committed itself to when speaking for and embracing the concept and objectives that come with sustainable development.

The political will of the government came to a serious test with Rafferty–Alameda and the Oldman River dam. I would like to indicate that the courts also told the government that the guidelines are mandatory and binding, not discretionary, and therefore could not be ignored.

At the present time, construction of the Oldman River dam in Alberta is continuing. As far as I can ascertain, $1 million a month is paid to the Government of Saskatchewan to stop work on the dam. The work there has not been stopped despite a court order. This raises some serious doubts about the political will behind the proposition we are debating here today.

I would also like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary that, when it comes to projects to be assessed and the specifics of the excluded projects, one could drive a truck through Clause 6(a) as it is written. We will certainly attempt in committee to tighten up that clause.

I also refer to the weakness of how the projects to be assessed in Section 5(d) is presently written. That clause would be much stronger if it did not have the qualification at the beginning referring to subparagraph 55(1)(g). That very much weakens the impact of that particular assessment.

• (1210)

It is worth noting that, if one looks at the legislation that would trigger the powers to be used under this bill, one has to look at the regulations. I am sure this will be dealt with very effectively by my colleague, the hon. member for Skeena. He was very articulate and effective in commenting on this when the legislation was introduced and I am grateful to him for having done so.

In subparagraph 55(1)(g), in particular, we find that the key legislation that would trigger this particular bill is not indicated yet. That tells me that there is indecision or division in cabinet. In other words, one would want to ensure that the key legislation which a government has at its disposal would come under the umbrella of this procedure called the environmental assessment process.

We find that Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. is not yet, or may never be, brought under this legislation. Canada Post Corporation, the Cape Breton Development Corporation, and the Export Development Corporation are not part of the legislation covered by this bill. The Federal Business Development Bank, the Harbourfront Corporation, and the National Capital Commission would seem to be exempt, as well as the Northern Canada Power Commission. The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority seems to have escaped the net, as well as VIA Rail, Canadian National Railways, the Montreal Ports Corporation and Petro–Canada. These would be the major actors, so to speak, which ought to be brought under the umbrella of this legislation if it is really to have muscle and if it is really to implement the political thrust, determination, and commitment the parliamentary secretary referred to earlier.

Let me also make a reference to paragraph 55(1)(j), and repeat that Schedule 3 corporations, from which I read a moment ago, do not come under this bill. None of the 75 clauses that comprise this bill apply to them.

We will not know when the regulations will be written, what they will specify, and if they will ever be proclaimed as they affect these corporations. In other words, we are being asked to take a leap of faith that something of this kind will come into effect. Through the parliamentary secretary, we urge the minister when he appears before committee to indicate to us exactly what plans he has to include the statutes of other agencies under Schedule 3.

It is my understanding that the National Energy Board Act, the Fisheries Act, the Atomic Energy Control Act, the International River Improvements Act, the Canada Oil and Gas Act, the National Parks Act, the Railway Act and the Railway Reallocation and Crossing Act are being considered. We invite the parliamentary secretary to ensure that when we go to committee we have a clear understanding as to which acts will be brought under this umbrella because they are not specified.

Another question must be raised under this section. Will there be a public role? The bill does not give us such assurance and we would like that added when we enter into the study of the bill in committee.

I also refer very briefly to section 55(2) because there is a problem of clarification, to say the least. The question is related to the exclusion of physical activities, whereby the minister, when making regulations, may exclude certain physical activities. What will be considered inappropriate when it comes to physical activities? That is the question. The interpretation that could be given to this section is so broad that it definitely raises some doubts as to the loopholes that this particular section offers.

Also, I find it important to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the significance of the decision of the minister concerning section 20. Some words have been added to section 20(a)(i) which did not exist in the unnumbered version of the bill. These words have weakened the original version by adding "that may not be mitigable". This particular addition weakens the impact of the section as a whole, and also because the term "mitigable" can be interpreted in so many different ways.

We would also like to have in this bill powers given to the minister of the day to recommend, at least to cabinet, refusal. The powers to refuse, at an early stage, are some that deserve thoughtful attention because it would be easier to achieve or to stop a project than when it is too far downstream, so to speak, and too late in the day.

Therefore, under this act, the minister ought to be given such authority, possibly under section 20, so that the project can be sent back to the drawing board. I would submit for the parliamentary secretary's consideration some wording to the effect that the minister of the day would have the authority to recommend refusal to cabinet. Then this act would have the additional strength that is required to command the attention of the totality of government as to the importance of implementing the environmental assessment process, as already done by virtue of the two decisions by Judge Cullen which seem to me to be, not only extremely lucid but also very clear on the role that the Minister of the Environment of the day ought to play when it comes to the environmental assessment process.

• (1220)

Also, I would like to refer the parliamentary secretary to section 25, the mediation and panel reviews. This is written in a manner that appears to include anybody who is not directly affected. Therefore, we wonder, if section 25(a)(i) where the words "directly affected" are spelled out were to become law, would it mean that at the point when mediation has taken place, is taking place or will take place as in the case of Rafferty-Alameda, the Canadian Wildlife Federation would have had standing in the court?

Would it have been excluded? Would Friends of the Oldman River have been excluded at the mediation or panel review phase if this clause had been proclaimed?

One must say that one would not want to prejudge mediation. The wording of section 25(a)(i) would seem to indicate that the minister could prejudge the outcome of a mediation specifically without giving it a chance to take place. I suppose that here experience is being drawn from labour negotiations, and I would say to the parliamentary secretary that a judgment a priori sometimes has not led to the best possible results.

The bill is one that gives us something to discuss and to move ahead with because definitely it is badly needed. As such, we welcome the fact that it has finally seen the light of day six years after the promise was made by the Progressive Conservative Party during the 1984 election.

The credibility of the bill would be considerably enhanced if the concept of sustainable development would find its way into the preamble and the purposes. It would be considerably more enhanced if this reference to a balance between the economy and the environment were to be replaced with appropriate wording. We could work this out in committee, particularly, if the concept would emerge at last in the thinking of this government that there cannot be a healthy and long sustainable economy unless it is based on a well-protected and well-managed environment. There is no dichotomy between the two and there is no conflict between the two in the long term. I presume the test of the political will of this government will come in committee when we discuss the bill clause by clause.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C–78 today.

Unfortunately, it is a bill that fails on many tests. I will spend the next few minutes going through the history of how we got to where we are and why there will have to be substantive changes to the legislation if it is to be accepted widely by the Canadian public, as I think the government would like.

The federal environmental assessment and review process known as EARP was developed in response to a December, 1973 cabinet decision to provide for evaluation of environmentally significant undertakings subject to federal control. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that was during a period of a minority government. In fact, we got some fairly good legislation under way during that period of time.

The main outlines of the process were approved by cabinet in April of 1974. Minor revisions were made by a cabinet directive in 1977. In its initial form EARP was entirely administrative. A 1979 amendment to the Government Organization Act gave EARP a statutory basis for the first time by authorizing the Minister of the Environment to establish and operate an environmental assessment process.

Since 1979 the federal Minister of the Environment's duties have included the following responsibility:

> —to ensure that new federal projects, programs and activities are assessed early in the planning process for potential adverse effects on the quality of the natural environment and that a further review is carried out of those projects, programs and activities that are found to have probably significant adverse effects—

In 1983, following 10 years of experience with EARP, the federal cabinet ordered a formal evaluation of the program. This resulted in the proclamation of an Order in Council on June 22, 1984 under the Government Organization Act. This Order in Council replaced the previous cabinet directives that established the program.

It is that 1984 cabinet guidelines order upon which the Federal Court ruling was made on the Rafferty–Alameda and the unanimous ruling of the Federal Court of Appeal on the Oldman.

The EARP guidelines order is applicable to any proposal that,

> (a) is to be undertaken by an initiating department;
>
> (b) that may have an environmental effect on an area of federal responsibility;
>
> (c) for which the government of Canada has a financial commitment; or
> (d) that is located on lands, including the offshore, that are administered by the Government of Canada.

It is on that 1984 cabinet guidelines order that many Canadians are waiting to obtain assurance from the Government of Canada prior to Parliament rising that the guidelines order will not be tampered with.

Since Bill C–78 is now moving through the House, I would hope that today the parliamentary secretary or someone in the cabinet would give an assurance that the guidelines order will not be tampered with as we await the passage and proclamation of C–78, a piece of legislation which I said requires some rather drastic modifications. Let me spend a few moments on that.

My friend who just spoke pointed out that the Conservative Party did promise during the 1984 election that some kind of EARP legislation would be brought forward soon. That was six years ago.

Let me run quickly over the last couple of years. After a year of hearings in 1987—and I think this is germane because of these so–called Green Plan hearings that are going on—how may Canadians have an expectation that that process is actually going to produce some kind of useful and functioning environmental legislation and fiscal framework?

This gives some idea of how this particular government will always find ways to stall. After that year of hearings on EARP in 1987, on October 20, 1988 the federal government announced that it would strengthen the federal environmental assessment and review process known as EARP which was a mere Order in Council.

The press release of October 20, 1988 quoted the then environment minister, Tom McMillan, as saying: "We are prepared to subject every federal undertaking and every undertaking on federal lands to a thorough environmental impact study."

This followed the year-long Canada-wide consultations between the federal government, industry, the academic community, local government, environment, and other citizen interest groups of which I have spoken.

This was reiterated because a year later, workable EARP legislation had not been put in place and both Tom McMillan and his successor Lucien Bouchard got blasted by Canadians over the decision to proceed with the Rafferty-Alameda project without the promised EARP review.

In fact on June 20, 1989 Lucien Bouchard told the House of Commons he would be introducing "very, very important" legislation by fall. That was the fall of last year. However, as of the beginning of this year we still only had the guidelines in place, although they had been somewhat strengthened by the Federal Court ruling on Rafferty-Alameda which made it clear that the guidelines were both mandatory and binding.

A further step was taken on March 13, 1990 with the unanimous ruling of the Federal Court of Canada on appeal that both Transport Canada and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans were negligent in not conducting an environmental assessment of the Oldman dam. Although, as we heard earlier today, construction is not halted on either of those projects even though on the Rafferty-Alameda the federal government is paying some $1 million a month for Saskatchewan not to proceed and yet both the Rafferty-Alameda and the Oldman dams are proceeding supposedly only in relation to safety related matters. But, of course, the definition of "safety related" appears to coincide rather nicely with the concept of completion construction. Completion construction seems to all be safety related, no matter what area it comes in.

We need assurance that the guidelines order will not be gutted or changed prior to the passage of Bill C-78. I do not hear anyone from the government side contradicting that, so I assume that will be the government position until Bill C-78 is passed, unless we hear otherwise during this debate.

Let me quote what some people had to say on June 19 when this bill was unveiled by the new Minister of the Environment, the President of the Treasury Board. "It is fill-in-the blanks legislation". That was stated by Elizabeth May, a lawyer and spokesperson for the Sierra Club. "Too much has been left out", that was stated by Stephen Hazel, a lawyer and spokesperson for the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee. He also said: "As it stands, it is narrower than what we have now".

Ray Robinson, the head of FEARO, the existing body that administers environmental assessment stated: "It is fair comment to say the scope of the act cannot be determined by what you have in front of you". There you have probably one of the people in Canada most expert in understanding the history of environmental assessment, of the panels that are presently under way and the ones that have already held hearings across the country.

Of course, this is the fifteenth draft. This legislation was brought forward and gutted, brought forward and gutted, brought forward and gutted, until finally it was the kind of amorphous Swiss cheese that Conservatives like the most where there appears to be something there, there appears to be some functional piece of legislation that could actually go out and evaluate nuclear projects, tanker spills, water quality or mega projects.

In fact, as one finds as one reads through the legislation, which is something that all Canadians should do, every time you find something that is constructive that appears to give some legitimate access to a process, almost the very next section will provide for exclusionary powers or lists of excluded projects or ministerial discretionary powers to provide other lists or special discretionary powers for the federal government to opt out of a process and give it over to a provincial or territorial process. So there is this constant building up of expectation in the legislation and then much like a gigantic legislative game of snakes and ladders, just as you finish climbing that ladder in hopes of finding a good, fair and just democratic process, there is this giant tube that you must slide down again that gives all the powers back to the political level on behalf, generally, of industry and government.

Under the existing rules, the 1984 guidelines order, which are supported by federal court rulings, it is required that all projects that might affect an area of federal jurisdiction must be reviewed. So we can see that we have in fact gone backward. We have not gone forward and come up with a more comprehensive piece of legislation. In fact, the draftpersons were forced, I suspect at the point of the cabinet's gun, to go back and particularly gut the statutory provisions in relation to Section 55 and the other provisions that I will come to in a moment.

Under Bill C–78, projects the federal government funds or is directly involved in may be reviewed as well as projects involving federal lands. There is a world of difference between what the Federal Court has said about the guidelines order and what is actually in the legislation.

The list of federal statutes to which the legislation applies is not included. A moment ago, my friend from Davenport pointed out that in the documents that were released on June 19, some are suggested. The Minister of the Environment said with certainty that the Fisheries Act will ultimately come under the ambit of Bill C–78.

In one of the cabinet documents that I have here it states that as of December, six months ago, $14 million has been spent doing the various consultations, studies and so on related to this legislation. After spending $14 million the bureaucrats were unable to come up with a list of federal legislation that has some environmental bearing on some federal jurisdictions or some bearing in relation to permits that could or might or should be involved in projects across the country.

They suggest the National Energy Board Act, the Railway Act, the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act, the Atomic Energy Control Act, the International River Improvements Act, the Fisheries Act, the National Parks Act and the Canada Oil and Gas Act are the only ones that the cabinet seems to think might perhaps be included. I suggest that the list that should be included in this as a statutory reference is several dozen in length and I would hope that the government will come forward with a full, complete and unadulterated list of those that will be included before we in fact even have to deal with this legislation in committee.

The other deep concern that Canadians have about this legislation is that in terms of government policy, perhaps the most important tenet to be carefully scrutinized under environmental assessment legislation has been purposely excluded. There will be assessments done but they will be done in house and the only thing the public will ever see is the conclusion, perhaps a one or two line conclusion of the assessment when it comes out. That is not a very stirring approach.

Even the approach taken by the Government of New Zealand is better where there is an environmental commissioner or, as I have suggested, a national environmental auditor who in fact would be arm's length from government, much like Canada's Auditor General, and be able to go in and audit the environmental assessments that are done.

Let us take an example. The Minister of Energy right now wants to provide billions of dollars to certain fossil fuel projects, after slashing available funding—supposedly the level playing field concept—to renewable energy and to conservation. That funding was slashed to only $200 million over five years, but it is proposed to give billions of dollars to fossil projects that have never undergone the most basic environmental assessment.

What has happened is we have what are known as the scrambled industrial omelettes. On those that Mr. McMillan and Mr. Bouchard struggled with, the Rafferty–Alameda and the Oldman, they did not do what they were supposed to do in the first place and even when ordered by the courts did not do what they were supposed to do, and we are being told now, as members of the House and as Canadians, to trust the government, that the government in fact will do proper auditing and accounting of the environmental impacts of government policy.

That particular area of this legislation is so poorly and so weakly drafted that I do not think any Canadian will find it acceptable until either we have a publicly accessible in house evaluation, or at least an arm's length evaluation through an environmental commission or commissioner or environmental auditor. Nothing less will do.

As my friend was talking about earlier, this legislation does not even give credence or pay respect to the Brundtland commission, the definition of sustainable development. The former Secretary General, Jim McNeill, just works across the street from here and could have easily been given a phone call and asked where, in the opening sections of this legislation, should we put purpose sections, interpretive sections and clauses to make sure that the true impact and meaning of sustainable development is included in this legislation.

Another point made by my friend from Davenport was in relation to the precautionary principle, another absolute fundamental that is now recognized world-wide by leading environment ministers and environment organizations and generally thinking people that there must be a precautionary principle included in legislation such as this that gives immediate power to the minister, at the very least, to put an absolute halt to projects, including those that have already begun.

This legislation excludes the scrambled industrial omelettes like the Rafferty-Alameda and the Oldman. It excludes all of that policy that is now coming to the fore, the fossil projects and all of these other projects that are absolutely kooky when taken in the context of sustainable development. We have all of that stuff grandfathered out of the legislation. And now, in terms of having truly visionary and forward looking environmental legislation that would deal with policy so that in fact it is sound, that is excluded. It gives the opportunity for exclusionary lists of projects.

I can already hear the chatter in the various industrial clubs across the country: "Oh, hey, that EARP legislation is before the House. Did you manage to get yourself on the 55(2) list?" That will be famous. Everybody in the boardrooms will be asking their lawyers: "Did you get us on the 55(2)?", the mandatory exclusionary list. That will be oil projects, nuclear projects and all of these other ones. It will be the 55(2) club and you will not even need Roch LaSalle to get on that one. You will not have to pay five grand to go to dinner. You will just have to make your contribution to the local PC association, five, ten, fifteen grand, and you become a 55(2). You never even need to worry. Daishowa will want a 55(2) today for Alberta, AL-PAC, every one in the fossil section, uranium mining companies, pulp companies that create 40 per cent of the main pollution in Canada; they are all going to want to be 55(2)s.

What I think happened is on the fourteenth or fifteenth draft, this came back to cabinet because Mr. McMillan had been summarily booted out of cabinet with such a proposal and booted out of the House of Commons too. Then Mr. Bouchard had been booted out of cabinet. The day he resigned, very few environmentalists had even heard of this yet. His resignation, because it took place while the market was open, cost over $1 billion. That is how much Canadian currency dropped. That is how much the Bank of Canada had to intervene because Mr. Bouchard chose to resign while the markets were open. More than Environment Canada's entire annual budget was flushed down the drain by a minister who claimed to care about the country, to care about Quebec and to care about the environment. He lost on all three in my view by doing what he did when he did.

Let us go back to this legislation that is full of these incredible holes. Bill C-78 has been described by many as legislation in retreat. I quote what The Financial Post had to say: "Ray Robinson, FEARO's executive chairman said under the new act the environmental assessment process is an advisory process. The government does not have to accept the recommendations of the review panels. Government hopes to pass the act by the fall of 1991".

So now we are getting signals about what the government is really all about. This process began in 1983. By 1984, the government promised to implement legislation. After three years in office it then had a year of hearings and then made promises for another two years. Finally it brought the legislation forward. The legislation has been gunny-bagged. Even the gunny-bagged legislation is not supposed to come in for another year and a half. One can only wonder how anything could possibly move that slowly, other than a slowly melting glacier.

The Ottawa Sun, on the day that the legislation was released, quoted my friend from Davenport as saying that the bill was a step in the right direction. A very timid step, Mr. Speaker. The Montreal Gazette went on to quote him as saying: "It deserves intensive and speedy study so we can make it the law of the land".

It certainly is going to require intensive work because the legislation is almost totally inadequate. It allows the government to get out of having due process on almost any project, no matter what the magnitude.

This legislation, as drafted, would not in its present draft apply to the largest industrial project ever proposed in the history of North America, James Bay II. This legislation would not apply. It is discretionary. It will not apply to the largest industrial project which will flood 5,000 square kilometres of the province of Quebec, cause enormous methane releases to the atmosphere, wipe out the only freshwater seal population in the world, harm the whale populations in James Bay, divert many river systems so that they will flow in the opposite direction to which they already do and require the clear-cutting and the dumping of thousands of square miles of forests. This has been demonstrated in the March edition of Science Magazine as being the largest, single, carbon sink on planet earth, the northern boreal forest. It used to be thought that it was the oceans. Now, because of advances in science, we know it is the forests.

Amory Lovins appeared before the Standing Committee of Parliament, and the Canadian media did not even cover the fact that he had done a study for the northern tier states which showed that simply by revamping with new motors and with state of the art conservation and by redoing the buildings, the industry, and the homes only on the Island of Montreal, more power could be saved than would be generated by James Bay II. In fact, there would be an incremental bit of power that could be sold to the northern tier states at lower than the cost of any James Bay I power now available after almost a decade and a half of amortization.

The country is being led by a good chunk of the business community that can only be described from an environmental perspective as the lunatic fringe. In terms of their accounting procedures they completely exclude outside impacts on the environment. Pulp companies generate 40 per cent of the marine pollution in Canada. They consider the rivers, lakes, and oceans of Canada to be an open sewer for their free, uncosted benefit.

The atmosphere of planet earth is being considered as a gigantic garbage dump for those who want to dump acid precipitation. For those who want to move toxic and hazardous materials that they cannot take to a land fill, they put them in the atmosphere and they blow into another country, out on to the ocean, or out into the countryside.

Carbon dioxide in the atmosphere, CFCs. The Minister of the Environment is in London and we have already had leaks. We understand the Canadian position is substantially weaker than the all-party unanimous agreement on CFC and halon reduction. All three parties in this House are onside. The Minister of the Environment runs off to London to take a weaker position.

Who is his friend? Is it Dupont? Is it Allied Chemicals? Why would a minister not take the position which could only be described as a lowest common denominator? That report certainly did not represent the highest rate of reduction of CFCs and halons that we could possibly attain, but that is not being pursued.

This legislation has to be seen through the transparencies, the way it has been so carefully crafted that wherever there is strength there is a complete return of that power to the political level and wherever a particular project is seen as politically sensitive like the Rafferty-Alameda, even though it is wrong, even though it is contrary to the law, even though it is in violation of a court order, it still proceeds. Wink, wink, nudge, nudge; you know what I mean. The Prime Minister calls Grant: "Hi Grant, I won't get in your way. Don't worry. I know you are getting politically upset. Go with the project". "Oh, Mr. Getty, the Oldman. Go ahead. Just build it on safety. That is right. Construct it all the way, but before you drop the last grain of sand, stop, and we will study it and see whether or not it is good, bad or indifferent".

That is madness. We know too much about the environment now. We could well all perish within our own lifetimes because of some of the things that we are doing to the globe's environment.

Forty thousand children under the age of 12 will die today from starvation and preventable disease. Is anybody doing anything about it?

The cartoon that was run recently in The Regina Leader Post told it all: a picture of a small, shrivelled up, starving child reading about Earth Day and saying: "Oh, well, if they care as much about us as they do about the environment, will we all survive?"

With 40,000 a day starving to death, I somehow doubt these geniuses on the government side who say: "No, we cannot really go through all these screening processes. We really need to be able to keep our radioactive material, 100 million metric tons at Elliot Lake, unsafely. We really need to be able to dump all of our pulp mill pollution into the rivers".

To have not come forward at this point in the world's history, let alone Canada's history, without adequate environmental assessment legislation is a serious underestimation of what Canadians expect now of government.

The head of FEARO, Mr. Robinson went on in an interview with The Toronto Star, June 19, 1990, to talk about government departments being unable to agree whether reviews would affect their areas. He said: "Of course everyone is turf protecting". That is used as the reason the necessary pieces of legislation to trigger the activity of this legislation have been purposefully left out. The Minister of the Environment states that they will be included over time to make the legislation dynamic. Perhaps the minister should get out a thesaurus and find out what is the opposite of dynamic, because that is what this legislation is without that being included.

• (1250)

I think I have covered Rafferty and Oldman enough, but northerners are concerned about things like the impact of organochlorines, furans, and dioxin in the Peace and Athabasca rivers flowing up and particularly affecting their aquatic life, fish, birds, and so on.

What does this legislation do? Would there be an EARP triggered under this in relation to either a singular pulp mill in the province of Alberta or any other province or territory? The answer is no.

Would there be one triggered because of the cumulative impact of 5, 10, 15, or 20 pulp mills on the same systems? The answer is no.

Would there be one triggered because of the clear cutting of a third of the province of Alberta, 220,000 square kilometres, out from under the noses of Albertans? Would there be anything under this because of its potential impact on reducing the carbon fixing efficiency and capacity of a country like Canada? No.

What is this legislation, really? This is a public relations exercise, and it should not be seen as anything other than that.

What about west coast tanker traffic? We have had the Nestucca spill. We have had the Exxon Valdez. We have had spills in downtown Vancouver, right in the harbour. Would there be a possibility of triggering an EARP under this one? No.

Could you even go to the courts to get a judicial review? Mr. Speaker, you only have to look in this legislation to find that only where there is extremely narrow grounds can you ever do what public interest groups have been doing in relation to the Oldman or the Rafferty–Alameda. We know why and I will come to that in a moment when I quote from the Bill Oppen memo, the famous Alberta memo about what the provinces wanted gutted from any legislation that would come before and through this House.

Would this do anything about global warming? No. Ozone depletion? No. Acid rain? No. Great Lakes water quality? No. Arctic pollution? No. Poisoning of the belugas in the St. Lawrence? No. The loss of an acre of forests in Canada every five seconds? No.

What about the 20 per cent? In 1988 we had an international conference in Toronto and a scientific agreement suggesting that Canada and other countries would have a 20 per cent reduction from 1988 levels by the year 2005 in releases of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere. That went too far. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did not like that. When the former Minister of the Environment went to Bergen, he said that Canada would at least freeze carbon dioxide levels to the year 2000. I understand he was promptly phoned by the PMO and told he had to eat those words.

It was not too long before he resigned. That again was the lowest common denominator. If we are not even going to freeze carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gas emissions into the atmosphere, life, at least human life, will not survive.

No one likes to talk in terms of that kind of fundamentally accepted scientific reality. People should read the IPCC, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change. One thousand of the best known climatological scientists in the world have agreed that we need 60 per cent to 80 per cent reduction in all of the greenhouse gas families in order to stabilize the atmosphere.

What is this government doing? The greenhouse gas emissions, including CFCs, have gone up every single day, every single hour, every single month, every single year it has been in office, and it claims to be environmentally committed.

Let us take a look at what was said in this famous Alberta memo from Mr. Oppen, because he got just about everything that he wanted. This was a meeting in Vancouver that involved a number of provincial bureaucrats acting, I take it, on behalf of their ministers. Here are the sort of things they wanted.

> There must be the capability through administrative agreements for Canada to defer to a provincial process.

That is very nice; just simply turn it over to the provinces.

> The act, or the regulations, must contain an exclusion or grandfather clause for projects that are either under way or that have previously been reviewed.

They wanted that and they got that.

> Reasonable time limits are to be imposed on reviews—This would only be appropriate in the case where a project is 100 per cent federal—The provinces need to be a party to the development of the exclusion and compulsory review lists.

That is part six and the soon to become famous 55(2) list. There will be lines with all of the Tory bag persons, I guess to put it properly, across the country saying: "Hey, how much to be a 55(2)?" They will be lining up to get on that exclusionary list. Certainly the provinces were very much in favour of that.

> With respect to the interim measures, the provinces will demand that action be taken to amend the existing EARP Guidelines Order in order to remove environmental policy from the courts.

Well the provinces certainly got that.

> Alberta has also asked that the issue of delegation of administration of the habitat and pollution provision of the Fisheries Act be considered within the context of these consultations as a related issue.

Some of the provinces even want federal legislation entirely turned over to them. It is not enough that they have a gutted and gutless act. They actually want the entire statutory and constitutional powers of Canada turned over to them.

What is missing? Let me quickly list it for you, Mr. Speaker. I know we are starting to run out of time, which is too bad because one could go on at some length about legislation that is so interesting, particularly because of its failures. However let me just make a few suggestions. These were suggestions made by Bill Andrews, Executive Director of the West Coast Environmental Law Association, regarding an earlier draft that came out, but they certainly still apply to this one.

I recommend that following points which are omitted from or mentioned but not supported in the subject document.

First, that the forthcoming legislation include a mechanism for environmental assessment of existing projects, policies, and programs. That is not there.

Second, the criteria for environmental assessment policies and programs be set by regulation with public input. There does not seem to be anything that would allow for that.

Third, that the Minister of the Environment be authorized to issue an environmental permit without which an activity subject to the environmental assessment process would not be able to proceed.

Fourth, that it be mandatory that a monitoring plan be included in an initial environmental evaluation or an environmental assessment report.

Fifth, that there be a provision for auditing of the monitoring that is conducted according to the environmental assessments.

Sixth, that there be a parliamentary commissioner on the environment to monitor the implementation of the environmental assessment process.

Seventh, that the legislation require that Crown corporations meet the environmental assessment standards applicable to other federal operations and that these corporations not have a special privilege to opt for a provincial environmental assessment process.

Eighth, that the primary decision on whether to send an activity to public review be taken by the Environmental Assessment Agency with an appeal to the Minister of the Environment.

Ninth, that there be a statutory provision for public input on draft agreements with provinces and other jurisdictions regarding environmental assessment procedures and standards prior to the finalization of these agreements.

Tenth, that the authority of a panel to impose costs against a proponent include expenses incurred by public participants in additional to those funded by the Environmental Assessment Agency.

Eleventh, that environmental assessments be imposed on federal spending on support for exports.

Twelfth, that the decision of the initiating department regarding whether or not to conduct an initial environmental evaluation be subject to an appeal first to the Environmental Assessment Agency and then to the Minister of the Environment.

These all seem like 12 very logical recommendations that will have to be included in Bill C–78.

So one can see, Mr. Speaker, even in the few brief moments that I have had here this morning—and I know I have kept you spellbound—there is an awful lot of hard work to be done simply to drag Bill C–78 up out of the gutter where it got trampled by cabinet.

There was probably a fairly nice strategy and piece of legislation developed by Mr. Robinson and others who worked on this and spent $14 million studying how to create a stand alone environmental assessment process that would work.

Unfortunately cabinet came along, as I said, and said: "Let's get those statutes out of there". It jerked the Fisheries Act and everything else out and then said: "Well, the provinces don't ever want an Oldman or Rafferty–Alameda decision, so let's jerk that judicial access out of there. Now we have got to have an exclusionary list. There is no better way to get pulp companies and others on side than by developing this exclusionary list. It might cost you a few bucks to get on that list, but let's keep that trap door open". We have to close those trap doors.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[Translation]

TRIBUTE TO PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Jean–Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress the steadfast loyalty of the Hon. Brian Mulroney to Quebec. In the history of Quebec, he is the only prime minister of Canada who has defended Quebec's constitutional interests with such energy and tenacity.

Meech is dead. We must look not to the past but to the future. We still have a lot to do.

An incredible consensus has developed among Quebec's political leaders and the people of Quebec. We must show our solidarity and work together to protect and promote Quebec's interests and the future of Canada.

Yesterday, Quebec celebrated its national holiday with dignity. Untold crowds of happy and proud Quebecers showed a solidarity never seen before. They expressed their pride in being Quebecers and they did so loud and clear. Mr. Speaker, there were more people on Île Sainte–Hélène than on Prince Edward Island, more people on Sherbrooke street in Montreal than the entire population of Newfoundland.

Jean Chrétien is hardly the man to ensure that Quebec's status is properly understood and that Québec is recognized as a distinct society.

TRIBUTE TO JEAN CHRÉTIEN

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Saturday night at the Saddledome in Calgary, some 5,000 solid Liberals elected the Hon. Jean Chrétien as Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, on the first ballot.

Not long ago—in 1986—the Prime Minister of Canada said in this House the following about Jean Chrétien, and I quote: "He loves Quebec, believes sincerely in Canada and has his own special way of expressing his feelings".

To people like me who believe in this beautiful country, this Canada of ours, he is a ray of hope. Thank you, Jean Chrétien, and congratulations!

TRANSPORT SAFETY

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last a report was released about safety on the B.C. ferries. B.C. ferries carry more than 19 million passengers each year.

The report was prepared by a committee appointed both by the union and the corporation. The report unanimously condemned the Coast Guard for its complete failure to maintain safety practices on B.C. ferries.

The report pointed to the carrying of dangerous cargoes outside the rules, overcrowding of B.C. ferries, the resulting lack of safety equipment and the failure to have adequate training programs.

It is the job of Transport Canada and the Coast Guard to ensure the protection of passengers and crews on B.C. ferries. The reaction of the Coast Guard, through a Mr. Peter Booker, was first to say he had not read the report; second to say that 90 per cent of it was wrong; and third, to criticize the president of the B.C. Ferry Marine Workers for his comments.

Accordingly, I call on the government to take this report seriously and to act to protect the people of British Columbia.

FARM SAFETY WEEK CAMPAIGN

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron—Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to draw special attention to the Canadian Safety Council's eighteenth annual Farm Safety Week campaign which will take place from July 25 to July 31, 1990.

The Hon. Don Mazankowski is pleased to endorse the campaign which this year highlights the theme of farm machinery, safe operation, transport and maintenance and stresses safe working habits on the farm.

Every year when man and machine interact in the farm workplace, there are fatalities and serious injuries which could be avoided, particularly those tractor-involved mishaps which account for about 70 per cent of all fatalities and injuries.

We commend the Canada Safety Council in its efforts to minimize serious accidents and to bring safety information to the attention of farming communities and agriculture-related businesses.

In invite members of the House to join with me in saluting farmers across the country for their hard work and vital contribution to Canada's well being.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this government decided to blame Premier Wells for its failure on the Meech Lake Accord rather than accept responsibility. The facts are that this government ignored, between 1987 and now, each and every recommendation to improve and correct the accord itself. As a result of such indifference the aboriginal people are left out of Canada's constitution. Imagine! This is not all. Millions of other Canadians are also left out.

Why blame Premier Wells? Because the Prime Minister desperately needs a scapegoat. Who is to be blamed when last Friday Senator Murray did not return the Premier's call? Why did the government reverse its position on the firmness of the deadline?

What this government hates to admit is the fact that the Meech Lake Accord died in the Manitoba legislature, where a courageous man, Elijah Harper, said no on behalf of the first people of Canada and on behalf of all those who believe that the first people must be in Canada's constitution.

SKILLS AWARENESS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, to compete effectively in the global market-place, Canada requires a highly skilled, flexible and educated workforce.

To meet this demand there is a fundamental need to address the growing shortage of skilled workers. In my riding of Sarnia—Lambton, the Lambton Industrial Training Committee has taken up this challenge. Entitled "Skills OK", the committee has recently launched a well organized and thought provoking awareness campaign, including this very attractive T-shirt, that talks about about "Skills OK", promotes skilled occupations as desirable career goals for our youth, and the member for Kent could probably take advantage of this. "Skills OK" seeks to demonstrate that skilled trades should not be occupations entered into by default of other perceived better careers. Rather, these are more than simply jobs. They are important and worthy careers which, in themselves, are integral to the future economic growth and competitiveness of this country.

I salute the activities of the Lambton Industrial Training Committee and urge others to emulate their efforts.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, we saw recently what international pressure could do in a country like El Salvador, when President Cristiani rescinded his decision to privatize the university there.

What we would like to see beginning now is that same kind of international pressure with respect to the parliamentary elections which will be held in El Salvador in 1991. What I would like to do today, as a result of meetings that I have had with the MNR here in Canada and the trade union movement from El Salvador, is urge the government to devote as much resources as needed to ensure that the election in El Salvador is every bit as free and fair as the election that was held in Nicaragua.

I realize that the government in El Salvador is not as friendly to the notion of a free and fair election but, nevertheless, the international community and in this case Canada must show some leadership to begin providing the resources now to do the important pre-election work, as well as the election work, to ensure a free and fair election in El Salvador.

LIBERAL LEADERSHIP

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, Liberals from all across Canada made a clear choice, electing the Hon. Jean Chrétien as Leader of the Liberal Party.

His first ballot victory is an indication from the party of the support for the vision he has for Canada. His experience as a parliamentarian, his patriotism as a Canadian and his strength as a leader are all welcomed by Canadians. Under the direction of the Hon. Jean Chrétien, the Liberal Party will gain the strength, unity and vision to bring the Canadian family together.

We, as Liberals, are an open party representing Canadians from all walks of life. We encourage open dialogue and we debate one another with vigour, but our goal is always for a strong and united Canada that will stand together for our children and future generations. I believe that is the goal that the Hon. Jean Chrétien, the new Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, can now help us realize.

NEWFOUNDLAND

CROATIAN ELECTION

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of the House three members of the cabinet of the Republic of Croatia. The new cabinet was sworn in on May 30, 1990, the result of the first free election in post-war history. On that occasion there were six members of Parliament, from all sides of the House, who went to Croatia to observe the elections.

In the gallery today is Mr. Manolic, who is a member of the Presidency; Dr. M. Babic, who is Vice-President; and Mr. G. Susak, who is Minister of Immigration.

On behalf of the House, Mr. Speaker, we welcome them to Canada and wish the Republic of Croatia all the best.

BILL C-21

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21 is a bill designed to do many things, not the least of which is to provide for an opportunity for mothers and fathers to be with their newborn infants for a period of up to 30 weeks.

Why is the Senate not passing this bill? Does the Senate have a problem with this legislation? Are members of the the Senate not sensitive to this problem because they are not capable of becoming new parents? Do they not believe in the importance of the family and essentially the importance of the opportunity for a child to develop a close relationship with its parents in the first few months of its life?

I assume the answer is no, to all of the above. I assume that the Senate is saying no to all new parents in Canada. Prospective parents in Canada deplore this insensitive non-action and I personally find the Senate's non-action despicable.

LIBERAL LEADERSHIP

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, last weekend in Calgary, Liberals from right across this great land had their leadership convention and chose the Hon. Jean Chrétien as their new leader.

Here is what one well-known Canadian said about Jean Chrétien, "—a great Quebecer and a great Canadian, a brave and dedicated member, the extremely likeable man who made an unforgettable impression on all Canadians, a witty and compassionate person. He loves Quebec and believes deeply in Canada and has a unique and thoughtful way of expressing that".

Some hon. members: Who said that?

Mr. Boudria: All right, it was the member for Charlevoix, the right hon. Prime Minister who said that.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, as it happened, the day after Meech failed, the people of Quebec took to the streets to celebrate their national holiday.

Yesterday's incredible demonstration where they marched towards their destiny and their future, with or without Canadian partners, was also a message from Quebecers to their political leaders.

They thanked the Prime Minister of Canada for doing his utmost, right to the end, to defend the aspirations of Quebec with honour and dignity.

To Jean Chrétien and his mentor, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, and his acolytes Carstairs and Wells, Quebec gave the following warning: It will remember for a long time, indeed forever, that they were the ones who really buried the Meech Lake Accord.

[English]

And as the new leader of the Liberal Party rightly said, "We have a lot of work to do".

KOREAN WAR

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, what was once known as the forgotten war was nationally remembered on Sunday when hundreds of Canadians gathered at the National War Memorial and at cenotaphs across Canada to mark the fortieth anniversary of the outbreak of the Korean war. The veterans of the Korean war, just like those who served in the First and Second World Wars, were certainly being remembered in practical terms by this government.

Let us recall the good news announced just this month by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, an agreement for 200 long-term hospital beds in British Columbia, services under the Veterans Independence Program for one year for spouses of deceased veterans, increased income protection for spouses of veterans in long-term care institutions, the payment of interest for the first time on trust funds administered by Veterans Affairs, special trusts for needy veterans, payments of attendants' allowances for one year to spouses of certain veterans and, finally, the raising of the ceiling for funeral assistance.

The Canadian men and women who served in Korea deserve programs and benefits which are second to none in the world and this government is delivering.

CANADA DAY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, next Sunday, we celebrate our 123rd anniversary as a country. Let us take the time to appreciate what we have been, what we are, what we can become.

[English]

There are many older countries that are just starting to appreciate some of the fundamental rights and freedoms that we have now. For example, with the crumbling of the wall between the two Germanys, East Germany taking its first real step toward democracy. The release of Nelson Mandela is a significant gesture toward human rights and racial equality.

Canada is indeed at a critical time in its history, but let us celebrate what we share as a people: our people, our rich resources, our fundamental rights and freedoms, our diverse cultures, our reputation for tolerance not only at home but abroad, and our ability to improve what we have built together thus far. Let us celebrate what we are and what we can be.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the efforts of a group of citizens in my riding of Cariboo–Chilcotin. These ordinary citizens from Quesnel, B.C., have launched a group called MEND—the Movement to End National Disunity—in an attempt to promote friendship between all Canadians.

The group has already organized a public conference call between elementary schools from each of our provinces and territories involving over 3,000 students. Petitions have been collected. Letters of support have been written by schools and church and business groups to their Quebec counterparts, offering hands of friendship.

These people themselves cannot solve the problem of national unity, but their love of their country and for all of their fellow Canadians serves to remind us that it is ordinary Canadians who built this country and it is ordinary Canadians who remain its greatest asset.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I thank my colleagues for their applause but I direct their attention to the statement made by the Deputy Whip confirming the results of the leadership convention last week and the kind words spoken by the Prime Minister about our new leader some years ago.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In his speech to the nation on television last Saturday regarding the failure of the Constitutional Accord of 1987, the Prime Minister said: "It is a time to mend divisions, and heal wounds, and reach out to fellow Canadians." Those are the words of the Prime Minister on national television last Saturday.

However, this morning the Liberal House leader was informed that the government did not intend to call the Hibernia legislation for report stage and third and final reading today, or at any time this week, even though the House is going to adjourn this Friday until September.

How does it fit in with the Prime Minister's desire to heal wounds, mend divisions, and reach out to Canadians by stalling on an important economic project with major industrial benefits for Newfoundland, Quebec, and all of Canada?

Will the government call this Hibernia legislation for third and final reading today? If it does so, I assure the government that it will have the co-operation of the Official Opposition in passing this legislation immediately in the interests of Newfoundland, Quebec, and all of Canada. Will the government undertake this act of nation-building today?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this is the last week prior to the summer adjournment and there is an understandable desire by members on all sides of the House to leave and go back to their constituencies as soon as possible. I naturally consulted my colleagues as to what their needs were in terms of priorities for the summer agenda.

• (1420)

The Minister of Energy informed me that, in fact, the discussions and negotiations with regard to Hibernia were in no way conditional upon this legislation going through all three final stages.

The EARP legislation which we started today is very important. The amendments to the Parliament of Canada Act are very important. If we can get those two, we can do what Opposition members, our members, and members of the New Democratic Party would like, namely, to adjourn for the summer.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the government that as far as the Official Opposition is concerned, we are quite ready to stay here and pass this legislation because we think it is important as an act of nation building for Newfoundland, Quebec, and all of Canada. We regret that according to the Minister of Energy it is not one of the priorities of the government.

NATIVES

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, last week, in an attempt to save the 1987 Accord, the Prime Minister sent Senator Murray to meet aboriginal leaders in Manitoba with a six-point program to respond to their concerns.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to continue the healing process by reaching out to aboriginals and implementing those points in the program for which constitutional negotiations and amendments are not necessary.

Would he agree this is important in order to end dissension, heal wounds and reach out to this very important group of Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition knows perfectly well that, before and during the negotiations on the Meech Lake Accord, there were many meetings with the aboriginal peoples on a bilateral basis between the Government of Canada and their representatives, and I want to give the House and the country the assurance that there will be many more. We have a number of bilateral problems to resolve, and we will do everything in our power to see to it that a settlement is reached that is fair and equitable to the aboriginal peoples.

It is truly unfortunate that the constitutional process provided by the Meech Lake Accord for aboriginal peoples no longer stands, as a result of the decision by one of the provinces last week not to proceed with a vote on the Meech Lake Accord. However, we will nevertheless meet, on a regular and satisfying basis, with aboriginal leaders in order to promote greater social justice for this constituency.

[English]

The Leader of the Opposition began by referring to some kind words that I apparently had for Mr. Chrétien some years ago. He need not have looked back that far. On Sunday, I wrote the following to Mr. Chrétien:

> I wish to offer my sincere congratulations to the Honourable Jean Chrétien, on his election as Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada.
> I offer Mr. Chrétien my full co-operation in the important duties he assumes today in Canada's democratic life.
> Mila joins me in wishing happiness and good health to Mr. and Mrs. Chrétien and their family.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the words in the Prime Minister's statement are obviously most welcome.

If the Prime Minister will not allow the House to reach a final decision—if not today, then before the end of the week—on the Hibernia legislation and, specifically, if he will not undertake to put into effect those items in the six-point program he offered the native leaders in Manitoba that do not require constitutional amendment, then how can Canadians take the Prime Minister seriously when he says he wants to mend wounds, heal divisions, and reach out to Canadians? Does the Prime Minister's attitude not mean that many Canadians are right when they say that the Prime Minister has lost the moral authority to govern and should act accordingly?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that some people, including my hon. friend, have made such elegant comments as those he has just repeated.

It will be for the people of Canada—

[Translation]

—for the people of Quebec and of Canada to judge at an appropriate time—

[English]

—to decide at an appropriate time who stood for Quebec's interests and who stood for the interests of a united Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: Let's have an election.

Mr. Mulroney: The hon. member from Toronto says: "Let's have an election". The last time he said that was in August of 1988 and look what happened.

The problem with the point of view that my hon. friend puts forward is that in Newfoundland the vote is not allowed in some areas.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: I just want to say to the Leader of the Opposition that he will hear no criticism from me. All he has to do is hear the comments made by the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard and members of his own caucus in regard to an important position that was not taken in the last week. Right or wrong, Canadians know where I stood. I was not hiding under a pool table in somebody's rec room.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister says it is up to the people of Canada to decide, and we agree. The quicker he calls the election, the better.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, on June 7 in the House of Commons, the Minister for International Trade, the hon. member for St. John's West, said the following with respect to the Hibernia bill in urging members to pass it quickly.

He said:

> If Parliament does not enact this legislation before we rise, during the month of June, then of course we will not be back until September and there would be real doubt as to whether or not a year would be lost with reference to the Hibernia project and the project, itself, could be in some jeopardy as a result.

My question for the Prime Minister is straightforward. The Hibernia project legislation is listed on the Government Orders and we are prepared to deal with it at third reading. Why is the government refusing to introduce that bill to the Parliament of Canada today, June 26?

• (1430)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I recall to his memory the statement I made at the time Bill C–44 was before a legislative committee of this House. I was asked very specifically at that time by the hon. member for Edmonton East—and I believe I have his riding designation correct—whether or not the government needed Bill C–44, the enabling legislation on Hibernia, to complete the Hibernia negotiations as well as to "flow money relative to the agreements".

I said at that time, well before last weekend, that the direct answer was that the legislation was not needed.

I also said at that time, and I have the transcript of the committee hearings here, that obviously there was a preferred route, but that I had a number of issues to deal with regarding Hibernia relating to industrial benefits, the lender risk sharing, or the LRS as it is now being referred to, environmental hearings, the completion of the agreements between the consortia and the two governments and that the legislation was the last piece of work needed for the finalization of Hibernia.

I say to the hon. member that the mandate is quite clear. We are going ahead with meetings on Hibernia. We are going ahead with the issues that are still outstanding. Obviously, our negotiations right from the beginning have been to maximize benefits.

I also remind the hon. member that it was because of the Atlantic Accord which this government signed, and which the Premier of Newfoundland as a lawyer proposed, that the offshore does not belong to the provinces. It is that issue which makes Hibernia possible in the first place.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, we in this party are not going to get into a petty dispute.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: I want to remind the Prime Minister, who I know is listening to the catcalls, that this is a megaproject for Canada. The lion's share of the benefits of this project are outside Newfoundland. The major single player is the Province of Quebec, and I do not dispute that or oppose it. This is a time of healing. But you cannot heal a nation by a divisive action like this.

Will the government reconsider this motion to withdraw Hibernia, pass the bill and begin the process of healing a nation?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the Hibernia legislation and in particular the industrial benefits that flow from it, I remind the hon. member that when the statement of principles was signed in July of 1988 there was a benefit for Newfoundland to be negotiated, and there were benefits which were to flow to other parts of Canada, not only to Quebec but generally to the eastern Canadian yards. The hon. member would know that. At that time there were 500,000 hours identified in the SOP as "best efforts".

I say two things to the hon. member. First, in our negotiations to the present time we have restored the hours for Newfoundland. Second, we have dramatically increased the hours for other parts of Canada. That is a lot more helpful than any premier saying that this is worth about two fish plants.

FEDERAL—PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

It is reported that the immigration agreement between the federal government and Quebec may be signed in a few days. Can the Prime Minister tell us what is in this agreement and the other agreements that the Government of Quebec would like to negotiate directly with Ottawa?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the agreement in question between the Canadian government and the Government of Quebec follows the process developed nineteen years ago, I think, since Cullen–Couture and even before that, of agreements between the Canadian government and the governments of Quebec and other provinces, six other provinces, in the field of immigration.

So today, we will maintain this tradition of bilateral negotiations which in the past twenty years or so, as I was saying, has resulted in a series of agreements with six or seven provinces involving issues of immigration and integrating immigrants into a new environment and so on.

It is in that context that we have been negotiating with the Government of Quebec for a long time now.

[English]

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of the bilateral negotiations that the Prime Minister is referring to, on June 18 the federal government made an offer to the aboriginal people which included six various points. By offering that, the Prime Minister was indeed acknowledging there are legitimate grievances on behalf of aboriginal people.

Having accepted that there are legitimate grievances, will the Prime Minister begin immediately to address outstanding treaty rights and tell us what his agenda is for talks with aboriginal people?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend should know what our agenda is for aboriginal peoples. This is the government that has signed the largest land claim settlements with natives in the Northwest Territories and Yukon, the largest and most generous in history.

We also increased expenditures in favour of aboriginal peoples up to in excess of, I believe, $4 billion per year. This is an increase of $200 million from last year to this.

I have indicated on a number of occasions that had it not been for the absence of Quebec from the constitutional table in 1985, I believe we would have obtained that constitutional amendment so vital for justice for aboriginal peoples. This is why I think we were all so saddened when the Meech Lake Accord failed to pass because it held out such extraordinary hope and promise for the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, certainly the first step for the Prime Minister and his government to take to show good faith with aboriginal peoples would be to restore the funding that was cut in the last budget.

I have another question for the Prime Minister. After the negotiations on June 9 I think all the First Ministers coming out said: "We do not want to do this process again. It is not a process that we feel is a constructive one". Events since have shown that it was a process which in the end failed.

Does the Prime Minister not see that one of the ways for further constitutional development to take place in a positive atmosphere would be to establish immediately a standing committee on the Constitution in the House of Commons? Is the Prime Minister prepared to take this positive step?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to look at any constructive proposal that my hon. friend has in regard to ways in which we might advance the causes to which she refers.

I think it is difficult to improve upon a constitutional document signed by the Prime Minister and the 10 First Ministers of Canada whereby the First Ministers undertake to bring this matter for resolution by June 23.

In spite of a formal signature of a premier on this document, it was not honoured. This is deeply regrettable and says a great deal about the challenges that Canada has encountered in the past.

• (1440)

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. When the Prime Minister and the federal negotiators met with the First Nations in Manitoba he offered a six-point proposal, two of which were non-constitutional items.

One was the definition of treaty rights which the aboriginal people have advanced for years. The second had to do with the establishment of a royal commission on native affairs.

Has the Prime Minister withdrawn these two items?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Ask Clyde Wells.

Ms. Blondin: Don't you like aboriginal people? What's wrong with you?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has raised a very serious matter. The question she kind of suggested from her seat was: "Don't you like aboriginal peoples?" The answer is very much. Ask Clyde Wells because a lot of this was unsuccessful because of the fact that it did not pass.

Mr. Allmand: That is absolutely stupid.

Mr. Masse: That's the truth. You stabbed Canada in the back.

Mr. Allmand: Roll the dice again.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind hon. members that the hon. member for Western Arctic has put a question. The right hon. Prime Minister is rising to respond. The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I point out to my hon. friend that the—

Mrs. Finestone: Why don't you send Lowell Murray to answer?

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the issue raised by my hon. friend is very important for the aboriginal peoples, which is why the offer was made.

It stated, in summary, that my government is ready to act expeditiously in relation to and provide financial resources for each of the following, as soon as the Meech Lake Accord is ratified. We then listed the six points.

As I indicated at the time in response to questions in the House of Commons, I believe that the 80,000 Métis Federation of Manitoba viewed this package as the most generous and comprehensive in favour of aboriginal rights ever put forward by a Government of Canada. It was therefore with deep regret that the Meech Lake Accord was not passed in order to give rise to the execution of each one of these.

I know my hon. friend raises two other points that were not touched by constitutional questions that are susceptible of being looked at bilaterally. I will take notice of her suggestion and will be happy to review it with officials and report back to her.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

Aboriginal people in Canada are anticipating a severe backlash from this government because of their principled stand to protect and advance their rights.

Since the Prime Minister has an obligation to deal with all Canadians and, in particular, a fiduciary responsibility for aboriginal peoples, will he assure Canadians that no retaliatory measures will be taken against the First Nations? Canada wants to know.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend is raising the rhetoric on this—

Ms. Blondin: Concern, not rhetoric.

Mr. Mulroney: I think she will acknowledge that given the record of this government we do not have any lessons to take from the Liberal Party about protecting the rights of aboriginals.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: On the eighteenth of this month, the president of the Métis Federation—

Ms. Blondin: Give me a break!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Maybe my hon. friend thinks that 80,000 Métis in Manitoba do not count, but I am concerned about all aboriginals, justice for all aboriginal peoples, including the Métis in Manitoba.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As my friend, the leader of the NDP raised moments ago—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchi: —recent media reports suggest—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchi: The animals are restless today, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I would say to the hon. member for York West that on some days you have to be very careful in your preamble.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, it did not take too long after our convention to have these guys shaking in their boots.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchi: Unlike the Prime Minister, we rolled lucky sevens this weekend, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchi: Recent media reports have suggested that the Prime Minister has discussed with the premier of Quebec the possible transfer of authority and money to the province of Quebec for immigration settlement services which represent approximately 30 per cent of the immigration budget.

Would the Prime Minister confirm for the House just what exactly is on the table and whether this arrangement in substance is the same as that provided by the immigration reference in the failed constitutional amendment?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the only reason people on this side are shaking is from laughter at the new partnership between the hon. member and the NDP.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. McDougall: The discussions on the immigration agreement began some three years ago. I am not in a position to provide details to the House at this time. It is in keeping with the traditional agreement that we had with Quebec in the Cullen—Couture agreement. We are negotiating with other provinces on immigration agreements. That option is open to other provinces as well. I would be very happy to give the details to the House as soon as they are complete.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. I think the minister touched upon this matter.

• (1450)

Given that other provinces such as Ontario and B.C. together receive over 70 per cent of all immigrants and refugees to this country, is the Prime Minister ready and willing to allow other provinces to have similar arrangements? Do these arrangements also include other matters such as setting immigration levels and levels for refugee movements?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one of the problems with immigration is that Quebec, with about 25 per cent of the population, receives only about 15 or 16 per cent of the immigrants, and many of the immigrants to Quebec leave for the English-speaking provinces later. The French-English demographic balance of Canada is thus in danger of being undermined. That is why the Minister of Immigration pays particular attention to the problems of Quebec these days. But that in no way prevents us from reaching agreements with other provinces, as we and previous governments have done, because immigration is an important cultural and economic development tool for all of Canada.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister knows, Canada has a very special responsibility for the First Nations, the aboriginal people in this country, that is quite distinct and different from that of the provinces and the territories.

My question to the Prime Minister is very simple. He has dealt with the six points, and he is going to look into them. What I am asking the Prime Minister is whether or not he is prepared to make special efforts in the area of comprehensive and specific claims. That is an area where aboriginal people need justice. They have waited a long time to get it.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first, let me acknowledge the accuracy of the statement of my hon. friend. The Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada has a very special and important relationship and obligation to the native peoples of Canada. It is one that we have sought to honour and will always continue to honour on behalf of all of the people of Canada.

With regard to the point raised in terms of land claim settlements, my recollection is that the last ones were the largest in history. They cover some 575,000 square kilometres, a territory larger than the four Atlantic provinces combined.

We put in $1.3 billion. I believe that at the time the Chiefs indicated that this was the most impressive grant and negotiation ever undertaken in history with the Government of Canada. I am particularly proud of that.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary to the Prime Minister is on the same two points.

I am sure he is aware that despite more than a decade of negotiations the Nishga Tribal Council in British Columbia has been able to make no movement in relation to the federal or the provincial Crown. There are several hundred outstanding specific claims. Some have been awaiting a negotiated settlement for more than a century.

Will the Prime Minister undertake over this summer to set in place a federal process which will get comprehensive and specific claim settlements under way in every province and both the territories?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I find the statement by my hon. friend very confusing. He appears to have said that the federal government has made no progress, I think he said, in regard to comprehensive land claims with the Nishga Tribal Council in British Columbia. I believe that is what he stated. Yet it was negotiations undertaken by this government which led to the framework agreement on the comprehensive land claim with the Nishga Tribal Council in July of 1989.

We have made some very remarkable progress, and we plan to make even more.

I think we can do all of these things and substantially ameliorate the record of the Government of Canada and the people of Canada in the obligation that we all have toward the native peoples of Canada.

CN REAL ESTATE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Once again, management of CN Real Estate in Montreal is trying to run roughshod over the people of Amos with its decision to increase the annual rent for a community parking lot from $1,000 to $22,000. Will the minister inform CN management that this 2,000 per cent increase is excessive and ask them to go back to the drawing board this week and reconsider the town's request for a normal increase in rental costs?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, CN's policy is to calculate rental costs for all its properties, in Amos and elsewhere, on the basis of market value. The company is continuing its discussions with representatives of the town of Amos.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I want to remind him that the Charest committee considered and unanimously rejected every argument for a way of getting more time than the June 23 deadline for the achievement of the constitutional agreement.

If the Prime Minister had some cards up his sleeve, and if there were ways of getting more time for ratification of the agreement, why did the Prime Minister not do the honourable thing and tell his colleagues, the other First Ministers, while he met with them in Ottawa during that week, that there was a method for extending the time for ratification?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. friend has not seen the final document. The first article states:

> The Premiers of New Brunswick, Manitoba and Newfoundland undertake to submit the Constitution Amendment, 1987 for appropriate legislative or public consideration and to use every possible effort to achieve decision prior to June 23, 1990.

It is signed by Clyde Wells, Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): My Speaker, why did the Prime Minister not tell the First Ministers that he had a gimmick in reserve for giving them more time? If more time was available for Manitoba under this novel legal argument, why was there not more time available for the province of Newfoundland and Labrador?

If last Thursday he could find a way of rolling the deadline back from the period of Saskatchewan's ratification to September 23, why could that extension not be sought even today at the Supreme Court of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am a little perplexed by my hon. friend's suggestion that perhaps more time was needed in Newfoundland and Labrador.

In point of fact, if he will consult the transcripts he will see that Premier Peterson of Ontario, Premier Devine of Saskatchewan, Premier McKenna of New Brunswick and I as Prime Minister of Canada went down and spoke to the Newfoundland legislature on the formal promise of the Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador that a vote would take place Thursday night or Friday morning, and it did not take place.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. A few weeks ago, the Minister of Finance stated that high interest rates in this country were partly a result of the constitutional impasse.

I now have the following question for the minister: Could he inform the House whether his government intends to pursue its monetary policy that keeps interest rates and the Canadian dollar at levels that are too high, a situation that is be coming very dangerous for the Canadian economy?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I indicated some two or three weeks ago that there was a risk premium that was built into interest rates because of the uncertainty surrounding the Meech Lake Accord. That was a matter of fact at the time. That uncertainty is still there. There is still a risk premium, I would imagine, in the level of interest rates today.

I have said on a number of occasions that the more important reason for the level of interest rates that we are experiencing today is the level of inflationary pressure in the economy. Until we get that inflationary pressure out, we will have to endure these higher interest rates for a somewhat longer period of time.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's answer and in view of the fact that in the February budget the prediction for an average annual interest rate during 1990 was somewhere around 11 per cent—the fact is interest rates now are nearly 14 per cent—does the Minister of Finance not believe that the time has now come, in view of economic and constitutional reality in Canada, to either bring in a revised budget or to bring in a new budget based on the facts?

• (1500)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question on numerous occasions in the House, a number of times when asked by the hon. member himself.

I indicated that there are offsetting factors here. Our revenues in 1989–90 were higher than expected, so we are going into fiscal year 1990–91 with a higher level of income and a higher level of revenues for the Government of Canada. There is an offset against the higher costs from our higher interest rates.

We are watching this on an ongoing basis. If it is appropriate to have some mid-term correction, we are prepared to take that action.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

On May 29, I appealed to the minister for financial assistance for the B.C. fruit growing industry, which is facing imminent financial collapse because of cheap U.S. imports. The minister advised at that time that pending the release of a report from an inquiry into the B.C. fruit industry he was prepared to make available a portion of the moneys set aside for agricultural assistance.

Now that the commission report has been released, will the minister confirm that he is willing to release these federal funds for the purpose of financial assistance to B.C. fruit growers? Will he sit down with his provincial counterpart and look at an appropriate program of financial support? Will he assure B.C. fruit growers that they will be given the financial security that the industry so desperately needs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the report has been released. We have not had a chance to study it in detail, but my understanding is that it centres around the fact that the industry can be more competitive if it deregulates, decentralizes, and takes on a more market oriented approach and that it is time to engage in some structural changes rather than just simply propping up the industry through ad hoc government intervention.

My understanding is that as a result of the release of the report the provincial officials are going around the agricultural population getting input and feedback on the proposed series of recommendations. At an appropriate time we will be in a position to sit down with our provincial counterparts. As I indicated in my previous answer, we are prepared to sit down with our counterparts in the the provincial government. As soon as that process is completed we will do so. We simply await their call.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, rather than acting on the minister's request the inquiry report has recommended the cutting of support programs for the industry. If the provincial government follows these recommendations the farmers will be left twisting in the wind.

Will the minister assure B.C. fruit growers that even if the Vander Zalm government is willing to abandon them the federal government will step in and provide the financial support that is so critical for the industry to survive?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to criticize the commission's findings after a thorough discussion with the industry and a thorough inquiry into the whole fruit industry. I think it requires a certain amount of time.

I thought the hon. member was suggesting that the federal government co-operate with the provincial government in coming to the aid of the fruit industry. He now suggests that the federal government should go it alone. He cannot really have it both ways.

As I said in my earlier answer, we are prepared to sit down with the province to work out a program that will be helpful and will facilitate the longer term structural and adjustment change that has to take place within that industry. I can assure him of the full-fledged co-operation of the federal government in that regard.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CHANGE OF AFFILIATION OF MEMBER FOR LONGUEUIL

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I entered federal politics for the first time in 1984, and I renewed my commitment in 1988.

I did so, first and foremost, in order to take an active part in implementing one of the most important proposals in Quebec's history. I did so because I was convinced I was taking part in a noble enterprise. I did so because I sincerely felt that it was possible to bring Quebec back into the constitutional family with honour and enthusiasm.

Like many other Quebecers, I was convinced that the Meech–Langevin Accord was an important first step, a step with which I could agree, despite certain concerns. I was convinced it was one step towards a flexible constitutional formula under which Quebec would be able to grow and prosper.

However, as recent events have borne out, this was not to be, despite the fact that we all placed our trust in this process and devoted all our energies and enthusiasm to this cause, with honesty and sincerity.

In this respect, we all know that the Prime Minister has shown extraordinary courage and energy. He has our respect and admiration, that goes without saying.

Only those who, at this critical point in our history, insist on engaging in petty politics refuse to recognize this fact. To those who think that someday they will govern Canada on the basis of an obsolete vision of this country, I say that Quebec's motto is: Je me souviens.

Today, I think it is clear that the process agreed on in 1987 cannot produce satisfactory results either for Quebec or Canada. It is simply impossible, because of the political and constitutional context we have inherited.

We must seek another way.

As a Quebecer, I am convinced this new way must first of all be defined by Quebecers, based on the interests of the people of Quebec.

I think this is the only feasible formula for considering a new form of participation in the Canadian federation. To be viable and satisfactory, however, it must be a different federation. It must be based on the participation of groups reflecting the many realities of Quebec and of Canada's regions.

That is why I feel obliged to resign from the caucus of the Progressive Conservative Party, and from now on, sit as an independent member. As such, I will be in a better position to act in a manner that is consistent with my initial commitment and to defend the interests of Quebecers in Ottawa.

At this point, I wish to thank the Prime Minister and congratulate him on his courage and perseverance. I want to say that I was proud to be a member of his team and to work for this fine and noble cause.

I can also assure him of my support for efforts and initiatives that are a response to the needs and aspirations of Quebec.

To my colleagues I want to say: I appreciated this chance to work with you, and I will continue to do so, if you wish, in order to promote the interests of Quebec in Ottawa.

CHANGE OF AFFILIATION OF MEMBER FOR SHEFFORD

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have had the honour and privilege of representing the people of Shefford in this House for over ten years, and never did I have to qualify or question my loyalty towards Quebec or Canada. Nor did I ever have to question my loyalty towards the Liberal Party of Canada in the past ten years. Yet today, as a Quebecer, I find myself at a crossroads. As a Liberal I also find myself at a crossroads. During all those years since the Quebec referendum I believed it was possible to achieve renewed federalism within the existing institutions.

• (1510)

And during all those years, Mr. Speaker, I believed that the Liberal Party of Canada was the natural bridge between our country's two linguistic communities.

Mr. Speaker, my motivation and my commitment stem from the speech delivered by Pierre Elliott Trudeau on May 15, 1980 at the Paul Sauvé Arena. I felt bound by his solemn commitment towards Quebecers, and I should like to repeat those words which were so important in my career and for the destiny of Quebecers.

On May 15, 1980 Mr. Trudeau said: "We will not stop until it is achieved". He was referring to constitutional renewal. "If it is no, we all said it will be interpreted as a mandate for constitutional change and renewed federalism". He said: "I am not the only one saying this, so do the 74 Liberal members in Ottawa"—including me—"and the premiers of the other nine provinces. We will tell Canadians in the other provinces that we will not accept that the no be interpreted as an indication that everything is going fine and that things can remain as before. We want a change and we are putting our seats on the line to have that change".

Mr. Speaker, not only did I put my seat on the line, I put my youth, my energy and whatever talent God gave me to work towards the renewal of the federation and to achieve this dream which was shared by so many Quebecers.

I was very active in 1981–82 when the Constitution was patriated, believing as I did that it was the first step towards genuine renewed federalism. I soon realized that the work was incomplete because Quebec had been left aside.

In 1985, Mr. Speaker, when Robert Bourassa was elected, a federalist premier, at the same time as the Prime Minister across the aisle had been in office for a few years, the Quebec–Ottawa axis was finally free, finally open. And today, Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge that the Prime Minister is an ally of Quebec.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lapierre: In 1987, not only was the 1981–82 failure admitted but the good faith of all participants gave us the Meech Lake Accord. And I also want to acknowledge the intrinsic merit of our then leader, the Right Hon. John Turner, who was also capable of reaching beyond partisan considerations and appreciating the fact that Quebec was entitled to its place in this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lapierre: Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the champagne we drank that night as Quebecers proud to be Canadians soon turned sour. So much for our illusions.

Since 1987, the five minimum demands of Quebec have proven to be too much. Since 1987, certain ghosts of the past re-appeared on Canada's political scene, associated with those I call "the government in exile" which enjoys much legitimacy in the Senate. Finally, Mr. Speaker, they did manage to derail the process over which all federal politicians in Canada had made a solemn commitment before Quebecers in 1980.

Mr. Speaker, I will indeed go beyond partisan limits—this is new to me, but I will have to get used to it—and tell the Prime Minister that they laid mines all along the road until the final explosion last weekend. I want you to know that Quebecers do not look upon this drama as the failure of one man, but much more as the failure of the system and the triumph of bad faith.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, today I feel sad, humiliated and betrayed.

[English]

I said sad, humiliated and betrayed. For those who thought that Meech was too much, take note that from now on it is not enough.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, beginning today and henceforth I want to support Quebec's endeavour and play a role in the new scenario which will automatically follow the demise of the Meech Lake Accord. With my fellow citizens in Quebec, I want to take part in the definition of a comprehensive collective project.

Mr. Speaker, I do not seek to blow up the barricades, I do not seek to destroy the country, but I want to make sure that, beginning today, together we can design a new political contract in this country.

[English]

We have been had. We need to establish a new level playing field, one on one, not one in eleven. We will have to design a new political contract among ourselves.

[Translation]

Unlike some of my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, I am a Quebecer first and for my children's future in Quebec and in French, Jean-Michel and Marianne, I am compelled, for the sake of freedom of speech, to sit henceforth as independent member for Shefford.

[English]

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there would be unanimous consent of the House to allow me to revert back to tabling of documents.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has asked if we could revert to Tabling of Documents. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

PRIVILEGE

BILL C-44

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I have given notice of a question of privilege earlier today.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member, but I will point out that I waited quite a period of time. I did not know what the hon. member's intention was.

Mr. Tobin: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. I did not see the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I stand on a question of privilege today because I believe my privileges as a Member of Parliament have been affected by an action taken by the Government of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, may I say as a Member of Parliament for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte in the province of Newfoundland, in case there is any doubt, that I am proud to stand here and talk about my privileges as a Canadian because I am a Canadian first.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, on June 7 in the House of Commons there was a debate in which I participated with many members, but in particular with the hon. member for St. John's West, and also the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in which there was a debate on Bill C-44, the Hibernia bill.

Mr. Speaker, I, together with other members were urging members of the New Democratic Party even though they were examining amendments to ensure quick—

An Hon. Member: Order!

Mr. Tobin: Let me explain. I have a right to be heard. You may shut down Hibernia, but I will be heard.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, we were encouraging all members, members of the government, members of the Official Opposition to deal with a particular bill. Mr. Speaker, 19 days later with no explanation, that bill has been pulled from the Order Paper. It is gone and the government has indicated again today that it will not be recalled.

• (1520)

Under Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition, there are established for all members to see the privileges of members of Parliament. Among those privileges are sections having to do with influencing a member unduly, threatening a member, and bribery.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to you—I want to make my case—under Sections 67, 68, 69, 70 and so on, that when the government of Canada, as it has today in Question Period, brazenly and blatantly in response to questions on process—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member could listen, just for a moment, to the difficulty his intervention is putting the Speaker in.

The hon. member is rising on a question of privilege. As hon. members know, a question of privilege is aimed at something that has happened that makes it impossible, or very much more difficult than would be reasonable, for an hon. member to carry on his duties.

The hon. member may or may not have a complaint. There were questions asked in the House earlier today involving that very issue, but surely the hon. member would agree with the Speaker that this is now a question of debate.

Whether the government should or should not have withdrawn something from the Order Paper is something that happens all of the time. It is a matter which is often dealt with in Question Period and it is a matter that often affects negotiations in this place, but it is very, very hard for the Speaker to accept that, under the circumstances, it is a question of privilege.

The hon. member will have to come very quickly to the point. I do warn the hon. member, I do not see a question of privilege at the moment.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear now, as of today, that in this country it is impossible for a member to represent his constituents, represent their views, and represent their interests. If you do not speak right, vote right, if your province or provincial legislature does not behave right, blackmail is—

An Hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Tobin: You are nothing but a trained seal who is a liar and a cheat. Only a coward remains silent in the face of dictatorship—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has expressed a complaint. It is not a question of privilege and I think hon. members will appreciate the circumstances under which the hon. member feels that he did want to raise a matter, but it is a complaint, not a question of privilege.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, apart from the first point which you have now disposed of, I think the hon. member knows full well and I think enough members in this House heard, that he used unparliamentary language. The words "liar" and "cheat" are outside of the purview of the use of parliamentary language and the hon. member has been in this House long enough to know that. While he might want to make certain points, I would ask that he withdraw.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I want to withdraw those words, because even though we have been neutered in this place, I want to stay around to participate in the debate. I am not letting this nonsense that is being practised today by this government go unchallenged, so I withdraw.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. de Cotret that Bill C-78, an Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak to Bill C-78, an Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, at second reading.

[English]

I want to continue with the debate this afternoon on Bill C-78. Opposition critics were very quick to find fault with this legislation when it was tabled in the House of Commons for first reading on June 18, 1990.

The NDP environment critic even had the temerity to suggest that the legislation was as full of holes as Swiss cheese.

Rather than find fault with the hon. member's bad taste, I would prefer to thank him for his analogy. After all, Mr. Speaker, Swiss is a world-class cheese and so too is Bill C-78 a world-class environmental assessment bill.

In my remarks to the House today I would like to focus on the scope of this bill in order to put to rest any concern that this legislation might be a retreat from the current guideline order. Nothing could be further from the truth.

This government is bringing forward legislation designed to bind government decision-making in a way that will ensure that every minister becomes, in addition to his or her regular responsibilities, an environment minister.

In such circumstances, a government that was less than fully committed to the environment might have sought to limit the scope of this legislation so as to leave its decision-making largely unfettered. Such has most assuredly not been the case with Bill C-78. This is a bill that is designed to expand the scope of the current environmental assessment process, not to restrict it.

This government is fully aware of the importance of the environment to Canadians. It is committed to protecting and maintaining environmental quality in all parts of Canada. The Canadian environmental assessment act will apply to virtually every project in which the federal government has an interest or an involvement. It will ensure that the environmental effects of all federal projects are fully understood before final decisions on whether or how to proceed with them are made.

The very broad scope of this legislation makes it abundantly clear that this government is prepared to leave no stone unturned in its efforts to bring a profound environmental ethic to all of its decisions and to all of its actions.

The scope of Bill C-78 is established right at the outset with the definitions of "environment", "environmental effect", and "projects".

Bill C-78 defines the environment as encompassing all of the components of the Earth including land, water and air as well as all layers of the atmosphere, all organic, and inorganic matter and living organisms, and the interacting natural systems that we commonly refer to as the ecosystems.

This definition of environment not only provides the broadest possible scope for environmental assessment, it also recognizes that all natural systems are inter-related, thereby setting the stage for the theme of sustainable development which is evident throughout the legislation.

The second definition of critical importance to the scope of this legislation is environmental effect. Bill C-78 defines environmental effect as any change that a project may cause in the environment, as well as any effect that the environment may cause in a project. But the definition does not stop there. It goes on to make it clear that the consideration of such effects is not restricted to those that may occur in Canada, but it is also to include those that may occur outside Canada.

Even further, environmental effects will not stop with the environment, but are to include the effects of environmental change or damage on related health and socio-economic conditions. That means on people. Again it can be seen that this legislation is intended to have a very wide scope indeed.

The third and most important definition relating to the scope of environmental assessment is that of project. Bill C-78 defines a project as any physical work or physical activity that a proponent proposes to carry out.

• (1530)

This definition includes the construction, operation, modification, decommissioning, and abandonment of physical works such as factories, dams or pulp and paper mills, and the undertaking of physical activities such as low-level military flight training, for example. Clearly, the scope of the legislation is impressive, as should be obvious even to my hon. friends sitting opposite.

While definitions are an important element of any legislation, the real measure of the scope of application of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is to be found in the body of the legislation. Clause 5 of the bill outlines the cases where an environmental assessment of a project will be required. I would like to take a few minutes to describe the types of projects to which this legislation will apply because it is important that the House have a good appreciation of just how comprehensive the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act really is.

The act will apply to any project for which the federal government is a proponent. Such projects would include the fixed link to Prince Edward Island from New Brunswick, the north warning system in the high Arctic, and the possible expansion of Pearson International Airport at Toronto.

The act will apply to any project for which the federal government makes or authorizes payments, provides a guarantee for a loan, or provides any other form of financial assistance other than by means of general taxation measures. Such projects would include major offshore oil and gas developments, projects funded through regional development programs such as the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency or Western Economic Diversification, and foreign projects sponsored and supported by the Canadian International Development Agency.

The act will apply to any project for which the federal government sells, leases, transfers, or otherwise disposes of Crown lands. Such projects would include those that take place in Canada's offshore frontiers, those that take place on territorial lands in the North, and those that take place in national parks and on military reserves.

Finally, the act will apply to the issuance of permits and licences and the granting of approvals under various federal statutes and regulations which have the authority to deal effectively with the environmental effects of projects. These statues and regulations will be listed in a regulation made pursuant to the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. The Minister of the Environment has already indicated that this list will include appropriate provisions for such statutes as the National Energy Board Act, the Railway Act, the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act, the Atomic Energy Control Act, the International River Improvements Act, the Fisheries Act, the National Parks Act, and the Canada Oil and Gas Act.

The Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office is currently undertaking a thorough review of all federal legislation having environmental powers with the intention of proposing an expanded list by the time that the legislative committee begins its clause-by-clause review of this bill. In addition, it is the intent of the government to add to this list on a continuing basis as new legislation is passed and current legislation is amended and updated. It is for that reason that the list will be established by means of a regulation rather than as a schedule to the act.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, it will be the rare project falling within the purview of the federal government that is not subject to a very thorough environmental assessment before the federal government makes its final decisions.

To this point, I have focused my comments on the definitions and the types of projects that will be subject to the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. While these have painted a very impressive picture of the scope of the legislation, I would also like to say a few words about the broad scope of the environmental assessment process itself. I would particularly like to emphasize that it is in this area that very substantial improvements have been made to the current guidelines order that this legislation is intended to replace.

In the current guidelines order, the scope of the environmental assessment process is restricted to the environmental effects of projects, any directly related social effects, and to the concerns of the public. In special cases under the guidelines, where the Minister of the Environment and the minister of the initiating department consider it appropriate, an environmental assessment may also include a consideration of the general socioeconomic effects of and the need for the project.

Let me turn, by comparison, to the scope of the environmental assessment process in the proposed legislation. When I finish describing this new process, I will defy anyone, including my friends opposite, to tell me that Bill C–78 is a retreat from the current situation. Instead, I will challenge my hon. friends on the other side of the House to open their minds, recognize the facts, and admit that this legislation represents a substantial improvement over the current process.

Clause 11 of Bill C–78 describes the factors that must be considered in conducting an environment assessment of a project. These are divided into two groups: those factors that must be considered in any project assessment, and those factors that must be considered in the case of projects that are subject to a mandatory study, a panel review, or a mediation.

The environmental assessment of any project must, at the very least, include a consideration of four critical factors. The first of these factors is the environmental effects of the project. But this factor does not stop there, as it does under the current guidelines order. A consideration of the environmental effects of a project under the new legislation must include a consideration of the effects of any malfunctions or accidents that may occur in connection with the project. It must also include a consideration of any cumulative effects that are likely to result from the project in combination with other projects that are being carried out, or are likely to be carried out in the same vicinity.

This single factor alone represents a substantial improvement and a substantial broadening of the scope of environmental assessment relative to the current situation. For the first time, explicit recognition will be given to the fact that projects are subject to both mechanical failure and human error. Proponents will be required to build such considerations into their project plans in a manner that will anticipate the occurrence of malfunctions and accidents and prevent their effects from being felt in the environment.

Also for the first time, explicit recognition will be given to the fact that projects do not occur in environmental isolation, but can contribute, in a cumulative manner, to an over–all reduction of environmental quality. Proponents will be required to examine the environmental effects of their projects, both on their own merits and in relation to other existing and planned projects in the vicinity. In this manner, it will be possible for the first time to ensure the achievement of effective environmental quality goals and objectives.

The second of the four basic factors is the significance of any environmental effects that are likely to occur as a result of a project. A determination of the degree of significance will allow project proponents and federal authorities to focus their efforts on those effects which pose the greatest danger to the environment and on those measures that can most effectively reduce or eliminate those effects. In this manner, environmental assessment will move from a subjective hit-and-miss art to an objective and cost-effective science.

The third of the four basic factors in environmental assessment under the new legislation pertains to the comments and concerns of the public. While this factor is similar to the one under the existing guidelines, the way in which this factor operates under the new legislation will be much improved. Bill C-78 provides far more numerous and more structured opportunities for the public to receive environmental assessment information and to participate in the environmental assessments of projects that are subject to the legislation. In short, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will establish a far more user-friendly process than the current guidelines order.

The final of the four basic factors that must be considered in the environmental assessment of any project is mitigation. There would be little sense in anticipating the environmental effects of a project if there was not a parallel requirement to take the necessary steps to control or eliminate those effects. The new Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will ensure that the proper mitigation measures are considered during the planning stages of projects and that effective measures are put in place at the start so that projects are safe from the time they are undertaken.

In short, the government is committed to anticipating and preventing environmental damage, rather than reacting to and curing, or attempting to cure, damage that has already occurred. This principle lies at the base of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act and it makes infinitely good economic as well as environmental sense.

Those are the four basic factors that must be taken into consideration in the environmental assessment of any project under the proposed act. Impressive though they may be, they are not sufficient to achieve effectively the goal of sustainable development. Therefore, for major projects that will require a mandatory study, a panel review or a mediation, four additional factors will have to be considered.

• (1540)

The first is the purpose of the project. It will be important, in considering the environmental implications, to have a good appreciation of the need for and the advantages to be gained from that project.

The second additional factor for major projects is a consideration of alternative means of carrying out the project. It is often a fact that the most economical way of carrying out a project may be very environmentally damaging, and the most environmentally friendly way of carrying out a project may seem to be very costly. Alternatives must be considered.

The third additional factor for the environmental assessment of major projects is follow-up programs. In particular, emphasis will be placed on verifying the accuracy of the environmental assessment and determining the effectiveness of measures taken to mitigate the environmental effects of the project.

The final factor which must be considered is far from the least. It is a consideration of the short or long-term capacity for the regeneration of renewable resources that are likely to be significantly affected by a project.

[Translation]

As you know, Mr. Speaker, this government undertook a long time ago to honour its commitment to sustainable development as proposed in the 1987 report of the World Commission on Environment and Development, also known as the Brundtland Commission.

With the promulgation of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, this commitment will take on a meaning that will extend its application to all major projects the government is involved in.

In this way, Mr. Speaker, we are living up to our commitment to make Canada, by the year 2000, the world's most environmentally friendly country.

[English]

In conclusion, since Bill C-78 was tabled on June 18, I have been appalled by some of the statements attributed to supposedly informed environmental activists and opposition critics. These people have been very quick to offer their opinions on the scope of the legislation and to suggest that the legislation represents a significant step backward from the current guidelines order. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act represents a bold initiative in the field of environmental assessment that will place Canada at the leading edge of responsible environmental stewardship. It represents a very significant expansion and improvement to the current guidelines Order in Council, and I trust that my remarks in the House today on the scope of the new process will put to rest any concerns in that regard.

Bill C–78 is a critically important legislative initiative that will provide environmental and economic benefits to Canadians for years to come and will place Canada in the forefront of economically concerned countries by the year 2,000.

[Translation]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your interest in and attention to this bill which is so important for our country.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my friend from New Brunswick.

[English]

I would like to compliment the member on that marvellous Environment Canada speech, but I would like to ask a few precise questions about the legislation itself.

I know the hon. member supports the concept of intervenor funding, but it is not found in Bill C–78. I wonder if he might want to express some support now during second reading for that principle which he thinks so highly of.

The second question is in relation to what is known as the exclusion lists and the mandatory lists. They are not included in the legislation. I am sure the hon. member, who has a background in resource management, knows that one has to be precise and one needs to know. That all comes under Section 55, but unfortunately most of it is proposed to be done by Governor in Council. I think the member would agree that we need to fill in what is on this exclusion list or exemption list and what is on the mandatory list.

I think the hon. member would also agree that statutes to which this legislation refers should be listed. The minister himself said that the Fisheries Act will be included. There are about a dozen acts suggested as being included. We are now aware that there are dozens of federal statutes that should be included. Does the member not think that those statutes should be included now? Should we not include intervenor funding now in the legislation? Should we not include those projects that are on the exclusion list and those that are on the mandatory list now so that everyone in the country knows, and should we not include the statutes to which this will apply whether it is for federal permits or federal jurisdictions?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, with respect to intervenor funding, the minister in his statements concerning this new bill has made it clear already that intervenor funding and public participant funding will be available. The estimate is that $100 million in additional funding will be involved to carry out the full provisions and implications of this act.

I would just like to read some of the conditions by which participant funding will be distributed to applicants.

Applicants must be directly affected by the proposed project or show a clear association with those who are.

Applicants with greater need will be favoured. They must also commit their own time and resources.

Applicants who are capable of making a unique and original presentation will be given priority.

Applicants who organize co–operative presentations will receive priority.

Applicants must prepare a clear plan of activity consistent with the terms of reference of the review.

Applicants from all sides of an issue will be equally considered.

The intentions of the government in this regard are very well stated and laid out. By leaving the matter open and subject to regulation, as with the list of statutes to be affected by the legislation and the other criteria that the hon. member has identified and suggested be in the bill, it seems to me that with the dynamics of the environment changing so rapidly, with all of us acknowledging that there are new environmental concerns today that we did not quite appreciate last year, it is very important that the Government of Canada be in a position to move swiftly to address those environmental concerns with flexibility and not be inhibited and locked into legislation that perhaps is too narrow or not comprehensive enough.

With respect to the exemptions from the legislation, the types of projects that are contemplated for exclusion have already been advanced by the minister. These include projects that are carried out during emergencies, projects that have been demonstrated to be environmentally inconsequential, projects where the federal involvement is minimal, projects related to matters of highest national security, physical activities but not physical works for which an environmental assessment would be inappropriate, and physical activities which are not within the definition of a project and falling within the definition of the act.

It seems to me that in the statements and elucidation of this bill that has already been provided by the minister and other speakers in introducing it and by officials of the department, the questions of the hon. member are well answered. The flexibility of regulations are far more effective in terms of environmental assessment development in this case than would locked-in concepts be in legislation.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if my colleague could provide some information on the funding. We have been told by the Minister of Finance and by the Minister of the Environment in the House that whatever money is necessary to implement a Green Plan, which is intended to be presented some time in October or November, will be available and in fact is available in the budget. Now we are told there is another $100 million. I wonder if the hon. member could tell us where that money is coming from. Is it in the current budget, or are we waiting until next year to have this legislation acted on?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that question definitively. I certainly would take it as notice and endeavour to get the precise answer. I would expect that there has been provision made in the 1990 budget for the establishment of the new agency. The introduction of this legislation certainly has been anticipated for quite some time.

I am a member of the committee with the hon. member which has examined the estimates. I do not have them with me so I cannot answer her question, as my memory does not serve me well in that regard. It may well be that supplementary estimates will be required to address this very important and exploding subject of the environment and all that is involved therein. I will take that question as notice and get a more precise answer for the hon. member.

• (1550)

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that we have just gone through a constitutional process where the major criticism was that the whole process was not transparent enough, that people did not know what was going on, and that too much was done in the backrooms by politicians, and also in light of the commitment during the election campaign that decisions of government would be subject to an open and full environmental review, how can the member rationalize the fact that decisions by cabinet will be escaping that review process and essentially Canadians will be told that we will have to trust the cabinet with respect to the impact of cabinet decisions on the environment.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I feel there is no process so clearly accountable than is the cabinet process of government. Frankly, it seems to me that the implications of our environmental assessment activity will be made clear to the public, and will be subject to public examination.

As a matter of fact, the bill conveys a very solid, strong commitment to full public participation. That is one of the principal criteria of the act. I support the democratic principle of responsible government. I believe the cabinet, in its daily exercised responsibilities, is the most responsible and accountable process.

As somebody has said previously, democracy does not seem to work well all the time, but it is certainly the best system we have.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to speak today on Bill C-78, an act to establish the federal environmental assessment process.

It has been a long time coming, Mr. Speaker, and the Minister of the Environment has certainly produced a document of great effort, with the best of intentions, but I am afraid that it has clearly fallen short of the expectations of most Canadians who have been making demands for decisive environmental assessment legislation.

The Minister of the Environment is taking Canadians for fools if he thinks he is going to pacify us with yet another generalized framework of legislation. After three years of study and 15 drafts, the minister has provided us with environmental assessment legislation that is skeletal and without solidity, not what this country needs at this crucial point in the environmental health of our nation.

Canadians have been waiting for new environmental legislation that will replace the old informal guidelines we have been following aimlessly since 1984. This legislation had previously given the Tory cabinet broad latitude in which it has woven a tangled web of misused and ignored guidelines.

Once again, the government has cleverly slipped out of making any real decisions by simply deferring the bulk of the legislation, to be drafted at a later date. This could be two years down the road. This is time that we do not have in our battle to prevent the environmental destruction that is plaguing our country.

As I read through Bill C–78, I noted that it might strengthen guidelines that allow environmental impact studies on projects such as dams, pulp mills, navigable waters or nuclear power plants. I had hoped it might give force to the idea of sustainable development, taking into consideration perhaps industry studied depletion of our renewable resources and the cumulative effect of many concentrated industries.

I am left realizing, however, that there are several weaknesses inherent in this environmental assessment bill and there are many questions that are not strategically answered within. This bill has been purposely designed to avoid telling the public the critical and most important detail of how the government will go about regulating a project. The scope and essence of this bill have been lost because no clear regulations have been set out for us within the legislation.

Once again, we have a loose framework with regulations to be decided upon later in the game by public policy bureaucrats. Does it not make sense that these regulations should be made clear to everyone from the outset? What kind of game is the government playing with the environment when upcoming and developing projects have to deal with random regulations? The rules are being made up as we go along and that is not playing fair with Canadians.

The Minister of the Environment hails this bill "as powerful in its impact on decision making". I question this line of thinking. The legislation will be worth nothing if cabinet fails to pass regulations listing all specific federal jurisdictions and legislation under which it can be used. Surely the people of Canada cannot be expected to blindly trust the cabinet to establish powers which will only be made public after the bill passes through the House of Commons, any time in the next two years or more.

There is a lack of strength of the environmental assessment agency process within the legislation. After reviewing a study of a particular project and the board finds it to present a risk, the agency can advise the environment minister to direct a panel of outside experts to assess that scheme.

The process starts off with good intentions, but then weakens. This panel could only make recommendations. It could not order a stop to any project. On top of there being a set of regulations to implement, the panel must make its recommendations, not to the environment minister or to the cabinet, but to the minister who wanted the project built in the first place. I see this as a waste of valuable study time. It is a process which seems to be defeating its own original purpose.

One of the government's own officials who helped draw up the bill, openly admits to this weakness, saying that the sponsoring minister may ignore the appointed panel and go ahead with the project. The only mechanism in place to prevent this from happening would be a mere appeal to the cabinet from the environment minister.

We have seen a similar process take place over the past 15 months in the case of the Green Plan. What did we end up with after an appeal from the former environmental minister? Nothing but a paltry framework for discussion. There is no solidity to the Green Plan, and now it seems there is no solidity to Bill C–78.

This legislation is not precise enough. It does not say how extensive the cabinet assessment must be, what standards for environmental protection must be followed, or how much of the cabinet assessment must be made public. Canadians must be wary of the existence of strong forces which we all know are pushing hard to weaken any guidelines, so that the courts cannot intervene in federal projects.

This bill lacks strong enough mechanisms to ensure compliance with the rules that government sets out to ensure the proper quality of assessment be given within the project assessment of the bill. For a policy assessment to succeed, a mechanism with teeth needs to be entrenched within the project assessment, that being the part which is entrenched in the law. Right now, we do not have this.

Perhaps the government could consider appointing a commissioner of the environment who would act in a similar manner as the Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages and the Office of the Commissioner of Human Rights. This environment commissioner could act in an automous fashion, being directly responsible to Parliament and directly independent of Parliament.

Passing a law would create such an office to audit policy and project assessment which signified forward thinking in the area of the environment. Within Bill C–78 itself, regulations outlined in section 55 are to be subject to the free discretion of the Governor in Council.

• (1600)

With direct reference to section 55(b) and (d), I feel that it is of utmost importance to define a list of projects that are to be excluded from the legislation and define a list of projects that are mandatory under the proposed assessment law.

The lists should be appended to the bill as soon as possible and before it is passed so that the rules will not be changed in cabinet later. If left to the discretion of the Governor in Council, the regulations risk not being defined as may be necessary.

The hon. minister should be more forthcoming and up front with the people of Canada by indicating early on in this bill a third list which relates to section 55(g): Acts of Parliament.

I am pleased that the hon. minister has included eight federal regular Tory statutes, and I quote: "Some provisions may warrant being covered with Canadian Environmental Assessment Act." The word "may" and not "shall". Once again, however, these are merely suggested in the act, and are not defined as concrete regulations.

The federal areas which are to come under environmental assessment must be clearly laid out and regulated.

These lists, I am sure Mr. Speaker, will become the subject of much heated debate within numerous departments, so for the sake of Canada's environment, they must be established within Bill C–78 from the very beginning.

We are now beginning to see the initial moves on behalf of several provincial governments to set up their own environmental legislation in which to counter any federal power and authority they may perceive to be a threat to their own interests.

The Minister of the Environment from Quebec, for example, has said that his province will be forced to enact its own dormant legislation. He feels that it must move quickly, before federal legislation is in force, to enact an idle section of the Environmental Quality Act.

This federal environmental assessment proposal, which will screen industrial projects for their environmental impacts, will however force the provinces to occupy their field of jurisdiction. Quebec perceives this to be a threat to its projects that involve, for example, the export of its electricity.

With the form of this legislation, we are going to see a scramble by provinces to set up their own environmental impact assessment legislation for large projects like aluminum smelters, pulp and paper plants and hydro dams.

The design of these provincial assessment legislations could over–ride the benefit of federal legislation. The provinces see an urgency to protect their own industrial development and will not hesitate to assert their control of their interests.

Other provinces have jealously condemned the loss of jurisdiction by taking pains to ensure that their environmental assessment legislation is comparable to the federal government. This government will lose the strong position it held with the court decisions.

Therefore, within this legislation, there is an absence of a mechanism which will ensure compliance to Bill C–78.

This thorny question of federal-provincial jurisdiction has been largely sidestepped in this bill. The hon. minister promises that the jurisdiction will be spelled out once again in the regulations yet to be proclaimed. The hon. minister is offering us promises with potentially wide range negative impact.

As an example, I will refer to the D'Arcy McKeough dam and diversion which is in the riding of the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex and of which he will be well aware. This project was to save the town of Wallaceburg from spring flooding.

The politicians and bureaucrats decided to expropriate the area required without due respect for the owners. Now no one likes the idea of losing his or her property to expropriation, but if fairly compensated and to help neighbours, there are no problems.

Common sense did not prevail, as the government wanted the land for nothing. Those affected by this expropriation formed a committee referred to as SOS, Save our Sydenham. The battle was on. At the examination for discovery, after many days of hearing witnesses, the judge ruled in favour of the SOS committee. To make a long story longer, a project that originally was to cost approximately $7.3 million ended up costing the provincial and federal governments in excess of $40 million.

At that time I sat on both the SOS committee and on the St. Clair Conservation Authority. You can imagine my frustration, due to a conflict of interest, in not being involved when the dam and diversion topic was discussed and watching millions being wasted every year. In the end the dam and diversion were built. The owners were properly compensated and the town of Wallaceburg was saved from flooding in the spring. In the process of not having guidelines, the government blew over $30 million. This is only on a small project.

In discussing Bill C-78, it is also important to draw attention to the fact that Canadian foreign aid, Crown corporations and support for Canadian exports abroad, will be subject to special rules still to be determined within the legislation. Again, it is important to the substance of this bill that policies with international implications be a part of the immediate act.

To close, I would like to point out one final weakness in Bill C-78. I question whether this bill entails the most efficient and effective method in which to utilize the additional $100 million in allotted government funding. The government has reached the point where it must really turn things around as far as its efforts toward the environment go. This environmental assessment bill could become a cornerstone for Canada if only the government would take a few larger steps further to create a more dynamic piece of legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for Prince Albert—Churchill River (Mr. Funk)—The Goods and Services Tax; the Hon. Member for Nanaïmo—Cowichan (Mr. Stupich)—The Fisheries; the Hon. Member for Burin—St. George's (Mr. Simmons)—The Fisheries.

[English]

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to participate in debate on Bill C-78, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

I must say I am a little bit surprised at the order because, indeed, I thought my colleague across the floor would speak first. I was looking forward to hearing what she might say.

The concern of the people of Canada for the environment was very evident last year when we came back to this House as a new government, newly elected and set up new committees. I noted that every committee was working on environmental issues involved with their particular interest. Out of that concern grew my work on parliamentary reform and global climate change. It emphasized to me that everyone in all aspects of life is getting more and more concerned, and I am delighted that this government is demonstrating its concern and interest by introducing Bill C-78.

Bill C-78 outlines a legal process, establishes ground rules and creates an efficient balanced approach for the environmental assessment process. In addition, this bill guarantees the public that they can participate in the process and be able to influence government decision-making. In this way, this legislation provides the most fair and open environmental assessment process in Canada and, indeed, in the world. This government is acting on the concerns of Canadians and the recommendations of the World Commission on Environment and Development, the Brundtland commission. The World Commission added new impetus and focused growing public demand for reforming environmental assessment processes. In its report, "Our Common Future", the commission concluded that the environmental assessment processes would be more effective if they were mandatory and entrenched in legislation; this is what we have done.

This reform package that we have introduced will ensure that all decisions of the federal government fully integrate environmental considerations where these are relevant to ensure protection of our natural environment and for future generations of Canadians. We believe, indeed we know, that many of the environmental problems we are forced to deal with today could have been avoided if we had simply improved the way in which we have planned in the past and we will do that by planning better in the future. Before we begin a project, it is just as important to know if a project is environmentally viable as it is to know what capital and labour resources are required to make it viable in economic terms.

It is not the intent of this government to use this legislation to stop projects, but rather to ensure that environmental impacts are considered before a project proceeds. This is the only sensible and fair thing to do, to protect the rights of future generations of Canadians to an environment equal or better to the environment we inherited from our parents. This government has gone to great lengths to make sure this legislation is the most fair legislation possible.

Let me start by showing this House how the whole process we have introduced is a fair one. For example, it would not be fair to the Canadian taxpayer to conduct environmental assessments of projects we know would not damage the environment. For this reason, we have proposed an exclusion list to be compiled through public consultation. The list will include projects known not to pose any risk of harm to the environment or where environmental effects are negligible. Projects such as simple renovations, routine operations, purchasing supplies or minor construction would be exempt from this review. However, we also believe it would be unfair not to conduct assessments on projects we know will impact on the environment, so we have proposed a mandatory study list. Projects on the mandatory study list will be large-scale projects that often generate considerable public concern, such as large oil and gas developments, uranium mines, major hydroelectric developments and large industrial plants.

Perhaps I could add here that I was astonished recently to learn that dams which we have in the past always felt were not harmful insofar as the hydroelectric generation aspects are particularly difficult to manage from the standpoint of mercury contamination of the water for a few years after they are put into operation. Another major part of dam construction that I had never considered before is that of methane generation and the impact of the methane on the warming trend. New information seems to be coming forward and putting different perspectives on things that we thought before were not harmful. To ensure that the lists are acceptable to the widest number of Canadians possible, we have proposed an equal and fair opportunity to any interested individual to play a role in the development of the exclusion and mandatory lists.

Further, it would not be fair to expect industry, environmental groups and communities to spend time and money participating in environmental assessments of projects similar to ones already assessed for environmental impacts. For this reason, we have proposed a process to assign projects of a similar nature to classes for review. We have proposed that projects could be assigned to classes if they are routine, repetitive and known not to cause significant or unmitigable effects. Such projects could include dredging, highway maintenance or rebuilding of facilities on the same site. Further, it would not be fair to ask Canadians to accommodate unnecessary delay because of environmental assessments. We recognize that many projects requiring a federal decision may also require decisions from other interests, including provincial governments, foreign states or other federal authorities with similar review processes. We believe co-operation can ensure the environmental assessment process is efficient and reduces duplication of work and cost to all parties and stakeholders.

The act offers a number of mechanisms designed to overcome such duplication and inefficiency to achieve closer co-operation and co-ordination between interested parties having responsibilities in relation to the same project.

The act enables a responsible authority to co-operate in the preparation of environmental assessments with another party or jurisdiction in the case of a screening or a mandatory study. It requires the responsible authority to exercise the appropriate quality control for any assessments so undertaken. It does not, however, allow the responsible authority to delegate any of its decision-making powers.

This feature will enable federal authorities to work closely with other parties and jurisdictions to minimize duplication and confusion without sacrificing environmental values. Not only is the process fair, but the opportunities for participation are fairer than ever before. The Government of Canada believes public participation is essential to achieving an appropriate integration of economic development and environmental protection.

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will provide a fairer opportunity for public input at all stages of the assessment process. Under the act public participation will be encouraged in a number of ways.

For instance, public participation will be enhanced through early notification. Responsible authorities will be required to inform the public through public registries and newspaper ads of major project proposals at an early stage of the assessment process. Public comments will be invited at that time. Time periods for the receipt of comments and information will be established by the agency.

Also a public registry will be established for each project, containing reports and supporting documents and information used in the assessment of the projects and the course of action following completion of the assessment. The public will have full access to the registries. The Access to Information Act will apply with respect to any restricted information.

Mediation will also enhance public participation. It will involve representatives of public groups which have a direct interest in or are directly affected by a proposed project.

Mediation is fair on two counts. First, it provides a fair opportunity for interested parties, opponents, and supporters to participate in an environmental assessment. Second, it reduces the time and money required for full assessments in cases where it appears all stakeholders are willing to participate and consensus is considered to be possible.

To maintain neutrality the Minister of the Environment, rather than the proponent or the responsible authority, will appoint the mediator. The mediator will assist and advise participants, not make decisions for them.

Panel reviews will also provide equal and fair opportunities for stakeholders to participate in developing recommendations on a project for the Minister of the Environment. Review panels will conduct their deliberations independently of the government. Review panels will be required to hold public hearings to allow the public to present its views and recommendations.

To assist public participation, the reform package includes a participant funding program to ensure that stakeholders have the opportunity to participate and play a full role in panel reviews and mediation.

The purpose of the financial assistance program is to improve the fairness and effectiveness of public reviews by increasing the equality of participation. It will help achieve balance and objectivity of decision making by supporting the preparation and presentation of informed views for decision makers that might otherwise not be available.

Further, Canadians will have the opportunity to comment on each individual act regulated under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. This government could have included a list of acts in the actual legislation. This would have provided Canadians with only one opportunity to comment on their inclusion, but the process that we have proposed will allow Canadians to comment on each regulatory statute to be included. Indeed, I believe it gives the government greater latitude to include other acts than it would if we had to choose them all at the present time.

Finally this government recognizes that it is only fair to lead by example. For this reason, while debate continues on the proposed legislation and Canadians make submissions to the legislative committee with regard to this legislation, we will begin immediately to consider the environmental implications of all proposed policy.

• (1620)

The results of the environmental assessment of policies will be integrated into the analysis supporting the policy proposal and will be incorporated into the memoranda to cabinet.

For the first time there will be routine environmental assessments of all federal policy proposals coming before the cabinet. This is a very important element of the reform package which accompanied the introduction of Bill C–78.

In summary, we are debating a bill in which everyone in this House can take pride. I am certain that we are examining a bill which will be a cornerstone of Canadian environmental policy for years and generations to come.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member could respond to a very deep concern that there is in much of Canada about the 1984 cabinet guidelines order.

As the member knows, in Saskatchewan the Rafferty–Alameda project is proceeding even though the Government of Canada is paying Saskatchewan $1 million a month not to proceed. Supposedly it is proceeding on the basis that this is safety related work. I do not think anyone would dispute in relation to any large project where there is such a scrambled jurisdictional omelette as the Rafferty–Alameda that safety related work should be completed.

There does not seem to be a distinction between safety related work and completion construction. The same is true in Alberta with the Oldman development despite a unanimous ruling of the federal Court of Appeal that the project should not proceed until an environmental assessment has been done, both on transport matters in relation to the Navigable Waters Act and in relation to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

My question to the hon. member is this: How can Canadians trust a piece of legislation which does not either include the statutes, the exemption list or many other things the government says it will put in it, like intervener funding at some point? We have the Rafferty–Alameda project running contrary to a Federal Court ruling and the Oldman proceeding despite a unanimous ruling of the federal court of appeal.

What should be done on those two, and should the other statutes not be included?

Mr. Brightwell: Mr. Speaker, obviously I cannot answer all the hon. member's questions. My involvement in environmental affairs is more recent than his own. Indeed he knows all the background to the particular questions he has asked.

It would seem to me that under this act, with the ability to review projects before they get going and before they are put in place, any of the problems he is signifying seem to be occurring with the Oldman dam and the other dam out west would be avoided.

He should be applauding the government for taking action and presenting a bill today that could avoid such problems in the future.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I think it is unfortunate when an hon. member rises, delivers a speech, and is not as familiar as one might be with the subject matter, or he would know that the answer he just gave the House does not really reflect reality.

The courts have been quite clear that the government has not only the power but the obligation under the existing legislation to conduct an environmental assessment in any area of federal responsibility. This obligation which I will be speaking to shortly is in fact weakened by this legislation and not strengthened.

The government asks us to take a great deal under this legislation on faith. I wonder if the hon. member would tell us how the government intends to demonstrate that faith by complying with the orders of the court in the Oldman River Dam in carrying out, as directed by the court, an environmental assessment by the Minister of Transport and by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to ensure that the project is not further proceeding as it is now, totally illegally and without the required permit from the Government of Canada under the Navigable Waters Act.

Mr. Brightwell: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I should be very annoyed, just a little annoyed, or quite what my reaction should be to the member's elitist. Because the member is very informed with her background in environmental processes, she feels that I as a newcomer to the field with an interest and a deep concern for my family, for my grandchildren, should not be able to comment on a bill before the House. I believe that is narrow in perspective and totally unfair to the process. Indeed I am learning about the process as I go on. I believe that is a right and a privilege that I should have freely in this House.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the very important matter of the environment and as a member who serves the area wherein the Rafferty–Alameda dam is located, one of the very disturbing factors is that we get many comments and many opinions cast before people understand the project.

If we are truly to have a good environmental approach, which we all want to see, I think that the opposition and government people will have to take some responsibility in terms of knowing what they are talking about.

I will give you an example. One of the people who has been most outspoken on this issue said that there were 2,400 acres of trees in the valley. There is one little grove of trees in the valley. There are people passing comment without even seeing the project.

It is safe to say that 90 per cent or more of the people there, whether they are Liberal, NDP, or Conservative, say that we need water in that area. This matter has been studied since 1905, and this type of approach does not help provide a good direction for environmental concerns and issues.

If we are to have sustainable environmental development, we have to take a balanced approach and we must know what we are talking about in dealing with individual projects.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see this bill before the House. We have been anxiously awaiting it for a long time. Other members who have been in the House longer than I have been here were awaiting it long before I was. It is indeed a pleasure to have it before the House and to have an opportunity to have it referred to a committee for detailed study and, I would hope, some substantial strengthening and improvement.

As I see the bill, it is in fact a step backward from what we now have in place. The courts have been very clear as to the strength of the guideline orders that are currently in place and have been since 1984.

They have been very clear that the guideline order places on the government and on every agent of the government, specifically on every minister, not the possibility but the responsibility to do a full environmental assessment of any project that touches on a minister's area of responsibility.

The courts have been very clear that the effect of the guideline orders is all inclusive and pervasive. It is therefore very disappointing to see before us in this long awaited legislation a bill that is intended to exclude more than to include, a bill that sets up a framework for the government to do the least possible rather than the best possible.

We have a situation where in fact how good this legislation is or how effective it is in protecting our environment depends very much on how the government chooses to use it. The guideline orders show that the government has chosen in most cases to get away with the minimum it can rather than do the most it can do. It is disappointing. At this stage, particularly with the level of public awareness of a new approach to the environment that is much broader than simply not dirtying the water and not fouling the air, the legislation does not deal with the concept of sustainable development. In fact, it specifically excludes those factors from being taken into consideration. They are important issues such as the unwarranted waste of resources, especially non-renewable resources. The whole purpose of preserving our environment for future generations and changing the way we behave and operate is so that that objective is achieved. A good part of that is based on, not temporary damage to certain aspects of our environment, but whether we even will have enough resources left in the future on which to survive and thrive.

• (1630)

One other major issue that I feel is excluded from the bill and that I hope we will be able to consider in amendments to the bill when it is before committee is aboriginal rights. It is a shame that a small country such as New Zealand can, at this stage in its history, ensure the preservation and protection of aboriginal traditions and cultures in its comprehensive environmental legislation and a country such as Canada has not chosen to include that as a factor to be considered in carrying out environmental assessments. I do hope members of the House, particularly members of the government, are prepared to consider favourably amendments that will no doubt be brought forward to ensure that aboriginal traditions and cultures are part of the environmental assessment that comes with any project.

A third major point that will need a great deal more attention when the committee addresses the bill in greater detail is the international factor. The bill very specifically excludes the Export Development Corporation. The Export Development Corporation is responsible for assessing those projects which Canada will fund to develop exports particularly to developing countries. It is irrelevant to include CIDA and CIDA projects abroad, which are overseas development aid projects, in the requirement for environmental assessment and yet not include the Export Development Corporation through which major goods and services are exported to developing countries.

The Environment Committee, through its hearings, has become increasingly aware of the importance of what we do internationally to the point where, if our concern is our global commons—our global atmosphere, our global water supply, our global supply of lands and natural areas—then we have to look very seriously at balancing what we choose to invest in Canada and elsewhere in the world in terms of protecting the environment.

It makes absolutely no sense for us to cut back on environment-destroying technologies in our own country while, through the Export Development Corporation and its assessment of projects, continuing to finance the export of projects to developing countries without any consideration whatsoever as to the environmental impacts of those exports that we have chosen to subsidize or to finance. It simply is a truism to say that anything that goes up into the air over China, India, or Indonesia, comes down in Ottawa, Toronto, Vancouver, or Rimouski.

I want to speak about the assessment of cabinet policy. I understand very well the tradition of cabinet secrecy and confidentiality and the reasons why material that goes to cabinet cannot be public. However, given the statements of the government and the concern of the public, I am shocked to find that an environmental statement or consideration is not already a required item on material going to cabinet. I believe that this is an extremely important weakness in the bill in that cabinet decides on the spending of many billions of dollars. It decides on significant expenditures on physical projects that have great potential to damage the environment. It decides on energy policies which have significant potential either to help or harm the environment.

In my view, the public is entitled to know on which considerations those decisions have been made, what their impact on the environment will be, and whether or not they are good policies from the point of view of the environment. The legislation does absolutely nothing to give the public that assurance. One can achieve that quite easily, respecting cabinet secrecy and at the same time respecting the public's right to know, by simply guaranteeing in the legislation that, once determined by cabinet, every policy will be subject to an environmental assessment review as any other project of any other private sector individual. The results of that assessment will be made known to the public and they will have opportunity for input and comment.

I want to speak about some of the loopholes in the legislation which I certainly hope we will be able to do something about when we come to deal with this and report back to Parliament on the legislation.

First, we start with projects on federal lands. However, we exempt those lands which the federal government has previously sold or any sale of federal lands unless there is a specific project. The government should, as a public owner of land, assume that it has a public responsibility of public trusteeship and when it disposes of land, for whatever purpose it is disposing of or leasing land, it should be subject to an environmental assessment. The sale in itself constitutes a project or an activity of government that should be subject to an environmental assessment.

I am concerned about weak-kneed wording such as "shall include a consideration of" and "mitigation without definition". I am concerned that the scope of factors to be taken into consideration by any responsible authority, and that includes a minister, shall be determined by the responsible authority. In other words, if I am sitting there as a minister sometime wanting to build some major big project, I have the right under this legislation to decide on what terms and conditions the environmental impact of that project shall be considered. Obviously, that has got to be tightened up.

We have the words "serious environmental impact use" and "significant environmental impact use", without attempting in any way to define those. A minister at any time could assume that, even though he has identified environmental impacts, they are not significant or they are not serious. Obviously, we have to clean up some of that.

In comparison to the guideline orders presently in existence, I notice the legislation does not give due attention to public concern. Currently under the guideline orders, any project about which there is public concern about the environmental impact must be subject to an assessment. That completely disappears from this bill. I do have trouble accepting the words of the hon. member who said earlier that this bill is a step forward and that it leaves behind guidelines that are ineffective and insufficient and puts something stronger in place. On reading the bill, it is evident to me that is not the case. In fact, if the bill cannot be strengthened, we would do better to stick with the guideline orders and the court interpretations that we now have on those guideline orders. They are comprehensive, inclusive, and far more widespread in the kind of projects that need to be assessed.

In bringing forward this legislation, the government has, in essence, given itself a great deal of power to exempt virtually anything from an environmental assessment. That is something that is not acceptable. This is far too important, not only for the future of our country and for the assets we hope to pass on to our children, but for the future of the world. We are on the brink of destroying the ozone layer that protects life on earth from ultraviolet radiation. We are on the brink of massive climatic change if we do not act. Yet, we have wishy-washy legislation before us that is a step backward from where we are now, not a step forward.

There is a great listing on page 33 of the bill of everything the government can do to exempt projects, ministries, or agencies of the government from the requirements of this act. If the government is serious, it will put forward a list now of legislation, act, ministries, and agencies that are subject to the acts. It will make a comprehensive and all-inclusive list and it will agree that there may be additions to that list by that regulation but removals may only be made by Parliament. That is the only thing that protects us and ensures public scrutiny of how the government operates under this legislation.

With all those powers, the government is essentially saying: "Trust me. Trust me to do what I say I am going to do." I think we have had good reason in the last six years not to trust the government, particularly since November, 1988.

I need only remind the public and members of the House of the many sacred trusts that have been violated and of the statements by a minister in Newfoundland that the government would not touch unemployment insurance and within months we were slammed by a retrograde UI bill. We have had statements by the Prime Minister himself, pledging his loyalty to his mother and swearing he would not touch old age security. We have had a number of bills before us that do exactly that. They touch pension plans in a detrimental way.

We are being asked to trust the government that decimated its investment in alternative energy from $500 million down to $50 million. It did this at a time when it is going to international conferences and talking about the importance of alternative energy and reducing the dependence on non-renewable fossil fuels. Yet, its actions speak louder than its words.

This is the first year the Department of the Environment itself has recovered from the massive slashing of its funds that has taken place over the years that this government has been in power.

There is the Oldman River dam where, despite a unanimous court decision, the Minister of Transport states it is okay for him to let this project go ahead without a permit required for safety reasons. If he is sincere about that, he should issue a revised permit that sets out clearly what is allowed to be done at that project and that establishes clearly that the works to be done are those related to safety and safety alone. Not having done that, he and his colleagues have shown clearly that they are ignoring the order of the courts and ignoring the environmental assessments required to be done. He has abandoned any control over that project that he is required—not able but required—to exercise under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. This is the government we are being asked to trust.

I spent the best part of yesterday and today at Green Plan consultations. I heard a great deal of scepticism in a roomful of primarily business people and business organizations, not environmental groups. I heard scepticism about the intentions of the government, because, again, this is the government we are being asked to trust. It had a green strategy that was ready to be brought forward last February.

We, who are members of the environment committee, put ourselves under a great deal of pressure to try to produce recommendations for the minister at a time that would have supported provisions in the budget to implement the green strategy. That was last February. Now, here we are into summer and we are back to an amorphous, meaningless discussion document that lays out no options, gives no costs and gives no analysis of the pros and cons so that thousands of people who participated in these consultations can sit down and, rationally, in a well informed manner, give the government their advice. That is the kind of frustration I was listening to this morning and all day yesterday.

Businesses are saying what businesses have always said: "Tell us the environment in which we have to operate and we will operate in that environment." They want to know the rules, they want to know the regulations, and they want to know that these rules and regulations are not going to change from moment to moment, from month to month or from fiscal year to fiscal year. This bill does absolutely nothing to give them the security that the environment will be protected. It is not only non-governmental organizations and environmental groups that are concerned about the environment. They want to do their part in protecting it but how can they? How can they, when the government can prescribe a list of projects for which an assessment is not required, prescribe a list of classes of projects for which no assessment is required, prescribe anybody to be a federal authority or not to be a federal authority? How can the citizens of this country know what they can expect from this government if it is not prepared to put it into legislation? How can our provinces know what they can expect and what requirements they have to meet if the legislation is not clear, is not immutable and not subject to the political convenience or the whims of a government?

We have already seen how the Ministry of Industry, Science and Technology considers the environment. The environment that provides for things that are not immediately of tangible value but have some higher value, poetry, music, what have you, as if care for the environment is something we can do without. We know that this legislation has been weakened. It has been weakened by a cabinet that is weak-kneed and unprepared to do what the Canadian public wants it to do. I challenge members of the government, as we go into committee with this, to please be prepared to make it clear, precise and strong.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa West has given us a very thorough and interesting analysis of the bill before us. She has put forward some interesting views about aboriginal rights and about the international dimension of this bill. She has reviewed the performance of this government in relation to the Oldman River dam. We know that the hon. member for Ottawa West has been quite active in this House on the question of the Rafferty-Alameda project. In view of the intervention made just a few minutes earlier by the member for Souris—Moose Mountain, I would like very much to hear the views of the member for Ottawa West as to the performance of this government in relation to the Rafferty-Alameda situation.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I really do not have to comment on it, the courts have done that adequately and fully. The courts have said that the government failed miserably and completely to accept and to exercise the responsibility it had under the existing guideline orders and that it has failed since then to act as it should act.

The courts have made it clear that on any project under federal authority, not limited as this bill is to projects on federal land or funded by the federal government, the federal government and the federal minister under whose authority it comes, can and must act to carry out an environmental assessment to protect the interests of the public of Canada and to protect the natural heritage of Canada.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to join in this debate. Following the previous speaker, it is very good to have an opportunity to put some facts forward. It is tempting to go through the comments that the previous speaker made one at a time and answer some of the rhetoric that was put forward. This particular government does not have to take any lessons from the previous Liberal administration. Being a member in Queen's Park in Ontario for a number of years, I am aware that the province of Ontario has had an Environmental Assessment Act since, I believe, 1977 or 1978. From that period of time through to 1984 the government that was in power during federally was a Liberal government. Did that Liberal government act to bring forward environmental assessment legislation? Very clearly the answer is no.

• (1650)

Just prior to the federal election in 1984 it brought in guidelines which it hastily threw together in the form of an Order in Council. These guidelines were intended to be just guidelines. They were never intended to come under the microscope of the courts. Clearly, although some of the members have stated that this act is not a step forward, I think the facts speak quite differently. I do believe that this is a major step forward. The bill has been under public consideration for some period of time has been put together as a result of that public consideration and I am very pleased to have an opportunity to speak to this bill.

It is the view of the government, and certainly my view, that the environmental assessment act is a major step forward in our nation's campaign to preserve and enhance our environment. The bill is central to the over-all goal of the government's Green Plan, to make Canada the industrial world's most environmentally friendly country by the year 2000.

Certainly this act has the power in its impact of decision-making that it is the most significant environmental assessment legislation anywhere in the world. The bill will, for the first time, entrench in legislation the federal government's obligation to integrate environmental considerations into its project planning and implementation processes.

Given the immense importance of this legislation, I wish to briefly outline the four key principles used in designing the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

First, the government wanted an environmental assessment process that is clear, consistent and effective. There should be no uncertainty in the environmental assessment process.

Second, the process should be efficient and fair. Each project should receive the amount of time and the kind of assessment that it requires.

Third, the government wanted the legislation to anticipate and to prevent problems rather than adopt the less effective and more expensive approach of react and cure.

Fourth, the legislation must encourage open decision-making and provide opportunities for the public to play a role in the final decision.

It is this final point, the openness and the increased public participation which I want to spend a few brief moments talking about. I believe that public participation in the environmental assessment process is central, and indeed essential, to achieving both a strong economy and a healthy environment.

I am pleased to say that the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will provide greater opportunities for all Canadians to participate at every stage of the environmental assessment of individual projects. Further, the act strengthens the public participation in assessment of major projects. The act outlines several ways in which public participation will be improved. It stipulates that the public must be notified early in the assessment process of all major project proposals.

Canadians will be invited to comment on the project proposals at this time. Similarly, the bill stipulates that the public must be notified when the Minister of the Environment receives an assessment report.

As well, for the first time open public registries must be established for all assessed projects. These registries will be a holding tank for reports and documents used in the assessment of the project. Decisions taken on proposed projects, including any mitigating measures and follow-up programs required, must also be kept in the public registries.

I think it is important that we make this very clear. All submissions, anything relating to a project, is in this open public file. Any correspondence, any materials that relate to that project are available for the public to read and they can use that material in formulating their own ideas and their own submissions for those projects. I think this is one of the most significant advancements here and it is on all projects.

The establishment of open public registries is a significant improvement in the Canadian environmental assessment process. Registries currently exist for some projects. However, they are maintained on a voluntary ad hoc basis.

Of course there will be many opportunities for Canadians to participate directly in the assessment process through the public review of major projects. Public reviews will generally be held on major projects which pose significant risks to the environment and about which the public has serious concerns.

The act introduces mediation as a new option for public review. Mediation will involve representatives of public groups which have a direct interest in, or are directly affected by, a proposed project. Through mediation, representatives will attempt to reach consensus on the potential environmental effects and measures for mitigating these effects.

Mediation is the preferred choice whenever all stakeholders are willing to participate and a consensus is considered possible. A major advantage to mediation is that Canadians who are most involved with, and most concerned about, a proposal can communicate directly with one another.

Major projects which are not suitable for mediation will be subject to public hearings by review panels. These hearings will allow all interested Canadians to present their views and recommendations.

It is important to note that under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, the Minister of the Environment will decide on the need for public review. Under the current Order in Council guidelines, only the minister responsible for the project had the authority to order a public review.

Now it is in the hands of the Minister of the Environment alone, not in the hands of the various ministers who are responsible for those projects in the past.

I am pleased to remind the House that this government has established a formal participant funding program to ensure that all stakeholders have the opportunity to participate in these mediations and public hearings.

This multimillion dollar financial assistance program will open the environmental assessment process to Canadians who might not have had the financial resources to otherwise participate in public reviews.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

MODIFICATION OF THE BENEFITS PAYMENT METHOD

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the regulations made under the Family Allowances Act to allow monthly benefits for the month of September of each year to be paid for each eligible child after the first but before the sixteenth day of September, in order to help Canadian families financially at the start of the new school year.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to rise today in this House on behalf of all Canadians so that, from now on, they receive their family allowance payments for the month of September at the beginning of the month in order to help them financially at the start of the new school year.

I wish to remind the hon. members that the federal Family allowance program is aimed principally at providing financial assistance to parents with dependent children, to help them with the cost of raising their children. This program aimed at complementing the income of Canadian families provides for monthly benefits for children under the age of 18.

At the end of 1988, Mrs. Claire Lecault of Amos, asked me to make representations to the Canadian government so that family allowances be paid at the beginning of September each year, before the return to school.

Other people in my riding came to see me several times to discuss the project, at the beginning of 1989. I have received a petition signed by people from Senneterre, Val-d'Or, Hull, Ottawa, Saint-Jérôme, Gatineau and Obaska, asking the federal government to pay family allowances at the beginning of September each year before a new school year in Canada, to help families who have one child or more in school.

I presented that petition numbered 342-0007 in the House on April 4, 1989 and got the following response from the Minister of National Health and Welfare: "The Family Allowances Act provides that monthly allowances be paid for every eligible child. Regulations (section 8) require that allowances be paid after the ninth, but before the twenty-fifth day of each month."

The Income Security Programs Branch processes approximately 9 million cheques monthly, and is responsible for the administration of family allowances (Section 3,6), old age security payments (section 3,0) and Canada Pension Plan payments (Section 2,4). The present computerized systems are not flexible. Radical changes are under way for the family allowances system and the old age security system.

Changing the date of issue of the September family allowance cheque, for the first or the second day of the month, would require amendments in the regulations. It would also require a change in the expiry dates, and the period of time during which changes can be made in the accounts would be shorter. For instance, there would be less time to change the address on a cheque between August and September.

The addresses on the September family allowances are used by Revenue Canada for the anticipated allocation of the child tax credit. If an earlier date in September was settled on, Revenue Canada would end up with a greater number of no longer valid addresses.

The minister answered my petition: "This suggestion is not unreasonnable per se and the Department's officials will assess it carefully during the computer systems review. However, considering the significance of the required changes and the inter-relationship of these programs, the Minister of Health and Welfare cannot guarantee that this suggestion will be implemented".

On June 20, 1989 I introduced motion M-502 now under consideration, as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the regulations made under the Family Allowances Act to allow monthly benefits for the month of September of each year to be paid for each eligible child after the first but before the sixteenth day of September, in order to help Canadian families financially at the start of a new school year.

Mr. Speaker, from the correspondence I exchanged with the Minister of National Health and Welfare in early 1989 concerning the payment of family allowances, I should like to read the following sentence in the minister's response: "Still I am always prepared to entertain the suggestions of our recipients because, as a rule, they help to bring about major amendments to our laws". My constituents of the riding of Abitibi did make a suggestion, that is, change the date to early September.

I have another letter. I wrote to the minister on February 8 to ask him for the findings of a study on the feasibility of paying family allowances at an earlier date. On May 2, 1990, he answered back that the Income Security Programs Branch of his department was in the process of entirely reorganizing the family allowance computerized system and of putting into place a direct funds transfer service that should be operational later this year. He also made this very clear: "As interesting as your proposal may be, it would take several years before it obtain the full attention it deserves from the government, that is all the time required to complete the reorganization of the family allowances.

Meanwhile, your proposal was analysed on a preliminary basis. According to that analysis, if we were to deliver the family allowance for September cheques earlier, it could create some administrative and operational difficulties in a system which was designed to steadily distribute some 3.7 million benefits to 6.6 million children. The time required to issue the August and September cheques and to make the necessary changes of addresses or recipients for these months would be reduced by half. Moreover, recipients should be notified in advance of the new payment date of family allowances to prevent cheques from remaining in mail boxes for several days.

Finally, your suggestion implies some costs. The simple fact of paying some $220 million in benefits two weeks ahead of time could cost Canadian taxpayers about half a million dollars in interest charges alone.

In spite of these problems, as the minister himself indicated in his letter, the idea of paying family allowances early in September is interesting and deserves to be explored further within the family allowance reform project. "

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced it would be quite easy to recover these interest charges from other governmental departments.

I am sure some hon. members will suggest to the government various means for the recovery of such costs.

When dealing with family allowances, Mr. Speaker, the House should be reminded that they mean $21.31 for a first child, $53.08 per month for a second child, about $133.08 for a third child, and $213.08 for a fourth child. We know that low-income families must spend an average of $70 per child to send their children to school, to buy them books, clothes etc.

As the minister indicated, thorough changes are being implemented both in the family allowance and old age security Pension schemes. Mr. Speaker, this would be the perfect opportunity to make the changes which many low-income families in this country have asked me to suggest.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask all ministers and all hon. members to support this motion, so that the necessary change may be made this summer to the regulations, so that family allowance cheques for September may be issued on the first or second day of the month, to help Canadian families send their children back to school.

• (1710)

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup for supporting my motion.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise and speak in favour of the motion which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the regulations made under the Family Allowances Act to allow monthly benefits for the month of September of each year to be paid for each eligible child after the first but before the sixteenth day of September, in order to help Canadian families financially at the start of a new school year.

I congratulate the hon. member for Abitibi for putting forward this very thoughtful motion.

Many expenses are incurred by parents at the beginning of the school year in September. There are new clothes to be bought, new school supplies to be had and bus passes to be purchased. At some schools there are school uniforms to be bought and tuition fees to be paid.

For these and other reasons it is necessary that we as legislators do what we can to alleviate the financial burden with which parents are confronted at that time of the year.

I therefore fully support this motion which would have the effect of expediting receipt of family allowance benefits by parents for the month of September each year. Receipt of the cheques at the very beginning of the month would make a positive difference for families whose cash flow at that time of the year is low. Families who may have experienced the need for borrowing to meet these expenses will have additional funds available when they are most needed, and not two weeks later.

Indeed, I believe that it will make a substantial difference for those families most in need, for those families with several children who are living below the poverty line. It is precisely families such as these which will benefit most from this progressive measure. To them we, as parliamentarians, have a duty and an obligation to act.

The motion being proposed has, I submit, a high benefit/cost ratio. Thousands of low-income families will experience less financial pressure in September, rendering the expenses associated with education not a disincentive to pursuit of learning.

Today there is in Canada a great need for a comprehensive policy on family issues which will have the effect of making life easier for families which experience difficulty in making ends meet. Such a policy would consider the social as well as the financial needs of Canadian families and do what can be done to reduce and eventually eliminate the scourge of child poverty, a very real problem in Canada despite our nation's great wealth. The measure before us, taken together with other measures which consider the plight of the less privileged, will improve the social fabric of our country.

Therefore, I congratulate the hon. member for bringing this thoughtful motion before the House, and in the interest of those families most in need and of their school children's education, I urge all colleagues, particularly those on the government side which controls the majority, to allow speedy passage of this private members' motion in order to help Canadian families at the start of a new school year.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to respond to the motion by the hon. member for Abitibi which suggests that the government consider amending the Family Allowances Act to allow for the payment of family allowances in September of each year between the first and sixteenth day of the month. The government appreciates and shares the hon. member's concern that Canadian parents have access to their family allowances in time to help cover the costs which come at the start of a new school year. At the present time, from January to November, the family allowance cheques are delivered by the twentieth day of each month. The only exception is December, when the family allowance cheques are delivered by the fifteenth of the month to help parents with holiday season expenses on behalf of their children.

We have had a universal program of monthly allowances for parents with children which has served generations of Canadians for over 40 years. The government recognizes that the objective of the family allowance program is to help families with the cost of raising the nation's children. Our children are our most important resource. They are our future. Thus the family allowance program benefits all our society as it is an investment in the future of Canada.

Over the years, modifications and improvements have been made to the program culminating in the new Family Allowances Act which came into effect in 1974. Today, universal family allowances are payable each month on behalf of all dependent children under the age of 18. The amount of the 1990 monthly benefit is $33.33 for each dependent child. In Alberta and Quebec, the rate is different as those provinces have chosen to vary this rate according to the number of children in the family and/or their ages. In each month of 1990 the government is distributing 3.7 million cheques to families across Canada on behalf of approximately 6.6 million children.

In light of current socio-economic changes the government believes that the system of delivering child benefits must be reviewed periodically to ensure that the needs of Canadian families and their children be met. In 1984 the government began restructuring the over-all system for child benefits so that the greatest benefits go to children in low and middle income families. Effective January 1986 the family allowances were partially deindexed to the annual increase in the Consumer Price Index in excess of 3 per cent.

As a means of offsetting the impact of partial deindexation of family allowances on low and middle income families, the government substantially enriched the child tax credit. In 1990 the child tax credit provides a maximum benefit of $575 per child. The credit is payable to low and middle income family allowance recipients on behalf of dependent children under the age of 19. Beginning with the 1988 tax year, the child tax credit is available for children in the taxation year during which they turn 18. Prior to tax reform, the last year for which a credit was claimable was the tax year in which the child reached 17.

As part of the national strategy on child care, the child tax credit was increased for lower and middle income parents who care for their children at home or who may have non-registered child care expenses. The supplement, which is payable for a child age 6 and under, is $203 for the 1989 tax year. This new supplement represents an increase of nearly 40 per cent in the over-all value of the child tax credit for these children.

In November, 1986 the federal government began making an annual prepayment of, the child tax credit for low income families in order to assist with expenses during the winter months and to discourage use of tax discounters. In November, 1990 the prepayment of $383 or the basic credit and $135 for the supplement will be sent automatically to persons whose net family income for the 1989 tax year was $16,513 or less. In the 1990 budget the government proposes to extend the prepayment to families with three or more children, provided their income does not exceed $24,769 in 1990. This measure would affect 70,000 families with a total of 236,000 children.

• (1720)

Taken as a whole, the changes to child benefit have reduced benefits of higher income families but substantially increased the benefits for lower income families.

Thus the government is meeting its objective of directing more assistance to low income families through the child benefit system.

In addition to these improvements to the child benefit system, the government believes that the system of delivering child benefits must be reviewed to ensure that the system is keeping pace with new technology and that the system is adequately serving the changing needs of Canadian families and their children.

Thus, in 1989, the government initiated the income security programs branch redesign project. Within the broad scope of the project, family allowance processes and procedures are being redeveloped to make use of the new technology and improve program delivery to family allowance recipients. It is expected that the redesigned family allowance system will be in operation nationally later this summer.

I am pleased to inform the hon. member for Abitibi that his motion will be examined within the context of this redesign project.

There are, however, several important factors which should be given careful consideration before any action is taken on the hon. member's motion. First, the August and October cheques would be delivered at the usual time, the twentieth day of these months. Thus the family allowance recipients would in August and September receive two family allowance cheques within a three-week period and then have to wait approximately six weeks before receiving the October family allowance cheque. It is possible that the long delay between receipt of the September and October cheques could create financial hardship in some families. Given this and other concerns, as well as administrative and operational changes that would be required, the government will proceed with a detailed analysis of the motion.

Since I have the attention of the House, I appreciate the opportunity to inform hon. members that the government is taking advantage of advanced technology, as well as responding to the wishes of a significant number of Canadians, by introducing a direct deposit service for persons receiving a federal government benefit. In 1990 persons receiving federal income security benefits such as old age security pension, Canada Pension Plan benefits, and family allowances can use the direct deposit service. Because some Canadians prefer to receive a cheque in hand, the direct deposit service is voluntary. Those who do not use the direct deposit service can have their family allowances cheque deposited with the financial institution of their choice.

There are many direct and indirect advantages to the direct deposit service. We all know how difficult it can be at times to get to our financial institution of choice to cash or deposit a cheque. With the direct deposit service such concerns are eliminated.

For example, the family allowances cheque is deposited on the due date directly to the recipient's account, thus eliminating a trip to the financial institution. Another important factor is that the funds begin to earn interest immediately. With a customer card, withdrawals can be made at the recipient's convenience.

Direct deposit eliminates the possibility of a family allowances cheque being lost, stolen, or misdirected. The direct deposit service also ensures that family allowance cheques are deposited during periods of illness—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the member's attempt to have regulations as they relate to the Family Allowances Act amended.

I want to read very carefully the substance of the motion because I think it ought to draw to the attention of many members some of the underlying concerns of Canadians with regard to the public policies that this government has been pursuing.

The second part of the motion states:

> —to allow monthly benefits for the month of September of each year to be paid for each eligible child after the first but before the sixteenth day of September, in order to help Canadian families financially at the start of a new school year.

I would think most members would want to concur with anything that can be done to assist in a meaningful way families in terms of raising their children and in providing the necessities for life. We have to ask what the fundamental concerns that we on this side of the House, as well as government members, have toward some of the public policies being initiated by the government and/or the lack of good public policies.

I make mention of one policy for which I am the critic responsible, namely child care. We have heard over and over again by this government in throne speeches in 1984 and 1988, in statements by the Prime Minister, in subsequent statements by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and by almost every conceivable agent of the Government of Canada that they were very concerned with child care, only to find that those statements were not acted upon.

In point of fact the concerns with regard to child care have been pushed aside. As a result many Canadian families do not have appropriate, high quality child care, nor do they have access to it.

The substance of the motion put forward by my colleague, the member for Abitibi, should be clear to all of us. Yes, we can change regulations. It may be helpful. I do not doubt that it would be helpful to those individuals. We ought to draw to the attention of Canadians, particularly ministers opposite on the front bench, that there are far-reaching and important concerns which must be addressed in addition to changing a particular regulation.

It should be noted that the number of one-parent families has increased significantly over the last 25 years. The majority are headed by women, and increasingly young women. Canada is on a steady course toward more single heads of families. By 1991, almost 15 per cent of families will be headed by one parent. Of these, 80 per cent will be women.

There are more than one million Canadian children living in poverty, up 120,000 since 1980, and over 60 per cent of these children are led by single parent families, most of whom are women.

It should be noted that this motion hopes to change a regulation in order that family allowances be paid at the start of the school year. I have no difficulties with that, but would it not be nicer and more beneficial to Canadian families if the government to which the hon. member belongs were to stop immediately the proliferation of taxes on families? Mr. Speaker, you are going to say: "Well, you know you cannot stop all taxes". Let us recall that this is the government that preached fiscal responsibility and to date has introduced no less than 37 tax increases, many of which have affected low and middle income Canadians in an extremely negative way.

• (1730)

I bring to the attention of the House, as has been done on previous occasions, particularly by my colleague from New Brunswick who has alluded to and provided empirical evidence for the Minister of Finance, that the proposed goods and services tax which is to take effect in 1991 will have a disastrous effect on Canadian families.

Yes, members opposite will be quick to stand in their place and say: "Oh, yes, but there are tax credits for some of the poor people," et cetera. The fact of the matter is the goods and services tax is a mean, discriminatory tax which will affect Canadian families, one-parent families, in a most drastic and negative way. I stand here before you, Mr. Speaker, and I know that you concur with me, because many times you have alluded to in this House and have demonstrated your keen ability for good judgment, sound basic economic principles and objectivity.

This regulation is good and I support the regulation. Surely members opposite ought to take their responsibility seriously and question the Prime Minister and members of their own cabinet on some of the most discriminatory, negative economic policies affecting Canadian families today in the history of this country.

They have an obligation not only to stand in their places as the hon. member for Abitibi is doing. They ought to support that. Equally so, I would urge them to join with us in pointing out to the government that some of their economic measures are not acceptable to Canadian families.

The Established Programs Financing Act—

Mrs. Dobbie: Tell us about it.

Mr. Dingwall: I will tell the hon. member about it if she would like to hear about it. Perhaps, the hon. member will become enlightened and thereafter make some positive contribution to the public policy debate in this country, namely the following.

The hon. member sits in her place in the Chamber at $62,000 a year, $18,000 in tax-free allowance or $20,000, the same as I, and has the unmitigated gall to question those poor souls in those poor provinces who will be receiving less from the Government of Canada respectively.

Maybe the concerns of the hon. member opposite are not for the poor janitor who works in a hospital, who is a single parent and has to provide sneakers and drugs for his or her children. That is not a concern of members of the Conservative government, not at all.

Therefore, when they slash us back on transfer payments, albeit in the provinces of Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Newfoundland, it is not a great concern to hon. members opposite. It is a great concern to the individual Canadian who has been receiving less as a result of those policies made opposite and who will continue to receive less as a result of the proliferation of taxes and cut-backs instituted by the government opposite.

There are many, many instances where this government has singled out one-parent families, young families, and low to middle income Canadians. As a result of those policies it has been very negative in terms of the economic and social outlook to which those people have to look forward.

As I stand in my place and support the pith and substance of what the hon. member is suggesting, I would hope that it would give due consideration to the many unrelenting attacks of the Prime Minister and the Conservative government against families in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps there might be a disposition in the House or unanimous consent for me to continue.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am quite surprised at the comments of the last member who just spoke.

I have been here since 1980. I do not know how many years he has been here, but I know he was here and had an opportunity to sit in government. It is very easy to sit here today and criticize the initiatives of the government, but at least we are taking action and doing something by providing programs for the people of this great country. From children of all ages, right through to our seniors; every aspect of livelihood is assisted in this country. This member sat here in government. I do not recall his party bringing in one initiative to help young people or seniors in the period of time that I was here from 1980 to 1984. I am surprised to hear him criticize the government.

I want to go back and deal with the amendment that my hon. colleague has brought before us today. I compliment him on what he has already done. He has brought forward an opportunity for discussion and to take a good look at the cheques being mailed and the family services being provided to young people and parents to help them at a very needy time.

In the context of this interesting and thoughtful suggestion, I would like to discuss some of the current initiatives of the federal government in the area of improvements and delivery of social benefits to Canadians.

As hon. members are aware, family allowances are administered by the Income Security Programs Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The ISP Branch, which also operates the old age security program and the Canada Pension Plan, is the government's major agency for issuing benefit cheques to millions of Canadians every year.

Indeed there are few Canadians whose lives are not somehow touched by the ISP. There are, of course, the mothers who receive family allowances on behalf of their children, the workers and employers who make regular contributions to the Canada Pension Plan, the seniors who receive CPP retirement pensions, as well as old age security benefits, the lower income pensioners who receive payments under the guaranteed income supplement and spouses allowance programs, the surviving spouses who receive CPP survivor benefits, and the disabled Canadians who receive disability pensions from the CPP.

Most Canadians would be less aware of the vigorous client services, delivery and redesign initiatives currently under way at the Income Security Programs Branch. These have been specifically undertaken to streamline and fully modernize the branch's over-all operations. I do not believe we have to take a back seat to anyone or any country in the world in the support of these programs.

The focus and commitment of the ISP redesign project is to implement the optimum level of service for clients in terms of accurate, timely and regular delivery of benefits.

The ISP redesign project is being undertaken as a joint enterprise between the Departments of Health and Welfare and Supply and Services, with additional participation from Revenue Canada Taxation, Veterans Affairs and Treasury Board. Now just look at the changes, Mr. Speaker. We will get into that some day when we talk about changes we have made to veterans programs.

Treasury Board has now allocated $7.9 million for resources to develop a comprehensive business strategy expressly for the redevelopment of the delivery processes for income security programs.

This redevelopment is now well under way. Following a rigorous evaluation, the federal government selected KPMG Peat Marwick to develop several key components in the new ISP business strategy. Among these components are a business solution which deals with how income security programs should be delivered in the future, the business change plans which deal with how to arrive at this future and at what cost, and the related business case documents and impact assessments.

In addition to the business strategy, resources have been made available to develop a comprehensive communications strategy, which will directly prepare ISP for future change, will assess and validate emerging details of the business strategy, and will provide additional support as required. The business strategy phase is expected to be completed by March, 1991, that is by the end of the current fiscal year. This will be followed by a general design phase to be carried out at the same time as preparation of the Treasury Board submission for the final detailed design, development and implementation phases.

In order to establish the general direction and philosophy for the redesign of the income security client services delivery processes, the Department of National Health and Welfare has completed a vision for income security programs. This was done in consultation and co-operation with other federal departments involved in the policy for and delivery of income security benefits of all kinds for Canadians.

The vision will guide all subsequent developmental work and will explicitly and intimately shape the eventual business solution and business change plans. These will be concerned with such specific dimensions as human resources organization, work processes and functions, management processes, technical support systems, facilities infrastructure, and of course actual legislation, policy and regulations. Copies of this vision document are available for review by members.

I realize that some hon. members may ask: Can this wide-ranging exercise translate into real progress and tangible improvements that are directly helpful to ordinary Canadians in all walks of life?

In the vision for ISP it is emphasized that within Canada's over-all system of social programs the mandate of the ISP branch directly encompasses a strong leadership role in the evolution and delivery of the entire nation's social security policies, reflecting the spirit of democracy at its most vigorous and salutary. The income security programs branch provides benefits to Canadians in the form of direct income and thereby illustrates Canada's elemental respect for each individual's rights to exercise personal discretion in determining the most appropriate use of such income to enhance his or her life or the lives of others.

You will see in the vision a strong recognition that clients are the reason for income security programs' existence. The administration of the programs must always be seen by clients as accessible and knowledgeable, respectful and efficient, and the delivery of the benefits must meet client expectations.

In summary, I wish to assure the hon. member for Abitibi that his motion for earlier family allowance payments during September is of direct interest to the government. We will be pleased to examine his proposal in the broader context of income security programs and redesign initiatives.

As I have been discussing, the federal government fully recognizes its direct, active commitment to the people of Canada to ensure sensitive, timely and efficient delivery of their benefits, not only under family allowances but under all income security programs which play a major role in the economic well-being of all Canadians.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the remarks of some of our colleagues today. I want to take a moment to congratulate the member for Abitibi for having proposed this motion. Of course I would be remiss if I did not mention the excellent remarks of my colleague from Cape Breton only a few moments ago as well.

I listened to the member who just spoke and gave his remarks my undivided attention. I listened to him spell out all the acronyms of the different subdepartments of the Department of National Health and Welfare which is administering this program.

He told us about how the department administered this, how the officials of the department were doing such a great job, and what department administered old age pensions as well as family allowances and so on. After listening to him for the 10 minutes allotted to him, I still do not know whether he was in favour or against the idea. After all, most of us listened to the hon. member's words of wisdom in order to figure out whether he liked or disliked the proposition set forth by our colleague.

Let us review for a moment what it is that our colleague wants. He said in his motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the regulations made under the Family Allowances Act to allow monthly benefits for the month of September of each year to be paid for each eligible child after the first but before the sixteenth day of September, in order to help Canadian families financially at the start of a new school year.

To some people, perhaps the amount that is derived from family allowances would be considered small. It is not a very big cheque. But for many of the constituents whom I represent, it makes quite a difference to be able to receive that cheque. It would make quite a difference during the month of September particularly when parents are struggling, single parent families and others, who are trying to make ends meet. They are trying to send the children to school.

I am sure that to be able to get that cheque earlier in September would be of tremendous significance.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is also a precedent. We know that, in the month of December, family allowances cheques are sent earlier to help parents, particularly mothers since the cheques are generally made out to them, buy what they need for the Christmas season.

The same thing applies to September with the start of the school year. I think that for some of my constituents who do not have as much money as some others, it would make a big difference if they were to receive that cheque at the beginning of the month. That would allow them to buy a new pair of shoes, a new schoolbag or anything else the children need to start the school year.

So I personnally congratulate my colleague for his initiative. I could also say a few words about this government's policy and orientation regarding family allowances and the fact that we are now faced with the deindexing of these benefits.

However, I will not get into that today, for two reasons: First, I do not want to diminish the excellent suggestion made by the hon. member opposite, and second, I think you will understand that because of this bad cold, I would rather not speak any longer than I have to. That is probably partly why the rest of my comments will be brief.

Suffice it to say, Mr. Speaker, that I support this motion, and I can inform you that as far as the people of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell are concerned, in areas of high unemployment—that applies to my riding, especially in the eastern part of the riding but also elsewhere—this initiative would make a big difference to our families.

I therefore urge hon. members to think about this proposal and support this motion. Of course, all we want is to see it passed. The motion is in no way binding on the government, and departmental officials who advise the minister on family allowance might consider the excellent ideas put forward by the hon. member and the entire House. If the minister so wishes, a study could be made by a parliamentary committee, but I don't think that will be necessary.

The procedure is quite simple. In fact, it is already being applied, as I said earlier, in December. So let's have it apply to September as well. Let us help young people, mothers and single parent families during the month of September.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, since the people in charge have already been advised of its existence, if this motion is passed today, the system could be in place by this coming September.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1750)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question arose from news that shellfish harvesting had been closed down near a number of pulp mills on the west coast due to the levels of toxic materials found to be in certain sea animals.

Pollution is not a new issue and yet it is relatively new in what people recognize as pollution.

I was a member of the B.C. provincial legislature when the very first legislation in that province was introduced to control pollution. At the time one of my colleagues, the New Democrat member for Mackenzie, Tony Gargrave, asked why the legislation was not dealing with air pollution as well as water pollution.

Of course the government members laughed at him. It was a ridiculous idea that we should be interested in or concerned about air pollution. In the first place it was not important. In the second place nothing could be done about it. That was just some 25 years ago. We have come a long way since.

The chronology of events I want to talk about this afternoon starts with the closure of two pulp mills on the west coast, the Howe Sound pulp mill and one at Prince Rupert. The prawn and shrimp fisheries were closed because of the level of dioxins and furans found to be in those particular shellfish.

There is no word that anything was done to the pulp mills. They continued to throw millions of gallons of effluent containing goodness only knows what kind of chemicals into the ocean.

The belief even at that time was that the ocean had an inexhaustible ability to absorb almost anything that was dumped into it, whether it was industrial pollution, natural pollution, or whether it was human pollution of one kind or another. Human waste, anything like that could be just dumped into the ocean and we could forget about it. We need not worry about it any more. That was the end of it.

By 1988 the realization that we could be hurting ourselves—quite apart from what it was doing to sea life—by continuing to consume prawns and shrimp that were growing too close to pulp mills that were considered to be damaging the environment.

At that time, and perhaps even today, we do not really know how bad any of these chemicals are. Assumptions are made, and there has been some evidence that certain of them are extremely dangerous, but I do not know that the case has really been proven.

However, we are making an attempt to clean up our act. In particular we are trying to force pulp mills to clean up the water they are dumping into the Straits of Georgia. But even beyond that, we want to find out how much damage the effluent is doing and trying to find ways to control and reduce it short of totally shutting down industry.

The Environment Canada report dated July, 1988—it was not revealed publicly until Greenpeace managed to get a copy of it leaked to them—said there were 83 out of 122 pulp mills in Canada that were dumping more toxic waste into the ocean or into the waterways of Canada than was allowed by federal standards.

Again, we should have realized that we had to do something about these federal standards, finding out whether or not they were real standards and whether they should be observed, how dangerous they were, and also obliging the offending pulp mills to do something about it.

November 24, 1989 was when I raised this matter in the House. At that time the minister said that "new and tough regulations would be enacted this year and letters would be sent to all the companies across Canada notifying them" of the new regulations.

That was 1989. To the best of my knowledge, if it has happened I have not seen it. These new tough regulations have yet to be issued. Nevertheless there have been some moves to tighten up on procedures.

On December 5, 1989 there was a leaked memo from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, from their own staff saying, among other things, that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans was closing its eyes to flagrant disobedience of regulations. It stated, "We have determined that DFO friendly corporations are parties with provincial permits, as well as the B.C. agency issuing the permit that allowed the offence will enjoy relative immunity from the Fisheries Act."

Mr. Speaker, we have not come very far and we have a long way to go. The Green Plan discussions that are currently under way, are criticized because the regulations have yet to be tabled and the Green Plan does not really have any plan for the future. On June 7, 1990, just this month, we were told, and this is after the two years work on this, that the pollution levels of 14 of B.C.'s 23 pulp mills are still greater than the provincial levels allow. As I said, we do not know how bad they are.

I consume crabs regularly on New Year's Day, it is something that is done in Nanaimo. The longshoremen get together and harvest crabs right at the pulp mill outfall and they grow best and biggest there. But are they safe to eat? No one has told us. When the shellfish harvesting was closed on the west coast, no one said how dangerous this food was. We were not told whether we could continue eating what was on the grocery shelves or what we had in our kitchens. There was no information at all, the beds were closed, no more fishing. What does one do with what you have already fished?

We have a lot to learn about these products and about the effect and danger of them. Beyond that, when we suspect there is a problem, then it is up to us to impose regulations and to make sure that the regulations are enforced. As I say, short of shutting down industry—and I know they are spending $1 billion currently to clean up their act—let's keep the pressure on to make sure that we protect ourselves and everyone depending upon us for that kind of protection.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, Environment Canada has recently completed nation-wide consultations with stakeholders on proposed dioxin and furan regulations, the thrust of which is to achieve the virtual elimination of dioxin and furan discharges from pulp and paper mills.

This is an important regulatory proposal which impacts not only on the environment but also on the food chain because marine species such as shellfish can ingest and accumulate contaminants such as dioxins and furans with subsequent public health consequences.

In fact, the Department of National Health and Welfare has, from time to time, issued advisory statements concerning dioxin and furan levels in shellfish from certain locations in Canada, notably in British Columbia. In light of the proposed regulations, it is important for people to know some facts about these substances so that they can appreciate the potential impact of proposed Environment Canada regulations.

The term dioxin, for example, does not refer to one compound but rather, to a whole family of 75 related chemical compounds. These 75 compounds are also often associated with another family of organochlorine compounds known as furans. There are an additional 135 related, yet individual, compounds in the furan family.

In test animals, dioxins and furans have produced a number of adverse health effects including cancer and birth defects. Impacts vary widely from species to species. In humans who have been accidentally exposed to these compounds, only one adverse health effect has been consistently observed; a skin condition called chloracne. This condition, which resembles acne, usually disappears soon after the affected person ceases to be in contact with the contaminant.

Nevertheless, the lack of evidence that dioxins and furans contribute to human health problems does not eliminate the need for further study and control of these undesirable substances. Our aim is to reduce the potential for exposure to the lowest level achievable. The proposed regulation by Environment Canada to reduce the presence of dioxins and furans to non-measurable quantities in final effluents will certainly add rigour to this aim and we will see that the new regulations are strictly enforced. In fact, the Minister of the Environment announced last week in Edmonton that $50 million and 200 person-years would be added to his department's enforcement program.

By way of background, one might ask how scientists assessed the potential health risks associated with exposure to such compounds. An example using the food supply might be illustrative of the process.

• (1800)

The first step is to determine the quantity of the chemicals that humans can consume on a daily basis over a lifetime, with reasonable assurance that their health will not be threatened. This quantity, which is called the tolerable daily intake, or TDI, is based on studies carried out on laboratory animals, and takes into account data from human exposure incidents and is determined using appropriate safety factors.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. parliamentary secretary's time has expired. The hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to deal again with the question that I raised on Monday, June 18. That question had to do with the whole issue arising from the treatment of co-operatives under the GST.

It is becoming obvious to all Canadians and probably to the government as well that the GST, if nothing else, is a big can of worms and that the more the government attempts to scoop up the worms, the more they seem to be crawling away. One of the big worms that seems to have crawled away is the whole question of how the GST will be applied to the share capital of co-operative organizations in this country. Will co-ops be placed at a serious competitive disadvantage vis-à-vis other businesses, or will they have a level playing field to operate on?

Twelve million Canadians belong to approximately 60,000 co-ops across this country. The co-ops differ in size, in their nature, and in the things they do. There are consumer co-ops, housing co-ops, farm product, marketing and worker co-ops, health co-ops, and co-ops in many other sectors of the economy. They have been a very important factor in building up some of the regions of the country which often do not enjoy the economic benefits that other parts of the country do and often they are the last business organizations to stay in those communities.

The common denominator of co-ops is twofold: One is that it is one member, one vote and it is democratically controlled; second, the equity that runs these co-ops that makes it possible for them to operate comes from the members. In other words, co-ops are grassroots people pooling their resources in order to help do something for themselves, something even the hardest Tory heart should be able to welcome.

With respect to the GST, the co-operative system has the normal concerns that any business organization has regarding that tax, the difficulties in applying it, what would be included, and the accounting nightmares. However, it recently seemed to surface, somehow or other they communicated with the gnomes in the Department of Finance, that in fact there might be a much more serious implication for co-operative organizations. That was the Department of Finance's threat to treat the equity, the investment that people had in their co-operatives, as if it were a membership fee, as if it were the equivalent of taking out a membership in a golf club, fitness club, a cosmopolitan club, or whatever, and that these were not to be treated as equity investments, but rather as memberships.

This creates a very serious disadvantage to co-operative organizations because no other businesses have their equity investment taxed in this kind of way.

These investments take many different forms. They range from initial investments which people make in their co-operatives. In some co-operatives it is an initial $5 investment, all the way to tens of thousands of dollars in worker co-ops where a group of workers are getting together to set up a business which they themselves will run.

There are ongoing investments of several dollars a month that take place in direct charge to co-ops which gradually builds up equity. Then there is the whole business of the dividend that people enjoy from the profits of their co-operatives being reinvested in share capital in those co-ops. This can amount to huge sums of money. Even in my own case, it was not a huge sum of money, but $600 was enjoyed by our family in dividend from our co-op. With what the government is proposing, that $600 would now be subject to the GST. If we invested that $600 in any other business, it would not be taxed. It obviously puts a co-operative at an automatic 7 per cent disadvantage vis-à-vis its competition.

Nation-wide, the numbers are actually quite staggering. The co-op system enjoys approximately $1 billion in dividends every year in direct equity investment which would mean that there would be a $70 million loss under the GST.

The co-op sectors had a number of meetings with the Department of Finance and the government, making three arguments essentially. First of all, that dividends are taxed as if they are investment, they are not taxed as membership. There is no tax on membership actually, but dividends are taxed as an investment.

Second, they are treated as investment on the balance sheets of co-operatives under standard accounting practices. Third, the Canadian Co-operatives Associations Act very clearly defines the share capital as being similar in nature to a financial transaction like any other share purchase. These are all very clear in the law. It seems that the people who are defining these things in the government have not yet realized that.

Furthermore, there are several other problems. Obviously, they do not understand the bottom-up nature of co-operatives. Co-op Atlantic, which raised this issue with me, says it will cost them $640,000 for the bottom-up structural problems. Together with the other problems, it is going to cost them $1.6 million, 40 per cent of their equity.

The government must deal with this immediately, because if it does not it means one of two things. Either it does not understand how the co-op structure works, or it is actively discouraging the formation of co-operatives as a matter of public policy. Either one of those is unacceptable. The co-ops are asking for a level playing field and the government needs to respond quickly so that the co-ops can get on with dealing with the other problems that the GST causes them.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Canadian co-operatives maintain their membership as a source of share capital and, as such, should not be subject to GST.

As you know, my colleague the Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) stated in the House on June 18 that the Department of Finance would discuss implementation of the GST with co-op members as soon as representations on their positions were received. The Department received the briefs only a week ago, and in fact, one of the key representations, the brief by the Atlantic Co-operative, did not arrive until yesterday.

Departmental officials—and I am sure the hon. member will be glad to hear this—have started a study of these various documents and are to continue their discussions with the co-ops in the very near future.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I rise one more time. I would think that this means that on 40, 50, probably 60 different occasions, I have raised this very same issue. It is an issue that I have raised in Question Period on dozens of occasions, in so-called late shows such as we are involved in right now, in committees, and in this chamber alone 40 or 50 times. You know what it is, Mr. Speaker. It is fish, or more to the point, it is the devastation and the havoc that the lack of fish is creating in the inshore fishery, what we call the hook and line fishery along the southwest coast of Newfoundland, in Fortune Bay, in the Port-au-Port Peninsula, Baie St. George area and to a degree in Placentia Bay, insofar as my riding is concerned. That is where the havoc is most complete. That is where the people are suffering the most.

Why are they suffering? Because they are too lazy to get up in the morning and go fishing? Not quite. Each day during the winter fishery and during the summer fishery these people have done what they have done and their people before them, literally, for five centuries.

The night before they get their baited gear ready and early in the morning while most of us are still in the middle of a night's nap, at three o'clock in the morning, they get out of bed. Men with their wives in many cases both go fishing, or two brothers or two neighbours or three or four people. Anywhere from one to three or four people go out in those small, open boats. They go anywhere from a couple of miles to 10, 12 or 15 miles offshore. For several hours they catch fish, or that is what they used to do. Now they go out and they put down their baited gear and they do not catch any fish, because the fish are not there. You cannot catch it twice. If the French, for example, in 3PS, in the area of Fortune Bay near the St. Pierre and Miquelon Islands, have already caught the fish because they have been over-fishing, with the silent blessing of this government over the past five or six years, it cannot be caught a second time.

• (1810)

That is only part of the problem. In part of that coast the problem is foreign over-fishing. There are other problems on other parts of the coast. But let me bring you, Mr. Speaker, to the result of those problems. Let me tell you something about the havoc that is being created by the shortage of fish and, as I say, a problem not created by the fishermen themselves. They, with good intention and with deliberate effort and much sacrifice still go out in the morning, still bait their gear, still spend their scarce money to buy gas and bait. Indeed, they are now spending more to prepare for the fishery than they are taking in in terms of the number of fish they are catching.

I gave you previously, Mr. Speaker, an example. It is one of many dozens of examples I could quote but because this one is so graphic and in such simple terms it drives home the magnitude of the problem.

In the community of Rose Blanche on the south west coast of Newfoundland there are 147 licensed inshore hook and line fishermen. In the winter fishery, the three-month period, January, February, March, 1987, these people landed four million pounds. This year, during the same period, the same number of people landed fewer that 200 pounds of fish. Not enough to pay their expenses let alone to pay the mortgage, the loan on the boat, buy groceries and to meet other family financial commitments.

That is not an isolated case. That story can be repeated in La Poile, Grand Bruit, Petites, Isle aux Morts, Burnt Islands, Fox Roost and Margaree. I could mention literally dozens of other communities up around the Codroy Valley, Bay St. George, down the coast from Burgeo east into Hermitage Bay, Fortune Bay, Placentia Bay. The story is the same everywhere.

For months we have been calling on this government to respond to that particular need. Lest there be confusion, the government has responded on another matter, the matter of the offshore fishery as it relates to places like Gaultois, Grand Bank in my riding, and Trepassey in the riding of the Minister for International Trade.

There is another need that has been completely ignored and nothing has been done about it. People do not have income. They have run out of UI and cannot qualify for more UI. They are hurting down there, I say to the minister. They are hurting, and you cannot buy groceries on hurt, on pain. If they could, their larders, their kitchens, their refrigerators, their cupboards would be full.

So far the minister is turning a deaf ear. If the minister responsible for UI, the minister of Employment and Immigration, had her way it would seem to me that every single community would be shut down and they would all be moved to Toronto. Well that is not what they want. They need some assistance from her and from him to tide them over until the stocks rebuild.

These people are part of and contributors to a way of life that has existed for many years, a culture all its own. Help them preserve it. Help them keep body and soul together. Help them keep their families together. Help them to cling to their communities until the stocks rebuild, if we are to believe the Minister of Fisheries, until the good times come back again. Help them bridge the gap. That is all we are asking the Minister of Fisheries. Not to wave magic wands. To do what his government has already done for the farmers of western Canada many times over, to do what his government has already done for the deep sea people, the trawler people and the people who work in those deep sea plants and come up with that kind of a program or, failing that, an extension of UI benefits, some ad hoc arrangement that will get these people over the hump. I tell you, it is quite a hump for those people and you would know how big a hump it is, Mr. Speaker, if you were there.

They are hurting. They cannot keep body and soul together. They are calling on this government to prove it has some soul, some compassion. I ask the minister now, will he not take this case back to cabinet one more time and make the case of the people of Rose Blanche and those other communities that I could mention throughout my riding. These people, through no fault of their own, are having one very rough time as my letters, telephone calls and people in my riding tell me literally every day of the week.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would just like first to say that the Government of Canada shares the concern of the various communities which have recently experienced the closure of their fish processing plants. As the hon. member has indicated, why they have closed is because of the lack of fish.

We also know that many resource industries in this country have had to experience cycles and there are ups and downs in the prices of their products. We know that from September to December, 1989 a large number of workers were laid off in the mining, forestry and petroleum industries in Canada as well.

We know that the fishing industry is also subject to cycles, as well as to market fluctuations. It is an unpredictable business to be in as well because the nature of the resource base itself makes it unpredictable. The fish companies can only partially cope with this instability through diversification of fish supply.

In periods of severe downturn, fish companies have to close plants just to survive, which is very unfortunate. When a fish plant is closed, the lack of economic alternatives in many coastal communities in Atlantic Canada makes the impact of these decisions especially difficult.

We know that sometimes plant closures allow companies to save operating costs by diverting the production to another plant that they might have somewhere else in the area, which can help them because they know that in all these plants they have fixed costs such as hydro, maintenance, insurance. Those are incurred regardless of the volume of fish that is received at that plant.

The alternative of keeping all the plants open would result in a lower standard of living for many of those people in those areas. That is not a picture of an industry which could be self-sustaining if that happened.

To wind up, Mr. Speaker, for these reasons, and what the hon. member has just brought to our attention again, as I will agree he has done many times, the government recently announced a $584 million adjustment package for the Atlantic fisheries. More specifically, it contains a Plant Workers Adjustment Program to provide further benefits to plant workers and trawlermen who have lost their jobs.

Furthermore, $146 million is being provided to foster the economic diversification within the fisheries and promote alternate employment in the areas affected by reductions in quotas and stock depletion.

As the hon. member has said, what we have often done for agriculture in Canada, we hope we can assist fisheries in the same fashion.

LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF QUEBEC

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Conservative Senator Martial Asselin was appointed Lieutenant Governor of Quebec by Prime Minister Brian Mulroney.

Mr. Asselin is from La Malbaie. A lawyer by training, he was educated at Laval University. He was elected member of Parliament for Charlevoix in the general elections of 1958, 1965 and 1968, and was appointed to the Senate in 1972.

He has represented Canada at a number of international conferences. In 1988, he was elected President of the International Association of French-Speaking Parliamentarians. He was Minister of Forestry under John Diefenbaker in 1963 and was appointed Minister of State for the Canadian International Development Agency and La Francophonie in 1979. He was Mayor of La Malbaie from 1957 to 1963.

Mr. Speaker, we are all proud of this appointment. When he was member of Parliament for the riding of Charlevoix, Mr. Asselin defended most effectively both the interests of his constituents and the demands of Quebec.

DUBIN INQUIRY

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the previous Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport said in April, 1989 that only "the federal government will decide whether to allow Ben Johnson to run for Canada again". Conversely, Recommendation 7 in Justice Dubin's report states: "Decisions on eligibility for competition remain a function of the sport governing bodies themselves. While the federal government can and should reserve the right to determine what individuals and bodies receive government funding, it is not appropriate for the Government of Canada to determine who is eligible to compete in either domestic or international competition".

[Translation]

I hope the minister responsible will accept Chief Justice Charles Dubin's recommendation that decisions on eligibility for competition remain a function of the sport-governing bodies themselves. While the federal government can and should reserve the right to determine what individuals and bodies receive government funding, it is not appropriate for the Government of Canada to determine who is eligible to compete in either domestic or international competition.

Our athletes and sport organizations are now waiting to see if the new Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport will follow Justice Dubin's recommendations.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House I raised questions with respect to the Hibernia bill. Later I left the House and in the lobby made remarks which, upon reflection, are totally unnecessary, unacceptable and I want to withdraw them completely.

I made reference to members of the government and specifically to the Prime Minister. I mentioned other times and other politics in the history of the world which no member of this House should be associated with. I refer specifically to the word "Nazi" and other references.

The emotion that I feel with respect to the issue yesterday is genuine, but no amount of emotion warrants those kinds of words. I want to withdraw them totally and to apologize completely and absolutely and without reservation to the Prime Minister or anybody else who felt offended by those words.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the Minister of Justice for her action yesterday in introducing a comprehensive package to strengthen control of guns in Canada.

The new laws will make it tougher to obtain a firearm licence and will provide tighter screening for people who want to own guns. Also, applicants will be required to pass a firearm's safety exam.

The import and possession of fully automatic firearms converted to fire in a semi-automatic mode will be banned in Canada and anyone convicted will face up to five years in prison.

Stiffer sentencing is essential to reduce attacks and murders by criminals because, in the past, sentencing was very poor and minimal.

The consultation process will continue. A committee of Parliament will meet this summer to hear recommendations for improvements from all interested parties.

This summer I will be convening a town hall meeting to hear the views of the residents of Markham and Whitchurch—Stouffville to ensure a balanced approach, an approach that recognizes the rights of responsible and legitimate firearm owners, while at the same time deals harshly with criminals, gun dealers and others using or trading illegal or unauthorized firearms.

HOUSING

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, misleading media statements, echoed by the Minister of State for Housing who ought to know better, have implied that co-operatives are the only type of housing subsidized by the federal government. That is not true.

The great majority of subsidized housing starts in the past 20 years were for owner-occupied homes or for apartments built for private profit.

Since 1969, home owners have received exemption from capital gains tax when selling their principal residence. This costs the government four times as much in one year as did all public, non-profit, co-op and private housing.

Developers of hundreds of thousands of luxury apartments received a total of $4 billion or $5 billion subsidy. On one Bay Street building, Cadillac received over $4 million subsidy, on another, Tridel received over $7 million in interest free loans for 15 years.

Compared to this, the 62,500 co-op units built in Canada are modest buildings providing a friendly community of affordable housing for all classes of people.

TRIBUTE TO PRIME MINISTER

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, although the demise of Meech Lake leaves a bitter after-taste, I feel very strongly that I must take this opportunity to reaffirm my steadfast support for my Prime Minister who, since 1984, has worked unceasingly to promote the interests of Quebec and Canada. As the tireless artisan of reconciliation, he has earned the respect and admiration of all Quebecers.

More than ever before, nationalist Quebec members have their place in this government, a government that is tolerant and open to Quebec. They are needed to protect Quebec's higher interests and to explain Quebec to Canadians.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to announce a new feature in the corporate welfare bum of the week award.

This week a special presentation is being made to Edgar and Peter Bronfmann and their many holdings. Mr. Speaker, you have heard of frequent fliers. Well, the Bronfmann's have the special honour of being frequent corporate welfare bum winners.

Not only did they have such runners-up as Trizec and Bramalea, but they also have taken top honours with Brascan and Edpar Limited.

Today, we add their sister holding company, Brascade Limited. It made $64 million in profit in 1988 and, like its sibling companies, did not pay a penny in taxes.

Let's show our appreciation to the Bronfmanns for their frequent appearance in the corporate welfare bum of the week awards.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, barring any last minute snags, we parliamentarians may be beginning our summer recess in just a matter of hours from now.

I want to take this opportunity to urge the Minister of Justice to come to grips with the David Milgaard case. This man has been behind bars for 21 years for a murder that he possibly never committed. For 21 years he has not confessed to the murder and for 21 years he has been denied parole.

About 18 months ago, the Milgaard family lawyer made an application to the justice department to reopen the case, and for 18 months the Minister of Justice has done more or less nothing. In that time, star witnesses for the Crown have changed their stories and there have been two prominent forensic reports casting doubt on the only physical evidence that linked Mr. Milgaard with the crime scene.

I urge the Minister of Justice to take action now. No more stalling. Do not try our patience any more. This case screams out for action and it screams out for action now.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): "Let us avoid living in or falling into over-narrow provincialism; let us work for the good functioning of the federal system, and let us gain confidence by sharing in our common government. Let us preach by our acts more than by our words".

Mr. Speaker, those patriotic words were spoken almost a century ago by an illustrious proponent of federalism, Henri Bourassa.

Today, let it be said that Liberals are committed to building a united country, and we have taken the first step by electing Jean Chrétien as our leader.

As a federalist, Mr. Chrétien represents the vision of other Liberal leaders who have brought together our founding nations through understanding and accommodating their mutual aspirations by the balancing of interests of individuals and society, regions and the nation.

Now is the time for members of Parliament to look to the future and a united Canada in which our children can grow in the knowledge that their leaders have the best interests of the nation at heart.

To the Prime Minister I say, faults are the easiest things to find. Answers are the true test of leadership.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, with the high unemployment in the riding of Timiskaming, the people of Kirkland Lake have been given a second chance. The Minister of Veterans Affairs announced earlier this year that the Ontario regional office would be relocated to Kirkland Lake, creating 180 new positions. Many spin-off jobs will result and they are welcome to the area.

Other initiatives have recently been announced to assist veterans throughout Canada: an agreement for 200 new long-term hospital beds in British Columbia; services under the Veterans Independence Program for one year for spouses of deceased veterans; increased income protection for spouses of veterans in long-term care institutions; the payment of interest for the first time on trust funds administered by Veterans Affairs; a special trust fund for needy veterans; payment of attendance allowance for one year to spouses of certain veterans; and, finally, the raising of the ceiling for funeral assistance.

This government recognizes the sacrifices of its veterans and places their need for program enhancements as a top priority to maintain what we all recognize as the delivery of benefits second to none in the world.

MINING

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, over the past year, 1,500 jobs have been lost in the mining industry in several communities in northeastern Ontario. During the next 12 months, we face the loss of over 2,400 mining jobs in Elliot Lake with the closure of the Quirke and Panel Mines and the cut-backs at Denison Mines.

It is essential that the federal government put in place a new system of incentives to promote mine exploration to ensure the future viability of the mining industry in northeastern Ontario.

More important is the desperate need of the federal government to put in place a comprehensive action plan to assist the community of Elliot Lake and the north shore communities to reduce the adverse impacts of the massive lay-offs planned to start in a month's time.

There must be early approval of the budget of the Community Futures Committee of $15 million needed for industrial and community adjustment, job retraining, manpower mobility and job search assistance. We need a comprehensive program to create jobs in the private sector and the decentralization of government departments and agencies to the Elliot Lake area.

It is urgent that the federal government make a commitment immediately to help the town of Elliot Lake at this time of desperate need.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, with each passing week, more and more Canadians are coming to recognize the GST as an important reform for Canada.

As the proprietors of small businesses register each day, they are discovering the benefits that the GST reform will mean to them and that administering the tax will not be nearly as complicated as they initially thought. In this regard, the recently announced quick method alternative for tax calculation was a most welcome modification. Unfortunately, the $200,000 threshold leaves many businesses above the line and not able to take advantage.

Many business people who support the GST are concerned about whether they can meet the current compliance requirements by January, 1991. My suggestion, and one which I convey to the government for its consideration, is that the threshold for access to the quick method be increased to $1 million for 1991, phasing down thereafter over three years to the targeted $200,000 mark.

This modification would provide the flexibility to assist many more businesses to comply on time and without undue trauma.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, despite the defeat of Meech Lake, the Parliament of Canada and the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick—according to our amending formula—can amend the Canadian Constitution and enshrine in that Constitution the equality of the province's francophone and anglophone communities.

The First Ministers' communiqué on June 9 contained an understanding regarding a constitutional amendment for New Brunswick that would provide that New Brunswick's francophone and anglophone communities have equal status and equal rights and privileges.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, this understanding affirms the role of the Legislative Assembly and the Government of New Brunswick in preserving and promoting those rights and privileges.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore urge the Prime Minister of Canada to communicate with Premier McKenna of New Brunswick and set a date as soon as possible to thus amend the Constitution, since under our Constitution, this amendment only requires the approval of the Parliament of Canada and the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance will know that the manufacturing and primary resource sectors in Canada are being seriously damaged by the artificially high Canadian dollar. Representatives of the forestry sector, agriculture, fisheries, manufacturing, mining and exporting companies have told the government again and again that the high dollar policy is causing enormous and perhaps irreversible damage to their industries.

Does the Minister of Finance recognize that the time has come to listen to the pleas from business leaders and try to focus on the economy and see if something cannot be done to try to save this haemorrhaging of jobs in the manufacturing and primary resource sectors?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what representatives of the resource sector and the manufacturing sector have said to me about various elements of government policy. I would ask my hon. friend to listen to them as well. If he does, he will understand that they say that one of the principal features of government policy which will help them to improve their competitive position is the removal of the existing federal sales tax and the replacement of that tax by the goods and services tax. That will reduce their costs of production, improve their competitive position, improve their ability to gain business in other countries and improve their ability to create jobs here in Canada.

Surely my colleague can get on side with that and tell his friends in the Senate to get on with passing this so that those industries can move ahead and improve their competitive position in the world today.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance suggests that we listen to the people who are involved. I would point out to him that Mr. Laurent Beaudoin of Bombardier severely criticized the Conservative government's monetary policy yesterday, saying that interest rates were too high and the value of the Canadian dollar was artificially too high as well, which puts exporting companies like Bombardier at a disadvantage.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the finance minister if he admits that he has to listen to people—perhaps he will listen to the spokesman of the Desjardins Movement who tells us that Quebec's economy is on the brink of a recession.

Does the Minister of Finance now admit that the time has come in Canada to address the problems facing the economy of this country?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what we are doing. If my hon. friend will look at the national accounts figures that were put out last week, he will see that the underlying cost structure of the economy, as best represented by unit labour costs, increased at a rate of 6.4 per cent in the first quarter of this year.

If that continuing upward pressure on unit labour costs continues, and it will continue if we start to ease monetary policy prematurely, then we will be in real trouble in this country. We will find that we will lose more business and more jobs, and that is surely what my friend and I both agree should not happen. We should be doing things that will help to create jobs.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that we take the minister's advice and listen to what Canadians are saying.

I want to point out to the minister that the Canadian Exporter's Association, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the National Council on Business Issues and the Canadian Labour Congress are all suggesting very forcefully to the Minister of Finance and to the Conservative government that they are in a situation where thousands of jobs in the manufacturing and the primary resource sector of this country are being lost.

How many of these high-paying jobs in manufacturing and in the primary resource sector are we going to lose? The inflation battle that you are fighting is against that sector of the economy which creates the best jobs in Canada. When is the government going to recognize that its wrong-headed monetary policy is going to cause irreparable damage to the Canadian economy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand fully what representatives of industry are saying and what representatives of the labour unions are saying. I understand that they would like to see the dollar down and they would like to see interest rates down.

What I have said on many occasions in this House is that we are in government to anticipate problems. If we do not get this cost structure under control, we will have much more serious problems down the road. The job loss down the road will be much greater than the job loss that those industries are enduring today.

That is why we have said that until we can address and get the underlying increases in the cost structure of the economy under control, we have to continue with the policies that we are following now. Once we see that we have those under control, then certainly we will be able to see some reduction in interest rates, but we are not there yet.

HIBERNIA

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Could the minister give me the latest, up-to-date status of the Hibernia oil project? If he could, would he do so today, please.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. As the hon. member knows, over the last number of days there has been some debate as to the status of the legislation.

The hon. member will recall that when we were in legislative committee, and he was a very helpful and co-operative member and I thank him for that, that I mentioned at that time that if the legislation was not completed before the House would rise, I had every indication that we could complete the work on Hibernia in the summer of 1990, this summer.

I should also say to the hon. member that there have been meetings today in Calgary at which the government of Newfoundland, namely the premier, has been represented and there have been federal officials at that meeting.

I just had a report before coming into the House for Question Period. I believe that those meetings are progressing well, and I think with that type of progress, we can keep on the schedule that we had originally announced.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. I would seek some clarification because at the legislative committee, I think the minister suggested that he would prefer to have the enabling legislation before he went ahead with spending any money.

Yesterday, apparently, he was at least quoted in the media as saying that without the bill we might be able to go ahead and sign something by this summer between the consortium and the government of Newfoundland and construction may start this fall. Then I just heard on the wires that Mr. Crosbie said that if the deal is not signed by August, it may be delayed a year, which is a completely new thing to me.

Is it possible for the minister to give us any indication of a date so that the people of Canada would have some indication of when they are finally going to derive some benefits from this megaproject?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I said in committee and I repeated it here in the House yesterday that that was my preferred option, namely, to see legislation passed.

I think all of us are mature enough to recognize that it is possibly best to proceed in the manner in which I described in my first answer.

That being the case, we also knew, and I said this at the time the committee met, that there would be some slippage beyond the mid year, beyond June 30, relating to the lender-risk sharing, the LRS, as well as some of the benefit issues and the financing issues. I think we made some progress on that this morning.

I think it was the understanding of all the parties concerned this morning that the outstanding issues, including the legal drafting, should be completed this summer and that is what we are working toward.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Finance.

For a long time, the Minister of Finance said that our interest rates were too high because of the constitutional crisis and our high rate of inflation.

But now, Mr. Speaker, in spite of last week's events, the Canadian dollar is stable and the inflation rate is down to 4.2 per cent. The finance minister has no more excuses now.

Will he now say, Mr. Speaker, whether he will make a commitment to lower interest rates starting today for all Canadians?

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I have answered the question quite fully in response to the member for Gloucester.

I would like to respond to the point the hon. member has just made. He said that the Consumer Price Index is 4.5 per cent, but I do want to draw to the hon. member's attention that the unit labour cost increase in the first quarter was 6.4 per cent.

The reason that 6.4 per cent has not been reflected in the Consumer Price Index is that corporate profits are now at the lowest levels as a percentage of sales that they have been since 1983 and that the Canadian dollar has been higher this past year than a year ago.

For those two reasons, costs at the retail level are less than the cost increases at the corporate level. If we do not get the cost increases under control at the corporate level, that will flow through into the retail level very quickly. That is why we are concerned.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well that the unit labour costs in this country are higher because net exports are down and because we have a high Canadian dollar.

In light of the possibility of a budget later this year, as he indicated yesterday to Canadians, can the minister assure the House that there will not be any new tax increases? What we have seen in the last five years are taxes, taxes, taxes, a GST, and a high interest rate policy where real interest rates are now at the highest level in the history of Canada.

In light of that, and if we have a budget later on this fall, can he assure the country that there will be no more Tory tax increases for ordinary people in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me comment on the remarks of the hon. member about a possible budget later this fall. That is something which I think has been taken out of proportion from the comments I made in a scrum yesterday outside the House.

I was asked questions following my response to the member for Gloucester as to what I meant by an adjustment, if that is appropriate. I said that we are always making adjustments. These adjustments are internal and external. In 1986 we made adjustments externally when we found that we were a little off track from our budget projections.

The principal feature of this government's management of the fiscal policy of this country is that it is hands-on management. We are following things aggressively on a day to day basis, and that is precisely why we have been able to come in under budget for the deficit number, four years in a row.

Whether or not we have a mid-term correction in the fall is something that we will know later on in the year if it is appropriate, and that is when it will be announced.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered the question which concerned what might happen during his mid-term correction.

One might suggest, too, that the economy might be in a good deal better shape if, instead of a hands-on philosophy, it was a hands-off philosophy on the part of this government.

I want to put the question directly to the minister once more. If he is going to make corrections as he says he is considering in the fall, will he make a commitment to this country and to this House that he is not going to give us yet another massive tax increase that will damage this economy just as his high interest rates are doing right across the country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me make it clear. What I was referring to is a hands-on management of the operations of government.

If my hon. friend is suggesting that we should not have hands-on management, that we should just set our course at the beginning of the year, put our feet up and watch the world go by, that is not the way that this government does business. The reason we have been able to keep our budget under control to control government spending is that we do have hands-on management and we are committed to continuing that hands-on management.

My hon. friend wonders what might happen in the fall. I ask my hon. friend what might happen if there is blue cheese on the moon. That is something that we will find out in the fall when things are far more precise than is the case today.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, I asked the Prime Minister to assure Canadians that aboriginal people will not be punished for exercising their democratic rights. He typically avoided the question and provided members with a non-answer. This is a serious situation.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister today to be specific and to assure members of this House that there will be no retribution to Canada's aboriginal people for exercising their legitimate rights in the Manitoba legislature. We need to know.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government firmly believes that with passage of the Meech Lake Accord the aboriginal issues could have been advanced in a very comprehensive fashion, having regard to the fact that all governments in Canada would have then been committed to that process.

However, the government continues to remain committed to improving conditions for aboriginal peoples in Canada in the area of pursuing land claims negotiations, encouraging economic development for aboriginal communities, advancing self-government, and providing assistance to improve their ability to handle their own affairs within their own treaties and within their own reserves and the resolution of treaty issues, such as the thorough work of the treaty commissioner in Saskatchewan. On all those things, I am sure my hon. friend would agree, there has been progress made in those areas. There will continue to be progress and we will continue to work in that regard.

I repeat that I believe and the government believes that we missed a golden opportunity to advance the cause of aboriginal peoples as a result of the conditions that were laid out and that would have been inherent in the Meech Lake Accord. For that, we sincerely regret the fact that the Meech Lake Accord was not adopted.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, there would not have been the reaction from the aboriginal community if the government was willing to allow aboriginal people to participate equitably. People like Elijah Harper were forced to be obstructionists and find their way into history books as obstructionists because you would not allow them to participate.

Mr. Kempling: What is your question?

Ms. Blondin: The question is this. Yesterday, the Prime Minister tried in vain to divide and pit against one another the aboriginal people by using the 80,000 Manitoba Métis, but we know in our hearts we will never be divided. He will not succeed.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister today to take the first step of honour, to extend his hand to the First Nations of this country and to assure Canada that the First Nations will not be subjected to punitive actions by the government.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend would agree that we missed a golden opportunity in terms of advancing the cause of self-government in the constitutional process, primarily because Quebec was not at the constitutional table at that particular time. I am sure my hon. friend would agree with me.

It was the unanimous decision of 10 premiers and the Prime Minister that in order to bring Quebec into the Constitution, to advance this process, the Meech Lake Accord was fundamental.

I do not want to be argumentative with the hon. member, but it seems to me that some aboriginal leaders were only interested in one thing—and I think that is unfortunate—and that is killing Meech Lake. Phil Fontaine was quoted on CBC as follows: "The strategy here is to kill Meech Lake". He said: "We are prepared to live with the consequences". I could go on and quote Mr. Erasmus. He said: "If it means that there is no constitutional change for some time, we will live with it the way it is". I think that one has really to question the sincerity of some of those leaders, because quite frankly I think they did a disservice to the aboriginal people of Canada.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Yesterday, the Prime Minister refused to explain the legal gimmick found at the very last moment last week to extend the time frame for the ratification of the constitutional Accord, a gimmick which he said would apply only to Manitoba. Yesterday, in the other place, Senator Murray stated, and I quote:

[English]

"The view of the federal Department of Justice is that we would have a strong case to make".

[Translation]

If the case then is as strong as her department claims, could the minister responsible for this legal opinion tell us why she does not appeal now to the courts to obtain additional time for the two provinces which need it?

[English]

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to address this issue.

If the hon. member will hark back to the circumstances of that Friday, the expectation was that a vote would be held in the Newfoundland legislature but that for reasons of procedural problems and not for a lack of commitment on the part of all party leaders in Manitoba it might be the situation that Manitoba, while wanting to ratify, could not do so within the time frame.

Therefore we were faced with the question of having all provinces in a sense ratifying but outside the time frame set down in the provisions of the Constitution which says—and I am paraphrasing but I think I have the words fairly close—that no proclamation shall be given more than three years after the date of the initiating resolution.

Therefore there was some suggestion that we should be looking for ways around the time frame and I know the Charest committee considered this possibility. The question arose as to whether, if there was a clear indication of a desire to ratify on the part of all provinces, it would be possible by having that initiating resolution repeated to come within the terms of the amending formula. I do not know whether the court would have found that the case or not, but only the federal government has the statutory power to go directly to the Supreme Court of Canada with a reference.

The government indicated at that time that if that commitment was there, if Newfoundland ratified and if Manitoba indicated its commitment to ratify and perhaps went ahead and ratified even outside the time frame, we were more than willing to seek an opinion from the Supreme Court of Canada as to whether that would bring the resolutions within the time frame.

It is perfectly clear that the opinion of the Department of Justice is that if there was that clear commitment on the part of all 10 provincial governments and the Government of Canada we would have a strong case to argue in the Supreme Court of Canada.

One cannot anticipate what the result would be, but if there was a desire on the part of all governments of Canada to have the Meech Lake Accord ratified it seemed to me perfectly responsible and in fact would have been abdicating our responsibility not to seek whatever measures were within our power to make sure that that happened. As a result it became an academic question.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the minister indicated, the Charest committee did look at that argument, but what the minister has not explained—and I press her on this—is if the interpretation of Section 39(2) would possibly allow a later ratification, bringing it up to the second date, what difference does it make whether there was one province still to ratify, two provinces still to ratify or more?

It was important, the legal argument on which the Government of Canada relied, a legal argument which to the disgrace of the federal government was never made known to first ministers when they were meeting in Ottawa.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it does not take a law professor to construct that argument as something that one might take before the court.

I remind the hon. member that the question is both a legal and a political question. At the time, and I am quoting from Winnipeg Free Press of Friday, June 22, it was said: "Premier Gary Filmon has opened the door to continuing Manitoba's Meech Lake debate beyond tomorrow's deadline but made it clear yesterday that the next step is up to Ottawa". The headline is "It's PM's move, Filmon said".

The Manitoba government was seeking some kind of assistance. The point is that in order to make the scenario work there was a possibility of resetting the time for the amending formula. It would require that the initiating resolution, the resolution of the Quebec legislature, be made again.

I do not think it is politically unrealistic to suggest that the province of Quebec, given its feelings about Meech Lake, its commitment about Meech Lake, and the political position it had taken, was unlikely to agree to re-enact its ratification resolution—it has a great deal to do with the legal situation—unless there was an existing commitment on the part of all of the provinces to ratify.

I think it was an extraordinary suggestion that you would ask Quebec, on spec, to do it.

If there was not a willingness to do that, then the opinion, of itself, would have been academic. If the provinces now come forward and say they are prepared to ratify then the hon. member's question becomes a very interesting one.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The government seems to be taking a two-track system to healing in this country. One is to call for healing after the Meech Lake decision fell apart last week. At the same time it is pointing fingers.

We want a clear answer from the Deputy Prime Minister. Will the government live up to its word to native people and will it say today that it will have a joint definition on treaty rights and a royal commission on native affairs?

Will it live up to that commitment and will it start the healing process now by stating this in the House?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member was in the House yesterday when the hon. member's leader asked the Prime Minister a question that was similar. The Prime Minister said he would take the suggestions of the hon. leader of the NDP into consideration.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister thought that a royal commission on native affairs was a good idea a week ago, it is certainly a good idea now and it is time we start the healing process.

The Deputy Prime Minister, earlier in Question Period, pointed fingers at various native leaders. He should realize that there are native people in northern Manitoba who will not be going to university this fall because the federal government has cut off funding for federal-provincial programs, the BUNTEP program and the ACCESS program?

How can he expect those native people to have any faith in this government when they cannot go to university in two month's time?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, to the latter part of the hon. member's question, may I simply say to him that on a per capita basis spending on behalf of native people in this country has risen by 38 per cent over 1985-86.

With respect to the question regarding healing, I simply quote from the hon. the Prime Minister's statement at Baie-St-Paul, Quebec, on June 24: "Everything that was in the Meech Lake Accord has, because of the failure of its ratification, fallen, as a result of which all of the meetings that were scheduled. And the ones that I particularly regret were the ones involving the aboriginal peoples because, as I indicated today, we came so close in the past. I was absolutely in my heart convinced that if we had Quebec back at the table we could have done the deal that would have brought aboriginal justice about. That is a great tragedy for the aboriginal peoples and for Canada that this was and has been lost, but we will try and work as best we can."

That is the commitment of the Prime Minister on behalf of the government of Canada.

RIGHT TO SELF-DETERMINATION

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): In the absence of the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Now that most Quebec men and women favour Quebec sovereignty and that even the leader of the New Democratic Party was quoted as saying that she could live with a Quebec sovereignty which she found ineluctable, it is surprising that Canada has not yet broken its colonial ties with England and the Queen, thereby demonstrating a complete lack of understanding of a modern and free Canada.

If English Canada cannot get rid of its old colonial ties and become an independent state, is it still the policy of this government to recognize the right of Quebecers to self-determination, to full sovereignty and complete freedom?

• (1450)

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the question is. If it is seeking clarification on the position of the New Democratic Party, he had better pose his question to the leader.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Deputy Prime Minister could pay attention and he would understand that this is an issue of extreme significance for Quebec men and women.

Is it still this government's policy to recognize the right of Quebecers to self-determination as well as full sovereignty and freedom? If the government replied in the affirmative, I should like to ask, by way of a supplementary question, whether the government recognizes that this right to self-determination could be exercised either through a Quebec referendum or a vote of the National Assembly?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is asking me whether I am a federalist and believe in Canada, the answer is yes.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Yesterday the government proposed amendments to gun control legislation in Bill C-80. These proposals leave at least two holes in the gun control safety net. They do absolutely nothing to advance safety training requirements beyond those passed in 1978, and still not proclaimed in force, and in relation to converted fully automatics, allow continued acquisition of these guns under a grandfather provision up to June 30, 1991.

Why has the minister failed to deal with these two important elements of gun control legislation and why is she proposing to allow acquisition of these so-called converted fully automatics for another full year?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the hon. member's question. Notwithstanding his criticisms, I do appreciate his constructive comments yesterday, as do I appreciate those of his colleague of the NDP.

To take the second part of the question first, in respect of the question of grandfathering converted fully-automatic rifles which are now in a semi-automatic mode, they will not be available for acquisition up until the time of the legislation coming into force because, as the hon. member will recall from yesterday, the importation of such weapons is already now being restricted by Canada Customs.

The decision as to whether or not in rendering these prohibited weapons to have a grandfathering provision, was a decision that was made as a policy decision. Certainly the legislative committee may want to discuss it and make other recommendations.

Following the practice that was set out in 1978, where prohibited weapons were grandfathered, that process worked very well. When those weapons are grandfathered, in order to be held legally they must be registered. They do give law enforcement authorities a much better idea of where those firearms are, who has them, and it is much easier to promote the gradual reduction of their numbers than when one simply prohibits them, creates an amnesty period for turning them in and hopes that all of those that are out there get turned in. It is a better way of keeping control but I would welcome suggestions from the legislative committee.

In respect of the provisions for training, I would like to advise the hon. member that the provisions in the Criminal Code—

Mr. Milliken: Come on. That's not an answer; it's a filibuster.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I am answering his question. The provisions in the Criminal Code do not set out any particular details as to the training proposals. I have indicated that I will be forming a Canadian advisory council on firearms. Its first mandate will be to provide a blueprint to implement those proposals that I hope will be in effect by the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Justice Minister. It is clear that we have a way to go with this particular bill. We in the opposition are prepared to look at expediting consideration of the legislation in order to accommodate real consideration with responsible gun users and groups.

Is the minister ready to agree to move this bill speedily through to second reading and a legislative committee so that Parliament can quickly receive submissions and consultations and make real improvements in this bill?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): I thank the hon. member. Yes, indeed I am. I am very grateful for his co-operation. I think that is precisely the way we would go and I would hope that perhaps we can get agreement among the House leaders to do that today. I think it is an excellent suggestion and I appreciate the good will and co-operation of the hon. member.

TRUCKING

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Over one month ago in Windsor, the minister met with the Ontario and Canadian trucking industry. He said he would address their concerns and level the playing field with their U.S. counterparts.

In a meeting this morning with industry representatives, the minister took the government's usual tactic and promised yet another task force, a task force that is not even going to start until mid-August.

When will the government do something concrete to assist the Canadian trucking industry?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised that my hon. friend would suggest that I reject the suggestion of the Canadian conference of teamsters, the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport & General Workers, and the transportation and communications international union, representing some 150,000 Canadians who asked me if I would form a task force made up of representatives of the trucking unions, from the industry and from government at the federal and provincial levels. I thought it was a good suggestion and I accepted their suggestion. We came up with a date which suited everybody, the week of August 13, for the first meeting. If my hon. friend is suggesting I reject that suggestion, what alternative would he have?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the minister that it was 34 days ago that he made a similar promise to those people and he has not done one thing about it since then until he was further pressured this morning.

I think the minister also knows that he has 24 hours to avert what some people in the trucking industry are going to do. They are saying that at 11.59 tomorrow night, unless there is some concrete action by this government, they are going to shut down the borders and the highways of this country.

I ask the minister again what the government is going to do now to address the concerns of the trucking industry, such as high interest rates, excise tax on fuel and the capital cost allowance that they face? All of these give them a disadvantage to their American competitors. What are you going to do now, before midnight tomorrow night?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend refers to the commitments I made to the independent truckers in Windsor some five weeks ago. I committed to explore better enforcement of the laws against cabotage. That is done. I committed to see if there was any way in which we could get more evidence on unfair competition. The independent truckers gave us no evidence in the intervening five weeks. I committed to explain the situation on the federal excise tax on fuel. That was done to their satisfaction. I have met all of the commitments I made in Windsor, and they will tell you I have.

I have also said to the organized truckers, some 150,000 Canadians who do not want a blockade, who want to obey the law, that I would meet with them in August.

I suggest to my hon. friend that he not counsel breaking the law as he is now.

DUBIN INQUIRY REPORT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Yesterday the Dubin report was made public. The report is an excellent well balanced report which makes a very powerful case for a complete overhaul of the sports system in Canada.

This House, through the Standing Committee, has established a sub-committee on fitness and amateur sport, and I would like to ask the minister if he will confirm in the House for the record that it is his intention to refer the Dubin report to the sub-committee on fitness and amateur sport?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of a question from my hon. friend to thank Mr. Justice Dubin and his staff on behalf of all members of the House for the excellent work he has done on the report.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danis: As far as the process goes from now on, it is the intention of the government to consult. We will, in fact, ask the sub-committee, of which the hon. member for Victoria is a member, to give us opinions on the report. It is our intention to make a decision with regard to those people named in the recommendation by Mr. Justice Dubin by the end of the summer. In phase two, it would be the intention of the government to have a global response by the fall.

• (1500)

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in his comments yesterday the minister said that he accepts the thrust of the report. The report describes a global disgrace in the area of sports and talks about the unethical and immoral conduct of organizations, some of which are funded by the government.

Will the minister assure the House that in his review of sports policies in the future we will no longer have to accept government funding of immoral and unethical activities?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): As I said, Mr. Speaker, the government will give a full response to the report in the fall.

I would love to answer all questions concerning the report now. However, I am sure my colleague understands that it would be done in a more proper and more orderly way if it were done in the way I suggested a minute ago.

AIRPORTS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. After many discussions I am pleased that he is going to visit Buttonville Airport.

The environmental assessment panel's recent review of air transportation proposals in the Toronto area recognizes the value of regional airports such as Buttonville. The including paragraph of the report states: "If there is a possibility that any of these airports may be included in the long-term aviation strategy for southern Ontario, the panel suggests that Transport Canada consider protecting its range of future options".

Is the minister prepared to make a comprehensive review of this excellent facility and its capacity to ease the chaos at Pearson Airport, particularly the large volume of small business aircraft?

Some hon. members: Yes!

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to say simply, yes, as my hon. friends opposite suggest.

I would tell my hon. friend that we are in fact in the middle of a comprehensive review of all the airports in southern Ontario. Pearson, Hamilton, Buttonville, and Oshawa are all included in our plans. We expect to visit Buttonville in the summer.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, further to rumours that were circulating this morning to the effect that I was going to leave the government benches and no longer sit as the Conservative member for Richmond—Wolfe, I wish to deny outright what was said in the media.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Côté: I may add, Mr. Speaker, that my decision had already been announced and confirmed in my own riding on Monday morning, and I am sorry these rumours should have disturbed my constituents.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to add that I see only the Prime Minister of Canada, Brian Mulroney and the Conservative Government as genuine defenders of the interests of Quebec in general and the interests of my constituency. Without this government, Mr. Speaker, we might have to rely on Jean Chrétien, which could only lead to sabotage and the destruction of—

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I can do so because I am not leaving my caucus either.

When the Minister of Transport responded to my supplementary question he made a very serious accusation, one which I take very seriously. He accused me of counselling an illegal activity.

I can tell the House that I have not been doing that, and I am not doing that. I was simply pointing out to the minister a serious problem that might arise so that he can take care of it and look after it as he should.

I ask the minister to withdraw that accusation.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend made several allegations in the preamble to his questions as to what I had done and had not done. I take offence at the suggestion that I have not met my commitments, because I have. My hon. friend should know full well that we have.

I have the representations of 150,000 unionized workers who have agreed that they will participate in this task force that we have created at their request. I am pleased to have their acceptance.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: I welcome the comments of my hon. friends opposite. If they want to join the task force too, they are welcome.

If I inadvertently suggested that, by threatening the Canadian people with a walk-out tomorrow at midnight, my hon. friend was counselling the breaking of the law, and if I inadvertently suggested, when he suggested that there is going to be a blockade brought about by those independent truckers, that he was breaking the law—something which I think is unfortunate for him to suggest—then I withdraw it.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-326, an act to amend the Criminal Code (hate propaganda).

The purpose of this bill is to ensure that these sections of the code be brought into conformity with the Charter of Rights which prohibits discrimination based on sex or on sexual orientation.

There has been an increasing amount of material promoting hatred and violence against lesbians and gay men and against women in Canada. The purpose of this bill is to send out a clear message from Parliament, despite the Neanderthals in some sections of the Conservative Party, that this hate literature will not be tolerated in Canada.

REFERENCE TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the second motion, which requires unanimous consent, is as follows:

> That notwithstanding Standing Order 73(2), Bill C-79, an Act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act, not be referred upon second reading of the bill to a legislative committee but to the Special Committee on the Review of the Parliament of Canada Act.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, yes, there have been consultations and we are prepared to give unanimous consent.

I am just wondering if the minister can indicate that once the committee has been established, it will not meet during July and August, and that there may be a short meeting in September to deal with the agenda. The purpose of establishing the committee now is to let people know that the committee is available to receive briefs and that it will be looking for information.

Second, can the minister indicate that the 1984 cabinet guidelines dealing with the environmental assessment review process will not be modified unless the Minister of the Environment has met with the committee?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm with respect to the motion that should any changes be contemplated to the regulations as established in 1984, the minister would appear before the committee and consult with it to discuss those changes.

It is not our intention to have the committee sit during the months of July and August. I just want to confirm that.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on the motion which is before the House which deals with the Parliament of Canada Act, could the deputy government House leader indicate whether it is the intention of the government to call this bill for debate this afternoon, and if so, at what point?

Mr. Danis: It is our intention to call the bill sometime later this afternoon. If the hon. member would allow me to put my third motion, I could probably answer some questions after.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN FOR SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): My third motion reads as follows:

> That, when the House has disposed this day of the second reading stage of Bill C-79, an Act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act, and the Government Notice of Motion dated June 26, 1990 respecting Bill C-78, an Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, it stand adjourned until Monday, September 24, 1990, provided that:
> (1) the provisions of Standing Order 28(3) respecting recall of the House be recognized as in force during such period of adjournment; and
> (2) if, at any time following the adoption of this Order until Friday, September 21, 1990, the House is not sitting and a Bill or Bills be ready for the granting of Royal Assent, the Speaker may, after consultation with the Government, fix a time at which the House shall meet for that sole purpose, after which the House shall once again stand adjourned in accordance with this Order.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, my apologies for asking the question during the wrong motion. There were probably two bill numbers side by side.

The government is aware, of course, that there have been serious questions raised about a particular clause in the Parliament of Canada Act, clause 52.8(1). Some members have clearly indicated that they want that clause changed. Can the government advise if it is prepared to modify or even eliminate that clause during committee consideration?

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make these comments as chairman of the committee, if my hon. friend would agree.

The members for Thunder Bay—Atikokan and Churchill are members of the committee. We presented a unanimous report to the House.

I have read the bill very carefully, as have my friend from Thunder Bay—Atikokan and members of the Official Opposition, and understand and share their concern with clause 52.8(1) of the proposed legislation.

That is why I hope that over the course of the summer, if there is a unanimous decision by all members to meet, and it will have to be unanimous, the government will certainly look into it. As chairman of the committee, I certainly would be willing to review that clause.

• (1520)

I fully share the concerns that members of the New Democratic Party, as well as members of the Official Opposition and members on this side of the House have with that clause.

To my knowledge it is the only clause in the whole bill which members have serious reservations about. As chairman of the committee, I can assure members of this House that we will look into it.

If members of the committee will support me in this, I am willing to write to the members of the House asking for their opinion of that clause. I would send each member a copy of that particular clause asking them for their comments. Then each member from each political party could make representations at that time.

It would also be my intention to suggest to members of the committee that we hear witnesses concerning this clause. Members are aware that the committee has been working now for over seven months on the bill.

There are approximately 50 clauses in this bill. Yet there is only one that causes some problems. That is why I hope that we could agree this afternoon to proceed quickly with second reading and have a careful look at the particular clause mentioned by my friend from Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this matter.

As a member of the special committee of the House that looked into the Canada clause, and speaking for this caucus and in particular for my colleague, the member for Saint-Denis, we expect hearings to be held later this summer. We expect witnesses to be called from civil libertarian groups and from police forces, to have input from everybody, on clause 52.8(1).

I can assure the House that we also have some reservations with the clause itself, but that we would like to have some public discussions on it so that people are very informed about what we are trying to do here.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, we had discussions in caucus about this very clause.

I want to make it very clear that the problem we have is that we are going into second reading later this afternoon. There is no way that we can accept the principle of that clause. We do not want to be pre-empted in the process that takes place this afternoon.

We do not want to see the House of Commons give second reading to the bill and then the government later on getting up and saying that we agreed to it in principle by giving it second reading.

We want to state very clearly on the record now on behalf of our caucus that when the bill comes up later this afternoon that we cannot accept that clause. If it passes in the House later on today, it is certainly our intention to remove that clause and to make sure that it is not there in the final bill after the committee studies it this summer.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the undertaking of the deputy government House leader with respect to this bill. However, I am concerned in that the deputy government House leader made reference to the committee report.

The committee report in question, while I understand it was adopted on a Friday afternoon, has not yet been the subject of study by the House. Certainly I would not want our agreement to this particular procedure to be taken to mean agreement to a bill which in that particular area reflects the report of the committee.

The reality is that there are deep concerns about the suggestion that there might be in effect a screening device and one law for Canadians and another for parliamentarians. That is the nature of the concerns. I think the deputy government House leader recognizes that that is the nature of the concerns.

I would hope that it would be clearly recognized. I understand my colleague from Churchill will be speaking to this bill at second reading. At that point we will be able to clarify our concerns, but I hope that it could be very clearly understood that we will oppose this bill at second reading.

A legislative attempt to ensure that the police of this country are forced to go to any body, whether it be the Board of Internal Economy or any other body, before they undertake a search warrant or an authorization for a wire-tap, would be fundamentally—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

OPPOSITION TO GST

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I have here a number of petitions concerning the new tax that will come into force on January 1, 1991.

Several hundred people in my riding and the Montreal area, Mr. Speaker, signed this petition to indicate that they object to a tax that is discrimatory and will put an additional burden on Canadian families. Your petitioners ask us, the Liberal Party, and all Canadians who vigorously object to this new tax on goods and services that constitutes an unprecedented attack on the incomes of Canadians and will force them not only to pay higher taxes but also to cope with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment to ask the government to withdraw this terrible tax.

VETERANS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of veterans and their supporters concerning a government decision.

[English]

The petition concerns the fact that the Government of Canada has introduced charges which will reduce home-keeping services to veterans and substantially increase the cost of long-term care.

Our veterans have already given service to this country and should not be targeted by these measures.

I call upon Parliament to reject measures that deprive veterans of proper services and increase their financial hardships.

This petition has been signed by over 300 veterans and their friends.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from quite a number of people in the area of Labrador City and Wabush dealing with the crisis that now hits our province in the fishery.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to have the Government of Canada immediately extend Canada's jurisdiction to the edge of our continental shelf, as is consistent with international law, so that Canada can protect and regulate the fish stock so vital to Atlantic fishermen and all Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition with another 300-plus names of people to add to the many thousands of names I have already tabled in this House. They are in opposition to the goods and services tax and ask that Parliament reject this tax.

RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a further petition in opposition to the cuts to rail passenger service in Canada. There are several dozen signatures to be added to the many thousands that have already been presented in this House on this subject.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition in the House today concerning the goods and services tax. This petition contains the signatures of 252 residents of Hamilton which were collected through the good offices of my very distinguished colleague, the member for Hamilton Mountain.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to reject this tax which they perceive as unfair after a string of Conservative tax increases.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): The Liberals like the GST.

Mr. Milliken: I appreciate the comments of the hon. member for Edmonton East. I know he is supporting the Senate, and I am delighted to hear it.

This petition is addressed to Parliament in both its constituent elements and calls upon this House to reject the goods and services tax.

I know the hon. member for Edmonton East is going to want to get an appointment to the Senate in due course so that he can express his concerns and views there.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and honour to table petitions.

The petition of these Canadians states that thousands of east Europeans who entered Canada in good faith subsequently applied as self-exiles in good faith, that there are no full service immigration offices anywhere in eastern Europe and that the processing time for many of these self-exiled applicants takes up to two years and even more. Whereas these people are well established in Canada as required by the self-exile regulations, the petitioners call upon Parliament to request the Minister of Employment and Immigration to reciprocate on their good faith and to extend the expiry date of Canadian visas until the cases have been completely processed.

• (1530)

In fairness, I do want to add that the minister and deputy minister have already taken action to address this problem and I thank them for their positive interventions to my early representations in this matter.

GERMANY

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): I have a second petition, Mr. Speaker, signed by thousands of Canadians pertaining to the unification of Germany and the impact it might have on the security of the Polish borders. The petitioners call upon Parliament to recognize the present borders between Poland and the German Democratic Republic as the boundary between Poland and any future unified German state as final and inviolable. They call upon Parliament to support the demand of the Polish government to be an active participant in any gathering and deliberation where any matters affecting Poland's interests will be discussed and resolved.

[Translation]

OPPOSITION TO GST

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House two petitions against the new GST signed by my constituents in York West.

They say that the Conservative federal government has imposed at least 31 new taxes or tax increases on Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, the imposition of this new universal goods and services tax will cause serious difficulties and injustices for Canadians throughout the country. So on behalf of all these people, I ask the government to withdraw this new goods and services tax right away.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motion for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all motions for papers stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, June 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. de Cotret that Bill C-78, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to bring to the attention of hon. members that the hon. Speaker would like to see them in Room 16 at 4.45 p.m. this day.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Durham has 10 minutes remaining in his speech, plus 10 minutes questions and comments. The hon. member for Durham.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, as you will recall, yesterday as I was supporting the government bill, Bill C-78, the proposed Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, the main thrust of my presentation related to the openness of the process and the significant steps that have been made in this bill to allow for public participation throughout the process. As I finished yesterday, I had just mentioned that as part of the bill there is a clause that has established a formal participant funding program to ensure that all stakeholders have the opportunity to participate in the mediation and public hearings that will occur under this bill.

This multi-million financial assistance program will open the environmental assessment process to Canadians who might not have had the financial resources to otherwise participate in public reviews.

This includes both opponents and proponents and applicants reflecting both sides of the issue will be equally considered for participant funding.

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act even legislates the requirement that public comments aired in the environmental assessment must be considered before a decision is made on a major project. As well, public concerns must be reflected in mandatory study, mediation and panel reports.

The act also establishes the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency. The new agency, which will be fully independent of all departments, including Environment Canada, has a mandate to examine and report on the implementation of the environmental assessment process across government. Each year the agency will be required to table in the House an annual report on this subject which will be open for public scrutiny.

There are also additional opportunities for public involvement in the development of exclusion and mandatory study lists, and other regulations under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act states that the government-wide exclusion list must be developed with public input and review. This list will include projects known not to pose any risk of harm to the environment and those with negligible environmental effects. Such projects could include simple renovations, routine operations, minor construction and controlled scientific experiments. Projects on the exclusion list will not require assessment.

A mandatory study list will be compiled for projects that pose a potentially significant risk of harm to the environment. In general, these projects will tend to be large-scale projects that often generate considerable public concern. For example, large oil and gas developments, uranium mines, major hydroelectric developments and large industrial plants, could be subject to mandatory study. There will also be major opportunities for public consultation and input in the identification of other statutes and regulations that should trigger an environmental assessment under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

The act gives authority to the Governor in Council to regulate which provisions of other federal acts will fall within this category. A preliminary review of the federal regulatory statutes suggests that some provisions of the Fisheries Act, the National Energy Board Act and the Atomic Energy Control Act may warrant being considered by the proposed legislation.

Identifying these regulatory acts in regulation, and not in the legislation itself, will provide extensive opportunity for public consultation. It will also allow the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act to remain dynamic.

Mr. Speaker, I have been talking today of the opportunities for increased and more open participation in the environmental assessment of projects. This government has, however, also introduced another major initiative that will increase public participation in the assessment of policies. For the first time ever the government is establishing a progressive environmental review process for all new policies and programs. This review process is virtually unique in the world. Under the new process, ministers have decided that the environmental implications of all proposed policy and program initiatives must be considered before decisions are taken.

The government has decided that a statement of the environmental implications of each policy and program will be released when the new policy or program is announced. Canadians will be invited at that time to scrutinize these public statements. A further opportunity for public scrutiny exists. The House of Commons Standing Committee on the Environment can request any minister to appear before it to explain the environmental implications of any new policy or program.

• (1540)

I remind the hon. members that this legislation is the product of considerable public consultation. The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act reflects closely the views and recommendations of Canadians gathered over the past two years on country-wide consultations.

To date the government has heard from a wide spectrum of Canadians, including governments, the private sector, native people, environment and other special interest groups, the bar, and environmental assessment professionals.

I encourage these and other Canadians to make their views known to the House of Commons committee when it studies the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act later this year.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the speech of the hon. member for Durham yesterday in particular, and today, I would like to ask him a question. Considering the fact that he was not yet politically born in 1984, and speaking so authoritatively as to what happened, in his opinion, hastily in 1984, he should perhaps be aware of the fact that the guidelines produced in 1984 were the result of considerable thoughtful work and not hastily produced as he is quoted as having said on page 13141 of Hansard.

The guidelines were intended of course to trigger all federal departments to conform with such guidelines after 1984. So the fault is not with the guidelines, but with the government not living up to the guidelines which have existed since then.

Therefore, the question to the member for Durham is could he explain why, despite the guidelines, and subsequently despite the two court orders, this government is still allowing construction of both the Rafferty-Alameda and the Oldman River dam today?

Mr. Stevenson: Mr. Speaker, as I stated yesterday, and obviously I expected some comment on this because I am sure the member is quite sensitive, in the provinces of Canada, and I gave one example, that being Ontario, and I must admit that since yesterday I have not checked the exact date, but I know in Ontario the Environmental Assessment Act was brought into being either in 1977 or 1978.

That is a very extensive and quite thorough legalistic type act. During most of that period of time federally, from 1977 to 1984, a Liberal government was in power. During part of that time the hon. member was in cabinet. Certainly they had ample opportunity to bring in an Environmental Assessment Act.

Regardless of what the member says, I think if you look at the timing of the bringing into effect of the guidelines in 1984 they were in fact brought in just prior to the federal election and my comments from yesterday stand.

The member speaks quite eloquently on the situation that exists now, on the various environmental questions that are in place, and on the two dams. I think the government has stated its position. A court decision has been made, and the government has given consideration to those court decisions. That information is in the public forum and I think I will leave my comments at that.

We had some discussion in the House yesterday on those two projects from members on both sides of the House and I do not know that I can add much to those arguments.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, do I take it, then, from the non-answer of the hon. member for Durham that he cannot justify the behaviour of his government on both Rafferty-Alameda and the Oldman River dam?

In other words, he has no answer to offer for the behaviour of the government which has disregarded until now two court orders.

Mr. Stevenson: Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that the guidelines were just that. They were brought in as guidelines. They were never intended to stand up to the microscope of court proceedings.

I certainly congratulate the minister and the government for bringing forward this very significant piece of legislation, which I think is arguably one of the most advanced pieces of environmental assessment legislation in the world, and for making sure that adequate legislation is in place in Canada so that projects are thoroughly reviewed and there is no misunderstanding of what are the responsibilities of various jurisdictions. This bill is a significant step forward. It is unfortunate that it was not in place some years ago.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a very short question. The member seems to be very knowledgeable of Bill C-78, so I would just like to get his perspective for the record regarding what he described just a moment ago as large hydro projects, nuclear projects, oil and gas projects—projects of that magnitude.

Is it the member's reading of this legislation and his understanding of government policy that this legislation means there would be full environmental assessment and review of those kinds of megaprojects? Is that how he understands this legislation?

Mr. Stevenson: Mr. Speaker, there is a clause in the bill under which there will be mandatory hearings. I do not have the clause in front of me right now, but as I understand it, it does not precisely delineate exactly what projects will be in that section. That will come forward in further discussions. I am sure it will come forward in the public hearings.

As a member of the House of Commons I have no problem that these individual areas are not named in the bill, but I certainly as a member of the House of Commons I would like to see prior to the passage of the bill a fairly complete list of projects which would be put into the regulations immediately after the passage of the bill.

It is important that the bill be flexible and dynamic. I do not doubt that over a period of years items will have to be added to that mandatory list. In fact I would be quite disappointed if items were not added to that list. Any future government that tried to take any significant project areas off that list would be dealt with quite harshly by the Canadian public, and I have no problems with that.

As I understand the bill there will be a mandatory list created involving public consultation. As I understand it, I have no great problem with that particular aspect of it. As I say, I would like to see a fairly extensive list clearly spelled out by the government before the time of passage.

Mr. Fretz: Mr. Speaker, I rise on just a brief point of order to interrupt the proceedings. We hope this House will soon rise, if not today, then certainly this week.

However, I want to pay tribute to the pages who have worked so hard for us as members of Parliament throughout this past year. We have an energetic, enthusiastic, intelligent, and marvellous looking group of pages who have served us so well in this House. This is one of the brief times we come together as partisan members of Parliament to pay tribute to the pages who have served us so well. We want to say thank you to each one of you. We wish you well in all your endeavours as you continue your education, return to your homes this summer, or whatever. I want the rest of the House to join with me in thanking you for serving us so well this year.

• (1550)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair concurs.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to contribute to the debate on Bill C-78, the environmental assessment review process legislation, the long awaited legislation.

However I must confess to being disappointed in the bill. I want to make it clear from the outset that our party will vote against it at second reading. I want to say why.

The New Democratic Party is clearly on record as being a leader in the whole environmental issue. I am sure viewers will wonder why we oppose a bill that purports to assist in the process of environmental protection. It is clear that this bill is totally inadequate. We have been waiting for months, in fact since the last election. The government has said that the environment would be an issue of this government. This bill causes disappointment because it is inadequate. It is much narrower in scope than the existing 1984 guidelines.

Yesterday my hon. colleague from Skeena outlined the history of this bill, and I refer members to his speech because I think it was a very concise rendering of the history and increases our disappointment in this bill.

It does not include federal legislation such as the Fisheries Act and other environmental statutes. It provides for exemptions but does not list them. It provides for mandatory studies but does not list them either.

The Minister of the Environment offered intervener funding at his press conference, but the bill does not include it. It is a just policy assessment, but the legislation does not do it. This bill is shot full of holes. It appears to be something when it is not. The whole expectation that this was going to be the lead for the government to take in environmental action is yet to be seen. That is why the NDP will vote against it at second reading.

After all the government's promises for a strong environmental assessment process entrenched in law, we are left with a hollow piece of legislation which is weaker than the rules now in place. Cabinet decisions are exempt from this legislation. The government has promised that all cabinet documents will have an environmental assessment attached but that only summaries of them will be made public. That is not good enough.

We have heard a lot about process over the last couple of weeks. The government should know that the process in this legislation is just not good enough. We are expected to trust cabinet to do the right thing. There are no safeguards or means of assuring that environmental considerations are given proper weight in cabinet decisions.

The government says that public opinion will be the enforcement mechanism. I know public opinion. People talk about how it relates to the GST. Did public opinion have any impact on that? No. We have already found out that in the employment equity legislation, using public pressure, is not an effective way to enforce the aims of legislation. This legislation is discretionary. This is a step backward from the current guidelines which were ruled as binding on the government by the Rafferty-Alameda decision.

Important sections of this bill have been left to regulations yet to be drafted. It is not even clear what federal legislation comes under this new law or what type of projects will be excluded. This bill leaves important questions unanswered. Some of them are: Which projects will be covered? Which will be exempted? What criteria will be used to review cabinet decisions? What federal legislation will come under this act? Will foreign aid and development be covered? How will Crown corporations be affected?

This was the bill that had such expectations, and yet it fails to address these crucial questions. The new Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency, CEAA, is basically the old federal environmental assessment and review office, FEARO, beefed up a bit. The NDP and environmentalists have called for an independent agency that would report to Parliament, but this agency like FEARO only reports to the environment minister. There were a number of reports including the NDP task force report entitled Towards a Sustainable Future. I had the honour to sit on that task force.

Mr. Fulton: It was an excellent report.

Ms. Hunter: It has been well circulated across Canada. The greenprint for Canada recommended the creation of an environmental auditor to review government operations independently. This was in the original drafts of this bill but was axed in the final version. When we talk about having faith in the cabinet and then we see what it did to this bill, I have little faith in the cabinet.

Mr. Fulton: Shame, Tory hackery.

Ms. Hunter: It is clear that this legislation has been drastically watered down from the original draft. It is now, in the government's words, only an advisory process. The legislation does nothing to clear up the uncertainties over the Rafferty–Alameda and the Oldman River dam projects. The government has admitted that it is currently impossible to assess the full scope of the bill. In the words of our environment critic, the hon. member for Skeena: "The bill is a giant Swiss cheese. It is full of holes." That is why we are opposing it at second reading.

I also want to focus on the bill itself and the language of the bill in the preamble. I think it demonstrates that the government's approach to the environment is wrong-headed. In part the bill says in the preamble:

> Whereas the Government of Canada seeks to achieve an appropriate balance between economic development and the preservation and enhancement of environmental quality;

Even that language points to the flaws in the government's thinking.

What we had hoped would appear in this legislation was an understanding that the economy and the environment were not something to be balanced. They are interlinked and that should be acknowledged. There should be a mechanism for full cost accounting.

I sit on the environment committee and I heard very interesting testimony from David Runnals of the Institute for Research on Public Policy when he appeared before the committee. When I speak about full cost accounting, the system we have now essentially counts only the flow of resources. It does not count the stock of resources. As a result we can have some quite idiotic circumstances like the Exxon Valdez spill in which the costs of clean-up are added to the U.S. Gross National Product and the costs of the destruction of the natural resource base of Prince William Sound are not counted anywhere. The Gross National Product of the state of Alaska grows quite significantly as a result of the oil spill. This is crazy. This was referred to by an economist of the World Bank, Herman Daly, as akin to running the world as if it were a company in liquidation. This is where this government had an opportunity to make a real impact on the environment, to merge the economy and the environment, and it has missed that opportunity.

• (1600)

It should be in this legislation. It should at least be in the preamble. If we are not successful in defeating this bill at second reading, I hope that the committee that is going to be reviewing this bill will certainly make that fundamental change at the very beginning.

I want to turn now to that part of the bill dealing with foreign aid and the Export Development Corporation, Clause 4. It does not say, as I stated earlier in my remarks, whether these are even covered in this legislation. That is why my colleague compared this bill to Swiss cheese. This is one of the holes.

This bill raises expectations, and as my colleague describes in his usual colourful way, it is like a game of snakes and ladders; you get up the ladder and you expect something to be there at the top but then slip down the slope because there is nothing there.

The environment committee had the opportunity to hear from representatives of the Export Development Corporation. They made it very clear what their mandate was. It was to facilitate and develop export trade by providing insurance, guarantees, loans and related financial services, fostering Canada's international competitiveness. It sounds wonderful, but the philosophy behind that action means that the EDC has to conduct its affairs in accordance with commercial principles and disciplines, similar to those followed by the commercial banking sector.

These are Canadian taxpayers' dollars that are going to assist Canadian exports, often going into developing countries, and they are not subject to environmental assessment? How can we as a country that has an international reputation, which sometimes exceeds what it is worth, carry on its affairs this way? We are a wealthy country. Certainly, we have a large deficit, but when we talk about it in relation to the rest of the world, we have a responsibility to act with environmental responsibility that exceeds other countries because of our relative wealth. It certainly is not right to allow the Export Development Corporation to be exempt from environmental legislation.

It is unclear as to where CIDA is in this environmental legislation. I am the critic for CIDA for my party and I have to give credit to CIDA. Often, they use a lot of scrutiny in their projects and their increasing environmental conscience does my heart good. They are doing some very good work and I give them credit for that. I hope that the Export Development Corporation will set aside its commercial principles and look at environmental projects in the same way as CIDA does.

The environment does not distinguish between foreign aid money and export credit. It is crucial that we have an understanding that if taxpayers' dollars are involved we expect environmental assessments to be up to Canadian standards. We obviously have a responsibility for projects in Canada, but we also have a responsibility for those overseas. There is no way we can take any short-cuts with that.

This bill also gives an opportunity for the government to do as the Bruntland Commission recommended and set the new agenda to deal with the causes of environmental problems rather than dealing with the effects. This is what I speak of when talking about the narrow mind-set of this bill. It is with a great deal of disappointment that we read the bill.

I know I have only a few minutes left, but I want to point out, as my colleague from Skeena said yesterday, that this is an amorphous document; it purports to be something when it is nothing.

I have in my possession a secret document from December, 1989. It is a communications synopsis. It says that the purpose of this bill is, and I quote: "To gain recognition and credit nationally and internationally for the government's leadership in using the environmental assessment review process to help achieve sustainable development".

What they are saying in this document, obviously, is that we want to appear to be doing something and to get the credit for that nationally and internationally. It goes on to mention the possible headlines that would result from this legislation. The possible positive headline is: "Government reforms to aid sustainable development". The possible negative headline is: "Feds back off on environmental promises".

Mr. Speaker, just to give you an understanding of what actually did happen and what the headlines were, I have a clipping file here of what actually happened when this legislation was unveiled. The Ottawa Sun of June 9, 1990 states: "The Green Law Unveiled—NDP denounces gutless bill". I wonder whether that was the positive headline or the negative headline. I guess it all depends on whether or not you belong to the NDP.

The Ottawa Citizen, June 19, 1990: "Environmentalists criticize fill-in-the-blanks legislation". I think that fill-in-the-blanks legislation came from a well-known, well-respected environmentalist by the name of Elizabeth May, who many in this House have the privilege of knowing. I think that definitely fits in with the negative headlines.

The next headline is: "The environment protection bill lacks anticipated measures". Environmentalists and the New Democratic Party are very disappointed with this initiative. We are going to be debating this at length, I know, but I want to make it clear that we are opposed to this. The government has fallen far short of its so-called rhetoric on the environment. They have missed this opportunity, and I can only hope that if we can have this bill amended, if it does happen to pass because members have not taken our good advice to defeat it at second reading, we can create a new environmental agenda for Canada and for the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments? On debate, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's note: Member spoke in Inuktituk.]

Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on Bill C-78, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. Certainly, after several years of promises from the government, the legislation was finally introduced last week. However, although we support it in principle, we have some serious concerns because of some clauses in the act. It is like building a house without the necessary permit or without securing the land underneath. It is nice to look at, but you cannot get into it.

Section 55(2) is really the problem with this whole bill. That clause states:

> The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Minister, make regulations prescribing a list of projects or classes of projects that are physical activities, and for which an environmental assessment is not required, where the Governor in Council is of the opinion that conducting an environmental assessment of such projects would be inappropriate.

Basically, this particular clause states that we could have all sorts of concerns and address all sort of concerns, but if some corporation decides that they do not want to go through that process, all they have to do is go to their friend, the Governor in Council, and ask for permission not to go through the assessment. The bill allows cabinet to exclude, through regulations, any project or class of project it chooses.

• (1610)

This bill does not specify which existing legislation would automatically trigger an environmental assessment.

This bill, furthermore, does not cover actions of Crown corporations. The bill does not bind cabinet to implement the recommendations of the review panel.

The public reaction to this bill has not exactly been ecstatic. Commentators, media and environmentalists have noted that the government's commitment to environmentally sound policies and programs has lacked conviction. One particular incident I would like to note is that during the 1988 international conference, the government wanted to pass a resolution cutting emissions down by 20 per cent by the year 2005. The Government of Canada subsequently did not agree with that. What kind of commitment is that to the environmental cause? Therefore, we have some questions about the government's concern about the environment.

The Green Plan for action has been postponed while the government stalls for time with public hearings. The existing federal environmental regulations have been treated by this government as discretionary and as nuisances to be avoided. The courts have had to tell the government that these regulations are mandatory. The Rafferty–Alameda and the Oldman River dams are still under construction, however, for safety reasons.

The new package the government has introduced includes this bill, and a host of promises of the government's good intentions. Ministers are to include environmental assessments of all their policy proposals. These assessments, however, will not become public. The public will see only a summary of these assessments. We also do not know how extensive the cabinet assessments will be, nor what standards for environmental protection must be followed.

This bill proposes to set up environmental reviews before a project gets under way, but what types of project must be reviewed? What federal laws automatically trigger an environmental assessment? What projects are exempt? What rules apply to aid projects?

The answers to these questions will be found in regulations, rather than in the bill itself. Regulations can be changed easily and frequently. We are concerned that important sections of the bill have been left to regulations which have yet to be drafted. These include special regulations for Canadian foreign aid, Crown corporations, and aboriginal lands.

The list of the various federal statutes the new law will apply to has been left to regulations and is not covered in this bill. A list of the types of projects that will be automatically excluded from the application of the legislation is also not covered in this bill. This exclusion list is left to the regulations which are not yet drafted.

Environmentalists have pointed out that the bill will be toothless if the cabinet fails to pass regulations listing all the specific federal jurisdictions and legislation under which it can be used or if it later changes the regulations.

A spokesperson for the Sierra Club, Elizabeth May, has said the bill is "fill-in-the-blanks legislation." Stephen Hazel of the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee commented, "Too much has been left out. As it stands, it is narrower than what we have now".

The government is not required to follow the recommendations of the environmental assessment panels. The environmental assessment process remains advisory only.

The new legislation does not apply retroactively to any federal project which has already been subject to some form of assessment. No provincial project or private commercial development is covered if it does not involve federal funds, or does not have any impact upon federal authority.

This bill is meant to replace the 1984 environmental guidelines. Until this legislation is in place, what does the government intend to do about the existing guidelines? The guidelines must remain in place to fill the gap until the new law is in effect. It seems some ministers and some provinces are pressing hard to weaken the guidelines so that the courts cannot further intervene in federal projects. The government must resist this pressure.

As I pointed out earlier, this new legislation is flawed, and some have said it is narrower in scope than the rules which are in place now. There are several questions we want answers to and we will be trying to strengthen this legislation.

The government appears to have recognized that many projects requiring a federal decision also require decisions from other interests, including provincial governments, foreign states, and bodies established under land claims or Indian self-government legislation.

The act enables a responsible authority to co-operate in the preparation of environmental assessments with another party or jurisdiction in the case of a screening or mandatory study. It requires the responsible authority to exercise the appropriate quality control for any assessment so undertaken. The responsible authority, however, cannot delegate any of its decision-making powers. The government believes this feature will enable federal authorities to work closely with other parties and jurisdictions to minimize duplication and confusion without sacrificing environmental values.

Where another party or jurisdiction has the responsibility to undertake a public environmental review of a project, the act provides the Minister of the Environment with the authority to establish a joint review panel.

The other party could be a provincial government, the government of a foreign state, a body set up under a comprehensive land claim agreement or a federal regulatory authority. I assume the government is recognizing here the environmental portions of the Inuvialuit and James Bay land claims agreements.

With respect to panel reviews of projects, the Minister of the Environment may approve the substitution of another federal or aboriginal organization for a review panel under specified conditions. The minister may also establish criteria for substitution.

The act also permits the minister to establish a public review panel to assess the serious transborder and related environmental effects of a project on federal, provincial, foreign, or Indian lands. Such projects include those to be carried out in a province and likely to cause serious adverse environmental effects in another province, on federal or Indian lands or outside the country. Projects also include those to be carried out on reserves, or other Indian lands that are likely to cause serious adverse environmental effects elsewhere.

The government has said all these projects will be subject to environmental assessment in accordance with the stated purpose of the proposed act. Because of special circumstances, however, they will be subject to special procedural regulations.

The government has set out a list of principles to govern the development of these special procedural regulations on Indian lands. I hope the government is also including Inuit lands in its terminology.

The regulation is to be consistent with the principle of devolution of authority to First Nations and, therefore, accountability under these regulations will reflect the accountability outlined in the devolution instrument. The regulation will minimize duplication of process with other jurisdictions.

We will be studying these proposed principles and their impact very carefully. We will be seeking comments and input of the aboriginal peoples and their representative organizations.

I will be examining this bill with the fact in mind that aboriginal rights include the right to pursue a traditional life-style and economy of hunting, fishing and trapping on aboriginal lands.

• (1620)

I will be thinking of the proposed pulp mills in Alberta that have the potential to affect the rivers in the Northwest Territories. I will also be thinking of the proposed Kiggavik mine near Baker Lake, about which an awful lot of people from the Keewatin have very grave concerns with regard to the possible effects of radiation.

Clause 55(2) is an escape clause for government and industry. This clause permits the government to draw up a list of projects or a class of projects for which an environmental assessment is not required. This clause is a gaping hole in the environmental protection regime.

As I said earlier during the opening statements, this particular clause does everything to undermine the principle of the legislation by saying that anybody could go to the Governor in Council and say that they have to be exempted from this particular bill because of such and such, or some other things.

I think this particular section should be taken out in order to ensure that proper environmental assessment is done on all projects that have the potential to contaminate the environment.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe that you will find that there is unanimous consent for the following motions that I want to present to the House.

The first motion is:

That the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-78 be now adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it so agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, there have been extensive consultations on all sides of the House and I believe you will find unanimous consent for the following motion which is on page IV of today's Order Paper and Notice Paper which reads as follows:

That a Special Committee of the House of Commons be appointed to meet, as it sees fit, to pre-study Bill C-78, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, which Committee may organize in June, 1990 and may call witnesses as it sees fit and shall act as the Legislative Committee to which the said Bill is referred after second reading;

That the Committee be empowered to sit when the House is not sitting or when the House is adjourned;

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, the membership of the said Special Committee be as will be reported by the Striking Committee before the House adjourns on the day of adoption of this Order, and that such report be deemed adopted upon presentation; and

That substitution, if required, be according to provisions for Legislative Committees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Hon. Members have heard the terms of the motion.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, just for the clarification of the public, and I am sure this is what the member means and I am sure it is what the Deputy Government House Leader meant when he was speaking earlier, this committee is being set up in this way to allow public interest groups, business, the territorial governments, provincial governments, and others who are interested in the environmental assessment legislation to have an opportunity to look at it and get their views back into this committee during this pre-review period.

There should not be a public expectation out there that this committee, in fact, is travelling somewhere in the country. One might describe it, at least during this point in time, as a bit of a post box that is getting information out and getting information in.

I just want that to be clear to the public.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, before the parliamentary secretary replies, may I also reinforce the intervention by my colleague from Skeena. It is our understanding as well that, because of the complexity of the bill and because of the importance that interested organizations and groups place on the bill and the time they will require to study it carefully to make a meaningful and constructive submission to the committee, the whole purpose of our understanding today is to provide a mailing exchange and facility to inform interested parties about the bill and to receive their input gradually and to be able to start thoughtful examination of this input by the public in September.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I do want to acknowledge that, in fact, is what the government is proposing here and what has been agreed to by the other parties.

I also want to say, if my memory serves me correctly, that it was a procedure recommended by the McGrath task force as part of its reforms. When we get into issues that are of particular significance to the country and of particular importance at a certain time that, as much as possible, we should allow the public to participate in the process and to have an opportunity for input before the House has approved in principle, as would be accomplished with second reading. This would give them that kind of an opportunity.

I congratulate the Minister of the Environment for agreeing to this quite novel approach and also the critics and members of both opposition parties for their consent. It is a novel approach and I hope it is very successful because it is the kind of approach that we should also be considering for other pieces of legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would seek unanimous consent of the House to revert to the presentation of committee reports so I can present a striking committee report which deals with the motion the House has just agreed to.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved that Bill C-79, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act, be read the second time and referred to a special committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On debate, the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, the New Democratic Party wished to put up one speaker on debate at this stage. We do so because of the issue of the clause referring to the reference to the Board of Internal Economy.

As I expressed earlier, we have no complaints with the idea that the RCMP, the Quebec Provincial Police, the Ontario Provincial Police, or others doing investigation should get a clarification from the Board of Internal Economy as to what are acceptable practices within the rules of the House.

We have had some incidents in the past that have shown why this is necessary. For example, we understand that it is quite acceptable behaviour for a member of Parliament to keep a Christmas card list on his computer. If the people on that list happen to be members of his own political party, we do not consider that an offence against the House of Commons or any of its regulations. So, there will be a number of occasions when that clarification must take place.

Our problem with the proposal as it is written is that it would require all law enforcement agencies to come to the Board of Internal Economy before they can ask for a search warrant or a wire-tap and before they can undertake any criminal process. We do not believe that the Board of Internal Economy is the right place for the RCMP or for any law enforcement agency to be going.

We would rather see that particular request for information come before an actual criminal prosecution took place. We believe that those are two very distinct situations. On the one hand, one allows the RCMP and other law enforcement agencies to do their legal duty, to carry out an investigation upon a complaint, but on the other hand, not be in a situation where it could be perceived by the public that members of Parliament have more rights than ordinary citizens.

• (1630)

What the Board of Internal Economy would do, under a proposal that the NDP would accept, would be clarify the rules of the House so the law enforcement agencies and the courts would have benefit of the knowledge of what is allowable.

Other than that provision, of which we have expressed our disapproval and which we will oppose on division later this afternoon, we find that the act itself covers many of the areas to be addressed by the House of Commons. It calls for the Board of Internal Economy to set up by-laws which are available to members of the House, so we know what is acceptable. It also allows members of the House to go to the Board of Internal Economy for opinions on what is or is not acceptable behaviour.

We believe that is a very useful purpose for the Board of Internal Economy. It helps to ensure that members, who have a questionable act, know who to go to and what process to follow in order to get a clarification about some undertaking they may be considering.

With that and with the recognition that the committee itself will study the act, we are quite willing to let the bill go to committee. As the chairman indicated earlier, he will be writing to members of the House informing them of the study to be undertaken.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Accordingly the bill stands referred to a special committee on the review of the Parliament of Canada Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a special committee.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, there are just a couple of housekeeping items that we need to handle. First of all, I am wondering if the House would give its consent to drop from the Order Paper the adjournment motion, which was put there as Motion No. 14, as it is no longer necessary because of the earlier motion we adopted. I would like the consent of the House to drop the motion on page 24 of today's Order Paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I am concerned. I have not had a chance to be here in the last couple of minutes.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is concurrence.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, may I say to all members of the House that it has been a long, interesting and often difficult spring session.

On behalf of the government, may I say to all members of the House, no matter on which side they sit, that we wish them all a very happy and restful summer. Perhaps they can enjoy some time with their families and friends as well as the work we know we all have to carry out in our constituencies.

Also, Mr. Speaker, I understand there will likely be Royal Assent at five o'clock. Perhaps what we can do is agree to suspend to the call of the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will suspend to the call of the Chair. There should be Royal Assent around 5.45. The hon. government—the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, call me whatever you want as long as you spell my name right.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say to all those who have been listening to us for several months that this was a productive session. When the opposition co-operates, things always go well in the House.

[English]

I want to especially pay tribute to the co-operation given by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, my colleague from the new class of '88, who is showing great understanding of the House and a great love of it. He has negotiated sometimes for us on the opposition side with the hon. member for Peace River, who has also been a great person to work with.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I think he is well deserving of the applause from his colleagues because of his understanding and his nice attitude and also his very constructive remarks most of the time. I said most of the time.

I just want to wish all my friends and colleagues in the House a pleasant summer with their families, and have a good time.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, as we all know, this House only works if we work together. We are partisans, because that is what brings us here, because we all have a different vision of the kind of Canada we want and how to get there.

I think we have to recognize that there are some key elements in this House that allows it to function, and they are the roles of the House leaders and their assistants in the House, as well as staff, the Whips and their assistants in the House, as well as staff that allows us to work with you, Sir, and your colleagues in the chair and the folks at the table, who assist us in operating the House of Commons, the people's court if you like, to do the business of the nation.

I want to express my appreciation to the officers of the governing party, of the Official Opposition and my colleagues for their co-operation over the past six months, in particular for me as the most recently elected Whip to the New Democratic Party caucus, but in years gone past as well. I also want to take this opportunity to say thank you to the young men and women who have served us so well this year. This is their last day. They thought that last week was their last but they have hung on to the bitter end with us. On behalf of all of us, I wish to extend our thanks for the work that these young people have done and wish them well in their years to come. Hopefully, some of them will still decide to choose politics as an occupation.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in extending the same wishes to all and to assure you that when Parliament returns on September 24, not only will there be more independent members, but we will be better organized and thus more able to work for Quebec's sovereignty and co-operate in the business of the House.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong the discussion that is under way unduly but I wanted to thank the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier for his kind remarks.

Also I suggest that perhaps when the House resumes the sitting for Royal Assent, if there is a report of the striking committee that needs to be tabled, perhaps the House could permit, by unanimous consent, that we revert to presenting reports from committees so that that report could be tabled in the House at that time. I think that concurrence is automatic in that particular case.

I wanted to thank the table officers of the House for their assistance during the session, because I think every member knows that they have been particularly helpful. Also I wish to add to the kind words expressed by the hon. member for Erie our thanks to the Pages for their work in the course of the past year.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in the spirit advanced earlier today by the hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe, I wanted to say that there was a rumour going around Edmonton earlier today that somehow I had been convinced to exit my party and sit in this House as a member of a party that began with an "r". It was "reform" or "rhino" or "regressive contemptibles" or "rip". That is r-i-p, Mr. Speaker, "ripperills". I just want to say that those rumours are absolutely false. It is my intention to continue, when the House reconvenes, to sit with my colleagues who serve the interests of the ordinary Canadians of this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to bring to the attention of hon. members again that the Speaker would like to see their attendance in Room 16. Since this is going to be the last day, I would hope that all members would pay their respects to the Speaker.

On behalf of the chair officers and all members of the House I wish to thank all the wonderful Pages and hope that they take on other professions, other than politics, after they leave here. I wish them well. They have served us well.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair will suspend the sitting until the call of the Chair for Royal Assent. If you would like to join us, it will be at 5.45 p.m. for Royal Assent.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 4.39 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 6.46 p.m.

CENTENNIAL FLAME RESEARCH AWARD ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore) moved that Bill C-258, an act respecting the establishment of the Centennial Flame Research Award to publicize the contributions to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities.

He said: Madam Speaker, in 1967 as a university student in Ottawa I watched, as a lot of other Canadians did, Prime Minister Lester Pearson light the Centennial Flame on Parliament Hill at the fountain that had been built to symbolize and celebrate Canadian Confederation.

Since that time the Centennial Flame on Parliament Hill truly has become a symbol of many things. The flame itself continues to burn brightly, surrounded by the Coats of Arms of all the provinces and territories of our country and the flowing water. Into that water, as typical with many fountains around the world, people throw coins as a gesture of hope perhaps or as some symbolic gesture.

Twenty years after that first lighting of the flame, I was walking one morning to Parliament Hill and saw the coins being removed from around the flame by a couple of workers from the Department of Public Works. I inquired what happened to those coins.

One of the pledges I had made to my electors in Etobicoke—Lakeshore was that I wanted to be a voice for the voiceless. The needs and the role of people with disabilities ought to be publicized in any way that we can. It was at that moment that the idea for this bill was born and I am very glad that it has been called now for further debate.

I appreciate the support which I have heard from many members for this bill.

First let me explain that the purpose of this bill is to establish a fellowship which will be known as the Centennial Flame Research Award. The purpose of this award is to provide an amount of money to a disabled person to enable that individual to conduct research and to prepare a report on the contribution to Canadian public life or the activities of Parliament of one or more disabled persons. Any Canadian citizen who is disabled is eligible to receive the award and may apply to the parliamentary committee on the status of disabled persons to be considered. The award provided for by this bill would be granted annually. Applications from those interested in receiving the award would be made to the committee itself and the committee will work with the Speaker of the House of Commons in this regard.

The funds for this will be the money collected through the year from the Centennial Flame on Parliament Hill and will represent all of the money collected from that source the previous fiscal year. As soon as possible after the end of the year, when the award has been made and the individual has done his or her research on the contributions to Canadian public and parliamentary life by individuals with disabilities, that will culminate in a report which will be presented to the parliamentary committee and laid before Parliament. The award recipient may prepare that report in whatever medium or format considered appropriate for that individual. It is also contemplated by this bill that at that time the recipient of the award presents the report, he or she could appear as a witness before the parliamentary committee.

The Speaker's office and the Speaker himself, the Hon. John Fraser, have been supportive of this and are looking at ways of implementing and promoting this measure, including the possibility of plaques adjacent to the Centennial Flame on the lamp posts. This will draw to the public's attention the fact that this is going to be the purpose for which any money from the fountain will be used.

It is very important to consider the context in which this is taking place. In 1983, the United Nations adopted the world program of action concerning disabled persons. In that global action plan, under the heading "Information and Public Education", one of the recommendations states: "should encourage a public information program about the contributions of disabled persons that would reach all concerned, including the general public. In this connection, attitude change should be given special importance".

Following that, Prime Minister Mulroney signed the declaration proclaiming that 1983 to 1992 would be the decade of disabled persons in Canada as in other countries, during which the objectives of the world program of action concerning disabled persons, would be implemented in accordance with the principles set out in the declaration. This declaration has been seen by Canadians with disabilities as something of a bill of rights.

The 11th of these principles states: "There shall be action and public education to remedy social attitudes evolving from ignorance, indifference, and fear, which impede the full participation of individuals with disabilities". It is in keeping with that spirit of the United Nations' global plan for action and the declaration of principles here in Canada that we find Bill C–258 playing a modest but, I believe, important role as a part of the over–all approach.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I should like to comment briefly on the UN Decade for the Handicapped. Enthusiastically supported by Canada when it was officially opened, the Decade for the Handicapped will end in 1992. We can readily sum up its impact on Canadian society as a whole.

In the past ten years we witnessed a new awareness and realized that people were sincerely motivated, even though their approach did smack of paternalism on occasion. In spite of some notable results, over–all progress has been modest.

As for the handicapped, the decade was highlighted by a number of positive changes, especially a renewed will to be independent and a new self–confidence. What stands out however is the resurgence of expectations which give rise to more bitterness and frustration when they outpace lasting realities.

Are we really concerned about the situation of people who have to cope with disabilities? Or are we mainly interested in looking after number one and seeking gratification and self–satisfaction from noncommittal statements we may make? The true answer to this question is perhaps somewhat disturbing.

[English]

Within our own country, since 1981 and the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, we have seen a new framework and a new legal foundation for our fellow citizens who have disabilities. Who are we talking about, Madam Speaker? We are talking about 3,300,000 Canadians who have mental and physical disabilities. That is 13.2 per cent of our population.

Under Article 15 of our charter there is a new basis for their equality in law. Article 15 provides that every individual is entitled to the equal benefit and equal protection of the law without discrimination, including discrimination on the basis of mental or physical disability. That provision in our charter, accompanied by a lot of work by Members of Parliament over the past nine years, has been important as we have evolved a greater awareness in our society about the important role that all Canadians with varying abilities can and must play as full members of our society.

The work of the former Member of Parliament, David Smith, when he chaired the committee on the position of people with disabilities producing the report called Obstacles was a very important initial work by parliamentarians in this area. By 1985 many of those recommendations had been implemented but a great many more, including recommendations relating to disabilities of native Canadians, found that they had languished without adequate action or positive response.

In 1985, as chairman of the parliamentary committee on equality rights that I was able to table the report Equality for All/Equalité pour tous. It reinforced all of those Obstacle recommendations and added about 25 more, including the recommendation that there be a permanent committee of the House to deal with equality issues. Happily, that committee has been formed and, following the time that I was able to chair it, the hon. member for Oxford now chairs that committee. It is very important that that work continues.

The committee decided that we in Parliament should put our own house in order and the report was brought in on the subject of Parliament Hill, federal government facilities, employment accessibility, and so on.

The Speaker of the House of Commons, the Hon. John Fraser, found that he could not answer the committee's questionnaire about what was being done to provide accessibility, employment, outreach and effective communication. He put in place a very active program here on the hill to see that these services were developed and expanded. Whether it is employment for people with disabilities, the shuttle bus, the multi-media presentation of committee reports, and so much more, we are gradually putting our house in order because leadership by example is certainly the best way to show what can and ought to be done.

• (1320)

It is in that spirit that I hope that members will support this bill which I have before the House. It seeks to use the coins thrown in a symbolic gesture by Canadians, from all parts of our country and from all backgrounds, and by those who visit our country, and turn that symbolism into yet another act consistent with the spirit that must pervade all that we do in this House—regardless of party, region, or affiliation. All of us, as Members of Parliament, must see that the 3,300,000 Canadians with disabilities have full recognition.

By this means, I hope that the contributions of those people will now be recognized and publicized as contributions to the Parliament of Canada and to the public life of our country. These things depend very much on those very contributions for their success.

With those words I would like to thank members of the House for listening and supporting this bill. No matter what else may divide us, this can be a common cause for all of us. It is important in this place where many voices are heard, and loudly, that there also be a voice for the voiceless. All of us can play a role in being that voice.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, as the opposition critic for the status of the disabled, I would like to commend the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore on his initiative.

This issue is one that transcends the usual partisan boundaries that we face daily in the House and, regardless of party affiliation, I am certain that we all want to see disabled Canadians lead fuller, more productive lives.

At first glance, Bill C-258 allows parliamentarians to seek the advice of the disabled on how they function in society and how we cannot only aid but improve their way of life. There is none better qualified to speak on an issue than those who have first-hand experience. When one builds a house, one does not hire an auto mechanic. Conversely, when one has one's car repaired, one does not hire a carpenter.

As previously stated, at first glance Bill C-258 has good intentions, but upon closer scrutiny we find that many amendments are needed to meet the stated objective.

Bill C-258 states that the committee should review applications, select the recipients, and deal with matters related to the status of the disabled. Several questions now come to mind. Does the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore suggest that the existing Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons is not fulfilling its mandate under Standing Order 108.3(c)? Shall this committee replace or run parallel to the existing one? Or is it meant to be the existing committee? If it is to run parallel, what shall its exact mandate be?

Paragraph 4 states that the recipient will be awarded an amount of money. What shall this amount be? The member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore questioned the Minister of Public Works via the Order Paper and learned that the average annual amount collected is only $1,000. Are we to take this as the amount? Who shall set this amount? What if the funds collected do not meet the set amount in a particular year? Will the amount then be reduced or subsidized? If it is to be subsidized, then by whom? By Public Works, which collects the funds; the committee's budget, assuming the Board of Internal Economy grants them one; the Speaker, who administers the fund; or Health and Welfare who are ultimately responsible for the physically challenged? What if the amount collected exceeds the set amount? Will it go into general revenues, be given to the recipient as a bonus, or go toward next year's award?

After all these questions are addressed there is that of timing. Paragraph 6.1 of the bill defines fiscal year as April 1 to March 31 and then states that the award will be made using the proceeds collected during the fiscal year preceding the granting of the award. We must assume then that the award would be made in early April each year.

Paragraph 7.1. states that the committee chair must lay before the House, as soon as possible after the end of the fiscal year, an annual report including the recipient's report. If the moneys are collected from the fund throughout 1990 and awarded in April 1991 and the report is tabled one year later in April 1992, then the purpose of the bill is not being served. Information is one year old before the Parliament even sees it.

Further possible amendments to the bill may include a defined application period, flexibility in the application to allow joint or team projects—at present, as set out in clause 5.1, only single individuals may apply—and a joint committee of both the Speaker of the House and the Senate since Parliament includes both chambers.

As I stated in my preamble, I am all for every valid effort that is made towards helping differently-abled Canadians lead fuller and productive lives, but this bill before us today simply does not provide any tangible net gain. Awarding one applicant out of 3.3 million disabled Canadians is not the kind of initiative we as parliamentarians should be providing. It is simply not substantial enough.

A disabled person would be given $1,000 to write a report. Is it realistic to expect a person to spend much time and effort on a report for which they are paid only a token amount of $1,000? I would like to challenge members of the House to try to hire a research assistant for this amount and see what kind of work they will receive in return.

The cost of administering a program such as the one which Bill C-258 would create far outweighs the benefits, not to mention the cost of our debate here today.

I have to question whether or not this bill should ever have been deemed votable. I refer to Standing Order 92. In the Annotated Standing Orders, under the criteria for consideration we see that:

> The bill or motion should not require obvious amendment because it is substantially redundant with the law, is fundamentally ineffective to implement its own intent, is unclear in its meaning or is otherwise defective in its drafting.

Presently a committee does exist and does administer these funds quite adequately. This group is made up of an official from the Department of the Secretary of State, the Director of State Ceremonial, a Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, a Sergeant-at-Arms and a senior official with the Department of Public Works. They request a list from Health and Welfare Canada of proposed recipients. Past recipients have included the CNIB, and multiple sclerosis and cystic fibrosis associations.

I suggest that this bill be re-examined and that the member try to solicit support from his caucus and ask his government for substantial measures and programs to help physically-challenged Canadians.

May I also suggest that all members of Parliament contribute to the United Way campaign which has just started in Ottawa.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, first, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore for presenting this bill and for giving us an opportunity once again to debate issues affecting Canada's disabled. It arises only very occasionally in the House.

That said, I want to point out to the House once again that when we talk about disabilities among Canadians, we are talking about 20 per cent of the population and that is a rather conservative figure.

I expressed appreciation to the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore for giving us the opportunity to debate this bill because it would give other members of the House of Commons an opportunity to sit in committee and examine the intent of this bill in greater depth because we cannot talk about money coming from the Centennial Flame in isolation. It would be a nice gesture, perhaps, because the amount of money collected, while it is in excess of $3,000. By the time energy costs appear for natural gas, $1,000 will remain to be handed over to a group of disabled Canadians.

The hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore understands this question as he is a former member of the the House of Commons committee on disabled issues.

• (1330)

What this Parliament and particularly this government have to address is the depth of poverty that exists in the disabled community in Canada.

The House of Commons committee on disabled issues has conducted an in-depth examination of the last 12 months or so. The results of those examinations were produced in a report of the standing committee to the House in June 1990, just prior to the House rising for the summer recess.

The report points out quite clearly that if we are to address poverty among Canada's disabled, it has to be a concerted effort using political will, which has been absent to this point, and an exercise of political will to do something about this very severe and extreme problem.

The first thing the government has to address is the means by which to accomplish the economic integration of disabled people into the mainstream of Canadian society.

One of the first issues in doing this has to be the question of unemployment within the disabled population. For example, for those Canadians who are blind, and a high percentage of the population that falls into that category, there is an unemployment rate in excess of 90 per cent.

There are those who have suffered spinal cord injuries and have become immobile. Many still manage to live productive lives even though they are confined by their injuries. The unemployment rate among all groups that we have looked at is totally unacceptable.

The first key that has to be addressed is the employment issue. One way to go about that is to bring in employment equity measures that have teeth and that can be enforced. At the present time our employment equity legislation is, to say the least and without exaggeration, one of the weakest pieces of legislation in this country. It relies solely on voluntary assistance from the private sector and, indeed, from government.

To show how weak this legislation is, although it is federal government legislation, the government has exempted itself from its application. The employment equity legislation does not even apply to this government although it is expected to apply, albeit on a voluntary basis, to the private sector.

In my view and, I think it is the view of the entire House of Commons Standing Committee on Disabled Issues, this is totally inadequate. Our committee travelled to Washington earlier this year to look at the Americans With Disability Act.

That act was brought in by the present United States administration to deal effectively with unemployment among the disabled population. That legislation not only has the support of the disabled community in the United States, it has wide support among large, medium and small employers.

If the United States can bring in legislation whereby all discrimination against the disabled, subtle or otherwise, will be prohibited within the next three-year period, why can Canadians not do the same? Why can Canadians not be as good as if not better, as the Prime Minister is fond of telling the country, than the Americans?

All that is required is the political will on the part of the government to allow disabled Canadians to live within the mainstream of Canadian society with some assistance. I do not think that is too much to ask.

In fact, what brought about the apparent need for that legislation in the United States was the recognition that there would be severe labour shortages over the next 20 to 25 year period. They told us that the corporations decided that they had to be able to tap into that large group of Americans who were unemployed. In doing so, they are quite prepared to look at not only employment, which you cannot do in isolation, but other regions which were denying disabled Americans the opportunity of entering the workforce. That included looking at access to education, transportation, recreational facilities, all that is synonymous with the problems facing the disabled community, not only in the United States but in Canada.

I say again that I support this bill, if only from the point of view that it will give us another avenue to discuss these issues that affect Canada's disabled outside of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Disabled Issues and Human Rights. That is the reason I support the bill. I think it should be referred to a committee. As the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore said, it does not require an awful lot of debate.

There have been studies and studies and studies. In fact, we have got studies coming out of our ears. Since I came here in 1980, I would bet there have been no less than 15 studies on issues affecting the disabled. Parliament knows what the issues and the solutions are. The disabled community has told us.

The House of Commons standing committee has repeated the solutions ad nauseam. It would not take an awful lot of money to address those solutions. In fact, at one point our committee estimated it would take about 1 per cent of the total Health and Welfare budget to address those issues in a concrete way. For that reason, I urge the House to pass this legislation, refer it to a committee and let us get on with the job.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I am certainly pleased to join with colleagues today to speak to and address the debate on Bill C-258 which was presented to the House by my colleague from Etobicoke—Lakeshore who, I would remind the House, was the very illustrious chairman of our Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons from 1984 to 1988. In that role he became very much aware of the needs of disabled people and was recognized across the country, particularly in his own riding, as somebody who worked hard on their behalf. What we are seeing here today is another attempt on his part to highlight the importance of people with disabilities while at the same time recognizing the fact that they do need to be integrated into our social life of Canada and in particular our economic life, as the two speakers before me have said.

I have read the bill, Madam Speaker. It is a fairly simple bill. I want to welcome the critic from the Liberal Party, the member for Hamilton Mountain, to the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. I believe she will be a member of that committee now that she is the critic for disabled persons. I appreciate the fact that she took the trouble today to address the House on this bill. She pointed out a few questions in her mind about the bill. She wondered what committee would be responsible for it. I think the bill does say that it will be the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, the committee she will be sitting on, I dare say.

The amount of money to be available, as I understand it, is the amount collected the previous year at the Centennial Flame.

There may have been other points that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain raised. They are technical points and I think she may have some valid concerns. Those types of concerns could very well be addressed in the committee stage of hearings on this bill.

• (1340)

I think I am fair in saying that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain did not object to the principle of the bill. I think she too feels that it is a symbolic bill in a sense. It is not giving out vast amounts of money, but it does suggest a concern on the part of parliamentarians. We are prepared to offer this award and at the same time be the ones to judge the applications for it, which is a little unusual for a standing committee.

I was most interested in hearing from my colleague from Beaches—Woodbine because the hon. member has been in this House, as he said, from 1980. He and I were members of the original Special Committee on the Disabled and Handicapped and it has been my pleasure to work with him and other colleagues over the last 10 years. I am sure he would be the first to point out that on the committee we work together in an amazingly good fashion. We are basically non-partisan. I have been very impressed by how members from all three political parties have been able to work together.

I appreciate what the member said this afternoon about the shortcomings that still exist with regard to people with disabilities and handicaps. The hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine very correctly pointed out some weaknesses in the government program. I would hope, and I would like to think that I have reason to believe, that we are going to see some of those corrections made in the next couple of years. The hon. member is quite right in saying that these problems have been pointed out in many reports, but in all fairness there is a move to make some changes along the lines the committee was hoping for when it came out with the report known as Obstacles.

We have made some achievements. Over the last number of years the United Nations has become quite involved, as my colleague from Etobicoke—Lakeshore indicated. There was the International Year for Disabled Persons and the Decade for Disabled Persons which will be concluded in 1992. There have been a number of issues bought forth by the UN that pertain to this and which we support.

I want also to touch on the support there is in Canada for this kind of initiative. I like to think that the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore showed an initiative which we as parliamentarians can pick up on, namely, showing a desire to encourage similar initiatives among disabled people in Canada, people who have a right to do something for their fellow man and woman in Canada and to be recognized for that. I think this bill is an attempt to recognize excellence among the disabled community. I notice the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine nodding his head in agreement. I know he feels that way and that it is important to recognize that kind of activity.

Polling indicates a vast support among Canadians for disabled persons. We are aware of this and I think we are on the right track when we collectively as a parliament move in a way, small as it is, that recognizes the importance that the disabled community can play in this country. As the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine mentioned, businesses in the United States realize, and they are beginning to realize here in Canada, that we need those people now. We need them as skilled workers with whatever qualifications they may have to contribute to the workforce and I think we will be seeing ourselves move in that direction.

There were three principles that were enunciated in the report of the special committee entitled Obstacles. One was the importance of participation. This is one way that we can see participation not only by Members of Parliament but also members of the community who are disabled and will be making application for this award. Also, there is the concept or the principle of responsibility, namely that Canadians collectively need to have a feeling of responsibility for those in the community who are disabled. Finally, we are recognizing the fact that disabled people like to help themselves. We are going to be increasingly looking at that as the work of the standing committee proceeds.

I want to reinforce what my colleagues from across the way said, namely that the recent report of the standing committee entitled Consensus For Action: The Economic Integration of Disabled People highlights the importance that Canadians put on the need to be of assistance to disabled people in Canada.

Bill C-258 allows us as parliamentarians to recognize the importance of that concept and to move ahead now as we must do to integrate members of the disabled community both socially and economically.

My time is very quickly drawing to a close. I want to reassure the House and my colleagues that I am certainly most pleased to support this bill. I think it along the path of the thinking of the standing committee. It wants to see Parliament more involved in the issues related to disabled people. We want the community of Canadians at large to become more involved as we believe it wants to be, from what we understand from polling. I urge all colleagues in the House to accept this bill now at second reading in principle and have it referred to committee stage so that some of the little flaws in it, if there are some flaws or weaknesses, can be corrected at that stage and it can come back here for subsequent approval.

I want to commend my colleague for introducing this bill and my two colleagues across the House from the standing committee for the support I feel they have given the concept. They have also challenged us with improving the bill a bit and have challenged us on the government side to do more for the people in this country who are disabled.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to enter into this debate today on Bill C-258 and to register my unequivocal support for this proposal.

As we begin this fall session of Parliament there are a number of issues before us. It reminded me of when the House began the winter session in January 1990, for the first item of business on the table was the private member's motion I introduced on saving the Rouge Valley system as a park. I recall that motion being given unanimous support in the House of Commons, and I was pleased that it happened.

Indeed I am pleased that the first item on our autumn timetable is a discussion concerning the disabled. I am sure the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore is also pleased that it has been highlighted. It is the first issue we are dealing with of a number of issues before us.

The hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore has long been a driving force in the campaign for Canadian people to be aware of the difficulties facing the disabled. His work has been substantial, and I compliment him. He continues to to do that work. I am pleased to endorse whole-heartedly the components brought forth by the hon. member.

This bill gives us as individual members of Parliament a distinct privilege and opportunity to recognize the participation and the contributions of Canadians with disabilities. The contents of the bill before us today are something that we can achieve and can indeed be proud of.

I am reminded of the words of Neil Armstrong when he stepped on the moon in the summer of 1969 when he said: "It is one small step for man and one giant step for mankind." I believe this bill is one small step, but it reflects a giant step which has occurred in the last decade, a major step which recognizes the contribution and participation of citizens with disabilities in the life of this great Canadian nation.

Ten years ago, in 1980, Canada was just beginning to plan for the International Year of the Disabled People. Canada did not have the protections that we now enjoy in the charter, especially in section 15. The hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore did an outstanding job in chairing a parliamentary committee concerning section 15. It did not have the Employment Equity Act it now has, and Canadians with disabilities were not able to take part in our society to the extent that they are today.

Since the International Year of the Disabled People, our country has come to recognize things many of us have always known, that every individual Canadian has a role to play and makes a unique and special contribution to life in Canada. This bill recognizes the excellence of participation in public life of Canadians with disabilities.

This bill is not about money because as the facts so eloquently demonstrate the amounts of money collected from the Centennial Flame in the last decade are not large. No one is going to grow wealthy on a research grant made as a result of this bill, but recognition by the Parliament of Canada is something we must strive to achieve, a recognition of excellence made by a committee of this House.

For a moment let us view ourselves standing outside the Chamber on the steps beneath the Peace Tower. Before us lies the Centennial Flame burning bright regardless of weather and regardless of time for 23 years, burning bright to reflect the hope of peace and prosperity.

The Centennial Flame speaks to the sense of the Canadian people. Unlike the flames that burn over the graves of unknown soldiers, the flame of the Olympics, the eternal flames that burn in sacred sites, this flame reminds us of our human responsibility to reach out to every member of our society.

In conclusion, I want to stress how strongly I feel about this bill. It provides an opportunity for all of us to come together as Canadians, as representatives of Canadians, to work together, to recognize excellence, and to recognize contributions made to the public life of our nation by Canadians with disabilities.

I know many in the House wish to speak on this excellent initiative put forth by our colleague from Etobicoke—Lakeshore. I want to urge everyone here to give this bill full and complete consideration in order that passage is realized through both Houses of Parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to take a few minutes to speak in support of Bill C-258, an Act respecting the establishment of the Centennial Flame Research Award.

I am sure everyone will agree with the purpose of this proposal to establish the Centennial Flame Research Award, which is to publicize the contributions to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities.

Furthermore, there are not many opportunities for a Member of this House to discuss a concept as unique as this bill, whose purpose is to ensure that the money thrown in the fountain surrounding the Centennial Flame on Parliament Hill is used to help disabled persons in public life.

I am interested in this bill, Madam Speaker, not only because of its noble purpose but also because it concerns the Centennial Flame and its fountain. I feel this is an important symbol and that we should take the time to reflect on the principles that led to its creation.

Let us go back to the night of December 31, 1966, when then Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson lit the Centennial Flame. Thus began the year 1967 which would be remembered for its enthusiastic celebrations of the 100th anniversary of our Confederation.

At the Prime Minister's side during the ceremony were Judy Lamarsh, Secretary of State, and John Diefenbaker, Leader of the Opposition, as well as thousands of others who had braved the elements to mark the beginning of a memorable year. It was the first of a series of special events that would make Canadians realize of what this country means to them and understand the ideas that brought about such remarkable changes over the years.

You will recall that 1967 was a time of intense activity. The Centennial Train, for instance, which provided a vivid illustration of our history and the contribution made by countless cultural groups in our country, was visited by over 10 million people.

There was a heightened interest in local and regional history, and many historic sites were restored. The arts thrived. Governments, anxious to erect monuments to the occasion, financed construction projects, the most impressive being, as you will recall, the National Arts Centre here in Ottawa.

As 1967 unfolded, Canadians became aware, more than ever before, that Canada had indeed entered the modern world. The most spectacular event of that year, EXPO 67, was for many of us reason to renew our pride in being Canadian.

And so, the next December 31, when Centennial Year ended where it started, on Parliament Hill, the public asked that the Centennial Flame be kept alive. It was important for Canada to have a symbol of the spirit that brought Canadians together from coast to coast, and the Centennial Flame seemed to be the symbol we were seeking.

Since that time, the Centennial Flame has remained as a tangible memory of an important year in our common history that made us realize the immense diversity and uniqueness of the Canadian mosaic.

Nearly 25 years later, Madam Speaker, the Centennial Flame still burns on the Hill, living testimony to a year that helped us, Canadians, from coast to coast, celebrate what we are, with our similarities and our differences. I hope that by focussing on the Centennial Flame, this bill will give us an opportunity to rekindle the enthusiasm and energy of those years.

[English]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I realize the time is almost up, but it is a great pleasure to have an opportunity to stand and join with other members of this House in supporting the measure brought forth by the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore. It is a very significant piece of legislation and a very excellent idea, and I commend the hon. member for bringing it forward.

As Canadians we have looked at the Centennial Flame over the years. We think of a flame as something which gives light. We think of the Centennial Flame as something designed to foster unity among Canadians. We should reach out and see that flame as a light that is especially going to light the way for a group of Canadians who from time to time may be left out of some of the decision making. In introducing the bill my hon. friend said that it was his objective in part to provide a voice for the voiceless. He used that very significant phrase.

The idea of using the funds voluntarily donated by Canadians and others through the fountain around that flame to bring particular attention to the needs of disabled Canadians is an excellent idea. I have no reservation whatsoever in supporting this measure.

We have made significant progress in Canada in recent years in recognizing the particular needs of disabled Canadians. All too often there is a tendency to forget that these people are not the disabled they are sometimes referred to as, but rather they are people, they are Canadians, and the disability that may impact their lives in one way or another is really of secondary consequence. The important point is that they are people like the rest of us. They are citizens. They are Canadians. It is important to ensure that they have the same opportunity to participate fully in all aspects of life in Canada.

We must continue to bring to the attention of Canadians and other people the needs of these people to ensure that they have an opportunity to have access, as well a full opportunity to participate.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Speaker: If I could have the attention of the House for a moment, I know that hon. members will want me to welcome the 42 new parliamentary pages who begin their duties with us today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I had the opportunity to assist in their swearing-in ceremony on Friday and I know hon. members will be impressed with the calibre and enthusiasm these young Canadians bring to their new duties.

Moreover, I am sure that all hon. members will want to join with me in thanking the Parliamentary guides who welcomed visitors on Parliament Hill all summer long.

From May until September, these guides have acquainted over 300,000 visitors from Canada and the four corners of the world with our Parliamentary system and highlighted for them the beauty of our building.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure to be back at work.

Having said that, I would like to make a statement on the fixed link to Prince Edward Island.

Although the Environmental Review Panel did not support the fixed link project as proposed, it did conclude that transportation to P.E.I. must be improved.

I would like to reaffirm my strong support and optimism for the proposal of a fixed link to Prince Edward Island as the only viable solution.

With predicted increases in oil costs, the project will become more and more viable as the ferry system becomes more expensive. The Environmental Review Panel has identified certain areas of potential problems but these can only be addressed and overcome with time.

The resulting benefits of the fixed link are numerous, considering that construction would employ more than 2,000 people, and would increase tourism and business opportunities for Atlantic Canada.

Considering the new circumstances which will increase the cost of the ferry system, and considering all of the benefits, I urge the Department of Public Works and all those involved to overcome the objections and move on with this project.

RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, last night candlelight vigils were held around the world to focus on our society's most important resource and asset, our children.

Canada, with the United States, ranks poorest among developed nations in caring for its children. One in six children in this country are poor, numerically more than existed in 1984. In Canada, statistics tell us that infant mortality is twice as high among poor children as among rich.

Ninety per cent of the 5,000 homeless young females on the streets of Toronto have been sexually abused in their homes. The statistics for our native children in Canada rival those of Third World countries.

Worldwide, tens of thousands of children under the age of five die every day from easily preventable diseases. Many others are exploited as child labourers or experience forced induction into military forces.

If the political will exists, these shameful statistics can be turned back. Canada's ratification of the Convention on the Rights of the Child must be a beginning. Let us not be judged by future generations, today's children, for our inaction on children's issues today.

CBC

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Again, as a Francophone, Mr. Speaker, I wish to denounce the situation which prevails in the area of information in Canada.

You will recall the recent events which surrounded the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, both the Oka and Persian Gulf crises which Anglophone Canadians in this country had the privilege to watch as they happened on the CBC-Newsworld information network. Anglophone Canadians have access to an information network while Francophone Canadians are still waiting for one of their own.

Mr. Speaker, two things. When will CBC consider seriously the possibility of providing this service to Francophone Canadians? Second, when will the CRTC put some order in the fee schedule for the English information network? This service is made available at a cost of 10 cents in Hull, Montreal or Sherbrooke, but if you happen to live in the Saguenay area you have to subscribe to pay TV and it will cost you as much as $19.08.

Mr. Speaker, Francophones in this country are entitled to and expect more fairness and consideration.

TRADE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, there are 16,000 steelworkers not working in this country. They have been in a labour dispute for nearly two months and are suffering great economic hardship.

The Canadians steel producers told us not to worry; we have the binational dispute settlement mechanism as established by the free trade agreement.

Now, after two more negative rulings against Canadian steel the steel producers are hedging. Algoma Steel says they have lost faith in the free trade process of appeals. Mr. Romanko, managing director of the Canadian Steel Producers say that the government is gambling on multilateral trade negotiations rather than the free trade agreement.

Trade negotiations are not crap shoots. We gambled with the free trade agreement and we lost.

Mr. Speaker, I have read and re-read the two recent rulings that have gone against Canadian steel and I guarantee you we cannot win any ruling involving harassment from American steel producers.

Our government must abandon its passive approach, must be much more aggressive in dealings with American political interests, must lobby more diligently, must express dissatisfaction with these rulings.

If not, it should do the honourable thing: get out of the agreement before it is too late.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I have recently assisted some farmers in my constituency in taking a crop off the field that is second to none.

As all parliamentarians are aware, the drought problems of the last two years have been replaced this year by an abundance of grain. Unfortunately, due to many factors, not the least of which is an international grain subsidy war and surplus grain stocks, western Canadian agriculture's cash flow remain a very serious problem.

I have faith that in spite of our own cash problems the Government of Canada will continue to recognize the contribution that the economic health of agriculture makes toward small business and the over-all economy of Canada.

I trust that the Government of Canada will respond to this need once again.

THE SENATE

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, one of the Prime Minister's appointees to the Senate, by her actions, questions his judgment and by her statements to the press, virtually declares herself unfit for the office.

Newly appointed Pat Carney, in a display of a remarkable lack of judgment, insensitivity to the demographic realities of Canada, and a sneering condescending attitude toward both parliamentary practice and to basic Canadian principles of tolerance for differences in our pluralistic, multicultural society, has proven herself unworthy and unfit for the appointment.

When she has no respect for the Prime Minister's other appointments, how can Canadians respect them or her. She has damaged both the reputation of her colleagues to be and that of the Senate. Like the John Buchanan appointment, she brings the Senate and the process into disrepute.

The Prime Minister should look for an honourable way out before her appointment is challenged in the courts. Canadians will applaud his effort to do so or condemn his persistence that is perverse acquiescence to Ms. Carney's contempt for our fundamental Canadian principles.

THE LATE ALLAN MCKINNON

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I know members will join with me in mourning the passing of a former colleague and dear friend, the Hon. Allan McKinnon.

Allan McKinnon served as the member of Parliament for Victoria from 1972 to 1988 and was re-elected four times. In 1979 and 1980, under the Right Hon. Joe Clark, he served as both Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Allan McKinnon was born and raised in Saskatchewan and was a proud Canadian. While serving as an officer with the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry in Italy in 1943, he was awarded the Military Cross for valour.

On behalf of the House, I extend our deepest heartfelt sympathy to Allan's wife Elizabeth and sons Ian and Peter.

Mr. Speaker, you and I were elected with the same class as he. I am now sitting in the seat which the Hon. Mr. McKinnon had prior to leaving Parliament in 1988.

THE PRESS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, one of the most disturbing aspects of the Oka situation is the cutting off of cellular phones and other means of communication essential to the jobs of journalists by the Canadian Army in conjunction with the Sûreté du Québec on dubious legal and factual grounds.

Why is this serious and outrageous? Freedom of the press is a fundamental right in a democratic society. It is often the first right to go on the slippery road to tyranny.

I ask Canadians to pause for a moment. Here is a real crisis where actions and not just words count—a real test. The Charter of Rights appears to have been ignored by the Minister of Justice and her government.

It is not up to the government, the Army, the Warrior Society or anyone else as to what is printed and shown. It is the responsibility of a free press. That is a fundamental right in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Waddell: We call on the government to respect this right. Also, we call on the House of Commons to send a group of members to Oka forthwith to negotiate an honourable disengagement and, as part of that, to reaffirm the fundamental Canadian principle of freedom of the press.

THE SENATE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I find it intriguing that during the 20 years of the Pearson–Trudeau governments, whenever some well–known Liberal was appointed to the Senate, he or she was referred to as a distinguished Canadian.

Now that we have a PC government, the implication seems to exist that there is something sordid about the idea that a Tory government might appoint Senators with Tory backgrounds.

Quite to the contrary, I compliment the Prime Minister on his recent appointment of 15 distinguished Canadians to the Senate, who happen to be Tories.

None has been more appropriate than that of a man who has served his province for 23 years, 12 of them as premier, who has contributed significantly to the national unity of this country and who, to the horror of all fair–minded Nova Scotians, has been the victim this past summer of a campaign of slander by a disgruntled and vindictive former public servant. No Canadian should be discriminated against simply because of unsubstantiated allegations.

John Buchanan will make an excellent Senator, and I compliment the Prime Minister for this appointment.

THE SENATE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on this first day after the resumption of the sitting of Parliament, let us remember what one great Canadian said about patronage.

On June 25, 1984, he said: "My government would reduce the partisan political appointments."

Some hon. members: Who said that?

Mr. Boudria: On July 9, 1984, he said: "I commit myself to set up criteria which will impress the Canadian people."

On July 16, he said: "Previous political appointments were a fraud, a deceit and a sham."

On July 16, 1984 he said: "Conservative appointments would represent the highest quality of people.

Some hon. members: Who said that?

Mr. Boudria: "Who said that?" my colleagues ask. Well, the present Prime Minister did.

As sad and as bad as the appointment of John Buchanan is to the Senate, it could have been worse. The Prime Minister could have appointed himself.

ENERGY

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, last week the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources visited Alberta and Saskatchewan to hear testimony on the role of the oil sands and the future of Canadian energy supplies.

What we heard was a clear and consistent message that oil sands production is essential to our future and that the government must act now to ensure that oil sands developments are completed in time to meet our country's urgent needs.

In my view, what is needed is a clear policy that encourages such developments as well as much needed conservation.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Finance must get together and develop taxation policies that promote equally the development of necessary energy resources and cost–effective conservation.

CANADA POST

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a message for the Government of Canada from the residents of Meadowood Manor, constituents of mine. It reads as follows:

We, the undersigned, wish to protest the proposed postal rate increase of one cent by Canada Post and the three cent goods and services tax which will raise the basic letter rate to 43 cents.

We all know that our seniors use the mails in a significant kind of way to communicate to their families and friends. They are angry at this massive increase in the postal rate.

I invite all Canadians to reject the Goods and Services Tax as well as the postal rate increase. We need to support our seniors and to improve the quality of life and this is one way in which we could do it for them.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I had better decline comment on that except to say that it is appreciated. I think my colleagues expect me to begin, in fact, by directing my first question to the Prime Minister.

Canadians have watched with shock and dismay while the neglect and ineptitude of the Prime Minister and his government has meant that the crisis at Oka–Kanesatake has gone on for more than 75 days without a fair and reasonable solution being arrived at.

Will the Prime Minister at last recognize that the Canadian constitution has placed the responsibility for our native peoples squarely on the shoulders of the Prime Minister and his government? Will the Prime Minister, as a result, finally begin to show leadership to bring about a fair, reasonable, and honourable solution to the crisis? Will he begin by replacing his Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with a minister who has a better understanding of that fundamental constitutional responsibility?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my hon. friend on his continuance in office.

I can tell him that the government has never doubted at all its important constitutional obligations in regard to the native peoples. Successive governments, including this one, have made important advances in regard to the protection and the enhancement of the rights and achievements of native peoples but a great deal remains to be done.

With regard to the problem at Oka that my hon. friend raises, we have taken actions which will be the subject of debate in the House tomorrow. We purchased the land and are ready to transfer that land to the natives and the leadership at Oka, as soon as the guns are put down and the acceptance of law and order, which must prevail across Canada, is accepted by those who have hijacked an otherwise entirely peaceful community.

The Government of Canada looks forward to working with the leadership at Oka and elsewhere as soon as that is accomplished so that together we can bring a much greater degree of social justice to natives there and elsewhere.

THE PRESS

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, our Canadian Constitution also guarantees rights of association, movement, and communication, including rights of freedom of the press. Yet, in recent days we have seen all too many breaches of those rights at Oka–Kanesatake.

I ask the Prime Minister: does he condone those breaches of basic human rights, including freedom of the press? If not, will he take basic steps to see that those rights are protected? How can dialogue, bringing about the fair and peaceful solution he talks about, be undertaken if the Mohawks at Oka cannot even make a telephone call and the press is prevented from telling Canadians what is really going on there?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should bear in mind what the situation is in Oka, where we have the dénouement of the situation. It has resulted in a situation where in the treatment centre, in addition to journalists, there are people who are suspected of being in violation of the criminal law of Canada. The law enforcement authorities are attempting to bring those people before the appropriate authorities to determine whether charges should be laid and to allow the judicial process to go forward.

A review of the law of freedom of speech in Canada and the right of freedom of the press would reveal that that law, as it has been discussed by the court, contemplates, depending on the circumstances, that some limitations might be imposed on the access by the press of information.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would simply indicate a principle which says that "reporting of criminal activity, such as hostage takings, will be done in a fashion that does not knowingly endanger lives, tamper attempts by authorities to conclude the event, offer comfort and support, or provide vital information to the perpetrators". That is a statement from the code of ethics of the Radio–Television News Directors Association of Canada.

An hon. member: We need a new Minister of Justice too.

An hon. member: Resign. That is disgraceful.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians will agree that that is a disgraceful answer from someone who is supposed to be the Minister of Justice of the country. The journalists at Oka are not suspected of criminal activity, except perhaps by this government, because they are trying to do their jobs.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when will the government give newsmen and others at Oka their constitutionally protected rights? In addition, will the Prime Minister launch an immediate parliamentary inquiry into the situation in Oka, and will the government set up immediately a royal commission on native issues so as to find quicker and better solutions, as suggested by my colleague the Member for Western Arctic?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition knows full well that the Minister of Justice never suggested that newsmen should break Canadian laws. But she did say that others had broken certain laws, and of course we know she was referring to the Warriors who made a difficult situation even worse during the summer. You had the solution concerning the Warriors, Jean Chrétien's solution as reported in the Journal de Montréal of September 6: "Let the Warriors go free, simply arrest them later". I can tell you that it is not the position of the Canadian government. The Warriors are subject to Canadian laws like everybody else.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, as a First Canadian, I am ashamed of what is happening in this country and I am hurt that the government would assault my people in this manner. It cannot continue to ask us to pick and choose between ourselves because, as aboriginal people of Canada, we will not do that.

This morning the members of the Liberal caucus were briefed by the aboriginal leaders from Kanesatake and Kahnawake. Those negotiators presented us with their proposal for an honourable and peaceful disengagement of the Armed Forces and the people at the treatment centre.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, what do he and his government have against a peaceful solution? Why has he chosen tanks, razor wire, and tear gas over a negotiated political settlement with the Mohawk citizens? Where is the leadership this country so much needs, Mr. Prime Minister?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Siddon: —over the course of the next few days in the House, all members will be participating in a serious and mature debate about our aboriginal Canadians.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. members: Order, order!

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I believe hon. members want to engage in a dispassionate debate about serious matters affecting the aboriginal people of Canada. All Canadians share the sense of anguish arising out of the tragic events at Oka and Kahnawake during the past several weeks and all Canadians agree that we should work together to find a peaceful means of resolving this serious issue. In order to find that peaceful solution, the federal government has acted with great prudence and restraint in support—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I would like to move on. Would the Hon. Member for Western Arctic put a short question?

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed again to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Prime Minister, quit hiding from the Canadian citizens.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that is not a question. Would she put her question, please?

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, why are the Prime Minister and his government abandoning their fiduciary responsibility for aboriginal peoples as set out in the Constitution of Canada? Why do you insist on playing an adversarial role? You should be an—

An hon. member: Order, order!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that the question must be put through the Speaker. The Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure my friend that, contrary to the assertion, I not only acknowledge but respect full well the importance of the fiduciary role that the Government of Canada accepts in respect to its native peoples. We have been seeking to fulfil precisely that.

I think my hon. friend would acknowledge that when certain individuals, a small group of certain individuals, many from another country, take up arms and seek to resist the reasonable application of the laws of Canada, that—

Ms. Blondin: You should have used the emergency measures legislation.

• (1430)

Mr. Mulroney: I think my hon. friend would agree that that causes some difficulty and that the Government of Canada has tried with restraint to deal with this and to bring it to a peaceful resolution without loss of life.

In that regard, I know my hon. friend, even with her deeply felt convictions, will want to join the House in congratulating all members of the Armed Forces of Canada for their forbearance in an otherwise very difficult situation.

I look forward to working with my hon. friend and all members of the House from all political parties, not only in engaging in the debate, but also in bringing forward measures that will achieve a greater degree of justice for native Canadians.

My hon. friend prefaced her remarks with a suggestion that I should quit hiding from Canadian citizens. May I say respectfully that is advice that she should give to her own leader.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

While this government continued its old style, cynical politics over the summer of avoiding consultation with the Canadian public and avoiding the Parliament of Canada, this country went through a tremendous turmoil. Canadian forces have been sent to a potential combat zone in the Middle East. We have seen the very tragic spectacle of Canadian citizens on Canadian streets fighting with the police and the Canadian army. We have seen images of food being withheld from Canadian citizens and now we see the censorship of the Canadian press.

Given the gravity of these crises this summer and given the fact that this Prime Minister has previously recalled Parliament in much less grave instances, I ask the Prime Minister why he did not call the Canadian Parliament back this summer to debate these issues before he took action?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in June, by unanimous consent of the House, including the New Democratic Party, it was agreed to adjourn until September 24. While we did hear on whatever issue came up over the course of the summer calls to return the House, they were never accompanied by the follow-on for precisely what would be the purpose.

If the Leader of the New Democratic Party has specific suggestions for legislation that could be brought before this House to deal with those issues, we anxiously await hearing them and will treat them with the respect they deserve.

Ms. McLaughlin: Yes, I have specific suggestions for the government. I suggest the federal government take its responsibility to aboriginal people and to Canadians seriously and, once and for all, take some action, have an open debate and listen to what Canadians have to say.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

As the Prime Minister knows, the situation at Kanesatake and Kahnawake is far from settled. Yes, I can tell him what I would do. I repeat my call of last month that a parliamentary all-party delegation be formed to go to Kahnawake and Kanesatake to investigate the situation there. I have been to Oka three times. I call on the Prime Minister to facilitate the development of that kind of parliamentary delegation because it is time politicians took the responsibility and did not just give it to the army.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend indeed made a very useful suggestion during the course of the late summer with regard to the manner in which some of the land claims could be dealt with. I think clearly that all Canadians acknowledge we have a serious problem with regard to the manner in which land claims have traditionally been dealt with by successive Canadian governments. I look forward to hearing her further advice and comments in this regard during the course of the debate which I understand will take place tomorrow.

That having been said, I think my hon. friend will recognize that the land claim issue that arose at Oka was indeed in the process of being finalized. The Government of Canada has procured the land, but this has been transferred into something entirely different from a question of land claim. There was a group of people, many of them from the United States, who hijacked an otherwise entirely peaceful community. The Government of Canada responded to a legitimate request from the Government of Quebec pursuant to the National Defence Act to provide the Canadian army for peacekeeping purposes, and they have done that extremely well.

That concept of bearing arms in Canada in those circumstances is fundamentally hostile to our kind of citizenship, and only when those arms are put down peaceably and order has been restored will the Government of Canada engage in the kind of very productive negotiations that will bring about the kinds of justice my friend is talking about.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Prime Minister that right at this moment there are proposals to end this conflict right now and the government is refusing to negotiate, so I would question the sincerity of that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Canadians wonder why the conflict at Kahnawake and Kanesatake started and why it is still going on. All these questions remain unanswered: the role of the Prime Minister, the role played by the Premier of Quebec, the role of the army and the Quebec Provincial Police, the role played by the Mohawks and the issue of illegal weapons, and also the control of journalists.

Mr. Speaker, what we now need is a public inquiry. Does the Prime Minister intend to order a public inquiry into this situation?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend mentioned a public inquiry. I agree that at the appropriate time perhaps we should consider the possibility of having some kind of inquiry into these events. However, first of all, order must be restored in this region not far from Montreal. The law applies to everyone: Natives, Whites, everyone in Canada. We must all obey the same laws and, as soon as that is settled, the government will be more than pleased to take the kind of action suggested by my hon. friend.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs. It is bad enough that the government has abdicated its federal responsibility over Indian affairs to the Quebec government but worse still, it has abdicated its authority over important decisions affecting this matter to the army and to the Quebec police, decisions which should be made at the political level.

Last week in Toronto the Iroquois Confederacy and John Ciaccia concluded an agreement which would have dealt with the long stand–off at the treatment centre at Oka, but this was left to the army and the police and was not taken up at the political level.

I want to ask the minister: when is he going to take up his responsibilities and deal with this important agreement which was concluded in Toronto, an agreement which would have settled this long–standing stand–off? When is he going to show some leadership?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, who is a Privy Councillor, understands the Constitution of Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member seeks an answer to his question and I think other members would like to hear the answer as well.

The Government of Canada has been seeking to solve the land issues at Kanesatake for three years. In fact, on May 6 I made a commitment to seek to acquire the land at Kanesatake which was in dispute.

A number of proposals have come forward and been negotiated with various parties. In each case those proposals have failed because they have put constitutional questions and land claims questions ahead of the laws of Canada. They have failed in the final instance because the warriors at the Kanesatake treatment centre are asking for sovereignty and immunity from Canadian laws. I cannot imagine any member opposite accepting that kind of proposition.

• (1440)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered my question.

We had an agreement concluded by a Quebec minister with the Iroquois Confederacy, an agreement to settle this long stand–off at the treatment centre. The representative of the Confederacy could not even discuss it with the people in the treatment centre. The army would not let them do it because the minister had not given instructions for them to act properly.

This a political issue. Why will the minister not consider this agreement made in Toronto, an agreement which could settle this long–standing stand–off, instead of dealing with red herrings. Get down to business.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is very simple. In this country we do not have different laws for different people.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Siddon: Canadians I have heard from these past several weeks believe we should not negotiate complex land claims issues at the point of a gun. When the guns are laid down, the federal government has committed itself to get back to settling the land issue at Kanesatake, but not until the guns are laid down and order is restored to that community.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, that is the minister who signed an agreement with a masked warrior.

On August 11, 1987, this government recalled Parliament in order to deal with the issue of 174 refugees who arrived on Canada's shores by boat. Does the minister not consider Canada's native peoples and the Oka situation at least equally important? Why did the government not recall Parliament to deal with this issue?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I could tell the hon. member that a great deal of effort was expended during the summer months dealing with parties with a view to seeking a peaceful disengagement of this conflict. I can assure the hon. member that most aboriginal leaders with whom I have met over the course of the past many weeks do not condone violence or the use of arms to achieve their end. They have supported the course of action this government has taken to deal with the law first and then to settle the land issue.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): And completely ignored the legitimate voice of all Canada's people to hear the Parliament of Canada.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has just assured this House that he seeks a peaceful and just settlement of our native issues and Oka.

Would the Prime Minister be good enough to give this House the names of Canada's native leaders with whom he has met to resolve this issue?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I can speak for the government, for myself and several other ministers who have been meeting throughout the summer with native leaders across Canada. I have met with national assemblies of chiefs in Winnipeg. In Ottawa only two weeks ago I met with provincial assemblies of chiefs from across the country. The responsible leadership of the aboriginal communities of Canada do not support or condone lawlessness or the taking up of arms against society.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on every occasion that a reasonable proposal for a peaceful settlement at Oka has been proposed, including the the nine point proposal advanced by the Iroquois Confederacy or the agreement reached a few days ago with Quebec's Minister of Native Affairs, the Liberal premier of Quebec has stubbornly refused to accept any settlement short of unconditional surrender of the Mohawks at Oka.

Will the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development explain to this House why he did not step in to exercise Canada's exclusive jurisdiction over Indians and, in accordance with his trust responsibility for native Indians, to negotiate a peaceful and honourable settlement to this situation?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, for the same reason that I and other ministers have explained ourselves not only today but throughout the summer.

If the hon. member would search his office he would find 31 separate communications from my office explaining why we do not negotiate sensitive land issues at the point of a gun—

Some hon. members: You did.

Mr. Siddon: —held by individuals who are not interested in abiding by the laws of Canada but who proclaim their independent sovereignty, who seek sovereign enclaves free and immune from the application of the laws of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): My supplementary question is for the same minister, Mr. Speaker.

This minister has narrowly interpreted the Oka and Kahnawake incidents as criminal matters in order to justify abandoning jurisdiction over natives in Quebec to the Government of Quebec because he fears that if Canada exercises its jurisdiction over natives in Quebec and exercises its full sovereignty and trust responsibility for natives in Quebec, then sovereignists in his own caucus who support Premier Bourassa are going to walk the floor and join the party opposite.

Will the minister not admit that he is being held to ransom by sovereignists in his own caucus?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the point is that responsible aboriginal leaders in Canada do not condone the taking up of arms.

I could quote, for example, from Konrad Sioui, the vice-chief of the Assembly of First Nations of Quebec. Mr. Sioui said: "From day one in the current dispute we spoke out against the use of weapons. We always sought peace".

We seek peace first. Then we will resolve these land issues in which we have been engaged and seeking long-term solutions for many, many years.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of the Right Hon. Bernard Weatherill, Speaker of the British House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

We have just heard the minister say that he will not negotiate at the end of a gun or at the end of a rifle. However, as pointed out earlier by my colleague, we saw on national TV the same minister signing a deal in Oka.

On August 17 of this year the minister sent a letter to the office of the Kanesatake Mohawk negotiating team outlining the deal they had made with regard to the land in question. In there it says, and I quote: "In accordance with the agreement with the municipality this deal will close within 10 days of the removal of the barricades". The barricades have been down for some time. When is the minister going to honour the agreement he made with the office of the Kanesatake negotiating team?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing to the attention of this House an important point.

We closed and concluded that deal on September 14 in full compliance with our undertaking.

• (1450)

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, the minister announced earlier that there will be an ensuing debate over the next few days on aboriginal issues. With the way the government has been acting over the summer, it does not seem to recognize aboriginal rights.

If the minister is going to be announcing any programs over the next few days, how can we be assured that he will follow through on them?

Mr. Speaker: Procedurally this may be a slightly hypothetical question. The minister may wish to deal with it.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this government has nothing to apologize for in terms of our record of progress on behalf of Canada's aboriginal people.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the evidence of that—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister could direct his answer to the question.

Mr. Siddon: The evidence of our commitment to resolving land claims issues is to be found in the conclusion of historic agreements all across northern Canada between the federal government and the Dene–Métis people, the Tungavik Federation of Nunavut, and the Council of Yukon Indians.

I personally attended with the hon. member for Nunatsiaq the signing of the agreement in principle with the Inuit people in Igloolik on April 30.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, as you know, the Government of Quebec has implemented a compensation plan for the communities of Oka and Châteauguay. I want to ask the following questions.

First of all, does the federal government intend to share the tax burden with the Government of Quebec? Second, does the federal government intend to provide full compensation for the people of the South Shore, Southwest Montreal, Lachine, LaSalle, Émard, Kahnesatake and Kahnawake?

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this question illustrates the tragic side of this kind of development when people take up arms against the necessary order in society that we should all uphold in this House.

We have received representation from both the native and non–native residents in the vicinity of Oka, and we are examining proposals from those parties. But I might point out that many weeks ago we conveyed in writing our commitment to continue the process of resolving the land issue at Kanesatake and to include an important economic and social component in the settlement of those matters together with the resolution of all of the land issues.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, that is a fudge. The Government of Quebec has already proceeded to compensation. It is crucial, if we are to begin the process of reconciliation between the diverse populations, that those people who have suffered not be made to bear the burden of this government's dithering.

The question is: Are you going to compensate the populations of the south shore—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that questions must go through the Chair.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, when we receive proposals from the Government of Quebec and have a chance to review them, we will consider all these factors.

I want to point out that my colleagues from the vicinity of Oka have made these recommendations, and we have them well in hand at the present time.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Two years ago when the Conservative government sent peacekeeping troops to the Middle East the then Minister of National Defence said: "When such a major new undertaking is given I have a moral responsibility to report to the people's representatives to ask for their support".

Why did the Prime Minister abandon this moral responsibility referred to by the Minister of National Defence by sending Canadian troops into the Persian Gulf without recalling Parliament for over six weeks? Why this contempt for Parliament?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister announced on August 10 the deployment of Canadian troops to join with—

Some hon. members: We know that.

Mr. McKnight: Members of the NDP say that they know that. They probably also realize the tradition or convention that there will be after the Order in Council has been placed within 10 days a debate.

I would suggest to hon. members, through you, Mr. Speaker, that several changes that have taken place through the UN auspices and through diplomatic channels supported by Canada mean now the debate will take place with knowledge. I think that would make for a much better debate than what the member would have been involved in had it taken place earlier.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, we wanted a debate at the time because Canadians want our country to be part of a clear UN peacekeeping effort. They do not want a Prime Minister who is simply a lap dog for George Bush.

My question is again for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister agree to send our troops no farther than the Gulf of Oman, strictly to enforce UN Resolution 665, and cancel the CF-18s? Will Canada use its position on the security council of the United Nations to urge that all troops in the gulf be placed not under United States direction but under clear United Nations command? Will he play that important peacekeeping role?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made some suggestions that he will be able to make later. I would suggest to him that historically, Canada, indeed successive governments representing the people of Canada have taken action to deter aggression. They have taken action to show the world that might is not right.

In this case the hon. member says under the UN. In some cases he is right, but I refer to two world wars and a Korean war where the Canadian men and women who served deterring aggression paid a very dear price.

The hon. member is suggesting that we not provide to our men and women on those ships in the Persian Gulf the cover of defensive aircraft, the CF-18, to provide them with the best protection that we can, doing the job that they are doing on behalf of the people of Canada.

Oral Questions

FREE TRADE

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade regarding the proposed U.S.—Mexico free trade negotiations.

Will the minister confirm whether cabinet has decided to participate in the talks and, if so, on what basis? Frankly, can he tell us what requests have been made and what so far have been the responses?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the government has decided that Canada should involve itself and participate in tri-lateral discussions with the United States and Mexico that would lead to a North American free trade market if an agreement is reached.

The present stage of the matter is that the President is likely, today or very shortly, to be sending a message to Congress to ask Congress for authority to enter into bilateral negotiations with Mexico. He must get authority for bilateral negotiations and trade matters. He will be advising the Congress of our intention to discuss with both parties a trilateral agreement as has been recommended by most groups in Canada that have studied or thought about the matter.

We will be entering into—

Mr. Barrett: What is there to protect?

Mr. Crosbie: This is extraordinary: you are not allowed to answer a question because of the rowdies in the NDP, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister can do the best he can.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, we will be starting a process of consultations with the representatives of Mexico and the United States over the next several months, looking at the scope, the elements, and the procedures that will form the basis for subsequent negotiations if all of those consultations prove to be satisfactory.

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: It may surprise the House that the Question Period will be extended by a couple of minutes because of the earlier interventions.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The minister must know that Quebec agricultural producers are extremely concerned about the future as a result of the positions which the federal government will take in the current round of GATT negotiations in Geneva. They are quite aware that the government, despite the very firm commitments it made to them, has agreed to negotiate under terms of reference which, if accepted, will destroy the supply support program and the stabilization measures.

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister to give Quebec producers the immediate and firm commitment that he will defend and safeguard the entire supply management system and all the financial stabilization measures it entails.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. He should know that during the summer I went to Geneva to meet with all delegations, the American delegation, the European delegation, the Japanese and the Australians, to explain Canada's position.

We have always said that we would strongly defend the interests of Canadian and Quebec producers, and that is what we did. I conclude by saying simply that last week we had a meeting with the negotiation team, the UPA president, the president of the Coopérative fédérée du Québec who, in a letter sent to the Prime Minister Tuesday, expressed their full satisfaction and enthusiasm about the position taken by Canada.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister just made an important statement about the decision of this government to participate in trade talks involving Canada, the United States and Mexico.

Yet this is the same minister—

Mr. Speaker: I know that the hon. member would want to co-operate. This is the end of Question Period. Please put the question.

Mr. MacLaren: When is the minister going to come forward with all the reasons why the government has made this decision and explain to the Canadian people what are the goals that Canada seeks in these trade talks?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. gentleman on his appointment as the Official Opposition critic on trade. He shows great promise compared to the last incumbent.

With respect to the question, I was following the advice of the MP for Broadview—Greenwood, the hon. member for Lasalle—Émard, and the Ontario caucus chairman, who all recommended this course.

When I saw that sanity had returned to some of the members of the Liberal caucus, I thought this was the time to go for it.

Mr. Speaker: I think all hon. members are prepared to listen to a statement by the minister.

THE LATE ALLAN MCKINNON

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, members of the House will know of the death on Wednesday of the Hon. Allan McKinnon, a distinguished member of this House for 16 years, a Minister of National Defence, Minister of Veterans Affairs and a very good friend to many of us in all parties and among the people who serve Parliament.

Allan McKinnon's life was one of public service; in the Canadian Army from 1939 to 1965, as a teacher, as a trustee and then as chairman of the Greater Victoria School Board and as a member of this House.

Tributes

Nearly 50 years ago while fighting in Italy, he was awarded the Military Cross for valour, and other honours and offices came to him later. He was a man to whom others turned naturally for leadership.

Allan McKinnon sat in the highest councils of this country and took part directly in some of the critical discussions of world war and peace at the NATO table. He was effective and respected there. But what he enjoyed most about being a member of Parliament was the opportunity it gave him to help ordinary people whom the system had forgotten or abused. It is easy to lose perspective in public life, to forget why we are here or whom we serve; Allan McKinnon never forgot. He never failed to serve the people of Victoria who elected him.

He was born and raised in Saskatchewan. Adlai Stevenson once said that on the prairies you can see a long way in all directions and prairie people like to believe that at our best, we are long-sighted, generous and fair. Allan McKinnon was one of our best. He served me and our country with a combination of wisdom and dry humour that was both rare and invaluable. As an officer, a teacher, a trustee, a parliamentarian and a man, his motive was a straightforward sense of duty which he exercised consistently and compassionately.

To his wife Elizabeth, to his sons Peter and Ian and their families and to the larger family of the friends and admirers of Allan McKinnon we express our condolence and our thanks for the privilege of knowing a wise and a gentle man whose compassion, strength and humour enlarged our lives.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Liberal Party I want to say that it was with very deep regret that we learned of the passing of the Hon. Allan Bruce McKinnon, former member for Victoria, former Minister of National Defence and Veterans Affairs, a dedicated public servant.

I agree entirely with the statement just made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs because Allan McKinnon was an individual who could see over the horizons and look into the beyond. He loved his job as a member of Parliament and looked upon his attaining the Ministry of National Defence as an outstanding goal along his life's career.

We extend our sincere sympathy and condolences to his wonderful wife, Elizabeth, to whom Allan was always very devoted, and to his two sons, Ian and Peter. In our personal conversations during the years that he spent in this House he often spoke of his wife and family and we must say a word about the other partner in public life. Elizabeth was, in the eyes of many of us, an ideal life partner for a person who had to face the decisions, the problems and the general workload of a person dedicated to the public life of his country. She was always uplifting in her remarks.

Having been born in Saskatchewan and having been a teacher, he always talked about the prairies and education. After a distinguished career in Canada's Armed Forces, he served on the school board for greater Victoria and other distinguished organizations. My colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Denis, always said that Allan McKinnon was one of the most dedicated members of the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence during the years that he chaired that committee. Allan was active on the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence for many years. As a person who took part in many NATO delegations from this Parliament to other NATO countries, he was always a Canadian first when abroad. He was a firm believer that when a Canadian delegation, made up of all parties from both Houses of Parliament went abroad, the group should speak with a common voice.

During his 16 years in this House of Commons, he made many friends and took his duties seriously. His life as an MP is one that can be looked up to with respect and it is an example for others to follow. We must ever remember when in this House that the example we, as MPs portray is one that will always stick with us. Allan McKinnon's example will wear well with time.

• (1510)

We want to say to his wife Elizabeth, his two sons and his host of friends that Allan McKinnon's memory will wear well with all of us here in the House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the caucus of the New Democratic Party and, particularly on behalf of the people of Victoria, to join with the statements of regret and yet admiration and respect for Allan McKinnon.

Allan, apart from all the other things that have been said about him, was a person who was truly loved and respected in Victoria. He worked very hard at his job as a member of Parliament. He loved the part of the job of working for constituents and solving individual problems. That gave him a great deal of satisfaction which was returned by the people of Victoria, not only in successive majorities of astonishing proportion, but as well by the love and affection with which he was held. One ran into it everywhere and I know that he will be missed by the people of our community.

Allan McKinnon served this country beyond just the community. He was a man of great courage. I agree with the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he was a quiet and gentle man. Yet under that was a toughness and a determination which I suspect was born not only of Scottish ancestry or growing up on the prairies, but his experience in the Second World War where he was in active duty in Italy, Belgium and Holland. He never forgot that. He never forgot the veterans, whom he served in this Parliament and in the cabinet.

Allan McKinnon loved Parliament. I had a chance to chat with him just after he retired and I took over as the member of Parliament for Victoria. He said that what he really liked about the job was that, apart from the opportunity to serve constituents, it gave him a front row seat in the decision-making. He would have enjoyed today I think and enjoyed many days in this Parliament because he really loved that aspect of the life of being a member of Parliament.

He was a strong defender of seniors even when his government strayed, he thought, occasionally from what it ought to have done. He also was very effective in securing for Victoria its share of federal support, particularly on the Conference Centre, one of his great achievements which will stand for Allan McKinnon in the centre of Victoria. I would hope that his contribution to that Conference Centre will be recognized in a formal way by the city council in Victoria.

I join with the other members of the House in condolences to his wife Elizabeth and to his family.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask that all hon. members stand with me for one minute of silence.

[Editor's Note: The House stood in silence.]

REMARKS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief point of order I want to raise in respect of the question asked by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway which I contend was out of order for two reasons. First, it anticipated an Order of the Day and, second, it contained a gratuitous personal insult to the Prime Minister.

I recognize the question has been asked. I raise it only because when practices occur which are not challenged, they become routine and part of our traditions. I would not like to see that happen in this instance.

Mr. Speaker: I must assure the hon. House Leader, as I assure all hon. members, that complaints of this nature are considered seriously by the Speaker. I hope that we shall be able to proceed with a minimum of such complaints and, where they are serious, that those comments would be considered in the spirit in which they are meant in the interests of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RESIGNATION OF THE HON. MEMBER FOR BEAUSÉJOUR

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, it has already been six years since the people of Westmorland and Kent elected me to represent them in the House of Commons. I have always felt it a great honour and privilege to be entrusted with this responsibility, and I have always taken great pride in trying to be a worthy representative of my constituents.

A great deal has changed in six years, however, so much so that today, the circumstances are such that I must make a major decision. The decision was made in consultation with the executive of the Liberal Association of Beauséjour, and I want to stress that it was unanimous. We have decided to give the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada an opportunity to go before the electorate in the riding of Beauséjour and represent that riding in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced this decision is in the best interests of the people of Beauséjour and that the Leader of the Liberal Party will be a strong and energetic defender of that riding in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore wish to tender my resignation as the member for Beauséjour in order to yield my seat to the leader of my party.

Before I sit down, I would like to take this opportunity to thank sincerely the people of Beauséjour for the trust they have placed in me during the past six years. Mr. Speaker, this is something for which I will always be grateful.

[English]

I would also like to assure the people of Beauséjour that in my new duties I will always be within their reach and I will have their best interests at heart.

I would also like to express my deepest gratitude to all members of the House and particularly to my caucus colleagues who have all contributed to making these last six years the most memorable of my life.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, you yourself and all those who have sat in the Speaker's chair always made it a pleasure to take part in the proceedings of this House, and I want to thank you very much.

In concluding, I hope the Prime Minister will call a by-election as soon as possible, to ensure that the people of Beauséjour are represented in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, I haven't left yet, but I must admit I am already making plans to come back! I intend to return after the next general election.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: If I may have the attention of the House for a moment. I have several questions of privilege this afternoon. The first notice is from the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

PRIVILEGE

SEATING IN THE HOUSE

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, since last June my colleagues and I, now grouped under the banner of the Bloc Québécois, have been the object of repeated attacks from members of this House about the legitimacy of our action in the House of Commons.

For quite some time, Mr. Speaker, I was hoping that the outcome of the election in Laurier—Sainte-Marie—67.8 per cent— would put an end to such questions. I notice they have precious little to say on the other side, all they got was 3.9 per cent.

Again this morning the member for Kamloops and NDP House leader stated that the members of the Bloc Québécois were members—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that in the case of a question of privilege it is necessary to establish the circumstances or facts which may prevent a member from performing his normal duties. Again I find it hard to see how there could be a question of privilege in this instance. The hon. member may make a comment of course, but I would ask him to guide the Chair as to the nature of his question of privilege.

Mr. Gérin: I can understand your reaction, Mr. Speaker. For that matter, I will refer as a precedent to the statements which you allowed made by the hon. member for York South—Weston last March when he accused Separatists or Sovereignists of treachery, prejudice and racism. On that occasion, you let the hon. member speak us in the House for a long time on.

And here he goes again accusing us of treachery. Mr. Speaker, such statements made this House do infringe an hon. member's privilege. I have received over 100 letters from all over Canada, which claim that I have no right to sit in this House. My privileges are being trampled on. And when, as Speaker of this House, you do not allow me to sit with my fellow Quebec Sovereignists, you are playing in their hands, something you have no right to do. I suggest that this question of privilege must be ruled on once and for all.

May I remind you that, last March, you had allowed the hon. member for York South—Weston to discuss at lengh this issue and other members to intervene. If we are unable to settle this matter once and for all, I just do not see how the House could move ahead quickly with its agenda.

Mr. Speaker, all I am asking you is to be allowed to raise this question of privilege based on the difficulties which I face because of these outrageous statements made today on Canada AM on a national television network and publicly again in this House by other members. If you are anxious to see this House move ahead quickly with its agenda and go on with its business—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has certainly a grievance. It is undoubtedly a grievance. However, surely the hon. member will understand that the Chair must conduct the business of the House according to Standing Orders. Of course, when necessary, I may consider a motion dealing with a question of privilege and take all circumstances into account. Yet, I must say that sometimes statements made outside the House by an hon. member cause a lot of distress and anxiety. Partly, of course, this is just politics. The hon. member may have a grievance. If the hon. member wants to see changes in the Standing Orders of this House, I would ask him and his colleagues to discuss the matter with me. There is of course a procedure for presenting a motion or request regarding the Standing Orders of this House, but a question of privilege is very rare, and in any case, the circumstances that make it impossible for the hon. member to continue to perform his duties as a member of the House of Commons of Canada must be put before the House, before the Speaker.

It is clear the hon. member may have a grievance, but this is not a question of privilege. I also think members should understand that as your Speaker, I have some discretion in dealing with the rights of every person in this House who is in a minority position. I think we have a great tradition of protecting the rights of minorities, and I can assure the hon. member that the rights of minorities will be protected by the Speaker in a way that is fair and equitable for all other members.

I would ask the hon. member for his co-operation, since I realize the Speaker must rely on the co-operation of all members, but I must interrupt the hon. member because this is not a question of privilege. The hon. member may be referring to another matter that was before the House a few months ago. I remember the situation well, and at the time I also had to apply the Standing Orders of this House in a way that was fair and equitable. I am sorry, but although the hon. member may wish to have a conversation with the Speaker or with other members of this House, I cannot allow him to continue to argue a question of privilege when it is clear that although this may be a grievance, it certainly is not a question of privilege.

That is what I had to say about the hon. member's comments.

Does the hon. member have further comments for the Chair? Please be brief!

Mr. Gérin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It has to do with our request to you that we be allowed to sit together. In this case, Mr. Speaker, it was left to your discretion and I understand you refused. I believe one of my privileges as member is that I be permitted to sit with the group to which I belong. You know this group, Mr. Speaker, the members of the Bloc Québécois who have chosen to work towards Quebec sovereignty and state to the House of Commons that the sovereignty of Quebec would be in the general interest. Mr. Speaker, I am wondering who made that decision. Was it you or was it the government whip?

Mr. Speaker: I can help the hon. member. Again, this is not a question fo privilege. But to be fair I will try to answer the question. Usually and in keeping with long-standing traditions, seating arrangements concerning members are made as a result of an agreement among all parties recognized under Canadian legislation. Subsequently, if it is not possible to reach an agreement, the Chair will make a decision, if necessary. However, it is always a compromise.

• (1530)

Perhaps the Speaker may remind the hon. member that his colleagues are in the House. However, if the hon. member and his colleagues wish to have a further discussion on the subject of seats, I am prepared to ask the hon. member or the leader of his group to come and discuss the matter with me in my office.

However, a decision must be made, and in the final instance that decision is up to the Speaker, after many discussions with all other colleagues. Perhaps we could now hear the next question of privilege. I would like to make it clear to the hon. member that he can come and talk to the Speaker in his office.

I will now recognize the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

THE RIGHT TO SPEAK IN THE HOUSE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): On September 20 last, Mr. Speaker, I wrote you a letter asking that I be heard on a question of privilege about the right of all members to speak freely in this House, to fulfil their electoral mandate, to represent their constituents in the House and to debate the issues which concern the country both nationally and internationally.

Mr. Speaker, I refer you to Beauchesne's citations 16 and 55. Citation 16 deals with parliamentary privilege.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that after writing letters to the government, and I am not referring only to the member for Ottawa—Vanier because a number of my Liberal caucus colleagues also urged the government to recall Parliament this summer to debate a national issue, the situation of native people, as well as the question of Iraq and Kuwait, but the government systematically refused to acknowledge the right of each member to express his opinion in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Again I regret to interrupt the hon. member. There may be a very serious crisis in the political world, but it is not a question of privilege.

[English]

I hope that if other members are rising on the same point they will take my point in advance.

RECALL OF PARLIAMENT

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of privilege to bring to your attention what I see as a contempt of Parliament and what I see as an attempt to circumvent the statutory and the conventional authorities of this House and its members. I am referring, Mr. Speaker, to the mobilization of the Canadian army against Canadian citizens and the fact that that mobilization took place without recall of Parliament, without consulting Parliament, without any open and democratic debate. Such debate, Mr. Speaker, is not a luxury but a requirement under the conventions and the rules of Parliament.

I wonder whether this government considers early recall something that can be undertaken only when it is politically advantageous to the government and something to be—

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I regret very much again having to interrupt the hon. member, the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I thank the hon. member for giving me notice, as did the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier of the point that was being raised. The point is in narrow terms, somewhat different. It is the same point in principle. The complaint is that the government did not call the House back during the summer for whatever reason. That complaint may be based on a number of things that hon. members wish that the government had brought the House back to debate, to meet or to pass legislation on. However, that is a political decision and it does not go to the question of either privilege of individual members nor, I must say, to the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party. It does not go to the question of contempt of the House.

It may well be, and undoubtedly is, a matter of serious debate both within this Chamber and outside the Chamber, as it has been and as it has been today. However, I have to say to hon. members it is not a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast on a question of privilege. The hon. member, who has given me an extensive several page precis, will I am sure keep in mind what I have had to say so far this afternoon.

PARLIAMENTARY READING ROOM

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, it was only two pages, I would point out, one and a half actually. This is a matter which affects all of us. I refer, of course, to the closing of the Reading Room which has been there since the mind of man and woman run not to the contrary, to my knowledge.

What has it cost members to have moved the Reading Room down to the basement in room 134N? My understanding is that 475 weekly newspapers are no longer being received by Parliament and available to members, 88 periodicals are no longer available to the members of this House, a number of newspapers from abroad and about 200 non–fiction books are no longer available to any member of this House.

Some people may say that the subscriptions are still coming in but, Sir, I would point out that to the best of my knowledge all of these weekly newspapers which are so important to all of us are going into the trash can and when the subscriptions end, they will not be renewed. That is my information.

Mr. Speaker: I have a suggestion for the hon. member before I am forced to make a ruling one way or the other.

There is provision under the rules, as the hon. member as a very experienced member knows, to ask a question of the appropriate member of the Board of Internal Economy where this decision was made. In addition, if there are facts which the board needs for whatever reason in connection with this decision, perhaps the hon. member could assist the Chair in that.

In the meantime, until the hon. member discusses this with the appropriate member of the board, takes an opportunity of asking a question of a member of the board, I think it would perhaps be best if the hon. member adjourned this application on privilege because at the moment the Chair is not inclined to accept it on that basis.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE ACT

TABLING OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the report of the special committee of this House on the review of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act as well as the Securities Offences Act, and the report is entitled In Flux But Not in Crisis.

Pursuant to the Standing Order, we are requesting that the government give a comprehensive response within 150 days. Because it was a special statutory committee, I just wanted to refer to the members, the vast majority of whom were in their first term as members of Parliament, and to say how hard they worked over the last 15 months to do this very important review for all of us in the House. I refer to the vice-chairman, the member for Lotbinière, the members for St. Catharines, Victoria, Scarborough—Rouge River, Wetaskiwin, Moncton and Laval-des-Rapides. It is truly a yeoman's work. I am immensely proud to have chaired this report and I think members will find the recommendations to be sensible.

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-329, an act to amend the Criminal Code (desecration of the flag).

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to introduce this private member's bill, making it an offence under the Criminal Code of Canada to wilfully burn, deface, defile, mutilate, trample upon or otherwise desecrate the national flag of Canada.

I have considered this for six or eight months and have followed the events in the United States very carefully. In my thinking, the flag of Canada is a symbol of Canada and anyone who wilfully desecrates it should be answerable in court.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls) moved that Bill S-14, an act respecting the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons, be read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the section of Routine Proceedings relating to motions to ask Your Honour to seek unanimous consent of the House of Commons to put the following motion:

That an all-party committee of the House of Commons travel forthwith to the treatment centre at Oka to negotiate an honourable disengagement.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member will want to raise the matter at another time as there does not seem to be consent.

PETITIONS

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by various residents of Canada from widely separated points, most of them in Ontario.

They are protesting government cutbacks to veterans services, particularly housekeeping services to veterans and the increasing costs of long-term care for veterans in institutions.

They call upon Parliament to reject the budget measures introduced in the last budget which provided for these reductions and ask that we vote those down so that the government will not be able to implement these harsh and oppressive budget provisions.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I too have the honour to table petitions on behalf of Canadians living in my riding of Parkdale—High Park and in other constituencies in metropolitan Toronto.

The hundreds of signatories on this petition are angry with the government's policy of cancelling the self-exile class for thousands of East Europeans who entered in good faith and are well established in Canada as required by the self-exile regulations.

The petitioners, many of whom are sponsors of these self-exiles, are requesting the Minister of Employment and Immigration to honour all bona fide self-exile cases which were being processed before the September 4, 1990 cut off that the minister imposed without any consultation with Canadians.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to lay before the House some petitions signed by the residents of Broadview—Greenwood.

They ask the Government of Canada to release the money it committed in 1988 to begin the clean up of the Great Lakes, and specifically the Don River which is the most polluted river in Canada.

They humbly ask the government to release this money so the clean up can begin.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have a petition to present from residents of the federal district of Cape Breton—East Richmond comprising such communities as Glace Bay, Waterford, Sydney, and Marion Bridge, as well as other rural parts throughout that riding.

In view of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child which sets a standard of protection and care to children far superior to anything we know and experience in Canada and countries world-wide, we call upon the Government of Canada to review its legislation and policies for consistency with this particular convention.

I urge the Prime Minister and the government take action forthwith.

• (1550)

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in presenting a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The petition is signed by several hundred people in Toronto, Mississauga, Brampton, Burlington, Newmarket, Scarborough, and other communities in southern Ontario, many of them former residents of Newfoundland who have a particular concern with respect to overfishing and its adverse impact on fishermen and plant workers along the coast of Newfoundland.

The prayer of the petitioners is that the Government of Canada will take the appropriate steps to eliminate the overfishing so that the people who live nearest the resource can have the full benefit of it.

I support whole-heartedly the prayer of the petitioners.

NORTHERN RESIDENTS DEDUCTIONS

Question No. 279—Mr. Gardiner:

In (a) 1988 (b) 1989, in British Columbia, were there any follow-up inquiries regarding the Northern and Remote Tax Allowance and, if so, what number?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Of the 59,521 Northern residents deductions claims made by British Columbia and Yukon residents on 1987 tax returns, 1881 claims were reviewed and ajustments were made to 355 claims. Of 54,009 claims for the 1988 year, 2,213 claims were reviewed and adjustments were made to 2,071 of them. 1989 claims statistics are not yet available.

INSHORE SHRIMP LICENCES

Question No. 292—Mr. Rompkey:

In (a) 1990 (b) 1989 (c) 1988 (d) 1987, were new inshore shrimp licences issued, in the area covered by the Gulf Region of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, to residents (i) of the Province of Quebec (ii) of Labrador (iii) of Newfoundland (iv) of New Brunswick (v) of Nova Scotia and, if so, what number?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): On February 10, 1986, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced the issuance of 19 additional shrimp licences for the Esquiman Channel. These additional licences were issued as follows:

(a) in 1986,

(i) 6 licences to Western Newfoundland fishermen,

(ii) 3 exploratory licences to Quebec fishermen,

(b) in 1987, 6 licences to Western Newfoundland fishermen,

(c) in 1989,

(i) 4 licences to Quebec fishermen,

(ii) the 3 exploratory licences issued in 1986 to Quebec fishermen were made permanent.

No other additional licences for Gulf Shrimp were issued between 1987 and 1990.

ELECTRICITY SAVINGS

Question No. 294—Ms. Callbeck:

Has the government made estimates of the number of kilowatt hours of energy that could be conserved economically but are not because of market imperfections and, if so (a) what number (b) what is the equivalent of this figure in new nuclear and fossil-fuel fired power plant capacity (c) what would be the reduction of carbon dioxide emissions if such conservation were implemented (d) would any money be saved thereby and, if so, what amount?

Hon. Arthur Jacob Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): (a)—(d) Estimates of the economics potential indicate that up to 300 petajoules, or the equivalent of 83,340 gigawatts-hours (Gwh) of end-use electricity savings could be available by the year 2000. However, preliminary estimates of the portion due to market imperfections is lower, possibly in the range of 200 to 250 petajoules.

The major difference between these estimates is that measures which are economically attractive (i.e. to society) are not necessarily attractive to individual investors. Of the 200 to 250 petajoules of electricity saving that could be due to market imperfections, a portion can also be attributed to existing electricity market prices—generally based on historical accounting costs which can be less than the economic costs required for economically efficient resource allocation. However, such pricing decisions fall under provincial jurisdiction. Therefore, the amount of electricity that could be targeted with even an agressive federal package of initiatives is significantly less than 200 to 250 petajoules, in the absence of co-operation from the provincial authorities and the utilities.

In terms of capacity, the economic potential for end-use savings possibly due to market imperfections depends on whether the actual savings affect the base load or peak load. If 200 petajoules of annual electricity savings could be achieved and translated into capacity addition delays, this would be equivalent to about 6,300 megawatts (MW) in the year 2000. Fossil fuel (coal, oil, and natural gas) and nuclear generating capacity additions are forecast to be about 8,300 MW by the year 2000. Therefore, forecast electricity capacity additions exceed the capacity equivalent of 200 petajoules of end-use electricity savings.

About 18 megatonnes of CO_2 could be saved annually if 200 petajoules of annual electricity savings were achieved by the year 2000. (For purposes of comparison, the estimate of total Canadian CO_2 emissions for 1990 is about 490 megatonnes.) The CO_2 savings estimate assumes that electricity saved in the year 2000 is produced from the average regional mix of fuels forecast for the year 2000. Actual emission savings estimates will differ to the extent that a particular utility's production deviates from this average generation mix.

No estimate of the dollar savings from reduced end-use electricity consumption due to eliminating market imperfections is available at this time. The net dollar savings will depend on the extent and timing of the electricity savings potential being achieved, the portion which is peak versus base load, the extent this influences the timing of capacity additions, the costs that will be required to offset existing market imperfections, and transactions and other costs (often not measurable) which will be borne by the consumer.

NATIONAL CITIZENSHIP WEEK

Question No. 300—Mr. Boudria:

1. Were National Citizenship Week kits produced for the government and, if so (a) what number (b) at what cost?

2. Were (a) stickers (b) a lapel pin (c) a flag (d) a bookmark (e) a calendar (f) a poster included in the kit and, if so (i) who designed each one (ii) at what cost (iii) what was the name of the supplier of each item (iv) were the items purchased by public tender and, if not, for what reasons?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): 1. Yes.

a) 60,000 kits

b) $1.68 per kit

2. a) Yes

b) No. However a National Citizenship Week button was produced for the kit.

c) Yes.

d) Yes.

e) Yes.

f) Yes. Also included in the kit was a fold-out brochure and a message from the Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship).

(i) and (ii) The stickers, buttons, bookmarks, calendars, posters and fold-out brochures were designed by Banfield-Seguin at a cost of $32,200.73. The Minister's message was written in-house.

(iii) The stickers were supplied by HAS Novelties of Toronto. The buttons were supplied by Maison Basilières of Montreal. The flags were supplied by Flags Unlimited of Thornton, Ontario. The bookmarks, calendars, posters and fold-out brochures were supplied by Ashton-Potter Ltd. of Toronto. The Minister's message was printed by Commercial Printers of Ottawa.

(iv) All suppliers were contracted through the Supply and Services Canada tendering process. The Minister's message was requested via a purchase order on an emergency printing basis.

USED FUEL FROM CANDU REACTORS

Question No. 310—Mr. Heap:

1. For all CANDU reactors ever commissioned in Canada, has there been an accumulation of spent fuel and, if so, to 1990 (a) what number of kilograms (b) what are the (i) components (ii) weight (iii) ingestion toxicity (volume of water required to dilute the waste to public drinking water standards) (iv) estimated number of years of toxicity of these wastes?

2. Does Canada have any responsibility for spent fuel of the CANDU reactors it has sold to other countries and, if so, what responsibility?

Hon. Arthur Jacob Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows:

1. a) Used fuel from Candu nuclear reactors in Canada is presently safely contained and stored at the reactor sites. The principal storage method is in water-filled storage bays; dry storage in concrete canisters is also being used to supplement water-bay storage. Many years of experience in Canada and internationally have demonstrated the safety of these storage technologies. To the end of 1989, about 14,000 tonnes (14 000 000 kg) of used fuel had accumulated in storage at reactor sites in Canada. This amount would fit into a single olympic-size swimming pool.

1. b) (i) Candu fuel is manufactured as fuel bundles which consist of an assembly of zirconium alloy tubes each containing dense pellets of uranium dioxide (UO_2). A fuel bundle typically is about 50 cm long, 10 cm in diameter and weighs about 22 kg. After irradiation in a CANDU reactor, the physical form and weight of the fuel bundle are essentially unchanged. Greater than 98 percent of the UO_2 is unchanged after use in a reactor; only about 1.3 percent of the uranium is changed into new chemical elements, and only half of these are radioactive. All the new elements remain contained within the zirconium alloy tubes and 99 percent remain part of the solid UO_2 fuel pellets.

(ii) The weight of a Candu fuel bundle is about 22 kg and remains essentially unchanged after use in a reactor.

(iii) Ingestion Toxicity (volume of water required to dilute the waste to drinking water standards)

The used nuclear fuel is a solid material that is very insoluble in water and it is not possible to dilute the waste to drinking water standards. Used fuel that has been stored in water at nuclear generating stations has shown no signs of dissolving in more than 30 years.

The investigation of a 1,300 million years old natural uranium ore deposit at Cigar Lake in Saskatchewan has shown that the water within a few metres of the ore body has a very low concentration of uranium. This is consistent with the very low solubility of uranium oxide in groundwater.

If the used fuel were disposed of in a geologic vault as proposed by AECL, the total contents of the vault (used fuel and rock) after 300 to 1,000 years, would be no more hazardous than naturally occurring uranium, mercury and lead ores.

(iv) Estimated number of years of toxicity of the wastes

Unlike the case with other kinds of toxic wastes, the hazard of used nuclear fuel decreases rapidly with time because of radioactive decay.

Ten years after removal from the reactor, the fuel bundles are approximately 2,000 times less radioactive, after 25 years about 99.95 percent of the radioactivity has disappeared, and after 500 years, most of the penetrating radiation is gone.

The proposed concept for the permanent disposal of used nuclear fuel that would ensure that the most exposed individual living near a disposal vault receives a dose of no more than .05 milliSieverts a year at anytime during the first 10,000 years. This dose is a small fraction of the natural background radiation received by everyone. The disposal concept is now undergoing review by a Federal Environmental Assessment Panel.

2. No, Canada does not have any responsibility for spent fuel from CANDU reactors which have been sold to other countries.

SUBSIDIES FOR BABIES BORN IN QUEBEC

Question No. 315—Mr. Wappel:

Does the government, either directly or indirectly, subsidize the government of Quebec with respect to payments or subsidies for babies born in that province and, if so, for each year since the program was introduced (a) what is the total amount paid by the government (b) is the government aware of the percentage that this represents of the total amount paid out by the government of Quebec and, if so, what is it?

Hon. Henry Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health): This is a universal program which does not meet the requirements for federal financing as set out in the Canada Assistance Plan or any other cost-shared plan. It is, therefore, certain that there is no direct contribution by the federal government to the grants paid out by the province under these circumstances.

As for the question of indirect contribution, it would be difficult to claim that there was none, considering the various forms of overall funding or transfer payments made to Quebec such as Established Program Financing (EPF), equalization payments and so on. None of these contributions, however, could be explicitly linked to these payments upon the birth of a child.

NUCLEAR FUEL WASTE MANAGEMENT

Question No. 323—Mr. Waddell:

Was a research program into high-level radioactive waste disposal begun in 1978 and, if so, since its inception, has AECL spent any money on research on re-processing spent fuel and, if so, what amount?

Hon. Arthur Jacob Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows:

The Canadian Nuclear Fuel Waste Management Program was initiated by a joint statement of the energy ministers of Canada and Ontario in June, 1978.

Reprocessing research in the Advanced Fuel Cycle Program was carried out at AECL's Whiteshell Nuclear Research Establishment at Pinawa, Manitoba between 1977–78 and 1985–86. During the fiscal years 1978–79 and 1979–80, approximately $3.3 million of this research was paid for by the Waste Management Program to develop an understanding of the types of nuclear fuel wastes that would arise from any future reprocessing of CANDU fuel. Within the Waste Management Program, a method was also tested to immobilize simulated high level radioactive wastes and to convert them to a solid form that would be suitable for disposal.

From 1977–78 to 1985–86, a total of $19.2 million was spent on the Advanced Fuel Cycle Program, including the $3.3 million mentioned above. Since 1985–86, the Advanced Fuel Cycle Program for CANDU has been centered at AECL's Chalk River Laboratories, and has focused on once-through fuel cycles using Slightly Enriched Uranium (SEU). Such fuel cycles are more economic in today's market conditions, and do not require reprocessing of used CANDU fuel.

The above amounts are stated in overhead dollars of the year in which the expenditures occurred.

ADVANCED FUEL CYCLES

Question No. 324—Mr. Waddell:

Does AECL now have a position on the need for advanced fuel cycles in an expanding nuclear power industry and, if so (a) what is it (b) to what extent and in what ways does it resemble or differ from the position proposed in "AECL's Proposed Recycle Fuel Programs", presentation No. 4 in the AECL seminar "Proposed Canadian Fuel Cycle Program", held on February 28, 1977?

Hon. Arthur Jacob Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows: (a) AECL's position on the need for advanced fuel cycles is as follows:

In the near term, there is no economic justification for Canadian research and development on fuel reprocessing to improve uranium utilization because the prices of uranium and uranium enrichment are low, and because assured resources of uranium are judged to be adequate.

In the longer term, advanced fuel cycles that involve recycling fissile material from spent fuel will be required in order that the world's fissile and fertile resources can have a significant impact on satisfying the energy requirements of the world.

Because of its neutron-economic design, the CANDU reactor can, and should, play an important role in the exploitation of advanced fuel cycles for the benefit of Canada and the rest of the world.

(b) This position on the strategic importance of advanced fuel cycles does not differ fundamentally from that indicated in "AECL's Proposed Recycle Fuel Programs", presentation No. 4 in the AECL seminar "Proposed Canadian Fuel Cycle Program" held on February 28, 1977. What has changed in the interim is AECL's opinion on when the R&D programs described therein should be pursued. The combination of low uranium cost and increase in assured supply has reduced the immediate incentive for exploiting advanced fuel cycles based on thorium or plutonium. Thus, there is currently no Canadian R&D program on reprocessing spent fuel from power reactors. Rather, efforts are concentrated on the once-through fuel cycle for CANDU reactors using Slightly Enriched Uranium (SEU), which is clearly more economical under present market conditions than the currently used once-through cycle with natural uranium. The fuel for the SEU cycle could be enriched uranium purchased on the world market, or Recovered Uranium (RU) arising from reprocessing of Light Water Reactor (LWR) fuel, an activity practiced by LWR owners in several countries.

Concurrent with this R&D effort, a program to demonstrate the safe and permanent disposal of spent fuel from once-through cycles is being completed.

STABILIZING CANADA'S TOTAL CARBON DIOXIDE EMISSIONS

Question No. 325—Mr. Caccia:

Is the government officially committed to stabilizing Canada's total carbon dioxide emissions at 1988 levels to the year 2000?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board and Acting Minister of the Environment): On May 16, Canada endorsed the Bergen Declaration which reads, in part:

We urge all ECE countries to take action now, and we agree to commit to establish national strategies and/or targets and schedules following the report of the IPCC and no later than the start of the negotiations of a framework convention on climate change to limit or reduce CO_2 emissions and other greenhouse gas emissions as much as possible and to stabilize them. In the view of most ECE countries [n.b. this includes Canada], such stabilization at the latest by the year 2000 and at present levels must be a first step.

CFB SUMMERSIDE

Question No. 326—Ms. Callbeck:

1. Has an interim management committee for CFB Summerside been appointed and, if so (a) what are the names of the chosen individuals (b) to whom are they accountable (c) was an allocation to the interim management committee of $900,000 made on March 27, 1990 and, if so (i) is it controlled by guidelines and if so, what are they (ii) has any of the money been spent to date (iii) who is directly accountable for the money (d) what authority does the interim management committee have?

2. If the committee has not yet been appointed, on what date will this take place?

—The Interim Management is responsible for developing an effective promotional package to help promote and secure tenants for the Summerside Base Development Corporation.

—The Interim Management must consult with the Advisory Committee on the progress being made in the negotiations and take into consideration the views of the Advisory Committee on the acceptability of the prospective tenants.

—The Interim Management will establish a full-time office at the Base employing at least two people full-time.

—The Interim Management will not act as permanent management for the Development Corporation.

The Interim Management will provide monthly reports outlining work completed during the month in relationship to the terms of reference. These reports will be made in written form to the Minister of Employemnt and Immigration and the Minister of Public Works.

Once negotiations are complete with prospective anchor tenants, the Interim Management will provide a comprehensive report to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Public Works on the terms and conditions needed to locate businesses at CFB Summerside.

The Interim Management will also provide comprehensive reports on the structure and status on incorporation of the Summerside Base Development Corporation and on additional tenants wishing to locate in Summerside.

2. The Community Advisory Committee has been appointed.

EMPLOYER SUBSIDY PROGRAMS SPONSORED BY CANADA EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Question No. 328—Mr. Gardiner:

Has the government done any studies on whether employer subsidy programs sponsored by Canada Employment and Immigration Centres have resulted in permanent employment by the funded employers?

Hon. Barbara Jean McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Employment and Immigration Canada (EIC) conducts follow-up surveys of Canadian Jobs Strategy (CJS) clients on an on-going basis to determine their post-training labour force experience. One of the questions on the survey asks if participants are still employed with the same company at the time of the survey.

EIC also has periodic evaluation reports of CJS programs such as the evaluation of the Job Development program published in August 1989 and the evaluation of the Job Entry program published in July 1989. As part of these evaluation reports, program participants are asked whether they are employed by the employer that trained them under the program.

Results of the evaluation reports and follow-up surveys of Canadian Jobs Strategy clients can be found in the department's Main Estimates entitled, Employment and Immigration Canada, 1990–1991 Estimates, Part III, Expenditure Plan.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX GUIDE FOR SMALL BUSINESS

Question No. 329—Mr. Nystrom:

1. Were any funds expended by the government on a publication entitled "Goods and Services Tax Guide for Small Business" published earlier this year by the Department of Finance and, if so (a) what amount (b) in what way did the government allocate this expenditure with respect to (i) preparation (ii) printing (iii) advertising (iv) distribution (v) postage for this publication?

2. Has the government destroyed any copies of this publication and (a) if so, what number (b) if not, does the government have any such plans?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): 1. a) A total of $1,288,857 was expended by the government on a publication entitled "GST: Information for Small Business". The Department of Finance has not published a booklet entitled "Goods and Services Tax Guide for Small Business". This booklet was recently published by Revenue Canada.

(ii) $616,702 for the printing of 2,232,050 copies;

(iii) No funds were expended on an advertising campaign aimed at promoting the "GST: Information for Small Business" booklet.

(iv) $629,523 for the distribution of approximately 1.9 million copies (the cost of preparation for distribution, postage and envelopes)

(v) $432,536 for postage costs (included in above distribution costs (iv))

2. The government has not destroyed copies of this publication and has no plans to do so.

MONEY SPENT ON POLAR 8 ICEBREAKER PROJECT

Question No. 330—Mr. Waddell:

Was money spent by the government in anticipation of the approval of the Polar 8 Icebreaker project and, if so, including such items as blueprints and design consultation, what amount?

Hon. Douglas Grinslade Lewis (Minister of Transport): No unauthorized financial commitments were entered into or resources expended with respect to the implementation (construction) phase of the Polar 8 Icebreaker project. Treasury Board Preliminary Project Approval for the contract definition phase of the Polar 8 icebreaker project was received in July 1987. Capital expenditures authorized under this approval were directly related to obtaining a ship design and proposal and offer for construction. The final project cost is projected at $15.3 million. In addition to the above capital expenditures approximately $807,000 was spent by the operational planning team responsible for operational support and government furnished equipment and supplies.

PERSON-DAYS SPENT ON THE POLAR 8 ICEBREAKER PROJECT

Question No. 331—Mr. Waddell:

Did the government and its officials spend any person-days in anticipation of the approval of the Polar 8 Icebreaker project and, if so, what number?

Hon. Douglas Grinslade Lewis (Minister of Transport): No unauthorized human resource commitments were entered into or person-years expended with respect to the implementation (construction) phase of the Polar 8 Icebreaker project. Treasury Board Preliminary Project Approval for the contract definition phase of the Polar 8 icebreaker project was received in July 1987. Term person-years authorized under this approval were directly related to obtaining a ship design and proposal and offer for construction. The final project person-year utilization is projected at 41.7 term person-years. In addition to the above term person-years approximately 10.1 person-years were expended by the operational planning team responsible for operational support and government furnished equipment and supplies.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT CONTRIBUTION TO VICTIMS OF IRAN EARTHQUAKE

Question No. 334—Mr. Kaplan:

Is the government currently limiting its contribution to the victims of the Iran earthquake to $300,000 and, if so, does it plan to give more and, if so, on what date?

On June 26, 1990 the government announced the contribution of an additional $800,000 to Iranian earthquake victims, bringing the total to $1.1 million.

JOB SHORTAGES IN THE GASPÉ PENINSULA

*Question No. 316—Mr. Langdon (Essex—Windsor):

1. Is it the understanding of the government that job shortages in the Gaspé Peninsula are forcing many workers to leave the region and, if so, is it willing to provide the region with (a) special job creation programs (b) labour force adjustment programs?

2. Does the government believe that the implementation of Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration and Department and Commission Act, together with the decision not to carry the Unemployment Insurance variable eligibility standard over to the beginning of January, 1990, will have a negative impact on the financial situation of the residents of the Gaspé Peninsula and, if so, does it plan to put economic instruments in place that will allow this area to become economically viable once again and, if so, what instruments?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): 1. (a) Because we are aware of the economic difficulties in the Gaspé Peninsula, Employment and Immigration Canada is already, through the Canadian Jobs Strategy, providing programs and services to help this region. On July 20, 1990, the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration announced an increase of $2.5 million in Canadian Job Strategy funds for the Gaspé region. These funds will be used to help workers in the Gaspé and Ile de la Madeleine areas improve their employment prospects within their local labour markets. In addition, the entire Gaspé region is a designated area under the Community Futures Program.

(b) With regard to labour adjustment programs, EIC has signed two Industrial Adjustment Service agreements in this region.

2. The implementation of Bill C-21 will not have a negative impact on the residents of the Gaspé Peninsula. In fact, if the provisions of Bill C-21 were in effect residents of the Gaspé, and Canadians in all regions, would now be enjoying the benefits of that legislation including increased training opportunities, extended parental leave, and enhanced unemployment insurance benefit options as well as the new variable entrance requirements contained in Bill C-21.

It is important to note that the variable entrance requirements in Bill C-21 are designed to leave high unemployment rate regions virtually untouched. The Gaspé Peninsula traditionally has an unemployment rate above 15 percent. Consequently, workers in that area will normally need only 10 weeks of work to gain access to the UI Program. If it had not been for delays imposed by the opposition in Parliament, the 10 week requirement would now be in place.

The current 14-week fixed entrance requirement has been in effect since January 6, 1990. It is too early to provide conclusive evidence on its impact. However, preliminary evidence indicates many claimants are able to find the few extra weeks of work they need to qualify for UI benefits.

It must be remembered that Bill C-21 is part of the Labour Force Development Strategy (LFDS). The basic thrust of the LFDS is a shift from passive to more active UI uses in an effort to enhance the employability of UI recipients. Measures of particular interest to the residents of the Gaspé Peninsula include: the expansion of the Community Futures component of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, and the extra training and re-employment measures.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH TAX CREDIT

*Question No. 333—Mr. Saint-Julien:

1. Has the government allowed tax credits to be claimed by companies or individuals under the Scientific Research Tax Credit (SRTC) and, if so, what are (a) by province, the amounts allowed (b) by project (i) the name of the project (ii) the amount allowed (iii) the names of the beneficiaries (iv) the location (v) the names of the law, accounting and brokerage firms that represented the promoters?

2. Have companies or individuals benefitted from tax credits without doing research?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): 1. The Government has allowed companies and individuals to purchase and claim tax credits under the Scientific Research Tax Credit (SRTC) program.

a) Information available at this time by province or region, indicates the following total dollar amount and number of SRTC designations:

Province or Region	Designations	Amounts Designated (ooo's)
Atlantic Provinces	49	$ 101,295
Quebec	222	648,101
Ontario	829	3,207,753
Manitoba	46	80,386
Saskatchewan and Alberta	264	1,086,692
British Colombia	489	1,996,072
	1899	$ 7,120,299

For individual investors, the rate of tax credit was 34 percent of the amount invested and for corporate investors, it was 50 percent. The amounts of tax credits allowed are nor presently available, but lies between 34 per cent and 50 per cent of the amounts designated.

b) The confidentiality provisions of the Income Tax Act preclude disclosure of this information.

2. The tax credits could be passed to investors through the making of a designation by the research company of an amount—typically the full consideration received—in respect of the invesment made in the research company by the investor. Designations were made pursuant to the provisions of Part VIII of the Income Tax Act. A research company making such designations incurred a tax liability equal to 50 per cent of the amount designated. This tax is refundable by Revenue Canada at the rate of $1.00 for every $2.00 of eligible scientific research expenditures.

There are circumstances where companies did not fulfill the research commitments and did not pay Part VIII tax. In these circumstances investors would have benefited from the tax credits without an offsetting scientific research expenditure.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that I have a series of applications for emergency debate. It may well be that in view of the Order Paper hon. members may not wish to pursue all these applications overly vividly today, but I will certainly hear hon. members' remarks.

I caution hon. members to remember that our custom is that a brief statement is made, only a brief statement. The reason for that of course is that no other member of the Chamber can respond and a lengthy statement leads to a wish on others sometimes to get into argument. Of course we would never want that to happen here on an application for emergency debate.

I will hear first the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, on August 22 this year I sent you a letter pursuant to Standing Order 52(1), asking for an emergency debate the moment the House was fortunate enough to reconvene. At that time I also sent a letter to the House leader requesting that through his powers he allow the House to come back early in order to entertain this motion which would allow for an emergency debate on the particular issue in question.

That particular question is one of government policy as it relates to land claims.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, what you mentioned when you talked about the government's business and the motion of today. I ask you to consider this application very carefully before you rule on whether it is appropriate to have an emergency debate starting today versus allowing the government's business to take precedent.

The government's business is a motion and the motion is simply not adequate to address the issue of specific aboriginal land claims policy in this country. It is a very detailed and straightforward, and I commend the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs on that.

The problem is larger than that. It deals very specifically with Oka and the Mohawk people. My request for an emergency debate goes a lot further than that. It looks at specific land claims policy in this country of ours and the importance of it to all Canadians. When you look at what happened this summer, Mr. Speaker—

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River is correct. His application is more general than the motion that has been put down by the government. However, the matter is a very serious one to all members of this House and to the country, but there are probably other ways that the hon. member can bring this matter to the attention of the House.

In the meantime I should say to the hon. member and for the information of the public that if the hon. member is recognized in debate on the government motion, considerable latitude would certainly allow the hon. member to raise more general issues. I am sure the hon. member, with the skill for which he is known, will be able to do that.

Certainly as of today and given the circumstances I am not disposed to call for an emergency debate, although I appreciate the distinction the hon. member has made. I may well of course be hearing that distinction again at another time.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the proceedings. If the Prime Minister had stuck around and listened to me for a minute, I would have listened to him for 35 or 40.

Certainly I appreciate the gravity of the situation in Oka and the Middle East. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I request leave under Standing Order 52 to make a motion to adjourn the House pursuant to my letter to you of September 5 and my notice to you at eleven o'clock this morning. I today urge you to convene an emergency debate on the present crisis of the Canadian steel industry.

One cornerstone of our country is our steel industry, and this industry is at peril as I speak.

The factors involved in the emergency nature of this situation are as follows: 16,000 steel workers in this country have presently been in a strike lock out situation for nearly two months. High interest rates and the consequently inflated Canadian dollar make export of steel most difficult.

Recent rulings by the Canadian International Trade Tribunal which remove dumping duties against a total of 20 countries pose an immediate threat to the domestic market being flooded with cheap steel.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member who has a serious matter to present. The hon. member is perhaps going beyond the brief statement and getting into debate, although I must say to the hon. member that his comments, which he is following very carefully and which were given to me, are a considerable help to me.

Given the business of the House at this moment, I think it probably would be best not to try to proceed with an emergency debate at this time. Of course the hon.

member may want to bring the matter to the attention of the Chair at a more appropriate time.

I thank the hon. member for being so explicit in his application. As I say, it is a serious matter and I think recognized to be so.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to call for an emergency debate concerning the deteriorating relationship between Canada's aboriginal people and non-aboriginal citizens.

As you pointed out earlier, Mr. Speaker, I know that the government has tabled a motion which will permit the House to debate and examine some of the events of this summer at Kahnawake and Kanesatake. My caucus and I will participate in that debate.

However, it is my belief that the scope of motion No. 17 is not sufficient to examine the whole issue and that it is insufficient because it will not allow us to go beyond the immediate events of Kahnawake and Kanesatake and look at their roots, the long-standing grievances of Canada's aboriginal peoples.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we must restore confidence in the legitimate political process so as to respond to the grievances of the aboriginal peoples. Otherwise we can expect the worst consequences.

[English]

I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that you consider an emergency debate on this issue. I believe a debate is urgently required to demonstrate that faith in the political process is not misplaced. For that reason I respectively request an adjournment of the House for an emergency debate on this issue.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon has pointed out, as did the immediately preceding member, that there are some differences between the application for debate in general terms of the situation with our fellow Canadians of native origin, native tradition, and perhaps the order that is before us on behalf of the government.

However, I think it would be appropriate, given the government order, that any application for an emergency debate on this matter at least wait until we see the outcome of the debate which is to follow.

I want to assure the hon. member that I recognize the distinction. It may be that she will want to raise the matter again.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I made application for an emergency debate on the subject of children's rights. The Prime Minister will be attending the world summit this weekend, on Saturday and Sunday. Probably it will be the most important international meeting in the last 30 or 40 years in which this country has been involved.

• (1600)

We saw last evening thousands of Canadians across Canada participate in a candlelight vigil to express their commitment to this issue. In my own riding I have had high school students writing essays and drafting their own charters. There has been a very strong upward welling of concern about how we define childrens' rights, particularly as a country, and the leadership we will show in dealing with the tragedy abroad but also the tragedies in our own country.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is very important for the Prime Minister to represent the views of Canadians when he appears at the United Nations this weekend. That should happen as a consequence of this Parliament coming together for a joinder of those views and to give us the opportunity to represent the kind of feelings we have seen in our constituencies in the past several weeks on this crucial issue. I do not see anything on the Order Paper that presently allows it but I do think it would be crucial that we have a debate on this issue. Unless or until the government is prepared to offer it, I think my request for an emergency debate should be agreed to.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises another very important matter. I think it is important for the Chair to look at all of the circumstances today and perhaps the next day or so. Given those circumstances, I do not think it would be appropriate to adjourn the other business of the day on the application of the hon. member. That of course, does not preclude the hon. member from applying at another time or using other methods of pursuing the issue, which I think all hon. members accept is a very serious issue.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

IRAQ

INVASION OF KUWAIT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and, encouraged by the unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of the legitimate government of Kuwait, affirm unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the United Nations Security Council and its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2 and for the despatch of members of the Canadian Forces to take part in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula; and

That, upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, last August 2 without provocation or warning, Iraq invaded Kuwait. Having overrun his smaller neighbour, Saddam Hussein claimed that Kuwaiti territory henceforth belonged to Iraq. Although he said that he had no further territorial ambitions, such assurances have been heard before. Fifty-two years ago this month, in Munich, the world learned a hard lesson about aggression and appeasement.

The world may have been surprised by the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait but no one was taken in by the justifications given for it. The invasion of Kuwait was seen for exactly what it was; a brutal aggression, a flagrant violation of international law and a challenge to the principles of the international order on which world peace depends. Iraq's aggression demonstrated how important that order is.

Tyranny is far from absent from international relations. Iraq's aggression also demonstrated how much the world has changed in recent times. Within hours of the invasion, condemnations of the Iraqi action were heard from Moscow and from Washington, from Cairo and Tel Aviv, from Ottawa and Ankara and all outraged countries around the world.

In those early days of August we all rediscovered the value of an idea long buried under the snows of the Cold War. That idea, created out of the rubble of World War II, was one of peace through collective strength. That idea was that a civilized world community living by a common code of behaviour would have the will to stand up to tyranny and the means to respond to it. That idea was the United Nations.

The United Nations has emerged from this crisis in the gulf with new life born at the end of the Cold War under the renewed determination on the part of many countries including, most importantly, former adversaries to make the idea of collective security work. In the seven weeks that have followed the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, we have seen the United Nations operate I think precisely as its founders would have envisaged and would have hoped. The Security Council has condemned the invasion. It has passed seven resolutions, the most recent following the armed entry by Iraqi soldiers into Canadian and other diplomatic residences in Kuwait and the detention by force of our representatives.

[Translation]

It has taken, partly at Canada's urging, a careful, determined and step-by-step approach under Chapter 7 of the Charter of the United Nations and has mandated a strict embargo of Iraq. There have been no vetoes cast, no superpower confrontations, no endless debates to mask impotence or disagreement. The Security Council has made it clear to Iraq that its annexation of Kuwait is unacceptable in the eyes of the entire world and that it will have to end. Last August, this was the position taken by all civilized nations, including Canada, and it is our position today.

[English]

The members of the United Nations have met Iraq's blatant disrespect for international law with firm and unflinching resolve. Saddam Hussein does not face a pile of toothless resolutions and pious hopes, as might have been the result in the not so distant past. Instead he faces the broadest global consensus of the modern era, perhaps of all time, expressed in the support for the embargo by over 150 countries. He sees before him Arabs and the Soviet Union joining with the United States and countries like Canada and Australia, all committed to the same fundamental and viable principle that aggression must be resisted because when civilized nations fail to resist aggression, liberty will die.

Canada welcomes the crucial and skilled role played by President Bush of the United States in contributing immensely to building this important international consensus. The world is fortunate that the United States of America has both the political will and the military capacity to back up this leadership and to back it up quickly.

Some have suggested that the enforcement by armed force of international law and of the United Nations' resolutions is somehow contrary to the spirit of multilateralism and Canada's traditions. Nothing could be further from the truth. The willingness of the United Nations to authorize military means to enforce the resolutions it has passed may well presage an important new era for multilateralism, a goal for which generations of Canadians have worked.

Although the Iraqi leader has desperately tried to portray the conflict as one of the United States of America versus Iraq and the Arab world, he and his people must now know the fundamental truth that it is Saddam Hussein against the rest of the civilized world and, in that kind of conflict, Mr. Hussein will lose 10 times out of 10.

Saddam Hussein is facing the military forces of more than 25 nations. The determination of Egypt and Syria to play a significant role in the collective defence of Saudi Arabia was not only unusual and remarkable, but I think a most encouraging development not only for the present situation which we confront but future developments in the Middle East.

Throughout this crisis Canada has been active in a number of ways and the Secretary of State for External Affairs has played a vigorous and a most effective role in representing Canada throughout. We have focused our activities on three fronts, which the Secretary of State for External Affairs will elaborate on in much greater detail. First of all, diplomatic, in helping to orchestrate the United Nations embargo and in helping Canadians in the region. Second, economic, through respect of the embargo ourselves, not without cost. This has been a very costly. In fact I believe that the first effect of the biting of the embargo took place in Vancouver where 60,000 tonnes of Canadian wheat destined for Iraq were stopped in Vancouver harbour. This was a great hardship for Canadian farmers but all Canadians have respected that embargo, and that too is most important.

• (1610)

And so economically, through respect of the embargo ourselves and through assistance to individuals and countries most severely harmed by Iraqi aggression; and militarily, through our despatch of men and women and ships and aircraft to the Gulf, we are doing our part.

[Translation]

As a member of the Security Council, we have been active in all its debates on this crisis. We have initiated some of the resolutions the Security Council has passed and we have participated in the drafting of others. We have argued for both firmness and balance.

And on behalf of all members of this House, I wish to offer our sincere congratulations to Ambassador Yves Fortier and his team for their outstanding work at the United Nations.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: When Saddam Hussein claimed that the embargo was starving Iraqi children, Canada took the lead in proposing that food be distributed under the supervision of an international body such as the International Red Cross, the approach that the United Nations adopted.

Our embassies have worked very hard with the Iraqi authorities to help stranded Canadians leave. And, we have kept open our embassy in Kuwait in the face of danger and of substantial hardship for our officials who have shown great courage. At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to digress, if I may, and offer, on behalf of all Members of this House, our sincere congratulations to our External Affairs staff in Baghdad and Kuwait which has represented the interests of Canadian citizens with such courage and dignity.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: On the economic front, we have worked for a strong embargo and supported the use of effective measures to ensure that it is not frustrated. We have scrupulously honoured that embargo ourselves. And this, Mr. Speaker, is an example of a measure that has proved costly to Canada. Canada has, also, supported the international efforts to respond to the human tragedies that the crisis has spawned.

In the way he has treated foreigners who had been living peacefully and productively in both Kuwait and Iraq. Saddam Hussein has shown the world the moral bankruptcy of his regime. With no concern for their safety or survival, the Iraqi Government forced thousands of guest workers to flee through the deserts or Iraq to Jordan in the lethal heat of August. Canada was one of the first countries to commit funds to help international organizations deal with the complex problems of managing this vast outflow of displaced people, primarily into Jordan.

We subsequently announced a substantial expansion of that assistance, and approved as well a range of additional measures, altogether amounting to some $75 million. One of these measures will be the airlifting of displaced people to their home countries and providing special assistance to some of those countries least able to cope with the impact of thousands of returning citizens. Another such measure will be assistance to the countries of the region suffering serious side-effects from the crisis and from the sanctions against Iraq, especially Jordan, Turkey and Egypt.

[English]

And on the military front, we had little choice but to react quickly.

In August, when the Iraqis were massed on the border of Saudi Arabia, the situation demanded a prompt decision to stand up and be counted. Canada made that decision and we stood up and we have been counted.

Canada's response to the Gulf crisis was quick, clear, and unequivocal. When we dispatched three ships carrying almost 1,000 personnel, we decided at that time not to give their crews their specific mission tasking because we wanted to take into account the important evolution of developments internationally before doing so, given the normal time it would take for the Canadian ships to reach the Gulf. Subsequent UN resolutions, particularly resolution 665, confirmed, I believe, the appropriateness of this initial position and helped Canada define the ships current mission, I believe, to the satisfaction of the military advisers of the Government of Canada.

On September 15, when our troops entered the operations zone, the Governor General signed the Order in Council placing them on active service for this mission. The Order in Council was tabled earlier this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence, consistent with parliamentary traditions. Members of this House have the opportunity to debate this matter fully before the ships arrive at station on October 2.

When it became clear 10 days ago that an additional contribution in the form of air support would be extremely helpful, not only for our own ships and the protection of our own personnel but for those of friendly nations as well, the Government of Canada decided to despatch a squadron of CF-18 fighter aircraft from Lahr, West Germany to the Gulf to protect Canadian lives and the Canadian operation. They will arrive in the area shortly and will be sustained by another 450 military personnel. We are also making Canadian civilian aircraft available to assist other countries in moving their forces to Saudi Arabia.

Some people have argued that Canada should not have sent planes and ships, and that taking on such a military role is incompatible with our role as a peacekeeper. Such arguments are based on a serious misreading of Canada's history. When called upon to play its part in collective efforts in the past to roll back aggression and to defend freedom, Canada has never shirked its responsibilities.

The sacrifices made by young Canadian men and women in two world wars are a proud and important part of our history as a nation. Those Canadians understood then, as we understand now, that the defence of Canada and of our ideals and values is not simply a case of protecting our own coasts, but also a case of preserving international order. It was precisely to defend those ideals and values that we contributed troops to NATO at great cost to Canadians and assigned them in Europe since 1951. It was to defend those precise ideals and values that over 25,000 Canadian troops fought in the United Nations engagement in Korea. And now our young men and women are called on to defend those ideals and values once again—this time in the Persian Gulf.

[Translation]

Our military response to Iraqi aggression is fully compatible with our traditions as international peacekeepers. Canada has been among the most active of all countries in multilateral peacekeeping efforts over the last forty-five years. Canadians have served in more than twenty peacekeeping operations, from the Congo to the Sinai, from Indochina to South Africa. And we are all proud of that tradition.

[English]

Our peacekeeping role—one in which we take great and I believe justifiable pride, which has distinguished Canada and where we have contributed enormously over decades to world peace—this peacekeeping role neither excludes us nor excuses us from the call to resist aggression. The roles are complementary as both serve the larger political purpose of preserving international order and both are very much in Canada's national interest.

• (1620)

There is no honour in claiming neutrality in the face of flagrant violations of international law. Canadians do not like the use of force and we have never in all our history chosen force as the preferred means of settling a dispute. But neither have we, at any time in our history, shrunk from using force when other means were exhausted, nor have we left the tough work to others in causes that we have supported. Canadians have never looked for a free ride and we are not going to start today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Our contribution to the defence of freedom and our resistance of aggression constitutes chapters of sacrifice and glory in the history of this nation.

Throughout this crisis the protection of Canadians put in jeopardy by Saddam Hussein has been a major concern for the Government of Canada. We have evacuated as many Canadian citizens as possible and we have stayed in touch with those still there to offer whatever material, logistic, and moral support we can. I know that many Canadians are worried about members of their families still caught there and I know that all members of the House join me today in praying that those Canadians detained in Iraq and Kuwait against their will will not be harmed. Our hearts go out to these families and I give them the assurance of all members of the House that we will continue to do all that we humanly can to make sure that we get their loved ones out and back to Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: We, and all other civilized nations in the world, are going to hold Saddam Hussein responsible for the well-being of our own citizens.

As I look back over the tumultuous events of the last 50 days or so, I see much of which Canadians can and will be proud: our sailors, and pilots, and soldiers who have gone courageously to the Gulf; our dock workers and specialists in Halifax who did months of work in a matter of weeks to get their ships ready; the members of the foreign services, to whom I referred a few moments ago, who have risked their own security and their lives and who have worked tirelessly to help stranded and detained Canadians; and the courage of Canadian families whose loved ones have been drawn into the vortex of this whirlwind inside Kuwait and Iraq.

I know that all Canadians do not want to see a war in the Gulf.

[Translation]

We all hope that the forces arrayed in the cause of peace will be sufficient to deter further aggression and to provide the leverage necessary to achieve a peaceful Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait. I give Canadians my assurance that we are doing everything we can, and will continue to do everything we can, to encourage a peaceful conclusion to this crisis.

But I give them my guarantee, as well, that we will not buy peace at the cost of dishonour to our history nor abdicate our share of the responsibility for preserving international order.

[English]

The many thousands of Canadians who have with great courage and great honour kept the peace in Africa and Asia and the Middle East and elsewhere around the world, understand why this must be so. The many thousands of Canadians—too many of whom lost their lives at Vimy Ridge, Dieppe, on the beaches of Normandy, and the hills of Korea—would have wanted it no other way.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I think I can say without any reservation on behalf of most Canadians that finally, at last, we have an opportunity in Parliament to begin to come to grips with one of the most serious and important issues facing the country in the last decade.

Many Canadians have been waiting for seven weeks for the opportunity in Parliament to express their concerns, to raise their questions, and, in fact, to find a way in which this country can play an effective role, a proper role, and an expanded role in this situation.

Let me first point out that our party, without any reservation, at all joins every other party, every other Canadian, and every civilized person in the world in condemning the aggression and invasion of Iraq into the state of Kuwait. We were all horrified at the brutality with which that aggression is taking place and the continuing impunity with which Mr. Hussein and the government of Iraq approaches its responsibilities under the United Nations and its obligations.

[Translation]

The Liberal Party of Canada unconditionally supports the broad international consensus condemning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. All member States of the United Nations must observe the provisions of the United Nations Charter and international law.

Taking a sovereign territory by force is an obvious failure to meet the obligations.

[English]

Also, I would like to join the Prime Minister in paying tribute to Canadian diplomats for their efforts to represent the interest of Canadians in the occupied state and the way in which the diplomats in the United Nations have carried out their functions with skill and the professionalism for which the foreign service has been known.

Also on behalf of my party, I would like to comment upon the uniqueness of this opportunity for an international response. We are so fortunate that events have come together to allow the United Nations once again to restore and play a role that had been denied it for so many years because of the cold war conflict and we can now hope that once again that the original charter seven responsibilities of collective security will be introduced.

[Translation]

We are encouraged by the role played by the United Nations in developing an effective international response to the Iraqi invasion. The UN Security Council has been particularly active, and the unanimity of its 15 members is both remarkable and welcome.

[English]

In saying those three things and in putting them on the record, I want to point to something the Prime Minister said in his remarks. I think his words were that this was a truly significant moment in world events and in the history of the country. If that is the case, if it was so significant, so crucial, and so vital, then why was Parliament kept in silence for seven weeks? Why were the people of Canada denied the opportunity to come together to address the issue? If the Prime Minister recognized how important and vital this matter was, why were the lights turned out in this building? That is a crucial question.

• (1630)

When it comes down to vital issues of international obligation, of war and peace, of sending Canadian troops overseas, to deny the opportunity for this Parliament to be heard or to represent the Canadian people, to have the question posed, is a dereliction of duty by the government, not by the troops, not by the forces but by the Government of Canada. That is really one of the serious problems this country faces. In fact, it was contributing to the malaise, the sense of great scepticism, almost cynicism, that the political system cannot even be employed at a time so crucial, to use the words of the Prime Minister, in our history.

I recall it was not that long ago when I was sitting at my cottage on Lake Winnipeg when all of a sudden I received a phone call from the Whip saying: "You have been called back to Parliament for a national emergency." "What was the national emergency?" I asked. "Has war been declared? Are the missiles coming?" He said: "No, 56 Tamils have arrived on the shores of Nova Scotia, and the government thinks that is so vital to the sanctity of this country that we must call Parliament back into session."

My goodness, 56 Tamils. Poor refugees. The homeless and the abandoned struggling ashore, and the full resources of the Government of Canada and Parliament are brought to bear for months of debate. By the way, the bill took almost a year to pass. What we see now, of course, is that we have a backlog of 300,000 refugees and $285 million in expenditures. That is how much of an emergency it was.

I ask the Prime Minister: Does he not see the enormous irony that he could feel so compelled by the arrival of 56 refugees on the shores of Canada to say it is a national emergency and, at the same time, authorize 1,500 Canadian forces to a war zone, to an area of great critical risk, recognizing that Canada was undertaking historic obligations internationally but did not see fit to ask Canadians through their elected representatives what they thought?

The British Parliament managed that. Madam Thatcher has been criticized in many circles as not so close to being democratic. She managed to get Parliament back. What was interesting about that? What was interesting was that through the meeting of that Parliament, they were able to develop a consensus in a country. It was a bipartisan approach. It was an attempt to find an all-party agreement.

Mr. Kennock, on behalf of the Official Opposition there, spoke strongly in favour of the reaction. He raised some serious questions about the nature of the role in the United Nations and, I believe, helped in a very constructive way to formulate the proper approach for that country. I am not saying it is perfect, but it answered the debate. That is what this place is about.

This is not some kind of sausage machine where you simply turn out legislation and bills. Debate is essential to the spirit of democracy. When it is denied, democracy withers and dies. That is what we saw happening this summer.

Madam Speaker, I say through you to the Prime Minister that we are not here simply to rehash history. But, he has to realize that that was a mistake and that while in the resolution he is asking for unequivocal support, Canadians ask: "How can you be unequivocal when you have seen your own democratic system put on the shelf with the lights turned out? How can you be unequivocal in approving an action which is so demonstrably dangerous to the maintenance of our own democratic spirit in this country?"

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, public consultation should also be a key part of government policy when the government considers deploying military personnel. There must be a debate in this House to discuss all aspects of the matter and examine all problems, if the spirit of democracy is to mean anything at all in this country. This is essential.

[English]

But, we missed that opportunity.

Also, I want to raise an important question to the Prime Minister who is here, because he did not address it in his remarks. It is one I raise on behalf of many Canadians. I think it is important that he or his ministers address it as the debate ensues.

The resolutions passed by the United Nations deal with an economic embargo of Iraq. That is the chosen instrument by which the Security Council has made its decision of how to compel Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait. The endorsement of the use of military forces is to back up that embargo. There is no United Nations mandate covering the use of force in other circumstances. Those were unilateral decisions taken.

The key question that many Canadians are asking is are we going to adhere religiously to the UN resolutions dealing with the use of force or are we already beginning to extend out and push beyond the mandate of those resolutions? Clearly the sending of the maritime force was within the mandate of that resolution 6.65. No question. The sending of the CF-18s raises a somewhat different question because the military personnel themselves have said that in addition to providing air cover for the three ships going to the gulf, they are also going to be integrated into the other air defence wing and that there could be other uses in the deterrence of further attack.

Well, that is a very important distinction that has been made. It is not covered by UN resolution. I go back to the importance of the Prime Minister's words that this is an opportunity to build the United Nations, to give it a different kind of role, to enhance, enlarge and magnify its primary responsibility on decisions of conflict resolutions of collective security.

Therefore, we have to be absolutely careful that we do not contribute to any action that would subvert that role, change that role or question that role. If all of a sudden we are beginning to deploy troops and give them rules of engagement or a mandate that extends beyond the clear definition provided by the UN, then we may also be in danger of undermining the opportunity of the UN to show it must be the place where decisions are made.

I noticed with interest the comments made by the Secretary of State in his visit to Washington—I believe it was on Friday—where he said we could envision the use of further troops, ground troops I presume or further aircraft troops. Would that be within the mandate of the UN? Perhaps this is the question that follows the one I just asked: Would it not be more important for Canada, occupying as it does a seat on the Security Council, beginning to ensure that those resolutions do cover the mandate, that there is not a question of unilateral decisions on war and peace, on deterrence or invasion or whatever other kind of military employment may be made?

That is why members of this party and others in the country who are knowledgeable and learned in this matter are saying that we as a country should be using our role, occupying that seat, to ensure that it is a United Nations mandate. This is not superpower bashing or anything else, but it is clear that there is a principle at stake. Do individual nations, whether they be large or small, have the right to decide when to use force for invasionary purposes? Whether it is in Grenada, El Salvador, Afghanistan or Iraq or if it is in response to something else, it should not be a unilateral decision. Surely the interest of countries like Canada, a middle power as it is often described or within that regime, which have represented so effectively since Suez the voice of countries that are not grand powers, says that we must establish a rule of law and a process to go along with it.

I agree with the Prime Minister that we honoured it to a point, but we are now talking about what happens from here on in. There is a mass of military build-up in Saudi Arabia—250,000 troops massing on the borders, massive tanks and everything else. There is a huge arsenal being built up. What is the purpose of that? Is it to deter further invasions of Saudi Arabia or others? Fine enough. But is it also, as has been mooted about, potentially to be used for a military solution to the problem? If the embargo does not work or people get impatient or it does not bite soon enough, will all of a sudden somebody else make a decision to use force to compel Hussein to back off or to try to topple him as a tyrant? Who will make that decision? Will we be drawn in axiomatically as part of that decision because we have become part of the integrated command or that we are part of the Bahrain meetings or whatever other arrangements were being made.

• (1640)

I say to the Prime Minister very directly that it is a very important, crucial question. While Canadians have condemned the use of force by the Iraqis, they are not prepared to give a blank cheque for the use of force simply to get rid of them. They want it done with proper discussion and debate in this Parliament and in the United Nations. If it is to be used, then let it be used in that multilateral way, in that internationalist way which is very different from pure multilateralism. An internationalist way would build up the body of law, procedure and precedent to ensure that we have in place a clear commitment that unilateralism in the use of force should not be recognized. I in particular just raise raise the concern. The Prime Minister is certainly free to clear it up.

I do not have the actual copy of his statement, but he said that Canadians would not be afraid to use force if necessary, or words to that effect. Under what context? By whose decision? Our own or someone else's? By the United Nations? That is a very crucial issue.

I would hope that in the next day as this debate continues or however long we have that the government will answer that question. Is it prepared to make a commitment that there will not be further deployment of troops or the use of force without a clear, new mandate for the United Nations to do so. This means that we will clearly need to have a debate with the Security Council as to whether the sanctions have worked or not worked and then decide if in the interests of international peace and order that other options will have to be exercised. I certainly do not want that, Mr. Prime Minister. None of us in this House would contemplate it because we know what an enormous, incredible tragedy that would be.

As a result, we also want to pose some corollary questions to the Secretary of State arising out of the use of force. What initiatives, what actions are we taking as a member of the Security Council to seek a peaceful resolution? What kind of support? What is our statement? For example, what is our position on the Soviet proposal for an international conference on the Middle East? What is the position of the government dealing with the proposed regional collective security proposal that the Americans have made, among others. These are crucial issues. What role?

I say this. It is important, and no one knows this better than the Secretary of State from his experience, that Canada play a positive role in making suggestions and making contributions rather than simply reacting to events, rather than simply responding to what takes place. Surely it is within our tradition.

I go back to the Pearson initiative of 1956, which was to find a way of resolving the conflict after an invasion.

I hope we can build upon that. I do not know if the Secretary of State is in the running for a Nobel Peace Prize. It certainly helped a past minister to become a Prime Minister. Who knows, lightening can strike twice.

The fact of the matter is that it is within the Canadian expectation. It has become part of our identity as Canadians. I know that there are a lot of cynics and sceptics around who say we make too much of our peacekeeping role. For many Canadians that is part of what we are. That is part of the basic traditions we have established as a country. We should not be simply engaged in the sabre rattling rhetoric, we should also be equally involved in the much more difficult, complex world of seeking some resolution.

God knows we have read the statements of Saddam Hussein and others. But there are initiatives being undertaken. Certain Arab nations are doing it. The Soviets are engaged in it. There are things under way.

Certainly it should be our role as Canadians to make a strong case at the United Nations to support those initiatives, just as we should also be raising serious questions about what happens after. The Middle East can never be the same. All the old rules are gone. Surely we are going to have to start asking ourselves some tough questions as a country about the kind of initiatives we wish to take.

As I understand it, one of the real reasons Saddam Hussein is able to build the kind of support he enjoys in certain parts of the Middle East is severe economic deprivation. The fact is that there has not been effective economic planning or development in that part of the region for so long.

I think of the initiatives being taken now to raise funds. I applaud the contribution of $75 million, but I see the kind of economic impact that will take place in countries like Jordan, Turkey and even in Third World countries because of the increase in oil prices. It is catastrophic and it is going to require a substantial reordering economically of the international order. I was waiting for the Group of Seven meeting in Washington this weekend to come up with some initial proposals. It said nothing about it as far as I could see. It ignored the problem in part. That is not good enough. As a member of the G–7 we should be making that case.

I would also like to raise a serious question with the Secretary of State or the government as to the stand we are going to take as a country on the arms embargo. One of the great tragedies of this whole event is the number of western countries, including many of our close allies, rapidly engaged in selling arms, chemical weapons and components of nuclear facilities to Iraq weeks before the invasion took place.

The Secretary of State will know that many times in the past I have been asking in the House for tougher rules both in our own country and internationally on the issue of the sale of arms and on the merchants of death, as they are commonly known in journalistic parlance. If there was ever a time for that case to be nailed tight and shut, it is now.

One of the real roles and opportunities for Canada in this crisis is to speak again with an unequivocal voice and indicate that there should be no more chemical weapons, components of nuclear weapons or arms sold to the likes of Saddam Hussein and other military dictatorships. That should be one of the ways in which we can say to the world: let's take this issue beyond just the simple call to arms and also begin asking what happens after. We should begin to say to people in the Middle East and elsewhere that we will no longer tolerate business as usual once this is over and that we need a different regime and a different set of rules for these kinds of countries.

Mr. Prud'homme: All of them.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): For all of these countries, exactly. I agree. I say to my colleague who has had a long abiding interest in Middle East dramatics that that is true. Every country will have to examine its policies in this area to find peaceful resolutions. I believe it would help now for Canada to be raising its voice, to begin suggesting how that could be done, and to be putting forward those kinds of proposals.

The Prime Minister's statement did not answer any of those questions for us. We do not have answers on what is the actual mandate of our troops. We do not have an answer on the question of whether we are prepared to go to war even though it is not mandated or sanctioned by the United Nations. Are we prepared to support offensive actions by our troops in the Middle East?

Under what conditions? Under whose decision? How will it be made? Under what kind of rules? Will Parliament be consulted? We would like to have answered now all those very serious questions which should have in fact been answered weeks ago.

We look forward very much to the opportunity to listen to members of the front-bench and other members of the government side trying to come to grips with the questions we have raised, because we believe those are the questions being raised by Canadians, not in any simplistic or naive way or not trying to get the Americans. It is simply that they are deeply concerned. They know that no greater decision of any government of any country can be made than that of dealing with war and peace. It is the ultimate question for all states to decide.

They want to be assured that those decisions will be made by all Canadians and that this forum, this Parliament of ours, will be honoured and consulted and used as a forum in which that decision, if it ever has to be made, will be made. More important even than that is the fact that we will do our best and our utmost to ensure that it is the United Nations as the repository for international order that becomes the place where decisions like that are taken, not in the capitals of individual states. That is crucial for us to make.

I say to members on the government side that when it comes to the resolution we certainly agree with the condemnation and certainly agree with and support the actions of the United Nations. However, we think the spirit of the resolution presented to us is not designed to bring about a bipartisan approach which we can all support.

I wish it had been otherwise. I wish they had talked to us or asked us how we could have come together with a joint resolution of all three parties in this House. We could have had something that we could all support. We could have said that this was from where all Canadians speak, but it did not happen. In fact they included some words which they knew the opposition would have to take some quarrel with simply because of our concerns about both the past and present actions that have or have not been taken and the questions we have.

In that spirit I would like to present an amendment to the resolution, trying to work it into a more bipartisan approach. I expect my colleagues in the NDP will try the same because we are not approaching this matter in the way of scoring points or playing a parliamentary game. We realize just how deep and essential this is to the well-being of this country and the well-being of the world.

I would like if I might, Madam Speaker, to amend the motion this way:

> That the motion be amended after the words "Canadian Forces" and read:
>
> enforce these United Nations resolutions;
>
> That this House censure the government for not recalling Parliament at the earliest opportunity to fulfil its legitimate function of consultation and debate as to what role Canada should play in the resolution of the present crisis; and
> That upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

We believe this resolution or the amendment to it will go a long way in providing the kind of resolution that all Canadians can support of whatever party or whatever position so that we can stand united as a country on this very crucial matter.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Resuming debate with the hon. member for Yukon.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I too rise to speak on motion No. 16 as presented by the government and to say that the New Democratic Party unreservedly condemns the invasion of Kuwait. The New Democratic Party unconditionally asks for the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait, as this motion states.

As the previous speaker has said, I think we have to look at this matter in context of the base we are setting for the future and to discuss a number of issues relevant to it.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I am pleased to see the House finally has a chance to discuss the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq which took place a little over seven weeks ago.

Let me make myself clear: the government has shown a flagrant disregard for parliamentary democracy and Canadian parliamentary tradition by failing to call back Parliament.

Madam Speaker, neither I nor my party can accept the use of Parliament for purely formal purposes. Canadians elect their representatives to think, to reflect, to criticize and even to advise, and that is what we intend to do.

Madam Speaker, first of all I want to say that my party and I have condemned the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq.

We think the international community must demonstrate its aversion to the ousting of the Kuwait government and its citizens.

We condemn the violations of the Vienna Convention on the rights of diplomats.

We demand the unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait.

We firmly support the five resolutions of the UN Security Council adopted on August 2, 1990, including Resolution 665.

We must do everything in our power to make the economic blockade a success.

[English]

We support a multinational force in the gulf to enforce United Nations resolution No. 665. We support every effort to ensure that the economic embargo is successful and that we arrive at a peaceful solution of this crisis.

I believe the United Nations is clearly our best mechanism for resolving this crisis. I want to give three main reasons for this. First of all, the cold war is over and the United States and the U.S.S.R. have both condemned the invasion of Iraq. Second, most of the Arab world has condemned the invasion of Iraq. The United Nations Security Council has been unanimous in its position against the Iraqi invasion.

However, I would suggest that the Canadian government has made a fundamental error in the precipitous actions that it took that were not simply related to the embargo as approved by the United Nations.

I also believe the government has made a fundamental error in deciding to follow the lead of the United States instead of helping to lead in the United Nations.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: This is the first post cold war crisis where the international community has been put to the test about how it might undertake multilateral actions in a consistent way, consistent with the United Nations charter and the precepts of common security.

As we have so often said in this party, our security cannot be kept through supporting the insecurity of others. That is why we see the United Nations having a role to ensure that there is common security, common actions, multilateral actions under the direction of the United Nations.

United Nations resolution 665 was passed on August 25, some 15 days after the government sent our Armed Forces to the gulf and 19 days after the Prime Minister had met with the President of the United States.

This government is losing an opportunity to live up to the intention of the San Francisco Conference of 1945 to function effectively when major powers are in agreement. I would remind you, Madam Speaker, that in this case major powers are in agreement. It is unfortunate in our view that the President of the United States decided to take things beyond the international consensus and has cast aside the United Nations. It is also unfortunate that the Prime Minister reacted too quickly to this President's demands.

In our view not only did the Prime Minister of Canada react inappropriately, but by following the U.S. plan this government has given Saddam Hussein an easy villain for his propaganda.

• (1700)

It is for this reason—and I agree with the speaker from the Liberal Party—that we would have wanted to see a resolution that brought together the views, the horror that all Canadians share about the actions of Saddam Hussein in invading another country, but would also allow us to have a debate in which we could look at the way in which it was done.

In his opening remarks the Prime Minister said something to the effect that Canada would stand up and be counted, that we would do our duty, that this was historic, this was significant. I agree that this is an historic and significant act that the Prime Minister has taken unilaterally without consulting this House, but there are ways to stand up and be counted. Why should we accept that the only way is the way that the Prime Minister has taken and that is to send three ships and now further to that CF-18s?

Surely there is another way. Could we not sit down and use our seat on the UN Security Council, for which we fought very hard, in a way which will provide the basis and the foundation for the United Nations assuming a role in this conflict, as in others, that will provide an agenda for peace and for a peaceful resolution.

I would have to say that this government has tended to use the United Nations as it has this Parliament, for approval after the fact. This is a bad strategy for Canada and, in my view, it is a bad strategy for world diplomacy. This resolution uses the United Nations as a rubber stamp. It diminishes its potential and it diminishes the role that Canada could be playing now that we are on the Security Council.

It is clear that independent, thought-provoking policy is not a priority of this government. This is a government that first of all joins the Organization of American States and its first action is to support the U.S. invasion of Panama. Finally, we win a seat on the Security Council and the first action in a major way that we take is to support the United States actions which circumvented unilaterally a United Nations decision.

Let us review the actions of the Canadian government before the crisis began. Three Canadian vessels were dispatched to the Gulf on August 10. There was no parliamentary approval and no parliamentary debate. In fact, the armed forces were not put on active duty because to do so would have meant recalling Parliament. Ironically, our ships even had to slow down in order to avoid active duty status. Our CF-18s are on order to be dispatched but their mission is totally unclear. No other alternatives for a Canadian contribution to a multilateral effort appear to have been considered.

Now there is some confusion. There were no clear orders, no clearly defined role for our armed forces and many questions still remain that must be answered by this government. First of all, on what basis was it decided to send three naval ships? Second, what exactly did the U.S. President request of our Prime Minister? What did the Prime Minister promise to the United States President in terms of our action in the Middle East? This is not clear in the Prime Minister's statement today. Has the Prime Minister ultimately committed us to the use of ground troops? That was not clear in the Prime Minister's statement today. What is the military objective of our naval ships? What is the military objective of the CF-18s? I suppose the biggest question of all is: who is giving the orders? What is Canada prepared to do? We have seen what is happening, we have seen increasing support for Saddam Hussein in the Middle East, we see the possibility of a conflict between the United States and Arabs, not just Saddam Hussein. What will Canada's role be? Are we proposing an offensive role, a defensive role, or standing on the sidelines? It has never been made clear; it was not clear, even in the briefing given by the head of the armed forces and by the Prime Minister last week.

I believe that my party and I would have acted differently if we had had the opportunity. First of all, we would have held a full parliamentary debate—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: —because we believe that an issue as important as this, an issue that could basically come to the question,"Will Canada go to war?", we need to hear everyone's views, everyone's solution, not in a partisan way but in a way to ensure that Canada, as a middle power, acts as a force for peace and uses its resources in a way to ensures that.

The Prime Minister referred to our role in peacekeeping and said that that was not undermined by the actions that he and his government took. It seems to me that if we had not been so precipitous in doing what we did, we might have found a role that is much more in keeping with the traditions of Canada, that is peacekeeping, its role as a voice of reason and diplomacy. As we know, this was not done and Canada's troops are now in the Middle East. The question is, what do we do now? How do we maintain Canada's international reputation as a peacekeeper and how do we demonstrate that we are prepared to work with the United Nations, not simply follow one other nation's decision-making?

Madam Speaker, I propose that Canada adopt the following policies: given our limited military resources in the Persian Gulf, Canada should be poised to take future peacekeeping roles. In the meantime I recommend, as my colleague did earlier today during the Question Period, that our troops stay in the Gulf of Amman as was their original order and that Canada begin to position itself as a voice of reason and calm in the midst of high tension. I would add that if our troops were to remain in the Gulf of Amman, we could then assist in implementing Motion 665 of the United Nations regarding the blockade.

Second, I would propose that we must increase our efforts to help refugees from this area and use our seat on the United Nations Security Council to put increasing pressure on Saddam Hussein. Canadians must be wondering what we have done since we got that seat on the Security Council. All that most of us can see that Canada has done is simply to follow the United States before it has even made any kind of plan, proposed anything that the UN could become involved in, in a substantive way.

We would also work for a political solution; this is not just something that requires a military solution. We recommend that we should be attempting to revive the military staff committee of the United Nations which provides for the co-ordination of international military efforts, in order to maintain international peace and security. Surely this crisis in Iraq and Kuwait demonstrates the importance of having the United Nations mobilized so that it can deal with these issues, not after they have occurred but have a policy developed to deal with them before they occur. I would suggest that the Canadian government has a role to play and we should use our seat on the United Nations Security Council to make sure that the United Nations is in a position to use its authority in a useful and a positive way.

We cannot see this situation simply in the context of the invasion of Kuwait, although it is obviously the most serious issue at this point, we also must look and work for a long-term approach to the situation in the Middle East in general. My colleague, the hon. member from the Liberal Party, also mentioned arms shipments to Iraq. We simply are now reaping what many have predicted, including many in this party and myself, that to continue to sell arms to the Middle East will simply lead to very serious consequences and we see the consequences now. We must have an arms embargo in the Middle East.

• (1710)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: I would add, Madam Speaker, that this country cannot see itself exempt from that. We know that we have participated in that and we have to take our own responsibility and not just point the finger at other countries. We also have to work to end the use of nuclear and chemical weapons.

Third, we must promote an international conference to resolve the longstanding Palestinian question. Let us not forget that Canada's longstanding and traditional role in international relations has been to provide diplomatic means as well as a force for peace in times of conflict. By participating in the present non-United Nations force, Canada may eliminate the possibility of playing a peacekeeping role in the future. There is a better way, and I say today that we must begin that task.

I would like to make a couple of other points and take a bit of time to send my prayers and those of my party to the Canadians still trapped inside Iraq and Kuwait. I also want to commend the embassy staff in those two countries for the hard work which they did under very, very stressful conditions. I myself had an opportunity to speak on a couple of occasions to those staff in Iraq specifically and I understand how very, very difficult and in a very fine way they did their job.

I also would like to extend my admiration and prayers to the Canadian men and women who have been sent to the Gulf. They are courageous Canadians who have already made many sacrifices so that we may live in a peaceful world. Let us all hope that none of them will have to make the ultimate sacrifice. Let us all today take the responsibility which ensures that we, as politicians, will act in a responsible way to ensure that they do not.

Madam Speaker, there are three other short points I would like to make because I would like to propose an amendment to the government's motion. As we know, Iraq was our largest customer for Canadian wheat, and I would ask that the government adequately compensate Canadian farmers who are harmed by the Iraqi wheat embargo because it is very important to have a united front on this very serious issue.

I have said that we support unreservedly the first part of Motion No. 16 put forward by the government. We too condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. We too demand the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of legitimate government in Kuwait. But I would have to say that what has been added to this, that we simply rubber stamp the actions of this government is not acceptable. I take great offence that the government has put forward a motion which they know will not get unanimous consent because they simply have put in that section to rubber stamp their actions rather than to condemn the government. It is for these reasons that we cannot support the resolution as it stands before the House.

This government is using the United Nations, as it does its own Parliament, for approval after the fact.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the member for Burnaby—Kingsway:

> That the motion be amended by adding the following after the word "resolutions"
>
> "And further, that Canada work at the Security Council to seek assurances that no country will undertake offensive military operations against Iraq unless they are under UN command and explicitly authorized by the Security Council."

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: In view of the amendment moved by the previous Speaker, the House will surely allow me to check to see if it is in order before moving this amendment to the amendment.

Pursuing to Standing Order 38, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Burnaby—Canada Assistance Plan; the Hon. Member for Nunatsiaq—Aboriginal Rights; the Hon. Member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing—Post-Secondary Education.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Shefford rises on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I ask now that the Hon. Member for Lac-Saint-Jean be heard.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I suggest the Hon. Member should have waited for the Chair to recognize another member or whatever. Now, the motion has been heard, as moved by the Hon. Member for—

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Saint-Denis rises on a point of order.

Mr. Prud'homme: I suggest that what we are doing now is quite irregular. If my memory concerning a major debate on the Canadian flag serves me right, it would be necessary for two members to rise at the same time. The Chair would have had to recognize one of them. Any member who is dissatisfied would have to stand up and say: Therefore, I recommend that Mr. or Mrs X be recognized instead of Mr. or Mrs Y.

For the time being, I do not see anybody standing. Under the circumstances, do not tempt me, for I might be the one to have the floor.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I think it is important to note that when we are dealing with this issue, notwithstanding the excellent points raised by my colleague with which I fully concur, there is the additional requirement as far as I am concerned that we actually be at a speaking stage of the bill. Right now, and for the next 10 minutes, we are in the process whereby we will recognize questions and comments. When that process is terminated, the next speaker must have risen and been duly recognized. Once recognized, a second speaker must be rising at the same time. Why should the Chair be called upon to decide between two speakers when only one of them rose in order to speak, namely the minister?

[Translation]

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford rose on a point of order to ask that another member be recognized. Unfortunately I must advise the hon. member that the member for Lac-Saint-Jean did not rise at the same time he raised his point of order. Therefore I must recognize the first member who rose, the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. I think this settles the question. The hon. member for Shefford?

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): At the time you saw the member for Lac-Saint-Jean standing and seeking the floor. Consequently, as suggested by our colleague from Saint-Denis, I move:

That the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean be now heard.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I am rising to support the Chair in the ruling. I just want to read this for the benefit of other members who might not have clearly understood what the Chair has ruled upon, and with which I agree. Rule 62 states very clearly:

When two or more Members rise to speak, the Speaker calls upon the Member who first rose in his or her place; but a motion may be made that any Member who has risen "be now heard", or "do now speak", which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

• (1720)

[Translation]

Quite clearly, Madam Speaker, as far as I am concerned—and other members share this view—your ruling was sound and the question can be put only in cases where two or more members rise at the same time and under similar circumstances when the Chair has recognized one and the other is not satisfied. Since there was no such circumstance I fully agree with the Chair as to the way the matter was settled.

Mr. Lapierre: Since we have nothing to lose by waiting, Madam Speaker, I abide by your ruling.

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, when the decision was taken to send Canadian forces to join other nations in the gulf, there was an undertaking to initiate a discussion in Parliament at the first appropriate occasion. The House resumed sitting today and this resolution has been introduced immediately.

If I may, I will deal for a moment with some of the matters raised by my colleagues on the other side. No opportunity has been denied parliamentarians to be heard on this issue. That opportunity is being exercised now. That is perfectly in accordance with the traditions and the practices of this Parliament in all situations that bear any resemblance to what we are dealing with now.

What departs from the tradition, if I may say so, is the attempt by my friend, the hon member for Winnipeg South Centre, to make this, not a debate about a question of great importance, but simply a partisan exchange, which he has done with his amendment. Naturally, I wanted to indicate on behalf of the government that we do not intend to support that amendment which would have that trivializing affect upon a debate which is very, very important.

The value of a debate is to know the views of other parties and other members in the House. The other parties who have spoken today will be judged on the basis of the matters they have brought forward.

My colleague from Winnipeg did raise some questions of importance and substance and I hope to deal with them later on. I always thought he wanted to be the external affairs critic and, for a while today, I thought he wanted to be the House Leader of the Liberal Party because most of his arguments were procedural, but some were not and I will deal with those later.

With regard to the Leader of the New Democratic Party, if I understood her correctly, one proposal she put forward was that the decision that was taken as to the deployment of our ships in the gulf, a decision taken by the Chief of the Defence Staff, should be changed by her critic on external affairs. I am not sure that the rest of the country is ready to have the judgment of the Chief of the Defence Staff substituted by the Member of Parliament for Burnaby—Kingsway. Certainly, we are not.

I was interested in her suggestion as to the amendment that she introduced. Since she took exception to the following language in the resolution now before the House—the affirmation of "support for Canada's actions in the United Nations Security Council and its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2—am I to understand that the New Democratic Party opposes Canada's actions in the United Nations Security Council? Am I to understand that the New Democratic Party opposes support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2? That would be a bizarre position.

[Translation]

On August 2, Madam Speaker, Iraq launched a general attack and invaded the sovereign state of Kuwait. This was an obvious breach of the most elementary principles of international law. It was an invasion made without provocation and in violation of the commitment made by Iraq as member of the United Nations to seek a peaceful settlement to disputes.

Even though the concentration of troops which preceded the violation of Kuwait's sovereignty did not go unnoticed, the rest of the world was shaken by the fact that Iraq should have so readily resorted to force.

Only a few days before the invasion Saddam Hussein had promised President Mubarak that Kuwait would not be invaded. The small country was quickly occupied and its government was replaced by a puppet regime whose nature was obvious. Realizing that the international community would not recognize this puppet administration, on August 8 the Iraqi quite simply decided to swallow Kuwait and announced that henceforth this country would be their southern provinces. All these measures violated international law and made people fear that the agression might well extend to Saudi Arabia.

Since then Iraq has increased its military presence and imposed strict occupation rules on the resisting population. It is now plundering public and private Kuwaitian assets.

Hundreds of thousands of foreign workers fled Kuwait and neighbouring countries, particularly Jordania, have to face the consequences: hordes of fleeing and penniless workers, economic upheaval and increased tensions.

Canada reacted by asking immedialtely that collective measures be taken to condemn and stop the aggression. On September 4 Canada officially suspended all commercial trade with Iraq and occupied Kuwait, froze the assets of both governments and cancelled special provisions concerning trade promotion with the Iraqi and other commercial agreements.

[English]

When Iraq acted against Kuwait its aggression had to be stopped in its tracks to give time for the machinery of the international community to get to work. Iraq's clear ambitions against Saudi sovereignty and the threat of further direct action against it required an unequivocal demonstration of support for Saudi Arabia and for the gulf states. That immediate reaction allowed the United Nations to mount a response of unprecedented unanimity and effectiveness.

There have been questions raised about the United Nations' mandate, serious questions raised by my colleague from Winnipeg, and I assure him and the House that the Government of Canada has worked very hard within the United Nations to ensure that there will be full respect for the mandate of the United Nations.

We have encouraged our close allies, we have encouraged others, and we have used our influence and our position on the Security Council to ensure that the action that proceeds is action that is within the mandate of the United Nations and, indeed, that the mandate given by the United Nations expands to take account of the circumstances as they develop in the region. We are working very hard to have United Nations' auspices respected.

The member posed a question as to comments I made in answer to reporters in Washington on Friday. I was asked whether we had ruled out other actions that we might take. We have not ruled them out. We intend to take them in the context of the United Nations. We intend to take them in the spirit in which we have acted to this point, if we have to take them.

Remember what we are dealing with here. We are dealing with a situation in which world pressure has to be mounted and has to be maintained if there is any hope for diplomacy to work. That means that countries like ours, which have a range of measures which we might apply, have to be in a position to apply them as circumstances warrant. In our view, in the Canadian tradition, in the tradition of our actions in this crisis, we will be acting within the context of the United Nations and encouraging others to respect the mandate of that organization.

But let me make this point. One cannot always wait for deliberative bodies to deliberate and to decide. Saddam Hussein did not wait. I was quite surprised by the suggestion of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, if I understood her correctly, that somehow Canada moved too quickly. Does she believe that Egypt moved too quickly, because it was at the same pace as Canada? Does she believe that Europe moved too quickly, because it was at the same pace as Canada? Does she believe that the Soviet Union moved too quickly, because it was the same pace as Canada? Does she believe that there should not—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): No Soviet troops. There are Soviet ships and there has been Soviet action very actively on the Security Council. The point is that we cannot always expect events in the world to await the decisions of deliberative bodies. We can do what we can to ensure that those bodies move very quickly. I ask some questions. Perhaps there is a new position being put forward by the member for York Centre different from that put forward by his colleague from Winnipeg.

• (1730)

Let me take the proposal as I understand it by the member for Yukon, which was that Canada should have waited before signalling our willingness to send troops, before acting to freeze Kuwaiti assets in Canada so they could not be taken advantage of by Iraq.

An hon. member: She never mentioned it.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I do not want to misinterpret her. Let me just stick to the issue of troops. If she was saying—and her critic is nodding his head affirmatively—that the position of Canada should have been that we should have waited until there had been UN action before we signalled our intention to join other countries in the Gulf, then I think that that raises some other questions.

One question it raises is: how long would she have had Canada wait? A second question it raises is: what does she think would have happened while Canada was waiting? What would have happened while Egypt was waiting? What would have happened while Europe was waiting? Does she believe that Saddam Hussein would have waited? Those are not rhetorical questions offered in debate. Those are questions that have to be faced by serious parliamentarians recognizing that Canada's position here is not simply a position of passing resolutions but is a position of exercising our influence by the deployment of all of our resources, humanitarian resources, military resources and diplomatic resources.

There is no doubt at all that our ability, Canada's and that of other countries, to provide some room for the United Nations to work, our ability to stop Saddam Hussein in Kuwait and dissuade him from going on into Saudi Arabia depended upon the fact that there was a clear response on the part of a range of countries that further aggression by Saddam Hussein would not be accepted by the world.

The United Nations Security Council could not meet that quickly to deliver that message, but the message had to be delivered. I have no apologies for Canada being part of sending a signal that stopped Saddam Hussein and created an opportunity for diplomacy and the United Nations Security Council to work.

To come back to the central point, I assure the House that we have acted consistently to strengthen the role of the United Nations in this crisis, and we intend to do that. Canada's immediate and timely response, including the commitment to send our forces, contributed to stopping Iraq from more aggression. At the same time that we sent that signal we were playing a very active role in developing Security Council positions. The spectacular and historic success of the United Nations system in the succeeding weeks vindicated our faith in the ability of the world body to follow through with concerted measures against the Iraqi Government's actions and with policies consistent with Canadian values and precedents in foreign policy.

Resolution 661 passed on August 6 by the Security Council was key to that definition because it set out the sanctions which were to be imposed on Iraq. The intention of that measure was to end trade with Iraq. All ordinary commercial operations were to stop immediately. Critical for Canadians and indeed for all countries with nationals who now fall under the control of the Iraqis was resolution 664, which was passed a brief 12 days later on August 18. Saddam Hussein detained all males over the age of 18 from a group of countries, mainly western countries, which included Canada. Working women from black-listed countries were as well refused the right to leave freely.

The forces in the Gulf were given United Nations authority to use necessary force to halt maritime shipping and inspect cargoes to ensure that sanctions were being respected. Resolution 665 was passed on August 25 with two abstentions and was crucial to giving United Nations framework for the activities of naval forces in the area, including our own. In response to the manipulation of the food issue by Saddam Hussein, the Security Council had to define the precise conditions under which food could be sent to civilians in distress in Iraq and occupied Kuwait.

Resolution 666 of September 13 addressed the question firmly and unambiguously; if United Nations and some appropriate agency had to accompany any delivery to ensure distribution to the civilian population. Further measures are in preparation. The sanctions must be continually defined and tightened. They must be policed. My colleague from Windsor, who has worked with me on South African matters, knows how important it is to police embargoes and police sanctions that are in place. That has to happen here. A further resolution concerning an air embargo will be presented at the Security Council meeting tomorrow, an extraordinary meeting, at the level of foreign ministers, dedicated, among other things, to demonstrate the very high priority that all of the world attaches to this response.

If Iraq's attack was an extraordinary violation of international law, so was the world's response an extraordinary example of common purpose. The whole of the international community joined in condemnation of Iraq. The ships in the gulf are from Britain, France, the United States, the Soviet Union, Canada, Australia and Argentina. The troops on the ground are from some of these countries, plus Egypt, Syria, Morocco and Bangladesh. With remarkable courage, the majority of the Arab world has demanded that Iraq leave Kuwait. This is not east against west nor rich against poor nor Arab against non-Arab. This is the world coming together to stop aggression. Naturally, Canada has played its full role. We are advocates of international order. We seek to defend it when it is broken and we seek to extend international order when we can. Ironically, this aggression by Iraq may have created conditions where common action by the world may become more the rule and less the exception. Certainly, it is Canada's intention to seek to extend this new consensus in the United Nations.

Questions were raised about arm's embargoes. There is no question that is a very important matter now, thrown into relief by the sources of weapons involved in this conflict. Canada's record, as a matter of fact, is a good record with regard to our own policies but other countries in the world are not so good. There is no point our being effective unless others are. There is an opportunity now for us, not by showing the way. You do not accomplish things necessarily by showing the way. You accomplish things by sitting down with others and moving them forward with you.

We have had some experience in moral leadership. Moral leadership is fine, Madam Speaker. Moral leadership is quite important. Moral leadership is particularly important for celebrating empty victories. But if you are interested in making some significant changes in international events, you have to combine moral leadership with a very sharp sense of what can be accomplished and that is what we have been doing here. I believe, and it will be Canada's intention in the Security Council and elsewhere, that it is now going to be possible for us to have a more secure and comprehensive regime with regard to arms exports than has been the case in the past and it may indeed provide momentum for the discussions on chemical weapons.

Again, we have some experience here. Canada's reputation, Canada's diligence on these issues, has been successful in extending the arms control embargo as it has applied in the past to South Africa. I think in these new circumstances it will be possible for us to use that same commitment and leadership and skill to advance the possibility of arms embargoes to help prevent future crises of this kind.

I was asked if we are examining options, I believe it was the question, that would lead Iraq to withdraw and certainly we are. May I make three points about that. As we undertake that, we want to be careful not to complicate the resolution of this issue by drawing in other questions which have on their own proved extraordinarily difficult to resolve. I know the position that is being put forward by Saddam Hussein with regard to the inter-relation of all of the issues in that region. I think that we are justified in seeking to resolve this particular aggression now. I take the hon. member's point that the region has changed irreversibly and very substantially. The question for us to face is how do we respond to those changes and do we put at risk the possibility of moving Saddam Hussein back by bringing in other issues which, while they have to be resolved, might not best be resolved in this circumstance.

Second, we are naturally going to be consulting closely with the Government of Kuwait with respect to any matters that might affect the nation, the state or the sovereignty of Kuwait.

• (1740)

Third, our authorities are under instruction as those of others in the world are to seek urgently imaginative options that might make a difference in this particular crisis.

The hon. member raised a question generally. I have tried to reply to him to indicate that we are looking very actively with as much imagination as we can to ways in which Canada might either find options that would work or advance them.

A point has to be underlined. I note that I am at the end of my time. This conflict is very dangerous to the world. Its ramifications will dominate global policy making for years to come. The challenge will be to maintain unwavering and consistent pressure to give diplomatic avenues a chance to succeed, but there must be a recognition on the part of the House and on the part of the country at large that there is no certainty that this issue will be resolved quickly.

We are in a very dangerous time in the world. We have an obligation as a country which has earned its credentials as a peacekeeper, diplomatically and militarily. We are under an obligation to deploy all our resources in ways that are consistent with our traditions and interests. That is what we have been seeking to do.

Yes, we have been innovative. Mr. Pearson was innovative when he stood against people who criticized the idea of using military forces in any peacekeeping role at all. We are prepared to be innovative in these circumstances, but we believe there is a requirement upon Canada to deploy all our resources—military, diplomatic and humanitarian—so that we can contribute in the best Canadian tradition to a resolution of a crisis that is as serious as anything we have known in decades.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments on the amendment to the amendment as moved by the previous speaker.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I had an opportunity to speak and I will leave it to other members, but there was one question that I will just put to the government side. The Secretary of State was good enough to answer several questions, but he missed this one and it is crucial.

As we now stand in the present situation, we are looking at very long, protracted sanctions in the gulf which could take months. We are looking at a very major military build-up that is taking place in Saudi Arabia with the various multinational forces, and we are looking at a potential military option.

We would like to get some assurance specifically from the government that we will not engage in any offensive action in this region unless there is a consent of Parliament and a mandate from the United Nations. Can the minister give us that assurance?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Madam Speaker, we are anticipating no offensive action. We cannot anticipate what Saddam Hussein might do. We cannot anticipate threats that might arise to Canadians, and I think the hon. member would want us to respond to those threats as appropriate.

I do not contemplate circumstances under which our anticipation would change. I give you my assurance that if the House is sitting, if it is not a weekend, if it is a week day, we would come to Parliament in the very unlikely event that what we anticipate changes. If not, that I or others would seek to consult with the spokesmen of other parties.

We are also urging, I should add, other countries to work within and to stay within the United Nations mandate. Part of our success in that will depend upon the United Nations mandate continuing to be large enough and contemporary enough to changing situations in the gulf that the temptation for other countries to operate outside it would be reduced.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I would like to deal with the latter point made by the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. Of course the current mandate given by the Security Council is very specific with respect to the use of force in that area, and that is the mandate under resolution 665. It is strictly for purposes of enforcing resolution 661. There is no other security council mandate at this point, as the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs is well aware.

I want to point out to the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs that in fact—and I am sure it was unintentional on his part—he did unfortunately misrepresent the position taken by the leader of my party during her very eloquent contribution to this debate. The leader of my party made it very clear that the portion of the main motion to which we take exception are the words after "August 2"; in other words, the words dealing with "the despatch of members of the Canadian Forces to take part in the multinational military effort".

We have condemned the invasion. We have urged Iraq to recognize its responsibility to withdraw unconditionally from Kuwait. We have indeed supported Canada's role in the Security Council today. That should be made very clear, and any suggestion to the contrary is completely without foundation.

I might just say as well that when the Secretary of State for External Affairs asked why Canada should not have moved more quickly, the reality is that the Security Council did meet before August 25 and it would have been prudent and indeed desirable for Canada to have waited until the Security Council had moved, as it did ultimately move under 665, before proceeding to send troops into that area.

I might say as well that there is a great deal of hypocrisy in the response of many countries in this region. On July 31, two days before the invasion, the American government turned down efforts by a number of people in Congress to enforce trade sanctions against Iraq.

The Conservative government in November of last year was peddling all sorts of Canadian business at the Baghdad trade fair in November 1989 after the Iraqi government was responsible for the gassing, the chemical warfare against 4,000 Kurds in March 1988.

Following those comments, I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he in fact agrees that Canada should be playing a role at the Security Council to ensure that no country, including the United States, will in fact take unilateral offensive military action against Iraq outside the framework of the United Nations and, more specifically, outside the framework of the Security Council.

It is essential that we have that assurance as a Parliament, because failing that assurance the lives of the many troops that have been sent into that area from Canada are put directly at risk. Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs prepared to give that assurance, and is he prepared to give the assurance that Canada will seek to establish a situation in which troops in the Middle East are there under United Nations command?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Madam Speaker, there were several questions there and some observations, including a confusion which I think I should elucidate, a confusion between a policy which would prevent the export of arms, which is what we are doing with regard to Iraq and to many other countries, and a policy which would say if there is behaviour that is objectionable to us we should stop all business with a country like Iraq.

I think it was that latter proposal that was put forward by the spokesman for the New Democratic Party. I think it important that that distinction be made because it would be unfortunate if we took attention away from the stand alone importance of the question of an effective arms embargo where we have to gather international support if we are going to make any progress. If we were suggesting a much broader approach which would say nobody does business with countries that behave in ways of which we disapprove, I can tell the hon. member he would know that our chances of success would not exist.

If I misinterpreted the amendment, which I only heard orally from his leader, then I apologize. I think that what she is saying, however, is that there should not have been a signal by Canada, that Canada should not have joined Egypt, should not have joined most of Europe, should not have joined Australia in sending a signal that would stop Saddam Hussein from carrying on his aggression. We do not think that it would be appropriate for Canada, as the Prime Minister said, to absent ourselves from our responsibility.

• (1750)

With respect to the member's particular question, we are working to ensure as much as we can, and ensure is a difficult word. We are using all of our influence to encourage all members of the world community to act within the framework of the United Nations. I have said that frequently in the House in this debate. That is clearly what we are doing and that is the policy that we intend to follow. I reiterate to him that in order for us to be effective in pursuing that policy, it has to be clear to the rest of the world community that we are prepared not simply to talk about things, but that we are prepared also to deploy all our resources as they are appropriate: military, diplomatic, humanitarian.

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I want to join in underlining the seriousness which the minister has echoed in his speech and make the following observation. The Secretary General in his comment indicated that we are possibly in the most serious situation of war since the Second World War. The Secretary of State for External Affairs says that imaginative options are being pursued. I would like to encourage him and others in that direction and suggest that we are dealing with face saving on two sides in this case. Canada is uniquely positioned with President Bush as well as with Hussein.

Second, the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke about humanitarian assistance and Canada's contribution. Former President Julius Nyreve today suggested in speaking to the south report that the by-product of this Iraqi situation will mean to the nations of the south some $18 billion to $26 billion on already fragile economies. In meeting with our Security Council members, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs bring this to their attention and see what the world community can do to offset the suffering implied in that?

Third, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has spoken about seizing this moment. For many years in the time of the East-West confrontation we have looked at a standing UN peace force. There have been designs and models and because of the East-West confrontation we have not been able to move. Will Canada now, and will the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his speech to the United Nations indicate that Canada will move to try to establish the machinery for a UN standing peace force with battalions held in reserve by national governments so that in an emergency like this or in another regional area we will not be beholden to one superpower or another to act and thereby the accusations that somehow the world community is not fully behind us?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Madam Speaker, very briefly, there is unquestionably a crisis that is particularly acute for developing countries. In some cases it is not simply a crisis brought on by increased oil prices but also by the return of nationals who had been earning income in the gulf and are no longer able to do that and who indeed come back to contribute to an already difficult problem of under-employment of resources in their own countries.

These matters have been discussed in a preliminary way. The member from Winnipeg asked if they had been discussed at the G-7 meeting. They have been. I chaired a meeting on Saturday in Washington of the Inter-American Development Bank. They were discussed there. A point that does not take away from the importance of the question is that some of the developing countries are of course oil producers and there is consequently in some cases an impact that is not wholly negative on some of those countries, but in general the situation in developing countries is made more severe.

With regard to UN peacekeeping and a permanent force, I cannot comment on that specifically here today. I think the new interest which has been shown in the United Nations makes a number of sensible proposals that were not getting a lot of support in the past worth looking at again. I would not want that to be interpreted specifically with regard to the UN peacekeeping permanent force. The UN is facing an extraordinary demand upon its auspices hopefully in the gulf and certainly in Cambodia, and we have to seize this moment to try to ensure that the enthusiasm shown in response to this crisis becomes more general.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Given that this issue is so important and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, although I disagree with what he says, is so forthcoming as a parliamentarian in the debate, I seek unanimous consent of the House to extend the question and answer period for another 10 minutes.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not have unanimous consent is not unanimous. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Labrador has the floor.

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I now move:

That the member for Lac-Saint-Jean be heard.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion is admissible as moved. Is it the pleasure of the House—

Is there a seconder for that motion?

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would suggest that since the motion has been put once in this sitting it cannot be put again. Is that correct?

Madam Deputy Speaker: No, that would not be the case because obviously it would be a different member having been recognized.

I will have to go back to the yeas and nays because I have lost count.

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion is lost.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, for the purposes of this debate there were two main issues that faced Canadians this past summer. The first issue of course was the world crisis, possibly the most serious crisis that we faced certainly since the Korean War and possibly since the Second World War.

The first crisis was the world crisis and the threat. Canada responded to that in a way which we have learned in this debate not everybody appreciated.

The second issue that faced Canadians this past summer was a clear message from the people of Canada that they wanted to be consulted on what was happening in this country, in the governing of this country, and that they were going to hold all politicians, no matter what Parliament they served in, accountable for what was happening.

I contend that there were two crises: a growing threat of war and a growing threat of democracy. In dealing with the first issue, the growing threat of war, the government ignored the second issue, the growing threat of democracy. The government committed the Canadian Forces to the gulf with no consultation at all with Parliament or the people of Canada. There was consultation with the US. In fact the government reacted as a result of the request from the United States.

It was on August 6, the same day as the second resolution in the Security Council, that the Prime Minister went to Washington to consult with President Bush and there agreed to support the naval blockade in the gulf. Clearly Canada acted at the request and at the instigation of the United States, but at no time did Canada act in consultation with the Parliament or the people of Canada. This was unlike any other country with which we are associated now or with which we have been associated in the past. It was unlike, as my colleague from Winnipeg indicated earlier, Great Britain, which consulted its Parliament. It was unlike France. It was even unlike the United States because President George Bush, even when he was on the golf course, was consistently consulting and letting the people of the United States know what was happening and, indeed, consulting congressional leaders. He lives in a presidential system whereas we live in a parliamentary democracy. Unlike other parliamentary democracies with whom we are associated now and with whom we have been associated in the past, the government has not consulted Parliament and, through it, the Canadian people.

• (1800)

The government has said—that is the implied statement of the government—that this is not a serious enough issue on which to consult Parliament. It is not as serious as, for example, the parole bill for which Parliament was recalled some years ago. It was not as serious as the arrival of Tamils on the shores of Nova Scotia for which Parliament was recalled in 1987. At that time the then Minister of Immigration said it was one of the most serious crises that Canada had faced and Parliament was recalled. But on this issue, which is the most serious issue which we have faced since the Korean War and, arguably, since the Second World War, there was no recall of Parliament.

That stands in stark contrast to the pattern of the past, of the entry into the Korean War for example. Parliament was sitting at the time in which Canada's participation was initiated, but Parliament prorogued for the summer and was recalled for an emergency session later to debate the entry into the Korean War.

So the practice this past summer is in stark contrast with what has happened before. We maintain that the government may have acted within the letter of the law as contained in the National Defence Act, but it has not acted within the spirit of the National Defence Act because that act clearly says that Parliament is to be recalled if Canadian forces are put on active service and if they are committed to a theatre of war. In doing so, we maintain that the government has compromised certainly the dignity and possibly the integrity of the Canadian Armed Forces because they had to change their plans to conform to the incompetent management of the Government of Canada.

It might be useful for us to recall some press clippings of the day that describe how the Canadian forces had to change their plan of action because of what they government was doing or, more importantly, not doing. Here is The Globe and Mail dated September 11:

> Sources within the Canadian Forces say the government's commitment to the gulf has been consistently tempered by a reluctance to recall Parliament, and Defence Department spokesmen acknowledge that the ships' progress is tied to the date of Parliament's return.
> Instead of sailing directly towards the Suez Canal and reaching the Red Sea early this week, the ship sought what department spokesmen called "other training opportunities—". The ships are currently in the Sicilian port of Augusta.
>
> Asked whether there has been time for the ships to reach the Red Sea by now, navy spokesman Jeffrey Agnew said yesterday, "They could be there now. Yes."
>
> However, the navy "scheduled a whole bunch of things" designed to ensure the ships did not arrive before Sept. 14. "Everything was back-dated from Sept. 24," he said.
>
> A second department official, who did not wish to be named, said yesterday that the Canadian flotilla "is definitely not moving as quickly as possible."
> Asked why the government did not order the ships to reach the Red Sea sooner and recall Parliament to authorize their status, Cmdr. Agnew said, "That is a political question, and not for me to discuss."

It is clear that there was a necessary change of plans by the Canadian Armed Forces to accommodate what the government was doing, or more importantly, not doing. Here is the report of that same time from Southam News.

> Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's decision not to recall Parliament to debate the Persian Gulf crisis has temporarily stranded a convoy of three Canadian warships in Sicily.
> Under the original timetable the three ships would not have been there until well after September 14.
>
> But those plans fell apart on the weekend. On Saturday, Col. P.G. Boutet the defence department's chief judge and advocate, turned over a legal opinion concluding that the area of operation also included the Red Sea.
> After being told that cabinet would not sign the order until Sept. 15, senior military officials decided to delay the ships which originally would have entered the Red Sea on Sept. 13 or earlier.

So it is very clear that the handling of this by the Government of Canada necessitated a change in plans by the Canadian Armed Forces. What signal does that send about the seriousness of our intent? What signal does it send to our allies? What signal does it send to the Canadian people? What signal does it send to the people in Halifax? What signal does it send to the spouses of Canadian forces personnel who went down to the jetties and who tied yellow ribbons in remembrance of those people who were going overseas. There are people in this House today who stood with them on the jetties and who understood the seriousness of what they were doing, who understood that this was a matter of duty for anybody in the Canadian forces. They did this willingly with a seriousness of purpose, with great sympathy, great compassion and with great sadness, only to discover that those ships spent two days off course, going through unnecessary manoeuvres because of the handling of this situation by the Government of Canada.

Those are the kinds of things that Canadians cannot tolerate and cannot appreciate. The Government of Canada may have acted within the letter of the law because the letter of the law says, if you put Canadian forces on active duty you have to recall Parliament within 10 days. But the spirit of the law clearly is that Parliament is to be consulted.

I maintain that if we have learned anything over this past summer it is that the people of Canada not only want that consultation but demand it. If there is one message coming through clearly after this past summer it is that the people of Canada want to know what the government is doing. More than that, they want to participate in what the government is doing and what is happening in this country. That is what the government failed to recognize. They followed the letter of the law of the National Defence Act, but they did not follow the spirit of the National Defence Act.

What will the government do? This question was raised by my colleague from Winnipeg just a few moments ago. I am not sure we have received an entirely clear answer as to what the government will do. We know what the government has done thus far and we know how the government has operated thus far. They have operated without consulting Parliament and without consulting the Canadian people.

Our sea forces are in the Gulf. They are under the aegis of the UN because of the resolutions that have been passed. But there are other forces on land in the Gulf which are not under the aegis of the United Nations. What happens if there is a declaration of war? What happens if the United States declares war? What will be the position of the Government of Canada then, and how will the Government of Canada act? I think Canadians want to have a clear answer to that question. I am not sure that we got a clear answer from the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon.

While the people of Canada support the containment of aggression and the establishment of peace, they do not support Canada simply being an appendage of the United States. The people of Canada want an independent posture for this country. We are still an independent country and the people of Canada will want an independent posture and not simply a yes-man role for the government. The government has to give a very clear answer to that question. I think the government has to give a very clear answer to that question.

Another matter the government has to give a clear answer to, and I have not heard it this afternoon yet, is what initiatives were taken in the Security Council to promote a peaceful resolution. In the past Canada has given a good account of itself in that forum but I ask the question, where is the equivalent of Lester Pearson today.

During the Suez crisis a Canadian was prominent in not only bringing about an important solution to a world problem but being seen to bring about an important solution to a world problem. Where is that same Canadian today? Where is that same leadership today? If in fact Canada is taking that kind of leadership in the Security Council, we do not know about it. There is no evidence. The Canadian people do not know about it, Parliament does not know about it. Exactly what has Canada done and exactly what is Canada doing within the Security Council to bring about a peaceful resolution of this? Now is the time to strengthen the UN. There is a window of opportunity.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said a moment ago, out of this crisis may come a strengthened UN. That is the hope of us all, but unless we work we cannot expect that to happen willy-nilly. We cannot expect that to happen inadvertently. We have to work at strengthening the UN. We have to ask again: what is the role of the Canadian government in this?

In conclusion I would like to say that Canadians are encouraged by the role that the UN has played in this crisis and we must seize this opportunity to assert the primacy of the UN. Second, Canadians abhor and deplore the actions of Iraq. We must underscore and emphasize that this party and the people of Canada, and indeed this House deplore what has happened in the Persian Gulf, deplore the aggression of Iraq. Canadians want an independent policy. They want to see that we are not simply an appendage of the United States but that we have a clear, national policy of our own.

Last, and above all, Canadians want to know what are the government's plans. They want to be consulted about those plans and participate in the formulation of them. That has not happened up to now. It must happen now and in the future.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I had an opportunity to listen to my hon. friend.

[Translation]

For now, however, I have a question to ask on another subject. It relates to the comment to the effect that all Liberals would not necessarily have agreed to an early recall of the House.

[English]

During the past several weeks I met several of my hon. friend's colleagues. They all told me they were reluctant to return. One in fact said, "Don't believe that nonsense you hear from the leadership of our party. We have no intention of coming back early." What I want to ask my hon. friend to do is this: can he tell me what steps were taken to accurately poll the members of Parliament of his party—

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Greene): On a point of order, the hon. member for Saint-Denis.

Mr. Prud'homme: I think the minister knows that he cannot anonymously quote people of whom we are unaware. He is saying, "Anonymous friends called me", which is a private conversation. I do not think the minister should use that.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Greene): This is not a point of order. The hon. Minister of Transport.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I will come to the defence of my hon. colleagues opposite and say none of them are in the House today, which may speak to where they are.

I would like to know what were the results of that poll which the hon. member's party took? Will he be willing to make the results of that poll of his party's members of Parliament public? Will my hon. friend not admit that his colleagues from Ontario were involved in an election campaign, rather an early campaign which ended disastrously—

Mr. Rompkey: That side of the House didn't do so well either.

Ms. Clancy: Call an election.

Mr. Lewis: —and failing the production of that documentation, will my hon. friend not admit that the Liberals were not serious about coming back.

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Speaker, the answer is simply this. On this side of the House, unlike that side of the House, we still have some leadership. It is the leadership that decides what we do and that leadership decided we were going to come back. When our leader speaks, we listen, unlike the other side of the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I have a comment. I have listened intently and I perhaps have a bit of a personal interest that some other people in the House do not have in this issue.

Ms. Clancy: Wait a minute. I have that interest.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Of the three naval vessels that were ordered overseas by the Prime Minister, at least half, and perhaps a few more, of those men and women who are serving come from my riding. So, as everybody gets into the sterile debate as to whether or not this or that was done at the right time, I would like the government to understand quite clearly that it is not dealing with just pawns on a chessboard here. It is dealing with men and women who have been trained to serve in the Canadian Armed Forces. But, more importantly, it is dealing with the families of those men and women who have been trained to serve in the Canadian Armed Force and who, for love of country, have decided to make this a career.

I have to tell the Speaker that I was not just annoyed, but I was highly insulted by the manner in which this government treated those families. What this government did was unconscionable. What it did was unprecedented. It ordered Canadian naval vessels to the Persian Gulf area. That perhaps in itself may be open to debate. I happen to think that Canada had a role to play.

I listened intently to the Prime Minister when he spoke earlier. He said that it acted against what was a flagrant abuse of international law. He was talking about Iraq, obviously. He said that was why the Canadian Forces were ordered in. I do not have a debate with that particular point, but let us take it a little further.

The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs and others have talked at great length about why we did what we did, but there is a double-edged sword here. The people of Canada want to talk about what they did not do, and what they did not do was keep the Canadian public informed through the proper forum and that was the floor of the House of Commons. They did not keep the men and women who were serving, the men and women who might be ordered over to serve, or their families, their loved ones, and their neighbours informed. What had to happen was that those individuals in my riding had to turn on the CNN evening news every night and watch George Bush on a golf course chatting between yells of "fore" or "Brian"—whichever one it was—to find out exactly what was going on. That is something the people in my riding and the people of the Canadian Armed Forces are not going to forget easily.

I know that you are telling me that my time is just about up, Madam Speaker, but this is an important point. I am speaking for a lot of individuals whose loved ones may be the first casualties if something happens in the Middle East and they want to see a debate in the House of Commons. They want the government called to account for why it did not inform the Canadian public through Parliament. But, more importantly, the day that those navy vessels went out, I and my colleague from Halifax sat down on the Halifax waterfront and watched those three naval vessels going out. We watched the Sea King helicopters flying past. We watched those men and women waving goodbye, many of them wondering if they were ever going to return.

There was something wrong there that day because, although we have an unprecedented engagement of Canadian naval vessels, the Prime Minister of Canada was not even there to see the men and women that he sent off to a potential theatre of war. That is something, if we do get to debate this a little later tonight, that I want to go into more detail. I want to go back very briefly to what my colleague from Labrador has said.

He talked about the need for this place to have been informed much sooner than what we have had to wait and I think that that is the debate that we should be having here tonight. We all understand the severity of the situation in the Middle East. We all understand our role within the United Nations, or at least we should. We all understand the potential for major disaster in the activities that are now taking place or have taken place in the Middle East. But we should also understand that this government was absolutely negligent in its responsibility to the Canadian public.

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Labrador who has just spoken a question with respect to the resolution of this very difficult conflict. Obviously, we join in calling for the unconditional withdrawal by Iraq from Kuwait. Under United Nations command, hopefully, through sanctions and the effective enforcement of those sanctions, we will be able to persuade Iraq to withdraw.

I would like to ask the hon. member for Labrador about the longer term and what the position of his party is with respect to one of the very serious issues that must be addressed in the longer term in this region. Indeed, even Secretary of State James Baker said before Congress last month that he recognized that this is an issue that must be addressed. I speak, of course, of the question of the tragic plight of the Palestinians and, of course, the hypocrisy of the Americans. On the one hand they are saying that we must enforce united resolutions when they agree with them, but on the other hand, they are refusing to call upon Israel to accept Resolution 242.

Therefore, does the hon. member for Labrador agree that an essential part of the longer-term resolution of this tragic conflict must be the convening of an international conference at which all of those parties who are directly affected—including the Palestinians and their representatives, the Palestine Liberation Organization—will participate and recognize the right of self-determination of the Palestinians, their right to a state and, of course, the right of Israel to exist within secure borders? Does his party support that very important position?

Madam Deputy Speaker: A short comment from the hon. member for Labrador.

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Speaker, I must say that, while the question is relevant and related to the debate, I am not sure it is an issue that we can get into in any depth. If we do, it seems to me we will be superseding this debate and proceeding with quite a different debate.

I would simply say this and this party is quite prepared to debate it at the appropriate time and in the appropriate place. The issue can better be solved with a stronger and more vibrant UN. If, out of this whole crisis, comes a strengthening of the United Nations, then obviously it would be able to deal more adequately with that question as it will with other questions that may arise.

I do not believe that this is the forum in which we should get involved in a lengthy and detailed debate on that particular question.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I must say that I have been in the House and observed from outside the debate that has taken place to this point on the motion that has been put forward. I must again say that I am pleased to be able to address that motion concerning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq.

I want to focus briefly on Canada's response and, in particular, the decision to commit elements of Canadian forces in the Persian Gulf area. It is fair to say that we all recognize that this is a serious commitment of the government on behalf of Canada. Canada has taken a stand, along with other civilized nations in the world, against this brutal act of aggression against Kuwait.

I would like to take a moment, if I could, to explain the purpose of the Order in Council which I tabled earlier this day. The government believes that it is important to respect the longstanding tradition of the parliamentary system and that the deployment abroad of armed forces be debated in the House of Commons. This tradition is rooted in the history of the place. It stretches back almost 90 years to when Canada first sent troops to the Boer War. Over the years we have debated in the House and approved the deployment of Canadian forces abroad. The last time a deployment of this significance took place was in 1950 when the Government of Canada committed Canadian troops to take part in the United Nations peace-restoring or peace-making effort in Korea.

Once again, the world is faced with a flagrant act of aggression, a violation of international law and civilized values and, once again, Canada must stand up and be counted among those civilized countries opposing this act of aggression. Taking an easy position is not Canada's way. It has not been our history to seek the easy or the peaceful area to expound our beliefs. Traditionally, Canadians, men and women who serve this country, have been involved in the difficult decisions in the hard places to show our belief in values and our belief that aggression cannot be tolerated.

As the Prime Minister said on August 10, the lessons of history are clear. Turning a blind eye to aggression only encourages further aggression. No civilized nation is excused from its broader responsibilities to the world community for international peace and order. If a clear warning is not sent to Iraq now, it will serve only to embolden it to find a new victim.

At the outset, the deployment of the elements of the Canadian forces represents a serious commitment by the government. Parliament has an important role to play. Parliament can be very helpful, the men and women assembled here and representing constituencies around Canada. Parliament, by being united, can send a strong message to the Iraqi government that we do not tolerate aggression. If we are united in the House, I suggest, as has the member from Halifax who was concerned about his constituents, we can best send a strong message of support to those men and women who are serving their country abroad.

I would suggest to all members of the House that there be support for the actions that have been taken. We ask for the approval of a strong Canadian commitment, not just words, not seeking a peaceful area, but taking a stand as we have historically and as we, as Canadians, have recognized in the past as being important.

There are basic international principles that we believe we uphold. I ask my colleagues in the House to consider the gravity of Iraq's action. I ask them to consider what would happen if the suggestion was that we should do nothing and the message that would send, that Canada would refuse to join a multinational military effort to enforce the sanctions of the United Nations. It would be fine to have those sentiments but not act. It would be fine to talk tough and not act. But it certainly would not be in the tradition of Canada and it certainly would not be in the tradition of the men and women who serve now and have served in the past.

I would suggest that there is a place for diplomatic actions and it has been actively pursued. We have heard in the House from colleagues who have identified those actions which have been taken by Canada's Ambassador to the United Nations to bring forward these resolutions from 661 to 665. Those resolutions imposed the embargo and allowed nations with maritime force in the area to enforce the embargo.

• (1830)

Over the past number of weeks, there have been changes that have taken place. As a matter of fact, before Kuwait was attacked by Iraq, the Government of Iraq assured its Arab neighbours, and in particular President Mubarak from Egypt, that it would not attack its smaller neighbour, that it was only interested in a peaceful resolution. Quickly it broke off talks and annexed the small country of Kuwait.

This was done by a country that has, I would suggest, more military might than is needed for the defence of its own borders. It was done by a country that has waged an eight-year war against its neighbour. It was done by a country that placed under the pretext of negotiations some 150,000 troops on the border between Iraq and Kuwait, some 1,200 tanks, some 1,000 armoured personnel carriers while it was carrying on a façade of negotiating with a smaller and less militarily strong nation.

What we have at this time is a presence of Canadian forces in the Persian Gulf area to take place on position approximately October 1 or October 2. Ultimately we have to recognize the actions that were taken by the government, by the men and women who serve to ready themselves for this activity.

What we have and what we have committed are military forces in the Persian Gulf region to support an international effort to deter the aggression of Iraq and to enforce the sanctions that were applied under the United Nations.

Canada has believed and will continue to believe that there must be, if possible, a peaceful resolution of dispute. I suggest to my colleagues in the House that the actions that were taken initially after Iraq invaded Kuwait stopped that aggression where it only gobbled up one small country and did not continue in gobbling up its neighbours in the Persian Gulf area.

There has to be respect for the sanctity of existing states, borders and their citizens, and that is part of the mission of the Canadian forces along with the forces from some 25 other nations in this world.

There has been a suggestion that Canada made a decision because we were following the lead of other countries. Canada made a decision because what took place offended the sensibilities of Canadians. What took place offended the reality of today, and it is not just Canada. It is the United States. It is the U.S.S.R. It is Egypt. It is Australia. It is Afghanistan that my colleagues should understand. It is Bangladesh. It is Pakistan that has made commitments to stop aggression and to enforce the sanctions of the United Nations.

This is not something that is usual in the course of the United Nations. In the past, we have wished to see the United Nations act in a more determined manner, and it has been unable to do so. At this point with the action, co-operation and leadership in several cases of Canada, the United Nations has strengthened itself and has put in place sanctions that we believe are important, that we believe if Iraq understands the world condemnation will have it returned to the borders prior to its attack, to have it allow the citizens who it is detaining returned to their countries and to stop any further aggression by Iraq. There are a couple of things that have been accomplished by Saddam Hussein. I am not too sure that they are accomplishments that we would applaud, but at this time he has concentrated his forces on the borders of Saudi Arabia, threatening not only Saudi Arabia but the gulf states, Bahrain, Qatar, United Arab Emirates. He has, as I mentioned earlier, constrained citizens of other countries from leaving. He has threatened to use citizens of other countries as a shield, a sign of a true bully and a true bully who is a coward.

The effect of the embargo and the determination of Canada and other countries which are presently there is hope for the world. There has been a suggestion that Canada and the men and women who are serving do not have a definite mission. I think it is important to redefine again the mission.

The mission is that Canada has joined with other countries of the world, some 25, to deter further aggression and to enforce the sanctions of the United Nations. To this goal we despatched the three ships, Athabaskan, Terra Nova and Protecteur, and almost 1,000 Canadian men and women. The preparation for that departure was concluded in a very brief period of time. I compliment the men and women, both in and out of uniform, who accomplished a goal that was at some point recognized as being heroic. Their work and their dedication are an important aspect of this and should not be forgotten. But we had some work to do and we had it accomplished.

We have put new systems on the vessels, the Javelin anti-air missile, the Phalanx close-in system as well as 50 and 40 calibre millimetre anti-aircraft guns. We were able to deploy on August 24 and they entered the Red Sea on September 16 and within a 24-hour period will pass through the Straits of Hormuz.

We also made another decision to send a squadron of CF-18 fighter jets from the Canadian Forces base in Baden. We are currently discussing with the countries in the area as to the location of our air force but that will be concluded in a very short period of time. That again involves the deployment of some 450 plus Canadian personnel to support this operation. But the role of our vessels which has been recognized as that of enforcing sanctions against Iraq will be through surveillance, through monitoring and, if necessary, interception of ships to verify their cargoes and their destinations.

Under Security Council resolution 665 our maritime forces are authorized to use such measures as may be necessary to halt all inward and outward shipping to ensure that the sanctions are not being violated. The CF-18s will provide long-range defence air cover in the operating area of the Canadian task group and will be part of an integrated multinational air defence network in the gulf area. Together with those defensive resources of other countries, our CF-18s will investigate unidentified or hostile aircraft and ships that could be capable of attacking the Canadian task group or other allied ships. They will also investigate any unknown radar contacts and take appropriate action to protect the men and women on Canadian ships.

On September 9 and 10 Canada took part in the naval conference in Bahrain to discuss co-operation among the various nations involved.

• (1840)

The purpose of that meeting was to allocate operational sectors within which each nation could operate within the Red Sea, the Gulf of Oman and the Persian Gulf.

For a number of reasons, military reasons—I refer this to my friend from the NDP—these were decisions made by military leadership for the safety and security of Canadian men and women. The place they could do their best work was in the Persian Gulf area. They could do that work in co-operation with other countries and they would end up having the benefit, not only of Canadian support, but the support of other allied countries in an over-all umbrella and an over-all activity within a region.

The hon. member from the New Democratic Party asked: "Who is in command"? The forces that are deployed are under Canadian command and control at all times and they will remain under Canadian command and control at all times.

I do not know whether the hon. member understands the significance of that. Canadians have long ago given up the right to another country or another jurisdiction to command and control our men and women who are deployed on behalf of the people of Canada in any conflict around the world.

Madam Speaker, the questions as to the risk are serious. There is risk in any activity involving forces. Indeed, today there is more risk involved in this activity probably than there has been at any time since the Korean war. That risk was weighed. It was not weighed by politicians. It was weighed by military leadership. That risk was assessed as being acceptable.

I want to give colleagues some idea as to how that decision was arrived at. Yes, Iraq has a very impressive standing army of some 5,000 main battle tanks, but these land forces do not pose a significant risk to Canadian air and naval operations in the region. The Iraqi air force has approximately 500 combat aircraft. The navy, on the other hand, consists of a small number of frigates and coastal patrol craft. Both the Iraqi navy and air force are equipped with anti-ship missiles.

I want to take a minute to talk about the defensive capabilities. In addition to the active defence systems that were put on the task group before it left Halifax, our ships have new passive defensive including mine detector sonars, chaff dispersers and air search radars. The Terra Nova has been fitted with harpoon surface-to-surface missiles. These systems will enable our vessels to defend themselves against a potential missile threat and thus fulfil their role in the Persian Gulf.

With the Phalanx anti-aircraft guns and missiles as well as the passive defence systems we should be able to effectively operate against any threat posed by the Iraqi anti-ship missiles.

The squadron of CF-18s which has been deployed will also help in the defence of our vessels. The pilots and ground personnel which will be drawn mostly from Europe are trained and experienced. They are experienced in multinational air defence operations. Indeed, some have already trained with the task group as it proceeded into the gulf area.

I believe one of the most difficult things to defend against and one of the weapons that Canadians have difficulty in understanding is that of chemical warfare.

I am not too sure what the comment was from the New Democratic Party. I am sure they will have a chance to speak later.

I want to assure Canadians and I want to bring to the attention of the families of the men and women who are serving that even though the Iraqis have been ruthless in the use of chemical weaponry—They have used it against their own people, the Kurdish minority in their country. They it used in Iran—we have assessed the chemical threat. We have taken steps to ensure that we will be able to meet that threat.

Those steps are involved with the external sprinkling system. They are the opportunity to rinse off the contamination, the opportunity to seal off our vessels and pressurize compartments, and all crew members have been provided with individual protection suits and gas masks. In the CF-18 in the aircraft area there is also the protection that is necessary against possible chemical attack.

I know you are giving me the time signal, Madam Speaker, but I believe it is important to take a minute in closing to talk about the over-all defensive capability of our task force. It will be enhanced by other task groups in the area, and it will be enhanced by the co-operation of those groups. Some naval forces possess longer range detection and defensive systems against aircraft and missiles than Canadian vessels do.

All these factors, I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, have made the risk acceptable. That does not mean that it should be taken lightly. That does not mean that we should discount it, but I believe with the co-operation of both naval and air and in co-operation with allied forces in the region in this multinational effort we will be able to ensure that those men and women have the best protection that Canada can provide, the best opportunity to bring about a successful conclusion of their mission which, again I reiterate, is to enforce the sanctions levied by the United Nations and to deter any further aggression.

Canada has been a long-standing member of the United Nations, and we would not be expected at this time to relegate ourselves to a minor role in an important task that has been designed and debated.

I say in closing that under Canadian command and control the provision of our co-operative efforts in a multinational effort we are contributing to the long-standing aims and goals of the Canadian foreign policy. We are supporting actively the United Nations. We believe that it is in the true historic tradition of Canada that we do take tough decisions, that our men and women serve well, and that we do not and will not tolerate aggression.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I know that all members of the House view this as a very important debate. As a result I have been back and forth across the floor several times today in an attempt to negotiate a way by which we could as a House agree to extend hours and allow a fuller participation by all members on all sides of the House.

I would just like to ask once more publicly if there might not be unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That this House sit beyond seven o'clock p.m. to continue its consideration of the business now before it provided that when no members rise to speak the debate be deemed adjourned and the Speaker adjourn the House until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m., and;
>
> Provided also that neither dilatory motions nor quorum calls be accepted by the Chair.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion presented by the parliamentary secretary. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Motion negatived.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I think it is no mystery to my colleagues that I know that part of the world pretty well, if I may say so. I do not wish to underestimate this knowledge nor to overestimate it. It is quite complex. I will certainly take part in the debate to come.

• (1850)

I can think of a few points I would like my hon. colleagues to ponder over.

As one who, in his long career, has had the honour to travel in most of those countries and to put out a number of fires, I can tell you that I have always been careful for some reason. I did not make any concessions, that would have been out of character for me. I have yet to visit Lybia and Saudi Arabia. Those are about the only countries left for me to visit in that area.

I spoke before the Parliament of Kuwait in the days when it existed, that is before it was dissolved by the Emir. It is rather unusual for a North-American parlementarian to speak there.

I have learned one thing though. One may know when and how he entered the Middle-East, but let me remind you that, according to another proverb, one never knows when or how he will get out of the Middle-East. Please think about it before we get into the debate.

Since the beginning of the debate, especially as regards our neighbours and friends to the South, I have found outrageous all the new and dreadfull names used, the sudden equation Hussein-Hitler. I have no intent to defend Mr. Saddam Hussein. I have met him, but I will not stand up for him. I am surprised however by such sudden discovery of who he is and by how suddenly people came to realize that he is armed with the most destructive weapons in the world. His nuclear capacity is not as strong as that of Israel, I agree, but chemical and bacteriological weapons do cause disasters. Let us keep in mind, when the time comes to debate that question, that many young people risk being killed by the very weapons that there own countries, be it France or another country, have sold to Irak.

What I want to ask the minister has to do with the new war logic. French President Mitterand keeps saying that we are on the verge of endorsing war logic principles. My esteemed colleague and friend from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Axworthy), my Party's new critic on Canadian foreign affairs, is a brilliant man fully conversant with such issues. He knows that when people talk about a war logic—I direct my remarks to the Minister of National Defence—they seem to forget that there should also be a peace logic. Obviously the minister stated that we will do our share. The Prime Minister made a few comments, superlative as usual. I suggest that Canada's contribution should be made at the diplomatic level.

My question to the minister is precise: other than this war logic which, we are told, seems to fascinate all nations of the world, is there a peace logic to which Canada would more readily subscribe? I think I will make a suggestion, the first. Referring to countries like Canada, Algeria, Senegal, India, I ask the Minister of National Defence whether his department and the Department of External Affairs now have a committee considering the best contribution Canada might make to this debate?

[English]

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, my colleague puts forward an important question and I understand the dilemma in which he finds himself, as others in the House may find themselves.

He asked a specific question: Is there a group or are we in the Department of National Defence and in the Department of External Affairs looking at other things that Canada can do to bring about a peaceful resolution?

Yes, Mr. Speaker. At the outset, Canada, through its ambassador and its seat on the Security Council, has been focusing on the involvement of the United Nations in this action, not one country but the United Nations, and we are continuing to work in that manner. Both our departments, if I could say to my colleague, would welcome and are working toward and imploring the United Nations to put a blue flag over the whole of the multinational effort. That is what Canada would like to see, but we cannot wait for the United Nations to make that decision because, as we know, in the past the United Nations at times has not been able to arrive at a decision. If he is asking about the efforts, both government departments, in fact the whole of government, would welcome that initiative and are working toward it in the United Nations. Hopefully we will be successful.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, first of all the House should know that we fully support our troops and the men and women who are there. What we have some difficulty with is the clarity of the government's policy in this area. I would just like to ask the minister for some very specific and clear commitments to this House.

He has said that the troops are under Canadian command, and he said that very emphatically. I would like to know what directions the government has given to the commanding officers in the Persian Gulf in respect of the outer limits of their mandate.

A retired rear-admiral in the United States has given quite an excerpt on the view of the American government, that it is moving into an offensive build up in the Middle East. Many other military analysts have said the Americans are preparing for an offensive assault on Iraq that at this stage has no UN sanction whatever. The chief of staff of the United States Air Force was fired because he made it very clear publicly that the Americans were building up an offensive capacity in the gulf.

UN resolution 665 which the government has relief on in support of its direction of our troops into that area very specifically calls on members states to deal with the necessary military involvement to "halt all inward and outward maritime shipping in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and to ensure strict compliance with the provisions related to such shipping laid down in UN resolution 661".

My question is very specific. Will the minister assure this House and the country that the government has given clear direction to the commanding officers of the Canadian contingent in the gulf that they are not to participate in any offensive action in the gulf and that their mandate for military involvement is not to exceed the terms of reference of resolution 661?

Mr. McKnight: If I can be brief, Mr. Speaker, we have not given definitive direction, as the member asks, that their terms of reference will not exceed 661.

Mr. Brewin: 665.

Mr. McKnight: Then 665. That is different.

There is another thing that we have continually said, that we are also there to deter further aggression. That is part of the mission that has been given to the Canadians who are serving. They are given the ability, and their rules of engagement will not deter from their ability to defend themselves. The assurance that I can give the hon. member is that they do not have their ability for self-defence deterred by the rules of engagement that they have been given.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1900)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this first day back in session because I was extremely dissatisfied with an answer given to me by this government during Question Period.

In her answer to me the minister responsible for the status of women said that violence against women was her top priority. Yet she and her government have put a spending limit on the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal-provincial funding mechanism for shelters for battered women.

Three provinces were singled out for this spending limit. My own province of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. The Minister for National Health and Welfare replied to my question about CAP by saying that only the rich provinces are affected by this spending limit.

Well I said, Mr. Speaker, that the women in British Columbia who are battered are just as battered and bruised as any abused women in this country. Their pain is real. It makes no difference to them when they are being battered that they live in a so-called have province.

Currently the government says it is spending a fortune, a lot of dollars on battered women, and the figures that it releases does sound like a lot of money until you realize that this figure is spread out over four years and that much of it is spent on research and not on shelter spaces.

The figure amounts to $10 per year per battered woman. One of every two women who seeks shelter at a refuge for battered women is turned away because there is no space for her. These women often have small children and the shelter is their last resort. There is nowhere for them to turn except to the streets or to go back to the abuser.

A woman and her children usually arrive at a shelter when all of their options have been exhausted. She has already tried her family and her friends. She does not have the money for a hotel or an apartment. And this government claps itself on the back and says what a wonderful job it is doing for battered women.

The legislation that puts a spending limit on CAP passed the House of Commons and is now in the Senate. The Prime Minister is currently attempting to stuff the Senate with Tory appointees so that the CAP legislation and other legislation will go through quickly.

What we are seeing in this country is a level of patronage appointments that is unprecedented. Canadians are sickened by this display by the Tory Prime Minister. We have had a summer of discontent in Canada, a difficult summer for all Canadians, and our Prime Minister refused to recall Parliament to deal with these issues.

Now the Prime Minister wants to shut down Parliament, shut down this session as soon as possible. In this way he and his government can avoid their responsibility to Parliament and their responsibility to Canadians, the responsibility with the crisis at Oka, the responsibility with the Persian Gulf crisis on which we have heard debate today, the responsibility over GST and all of the Tory unpopular policies.

My constituents in New Westminster and Burnaby elected me to represent them on important issues facing them and affecting British Columbians and other Canadians. The Prime Minister is thwarting democracy by attempting to stifle the voices of members of Parliament and not listening to the Canadian public. This whole affair not only shows that the Prime Minister and his government have no commitment to the poor, to the children, and to battered women in this country, but also no real commitment to Senate reform.

New Democrats have been offered Senate seats in the past and they have always turned them down. They have turned them down because New Democrats do not believe in a non-accountable body and people living on the public purse without accountability to the people.

Under a New Democratic Party government you would not see British Columbians singled out for punishment in this matter. You would not see social assistance, child care, shelters for battered women choked off by capping the Canada Assistance Plan.

A recent National Council of Welfare report showed that 60 per cent of the poor in Canada are women. In British Columbia the federal and the provincial governments are collaborating to ensure that they and their children do not have enough to eat.

• (1905)

One in five Canadian children is poor. New Democrats have outlined ways to ease this poverty with a view to eliminating it in the long term.

There are two foods banks in my constituency. Poverty is a national disgrace. It affects seniors, single parent families, children, the disabled and the working poor.

Children are the largest users of food banks in this country. In a country as rich as ours, it should be a crime to choke off social assistance and child care programs as well as programs to aid women who are victims of violence.

We need programs that will help people to get back on their feet again, not inadequate programs that dole out money once in a while. Literacy, job training and counselling are all necessary to help people become self-sufficient.

Shelters for battered women funded through CAP are not simply a roof over the heads of victims of violence, although that is extremely important. They help the woman to find a job, housing, schools or child care for their children. They provide the counselling that tells the woman what she most needs to hear, that she is a valuable human being and that she does not deserve abuse. She needs to hear that help is available and that others in our society do care.

The shelters refer women to doctors or lawyers who they may need. They offer support groups and a new start on life. These are the programs that this government wants curtailed. Other programs funded by CAP do not even have the chance to develop the way the shelter program has.

The goal of all social assistance should be to help people to become self-sufficient again, to break the cycle of poverty and not to reinforce it.

I call on this government to stop this legislation and to put a ceiling on the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, strange though it may seem, I would like to thank the hon. member for Westminster—Burnaby for giving me a chance to respond to her question about what the government is doing about its priority on fighting family violence.

The hon. member knows perfectly well that since May 14, 1990, when she asked this question, there have been a number of unprecedented events in this country, including, Mr. Speaker—and unfortunately she is right—the events in Oka, in my riding, and in Châteauguay, as a result of which there was no mention of the women and children murdered over a period of five weeks. Mr. Speaker, family violence is taking on alarming proportions.

She said that the Budget proposals would cap increases in payments to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia at 5 per cent.

She also referred to unpopular measures our government must take. I think she may be right. We are taking unpopular measures in order to curb the deficit, so that we can keep essential programs like those that deal with family violence.

She ought to know that more than one billion in real dollars, and I repeat "real", will be paid under the Canada Assistance Plan during the current fiscal year, and this is only for provincial programs designed for victims of violence.

There is one very important program, Project Haven, under which $22 billion has been earmarked over a period of four years, across the country, to create new spaces for women and children who are victims of family violence. In my own riding, la Maison Citadelle in Lachute has been involved in this program, and we have been able to allocate about $200,000 for the construction of new beds.

Mr. Speaker, I wish the program did not exist, because that would mean there are no women or children who are victims of family violence. Unfortunately, the reality in this country is quite different.

I can inform the House that the Department's program for shelters has been very successful. Of course it is not enough. We would need $44 million. However, I would urge the hon. member and all members of this House to speak out against violence and try to help both men who are violent and women who are victims of family violence.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, last March I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a question about the latest annual report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. The Human Rights Commission in 1988 referred to the situation of aboriginal people in this country as a national tragedy. Last year the commission said it had no reason to alter that judgment.

I asked the minister last March what immediate action the government was prepared to take to turn this tragedy around. The minister gave the standard government response. He referred to how much money the government was spending and to certain areas of current government activities. At the same time he acknowledged that further improvement in the conditions of aboriginal people is required.

What has the government done since then to further improve the conditions of aboriginal people? We have seen no improvement whatsoever. In fact, the government has managed to make matters even worse, as the events of this summer and the Oka crisis have shown.

The Human Rights Commission's 1989 annual report called for a new deal for the aboriginal people of this country, based on the commitment by non-aboriginal Canadians to meaningful political and cultural autonomy and much greater economic self-sufficiency. To date the government has not shown any evidence of such a commitment, despite the growing body of advice it has received on the direction it should be taking.

In 1983 the report of the Special Committee on Indian Self-Government provided a clear direction to the government with respect to aboriginal self-government. In 1985 the Task Force on Comprehensive Claims Policy outlined several new directions for the government in the interest of reaching fair and equitable land claim settlements. The major recommendations of these reports have been ignored.

Aboriginal leaders have tried over the years to focus the attention of the government on aboriginal issues. Time and time again the government has been warned that the current conditions are intolerable and cannot be allowed to continue and that the patience of the aboriginal people is running out. Time and time again the government has not listened. The government has refused to make the abysmal social and economic conditions of aboriginal people a priority on the national agenda. Unacceptable conditions in a western industrialized country as rich as Canada are allowed to persist.

With the World Summit for Children coming up this weekend, it is appropriate to remind the House of how badly the government has failed Canada's aboriginal children. Aboriginal people are the poorest of the poor in this country. Poor health and early deaths are among the consequences of aboriginal poverty.

Last year the Canadian Institute of Child Health published a report on Canada's children. That report described once again the continuing inequalities between aboriginal and non-aboriginal people. A newborn child in the Canadian population as a whole is expected to live 76 years. A newborn aboriginal child has a life expectancy of 68 years. Infant morality rates among aboriginal people are double the national average. Suicide rates among aboriginal people are many times higher than the national Canadian average.

According to the report of the Child Health Institute, when it comes to the health of aboriginal children we have Third World problems within our society.

The Prime Minister will be co-chairing the World Summit for Children and I suggest that this government and this country cannot be part of the existing and continuing disparities between aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians. In addition to any concerted action on aboriginal social and economic issues, the government has steadfastly refused to deal with the fundamental political issues which are at the root of this country's relationship with its aboriginal peoples.

• (1915)

Justice for aboriginal people in the country has been delayed and denied over and over again. Lands claimed by aboriginal people continue to be eliminated even when negotiations are proceeding. Logging and forms of resource development are allowed to continue on lands which aboriginal people have not given up. Throughout the country aboriginal people continue to be harassed in the exercise of their aboriginal hunting and trapping rights in violation of their rights, court decisions, and the Constitution of Canada.

Under this government, post-secondary education was capped and many aboriginal students were denied the opportunity to pursue higher education. Aboriginal constitutional negotiations were terminated by this government. With this history of neglect, the government should not be surprised that the aboriginal people and many other Canadians believe the government has failed them.

In conclusion, the government will continue to fail aboriginal people as long as it insists on its present course. Fundamental change is needed now. Aboriginal people need justice and political action from this government, not platitudes.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. colleague that there is a long way to go in Canada in the treatment of our Indian and native peoples, but in fact the government is committed to making changes. I think we should put the question into perspective and talk a little bit about some of the advances that have been made over the last 18 years or so.

We are committed to progress in all the areas that the hon. member has mentioned. Some of that progress has been made, and more will be made, through co-operation with the Indian people and the Inuit people themselves. In fact, Mr. Yalden pointed out in his own report that significant improvements have been made over the past several years.

Our government is absolutely committed to strengthening the capacity of Indian peoples to provide their own government and to design systems that will be flexible to serve the needs of the communities that we are dealing with—programs that are really designed to meet the individual needs of the Indian and Inuit people who are involved, rather than quite as bureaucratic as has been perhaps in the past.

Steady progress has been achieved in transferring control of program expenditures to Indians over the past 18 years as I have mentioned. For example, in 1971, Indians managed only 20 per cent of the budgets that were set aside for their use. In 1990–1991, Indians will manage over 72 per cent of these budgets and that counts for over $1 billion in their hands for the delivery of services to Indian and Inuit peoples across the country.

Substantial progress is also being made in other areas. For example, in education, only 53 band-operated schools existed in 1975, but some five times more than that number, 280, existed last year in 1989. Enrolment in post-secondary education in 1989 had increased over 35 per cent from 1985. Contrary to interpretations that were put upon this in the report, post-secondary education budgets were actually increased very significantly to $149 million.

In the area of child welfare, there is no question that there is a need for improvement and that has been recognized. Therefore, in co-operation with Indian leadership, the federal government has entered into arrangements whereby Indian-operated child welfare agencies provide child and family services for many Indian communities. These are agencies operated by the people themselves.

Economic self-sufficiency for aboriginal people is also a priority. It is a priority for the government. This is evidenced by the establishment of the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy, or CAEDS as it is more commonly known. This strategy is a very positive initiative aimed at helping Indian and Inuit people to build their own economic structure.

In collaboration with Indian people, changes to the Indian Act are being considered. Through the lands, revenues and trust review, there is collaboration that will bring about changes that will recognize Indian authority over their own lands and money and the governance of these.

• (1920)

Another priority is the development of community-based self-government. The objectives of this initiative are to enhance community control and decision making and to recognize all those diverse needs and traditions that are there. Currently eight projects involving 30 bands are in negotiations. Fifteen projects involving 29 bands are working more closely toward framework agreements and over 100 bands are at the initial state of defining what community development and government means to them.

I know there is a long way to go on the issues that the hon. member mentioned, but the government is committed to achieving those goals and with co-operation and collaboration we will do so.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, education, in all its aspects is, and should be, a right of all Canadians. Post-secondary education is increasingly a necessity in today's fast-paced and ever-changing world. Because of this, it is essential to the welfare of Canadians and Canada to ensure that Canadians from all backgrounds are given the opportunity to attend a post-secondary education institution if they have the ability to do so and if they wish to do so. This, unfortunately, is not the case.

As Canada is a mosaic of different people from different backgrounds and cultures, so must be our education system. More must be done to include those with lower incomes, women, native peoples, visible minorities, and Francophones outside of Quebec. Not only are these groups presently under-represented in our post-secondary education institutions, but they are also hurt the most when government funding is cut and tuition fees increase.

Although advances have been made in the past 25 years, the great majority of potential students in Canada still do not attend a post-secondary education institution. Research shows that a disproportionate number of university students have an upper or upper-middle class socioeconomic background. Much potential talent remains under-developed in other socioeconomic groups. Higher fees, along with rising living expenses and cuts in aid programs, all lead to higher debt loads which further hinder accessibility if the student does, in fact, decide to attend a post-secondary education institution.

Education involves personal and intellectual development. It gives students a base of skills, as well as cultivating the ability to adapt, innovate and make responsible judgments. In doing so, not only does the student benefit, but society does as well. Individuals return benefits to society by becoming active, working participants in their community. The growing assumption is that for a person to contribute in society, one must have some form of post-secondary education. Without it, Canadians fear they will be left behind.

Although the investment made by the federal government must be considerable, so will be its future return. By making post-secondary education more accessible, more students are given the opportunity to contribute to society upon receiving their qualifications. A post-secondary degree opens the door to better, higher-paying jobs and opportunities. In the long run, support in keeping post-secondary education accessible through lower fees and increased funding, contributes greatly to the economy.

With federal support, education can be an equal base for all students, allowing them to advance according to personal achievement. With decreasing federal support and with fee increases, fewer students will be able to attend a post-secondary education institution. We cannot allow policies that will create a student body composed almost exclusively of those who calculate education simply as an investment in their own future or who can be comfortable with astronomical debts, equivalent to years of employment earnings.

In the past, higher levels of schooling were seen as a factor in economic growth and democracization of the system was seen as a necessary condition for greater social and political equality. Both the federal and provincial governments called education a top priority. The general public rallied to that idea and we saw an increased demand for higher education and an increased demand for extensive financial support from governments. Even today, 88 per cent of Canadians do not want the cuts to post-secondary education that the government has proposed in Bill C-69.

The objectives became to expand and diversify institutions and to encourage individuals to pursue higher education while providing financial assistance to those most in need. To meet the goals, a number of policies were implemented. The number of available places in universities were increased. New universities were founded and the non-university, post-secondary education sector became an important alternative to university studies and a complete network of community colleges and CEGEPs were established.

In the seventies, both levels of government also established student aid programs and post-secondary institutions did their part. More flexible admission policies were implemented, short-term and night courses were developed, and satellite campuses and distance education facilities were set up.

As the seventies gave way to the eighties, funding for post-secondary education gave way to financial retrenchment and constraint. A profile of post-secondary students completed in 1987 revealed that their earlier gains were wiped away and areas that needed improvement never received it.

• (1925)

We had an over-representation of richer Canadians, and an under-representation of those groups who had previously been under-represented: native peoples, women, visible minorities and so on. It also found that students from more modest backgrounds chose a community college education as opposed to university education more often than those in the higher income level.

More people look to education as an alternative as labour markets became more difficult. Many attended post-secondary education institutions for the first time.

Student fees began to be pushed upwards. In the eighties, the percentage of university budgets derived from student fees edged up from 10.6 per cent to 14.5 per cent. Including other costs, students are now responsible for carrying over 25 per cent of university costs. Some call for the deregulation of fees and the privatization of the post-secondary education system. But to do so would ignore the federal responsibility to our children and their future, as well as the future of Canada.

The federal government has an obligation to provide for the national interest and the common good of Canada. This is too great a responsibility to be left solely to the provinces because the long and short-term consequences affect the nation as a whole.

The standard of education throughout Canada must be guaranteed, and it is a shame that this government is perfectly content to cut money to the have not provinces as well as to the have provinces. This decision is leading to a two-tier if not more tiered system, a system which will enable the wealthy to have a better system of education than the less wealthy.

This government is not dealing with the education crisis. It is covering up the problem, presumably hoping it will go away. It is doing this without treating the in-depth problem and is disregarding the damage done to Canada's national and cultural consciousness as well as the economic stability of future generations of Canadians.

The government can and must do more. Canadians need and deserve better support for their post-secondary education system. Without it, the future of Canada is at stake. It is time that the government realized that words alone do not solve the problem. Action must speak louder than words.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing makes a number of points that I cannot help but agree with, because he is talking about the people who are the future of Canada.

Of course we all realize that not only those who are attending post-secondary schools in 1990, 1991 or 1992 but for the decades to come will continue to represent the true future of our country.

If we are really going to be looking after their future and the future of this country properly, we have to recognize that the biggest problem we are facing in Canada is the annual deficit.

I am proud to say that this government has addressed expenditures. It has tried to maintain restraint programs more than any other government in Canada in history.

When we first came to office, the federal government was spending $16 billion more on programs than it was collecting in revenues. Today our program spending is $9 billion less than revenues. This is a $25 billion a year turnaround in the stretch of a five-year restraint program.

Seventy per cent of this progress has resulted from expenditure restraint. To achieve that progress, we have reduced program spending as a share of the economy to the lowest level in almost 20 years.

Significant progress has been made in reducing the deficit problem that this government inherited. However, more needs to be done because of the huge deficits built up before 1984.

Federal transfers to the provinces are simply too large for us to ignore. Our transfers to the provinces have been increasing over the last five years at 6.5 per cent annually. Our expenditures have been increasing at only 3.6 per cent. Cash transfers alone to the provinces represent 24 per cent of all of our program spending.

Therefore, in this budget the proposal is to hold the per capita transfers for the next two fiscal years. These transfers have not been cut, they have been capped. It is part of a responsible government's job to ensure that there is a strong, healthy future for young Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour for me this morning to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of a number of residents of Kamloops, British Columbia.

The petitioners point out their ongoing concern with the government's intention to impose the goods and services tax on the people of Canada, and are calling upon the Liberals in the Senate, not only to plan to vote against it but, if necessary, to filibuster this legislation to ensure that this horrid tax never becomes a reality in Canada.

BILL C-21

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise in accordance with Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of 65 of my constituents in the riding of Port de Grave, Harbour Grace, and Trinity—Bay de Verde.

These people are terribly concerned about Bill C-21. They are concerned that the unemployment insurance program which the government plans to get out of when this particular bill is passed will hurt them because of the high rate of unemployment and the scarcity of jobs. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject these cuts in the unemployment insurance system and to come up with a more meaningful program.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to place before the House a petition signed by my constituents in Broadview—Greenwood in Toronto as well as other areas.

The government promised comprehensive tax reform. These constituents humbly ask that the GST be scrapped, and that the government go back to the drawing board and review the single tax which more than meets the Mulroney–Wilson challenge as a constructive alternative.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I rise today with petitions from members of my constituency of Mission—Coquitlam, as well as from people in Langley and the lower mainland who oppose the goods and services tax that this government is planning, or has introduced and passed and is planning to impose on Canadians. The government is planning to impose it on Canadians and they are opposing it on the basis that it is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for a taxpayer's ability to pay.

• (1110)

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a couple of petitions. The first is a petition from a number of residents of my riding of Moose Jaw—Lake Centre who are opposed to the GST. They call on this government to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and to ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on sales tax measures to replace the manufacturers' sales tax. The petitioners say this is not an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax through the GST.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I also have a petition presented by a number of farmers from the province of Saskatchewan. It calls upon this government to amend immediately the Canadian Wheat Board Act to place oats under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. This would give oats and barley the same protection that wheat presently enjoys under the that act.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my honour and pleasure to stand in the House and present two petitions on behalf of the constituents in my riding of Kent. The imposition of the GST will create an onerous burden on small business.

On behalf of Canadians I strongly oppose this new goods and services tax which is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SITUATION AT OKA AND CHÂTEAUGUAY

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved:

That this House commends the exemplary conduct of the men and women of the Canadian Forces at Oka and Châteauguay;

That, in the opinion of this House, the laws of Canada must apply on all Canadian territory, including Kahnawake, and that all persons currently at the Kanesatake Treatment Centre should lay down their arms and submit to the processes of Canada's judicial system, thereby encouraging the creation of a constructive climate for discussions between governments and the Mohawk people on land claims and other issues; and

That upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

He said: Madam Speaker, I rise to debate this motion regarding a most serious matter of particular concern to Canada's native people, but indeed to all Canadians, a motion dealing with an issue which strikes at the roots of what we believe we are as a country. It is a belief in justice and in an earnest endeavour to seek and find an honourable resolution of longstanding native grievances.

It is a belief shared by Indian leaders across Canada. For example, Phil Fontaine, leader of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs said on August 26 of this year: "To improve our lives, the lives of our people, we, in turn, improve this country."

On September 13, one of the chiefs of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations with whom we have worked so closely on treaty issues in Saskatchewan said: "If ever there was a light at the end of the tunnel where we all have a keen desire for wanting to succeed, the time is now."

These statements come from Indian leaders with whom I have met on many occasions over the past several months. They wish, as do I and the government, to make that light brighter so that under their guidance we can begin in a substantive and committed way to make necessary changes in policy and process and long overdue improvements and resolution of native issues.

We must all be more sensitive and more conversant with the perspective of aboriginal leaders who want actions so that their children and successive generations can live in dignity, with honour and respect. That is what we wish for all Canadians. I sincerely believe that I can play a constructive role in the process to bring this about. The time to begin is indeed now.

We are all aware of the good that can come from working co–operatively through consensus in a spirit of openness and honesty. We are all aware that this project of historic significance has been made increasingly difficult by the events of the last several weeks but also has now made these matters a major imperative for Canada.

The events at Kanesatake and Kahnawake pose a threat to achieving our reasonable goals and objectives. This debate is not about the existence of legitimate longstanding aspirations of native people in this country. This debate is not about the vast majority of native people who are law abiding in pursuing their aspirations in a peaceful way. What this debate is about is the fundamental respect which all Canadians must hold for the rule of law, the threat posed to society by those who reject it, and the efforts of those that seek to uphold it.

The motion states:

That this House commends the exemplary conduct of the men and women of the Canadian forces at Oka and Châteauguay; and

That, in the opinion of this House, the laws of Canada must apply on all Canadian territory, including Kahnawake, and that all persons currently at the Kanesatake Treatment Centre should lay down their arms and submit to the processes of Canada's judicial system, thereby encouraging the creation of a constructive climate for discussions between governments and the Mohawk people on land claims and other issues; and

That upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

There are several issues relating to this motion that I want to present and review in the House today.

I want to begin with the role and conduct of the Canadian forces, a role which is now coming to an end. I want also to review the land issue at Oka and our efforts to resolve it. I wish to discuss the rule of law and its fair application throughout Canada. There can be no sovereign enclaves within Canada where the laws of Canada do not apply. I want to discuss the laying down of arms by the warriors as the only means to resolve this situation at Oka peacefully and honourably. This will enable our system of justice, the fairest in the world, to take its course and to ensure that the innocent are not in any way penalized and those guilty of crimes meet the proper remedies under the law.

• (1120)

I want to state that once this occurs, we will immediately begin full discussion on the land issues and aspirations of the Mohawk people at Kanesatake.

In concluding my remarks, I will touch on the broader issues facing Canada's native people and the government's commitment to working towards a solution of their grievances. There will be much fuller debates on these downstream questions in the days and months ahead.

Returning to the motion for today, given the situation at Oka and Chateauguay and the level of tension that has existed over many weeks, the first clause of this motion intends to recognize and commend the exemplary actions of the Canadian forces since they were requisitioned by the Government of Quebec. The nature of this requisition has to be well understood by all Canadians.

The Chief of Defence Staff responded to a requisition from the Attorney General of Quebec on August 8. As required by the assistance to civil authorities provision under Part XI of that National Defence Act, General John de Chastelain implemented a plan which sought to remove the barricades and resolve a continuing disturbance peacefully. That was the undertaking of General John de Chastelain on August 8, and he has led that action without bloodshed.

The forces personnel assigned the responsibility of following the order have carried out that order in a planned, logical, and prudent manner. Throughout their mission, they have attempted to bring about a peaceful resolution to this situation.

In the case of Chateauguay, or Kahnawake as it is known to the Mohawk people, the removal of the blockades leading to the Mercier Bridge had to be an immediate priority. The tension in the community on both sides arising from the blockage of a main commuter artery into the city of Montreal required the Armed Forces to undertake a peacefully negotiated joint removal of the barricades. I think all Canadians were proud on that day to see the soldiers assisted by unmasked Mohawk people taking down those barricades.

All the Canadians saw the skill of military officers in achieving the important first step in restoring the rule of law to Chateauguay. This includes supporting the Sûreté du Québec in the investigation into the possession of illegal weapons and their which has been graphically demonstrated and counted by all Canadians by way of television.

At Oka, we witnessed the implementation of a detailed military plan which secured, over one weekend, the peaceful dismantling of the barricades blocking several roadways in the Oka vicinity. If it were not for the intransigence of a small group who have thus far refused to accept the rule of law, the mission of the Canadian forces would have been completed several weeks ago.

As the lines between the two groups narrowed, we saw soldiers come face to face with masked, heavily armed warriors. On behalf of all members and all Canadians, I want to commend in this House those brave young people of the Canadian forces who stood firm and resolute, at the risk of death, and in the face of verbal abuse and violent threats.

[Translation]

Their courage, dedication, and commitment to act with minimum force to fulfil their mission was an example of the effectiveness of their training and the quality of their commanding officers.

As the motion states "This House commends the exemplary conduct of the men and women of the Canadian Forces at Oka and Châteauguay" in these trying circumstances.

Madam Speaker, all members should commend these men and women who have acted with honour and distinction throughout this tense standoff.

[English]

The removal of barricades is not sufficient. What is needed now is a return to normalcy and peace and to a process for the resolution of differences around a table of goodwill and understanding. A table where these matters can be negotiated.

However, the role of the Canadian forces is coming to an end. More and more the situation remaining at the treatment centre will become a provincial policing operation. Support will still be provided as investigations are undertaken and until normalcy is restored to the community of Oka, so that the residents—the children who must return to school, the neighbours, native and non-native alike—who must live together and the wounds that must be healed may be done so with the security of knowing that there no longer is a militant group of armed warriors in their community. The role, therefore, of the Canadian forces has been to restore the rule of law.

The situation at Oka started out as a dispute over land owned by the municipality and claimed by the Mohawks at Kanesatake. Suddenly, however, it became a dispute over sovereignty, self-government and immunity from the laws by which all Canadians must live together. The vehicle to address these issues is earnest and reasoned dialogue and not military assault weapons and masked warriors.

The rule in law must be applied equally and fairly to all Canadians and all people within the borders of Canada who may choose to visit here. This is the oath I swore when I took my place in the House—to uphold the rule of law. This is the obligation of all of us in the Chamber today share—to uphold the laws of Canada.

The issues of land and self-government have been and will continue to be examined and addressed carefully by the government in the fora appropriate for such matters. I firmly and strongly believe that no one in the country, except a peace officer, should take up a gun or threaten violence in order to get their way. In fact, no one should take up a gun or threaten violence to get their way. I know all Canadians believe this and I assume all hon. members also agree that an exchange of words is infinitely preferred to an exchange of bullets.

We have witnessed many tragedies this summer, not the least of which was the tragic death of Corporal Marcel Lemay. I know all members of the House will join me in expressing our sorrow and heartfelt sympathies to his widow and family.

We must also feel great sympathy for all people, Mohawk and non-Mohawk people, alike who will bear the wounds and ultimately the scars of these tragic events.

We have seen incidents of racism and intolerance which in this country, my country, our country, are deplorable and unacceptable. We have seen the stoning of men and women; people being pushed and shoved by those who cannot control their hatred—hatred driven by an element in their community hiding behind masks and armed with illegal weapons, hatred that none of us can be proud of. All of us should be ashamed of the conduct of natives and non-natives alike who may have engaged in these acts of hostility toward one another. It has saddened me greatly, Madam Speaker, as it saddens all Canadians.

Throughout the summer Canadians have wondered just how did a tragic circumstance come to be. I want to point out that the Government of Canada through my department had been working diligently on the land question at Oka for some time. Despite court rulings and decisions of previous governments and a decision of confirmation again in 1987 that a specific claim by the Mohawk people at Oka could not be received for negotiation, our government attempted to help the people at Kanesatake to achieve a land base and develop a recognized community.

• (1130)

It was the present Minister of National Defence who initiated a process which led to negotiations and it was the present Solicitor General who appointed a mediator in August 1989 in an attempt to resolve and rectify the land dispute between the municipality of Oka and the Mohawks of Kanesatake. That process commenced over a year ago and the parties endorsed a framework agreement in September 1989 which would have ensured that the land would be preserved for the use and benefit of the Mohawk people at Kanesatake.

This agreement was to have been ratified by the community by March 1990, but the community was not asked or allowed to vote on the agreement. Instead, the Mohawks chose a new chief who declared an indefinite suspension of negotiations in early March of this year.

The municipality then decided to push plans ahead for developing a golf course expansion on land which they owned by way of an option. This caused the Mohawk people and warriors in particular to put up a barricade on Route 344 around March 12 of this year. The municipality therefore,sought an injunction from the Quebec Superior Court to have the barricades removed.

During May and June I met separately with Minister John Ciaccia of Quebec and representatives of the municipality of Oka, the parish of Oka, the Band Council of Kanesatake and the Longhouse Group in an attempt to bring the parties back to the table. In May I undertook to pursue the negotiation and purchase of the lands which were the subject of the disagreement. At my meeting with leaders of the Mohawk and surrounding villages and communities in late June, I asked that the Mohawk people put their concerns and propose solutions in writing for an improvement in the process, a letter which I never received.

On June 28 I wrote to Chief George Martin, the Grand Chief of the Mohawk community at Kanesatake, and to Mayor Jean Ouellet, asking them to put their differences aside to reduce the tensions between their communities and, whatever the outcome of the injunction request, to return to the table with our federal negotiator and work toward finding a peaceful solution.

That was two weeks before the tragic morning of July 11. On that morning, acting under a court injunction granted by the courts in Quebec, the Sûreté du Québec moved in to remove the barricades. Gunfire ensued, resulting in the most tragic death of Corporal Lemay. From that moment on, the issue was no longer one of land. It became one of security and policing which is clearly the jurisdiction of the province, in this case Quebec, as stipulated by the Constitution of Canada, which we all respect and uphold in this House.

Nevertheless, I worked diligently throughout this dispute, having instant contact that very day with the Quebec minister, John Ciaccia, numerous meetings and telephone conversations virtually daily with Minister Ciaccia, Sam Elkas, the minister responsible for public security, and through discussions directly with the premier's office in Quebec. This constant contact included undertakings with respect to the federal willingness to continue the process of resolving the land issue and clear commitments to acquire and purchase the lands in question at Oka in order that we might all find a way to resolve this issue peacefully. Throughout this situation, the federal government has been reasonable, prudent and extremely vigilant to ensure that the interests of the Mohawk people at the community of Kanesatake and at Kahnawake, where a sympathy blockade had been erected on the Mercier Bridge, were fully taken into consideration by the federal government.

On July 27, I announced that my department had taken steps to acquire some 30 acres of the land at Oka and had entered into discussion with the town of Oka for the purchase of additional lands. This was consistent with what we had been trying to accomplish for several years and we had received the willing co–operation of the village of Oka in negotiating an agreement for the purchase of that land.

On August 8, the municipality accepted an agreement by which the ownership of 67 acres of land was transferred to the federal government, within 10 days after the removal of barricades and a return to normalcy. Prior to that, we also secured and purchased the lands owned by a M. Rousseau and his family, which are adjacent to the park held under option by the village of Oka. The transaction with the village of Oka was concluded and finalized on September 14 and we do indeed hold full title to those lands and they will be an important element of the solution to the land issue at Oka, once the weapons are laid down. I point this out because it demonstrates the steps that the federal government has taken, not only since July 11 but for several months and years, to ensure that the threat of adverse land development in the vicinity of the Mohawk community at Kanesatake be removed. Therefore, the resolution of the immediate land issue at Oka is a fulfilment of our offers and intentions stated well before July 11 and had been confirmed, in writing, on a number of occasions since July 11.

It is now time for the warriors to put down their arms. Throughout the process I maintained that the Government of Canada was committed to a very important principle. That principle is simply this, that we will not, and no Government of Canada ever will contemplate, I am sure, negotiating sensitive land issues where many people's interests are involved at the point of a gun. To do so would be to yield our constitutional responsibilities to the forces of tyranny. What remains at Oka, at Kahnawake, and in Akwesasne, are situations where groups of heavily armed men from various parts of Canada and the United States are undertaking activities which no law-abiding Canadian can tolerate, smuggling of illegal contraband, illegal gambling and possession of illegal weapons. When the laws of Canada are broken, then those responsible, whether native or non-native must be brought to justice and that is the fundamental principle that we are debating here today. The rule of law is based on a set of commonly agreed upon moral precepts, some of which are ancient and others which are more modern. If we do not uphold the fundamental principles of the rule of law, we endanger the rights of every Canadian and we threaten the very order and security which we seek to maintain on behalf of all Canadians, our children, native and non-native alike, in a democratic society. Without fundamental respect for the rule of law, there can be no justice for anyone in this country.

The efforts of this government at all times have been to ensure that safety and security is restored at Kanesatake and Kahnawake. It is not possible, legally or constitutionally, to exempt or exclude any community from this rule. To do so would be to encourage the creation of warrior enclaves where illegitimate and illegal businesses could be conducted. As we have seen at Akwesasne, that is something no one, particularly members of this House, should encourage because of the tragedy and virtual civil war which broke out in Akwesasne at the hands of the same warrior element I might add, only a short while ago during the month of May. To bend to warrior demands on their negotiation proposals in this area is unacceptable. Armed violence such as what we have seen recently cannot be condoned. We must all seek to have normalcy established and the rule of law respected.

• (1140)

I have met a number of times during the eight or nine months of my ministry with native leadership from across Canada, but particularly with the legitimate Mohawk leadership of Kanesatake. In fact, I have been visited by community leaders from Kanesatake, Kahnawake and Akwesasne who have all decried the lack of democracy in their communities, the taking over, the taking hostage of their communities by this warrior element and who have expressed their wish for a resolution of the land issue and the continuation of co-operation and respect between their communities and the surrounding non-native communities.

The ongoing holdout of the warriors at the treatment centre and the events prior to it have undermined that mutual respect between native and non-native people in the vicinity of Oka and Kahnawake and we must all work very hard in the months ahead to rebuild that trust and mutual confidence.

The message for the warriors is you're hurting your own people. They want justice. They want safety and security. They want democracy where they can have a say in the land and future needs of their communities after the weapons are laid down.

So respect between native and non-native Canadians has been seriously undermined these past several weeks by a contingent of armed people who have their own base interests at heart, I believe, and who have sought and continue to seek the imposition of their armed will on other members of their own society and all Canadians. In doing so, they have resorted to acts which no law-abiding Canadian can condone.

This motion, therefore, links the resolution of the situation at the Oka Treatment Centre to important discussions between governments and Mohawk people on land claims and other issues. We cannot move on to that important discussion of these broader issues until the guns are laid down and peace and normalcy is returned to those communities.

As I have stated previously, and state once more for emphasis, the warriors have to accept the rule of law and we will deal honourably, fairly and generously with the needs of the Mohawk people and all other aboriginal people, but not through a process of confrontation and the threat of military style activity to achieve these ends.

That is the position of the Government of Canada and it should be the position of all members of this House. That is why this motion deserves the respect and support of all hon. members. The question we must all ask ourselves is: Can we allow any group in Canadian society to take up arms and to proclaim sovereign enclaves where they would be immune from the laws of Canada which apply to us all? Our answer and the answer of all Canadians, certainly those I have heard from this past many weeks, is a strong and forceful no.

The government recognizes the concerns of the Mohawk people at Kanesatake. They have had, until the illegal actions of the warriors, good relations with the rest of the community despite many long, outstanding concerns about land. This issue will now enable us, with the laying down of arms, to settle those issues about land. The government's commitment is to begin this full discussion immediately and the judicial processes, at the same time, must apply to the warriors who are presently still remaining within the treatment centre.

A federal negotiator was appointed in the month of August to conduct the negotiations. He stands ready to start those discussions, immediately the guns are laid down, but the ongoing standoff is preventing that work from commencing. Discussions cannot take place as long as armed warriors seek to dictate their will by the use of force or threat of violence.

Clearly the ends, no matter how honourable, do not justify the means being used. Armed threats will not and will never be condoned as long as this government holds office.

In this stand we are not alone, as the following statements by aboriginal leaders in recent weeks would attest. Recently Elijah Harper was quoted in The Toronto Star as saying: "Everybody supports non-violence, and there has been public support for that. It is essential that the Canadian people support non-violence".

Manitoba's Chief Phil Fontaine of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs said on August 26: "We don't condone violence of any sort, by any group. Our preferred option, our preferred approach is to negotiate and that is in keeping with our traditions and the teachings of our elders".

Notably, after a full week of discussions in camera with Canada's national aboriginal chiefs, the head of the Assembly of First Nations emerged and stated on September 15: "Anyone who picks up a gun in this country and is involved in a political cause, is threatening his cause".

Tom Porter, Chief of the Mohawk Nation Council at Akwesasne, which has seen such tragedy in recent months, said on August 20: "I don't condone carrying a gun at any time. We follow the ancient principles of honesty, truth and kindness because that is the real Indian way".

Negotiation, not violence nor the threat of violence, is the way to resolve problems. The Government of Canada believes, as do these native leaders and many others with whom I have spoken, that problems must be settled peacefully and democratically.

One prominent aboriginal leader said to me last week in the north of Canada: "Anyone who takes up an arm against a government of Canada is taking up arms against all the people of Canada".

There are the broader matters of native land claims, specific claims, treaty rights, and the essential economic and social progress which we all want to assist native communities in achieving. The resolution of these issues will take time. They have, however, taken too much time already, and the system of 120 years' duration, at least since Confederation, has not worked for Canada's aboriginal peoples. A system of dependency, supported by government members opposite for decades through this century has been changed in significant ways and must undergo even more major changes in the years ahead, because this government cares and wants to work with and to assist aboriginal people, but only in accordance with their wishes and in accordance with their guidance and advice on the achievement of their just aspirations within Canada.

The government has an agenda which has been in preparation for several months now. It has involved native leaders and will continue to involve native leaders as proposals are transformed into policies. Their perspectives, ideas and wisdom is a necessary and welcome input.

Over the past eight months as minister I have tried to meet as often as possible with native leaders across Canada, whether in small groups or in large summits. I have heard the voices of discontent and mistrust, as have many members. I have sensed the frustration and the anger. I have heard the earnest and sincere call from chiefs, councillors, and elders for changes in the policies and actions of government in the way we deal with claims, in the way we failed to live up to treaty obligations, and in the way we deal with the social and community needs of our aboriginal people.

• (1150)

I recognize, as I stated to the Assembly of First Nations two weeks ago, that a lot of native Canadians do not trust ministers. They offered the observation that I was not the first minister they had distrusted. In fact it was sort of the common way of dealing with ministers of Indian affairs. I think it is important that that trust be established. I think it is important that all native people trust this Parliament, trust in the laws and Constitution of Canada, and respect the way in which we ensure that those laws are applied fairly to their advantage, to their benefit and to ensuring the peace and security that they and we all seek in our communities.

The tragic situation at Oka will not dissuade me from my objective of earning that trust and confidence of native leaders. I am sensitive to the gulf that exists between native people and ministers. I am cognizant of the need to build a mutual respect and to establish a mutual confidence, confidence to listen and comprehend the extent and nature of the problems we all share.

I have been assigned a difficult and challenging task, one that seeks to implement with native input and endorsement, a set of initiatives which I hope will build in a substantial way upon a more trusting, generous and honourable relationship between government and native people. To do that, I will need and certainly will appreciate the support of all members in this House.

I have in meetings with leaders of first nations broadened my understanding of the honour and pride of Canada's native people. I have respect for the peaceful way in which native people have approached many of the problems in their communities.

The government can, will and must continue to build in this direction, to build on the progress we have already made, and yet to meet a much greater challenge that remains. We will not penalize the vast majority of peace loving native people by delaying progress on these issues because a small group of extremists are breaking the law to achieve their ends.

We have extremists throughout society and extremism which threatens the order and security of society must be dealt with, but at the same time we have much larger obligations. The people at the treatment centre must realize that their actions are helping to delay the settlement of this issue and they hurt the cause of other native people across Canada.

I encourage all members of this House to stand and vote together to encourage the warriors to lay down their arms and accept the army's offer of custody and the honourable application of our system of justice, which is known around the world for being the most fair and honourable system of justice available to mankind. In doing so they will have acted honourably and accepted that the rule of law applies to all people in Canada.

I hope all members of the House will support this motion because I think it in itself represents the key to breaking the impasse with the remaining few warriors confined to the treatment centre at Oka.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I would like to start my speech by quoting the words of a great liberal, a great Democrat, John F. Kennedy: "Those who make peaceful resolutions impossible make violent resolution inevitable." That in no way refers to my condoning violence, absolutely not.

I would like to say that I have listened very carefully to the words of the minister. He has inflamed my sense of humanity, my good sense of reason, and has compelled me to be a bit angry because I feel that there have been reasonable suggestions made over the period of the summer, the last of which was last Thursday when there was a proposal put forward which was ignored and which was not negotiated.

I think another proposal was one that I sent forward to the Prime Minister, to the minister himself, and to the premier of Quebec to have an all-party group go into Kanesatake to speak with the people about a peaceful and an honourable disengagement.

I received a letter from the minister in response to my letter. Just allow me to quote from it. I indicated that the native members of Parliament and senators would be going there to assist in the peaceful disengagement and to encourage that that would occur. The minister responded to me:

> I have to say that I am not persuaded that such action would contribute positively towards the conclusion I presume we all seek—that is, a peaceful disengagement which respects the rule of Canadian law.

It goes on to say:

> The bottom line for the Warriors appears to be an absolute unwillingness to submit to Canadian law and a parallel insistence on the recognition of a Mohawk state. As these demands are unacceptable to Canada a mass visit by Parliamentarians, however well-intended, may only encourage the Warriors to prolong their intransigent disregard for that Constitution you and I are sworn to uphold.

Let me say that I have a legal opinion which says that under the Constitution the minister has a fiduciary obligation to those people and it is as follows:

> 1) aboriginal and treaty rights will survive within the constitutional law no matter how much they have been regulated in the past
> 2) aboriginal and treaty rights can no longer be extinguished by federal or provincial legislation
>
> 3) the only possible ways now to extinguish aboriginal and treaty rights would be by constitutional amendment and, perhaps, by aboriginal consent
> 4) the federal government is the fiduciary for all aboriginal peoples—

As that I think he should have accepted my invitation. I think that we could have appealed in a humane sort of way to this group of individuals who are also human beings. It continues:

> 5) as fiduciary, the federal government must consult with the aboriginal peoples before regulating their rights in any way and can only regulate those rights in a manner that places aboriginal interests first above the interests of any other sector of Canada (but can place conservation of mother earth even higher as this benefits aboriginal people)
> 6) violation of the fiduciary obligation will be controlled by the courts through damage awards and declaring laws inapplicable to aboriginal people
> 7) the federal government must change its ways of developing policies and laws so that aboriginal people are involved and consent to these new policies or laws.

The conclusion of a legal advisor by the name Brad Morse who is professor of law at the University of Ottawa and legal advisor to the Native Council of Canada and other aboriginal first nations reads:

> I would conclude from this that the federal government's demand for extinguishment of aboriginal and treaty rights is a violation of this fiduciary obligation itself and must be stopped.

What has happened is that the minister has indicated to us this morning that when a group is armed he will not negotiate with them. I am telling you, Madam Speaker, that my people, the Dene–Métis, are not armed. These people are not armed and they want to negotiate in good faith a comprehensive land claims that will not force them to extinguish their rights, but this government will not allow that. It will not renew an outdated claims policy. This is divisive. This is the way in which this government is dividing the aboriginal community. It is totally unacceptable.

• (1200)

I would like to go from here to dealing with the fiduciary. The government's responsibility is to bring the aboriginal communities together and inspire confidence, not to drive them apart by using one aboriginal person against the other. I told this House yesterday that aboriginal peoples cannot afford to choose between one another, there are not that many of us. We are a community who has to believe in an old-fashioned ideology, that there is strength in unity. This is what Canada should be about. But that is not what is happening.

This country has been driven apart by a government that is bankrupt in policy, in ideology and in vision. We are constitutionally belly-up. It is not just an aboriginal problem, it is an anglophone–francophone, it is an eastern–western, it is an aboriginal–non-aboriginal, it is the rich and the poor. I do not think that is a partisan issue, I think it is a human rights issue.

The people of Canada want to belong to one country. They want to work together, to be one people, proud of the country they come from but that is not what is happening. This country is constitutionally belly-up and we are heading into a recession.

Why would we entertain such an inane motion to commend the exemplary conduct of the men and women in the Armed Forces? These people are pawns being used by the government to circumvent the democratic process. The wrong process has been engaged in and this is not right. What should have happened?

I have a copy of a speech delivered by the Prime Minister on August 18, I believe, wherein he called this an armed insurrection. If it is an armed insurrection, what the government should have invoked was the Emergency Measures Act, which would have had the House reconvene after seven days. Why would this government, in all good sense, want the sole responsibility for this mess? Why could it have not shared it with the other parties? It is ridiculous, it borders on the sublime.

On September 20 I wrote to the Prime Minister to demand that there be an inquiry. In response the government has given this ridiculous motion. There is no way that I am going to publicly chastise or criticize people that are being used. The National Defence Act is used as a shield to circumvent the parliamentary process. I am not going to be that ridiculous and neither are the other members of this Parliament, Madam Speaker.

Why has the government missed a golden opportunity to address the real issues? Why does it continue to put forward these ridiculous motions which, again, circumvents an opportunity to deal with some of the real issues that need to be dealt with, like the government's fiduciary responsibility. This responsibility should be one of advocacy, not one of adversary. The government should be working for these people, Madam Speaker, in an advocacy manner, not in an adversarial manner. It should be promoting brotherhood, not division.

I must say that the response that I have received on the motion that has been put forward by the government is that it totally avoids the basic issues with which we should be dealing. There are certain moral and legal obligations that should be addressed. I am going to attempt to address some of those, as I have with the fiduciary responsibility of the government as set out in the Constitution.

The government during the Meech Lake debate was very much aligning itself with a larger body of legal opinion on what is right for Canada constitutionally. There are bodies of legal opinion that say, and I have a note here called "The News from Queens." "Queen's legal scholars announce proposal to end Kanesatake stand-off".

Madam Speaker, these 20 lawyers from the Queen's Faculty of Law may not be experts, but they have bothered to come forward with a proposal. I will leave it here so that the minister may have a look at it.

They bring certain matters into question, and I will quote John White, the Dean of Law.

"Canada and the Mohawks are looking for a process which can lead to the laying down of arms and a withdrawal of the military. This inquiry represents a responsible way to avoid further loss of life.

According to the 22 legal academics who signed the letter, the usual criminal process may not suffice in this context. The laws we apply must recognize international law, treaty law and the law of aboriginal rights as well as the ordinary law of criminal procedure."

There have been many concerns about the ensuing investigation that will take place in Kanesatake. Who will be overseeing it? Will it be the Sûreté du Québec? I asked the Solicitor General that question yesterday. In a latter I wrote to him I asked if it was possible to have the RCMP undertake the ensuing investigation. I referred to the fiduciary responsibility of the government. The minister said: "If Quebec so wills and if Quebec agrees, it can be negotiated". But legal advice this morning tells me that the Solicitor General can, in fact, override that because of the federal government's responsibility for aboriginal people under the Constitution. In fact, it can make provisions, make accommodations and can negotiate. At the very least it should negotiate to show that there is an element of co-operation and to build the trust the minister has spoken about.

In my letter of September 20 to the Prime Minister, I indicated that it is critical that there be a parliamentary investigation into the entire situation at Oka and the subsequent events at Kahnawake and Kanesatake. The Canadian public is entitled to know why Parliament was not recalled to deal with what has become a national issue. They want to know why the federal government chose to neglect its responsibilities to those aboriginal people. This is a very fundamental question.

Why will the government not negotiate? Why was the army directed to use 3,000 troops to deal with a dispute over land? Why has the army used force and tear gas on women and children who were not armed? Why has communication been cut off between the aboriginal people under siege at Kanesatake and the Canadian public at large? Why has freedom of press has been denied? Why has a native civil servant been fired from the federal government? How can the government justify the continuous use of intrusion and violence against a group of Canadians who are not being protected equally as other citizens? These questions are endless and the implications of not acquiring the answers through a parliamentary investigation are too monumental if the government is serious about dealing with the problems confronting aboriginal people across the country. Madam Speaker, the questions and the concerns are endless.

On August 11, the Liberal MP for Kenora—Rainy River wrote to the Speaker asking for an emergency debate on the situation pursuant to Standing Order 52(1). It is crucial that a full enquiry be called in order to establish the facts surrounding this national crisis.

I will review the incident that brought this situation to a crisis. Let us look at the cumulative of the decisions in Calder—Gérin—Sioui. Sparrow establishes that the Supreme Court of Canada is willing to be flexible in order to allow the proof of aboriginal claims. It is also willing to interpret those sections of the Constitution dealing with aboriginal peoples in a way which gives meaning to the concept of aboriginal rights. The latter three cases have been affected by Section 35 of the Constitution Act of 1982.

Madam Speaker, clearly the Constitution Act of 1982, Section 35, is worth the paper it is written on, especially in relation to the evolution of the rights of aboriginal people. Section 35 was included in the Constitution during the tenure of Justice Minister Jean Chrétien. Had the Conservative government adjusted its policies and programs to fit these Supreme Court decisions, then the crisis at Oka might have been averted.

• (1210)

Throughout the summer, calls for the Minister of Indian Affairs to become involved in this dispute were met with silence in an attempt to pass off responsibility to the Government of Quebec. This whole procedure of a termination policy and sloughing off the responsibility to another jurisdiction and making aboriginal issues and the fiduciary responsibility for aboriginal peoples a political football simply is not going to work any more.

What we need in this country is fundamental change. We need changes. Any government that is in power is going to need fundamental change. You are going to have to look at the profile of the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs for instance. Why is it that when a Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs is appointed, it is considered a demotion? It is considered punishment for not having done a good job elsewhere. Why is that? That is ridiculous. That is the perception and if that is the case then it is up to the government to get the message out that this is a high profile position, a position that has inner cabinet support on aboriginal issues, a position that is sensitive to the needs of aboriginal people that is consultative and not confrontational. This is not a ministry that plays a power game, this is one that plays the game of co-operation with the people that it is supposed to serve.

Prior to the army moving to Oka, there were violations of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Electricity and telephones were cut off, repair crews were denied entry and the actions of the Quebec police were directed towards the cutting off of food and medicine to the Indian people. Media access was also cut off.

The motion put forward by the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs is an attempt to mask his incompetence with the competence of the army. That is what it is—avoiding and not dealing with the issues head on. The army has shown restraint and discipline. We recognize that. Why should we talk about it? But the federal government has pushed many aboriginal peoples to the end of their tether, let me tell you. This issue should have been resolved long ago.

I had warned the minister of the burgeoning crisis at Oka and to my knowledge, nothing was done. When human rights abuses took place he did nothing but to condemn various components and factions, not dealing with the issue head on. This is not how you govern. You deal with the issues that are put to you in a crisis yet you do not avoid them.

The army was requested by the Government of Quebec. It was not dispatched by the federal government. This government, this minister and this Prime Minister have sat idly acting as lackeys in refusing to take leadership roles in resolving this crisis. In my mind they have abandoned their constitutional responsibilities. The big question across Canada is, why? People have asked ridiculous questions such as this. Are the aboriginal people being punished for killing Meech Lake? That is a question that is being asked. This is not my question, this is a question that is being asked because there is no trust, no faith and no confidence in this government.

The Liberal Party called for the resumption of Parliament at the outset of this crisis, yet the Prime Minister refused to reconvene Parliament. The Prime Minister speaks glowingly in terms laden with blarney about democratic processes, yet he refused to keep Parliament informed about what was going on. Ironically, he reconvened Parliament when a band of poor, destitute refugees landed on the shores of Canada and he called it a national emergency. He used Parliament to foster racism in Canada. That is how I feel about it.

Now I want to go to the whole issue of human rights. I have an article that was sent to me by Lawanahara, Ross Maracle, a clergyman from the Tyendinaga Reserve in Desoronto. He states:

> However, here "at home", the Canadian Native is an endangered species living in increasingly endangered spaces. On September 20th the news media reported that the Prime Minister warned that "violence gets you nothing except heartache, sadness and loss'.
>
> So, what's new? We have always lived with heartache and sadness. You saw on TV, Desmond Tutu stand in a northern Native village whose shacks were devoid of electricity and running water. Yes, we have always lived on the edge of epidemics, our babies have the highest rate of infant mortality and our children are plagued with diseases caused by open trench sewers. Our life expectancy is much beneath that of other Canadians. We know what death is all about. Our babies die of gastro-enteritis, our children expire inhaling gas fumes, our youth increasingly are taking their lives. So, what's new? WE DON'T NEED TEAR GAS TO WEEP!
>
> You will never gauge the depth of my emotions, when I, as a Mohawk clergyman and Reverend Greg Shisheesh, a Cree, attempted to deliver food to Kanesatake that was purchased with money that came from Elijah Harper's Reserve of Red Sucker Lake, Manitoba.
> How can I express my feelings! Seeing the razor wire! The searchlights! The helicopters! Tanks! Machine-guns with bayonets! And now dogs and the towers! In Canada! May this not be the resurrection of the ghosts of Dachau and Auschwitz rising out of an abyss of racial intolerance.

This is what he likens it to. He continues:

> Give us native Martin Luther King's and Desmond Tutu's, who are not afraid to identify with despised people. Who will, as the Good Samaritan, bind up the emotional and spiritual wounds of our people. Where are those that represent the Jesus Christ who would pour in oil and bind up wounds without checking the colour of his skin or asking him his beliefs?

Well, I can say that we, as Canadians, have to remember that there are two races of people only, men and women, and the rest is just colour.

Our attempt has to be to live in peace and harmony, not to divide, not to create policies that divide people. That is totally unacceptable. I can tell you as an aboriginal person and a Canadian parliamentarian, it is my goal to be fair. It is my goal to be more than partisan. It is my goal to be human and to share that humanity with my fellow parliamentarians and Canadians who put me here to represent them.

My goal is to show you when you look at my people and you look into the eyes of my people, you will see something good, something kind, something tolerant, and that you will not see criminals. You will not see the intolerance that has been spoken about, the violence. Because there is goodness there and it is a goodness that is to be shared. We are a people, as one of my elders said, "a people who have no principle and have no belief and no vision, have no future. They are a people doomed for failure". Well, I see the aboriginal people and the people of Canada as more than that.

There have been other concerns. A member of the Canadian Bar Association, Mr. Sam Stevens, wrote an article in a paper called The National. The Canadian Bar Association membership has 35,000 members. There is a large legal body of opinion. In his comments he said:

> The new Native Law Section of the Canadian Bar met with the Minister of Indian Affairs in August 1988 to discuss its proposals and urged him to act quickly. The minister did not adopt any of the recommendations. In the midst of the Oka conflict, CBA again forwarded a copy of its report to the Minister.
> We, as Canadians, now face circumstances that no longer allow us to ignore or delay the resolution of these many issues, but it has taken an armed confrontation to force us to begin to deal with the original citizens of this country in a fair and equitable manner.

The Canadian Bar Association in its special report entitled: "Aboriginal Rights in Canada: An Agenda for Action (1989)" made this the central focus of how to resolve aboriginal issues but it also realized there had to be a number of other mechanisms to resolve the hundreds of outstanding claims. Their recommendations are as such: the resumption of the constitutional process; a royal commission to examine, study, and report on treaty issues; a parliamentary inquiry to examine and make recommendations on the plight of the Inuit, Métis, and non-status Indians; and the establishment of a specific claims tribunal and aboriginal rights commission to inquire into aboriginal rights, issues and claims and then to publish reports recommending solutions.

These recommendations are not made by people who scribble out messages on napkins. These are groups of professionals who sit down together, think out, and through consensus come up with an agenda, trying to assist government in taking the right approach.

Mr. Stevens states:

In the end that it will take a very long time before the bitterness at Oka and across the country subsides and aboriginal First Nations, governments and average Canadians can begin to feel good about each other.

What a heavy price to pay for something that could have been completely avoided. The solutions were there, but the commitment to do something about these problems was not there.

Sam Stevens is the Administrator of the Justice of the Peace Program for the Territorial Court in Yellowknife, Northwest Territories.

I will conclude with these comments. This country and this government will go nowhere if there is not fundamental change. We need to endorse a program, an aboriginal agenda, that does a number of things and that gives aboriginal issues within government the highest profile and the role of the minister. We need to look at what happens to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. To empower people, one accelerates devolution and makes sure that those resources and moneys that are intended for aboriginal peoples do reach the people that they are intended for.

We also must look at taking the right procedures now with this one crisis—this is one crisis, there are many that could occur—and that a parliamentary investigation or inquiry does take place. We must, in fact, entertain the recommendations about a royal commission of inquiry but the government should not use it as a blanket not to take action on current issues.

In dealing with land claims the policies, please, I appeal to the government that it should not be divisive. It is are dividing our people. We need to have our people work together. I represent 15,000 aboriginal people. I cannot have those people divided because of policies that divide them, separate them, and force them to choose between one another.

We also need to look at a legislative commission to deal with land claims and we have to deal with issues of sovereignty. We have to deal with issues of self-determination or self-government and we also specifically have to address the whole issue of the outdated claims policy.

From the day that I was elected, I have pushed successive ministers in committee on this issue of self-government and on the extinguishment clause because I could see that we were heading into trouble with the comprehensive claims. There were the former ministers, Mr. McKnight and Pierre Cadieux, and now we have the current minister.

It has been my goal ultimately to have the claims settled but in doing that there are major considerations for my people. What do they want to lose? What will the exchange be? These are the questions that are determined by the policies that government puts forward.

I say once again to Canada: "You have to realize that the aboriginal people are not the enemy." The aboriginal people are the inhabitants of this land, who have been here for thousands of years and who have carried on tradition.

Winandaga, a great peacemaker who was a Huron by birth and a Mohawk by adoption, said: "Our strength shall be in unity. Our way shall be the way of reason, righteousness and peace." What do you think the white forefathers saw when they came upon a group of people that had government based on peace, that had a group of people who were civilized enough to govern themselves? It must have been a pleasant surprise to extract principles of democracy from them for their own constitution.

It must have been a great treat to have been able to do that.

The aboriginal people have many considerations: constitutional, political, social, educational, and economic—marginalized on most fronts. But this is a problem that is not going to go away. This is a problem that the government is going to have to grasp and say, "We have the political will to make change," or it is not going to change. It is quite obvious that it is not changing.

I say that we are willing to work things out. We want to work together, but we cannot do it ourselves. I am here as a fellow parliamentarian and I am willing to work with the government on this issue.

Mr. Angus: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, I was going to move an amendment to the motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Blondin: I am sorry about that, Madam Speaker. This is a very emotional debate and one that is very much heartfelt. We felt that the motion put forward was an attempt to entrap us and to avoid. It is unacceptable as it is, so I move, seconded by the Member for Broadview—Greenwood:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "Chateauguay" and replacing them with the following:
> "and that this House condemns the complete failure of the government to address and offer solutions to the problems that led to the Armed Forces being deployed; and
> That upon adoption of this motion, the said motion be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs.

The reason we make this reference to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs is that it would be the most appropriate place. The Solicitor General, as well as the Department of Justice, could be called in for consultation to that committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair will reserve at this point on this amendment. We will come back in a few minutes and make sure that this is all in order.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan on a point of order.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, as members will know, on a motion like this the first speakers from the government and from the official opposition have unlimited time. Unfortunately, the Standing Orders did not provide the same opportunity for the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I think that you would find, if you sought unanimous consent, that there is a disposition to allow the hon. member for Yukon to have a few extra minutes to complete the remarks that she is about to make.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I can confirm that we, on the government side, are more than happy to co-operate in this gesture.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, we can confirm that arrangement also. It is also my understanding that there will be the normal time for questions and comments at the conclusion of the speech notwithstanding the unlimited time.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, first of all I would like to offer my congratulations to the member for Western Arctic who made a very impassioned and a very strong speech as an aboriginal member of this House of Commons. I look forward to the other speeches by aboriginal members because I feel that these are the people who can speak, as the member for the Western Arctic has done, from the heart and identify for us the issues.

Having said that, I would like to enter this debate on motion No. 17 which we are debating today, presented by the Minister of Indian Affairs. I would have to say at the outset how utterly disappointing this motion is. It totally fails to deal with the national and international ramifications of the situation that occurred this summer and still occurs at Kanesatake and Kahnawake. It fails to deal with the root of any of the problems that have led to that situation and it is, in my view, simply a cynical attempt, once again, for the government to refuse to accept its responsibility for the actions that were taken.

If the government had accepted its responsibility, it would have called Parliament back, but it failed in accepting that responsibility. The Government of Canada had an obligation, in a situation as serious as this, to call back Parliament and to hear the solutions, the ideas and the debate of all of the members and parties of this House. This government has not only failed on this issue and failed the aboriginal people, it has failed the people of Canada. What we have seen by successive federal governments has led to what I have seen increasingly over the years become, on the part of aboriginal people, a rebellion of despair because there is nowhere else to turn. I want to say today in speaking to this motion that it is up to us as politicians to turn that rebellion of despair into a revolution of hope. That is our responsibility. That is the responsibility we want to see.

From the beginning of the situation at Kahnawake and Kanesatake it has been characterized by a wish more to save face on the part of the government than to save lives. That should always be the first consideration of any government. This has been much more than a summer of discontent. It has been a summer of anger and contempt. The images that we have seen this summer must surely be branded on the soul of every Canadian and of every Canadian child who watched what their country was becoming. We have seen the images of Canadians fighting other Canadians on Canadian streets. We have seen Canadians stoning other Canadians as they drive by seniors and children. We have seen masked citizens facing off against helmeted and shielded soldiers and police. I suppose the image that struck me the most is something I read the other day by a reporter who was behind the barricades. He said that he was in the treatment centre and a seven-year old child came in. That seven-year old wanted a piece of candy or something and he said to him to go away and he would talk to him later. He described how the seven-year old turned around with a look of tremendous hate in his eyes for this white reporter. It told a thousand tales. Is that the future we will see as a result of this summer? I sincerely hope not.

As politicians, we have a responsibility not just for the events of today but for what is going to happen tomorrow and as we move on into the decade and the year 2000. The minister spoke often in his comments about the rule of law.

We had a situation where the Canadian Armed Forces acted under the Defence Act and came into the situation at Kahnawake and Kanesatake. I ask the government: Let's talk about the rule of law. Why was the Emergencies Act not enforced?

I would suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that the reason that legislation was not used is that this minister, this government and this Prime Minister would have had to stand before this House and explain their actions, because under that law they would be forced to do so.

I quote from the preamble of the act: "In order to ensure safety and security during such an emergency, the Governor in Council should be authorized, subject to the supervision of Parliament, to take temporary measures that may not be appropriate in normal times."
