You made a ruling, Madam Speaker. The member for Shefford called your ruling into question and, in effect, accused you of being partisan. I take great exception to that and I am sure the overwhelming majority of members of the House take exception to the absolute insult the member for Shefford has shown to all members here this afternoon.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Let me comment briefly on a remark made by the hon. member for Shefford.

The hon. member said he had seen the Chair make a sign to an hon. member on the government benches. It will make things easier if I explain what happened and we will be in a better position to sort out the issues.

First, let me repeat that, according to the pattern we followed all day since the beginning of this debate, it would normally have been the time for a member on the government side to speak. So I simply turned to the parliamentary secretary so that he could tell which member on his side would speak. He told me he would take the floor himself and I agreed.

The previous speaker concluded his speech, I recognized the hon. member and he immediately set out to make his speech. At the same time, a point of order was made. Before I had time to recognize it or even say "point of order", the speech had begun. The law and the rules being what they are, I agreed to explain in detail everything that had occured. Enough of it, now, let us go on with the debate. That is the reason we are here. The honourable member for Timiskaming.

[English]

Mr. MacDougall: Madam Speaker, I would like to start off by—

Mr. Plamondon: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The honourable member for Richelieu raises a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: I simply wish to remind the member who criticized us for raising many points of order that I learned that when I sat with the party in office. And to the member for—

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is not a point of order. The honourable member for Timiskaming.

[English]

Mr. MacDougall: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. By entering into today's debate I first want to say to you and to those Canadians who this afternoon may have been watching the ongoing process of the House of Commons and debating of legislation that Bill C–44 is probably one of the most important pieces of legislation that all Canadians have seen for a great long while.

I say that for a reason. It goes back to the development of a government in 1984 that recognized the regions of the country, the concerns of those regions and developed policies, programs and economic development in those regions.

In July 1988 the Prime Minister of this country and the Minister of Energy signed a statement of principles in which Hibernia, the Government of Canada, the Government of Newfoundland and the premier of Newfoundland had negotiated in order to finalize a legal binding agreement incorporating the principles of the statement.

I had the opportunity a few weeks ago, and it was an historic time to be in St. John's, along with my colleagues from St. John's East, the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, officials of our department,the premier of Newfoundland and the minister of energy to be at the signing of history. At that time there were four former premiers of the province of Newfoundland there. It gave an opportunity for Canadians to understand how important this deal was, not only for Newfoundlanders, but for all Canadians.

This $5.2 billion project represents $3 billion expected for Canadian business. This business is not only going to be taking place in the province of Newfoundland, in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, in Ontario or in Quebec but across the land. It is an opportunity for all Canadians to be able to benefit from this project.

If we look back to the project in the North Sea, Norway and Great Britain had only 25 to 40 per cent of the project's budget. Madam Speaker, I must say to you, this project is important to all Canadians. It is so important because it gives an opportunity for individuals across Canada to benefit.

I refer to the province of Quebec's expertise in so many areas, where they were looking at the fabricating side of it, where they were looking at Hydro Quebec. Let me give two examples of companies which will receive a large share of the winning portion of the consortiums. SNC, with its partners, have a 70 per cent interest in a joint venture. Newfoundland Offshore Contractors have won a $360 million engineering design project management contract for Hibernia. This contract will begin in Montreal where about 600 people will be employed in designing the topside modulars of the Hibernia project. That gives one example of exactly what this project is going to mean for all Canadians.

Over $1 billion that is going to go into that project that will go into the province of Quebec. I hear from my socialist friend from the great province of Alberta who does not understand the opportunities that are available for all Canadians. I sometimes wonder when I listen to the socialists, who are supposed to be so concerned for the individual Canadian, the small guy, the individuals living in the small communities across this country and the individuals living in the small ports in Newfoundland. The socialists are just not concerned for them at all. They are ready to fold up and vote against this bill.

It certainly indicates to me that what used to be the NDP standing up for the individuals across this country is no longer so. The people who are standing up are the people who are in this House and this government. They are ensuring that the opportunities for individuals across Canada is going to be recognized with the Hibernia project.

As we go on and look at some of the values of this project, it is interesting to see how, as an example, a small outpost in Newfoundland where individuals, for a very good reason, have only been able to gather so many work weeks each year because of the options that they had, and those options were very few. It could have been in the fishing industry or just small seasonal jobs. Now, all of a sudden, there is a new way of life for these Canadians, a new way of life for people who want to be able to have that opportunity. That is really what Hibernia is all about. This project is for all Canadians. It is an opportunity for us to diversify and for Newfoundlanders to have the opportunity to be able to gain some of the recognition, skills and development of a region of their country. That is really what we are talking about.

It has been an honour for me to deliver a few words supporting Hibernia and the aspect of the fact that this is going to be a beneficial project for all Canadians. I thank you for that opportunity, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The honourable member for Chambly.

Mr. Lapierre: I raise on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Point of order. The honourable member for Shefford.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I move:

That the Hon. Member for Rosemont now be heard.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion is in order.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Edmonston: Madam Speaker—

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, there was no quorum!

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows as well as I do that we had a quorum. Seventeen members thought fit to vote, and that is good enough for me. The hon. member for Chambly.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Thank you, Madam Speaker, for recognizing me after all this time.

I simply want to support the amendment put forward by my friends of the Bloc Quebecois. I think the amendment to the amendment presented by our Liberal colleagues does not really solve anything. You have to understand that we want to get the most benefits out of this Bill for the Canadian people. I understand what the members of the Bloc Quebecois are trying to do. I think their proposals are desirable and very important. I want to remind you though that we are facing a huge deficit, so huge that the government of Canada spends at least a third of every revenue dollar just on the interests. The Conservative government talks about deficit control, but at the same time, like my NDP colleagues and the members of the Bloc québécois pointed out, they are writing a blank cheque for this Hibernia project. I find this Bill very dangerous, because it is, in fact, a blank cheque. I am not against Hibernia. I am not against the project as such but this bill is risky. And I will give you a few reasons why I think we cannot accept that legislation as it is now.

Firstly, we will be handing out roughly $2.7 billion on what guarantees? I am talking about firm and concrete guarantees. There are not many. What will be the actual windfalls of this project? What we usually call equity.

[English]

What will be the equity that we will be able to have out of this project? When we are talking about investing, we usually talk about what we will get, what guarantees of what we will get, as Canadians, across the country.

So, as far as guarantees go, that is a return on our money, I see none of that in this bill. That problem has not been resolved in that bill.

Second, I heard that it would cost $900 000 for each and every one of the 1100 jobs that will be created, and I mean long term jobs.

An hon. member: Shame!

Mr. Edmonston: My colleague just said that it was a shame!. That is so true, especially when we consider that this government keeps saying that there is no money left to spend. But it wants to spend $900 000 to create one job. Of course that is a shame!

• (1730)

Third, about the environment, this bill amounts to giving a blank cheque. What guarantee do we have that the environment will be preserved and that it will not be contaminated from carrying out the project itself? None. So, for the people who really care for the environment, and I think people do, this bill bring no answer. It does not provide them with the reassurance they are looking for. Instead, it makes them worry because it does not take the environment into account. That is the third reason for finding this bill faulty, to the point of being inacceptable.

The fourth point I want to raise, as my colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois and from the NDP did earlier, is this: What will be the financial benefits for the rest of Canada? Will Quebec only send a little sand or a little technology or will other provinces send a little manpower? Are those the benefits we are looking for? I surely don't. I want real jobs, permanent jobs across Canada and jobs in the high technology sector. Why not make sure that we are not simply going to pump oil for the Americans? Why not refine that oil somewhat to sell gasoline and possess another technology?

I can tell you about the situation in eastern Montreal. A number of refineries closed down, putting hundreds of workers out of work in the area. Why introduce a bill that does not attend to that problem? I find that this project does not create many spin-offs, not to mention spin-offs in the sense that refineries could treat oil produced at Hibernia. I find that senseless, unacceptable.

Finally, I want to say that we have a problem even if all garanties have been— The government has accepted the demands, which means that the Canadian companies will benefit the most from this Hibernia project.

The Free Trade Agreement is causing us serious problems. This is what I want to tell you about my collegues from the Bloc Quebecois and the Conservative Party who are responsible for the present situation in which we can't even force Americans or whoever will obtain the contracts to hire Canadians. Moreover, Americans will say that it goes against free trade. Who signed this treaty?

An hon. member: Not us!

Mr. Edmonston: What government? I'm sorry. But I can tell you, my collegues from the Bloc Quebecois, not now that they are in that group, but when they were members of the Conservative government—

An hon. member: Not us!

Mr. Edmonston: My NDP collegue, the member for Alberta, already said that the members of the Bloc Quebecois voted for free trade when they were members of the Conservative governement. And it is because of free trade that we can't do anything to improve the situation.

I support my collegues of the Bloc Quebecois, but I deplore that many of them are responsible for the situation in which we find ourselves today. With the best intentions in the world, there is not much we can do because, after all, they helped the government to pass the Free Trade Agreement.

So I find it sad that, today, when he wants to defend the interests of Quebec and of Canada— because I heard my Liberal colleague saying gladly that since the Bloc Quebecois wanted all Canada to receive the most financial spin-offs from the project, it means that they are Canadian and in favour of the status quo— I am not prepared to say that—

Mr. Lapierre: For the time being.

Mr. Edmonston: —for the time being. But I would like to say that there is a contradiction at the moment. We want to defend the interests of Quebecers, but we have created a sad situation in the sense that we cannot defend those interests with the Hibernia project, because the free trade treaty keeps us from doing it.

An hon. member: It is not true.

Mr. Edmonston: Now, in conclusion, Madam Speaker, I think it is necessarry to have projects like Hibernia and projects elsewhere in Canada. I am not necessarily against the people of Newfoundland or people from elsewhere in Canada. However, this legislation is not fair, neither for Quebec nor for the rest of Canada. And I think particularly, and this is the most disastrous point in this bill, that it is the reason why I support the amendment of my colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois. And I am extremely sorry to see that my colleagues from the Liberal Party could move an amendment to the amendment which is so opportunist that it is utter nonsense.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to rise to—

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford has a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Since I raised a point of order before the member for Laval-East spoke, I want to introduce the following motion:

That the member for Rosemont be now heard.

Today, you will have heard all the speakers of all other parties except one from the Bloc Québécois. We have had enough. Let him now be heard!

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is a motion before the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost. Debate. The hon. member for Laval-East.

• (1740)

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak. If my colleagues would only listen, I have things to say to them.

Madam Speaker, when the Hibernia project was under consideration some months ago, I was very much in favour of it but after some discussion, I must say it no longer appealed to me, because the province of Quebec was not getting much out of it.

Back then in 1988, one of our members—the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, now leader of the Bloc Québécois—was Quebec's political minister and Minister of the Environment. He sat on the priority committee and approved the project with a guarantee of two million man-hours for Newfoundland, but none for Canada or Quebec. The people of his group are now turning this House into a circus. Whenever my children watch the proceedings on television, Madam Speaker, they ask me serious questions about the House. I do not know if it is due to the fact the hon. member for Shefford lacks experience or has been here too long, but I was so ashamed when I saw those people show no respect for the Speaker. The things we heard in this House! In the six years I have been here, Madam Speaker, I have witnessed stormy debates and fights, but I was really ashamed of what I saw today. Anyway, Madam Speaker, people on the other side tried to talk about the project, but they spent much more time talking about the rules of the House they still do not know very well. We talked about Hibernia, about the fact it does not bring enough economic spin-offs to Quebec. As I said, there were none at the time.

But I can tell you that there are members on this side of the House, like the hon. member for Lévis, who understood and went out to get their share. At the last meeting I attended, we were given background information on this matter, but someone stood up, Madam Speaker, and I regret that he is not here because I will mention his name, and I don't usually mention the name of a member who is absent from the House. Somebody even told me—

I accept your remarks, Madam Speaker. It's a shame that one of the members whose riding will benefit from the economic impact of the Hibernia project left the party and is now on the other side, trying to turn this place into a circus. All that was missing was the member for Quebec who came here yesterday to prove to us once and for all that all they want to do is disrupt the proceedings of the House. They don't want to talk, but I would like to hear what they have to say about this bill. I was really affected when people talked to me about that.

We have today the member for Lévis, who is beside me, Madam Speaker—

Mr. Lapierre: There was nothing at all.

Mr. Della Noce: The hon. member says that there was nothing. There are four to six million hours of work in his riding. For them, it's nothing. I can also tell you that the opposition to this project comes from one place only, and it is the place that will benefit the most from the economic impact of this project. That place is Quebec, and the opposition comes from the Bloc Québécois. Of course we would like Laval to benefit from the fallout instead of Quebec, but unfortunately we don't have any company that works in that field. We are very happy anyway that the Quebec area will benefit, weather it be Lévis or Richelieu.

My colleague opposite says that there is nothing at all. Maybe we will try to give some figures in a few moments. I mentioned earlier the names of the two corporations from Quebec, Madam Speaker, but I will repeat: Monenco and SNC. The latter was saying to its employees a month ago to do something about the empty spaces. Empty spaces will have to be rented. The Chair said immediately after that the contract—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but I have to interrupt the Hon. Member.

[English]

It being 5.45 p.m., pursuant to order made in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78 on Tuesday, October 2, 1990 it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the report stage of the bill now before the House.

The first vote will be on the amendment to the amendment to Motion No. 2, standing in the name of Mr. Assad.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

Pursuant to Standing order 76(8), a recorded division on the amendment to the amendment stands deferred.

Consequently, the question on amendment and motions Nos. 1 and 2 will be put only when the House will have voted on the amendment to the amendment.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved:

That Bill C-44 be amended by adding immediately after line 27 at page 13 the following new clause:

"23.(1) The Minister shall each year prepare a report with respect to the Hibernia Development Project during the preceding calendar year and shall lay it before Parliament on any of the first fifteen days that either House of Parliament is sitting after he completes it;

(2) The report prepared pursuant to subsection (1) shall indicate

(a) the net direct and indirect economic benefits in each Canadian province which result from the Hibernia Development Project;

(b) the net employment benefits in each Canadian province which result from the Hibernia Development Project, including an analysis of job classifications and salary levels;

(c) the quantities and percentage of oil production which are exported in un-refined or semi-refined states."

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

The House will now proceed to the recorded differed division at the report stage that is now before the House.

The first question is on the amendment to the amendment presented by Mr. Assad. Call in the Members.

The amendment to the amendment presented by Mr. Assad is negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion negatived.

• (1850)

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

[Editor's Note: See Hansard, pages 13769 and 13770, and Votes and Proceedings for October 4.]

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I did ask the question.

[Translation]

Nobody objected. The Chair asked the question and nobody objected. Objections were raised, as the tape will show, I think, only after I said "carried ".

When shall the bill be read for the third time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 6.54 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.54 p.m.

POINT OF ORDER

CONCURRENCE IN BILL C-44

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding a set of serious concerns I have about the vote yesterday evening on concurrence at the report stage of Bill C-44, the Hibernia development project bill.

I have reviewed the tapes and have reviewed Hansard for that moment, and I would like to bring the following to the House's attention.

Yesterday, when the Deputy Speaker put the question, I and other members of my caucus said no. The Chair did not hear us, and I assume that others around her did not either, or they would have advised her of the dissenting voices. However, Mr. Speaker, we did not say no. I can only assume that our dissent to this bill was drowned out by the collective voices of the Liberals and Conservatives who were much closer to the Speaker than ourselves.

The result of this inability to hear was that our caucus was unable to vote against this stage of the bill. Yet, we have spoken repeatedly against this project at second reading, during report stage debate and debate on the time allocation motion. Surely the House should have anticipated that a bill which required time allocation would not be adopted unanimously.

This is not the first time that the House has encountered difficulties on important divisions, but I would like to think that this will be the last.

I seek your guidance, Mr. Speaker, on finding means to ensure that our voices are heard by the Chair in the future. In the meantime, however, the record shows that concurrence at report stage was given unanimously. This is clearly an incorrect record. I would like that division to be taken again but understand of course that the Chair and the House would be reluctant to do so.

At the very least, I would like to move that the record be corrected to show that concurrence was not given unanimously. I have an appropriate motion which I think will indicate very simply that. I would like to read the motion and then seek unanimous consent to have it put. I move:

> That the record of debate at report stage of Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia development project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be amended by deleting the words "Accordingly, the bill, as amended, was concurred in at report stage" and replacing them with the following: "Accordingly, the bill, as amended, was concurred in at report stage, on division".

I would like to seek unanimous consent to be able to put that motion. That would then not change what happened yesterday. Of course a decision was made. I think that inadvertently, because of the rather exuberant mood of the House at that moment, the noes that were stated at that time simply were not heard by the Speaker.

If the House were to accept this motion, it would simply clear the record, and we would be able to move on with the business of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to make the same mistake twice, the alleged mistake. The motion has been put.

Mr. Cooper: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: In one minute. I took it that the House is in agreement with the motion.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I just want to confirm that in fact what we are agreeing to is the motion itself and not putting ourselves in a position of debating the motion. I want to make sure that we are all agreeing to pass it by unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: That is my understanding. Is that the understanding of the hon. member?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I fully support the motion of the hon. member for Kamloops. Under the circumstances I should think it would satisfactorily indicate there was indeed division with respect to that vote.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): We also agree, Mr. Speaker, provided that the motion not be debated, and that the question be put and the motion be adopted forthwith.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there agreement?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: I want to say something. There has obviously been a complaint made. I have heard representations. It is very important that in this place we understand some things very clearly and, that is, that if there is a complaint about things in the House it is probably better to bring it to me on a personal basis and to do so immediately.

If—and I am not saying for one minute that that is the case—an error is made, especially on a vote, it is not possible for the Speaker to undo it unless the House wishes to do it as it has done this morning.

I want to say to the hon. member for Kamloops—and I can say it to some other hon. members also—that I appreciate very much the civil way this matter has been dealt with this morning and resolved. I thank hon. members.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

BUDGET LEAK

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, last April 27, 1989, the first thing in the morning that day, the Minister of Finance rose on a question of privilege concerning the leak in his budget that had occurred the previous evening. Hon. members will recall the events of that day. We now have had extensive coverage of those events in the press.

I gave Your Honour notice of my intention to raise this question a week ago Monday. I waited until today to allow the government some time to prepare its response and for us to deal with the issue in a non-urgent way because of course I think the urgency is gone, but I think it is an important question that was not dealt with on April 27.

I want to raise it again because of the fact that the court cases that were involved following that leak are now completed. The matter is no longer sub judice. Accordingly, we can deal with it in this House.

Hon. members will recall the sequence of events. In fact we now know there were two leaks of this budget that occurred on or about April 24, 1989. The minister became aware of one of those leaks, as did the whole country, on April 26 when Mr. Small appeared on television brandishing his copy of The Budget in Brief.

The Minister of Finance came into the House and through the Minister of Justice tried to get the House to sit late that evening. There was no agreement to do so. The minister released his budget on national television, and then the next day the question of privilege was raised by the Minister of Finance.

I notice that in the minister's question of privilege, which was the first one raised that day—and Your Honour indicated that you had received notice of many—there was no request by the minister for any reference to a committee of the circumstances surrounding the budget leak or anything to do with it.

Indeed, I do not know exactly what the minister's question of privilege was. He gave Your Honour notice of one, but he did not actually come out with anything that indicated a breach of his privileges.

I submit that while he may have been embarrassed by the leak, I do not think that he personally suffered a breach of privilege any more than the rest of us did, but the rest of us did suffer subsequent ones: one because the budget was dealt with outside this House, which I will come back to in a moment, but also the subsequent conduct of the Minister of Finance and the other ministers who spoke on April 27. In my view this prejudiced the opposition members of Parliament and thereby deprived us of privileges that we might otherwise have enjoyed.

Mr. Speaker: I have received notice of this. I made it very clear to the hon. member that I think he was completely right. At the time when I received the notice it may not have been the day to raise it.

I am having a bit of difficulty. This is all a long time ago, and I would hope that the member could come to the point of alleged breach of privilege. There may be other members who will want to rise, but I think we should get to that as soon as possible in the argument.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to do that. I just wanted to refresh the memory of some hon. members in relation to the events, because they are very important in determining the breach of privilege that occurred.

I submit that it arose out of the statements on April 27 in large measure. This is not the only basis, but I think the statements on that day are very important. If Your Honour looks at page 1005 of Hansard for that day, you will see the following statement of the Minister of Finance:

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): The premature release of details of the Budget appears to have resulted from a breach of trust, a wilful criminal act against which there can be no certain security.

I could read extensively, but I will not bore Your Honour or the House with the additional quotations.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to a thief being involved. The Minister of Justice referred to the fact that there had been a theft of budget documents. The Deputy Prime Minister made statements along the same line, and the Prime Minister himself alleged that there had been criminal activity involved in this case.

As a result of that, we all know that a series of charges were laid against, among others, Mr. Doug Small. We know that there was one conviction obtained of possession of a stolen document on a Mr. Brian McCuaig, but no other charges succeeded in court. All other accused were acquitted of any wrongdoing in connection with this case.

I wanted to read from the judgment of His Honour Judge Fontana. I submit that this is very relevant to the question of privilege before us because in his judgment the judge said:

> Since Mr. Small is charged, specifically, only with possession, his conduct in disclosing the contents of the budget on a telecast is not an issue before this court. Some might argue, for instance, that he could have fulfilled his journalistic obligations by revealing only the fact that budgetary secrecy had been breached, without revealing the details and contents of the document. Whether such bare-fact disclosure, without details, would have carried the credibility and impact appropriate to such a serious problem is doubtful. A society that recognizes the importance to the democratic process, of the free dissemination of news, should not be offended if that dissemination takes place with the measure of dramatic flair demonstrated by Mr. Small. Notwithstanding Professor McLuhan's observation, sometimes message overcomes medium. Indeed, Small's revelations on television and the resultant immediate response by the Minister of Finance, may well be viewed as having forestalled any real mischief with regard to the "Mutual Life" leak. Staff Sergeant Jordan raised this speculation early in his deliberations. Mr. Small's conduct in his subsequent dealings with the law enforcement authorities appears to have been exemplary.

He goes on talking about another case which I need not deal with. The hon. judge goes on to conclude:

> If budget confidentiality continues to be a matter of quasi-constitutional concern in this electronic, technological age, then it is for Parliament to address the issue promptly with appropriate specific statutory provisions.

He concludes with:

> There is no legal canon prohibiting the application of common sense. Based upon all of the foregoing considerations, I find that abuse of process has been made out in this case on a balance of probabilities. An order will go staying the further prosecution of these charges against all accused persons.

I submit that what happened is that we had a situation where these persons who are alleged to have committed wrongdoing had, at worst, stolen confidential information. There is a case in the Supreme Court of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member. I am impelled to raise a matter. I, of course, have read the judgment of the court, part of which has been cited to us by the hon. member.

Whatever was said that is being complained about, was that directed at any particular person?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, if Your Honour is referring to what was said in this House, I am saying yes, it was. It was directed at that time at Mr. Small or at the persons who supplied Mr. Small with the information.

Mr. Speaker: Were those people named in this Chamber? What we seem to be dealing with here is that the hon. member feels that what was said in this House ought not to have been said, especially in view of the judgment. When it was said, was it said and directed at these other individuals who were the subject of the prosecution?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, if you will hear me for a moment. I do not think I am complaining about what was said in terms of the individuals. I am complaining about in terms of our rights, and I am coming around to that in a second.

It is my submission that when the government—

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty I am having is that the hon. member is now looking at a court judgment ex post facto, after the event. The complaint is directed at statements made in this Chamber, which the hon. member says have affected his and other members' privileges. The question I am trying to make clear is when those statements were made, were they directed at any of the individuals who in fact became the subject of the prosecution afterward by name? Or, is it just an opinion on the part of a minister or ministers that whatever had caused the leak had been caused by somebody who had done something improper. That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. Milliken: I do not think that is something we can determine. I suspect and I think it is open to conjecture as to whether these comments were directed at Mr. Small whose name, after all, was known. He did appear on national television with the document. I submit that in the light of the events that followed, they clearly were directed at Mr. Small. We had the situation here where, you will recall, the police sergeant had resigned from this case because he refused to lay these charges—

Mr. Speaker: I am going to hear the hon. House leader in just a moment. I think most of us know the story. The hon. member is getting back into the case, but his complaint it seems to me stems from something that was said in this Chamber many, many months ago.

Mr. Small was not the only person who was involved in the prosecution, and the hon. member acknowledges that. I am having difficulty understanding how it can be a breach of the privilege, in other words how anyone in this Chamber had difficulty carrying out their duties because a minister said that a leak was or was not the consequence of theft or whatever other accusation is going to be made.

That is my difficulty and I would ask the hon. member to come exactly to the point and to shorten it up a bit.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I was just coming to that. That is what I have been trying to get to. The point is these charges were made against these persons—

Mr. Andre: Order. Get to the point of privilege.

Mr. Milliken: I am getting to it. If the government House leader will control his inner emotions—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I think on this issue there is very likely to be quite a debate as to whether it is privilege or not, but I will ask the hon. member to conclude his remarks because I am having trouble finding it.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear that what the government did was, knowing that there is a case in the Supreme Court of Canada which says the theft of confidential information is not an offence, make these statements. It said that there had been a criminal act here, when I submit that there may or may not have been. They proceeded to hush up the inquiry in this House on the basis that this matter was sub judice. There are answers given—

Mr. Speaker: I am going to hear the hon. House leader in just a moment.

The hon. member is saying that because there is a Supreme Court of Canada decision that some opinion expressed in this place that may be contrary to it is a breach of privileges of any member. That is taking the whole question much farther than I can go with the hon. member, but as I say, I will listen to the hon. member close his argument. I am having difficulty.

Mr. Milliken: I did not say that. I said that what happened was that in making those statements the government ought to have been aware of the decision of the Supreme Court. It made the statement. It said that there had been a criminal act, and I can quote chapter and verse on that.

As a result of those statements, charges were laid and then—

Mr. Andre: False.

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. The hon. member is taking a quantum leap here. That is a suggestion that because of something said here, charges were laid. That may be a matter of debate. But how can the hon. member lay that down as a factual basis for a question of privilege?

The hon. member just said that he knows.

Mr. Andre: Perhaps we could bring this to a close if he would cite the proper section of Beauchesne.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows I am having a great deal of difficulty with this. I am having difficulty because no matter what the complaint may be, I am having great difficulty finding it as a question of privilege.

I would ask the hon. member to conclude his argument.

Mr. Milliken: I have four immediate points to satisfy the government House leader as to how our privileges have been breached, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It is not a question of satisfying the government House leader. The question is whether you are satisfying the Chair.

Mr. Milliken: The constant interruptions from across the way make it difficult, Mr. Speaker.

First, our right of freedom of speech, one of our rights in this House, a privilege of all members, has been denied because we were not permitted to ask questions because this matter was placed before the courts. We were denied that opportunity—

Mr. Speaker: Please. That is not a question of denying a member's privilege. That is a rule of the House. That is a convention. While something is before the courts, especially in criminal matters, we do not allow questions here. We do not all it because it would offend against the rights of either the Crown or the defence. In the case at point, I remember very clearly being deeply concerned at the time because if questions had been asked here, if I had allowed those questions, it might very well have prejudiced the defence that was going on.

Mr. Milliken: Notwithstanding that, Mr. Speaker, I am submitting that if these charges had been properly considered and not laid, there would not have been that problem.

Second, our right to deal with the budget in this House first was denied because the budget was released on television, and I made that point on April 27, 1989.

Third, the statements by the Prime Minister, by the Minister of Finance and by other ministers in this House, that I could have quoted at length but have refrained from doing to save time, made it difficult, if not impossible, for the police to carry on their investigation without appearing—

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: This entire matter went through months in the courts. It has been determined. It does not seem appropriate to me to redebate it in the Chamber. It does not matter what I think about the rights or wrongs of it. The question is, we could, under the guise of a question of privilege, bring all kinds of things back into the Chamber.

I have got to tell the hon. member that I do not think there is a question of privilege there, and I am going to close it off right now.

BUDGET LEAK

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this could have been closed off by citing Beauchesne, paragraph 19(1), which states:

> A dispute arising between two Members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

Clearly on the question of the rules the hon. member knows, as he smirks at me from over there, that in fact—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I have made the ruling and I am not going to reopen the issue. If the hon. member wishes to rise on a point of order, but not on the same point of privilege, a point of order—

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, accusations have been made unfairly and allowed to be made to reopen an issue. The statement that led to this was a statement by the Minister of Finance that a criminal act had been committed. As the hon. member himself said, there was a plea of guilty to that. So not only was he wrong in terms of the rules as to what is privilege, he is wrong on the facts. He is wrong on both counts and should not have wasted 20 minutes of the House on this specious point of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my colleague was in the middle of a point of privilege. He was given an opportunity to present his case and then you indicated that the matter was over. Then you proceeded to hear the Government House Leader, in effect reopening the matter.

I would like the opportunity to make some very brief submissions on this point if in fact the matter is still open.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to help the hon. member. First of all, I insisted that the government House leader rose on a point of order, not the point of privilege. The ruling has been made.

If the hon. member wishes to help the House and the Chair on a point of order, I of course will hear him. The hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: In your submissions, Sir, you indicated that the court has dealt with the matter. As you know, it was a criminal court dealing with the criminal law. That court was not considering the conduct of ministers of the Crown and government accountability—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. The point I am making is that the matter has been dealt with by a court. Now, the suggestion is being made that somehow or other this matter ought to be all redebated in the House under the guise of a question of privilege. If the House wants to debate the matter further, that is the business of the House, but I am bound by what is or what is not a question of privilege.

I have had to say to my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands, who is a very good proceduralist, that no matter what merits his argument may have, in political terms or other terms, in my view it is not a question of privilege. It is no more appropriate for me to allow a question of privilege to go on, which is in the guise of reopening debate on some matter which, if it is to come in front of this House, should come in another way and it would not matter which side of the House it comes from.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's responses to three petitions.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL—FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, on prostitution and soliciting.

This is a short report which is a review of the legislation which was in effect. As we know, in most cities, the legislation was working well. However, in Toronto and Vancouver, it was not working quite so well. We have made only three recommendations.

We have also noted, since the prostitutes are usually victims of social injustice, child abuse, and so on, that they should not be further punished. We have recommended that social programs be set up to allow them to conduct a safer life-style.

We have made some recommendations because the police did want to identify these people and we have recommended changes to the Identification of Criminals Act.

I would like to table this report.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS—SIXTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the sixteenth report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, in relation to Private Members' Business.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce a Bill C-332, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is indeed an honour to present a bill to amend the Canada Elections Act, seconded by my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River.

The main goal of the bill is to lower the federal voting age to age 16. It seems to me that, in a country that enables young people to drive on our highways at age 16 and to enlist in the Armed Forces of Canada, it is certainly time that we give 16-year-olds the right to vote.

I must say that in the many times that I have spoken with youngsters of age 16, it certainly encouraged me to suggest that they are as well aware of the issues and the concerns facing Canada as many of their elders.

We look forward to consideration of this bill. I will be making an appeal to my hon. friends on the government benches, as well as my hon. colleagues in the Liberal Party, of course, to give this some consideration in terms of enabling it to be debated and referred to the appropriate committee. It would be nice, before the next federal election, to have 16-year-olds voting.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

OPPOSITION TO GST

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House a number of petitions signed by residents of my riding of Papineau—Saint-Michel who firmly oppose the Conservative government's new tax on goods and services.

Your petitioners strongly urge the members of the Liberal Party of Canada to do their utmost to prevent the adoption of this measure because it would do untold damage to low- and middle-income Canadians, not to mention the fact that it would make the tax load unduly unbearable and boost inflation, interest rates and unemployment throughout Canada.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is indeed an honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of citizens of Kamloops, Clearwater, Logan Lake, Chase, Westwold, Monte Creek and Monte Lake, as well as Red Lake and Savona, who are concerned that the Government of Canada is intending to impose the 7 per cent tax on the printed word.

I think this will make Canada the only country in the world that taxes literature. The petitioners are asking the government to reconsider this decision to tax reading material, particularly reading material for young children.

I have another petition to present which is topic indirectly related, on behalf of constituents of New Westminster, Vancouver, North Vancouver and Burnaby. The petitioners point out that they are against the goods and services tax. They point out a whole set of reasons why they oppose this tax and why they think this is the last tax we should be considering right now. They are asking the Parliament of Canada to defeat it, which in this case would mean the Senate.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, once again it is an honour to rise in the House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, and present four petitions with regard to the GST. Three of them state that, wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to re-affirm the historic principles embodied in tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulation.

The other petition states that the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax and to axe the tax.

GANNET ROCK LIGHTHOUSE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, from the residents of Carleton—Charlotte urging Parliament to maintain the current staffing of the Gannet Rock Lighthouse station.

The Gannet Rock Lighthouse station was built in 1831 and has been used as a navigational aide since that time. The residents of Grand Manan Island primarily depend very heavily upon this lighthouse. In terms of the environment, it is imperative that lighthouse be maintained. I am very proud and pleased to present this petition on their behalf.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, today it is my privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by residents of my riding who live in Petit Rocher, Robertville, Beresford, Nigadoo, La Plante and Pointe-Verte.

Your petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the new goods and services tax.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHT TESTING

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present a petition signed by Canadians from across the country who say that because we support Canada's aboriginal people's traditional use of their lands, and because we seek new Canadian initiatives of peace through common security and disarmament, and because the NATO and NORAD low-level flights disrupt the traditional society and tend to pre-empt peaceful and sustainable development in much of Canada, the undersigned residents of Canada respectfully call upon Parliament to join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Innu of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada, in opposing use of their lands for NATO and NORAD attack training flights.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by a number of people from Nova Scotia and Ontario that calls upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and to cause the government to cease with the proposal that will shift the tax burden onto ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

I should note that I am a bit reluctant to present this today because, of course, it is the increasingly widely spread and held opinion that Parliament is no longer legally constituted. However, in the interests of presenting this wisdom of the Canadian people, I shall waive that objection at this time.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it is my duty and honour to present two petitions today. The first is signed by residents of Prince Albert in my constituency, Red Deer, Alberta and Rosetown, Saskatchewan.

The petition calls on the government to see the folly of their ways with respect to tax reform and to bring in a fair taxation system rather than the goods and services tax which it has ramrodded through the House and is attempting to do through the Senate.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHT TESTING

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, the second petition which I present is signed by people from Winnipeg, Morden, Winkler, and other communities in southern Manitoba.

This petition calls on the government to have respect for the traditional way of life of aboriginal Canadians, to seek new initiatives in terms of common security and disarmament, and therefore to end low-level flights in the territories that traditionally are those of aboriginal Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to present two petitions today from constituents in my riding on different topics but both related to the GST.

So many constituents speak to me about their anxiety and concern about the government's proposed goods and services tax. The petitioners understand that despite government rebates they will be worse off after this tax comes into being. This petition asks the government to repeal the GST.

The other petitioners are very concerned about the government's tax of reading materials. They realize that we are at a great disadvantage with so many illiterate people in the country who must be encouraged in every way to learn to read and ask the government to repeal the GST on reading materials.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 298 and 307.

GOVERNMENT EXPOSITIONS CENTRE—EMPLOYEE BUYOUT

Question No. 307—Mrs. Gaffney:

Has the government bought out, or is it in the process of buying out, employees in the production department of the government's exposition centre and, if so (a) what number of employees are involved in the buyout (b) what are the conditions of the buyout (c) what is the cost of the buyout to the government?

Hon. Paul Wyatt Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): On April 30, 1990, the federal government accepted a proposal for buy-out of the exhibit production facility. The assets for the service have been purchased by LG Expositions Inc. These were purchased at a fair market value established by the government Crown Assets Distribution Group. There is no cost to the government as the assets were either purchased by the employee company or declared surplus through regular channels.

The new company was formed by a group of employees. Ten employees have agreed to join the new company. These employees received the usual government departure entitlements.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend acts in relation thereto, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am delighted to be addressing the House today on the occasion of third reading of Bill C-44, the Hibernia Development Project Act.

As I have had occasion to do previously in this House, I want to thank members both from my party and members opposite who have debated this bill but who have always supported the development of Hibernia.

They have supported it possibly for reasons the government proposed or possibly for additional reasons, and while the emphasis from time to time might have been different on the two sides, the bottom line on Hibernia has been co-operation. There has been a serious attempt within this House to examine carefully what is the best arrangement on the Hibernia project. Today, they have come together to work for the completion of this project. I thank them for that.

The Hibernia project goes back a long way. Some people who possibly saw the first activity on the Grand Banks have become not old men and women, but definitely people more experienced and in some cases possibly even cynical. I would suggest that this act today within this House will remove another portion, another facet, of the cynicism which I believe began to erode as we were able to sign the agreement in Newfoundland September 14 last.

It has been an eventful 10 days, and possibly something happened here that does not happen too often in this House. I want to go on public record to thank members of the Public Service, both from the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador.

As well, I thank the advisers of the companies that form the consortium. They have worked not hours, not days, not weeks, not even months, but literally years on this process. They worked not only from a professional point of view but also from a mandate that they were given from the different parties, relative to the agreements relating to Hibernia. They worked, I believe, in the best interests of our country. So it has been an eventful time.

I know this summer, even though it slipped by for most of us, the fact of the matter is that I saw men and women giving up much of their time, quite apart from the professionalism which we expect from them, to get this work done.

What has happened is that the bill, which was introduced last November, has had a very detailed process both in this House and in the negotiations which culminated in the signing of the document escrow and closing agreements on September 14. This event has locked in the business deal and is only subject to final approval by Parliament.

As has been noted, many of us had the pleasure of participating in the signing ceremony in St. John's together with a number of my federal colleagues, officials from the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador and members of the Hibernia consortium.

I also want to thank the Prime Minister. I do not do this only because he is Prime Minister or because he is my political leader. Many members in this House will know that in the post June 24 period there was much debate in our country as to what would be the state of federal-provincial relations.

Despite the rumours I would read in the newspapers or the commentary that I would see on television or hear on radio, the Prime Minister throughout that summer gave me, this process and this project not only his total support but also always kept his eye on the purpose of the Hibernia project. He described it himself when he said: "This is more than oil or barrels of oil. This relates to fairness and to dignity."

Hopefully, in some tangible measure, the Hibernia project will bring that not only to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador but to Canadians generally.

I do not want to be one of those politicians who, from time to time is accused of overstating the case, but I believe this event, this project, marks a major breakthrough for Canada's petroleum industry.

The Hibernia development project will contribute to the ongoing diversification of Canada's energy supply sources. The effects of this development will also be long lasting, not only for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, but for Canadians across the nation. We believe that Hibernia is only the first step in building the new skills, the expertise, and technology required to meet the challenges of frontier development.

I had occasion this summer to meet with some of the men who worked at the first oil well in Leduc, or what is known as Leduc No. 1, back in the last part of the 1940s, 1947-48. I am reminded of one particular gentleman, a farm boy from Saskatchewan in those days, who worked at Leduc. This gentleman told me about what happened on those days.

He told me, for example, that the night before Leduc was to come in, there were farmers and people from around the whole area along what are called section roads in the west, waiting for the events of the next day. He told me, as if it had happened yesterday, what Leduc No. 1 meant, not only to him personally, but to Alberta at that time.

We should remind ourselves that Alberta at one time had to come cap in hand to the government of Canada for help, and how today the province of Alberta benefits all of us not only by a secure oil supply—and we only have to take a look at events in the Persian Gulf to be reminded of that—but also Albertans have been contributing to equalization and the well-being of all Canadians for many, many years, partly because of the hard work of some people who possibly did not know what they were building back in the latter part of the 1940s.

He told me, for example, of the next wells that came in, the gushers and the problems they had from a technological point of view. He told me how they had to dig ponds to trap oil they had hit and which they did not know how to handle. In one area they recovered approximately one and a half million barrels hat way, literally by oil flowing down trenches into holding ponds.

That sounds primitive today, but it was real. It was from these humble beginnings that an oil industry was developed which today in world standards is seen as one of the very best.

I do not think that Canadians who really look at Hibernia and the risks that any of these large projects mean for all of us, that the risks of Hibernia in today's context are much different from what happened in Alberta in the latter 1940s.

I look at places like Stevanger in Norway and see what happened in that community in terms of servicing the offshore oil industry in the North Sea, or what happened in northern England or Scotland and the technology they developed. Too often as Canadians we take for granted for instance what the Dutch, or the Norwegians or some of the Pacific nations have been able to learn from these kinds of projects and that we as Canadians somehow will be left out.

I believe that Hibernia can be for all of us as Canadians that next frontier. I sincerely believe that. I do not think I have overstated the case. I would hope that for all of us that is what Hibernia will mean.

I spend a fair bit of my time time in Alberta because of my responsibilities. I have been meeting people time after time who have said to me: "Make Hibernia go". We want to see it completed because we believe it is going to help the energy industry of Canada. I thank them for that viewpoint as well in respect to this project.

While we will get some new skills, expertise, technologies from other countries obviously, we should not ever have the view that we have all the ideas. But we want to develop them for ourselves as well. I look forward to Hibernia doing that. We will develop engineering experience in the offshore that we should be able to market in other parts of the world. These are the kinds of spin-offs that we as a country have to examine.

Although the binding agreements have been finalized, they are being held in escrow by an independent third party until one remaining hurdle is cleared. That brings us to our task at hand today, the passage of Bill C-44.

Members of this government, along with many of our colleagues on the other side of the House, are very anxious to finalize this enabling legislation. There has been much debate over the matter of federal participation in the Hibernia project. It has been clear for some time that the Hibernia project is simply too costly and massive an undertaking to proceed without public support. In recognition of this in 1988 we joined the Government of Newfoundland and five private sector firms in signing a statement of principles to develop Hibernia. Bill C-44 will authorize the government to enter into legally binding agreements to fulfil its commitments made in the statement of principles.

This is also not unique. There is criticism from time to time about the so-called megaprojects but energy, generally speaking, is a megaproject. It is its very nature and while, yes, there has to be emphasis on smaller electrical projects—and I will be coming forward with programs on that later this year—I remind members that today as we look at the world around us, that because of oil and its development, we for example do not face the realities of our neighbour to the south who is now looking at importing 50 per cent of its oil and gas supplies. Surely with the long lead times it behoves us to move forward on these projects.

When Suncor came onstream did it make a lot of sense? One might have questioned the economics of it. Syncrude made more sense. I remember in 1979 , as Indian affairs minister, we were working on the Cold Lake project because there were a lot of native people involved. It makes sense today. Surely the frontier is a blessing, an opportunity that has been given to us as Canadians. We have not done anything to deserve it, nor have we done anything to put it there. It is our responsibility to use these resources not only for our benefit but for the larger community.

I want to explain the federal government's, that is the taxpayers' involvement, in this project and why we did it. More than $5 billion Canadian will be spent bringing Hibernia into production. Approximately $3 billion will be spent in Canada, including $1.6 billion for work to be done in the province of Newfoundland. In addition to the $5.2 billion in capital spending needed to bring Hibernia to production there will be a further $3.5 billion expenditure over the life of the project. This project, while extremely important for the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, is obviously a project that has national importance.

As was outlined in the statement of principles, the Government of Canada will provide the consortium with a cash contribution for 25 per cent of eligible pre-production capital costs up to a maximum of $1.04 billion. We will also guarantee loans for 40 per cent of those costs to a maximum of $1.66 billion. I want to tell hon. members that that is—and I want to use the word very specifically—a loan.

Yes, we could have gone the other way. We could have made it a Government of Canada and Government of Newfoundland project, but I hear criticism around this place that we should have done it all at the taxpayers' money. Then I imagine the governments would have been accused of exposing ourselves to too much risk. The risk is $5.2 billion then.

I ask members to look at this project very carefully, the loan, the provision we built into Hibernia on the lender risk sharing, as well as the pay-back depending on the price of oil. Surely members have to be realistic about whatever the price of oil will be when oil comes on in 1996 and then consider the period of time of the life of the field. It will have to be determined at that period of time what the return on investment is going to be, the ROI.

I ask members opposite if any one of us starts a business today can he or she guarantee for me 20 years hence what the return will be? Obviously there is a matter of financial return that we try to look at very carefully and the need to bring on a new source of supply. One always has to balance those two issues.

There has been some confusion in the press as to the true cost of the federal loan guarantees. Let me emphasize that the guarantees are a back stop, to be drawn upon only if the project revenue is insufficient to repay the debt. I can assure the House that the government will not agree to have provided these guarantees if it had any concern about the ability of the project to repay those loans.

Benefits emanating from the development of Hibernia for all Canadians are going to be substantial. Hibernia will play an important role in enhancing Canada's oil supply. I will comment further on that in a moment.

The project establishes a new frontier for Canada. It will diversify Canada's oil supply and offset the expected decline in conventional light oil production from western Canada. With the production of 110,000 barrels per day, Hibernia will account for approximately 12 per cent of Canada's light oil production by the year 2000.

Very often Canadians forget the matter also of the type of oil we are going to get. I am concerned about the reduction or decline of the light oil production in the western sedimentary basin. What are those reserves? That is why we have to move into in situ oil, for example. That is why we need the Lloydminster upgrader and use the heavy oils, even with the differentials in price. That is why we have to seriously look at how to plan the next projects relating to the oil sands and what are our projects for northern Canada. These are our opportunities because these are resources given to Canadians, I say, by a divine hand.

Out of this comes another question. People say: "Well, yes, you are going to get the 110,000 barrels, but it is all going to go to the United States". That is an interesting concept because the 110,000 barrels will be bid on and, most likely at this present point in time, they would go to the United States.

There is an issue relating to how much to change refining capacity to refine that oil because of its heavy waxing quality. Are we better off for example to get other oil, offsetting this 110,000 barrels with offshore oil which we get through Portland, Maine and which we send to various refineries in eastern Canada up to Montreal?

Those are the types of questions which I think logic drives one to examine from the best economic position one can get.

I also hear from certain refiners in eastern Canada that with some modification obviously they will have to look at it from a financial point of view. There might be in an opportunity to bid on Hibernia oil. I would suggest that the marketplace is the best place to examine that issue.

The same thing could be said about Cohasset–Panuke, which I personally hope will come into being before the end of this mandate of this government. It is a light distillate. There is tremendous interest in that type of product. Even though that is a relatively small project by international standards or even Canadian standards, how best do we develop that resource so that the people of Nova Scotia will get some benefits and through that benefit the people of Canada?

The Hibernia project will dramatically bolster Newfoundland's economy. We saw a bit of that even when we had a reception. I imagine there was even some bolstering of the hospitality economy in Newfoundland during that day. I dare say that possibly that activity has even continued beyond the time I was there.

My good friend opposite talks about people ready to work building a road into Great Mosquito Cove. I hear complaints of people who say: "I want to work. Will I get hired?". So often around here we look at the large issues. What we sometimes have to do is step back and look at what is happening in the bush. What is happening in the muskeg? What is happening at the coast? What is happening to people? That is why I am excited about Hibernia.

Every dollar invested in this project will yield several dollars in primary and secondary benefits to Newfoundland. It is estimated that approximately 10,000 person–years of work will be created in Newfoundland during the construction phase. Perhaps even more important, over the long term new technical skills will be developed in the province's workforce, as well as that of other provinces, that will position us to take advantage of future offshore development in other areas of Canada.

Yes, I believe that Hibernia will rank in terms of names and recognition with places like Leduc. People will come to know Terra Nova, Ben Nevis, and Cohasset–Panuke. This is Canada. This is our opportunity. I am pleased that so many members opposite recognize these facts and with the strong support I have had from my own caucus.

In early 1989 the Hibernia consortium undertook to redesign the top side facilities of the project. The main support frame was eliminated. The number of modules was reduced from 20 smaller units to five supermodules. As a result of this redesign, the industrial benefits provisions outlined in the statement of principles were renegotiated in a way that will provide significant benefits for all of Canada.

The agreement goes beyond the statement of principles as a result of the consortium's commitment to undertake an additional two million person–hours of metal fabrication work in Canada. These new commitments are approximately to two supermodules, and this should be kept in mind.

I say to hon. members that as they evaluate this project for the last time in this House they should remember that the governments pursued a regional benefits objective package for Newfoundland and Labrador and wanted it expanded not only to that province but to the larger Canadian communities.

As a consequence the Hibernia consortium has agreed to fabricate one of the supermodules in Newfoundland and will use its best efforts to build a second supermodule in Canada.

What is the effect of all of this? The impact of Hibernia on the province, as we said, will be substantial. However, I remind members that when the first projects in the North Sea came into being—and nobody today questions North Sea—the people of Norway and the United Kingdom realized approximately 35 per cent of the expenditure for domestic placing of contracts within those two countries. It was about 35 per cent.

In the statement of principles we were shooting for Canadian content in the area of 45 per cent. With the changes in the negotiations which are now incorporated in this bill and the agreements we have in escrow right now, it will be in the area of 55 per cent to 60 per cent.

I believe that Canadians will deliver. Time after time I hear in this House questioning: "Can we do it"? We have done it before. The oil industry has shown it can do it and it will do it again. We will do it with Hibernia as well.

Those are the facts. As a result, in every region of our country plants and industries are poised to meet the engineering and construction demands which will flow from the project.

Let me be very practical. This summer in my own backyard there was a looping of the trans-Canada pipeline. That is not very important, I imagine, in terms of larger Canadian energy projects and in terms of the length of time spent on the work they were doing. However, it was important because not only did it bring us new capacity which we so desperately need if we are going to move gas out of the gas fields but it had impact in the Manitoba economy.

Fellows got into their half-ton trucks at four o'clock in the morning and drove 80 miles to work. They were not concerned about the 80 miles. They were not even concerned about four o'clock. They wanted to go to work. These were farm fellows and people from the urban community.

Economic activity driven this way works. Canadians have always responded. If I can be very personal, my first exposure to this whole process was after I had graduated from high school and I was working for a car dealership in my home town. The trans-Canada pipeline was going through about 10 miles from our home town. At that time there were fellows there from Alberta and Saskatchewan and, granted, there were a lot of Oklahomans and Texans around. However, that was the year we sold more cars in that dealership than we had for many years before and would for many years after. Those are the practical impacts, the spinoffs.

I remind members—maybe there is even a chuckle or two—of what happens in this House with these some time almost prosaic kinds of discussions. Back home people know what this means.

Another point I want to mention concerns the environmental impact of energy production and energy transportation. I am aware of those impacts. I am committed, as is the industry, to ensuring that environmental considerations are integrated into the government's energy policy process. Environmental assessments are a crucial component of the government's over-all evaluation of any energy project. All such projects are subjected to detailed environmental scrutiny and review designed to minimize potential adverse consequences.

The government has made it clear that projects will not proceed if they are not acceptable in environmental terms. The Hibernia project has undergone a rigorous environmental public review which provided an opportunity for all interested parties to voice their concerns and have those concerns addressed. Based on the review, the Canada-Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board decided in 1986 that the Hibernia project could go ahead once the recommendations of the environmental assessment panel were adequately addressed. This requirement is being satisfied and at the same time my officials have assessed the environmental implications of the changes to the project design and the movement of the gravity base construction site to Trinity Bay.

I want to assure the House that the government is satisfied that all adverse environmental impacts have been addressed and, further, that all effects identified are insignificant or cannot be mitigated.

As I close, one point that I would like to emphasize is that it will give Canada and Canadians an unprecedented opportunity to develop a higher level of technical expertise in the development of the offshore energy source.

The design and construction of the Hibernia project will provide a wide array of important new business opportunities. These opportunities should be made available to Canadians. I know that the project will challenge the skills of Canadians and take them to the leading edge of technology.

Companies that meet the high standards demanded by Hibernia will be in a position to play an even larger role in future offshore projects in Canada and around the world. I find it exciting that through the joint initiative of two governments and the private sector, enormous economic benefits from Hibernia are now upon us.

I know this is a partisan place, but I want to say very clearly that for those of us who came from western Canada and even from a province like Manitoba where our production of oil is very small relative to Canadian production, when the western accord was signed, it was important for us because it was another plank in the long struggle for prairie provinces which, when we entered Confederation, had not been deemed worthy of ownership of our resources. That has been a long struggle.

It was a struggle which culminated in 1930 with the Natural Resources Transfer Act. There is still unfinished business in that bill. It relates to the satisfaction of Indians and claims that our native people have, which we in western Canada have to fulfil and complete.

Just as that was in my mind a step forward in bringing fairness to western Canada, who knows what would have happened had the Natural Resources Transfer Act of 1930 not taken place? Who knows?

The same thing applies to the Atlantic accord. I know my hon. friend opposite—and I want to end on this personal note—will understand when I speak of a man who came from Ireland, became a Canadian and was an institution in his own outport on the western coast of Newfoundland, the late Dr. Hugh Twomey.

Dr. Twomey was minister of health when I became—

An hon. member: He was a good Tory.

Mr. Epp: He was a good Tory. They are all good Tories.

I remember when I met with the late Dr. Twomey as minister of health, we were discussing in September and October of 1984 how together we were going to implement the Canada Health Act.

As the hon. Speaker would know, there was some controversy about that act and how it might impact on the delivery of health services in the provinces.

I had visited the province of Nova Scotia in the morning, Prince Edward Island in the afternoon and Newfoundland in the evening. Then I wanted to return to Ottawa. There were a number of issues I wanted to discuss with the minister of health of the day.

I do not know what kind of a day he had had, but he did not want to discuss the Canada Health Act. He wanted to discuss everything else. Never have I heard more stories about Newfoundland and never did I have a better evening.

What I remember that evening—it was late by the time we left—Dr. Twomey got up. In the small gathering, he said: "Jake, you wanted to discuss the Canada Health Act. I did not want to, and that is rather evident."

But he said: "What I want to tell you is this: Go back to Ottawa. With the signing of the Atlantic accord, I believe sincerely that the people of Newfoundland and Labrador will not only make their living based on our traditional activities of fishing and making a living from the resources we have in place at the present time, that the Atlantic accord will give us an opportunity not only to develop the economy for our people, but also improve the conditions of their daily life."

He said: "I believe that just as things changed in Alberta, Hibernia can contribute to the development of our province. We will become not simply the recipients of equalization, but possibly some glorious day we will be in a position where we can pay other Canadians for the years of equalization that we received from them." He finished his little speech that evening with one statement which remained with me as we discussed Hibernia. He said simply this: "Mr. Minister, go back to Ottawa"—in this case it was the Canada Health Act—"and do for Newfoundland what you would do for other provinces and we will trust you".

I believe that it was not my work; I was the recipient of the Atlantic accord. It was the vision of the Prime Minister to change a long history, a history based not only on changes that were needed, whether in one province or the other. In this case it happened to be Newfoundland's turn. I want to thank the Prime Minister for the vision and for the reality that this bill brings to us today.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Longueuil, on a point of order?

Mr. Leblanc: I have a question for the minister, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would refer the hon. member to Standing Order 43 which says that the first two speakers—the minister and the first member speaking in reply to the minister—have unlimited speaking time and that there are no questions or comments after their speeches. The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, as the associate energy, mines and resources critic and as a Newfoundlander, indeed as a Canadian, and even as a Liberal member of Parliament, I am delighted to respond to the excellent presentation given by the hon. minister. It gives me an opportunity to put together a number of things that have been said in the House by members on both sides and both ends of the House, an opportunity really for the public perhaps to see the entire package as it started, some of the snags that we have had, some of the comments we have had in the House, some of the difficulties we are going to have in the future and perhaps some of the prognostications with respect to what this project may bring, mostly on the good side.

Incidentally, may I welcome you to the chair. It is nice to see you in the chair and I look forward to more times with you as the Assistant Deputy Speaker.

However, Mr. Speaker, to continue, and to put this in a perspective of time, when I first heard of what has become Hibernia, I was a young lieutenant in the navy. I drove a small Renault car. I could fill the tank for less that $5. You could buy a four-bedroom house for $15,000 and you could have a sumptuous meal in a restaurant for less than $35, including tip. That was a long time ago and a lot of things have happened in the interim.

What I would like to do today, in the capacities that I mentioned and on third reading of this bill, is address myself to the package that has become Hibernia. I want to speak to the background and I want to give a more detailed description of what it is. I think there is a general combination of misunderstanding and, if not a lack of knowledge, a thirst for knowledge of exactly what this project is going to do.

I want to speak to some of the reservations regarding the project, in general for megaprojects and this one in particular, many of which were raised in the House. I want to go into some detail regarding the employment opportunities and the potential that this project has both in the short term and in the long term. Then I want to wrap up with a summary of the project's commitment to Canada. I will parallel in many respects the comments that were made by the hon. minister, but I am delighted to report that my comments are not repetitive in the sense that they are the same as his, but if you talk about Hibernia, it does follow the same general pattern. Therefore, for the organizational sense of those listening, that will be the structure.

To begin with, Hibernia P15 was the sixtieth well drilled in the Newfoundland and Labrador offshore area. Between 1980 and 1984, in eight of nine delineation wells—a delineation well is when you drill out to see how far the resource extends—they encountered significant quantities of oil, to their entire satisfaction. Even at that time, the recoverable reserves were estimated to be between 525 million and 650 million barrels.

In May 1985, Mobil Oil Canada, on behalf of the Hibernia consortium, submitted economical and environmental impact studies to the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador. These studies in turn led to public hearings and to the release of a document entitled: The Report of the Hibernia Environmental Assessment Panel in January 1986. A downstream development plan, including a benefits plan, was submitted to the Canada-Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board—and for future reference I will just call it the offshore petroleum board—in September 1985 and subject to the resolution of certain technical, employment and industrial benefit issues, that I will speak to later, was given the Offshore Petroleum Board approval in general in June 1986.

Two years later, in July 1988, the consortium—that is, the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador, plus the oil consortia—signed the Hibernia statement of principles which established the general terms and conditions under which the development would take place. As an aside, I was in the Hotel Newfoundland on that particular day and I must confess it was a day of great jubilation and a day of great hope. While we have had to wait a little longer than was promised for that, I believe we would agree, it has been worth the wait.

Subsequent to the signing of the statement of principles, as the hon. minister mentioned, the platform topside facilities were redesigned from, I think, 22 smaller modules to five supermodules. This revised plan was submitted to the Offshore Petroleum Board in March 1990 and was approved in August of this year.

Since the signing of this statement of principles, all parties have been negotiating to finalize the legal agreements. The agreement announced on September 14, again in another atmosphere of great hope and jubilation in fact that this was more progress in what hopefully will soon be the final enabling legislation for this project, allowed the project to proceed. All the agreements, including those related to royalties, financing, industrial benefits and related matters have been finalized, and as the hon. minister said, placed in escrow pending passage of Bill C-44—that is what we are in the process of doing now—by the Parliament of Canada.

What happened on September 14? The three parties entered into an initial engineering development and project agreement using the offshore development fund from which they borrowed $95 million. This was made available to the consortium to cover its costs until parliamentary approval is obtained and the agreements are formally executed. This will happen when Bill C-44 goes through the Parliament of Canada and, hopefully, that is not long away. At that time any moneys advanced will be repaid and by this mechanism the way has been cleared to allow the project to proceed immediately.

The Hibernia development plan envisages a concrete platform, 83 development wells, a crude oil loading system, sub-sea facilities and three specially built shuttle tankers of 120,000 tonnes. The platform will be designed to produce a maximum of 150,000 barrels of oil per day and withstand harsh environmental forces, including the impact of icebergs. Storage facilities for 1.3 million barrels of oil will be provided within the platform base itself, representing storage for approximately two weeks of production. It is estimated that an average of 110,000 barrels of oil per day will be expected during the peak production period.

The pre-production capital expenditures are estimated to total approximately $5.2 billion and that will be spent between 1990 and 1996. A further $3.3 billion in capital expenditures will be incurred after production begins. After production begins, the operating phase expenditures are estimated to total around $10 billion over the projected 18 to 20-year production life of the oil field.

Two major project contracts have been awarded, one for the engineering and construction of the gravity based structure, and the other for the project management and topside engineering. As I have said many times in the House, and I am very proud to say, the work on the construction and assembly site near Bull Arm and Great Mosquito Cove is expected to begin now.

The expenditures and resulting oil revenues will boost the economies in all parts of Canada. Although there is no question that Newfoundland will benefit from this perhaps more than any other province, Hibernia will provide business opportunity to shipyards, equipment suppliers, cement producers, and hundreds of other businesses throughout the country. Canadian goods and services will account for, as the minister said, 60 per cent to 65 per cent of the project expenditure during construction, and over 65 per cent during its operation. This is double what happened in previous megaproject examples. Most of the people employed during the construction will be Canadian residents, Newfoundlanders, and it is expected that most workers during the operations will be the same.

As part of the introduction, I think I can safely say, and I think there is general agreement, that the Newfoundland offshore opportunity that I am discussing here presents new challenges, not just in Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces, but to the whole Canadian petroleum industry. Hibernia will meet these challenges and will put Canada, Newfoundland, and Labrador on the leading edge of offshore technology.

At this point in time, I want to bring up the subject of the controversy that this megaproject has conjured up. I am not surprised. I think anyone who has been involved in a megaproject before should not be surprised. You are dealing with a lot of money. You are dealing with technological advances. You are dealing with state of the art technology, and you are dealing with human factors. You are dealing with bruised egos. You are dealing with the not-invented-here syndrome. You are dealing with people who are competing for contracts, companies that are competing for opportunities, and people who are competing for jobs. The stakes are high. It is a big poker game, and in big poker games, in big games of chance, the emotions are high, the stress is high. The arguments are big and long and go into the night. This is what we have here, because we are dealing with something that will happen 25 years from now.

Look at what happened last year in the world. People were saying that Germany would never unify. That was a year ago and it happened yesterday. The uncertainty in dealing with the world today and one year from now is complex and there are so many surprises. Good heavens, 25 years from now is very uncertain. We are dealing with risk and uncertainty. When dealing with risk and uncertainty—and I have been trained in that area—one has to make certain assumptions and you have to take certain chances. This is what is happening in the Hibernia project.

I want to talk about two aspects of this. The first is the technological advances. The hon. minister said not too long ago that politicians were sometimes accused of overstating the case. I will quote a gentleman who is fairly well known, C. K. Chesterton. He who said that there are times and circumstances when it is necessary to exaggerate in order to reveal the truth.

The enduring truth today in the growth of technology is undeniable. I just want to give some indication of this and I appreciate that there are a lot of people here who are trained in this business, but equally there are a lot of people who are trained in the arts and humanities side. I think it would be perhaps instructive to give some indication of what we are dealing with, the sheer range of technology in the world today.

We are probing phenomena that are as small as 10–15 centimetre. That is a hundred thousandth of a billionth of a centimetre. We can deal with things so small that there are systems in the world today that will allow one to etch a million angels on the head of a common pin. That is mind-boggling. I cannot really conceive that, but it can happen. That is on the small side.

On the large side we are dealing with a universe the edge of which, we are told, is 10 with 23 zeros, 1023 miles away. If I am right, that is 10,000 billion, billion miles away. So, we have this minute capability in a universe that is just endless.

It is similar with time. We are studying phenomena so short-lived that today it occurs in 10–23 of a second. By contrast, our astronomers and our astrologers tell us that the universe is 20 billion years old.

The sheer scale of explorable nature has burst beyond yesterday's wildest assumptions and imaginations. No where is this better illustrated than the world of the computer, and the computer is a very large part of this system that we are dealing with.

It was recently noted that the Industrial Revolution increased productivity by a factor of 100, while the microchip has raised data base technology by a factor of one million. Today a single microchip has the capacity of one million transistors and, it is estimated that in about 10 years time, it will have the capacity of one billion transistors. Perhaps I could be more illustrative on this point.

In 1960 the computing capacity that would run the battle control system of a modern warship would fill the area the average living room. That was in 1960. By 1980, 20 years later, it could probably fit on the top of two desks. Today, it can fit in one of those very razor-thin briefcases. The cost in 1960 was around $5 million. In 1980, it was around $100,000, and today, about $1,000 or less.

It was estimated that if the automobile industry had done what the computer industry had done in the past 30 years, a Rolls-Royce would cost $2.50 and would get two million miles to the gallon. That is the kind of strides that have been made.

Again, we talk about $5.2 billion and $3.3 billion. We throw them around. What is the difference between $5.2 billion and $5.1, or $5.3? As politicians, program managers, and business administrators, we use these terms. I can imagine $1 million, I can see it over there in the corner, in $1 bills or $100 bills. But $1 billion is very difficult for me to conceive, so I sat down last night and I tried to work it out in a metaphysical sense so I could appreciate what $1 billion would mean. This is what it means to me in two senses, in time and in space.

If I took $100 bills when I was 40 years of age and started counting them, one every second, I would be 70 years of age before I counted $1 billion. In terms of space, if you took $100 bills and put them end to end and went around the equator, do you know how many times you could go around, Mr. Speaker? Two hundred and seventy-fives times, with $100 bills end to end. That is what we are dealing with. And we are dealing with 5.2 of those in the design and construction phase, and 3.3 of them in the production phase. Mind-boggling, Mr. Speaker, absolutely mind-boggling.

There is another pragmatic thought which is relevant to the subject because it gives some indication of the kind of technology we are dealing with today in this project and why there are so many uncertainties, and why there are criticisms and rightly so.

• (1240)

Ninety per cent of the body of knowledge that exists in the world today has been created since I left high school. It will double again before I become eligible for the old age pension. That gives some indication of how rapidly the world of knowledge is expanding. Something is designed today and by the time it is produced, it is out of date. If it is not totally outdated, it is in the process of becoming so. Whether it is one year or ten years, as in the case of ships that I am familiar with, it is designed for something and, by the time it is built, it is not the same state of the art.

There is something more disturbing perhaps, and I am sorry to have to report this, but I hear it from university professors and presidents of universities and I feel I stand on good ground when I make this statement.

There is no doubt that the technological leadership in any country has become a strategic factor in determining the economic performance of a country, a region or a province. In this regard, I regret to say that Canada lags behind its industrial competitors. Atlantic Canada, in particular, lags behind other provinces in its per capita basis in production and retention of human resources. In Canada, on a per capita basis, we employ one-half the number of engineers and scientists that our competitors employ. Let me talk about one aspect of which I am very familiar.

Although we are the world's largest fish exporter, it was suggested at a recent conference that Canada's fisheries are now where Europe's were 15 years ago. Think about what our fishing industry could be doing without this technological lag. Think about the kinds of fisheries policies we could have without this impediment. Think about what addressing this problem alone could do for Newfoundland and all its communities, none of which are unaffected by the fisheries.

We are dealing with technology, sophistication, and cost that it is almost impossible for any one but the totally brilliant to be able to grasp, integrate, conceptualize, work out assumptions to cope with the uncertainties, do the risk analysis and to manage.

I would like to address some of the difficulties that my colleagues have had with this project. Members from the NDP expressed concerns about the amount of money invested and the risk that we are taking as a government. They have also expressed some concerns about the environment. In fact, I was very upset to hear that they were not really for this project. I hope when they campaign in Newfoundland, whenever the next election is going to be, they will remember that they did not support this project. I hope it has developed, at that point in time, where a lot of these uncertainties have disappeared and the early benefits of this project will be evident, not just for Newfoundland or eastern or Atlantic Canada, but indeed for the whole of Canada.

I had to satisfy myself before I spoke in support of this bill that there had been studies done, assumptions made, and money spent on the environmental aspects of this. I, too, have concerns about the fishing industry. One cannot go into this with blindfolds on. I satisfied myself that, yes, there is always risk, but I believe the risk has been minimized. I would like to tell you about what I know about this particular aspect. It is an uncertainty and it it something that has been discussed at length in the House. I am speaking now about the environmental aspect.

The governments of Canada and Newfoundland, the main partners in this, decided that an environmental impact on the Hibernia project should be reviewed by a joint federal-provincial environment assessment panel. Mobil Oil, the head honcho in this, representing the Hibernia consortium, conducted environmental studies and they produced an environmental impact statement. These documents were reviewed publicly by the joint federal-provincial panel at hearings held throughout Newfoundland. In December, 1985, almost five years ago, the panel concluded that the Hibernia project should proceed. That was not the end of it, it went on from there. The Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office, called FERO for short, recently reviewed the 1986 panel report and, they concluded that the report was prepared in accordance with the environmental assessment and review process, EARP for short, and they were happy with it. The Canada-Newfoundland

Offshore Petroleum Board, I will refer to it as the offshore petroleum board for short, reviewed the Hibernia development plan, which was submitted in December of 1985, and it approved the development plan in June of 1986.

Mobil Oil then submitted the development plan update in March, 1990. The offshore petroleum board decided that the update constituted a revised development plan requiring board approval. It then carried out a detailed environmental review of the update and submitted, to federal and provincial ministers, this update. This was then reviewed under the EARP guidelines by the Canadian oil and gas lands administration as the lead initiating agency.

The whole point of this is that this review was co-ordinated with other departments, it got public input, and there was prepared an initial screening decision, as required by the EARP guidelines. The Canadian oil and gas lands administration concluded, and here is the kicker, that there are no significant environmental effects identified at this stage of the project review. It did not say that there were none, it said that there were "no significant", and that was enough to let the project proceed.

Now there have been other concerns expressed in this House with, perhaps, the same magnitude as those concerns expressed about the environmental impact of this particular project. These had to do with why we have to settle for 25 per cent of this and 40 per cent of that and the totality, even of 65 per cent Canadian input in the whole project.

I was somewhat disappointed that this deficiency or apparent deficiency, or concern, was not really addressed and I think it was not addressed because time did not permit. We were speaking on motions, amendments to motions, and amendments to amendments to motions, and I think sometimes the impact of the concern gets lost in the procedure. I am not great on procedure myself, Mr. Speaker. Procedure is all good stuff and I know that you are very learned in this area. I am interested in the substance and I have hon. members, such as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who instruct me on procedure. I regret the hon. member is not here today so if I mess up in procedure, you will have to forgive me.

I would like this bill to leave the House of Commons after third reading with, if not the sort of political support of those members who are somewhat recalcitrant about this project, at least with their support for the spirit of the project. They may vote against it at third reading but I would like to believe that they have the spirit. This is the reason I am addressing their concerns. I could gloss over them, I could leave them out, I could speak only about the good things about this project, but I am a realist, as I said yesterday, and I want to speak to this. I want it on the record and I want them to hear the concerns and why we get 65 per cent and not 100 per cent Canadian content.

I want to talk about two things; materials, that is the raw materials, the steel and the concrete bars, and the equipment, that is the generators, the man-made equipment. These are two separate items. Let me talk about the materials first.

The price of the materials required for this project will total around $300 million. That is a lot of money. These materials include such things as steel plate, pipe and piping, casing, cement, wire, cable, valves and instrumentation. These are the raw materials for this project. More than 30 per cent, by value, of the steel plate and tubulars required for the structure is available from mills throughout Canada, that is the availability factor.

In addition, Canadian suppliers are capable of producing smaller diameter well casing which accounts for about 50 per cent of the smaller casing requirements. Seventy-five per cent of valve requirements can be supplied by Canadian sources. However, there are some limitations. Heavy duty ball valves may not be available in Canada and the ballast water and other sea water piping, fittings and valves, used on the platform will likely be made of titanium or austenitic stainless steel which is currently, to my knowledge, not available in Canada.

I think the important thing here is that the Canadian supply capability in instrumentation—these are the valves, dials, readouts and printouts that we get—varies widely, according to the item. The average capability is estimated at between 65 per cent and 75 per cent.

We range on availability in Canada right now between 30 per cent and 75 per cent of the materials needed for this project.

I think, Mr. Speaker, you have heard a couple of members say in this House that the project will require about 100,000 tonnes of cement which will be supplied by plants in Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, as well as Newfoundland, and approximately 50,000 tonnes of reinforcing bar and prestressed cable for the precast concrete that will be needed. That can be supplied by Canadian companies all across the country.

That is the limitation in materials. Again, as I said yesterday, I am familiar with this because I have been involved in shipbuilding and construction of major projects. You cannot get all of the materials from one country, no matter which country you build it in. You have to go offshore to buy areas of expertise that other countries have become experts in. I see nothing wrong with that. This is part of the international order.

I would like to talk about equipment now, Mr. Speaker. These are ready built equipment, motors, generators and that sort of thing. Again, in dealing with the Hibernia project, we are looking at another $300 million. I will give you some examples. Some of the equipment will be pressure vessels, compressors, pumps, motors, electrical units, drilling, well equipment and that sort of category.

While some of this highly specialized equipment will have to be imported, the Canadian industry throughout the country has demonstrated the capability to produce a wide range of the equipment required by Hibernia. This has been done because we have been involved, albeit not in the same magnitude that we anticipate in the future, in offshore development. I told you that when it started, life was simpler and 25 years does a lot to a number of things, but it has allowed us to produce and to develop in this area. Had we started today, I would suggest that we would be back to where the Norwegians and the Brits were, with 30 per cent and maybe even 25 per cent.

We have companies in western Canada, for example, who can supply drilling equipment, such as rotary tables, oil and gas processing equipment, pressure vessels, separators, storage tanks, heat exchangers and transformers, as well as some types of control systems. Why? Because they have been involved in the oil and gas system since the Leduc days in the 1940s. So it is only reasonable that they can do that. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I have a friend living in western Canada who is in the business of supplying this equipment and I have known him for 25–30 years. He was at it from the time I first knew him.

Companies in central Canada can be suppliers for such items as valves, pumps, compressors, switch gear and power generation units at which they are very good because of their industrial capacity. These are standard industrial items.

Companies in Atlantic Canada are potential suppliers of pumps, smaller valves, tanks and pressure vessels, because as you are aware, Mr. Speaker, we do have some shipyards in the Atlantic provinces. In fact, we are very good at that business. So these would be fallouts from that particular aspect of the industry.

Again, to summarize, it is estimated that between 40 per cent to 60 per cent of the components of the drilling package in the equipment area could be manufactured in Canada, indeed across Canada; from western Canada all across this great country.

Canadian capability in sub-sea equipment is limited, particularly to assembly of units, because most of the major components have been developed in the United States and in the U.K.. They have been in the offshore oil drilling business a lot longer than we have been. It is logical and understandable.

Generally speaking, current domestic capability in sub-sea equipment is estimated at between 30 per cent to 40 per cent. I think the point here is that as we jump into the pool and get ourselves concerned about draining the pool or the alligators, we will develop this. There will be mistakes made along the way. There will be people who will be hurt. There will be contracts that will overrun in cost and time. I can almost guarantee that. But that is the nature of megaprojects.

I do not like to dwell on my personal experience but I will have to report to you, Mr. Speaker, that 10 years ago I was the project director, not the program manager, but the project director of the Canadian Frigate Program. Members would know that we are talking of the same magnitude as the $5.2 billion for Hibernia.

I experienced in that a lot of uncertainty, a lot of difficulties in the very concept of a patrol frigate. There were those who said we do not need them. There were those who said we need bigger and fewer, and those who said we need more and less capable. The minister has to make a judgment. I have to make a judgment. My colleagues, everybody in the House here, civil servants who support the minister, people like myself and all those involved with this have to make a judgment. This is judgmental.

There is no computer that says you are doing it right, or you are doing it wrong. There is no computer that will guarantee that the minister, if he is still here as the minister two or three years from now, will have to get up in the House and answer some embarrassing questions. I can almost guarantee that will happen and I might be the person asking them, but that is part of the system.

I want to guarantee anybody who is here and listening to me that that always happens with a project of this kind. The way not to make it happen is not to do the project and then you will not make any mistakes. I do not operate that way. I am prepared to take a risk. God knows, I have made many mistakes in my life, I will probably make some more, and I can guarantee that there will be mistakes on this project, but let us get on with it and let us get it moving.

Mr. Speaker, I know it is getting close to one o'clock, but I want to get into an area now that is of vital concern to every member in this House. We know the employment situation in Canada. I am not making political hay, but the unemployment figures are up a little bit. They are terrible in Newfoundland and I am not saying this for political reasons. I am saying this as a lead in to the employment opportunities and the training opportunities that are under way. People call me on the telephone. Last night, when I got back from a reception after the House closed down, I got a call from one of my constituents. He said, "Can you tell me what is going on with Hibernia. How do you get a job? When are we going to start training for this?"

We do have foresight in Newfoundland. We have a thing called the Cabot Institute, a great institution that has graduated 20,000 people since the mid-sixties. In fact, just two hours ago I spoke with the president, Dr. Linda Inkpen and she indicated to me some of the things that are going on. We have been training people for a year and some to have the skills in Newfoundland and indeed in eastern Canada that are specifically related to the Hibernia project and in some of the spin-off areas like hotel management, hospitality management and just general business management of a kind that could look after some of the spin-off areas that would emanate from Hibernia.

Again, Mr. Speaker, one other point before I get into the detail of this. I have to make this point passionately. I am a believer of hands-on information. Something means more to me if I go to see it, touch it and get a feeling for it than if somebody tells me about it or I read it in a book. I live in Newfoundland. As I stand in this House this morning, there are 42,000 people that do not have jobs. There are 42,000 people that get up in the morning and have no place to go, except perhaps the post office to pick up their mail and chat with their colleagues. Regrettably some of the post offices are closing down, so they do not even have that to do these days.

Mr. Speaker, you and I have a job, and I expect we have always had a job. We have not experienced that. I would suggest that—you say, maybe not. If you have, then to experience the feeling of waking up in the morning and not having a job, I am told, is a terrible feeling and there are 42,000 people like that in Newfoundland. They speak to me. A lot of them are in my riding.

This project, to me, the centrefold of this project—if it were a Playboy magazine or a magazine of any kind, an automobile magazine—the centrefold is really the number of jobs and the hope that stems from these jobs.

Mr. Speaker, you would probably want to call it one o'clock and I will continue after Question Period.

TRIBUTE TO LOUISE BRISSETTE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, this week is National Family Week and therefore a wonderful opportunity for me to pay special tribute to a remarkable Quebec family headed by Ms. Louise Brissette.

This 44 year old single woman, a physiotherapist and osteopath, has adopted 14 handicapped children. Only five are able to eat unassisted. Three can walk, but the others are in wheelchairs. The children have major handicaps, but this courageous woman says that, to her, a handicapped child is like a poorly-wrapped gift, a human being encased in an imperfect shell, but nevertheless part of the marvelous world God has created, part of Creation.

A tireless worker and an example to us all, Ms. Brissette plans to open a centre this fall in Sillery to provide temporary accommodation for handicapped children and their parents.

Mr. Speaker, we wish Ms. Louise Brissette and her fourteen children, her "real" family as she points out, all the happiness and success they deserve.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

GERMANY

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, today is the first sitting day of the new Parliament of the newly united Germany. The Parliament is sitting at the Reichstag in Berlin 45 years after the creation of and only 11 months after the fall of the Berlin Wall.

It was only fitting that on Monday following the ratification by the four allied powers preparations for the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe to be held in November were begun by the foreign ministers of the 35 participating states.

Canada looks forward to playing a significant role in the new Europe and, as assured to us by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, we will strive to achieve a commitment by the heads of state in obtaining new security arrangements for all of Europe and North America.

In closing, the House joins Canadians of German descent in congratulating Germans of former East and West Germany for this remarkable achievement. We share in their joy and hope that this unity will lead to greater prosperity and a better life for all Germans and for all peoples of Europe.

THE SENATE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, Roman Emperor Caligula tried to appoint his horse as consul of ancient Rome. This was probably legal because he was the dictator at the time.

This government has packed the Canadian Senate with eight extra Tory horses, now called honourable senators, but is it legal? Does the fact that this extraordinary power has never been used in 126 years make it inoperative? A former Supreme Court judge says that may well be true.

By appointing extra senators from New Brunswick—more than they have members of Parliament—is that a constitutional amendment done unilaterally and therefore would be unconstitutional? The legal experts differ. Even the Minister of Justice is confused about this issue.

We in the NDP believe it is irresponsible for government to proceed with the GST without a court reference on its legality. Why take the chance that later acts of Parliament could be illegal or unconstitutional. This will bring legal and economic instability.

Who does the Prime Minister think—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, since the August 20 General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade update seminar in Abbotsford, British Columbia, attended by over 700 farm producers, I have received 180-odd follow up letters seeking assurances that supply management not be bargained away. I share this concern.

The Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture have continually pledged their commitment to fight for the integrity of supply management in Canada by seeking clarification and strengthening of article XI of the GATT. I encourage the ministers and our negotiators at the GATT to do their utmost to ensure this position stays firm.

Further, we need to preserve the integrity of supply management by exempting supply managed commodities from the application of a damaging aggregate measure of support and by maintaining existing internal support and border measures which are the underpinnings of supply management.

I believe this stand is needed and appropriate.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, this past Sunday the world's first ever monument to human rights was unveiled here in the nation's capital. To be in attendance at the unveiling ceremony, the celebration dinner, and the human rights committee, where the Dalai Lama graced the members with his presence, was indeed a pleasure and a privilege.

Three years ago I was part of the negotiating process that secured the Elgin Street site. The hard work of George Wilkes and his committee for a monument to human rights, the chosen design of artist Melvin Charney, and the approval of regional government should each be recognized and commended by this House.

Nobel Peace Prize winner, the Dalai Lama of Tibet, is an outstanding example of dedication to non-violence, conciliation, and maintenance of human rights. Canada should take the initiative in its bilateral relations with China to support the intent of the Dalai Lama's five-point plan for greater Tibetan autonomy and help facilitate a more constructive dialogue between China and the Tibetan people.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the cause for national unity in Canada prevails more strongly than ever.

In recent months feelings of alienation have intensified in many quarters, not only in Quebec but among native Indians and between regions of the country as well. The search for Canada's vision goes on in Quebec, in New Brunswick, and all across the nation.

This is a process that should be encouraged. It will not be harmful. In fact it will be helpful that citizens throughout Canada stop to reflect seriously about the kind of country we really want and, more important, about how we can attain our vision.

As these examinations mature I am confident that this federal government will lead the consensus toward the obvious reality of a national vision which will express our country's collective and united will as a whole.

I believe that history will reveal we are even now at work in Canada to build a special nation, one that will be a model for the world.

To reach that destiny we must each take a stand. I stand firmly for one united country. In my opinion there is no tolerable alternative for Canada's future.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, something is wrong when readers and writers across this country have to rely on the unelected Senate to block the GST which will do irrepairable damage to their industry.

Quebec's advisory council on books and literature, among others, has stated that sales of French books will decline by 25 per cent, which will have a disastrous impact on Quebec's culture. Similar effects will be felt by the scientific community throughout Canada, Mr. Speaker.

This dire warning of the council echoes those of Quebec Cultural Affairs Minister Lucienne Robillard, the PQ opposition, the Quebec writers' union, and the coalition against taxes on books.

When will the government finally withdraw this harmful bill?

FORESTRY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, there is some pressure to reopen the memorandum of understanding between U.S. and Canada regarding the forestry industry.

However, there are strong economic national reasons for maintaining the memorandum of understanding for the long-term good of Canada's forestry industry.

Only after proper replacement measures are in place should any negotiations be considered. Then the ministers and officials should work closely with the industry representatives and MPs from Atlantic Canada to avoid potential countermeasures from the United States.

U.S. representatives are already preparing their case and Canada should move very cautiously.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister of secrecy has struck again.

In 1989 the Minister of Finance refused to hand over to The Ottawa Citizen some 530 pages of departmental documents which showed that during the 1988 election campaign, when the minister was telling Canadians our fiscal house was in order, he in fact knew our economy was headed downward and the deficit was growing out of control.

As if that deception were not enough, we now learn that the minister has also refused an access to information request for the results of an opinion poll commissioned by his department in 1989, which measured reaction to the government's economic policies. Only after a complaint was lodged with the Privacy Commissioner did the minister finally release the results.

By stonewalling and obstructing the minister shows that he and his government will go to any length to keep information from Canadians and that, given the opportunity, they will bamboozle the public at every turn.

Surely the days of such a government are numbered.

FRANCOPHONES

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, while touring New Brunswick last week Jean Chrétien told reporters that apparently, under pressure from governments which support them financially, Acadian organizations had revised their position concerning the Meech Lake Accord.

Well, Mr. Speaker, not only did Jean Chrétien return to politics to put Quebec in its place, but now he is questioning the credibility and intellectual integrity of the leaders of Acadian organizations.

Properly so, the Society of Acadians of New Brunswick and the Fédération des francophones hors Québec have asked Mr. Chrétien to withdraw and apologize for his contemptuous remarks.

However, true to the Liberal tradition, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Chrétien chose to go even further instead of owning up to his mistake.

True to the Liberal tradition, Mr. Speaker, Jean Chrétien chose to insult and ridicule those who dare speak freely.

Acadians remember the Liberal régime when dissenting and diverging views were banned.

Mr. Speaker, the more Liberals change the more they remain the same.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the recent world summit on children's rights was not just a gathering of world leaders. It was also an opportunity for young people across the globe to tell the rest of us, the adult world, to stop, take notice and listen to their concerns.

In my own riding there was a whole series of events sponsored through the schools where children wrote essays, drew posters, and where high school students organized a mock summit on children's rights. Delegates to this mock summit presented a whole series of very impressive resolutions which highlighted their own hopes and concerns, hopes that they would want to have expressed by world leaders.

The resolution spoke to the need for more resources for education, sanitation, clothes, and water supplies for children. It called for the establishment of a peace dividend committee among nations of the world to oversee the reallocation of money away from defence spending and toward more productive uses such as housing, substance abuse, and AIDS.

If the world summit has taught us anything, it is that we must listen to our young people and to our children. In the words of Tanya Bailey, a grade 7 student—

Mr. Speaker: I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

FRANCOPHONES

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, in the early 80s, the Liberal government with Trudeau, Chrétien and Leblanc muzzled Acadian groups by making drastic cuts in their operating budgets.

In the early 90s, Jean Chrétien uses more subtle but equally damaging ways to undermine the credibility of spokespersons for the Acadian community.

The Liberals always fall back on their tried and true strategies, so that it should come as no surprise that we now see the same arrogance, contempt and intolerance being shown under the leadership of Mr. Chrétien.

Mr. Speaker, our government is proud of what it has accomplished with the co-operation of Francophone groups across this country. Our approach is based on the principles of justice, tolerance and respect, and we are working very closely with all those who would like to see the francophone presence enhanced in all spheres of our society.

POVERTY

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Assistance Plan Act states clearly that Parliament recognizes the provision of adequate assistance to needy Canadians. As we prepare for Thanksgiving weekend, we are reminded just how dramatically the poor have been abandoned by this government.

Winnipeg Harvest, a food bank in my own province of Manitoba, indicates that nationally there has been an increase of about 30 per cent in Canadians using food banks. Some 40 per cent of these are children.

No longer can we count on the poor being fed. Canadian food banks are facing the worst shortages of food ever due to the drastic increase in users. Who are these users?

They are the low income Canadians soon to be burdened with the GST. They are unemployed Canadians needing jobs. They are refugees caught in the backlog. They are single parents who cannot afford to work and pay for day care.

The inability of the Canadian government to provide food, the most basic need of its poor people, is scandalous. May this government spend its Thanksgiving weekend thinking about the poor they have abandoned.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to show my solidarity with Acadians in New Brunswick and my own riding, with the Fédération des Francophones hors Québec, the Société des Acadiens et des Acadiennes du Nouveau-Brunswick and with all Francophone groups and associations outside Québec that today feel they were insulted by Jean Chrétien.

Mr. Speaker, Francophones outside Quebec have suffered an affront without reason. Last Saturday, Mr. Chrétien stated that Acadians changed their minds about Meech Lake under pressure from the governments that subsidized their associations. This statement was severely criticized by the groups in question, and I want to take this opportunity to censure these libellous remarks.

Mr. Speaker, Jean Chrétien's statements are typical of the old-style Liberal Party that was rejected twice at the polls by Canadians. Jean Chrétien represents all that was petty and arrogant in the Trudeau government. I hope he will have the decency to withdraw his erroneous and unjustified comments and apologize to all Acadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, once again I feel compelled to rise and condemn the complicity of the Liberal Party in the passage of the goods and services tax.

Do the Liberals really oppose the GST?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Riis: Did the Liberal senators refuse to let the GST bill into the Senate?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Riis: Did the Liberal senators defeat the GST bill at first reading?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Riis: Did the Liberal senators defeat the GST bill at second reading?

Mr. Riis: Did the Liberal senators use their majority to defeat the GST in April?

Mr. Riis: In May?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Riis: In June?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Riis: Did the Liberal senators' bell ringing hold up the Senate business for more than 59 minutes?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Riis: In short, the Liberals have no intention of defeating the GST. Their business friends will not let them. Just watch Allan MacEachen fumble the parliamentary procedural ball. They will not block the GST.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, former Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Willard Estey, speaking of the controversy over the government's decision to stack the Senate to force through the GST said:

> The federal government could have anticipated all that and referred the thing themselves to the Supreme Court of Canada. That would have been a good move.

I ask the Prime Minister: why will he not take the advice of that distinguished jurist whom he has cited with approval in the past and personally refer this matter of the Senate to the Supreme Court of Canada today? Why does he want this doubt, uncertainty and controversy to continue?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend refers to a statement by the Hon. Willard Estey yesterday.

I have just been informed that former Justice Willard Estey issued a statement which has just been handed to me. It reads as follows:

> I understand—that there is an article in one or more newspapers in Canada, yesterday or today, stating that I had expressed a view about the legality of the appointment of people to the Senate of Canada through the machinery of section 26—
> Let me make it absolutely clear at the outset that at no time and in no arena or forum have I expressed an opinion on the legality or otherwise of the appointment of anybody to the Senate at any time and particularly the recent invocation of section 26 of the Constitution.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the Prime Minister.

I note in passing that the Prime Minister did not quote the words of Mr. Justice Estey about the usefulness for the country of having this question referred to the Supreme Court.

Yesterday, in this House, the Minister of Justice said that this issue is "an arguable one". In 1981, when there was similar argument over the process the then federal government was using to refer the issue of constitutional change and have it decided on, that government, after some initial reluctance, did in fact itself refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling.

I ask the Prime Minister why he will not follow the precedent of that government, a precedent asked for by his party when in opposition, and refer this matter of the appointments to the Senate to force through the GST to the Supreme Court of Canada today? I again ask him why he wants this uncertainty to continue.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I responded directly to the question and the quote attributed by my hon. friend to Mr. Justice Estey which Mr. Justice Estey had repudiated prior to the House of Commons beginning Question Period.

Inasmuch as my hon. friend then goes on to raise another point in the allegations associated with Mr. Justice Estey, I would refer him to the next paragraph. Mr. Justice Estey, after having denied categorically the statement imputed to him by my hon. friend, says:

> I did say to the reporter that if the Prime Minister had been given the foresight beyond anything I ever witnessed in any other human being, he probably would have thought about referring the whole business to the Supreme Court before some lower court, which, if it were a valid question, would take some time to percolate upwards to the Supreme Court, but I pointed out that in 1981–1982 the then government showed no such foresight and did not put to the Supreme Court a reference as to the legality of the then process being invoked by the government of the day for the amendment and other revisions to the Constitution, then known as the B.N.A. Act of 1987. Now, that comes back through hearsay to me through broadcasters calling and inviting me to join their programs as being a comment that the Prime Minister should have made such an application or reference to the court. That is entirely wrong because I have made no such comment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the 80s the federal government did refer the constitutional amendment process to the Supreme Court of Canada. I ask the Prime Minister why is he not prepared to follow that precedent, as requested by his own party when in opposition, and refer the matter of Senate appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada if only to clear up the uncertainty created by a series of related legal cases now before three or four courts across Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all this has been repudiated by Mr. Justice Estey. The Leader of the Opposition is now asking me for what is the equivalent of a legal opinion. I would draw his attention to Senator Forsey's viewpoint aired on the CBC network, for I think it is a direct answer to my friend's question. Here is how the question was put to Senator Forsey:

[English]

> CBC: So what do you think then of these challenges, that are being mounted by British Columbia and Alberta? You are a man that knows the Constitution well.
> Senator Forsey: Well, I don't think they will get anywhere. I think the government's legal position and constitutional position on this is perfectly correct.

Some hon. members: More.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is in the business now of releasing legal opinions. As he knows from the point of—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLellan: In a letter to the Leader of the Opposition, the Governor General said that he sought independent legal opinion before he made a decision on the question of the eight new senators.

Would the Prime Minister tell us who gave that legal opinion to the Governor General, when it was given, and would he table the results of that legal opinion.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General will, I am sure, be happy to respond to my hon. friend, if the question were deemed to be appropriate.

My hon. friend is impugning the independence and integrity of the Governor General. He takes his orders from no one. He represents the Queen in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fontana: He takes his orders from the emperor. Hail the king.

Mr. Mulroney: But, Mr. Speaker, there is—

Mr. Nunziata: Do you call him Ray or Your Excellency?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: It obviously depends on the issue.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, however there is no dearth of opinions around. I understand that Senator Forsey, the most distinguished constitutional scholar, said this:

An hon. member: The latest.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: This is yesterday, hot off the presses of CBC Newsworld:

> Mr. Forsey: Yes, because there's a special division in Section 22 of the act of 1867, that this is subject to the provisions of this Act. Well Section 26 provides for the extra senators, the eight extra senators.
> CBC: So you don't think the NDP has a hope on this one.
> Mr. Forsey: No, not a thing.
> CBC: Oh okay. Let's go to Ottawa and Evelyn. Hi, Evelyn.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister as well. Whereas the Governor General acts on the advice of his ministers, particularly the Prime Minister, will the Prime Minister ask the Governor General to release that legal opinion and from whom he got the legal opinion. Will the government as well tell us what advice it gave to the Queen and did it state the intervention of the Opposition and to what extent was that intervention stated when it sent the message to the Queen?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only conclude that Her Majesty, who reads the Canadian papers avidly, and the Governor General were well acquainted with the statements of the new leader of the Liberal Party who said that he was going to kill the GST. I think the Governor General may very well have been acquainted with that. He was also acquainted probably with the statement made by the leader of the Liberal Party to Michel Vastel——last week when he told Mr. Vastel: "The Liberal senators, 52 of them, will do as I say". What a pejorative comment on the independence of senators!

As to the legal opinion—

[English]

I think the answer to my hon. friend's statement is very straightforward. Senator Forsey says:

> —he's asked for the appointment of eight extra senators, he's got the appointment of the eight extra senators. I think that legally and constitutionally the appointment is perfectly proper and cannot be assailed on any possible legal or constitutional ground.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. We have a very serious matter here of constitutionality and legality by the actions of this government in appointing eight new GST senators. Today Michael Meighen, one of those eight GST senators, said that there should have been a reference to the Supreme Court if there had been time.

Surely, now is the time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is well aware that only he can end this chaos. Make a direct reference to the Supreme Court. We know from a case that was held last year that he can get a fairly quick reference on a case sent directly to the Supreme Court. So I say to the Prime Minister: Why not take the advice of one of your GST senators? Why not end the chaos? Send this to the Supreme Court now.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. leader for inviting me to take the advice of one of the newly minted senators. Perhaps she could take the advice of her very distinguished senior colleague, the House leader of the NDP, who in regard to Bill C-22 said, and I quote: "Quite frankly, I am very disappointed with the Senate because I don't think the Senate has the right to be holding up legislation."

• (1430)

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister may not take this issue seriously, but I assure you that the New Democratic Party does.

Mr. Speaker, many experts across the country say that the government may have acted illegally. The list is getting longer by the minute and it includes the dean of Queen's University law faculty, University of Ottawa and University of Victoria law professors, and a Montreal constitutional law Ph.D. Apparently the only advice the Prime Minister got came from experts who support his action.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he will table these expert opinions in the House, or else withdraw the tax?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I agreed with the hon. member that there will always be diverging views concerning any legal or constitutional issue raised in Canada. Most writers, law experts and legal advisers maintain that the government acted properly and that the Senate has no right to thwart the will of elected members.

In any event if my friend is not impressed by the member to her right I would urge her to listen to the reaction of her own member to her left.

[English]

My hon. friend is clearly not impressed with the statements of the member from British Columbia. The member for Yorton-Mellville, speaking on Bill C-62, said: "I believe the Commons should have the final say. I don't think the unelected body of the Senate should ever usurp the elected body."

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister refuses to listen to the Canadian people about the goods and services tax. He refuses to take seriously the issues of the legality of his decision to appoint eight new GST senators, in order to ram through the GST. The Prime Minister refuses to show confidence in his decision by making a referral to the Supreme Court, and his disregard of the Canadian public is unprecedented. I say to the Prime Minister: if he will not go to the court, then we will.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. McLaughlin: My question to the Prime Minister is this: Will he save the public money?

Mr. Boyer: What argument are you going to use?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Ah, shut up.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister simply start taking this issue seriously, as 80 per cent of Canadians do, save the public moneys, reassure the business community that the government has some plan, and simply make a reference to the Supreme Court to end this chaos now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that I, along with all other members of the House, will live in trepidation and apprehension while waiting for that legal assault that will be coming from the NDP. I presume that it probably is not unconnected to a newspaper report this morning that states:

> NDP Leader Audrey McLaughlin distributed copies of a legal opinion from a prominent Saskatoon law firm with solid NDP connections, saying the appointment of the eight Conservative senators breaches constitutional amendments—
> The law firm of Mitchell, Taylor, Mattison and Ching says that under the patriated Constitution of 1982, the composition of the Senate can only be changed by a constitutional amendment.

I have no quarrel with the right of that law firm of the NDP to hold that view and to challenge the government in court.

I refer my hon. friend to a statement made this morning again by Senator Forsey when he said, "So, Mr. Mulroney was faced with a deadlock and he advised the Governor General to recommend to the Queen of Canada the appointment of eight extra senators. I think he was perfectly entitled to do it."

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Taking care of the environment will involve spending enormous amounts of money on clean-up, recycling waste, research and development and consulting services. Today these areas are not subject to the manufacturers' tax but they will be affected by the GST.

What grounds does the minister have for taxing processes that improve the quality of the water we drink and the air we breathe?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I quite understand the concerns that the hon. member has expressed about the environment and the need to do everything we can to improve the environment in the country. That is precisely why the Minister of the Environment will be tabling a green plan shortly which will set out very clearly what the government's intentions are in that regard.

We appreciate how uncomfortable he is with the position that the Senate is taking on the matter of the GST and we understand that that is a concern that he has, but I think he must realize that the matter of the GST has been dealt with in this House. The matter is now in the Senate. The matter is to be dealt with in the Senate. I am sure that the hon. member, because of the discomfort that he feels about this, will be encouraging his friends in the other place to get on with dealing with the GST as quickly as possible.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary, certainly given what the minister has just said, is directed to the Minister of the Environment.

The clean-up of the environment implies an industrial revolution of profound proportions. It entails an investment in research and development and other costs which are not currently taxed. Other nations have recognized that sustainable development is not a milk cow, but represents a fundamental shift in values. Other nations are facilitating environmental clean-up. Other nations are funding it; they are not taxing it.

The Minister of Finance has just given the minister the opening. He has said that within the green plan he had the opportunity to reverse the application of the GST as far as it applies to the environment.

Is he going to stop taxing the environment? Is the minister not going to allow himself to be run roughshod over by the Minister of Finance? Will he, in the green plan, deal with the nefarious effects of the GST?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can tell my hon. colleague that the green plan, which was developed, as he well knows, in consultation with over 11,000 Canadians over the months of April, May and June and August of this year, will be presented to the House later on this fall.

It is a comprehensive plan. It is a plan that addresses our main concerns about the environment. It touches on every item that has been raised in terms of environmental protection for the future and generations to come. I could only assume that my hon. colleague will applaud the initiatives contained in the Green Plan.

AIRLINES INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Yesterday, the minister signalled the government's intention to negotiate a new and wide open air agreement with the U.S. The minister should know that Canadians will not accept the victimization of our airline industry the way other sectors were in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

I ask the minister this: What guarantees and safeguards is he prepared to make in order to fully protect the viability of our Canadian air industry and the quality of a national service to all parts of the country?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, prior to the announcement yesterday, I discussed in broad terms the possibility of going into a liberalization of the air services between Canada and the United States with the airlines. They both told me they were fully in favour of it.

I suggested to them that there would we would be drafting a negotiating mandate with the interested parties during the fall. That includes the communities, the unions, the airlines, the tourism industry, and the provinces.

We are completely open to their suggestions as to phase-ins and safety nets in order that this can happen for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the key words for both those airlines were that they want negotiated safeguards.

Why did the minister choose to enter into negotiations with the U.S. on a wide open skies basis, when a task force he appointed to study in part the same issue is not due to report until the spring of 1991, and when Canadians have not had a say? Why decide, Mr. Minister, and then ask Canadians for their views?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I fully intend that Canadians have the say that my hon. friend quite rightly suggests.

I suggested to my hon. friend yesterday that we take this matter to the Standing Committee on Transport for a full open review by all interested parties for input into the negotiating process.

We think this is going to be a good deal for Canada. The reason is this: The President of Air Canada told me that presently American airlines have access to 90 per cent of our market, and we have access only to less than 30 per cent of theirs. We are going to get that access.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Surely, the Minister of Finance realizes that at the heart of the matter that is going on in the other chamber right now is the radical unacceptability of the goods and services tax.

Instead of imposing the GST on the country in the various ways in which the government has tried to do this—most recently with the eight senators—when is the Minister of Finance going to announce what he intends to do about the fact that many tens of thousands of profitable corporations in the country do not pay any taxes at all? When is he going to announce what he intends to do about that? Perhaps then we would get to the heart of the matter.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is in a time warp.

We have done an awful lot of things to—

Mr. Blaikie: I have not.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He says he has not. I know that he has not been involved in the finance issues, but we have closed more loopholes that were resulting in companies not paying tax.

The statistics that the NDP persist in referring to relate to the year 1987 which is the year—

Mr. Blaikie: I do not quote statistics.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He says he does not quote statistics, but his colleague down the way has.

Time and again, they refer to statistics that refer to 1987 which is the year before corporate tax reform became effective. Let me give my friend an example.

In 1987, the chartered banks hardly paid any tax at all. This year, the chartered banks are paying $1 billion in taxes.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, Canadians know that this minister has no interest in fair taxation. He has told us over and over that people under $30,000 a year in income will be better off under the GST. The minister knows that this simply is not true. He knows the manufacturers will not pass on savings for scrapping the MST. They have told him that. The minister knows that the GST tax credit, the old age supplement and guaranteed income supplement will not be indexed in 1991. The government's own National Council on Welfare said that lower income Canadians will be worse off—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, as the minister knows, Canadians will be worse off in 1992 than in 1991. Why does the minister not come clean with Canadians just this once and acknowledge that the GST is bad for lower income Canadians or, better still, why does the government not—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put the question.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member say that Canadians will not see any reduction in taxes in 1991. Let me refer him to some advertisements that are on television right now by the Chrysler Corporation. Chrysler is saying that they are going to reduce prices now so that Canadians who buy a car now will be able to take full advantage of the savings in price that will come as a result of the GST on January 1. If my friend is looking for some very real examples, there is about a $800 example for him.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, according to Hamilton Harbour Commissioner, Duncan Beattie, a former Conservative member of this place, the Deputy Prime Minister knew four years ago when he was Minister of Transport that the Hamilton Harbour Commission was interested in buying J. I. Case property and that Peter Lush was an agent for J. I. Case. Mr. Lush was appointed commissioner anyway.

Then last January, Peter Lush became chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission. He is still the agent for yet another piece of J. I. Case property. What does the current Minister of Transport know about any of this and when did he learn it?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is certainly a difference in substance between the questions from the two transport critics over there. One is substance, the other is slander.

Mr. Boudria: Withdraw.

An hon. member: Which one?

Mr. Lewis: You are absolutely correct. I withdraw the allegation. You are absolutely correct.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister could answer the question.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the question of a conflict of interest came up last March. The question was cleared by the law firm that was hired to investigate it, Borden & Elliot. I have a full report on it. My hon. friend knows it was cleared at that time. My hon. said so in print. That case is closed.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but notice that the minister neglected to read the entire headline in the print to which he refers. It says: "Lush severs firm's ties to harbour land". In fact, the paragraph before my statement says, "Mr. Lush wouldn't reveal the amount of commission his firm could have expected to receive for selling the second parcel of land", but he took the $400,000 cheque anyway. No wonder I said what I had to say.

Today, Hamilton's finance and administration committee has unanimously requested that the Minister of Transport initiate an open public inquiry into this whole matter. The minister will hide behind the Ontario Supreme Court decision, but it states:

> This is clearly a provincial power—

The federal government can hold a full public inquiry.

Can the Minister of Transport tell this House if the Minister of State for Indian Affairs was aware that Peter Lush was the agent for J. I. Case when she asked Mr. Peter Lush to be the chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission?

An hon. member: Another one at the trough. Shame.

• (1450)

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The very day Mr. Peter Lush resigned his patronage appointment as chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission because of information revealed in this Chamber, and before the law firm to conduct the investigation in the whole affair was even named, Mr. Glen Shortliffe was moved out of his position as deputy minister of transport and into the Privy Council Office.

Will the Prime Minister guarantee that despite this move, the former deputy minister of transport will be fully available to answer any questions on this issue?

Mr. Andre: I do not believe a question like that is allowed.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Let me just say two things. I will respond by saying that Mr. Shortliffe, who is an outstanding public servant, has done a remarkable job on behalf of Canada. He will be there to respond to questions whether he is associate secretary of the Privy Council, deputy minister of National Defence or wherever he happens to be in the continued service of Canada.

What I think all Canadians and all members of this House would reject with vehemence is any suggestion, including that inferentially made by my hon. friend, that there is somehow something improper in the Clerk of the Privy Council recommending that senior public servants in the normal course of events be transferred from position to position. It was because of his extraordinary performance throughout his entire career that Mr. Shortliffe and the other appointments were announced at this particular time. I know that my hon. friend will want to stand up and say how proud she is of the public service of Mr. Shortliffe.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. It is difficult for Canadians to have any confidence that public servants will not be pressured and manipulated—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The public may or may not have confidence, but the hon. member is well on the way to making a charge that the Public Service is being manipulated. The hon. member knows that that is just not appropriate. I am going to the next question. The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I think the House knows that Premier Devine of Saskatchewan has in effect thrown in the towel and will not join other provinces in a legal battle against the GST.

We also know, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Devine has been a bit of a political poodle for the Prime Minister for a long time.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member can put his question.

Mr. Nystrom: I did not mean to insult poodles, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nystrom: Does this mean, Mr. Speaker, that the Devine government is on the verge of making an agreement with the federal government to collect the GST in Saskatchewan in a similar way that the Prime Minister's other friend, Quebec's Robert Bourassa, is going to do in the province of Quebec? If that is the case, when will that announcement be made? Can the Prime Minister tell us in the House today if that is indeed the case.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, during the the premiers' conference last summer, Premier McKenna of New Brunswick said that it would be irresponsible in the extreme for the premiers to come together and oppose the GST, spend three days in conference opposing the GST if they failed to come up with an alternative.

They met for three days. They failed miserably to come up with an alternative. Premier McKenna, who is not a Conservative yet—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Premier McKenna turned out to be right.

Mr. Marchi: Are you putting him in the Senate too?

Mr. Mulroney: Well, there are a couple of spaces left.

An hon. member: John is really upset.

An hon. member: John knows there is no future.

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: The Premier of Quebec decided it was in the interests of Quebec and Canada to harmonize Quebec's tax position in this area with the federal government's. It was a tax initiative and also a major contribution to national unity, and I think that is something that should not be overlooked. The Government of Quebec, by the way, made its own decisions, which were announced by Mr. Gérard-D. Lévesque.

[English]

If Premier Devine comes to the conclusion that indeed Premier McKenna was right and it would be irresponsible in the extreme to continue to oppose the GST without an alternative and decided to join the federal program which is designed to create new wealth and prosperity for Saskatchewan—

Mr. Speaker: I think we should move on. The hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Not all premiers have thrown in the towel just yet.

The people of Alberta from Coutts to Chip, from Lloyd to Lake Louise have had one consistent and compelling message for this government for the last year and a half. We don't want a general sales tax in Alberta.

Will the government continue to ignore the overwhelming majority of Albertans, or will it now withdraw the GST and begin instead to implement a fair taxation system where everyone, including the wealthy and the big corporations, pay their fair share?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it really astounds me how the hon. member can get up and talk about what we have been doing to the large corporations when we have passed a large corporations tax in this House. The hon. member is supporting the Senate in blocking that large corporations tax as well as other pieces of legislation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Let me draw a distinction that my hon. friend may not understand. The Premier of Alberta has said he does not like the GST, but he is a man of principle and he has said: "I believe it has passed the House of Commons, an elected House of Commons, and he, (the Prime Minister) has in fact a duty to appoint the senators".

He goes on to say: "I do feel strongly that elected people are there to govern and they should not be over-ruled by those who have no credibility".

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture. The minister knows that his department has approved funding of $3.5 million for a guarantee for the Southern Ontario Tomato Co-op under the Advance Payments for Crops Act.

This co-operative is an unlicensed facility to process food. It has been charged more than once, has paid fines, is presently charged again, and is operating illegally in Ontario.

Why is government funding to such a massive extent, or to any extent at all, an unlicensed, illegal food processing facility?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the producer organization which the hon. member refers to meets all of the requirements under the provisions of that act and so therefore the act is being followed in accordance with the rules and regulations.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. I would like to point out to the government that this processing facility is unlicensed and illegal in the province of Ontario.

I find it intriguing that in 1986 this facility was given a $1.5 million grant. It has now been funded and guaranteed this. It is still unlicensed. It is still illegal and has been given another $1 million grant on top of this funding back in April of this year.

I would ask the minister if he would explain and account to the taxpayers of Canada why this type of funding and support is being given to this type of facility.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has some concerns perhaps he may want to also take it up with the members of the Liberal administration in Ontario who also supported this co-operative.

• (1500)

The Alternate Enterprise Program was provided to switch into other production from tobacco production, which I think the hon. member has supported very much. It was under that program that we were attempting to diversify the industry in that particular area.

It was found to be legal in so far as the Government of Ontario is concerned and the federal government took the same position.

Points of Order

VACANCIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order dealing with a very important matter. It is called leadership in this country. It is also called courage in this country.

It deals with the vacancies in two ridings of this country, namely Beauséjour, New Brunswick and York North, Ontario. I would like to ask a question of the government. I take it the leader of the government in the House will be able to answer it.

I have drafted a copy of the required Order in Council to name or to declare the date of that election. If I send a copy to the minister, could he give us the exact date of the by-elections in Beauséjour, New Brunswick and York North, Ontario?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in 1983 when our leader was elected and did not have a seat in the House, a member of our caucus, the current Minister of Public Works from Central Nova, stepped down to allow the leader to run in that riding.

At that time Prime Minister Trudeau took 20 days to call a by-election. This Prime Minister will call a by-election in Beauséjour well before 20 days.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, 20 days from the date of vacancy would make York North pretty well vacant at this time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister the usual Thursday question. What kind of menu does he have in mind for the coming days, that is, Friday, Tuesday, and Wednesday next?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow it is my intention to call report stage and perhaps third reading, if there were to be agreement, on Bill C-37, the bill to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.

If we make progress on that I would call Bill C-54, the joinder of counts bill, on which I believe there is fairly wide agreement within the House.

Ms. Blondin: What about the aboriginal languages bill?

Mr. Andre: I cannot hear the hon. member for Western Arctic. I am trying to speak. I will listen to her after. Perhaps she would like me to answer her House leader's question first.

Ms. Blondin: You heard me.

Mr. Andre: No, I did not hear you. All I heard was noise and barracking. I will listen later.

Monday, being Thanksgiving, the House will be adjourned. On Tuesday it will be my intention to call an allotted day. On Wednesday there is a number of possibilities that I would like to talk to House leaders about before giving an indication. I would intend to do that before we adjourn for the weekend.

REQUEST FOR TABLING

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, earlier in Question Period today in an exchange the Prime Minister referred to some communication that he had received from a former Supreme Court justice.

According to Citation 159, subsection 3, of Beauchesne's, when the Prime Minister reads from a communiqué it is said that he will table it in the House. I would ask that the Prime Minister do what is expected of him in Beauchesne's and table the communiqué that he referred to.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe that was a statement issued publicly by the former Justice Willard Estey of the Supreme Court.

I am certain there will be no problem whatsoever. As soon as I get a copy I would be willing to table it before the House on behalf of the Prime Minister.

COMMENTS IN CHAMBER

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, probably one of the greatest civil rights issues of the present time is the right of the accused to be consider innocent until proven guilty. More and more we see an erosion of that principle. It is even worse when innocent people are accused in this House and rumours are begun in this House in order to make a person look as though they are accused.

It seems to me that the member for Ottawa West drew a very long bow today in starting a rumour rather than even reacting to a rumour regarding a public servant who has no right to defend himself, no forum in which to defend himself.

I would like to know if those kinds of questions are going to be permitted in this House, lest we violate the civil rights of individuals who cannot protect themselves.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for raising a matter of some importance. The hon. member for Ottawa West may want to rise to discuss this in a moment.

I have a matter of privilege from the hon. member for York South—Weston which I will come to in a moment. I have another point of order and there may be more.

To reply specifically to the question of the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, he referred to a question which the hon. member for Ottawa West started to put and has asked what I would do under the circumstances. The hon. member will notice that I interrupted the question and went on to the next question. I do not know what the rest of the question was going to be. I felt that it had erred against the very comment which the hon. member has brought to the attention of the House.

CALLING IN THE MEMBERS

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is very brief but I think nonetheless important to those of us who want to vote in this place. On Tuesday of this week, about noon, I and a number of other MPs were not able to vote. I just want to share with you the circumstances of that particular event, Mr. Speaker.

I left Centre Block about 11.48 and got a bus to go over to the Wellington Building. At the foot of the street, at Confederation Building, I crossed the street, having had to wait for the traffic light. I got into the Wellington Building and, Sir, the bells were not ringing. I took the elevator up to the fifth floor where I was to meet with the CPA in a selections committee meeting at 11.45. When I got to the fifth floor, Sir, the bells were ringing. I immediately spoke to the clerk who said she would find out about the vote, when the vote indeed would take place. She got back as quickly as possible and said that the vote would be in three minutes and that I would not be able to get there in time.

Had there been in the time it took the bus to travel from Centre Block, stopping at West Block and then going down to the foot of the street, some means of alerting members of Parliament in this wonderful world of technology and communications, had we had bells, whistles, lights or something in that little bus, other members of Parliament including myself could have been alerted and I am sure we would have been back, each of us in his place, to vote as he or she wanted.

I make the strong recommendation and suggestion to you, Sir, that we try to have a way of alerting members of Parliament in buses regarding votes that take place here.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear first of all the hon. member for Western Arctic, and then I will hear the hon. member for Shefford.

HERITAGE LANGUAGE FOUNDATION

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order and a question for the House leader opposite.

I would like to first of all state that Bill C-37, the bill to establish the heritage language foundation, is one that is being greatly opposed by the aboriginal leadership and individual groups. They are collectively opposed to being included under the heritage language foundation. They would like to have unanimous consent for the House to proceed on the establishment of an aboriginal language foundation under Bill C-269, which is a private member's bill.

I have written to the leader of the House this summer. He applauded my effort but would not give unanimous consent. The NDP has agreed and the Liberal Party has agreed, but we are lacking support from the Conservative government. Can we have—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has risen on a point of order to make a point. However, the hon. member's position is not really a point of order. I suppose that if her hon. House leader had raised it with the hon. government House leader it might have been a matter that would have been appropriate, but it is really a matter that has to be discussed between hon. members. I know that she would want to do that.

• (1510)

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, one of our colleagues pointed out earlier that the bells rang very fast and stopped quite abruptly.

Mr. Speaker, this is a genuine point of order. Yesterday, we saw the whips more or less make fools of themselves, and I wonder whether this race against the clock to keep members from voting or from getting to their seats is established practice, and would you not agree this is somewhat detrimental to the order of this House?

This is too much! They rush from their seats in such a hurry, they are liable to bump into the mace, Mr. Speaker!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Whips quite often move with great speed. I think the difficulty which the hon. member for Erie has brought to the attention of the House is a technical one. I am taking it very seriously. I will do everything I can to correct the difficulty.

CALLING IN THE MEMBERS

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, you are considering the question of voting and the ringing of the bells. We have had on a number of occasions over the last number of days a number of votes called on certain matters. I would ask you to consider the reasons why the members were being called in.

As you know or as you have been advised, Mr. Speaker, the members were being called in because of the obstructionist tactics of certain independent members of this House. They were obstructing the debate that was going on in this House. I would ask you to take into consideration the tactics of the hon. member for Shefford who was causing all these votes to take place yesterday and days preceding.

Mr. Speaker: Provided that the hon. member for Shefford was operating within the rules, there is nothing that the Speaker can do. If there is another kind of complaint, perhaps it will be made in the appropriate way.

However, I want to say to the hon. member for Shefford and all hon. members that if there is a problem in the ringing of the bells, I will have somebody attend to it right away. The question of tactics in the Chamber of course is another matter.

PRIVILEGE

QUESTION PERIOD

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice that I wanted to rise after Question Period on a question of privilege arising out of Question Period itself. Since then there has been a statement in this House in respect of a question I asked during Question Period that certainly needs to be responded to, and I look for your guidance as to whether or not that is a separate question of privilege.

However, on my first question of privilege, it was wrongly implied during Question Period by the Prime Minister that my question was questioning the integrity of a senior Public Service employee. Any objective reading of the question would make it absolutely clear that I was doing no such thing, that I was in fact questioning an appointment, an act of appointment by the Prime Minister, and asking—

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member would not want anybody to misunderstand her motivation or her position. The difficulty with this is that in the exchange that goes on here we could have members getting up all of the time to carry on further debate in the question and answer.

I think the difficulty in this case arises from the fact that if the hon. member had been permitted by the Chair to proceed with her second question the matter might have been clarified.

I would ask that perhaps she consider whether it could be clarified in another question or in another way.

I have let the hon. member go on so that the point is made, but I do not want hon. members to be getting up continually on points of order to re-debate an exchange in the House.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a different point of order. I am seeking some guidance from the Speaker regarding a very serious matter.

Over the last number of days, we have had legitimate questions from several members of the opposition calling for a public inquiry into a series of circumstances that led to a $400,000 commission being paid to the chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. There have been questions concerning the Hamilton Harbour and people engaged in it. They have been dealt with in the Chamber. It may be dealt with in the Chamber further, but it is not to be raised on a point of order.

There has not been just one question. There have been a number of questions. It is not appropriate to try to carry that on after Question Period by raising a point of order.

If I have misunderstood the hon. member for Hamilton East, I will listen to a word or two more. But I am not going to permit—I do not think it would be appropriate—carrying on that issue in the way of a point of order after Question Period.

It can be pursued at another time in this Chamber.

Ms. Copps: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, we spent about half an hour yesterday going through alleged possible points of order and questions of privilege on another matter.

What I have asked you for is a ruling on a very serious matter. There has been an implication by the government upon a legitimate request by the opposition for a public inquiry. The government is somehow claiming that we are running a smear campaign.

This is not debate. During Question Period–

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The government may be implying all kinds of things. The opposition may be implying all kinds of things.

That has got to be dealt with in debate and not on points of order. Certainly the hon. member does not have a question of privilege. She may have a complaint, and it may be a very vigorous one, but I cannot let this proceed.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, in defence of my colleague, we had an experience in this House this week when the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister were allowed 35 minutes on a point of order.

They were allowed to debate. They were allowed to read. They were allowed to put motions that were out of order. I do not understand.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just want to draw to the attention of the House that today we had members of the government rising to get questions on, which were very important to them as individual members representing their constituencies.

However, they were not given that opportunity. Let us take that into account as well.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the legitimate request, two of our members stood in their places today and asked legitimate questions of the government. You, Sir, with all respect either suggested that their questions were not able to be answered on the floor of this House, or that somehow our members were impugning the integrity of public servants.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may very well have a complaint with the Chair.

If that is the case, I would expect her to discuss that with me. If her hon. House leader has a complaint with the Chair or if other members have a complaint with the Chair, I would expect them to see me too.

What the hon. member is doing now is literally arguing an appeal against a ruling I made. That is not appropriate. I am prepared to meet with the hon. member, the hon. House leader and discuss the matter.

If I am at fault, then I shall try to correct it. But I make it very clear: I have given the hon. member more time under the circumstances with that point of order than is appropriate.

Points of order ought not to be used to carry on the debate in Question Period.

• (1520)

Ms. Copps: Just give me 30 about seconds to complete my point.

Mr. Speaker: No. I am sorry. I have asked the hon. member to co-operate. If the hon. member wants to rise at another time in another way, then I will hear her, but I have made my decision. The hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mrs. Catterall: On the point of order strictly, Mr. Speaker. I do certainly intend to come and see you and discuss with you some of the proceedings this afternoon, but I do not want to miss this opportunity to protect my right, so I am seeking your advice to address a second point of privilege. I gave you notice prior to the termination of Question Period as to a point of privilege arising from the Prime Minister's answer to my question.

My second point of privilege which I did not have the opportunity to address arose from a comment made by another member of the House, following Question Period in which he drew on the Prime Minister's answer, not on my question, to make an accusation. I would like to know if it is not appropriate now, at what point in time is it appropriate for me to make that point of privilege.

An hon. member: It is appropriate now.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can help the hon. member. As soon as she has a chance to consider the blues, she could consult with colleagues or with myself. If there has been something unparliamentary done, something which has impinged upon the hon. member's privilege, then I, of course, will hear the hon. member on that point.

In any event, I take it now as notice the hon. member is raising a matter. I would ask the hon. member to take careful look at what Hansard shows, and I will hear her further. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, with respect, the member for Ottawa West is known in this caucus as one who has human rights at heart. She is one of the greatest defenders of human rights. Her reputation was impugned. Her reputation was taken to task. I object strongly to that, Mr. Speaker, because the member for Surrey—White Rock had no business doing what he did, or being allowed to say what he said.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the point of order which was made by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton East, I just want to say that no one is questioning your ruling. In fact, the hon. member said not once, not twice, but I believe three times that she was seeking direction and guidance from the Chair with regard to the proceedings which have happened today.

Mr. Speaker, it should be well noted, and perhaps it should serve as notice, that members on this side of the House are extremely frustrated—extremely frustrated—and annoyed at the way in which hon. members opposite following Question Period are allowed to get up on spurious points of order, debate for extended periods of time—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: To debate ad nauseam.

Mr. Dingwall: —to debate at length, Mr. Speaker, points of order which in point of fact are not in accordance with Beauchesne.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, in terms of your rulings which may come subsequent to my intervention as well as other interventions by hon. members on this side that hopefully we would be given the opportunity and the full impact, if you will, of the rules of natural justice and order to present our case on the floor of the House of Commons.

An hon. member: That's right.

Mr. Speaker: I will do the very best I can. I am more than prepared to have a discussion with the hon. member for Hamilton East and other hon. members.

Perhaps clarification is needed. Perhaps there is an approach that would be appropriate. It might very well be a helpful idea to take some of the questions in which there seems to be some feeling that full latitude or enough latitude was not allowed, rise on a point of order, bring them to the attention of the Chair, which I would be very prepared to listen to, and then I will go away and try to respond in such a way that will be helpful to all hon. members.

Ms. Copps: That is what I tried to do, yes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton East says that she is what she tried to do. If that is what her purpose is, and the purpose of other members, I just want to say that I would be very pleased to see those particular incidents collected at the appropriate time in consultation with the House leader, rise, bring them to my attention. I may not be able to respond immediately, but I certainly will respond and I will try to be of assistance to hon. members.

In general terms, I do want to say this. It is very difficult for a Speaker to always know what is going to be said before it is said. I sometimes made comments in a wry way about that, but there is a fundamental here and that is that questions ought not to be used in the guise of allegations or in the guise of imputations of wrongdoing. The hon. members are correct, but by the same token answers given have to respect that also. I would ask the hon. member for Hamilton East, because I know she wants to co-operate with the Chair and I do appreciate that, to collect some of the matters that are troubling members and rise, bring them to me and I will try to deal with them.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we will certainly abide by your suggestion and your guidance. But, to bring home very clearly for your edification, and perhaps you will have an opportunity in the very near future to watch some of the proceedings and read Hansard, the frustration is exacerbated when individuals such as the right hon. Prime Minister make statements in response to questions put to them, which are knowingly, by all members of the House, incorrect.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I think if there are some examples which hon. members want to bring to me, where there is a complaint, as I have invited hon. members to do, please do so. It is not appropriate to carry on continually talking about what one person on one side said and one person on the other side said. I have been here for a great many years and I have heard some fierce things said in this Chamber, on both sides. I have also seen a good deal of badinage, I suppose we could call it, that goes on in the exchange in Question Period and other places. However, I have invited hon. members to bring their complaints in an appropriate way to me and I most clearly will try to deal with them and I will try to be helpful.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I will not belabour this point of order other than to suggest to you that perhaps you will review very carefully the comments made by the right hon. Prime Minister whereby he knowingly—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has a particular complaint, I have asked hon. members to come to me in a specific way. I am not going to try to rule on things when Hansard is not in front of us, when we are running on memory, and when they may very well be barely matters of debate.

I do have a question of privilege which I must under the rules at least start to hear.

The Hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

PARLIAMENTARY READING ROOM

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, it is the Reading Room point of privilege which was raised on September 24. You will recall that you invited me to contact a spokesman for the Board of Internal Economy, which I did. I have indicated in my letter to you today that the answer that came back did not deal in substantive terms with the point.

I would stress two points today, Sir, one having to do with the fire hazard. As I indicated, you will recall that the fire in 1916 broke out in a small reading room—

Mr. Speaker: I have read very carefully the hon. member's letter. Unless he has something to add to it, I must say that it is not a question of privilege. However, it is a question of the administration of this place, and I would invite the hon. member to pursue it further in two different ways. One, if the hon. member wishes, he can raise and ask a question of the nominated member of the board. There is also another way. The hon. member can come before the Board of Internal Economy and raise his concerns. It is not a question of privilege.

I have to insist to the hon. member. It is not a question of privilege. It may well be a question of the administration of the buildings. It is not a question of privilege.

I have looked carefully at the material that the hon. member has put to me. The hon. member may not be satisfied with the response he got from one of the members of the Board of Internal Economy, and I invite him to come before the Board of Internal Economy if he wishes. This is a matter of administration, not a matter of privilege.

The hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Harvey: I do apologize, Mr. Speaker, if I am doing this wrong, but may I now move that we hear from the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I think that that is out of order in that you had not recognized anybody by yet calling Orders of the Day. It is a nice anticipatory move, but out of order, nevertheless.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp that Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, on rising I would like to start off by thanking my hon. friend from Edmonton East for his very kind and, I am sure, usual but somewhat unexpected concern and I thank him very much.

An hon. member: He should have been a Liberal.

Mr. Mifflin: Indeed, I am going to work on that, too, I can assure you.

Before we called it one o'clock earlier this afternoon, I had risen to speak as the associate energy critic and as the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception where a large part of the construction of Hibernia will take place, to address elements of the project that had concerned a lot of people. I went through some background. I covered some of the details that perhaps were not well known to the House and, indeed, to the public. Then, I specifically covered two areas concerning members of the House, perhaps with the indication and certainly the aim of putting their minds at rest and to make them feel more supportive of this project. After all, it is going to be going on for 25 years.

Just before one o'clock, I looked at the materials and the equipment for this project that will total some $600 million. I gave what I believe to be the reasons why we physically cannot make this a 100 per cent project, purely in the area of materials and equipment.

I will now talk about what certainly in the interim period—the construction and production phase— will be the most important aspect to a lot of Newfoundlanders, to a lot of Atlantic Canadians, and indeed to all Canadians, but I may add the least understood aspect of this particular megaproject. I am referring to of course the employment opportunities.

I read in The Globe and Mail this morning, for example, an article with this headline: "Thousands scramble for few Hibernia jobs". The gist of the article is that there are thousands of people lining up and before the end of this year, it states that there will be only anywhere from 40 to 60 jobs.

I welcome the opportunity to speak on this because I have been following this project for a long time. I have spoken to members on the other side of the House, to the hon. ministers involved in this, to the hon. members, my own colleagues here, members of industry, bureaucrats, and those involved in the actual doing of this project. I hope, I say in all modesty, what I have to say will be instructive and informative.

It is well known that Hibernia will create thousands of employment opportunities across Canada. These opportunities will be offered generally, not by Mobil Oil, but by the major contractors or the service companies working on the project. I think that is a very important point. Most of the jobs during the development phase will fall into one of five industrial categories: construction, shipbuilding, manufacturing, engineering, and offshore contracting. There will be a wide range of skills and skill levels that will be required over the six-year project development schedule and during the approximate 20 years of production. I think it would be worthwhile perhaps to get into that in more detail, but, on a general note, employment on the project is measured in terms of person-years.

There sometimes is confusion as to what a person-year is. Very simply, one-year's employment for one person equals one person-year. Sometimes a million of man-hours is the term used, but I will deal with person-years, exclusively, so that we do not switch from one measure to the other.

During the development phase, the project will create an estimated 21,500 person-years of employment with 14,500 of those expected to be in Canada. According to the project schedule, the demand will begin to grow late this year. I have to use a range and am told that it will be between 40 and 100, depending on how rapidly the project gets under way and, indeed, what the weather is going to be like in November and December. But the employment is expected to peak in about 1993-1994, with work on several activities occurring at the same time in different locations.

You can appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that you start off with one aspect of this and then you go on to another aspect and then there are three or four aspects happening at once. Then there are five or six and, then, I suppose, at the end of the project, using a PERT diagram—a very complex mechanism to make sure that everything is co-ordinated in the time schedule—there will probably be hundreds and hundreds of things going on at the same time.

The first six-year phase, the development phase, from now to 1995-1996, can be broken down into seven main activities. First is the gravity base structure, that is, the big concrete platform that is going to be launched, towed out to sea, and sunk in about 250 feet of water, 80 metres of water. This will employ 4,545 person-years. For the topsides that are built onto the gravity base structure it will be 6,305.

There is the articulated loading platform. From this gravity base structure and the modules that I just described will be an undersea component, a manifold, and 1.3 million tonnes will be stored in the gravity base structure itself. The large tankers, of which there will be three at 120,000 tonnes, a fair-sized ship, will load from what is called the articulated loading platforms that are going to be spaced some distance from the gravity base structure itself. Of course, associated with that will be a pipeline, and there will be 290 man-hours.

For the sub-sea manifolds, the mechanism under the sea that is involved in the flow of the light crude oil that will go to the articulated loading platform, there will be 1,110. Then, for the drilling itself, there will be 1,650 and for the vessel construction to which I made reference, the three 120,000 tonne shuttle tankers, 450 man-years. Quite frankly, I think that is conservative but I will use the figures that I was given two days ago. For the startup there will be 150. That comprises the 14,500.

I know there are people listening to this who would like to know with what kind of trades are we dealing. With the indulgence of the Chair, I would like to give you some indication of the trades that are involved. They range from management administration to carpenters. I will just read out some of them: management administration, production management, petroleum engineer, straight engineer, surveyors, draughtsmen, engineering technician, medics, EDP operators, telephone operators, clerks, caterers, divers, drill rig crews, blasting occupations, machinists, sheet metal workers, welders, boiler makers, grinders, supervisors, in a general sense, air craft mechanics, industrial mechanics, instrument fitters, marine fabricators, painters, construction equipment operators, general labourers, electricians, carpenters, concrete workers, insulators, pipefitters, maintenance (general), pilots—that is an air pilot—deck officers for the shuttle tankers, ships' engineers, marine crew, truck drivers, crane operators, material handlers and technical testers. There are more. I just listed about 40 of them.

I will not indulge the Chair in the number of man-hours that are involved from 1990 to 1996. You can imagine, Mr. Speaker, they start low. They peak about the middle of the production stage. They stay a little high, and then towards the end they tail off.

I want to talk about the production phase. Once the platform is built, the topsides are put on and the gravity of the structure is towed out 200 miles southeast of St. John's. It is anchored and connected up. We then get into the production stage.

At this point in time, the project will create 1,150 long-term jobs, long-term being 18 to 20 years or however long the oil field lasts. They will be on the production platform, in other offshore operations, and in related shore based jobs in Newfoundland and elsewhere in Canada.

I referred to the 1,150 jobs directly involved, but there will be business second and third derivatives of this in the St. John's area, in Atlantic Canada, and certainly in Newfoundland that would be presumptuous of me to put a figure on. Using our imaginations, we can see how the industries will be created as a direct result of the production input that I refer to now.

Many of the jobs during the production phase require direct experience in the management and operation of the offshore production facilities. We have not done this in Newfoundland and we certainly will be training for some of them, but I will come to that later.

A number of these jobs will have to come from outside Newfoundland. While certainly the intent of the project is Canadians first and Newfoundlanders first, just as it is with materials and equipments, I think we have to accept in order to make sure this project stays on stream and is done properly that we will have to recruit, if you like, certain restricted areas of expertise.

Through advance recruiting and continuing training programs, most of these jobs will eventually be filled by Canadians. That is, once the outside expertise comes in and we train Newfoundlanders and other Canadians for the job, they will be able to relieve those people who can return to Norway, Britain, Scotland or wherever they are from.

Again, very briefly, I have a listing of the main occupations involved in this. There are five major areas: the platform operations, that is, the involvement of the working of the structure and the business of oil drilling. That will be 540 man-years. For tanker operations it will be 180; marine and air support—

Mr. Duceppe: On a point of order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie has the floor.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): We do not have a quorum, Mr. Speaker.

You won't make a decision, because you know members will be back.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We do have a quorum, and the debate may continue. The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

[English]

Mr. Mifflin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was making reference to the production phase main occupations, and I will continue.

For platform operations it will be 540 person-years; tanker operations, the operation of the shuttle tankers, 180 person-years; marine and air support, 120 person years; engineering and the omni-present administration that will be required to make this work, 160 person-years; and, the actual well workers themselves, the coal face of this whole operation, 100 person-years.

It must be emphasized that the employment estimates should be considered as orders of magnitude. This morning I made reference to the uncertainties in these kinds of projects. What might be 120 man-years now, may be 110 or 140—hopefully 140—by the time the production phase starts in 1995-96. They are based on preliminary designs, and both the numbers required and the timing may change substantially once detailed engineering is completed.

In fact, with the kind of experience I have had in these megaprojects, I can almost assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the House that there will be changes in both the time and the scheduling, which will I am sure will be flexible over time, but not the cost schedule.

I am going to speak later on about the training but I want to say that a substantial training effort is required to develop those skills in Canada that now do not exist. It is unlikely that the shortages can be completely avoided as I mentioned earlier.

However, since the training must be supplemented with considerable on-the-job training in order to meet the skill levels required, then we have to key ourselves to this kind of activity. The results of Newfoundland employment—I have a chart with that but I am not going to go through that in detail. Suffice it to say that it will start from 40 to 100 persons by the end of this year and the beginning of next year, and it will peak at about 2,145 person-years. The proportion of those jobs likely to be filled by members of the provincial labour force as it gets bigger will start from 60 per cent and hopefully will go up to 90 per cent and, I hope, 100 per cent eventually. And I do not see any problems with that happening.

For the production phase the annual employment that I mentioned earlier will work the same way. There will be on-the-job training and then eventually as the skills are acquired in this relatively new operation, certainly brand new operation, for the eastern coast of Canada then expertise will be developed as people are recruited and as on-the-job training takes place.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would be interested to know that not too long ago, a year and a half I think it was, the Newfoundland government sent 37 instructors to Holland and to Norway and the United Kingdom for training so that they would be prepared once Hibernia gets into its stride to embark on exactly the kind of operation to which I made reference.

At the beginning there will be one major impact area and then as the project fans out there will be two and three, and in Newfoundland I visualize that there will be four major impact areas. The St. John's impact area is obvious. St. John's is the capital of Newfoundland and we are going to be involved in employment opportunities in the St. John's area, project management, supply base operations, and support for development drilling. I am very pleased to report and I regret that my hon. friend from St. John's East, although he has heard me say this before, that the city of St. John's and indeed those people who will be employed from the St. John's area have already developed a fair amount of expertise which we have both witnessed ourselves in the last 20 years. Regrettably it has slackened off in the last few years but I recall in 1981 walking down the piers on Water Street and seeing the unforgettable type of activity that was involved in the offshore production at a time when the drilling that has culminated in Hibernia was going on.

So I feel comfortable and sanguine that there is a lot of expertise in the St. John's area and I am not going to speak to that any further.

An area that involves me directly is the Sunnyside—Come-By-Chance area and the employment opportunities in this area of course will be, I would expect, maximum.

As I mentioned, the gravity base structure will be built in Great Mosquito Cove—a beautiful name—at the end of Bull Arm, near Sunnyside, which is close to Come-By-Chance. Mr. Speaker, those are lovely names.

The trades required for the gravity base structure construction are similar to those—and I went into some of them earlier—required for major civil works projects such as a hydroelectric generating station, and we have those in Newfoundland of course, so that there are some skills that are already on the ground. They be involved in doing something else, they may be unemployed, but, Mr. Speaker, they are there. I feel very good about that.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, at a time when we are discussing a project worth $5.2 billion, we do not have a quorum in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I see we do have a quorum. The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

• (1550)

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, this is not a rebuke to the hon. member who is trying to learn the Standing Orders of the House, but only the Chair can determine whether or not there is a quorum. Members may ask the Chair to decide if there is a quorum. However, no member, except for the Speaker in the chair, may decide whether there is a quorum.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford, on a point of order.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): I think it is wonderful that the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is acting as your assistant, Mr. Speaker, but the truth is that it is entirely legitimate for a member whenever he observes a lack of interest in this House, to ask for a quorum. And I believe it was entirely appropriate for the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie to do so, since as a very junior member, he is particularly aware of the frivolous attitude of a number of members of our traditional parties.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since it has been established that there is a quorum, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception still has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the impact areas in the St. John's area. I had already begun to speak on the Sunnyside—Come-by-Chance impact area.

I talked about the skills that would be used for a major civil works project and they include such trades as ironworkers, scaffolders, reinforcing steel fixers, concrete workers, mechanical and outfitting engineers, electricians, welders, pipe fitters and heavy equipment operators. I know a lot of heavy equipment operators in the area who will be looking forward to getting some work in this area.

The minimum qualification for most trades would be a journeyman level training and some experience. Indeed, there will be some opportunity for on-the-job experience. Pipe welders will have to be certified according to provincial regulations. Industry standards will likely be required by the contractor to hold all-position tickets.

There are two other areas I am going to cover very briefly. There is the Argentia impact area that will be involved in the putting together of the gravity base structure, the full line fabrication, the deck and the top side of the assembly and the actual hook-up itself. I am going to leave that because that is later on in the project and I think it can be covered somewhat downstream.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: Do it now, Fred.

Mr. Mifflin: On second thought, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should cover this because it is a very important aspect of the area.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mifflin: Just to expand on Argentia itself, Mr. Speaker, the full line fabrication and the installation activities of this hook-up are going to involve a lot of man-hours and again the kind of expertise that we hope we will develop between now and the time that this is put together. For this actual job itself, we are looking at 1,960 person-years of employment and that is going to be created in the Argentia impact area.

While it is not in my riding, I know the people from Argentia. I was down there about three weeks ago and I know that they are very concerned about the reduction in the U.S. naval station down there and other activities that have shut down. I say to them that they, as it stands now, will be a very large part of this project.

The whole thing will impact all over Newfoundland and Canada eventually, but the fourth area is the Marystown area. I have spoken to my hon. colleague for Burin—St. George's on this and I know that he was instrumental in fighting for this particular piece of the pie, if you like. He has been instrumental in working together with all our colleagues in ensuring that with the floating system, approximately 1,490 person-years of employment could be generated in the production phase and hopefully just over 1,000 in the production phase itself.

There is work going on in Cow Head, I think it is, across from the Marystown shipyard, basically to bring the shipyard facility up to the state of the art so that they will be in a position to bid on the considerable technical work that will happen downstream.

Mr. Speaker, I want to speak very briefly to the training and the experience required. From the perspective of training and experience, the jobs created by Hibernia will vary widely from occupation to occupation. I want to use these examples from one end of the spectrum to the other. Senior managers and engineers will ordinarily require engineering degrees and several years of direct experience in the design and construction of offshore facilities. Some of the key fabrication and construction occupations will require journeymen status or equivalent and, in addition, may require some upgrading skills to meet special certification standards.

For the other occupations, the standard requirement of the particular industry, whether it is construction or steel fabrication, I expect will be sufficient. That is what is envisaged by the project management team right now.

During the development phase of the project, the major activities that I made reference to, for example, the gravity base structure, will rely largely on the mechanical and civil trades available in the construction industry. The skill levels and mechanical outfitting are required to be higher in some cases but the standard requirement is sufficient in others.

Module fabrication will require mainly the steel fabrication trades, plate and pipefitters, welders, riggers and electricians. Again the skill levels required are high, particularly for fitters and welders.

Then we come to the topside assembly which will require mainly mechanical trades involved in marine fabrication. It is likely that many of those skills, particularly the fitters, welders and electricians will require some upgrading in order to qualify for the jobs with the state of the art techniques required.

In the closing moments of my presentation, I want to just give you some indication of what preparations have taken place in Newfoundland. I am sure that other preparations have taken place across Canada, and I am aware of some of them, but I am directly involved in the preparations taking place in Newfoundland. I just want to make reference to one institution that is well known. I made reference to it this morning, the Cabot Institute.

In 1989 the faculty and administrative staff of the Cabot Institute authorized a strategic plan for the year 2000, which is the time frame for this particular project. The impact of the offshore oil development was a major consideration which influenced the over-all contents of the document. This was worked on for over four years. The people involved worked with management and with the knowledge of the skills required, they travelled to North American and European offshore construction and production sites. Some of the faculty members received on-site training themselves in such diverse disciplines as well logging, dimensional control, pipefitting, structural welding, project management, computer aided design and drafting, computer aided manufacturing and quality assurance and quality control.

As part of this, the computer facilities at Cabot itself have been substantially upgraded and are currently considered to be the best, certainly in our provincial college system, and could rate with any of those in eastern Canada. I may be challenged on that, but I know they are certainly of a very high quality.

There are some other specific things that have been done, again in the Cabot Institute, to make ready the system of education and training in Newfoundland for this project. I mentioned the strategic plan and I will not expand on that any more.

There is a second computer assisted drafting and design lab that recently was installed to serve all the engineering technologies. Riely's Datashare of Calgary—and here we have some involvement from western Canada—has agreed to make available to Cabot Institute a database with a commercial value of $750,000 containing data from over 20 wells in the Hibernia and related geological structures. This, with the relatively scant knowledge I have of the oil drilling operation, is an invaluable resource that will be used by students in the petroleum engineering technology. Another thing, again at the Cabot Institute, a state of the art geographical information system has been purchased and forms the basis of a revised survey and engineering technology program. All other engineering technologies will be made aware of the versatility of the computer software that is involved in this program.

We have another item. This institute has enthusiastically endorsed the introduction of the co-operative education program. In fact, in September it introduced its first co-operative education program, a three-year, eight-term program in computer studies. I do not have to tell you the importance of computers in the operation of this business and in the instrumentation involved. They have a steering committee that will target further current offerings for delivery through co-operative education in 1991 and every year to follow. They have an advisory committee set up specifically to oversee skills related to the Hibernia project. They have other areas, as well.

I spoke with the president of the institute just this morning and I was quite impressed by many of the concerns it has. It is concerned that the appropriate labour relations, education, and training will continue to be offered as part of most, if not all, their 60 programs that they have, with a specific eye on what is required for Hibernia.

Such information will be timely, relevant, and appropriately imparted to give their students a clearer understanding of the labour climate within which they will work and to which they will contribute. It will be to no student's benefit to be denied relevant facts on basic labour relations theory and practice as it concerns management and workers. A labour relations management, of course, would do well to address more fully these issues as we get downstream and more people are employed in these activities.

With respect to the Cabot Institute, during the next few years many of the businesses and companies that will most probably be involved in the Hibernia project will be affected by the graduates of this institute. They have not forgotten their traditional programs and they must continue to educate and train Newfoundlanders, Labradorians, and indeed mainlanders who attend the institute for non-oil related jobs. These are the businesses that will be a spinoff from the project itself. It has been said that perhaps the largest workforce adjustment will occur as indirect effects of Hibernia. Homes must continue to be designed and built and carpenters, electricians and plumbers will continue to work in non-oil related occupations. Business establishments will continue to require quality secretarial and business graduates, and all the education and training facilities must not just reflect Hibernia but the spillovers that will pertain to Hibernia.

Before I wrap up, I would like to summarize one of the main concerns that is pertained in this House from November 7 of last year, which is almost a year ago when we first started to discuss this project. Some will say it is a relatively short time, but it has been the style of the House. It went through first and second reading and committee stage. While some may disagree with the length of time it took, we are now at this stage and third reading.

The one thread that went through this whole thing was the project's commitment to Canada. I think there were well founded suspicions. I never impute the motives of those people who are concerned about how we spend the taxpayers' money. I would like to cover basically what the project's commitment is to Canada.

I take great comfort from the knowledge that I have of this project, but I would like to emphasize that this is a megaproject. There are risks and benefits involved. At this point in time, as we search out into the uncertainty, we on this side of the House believe and I am sure many of my colleagues believe that the benefits are greater than the risks. The Governments of Canada and Newfoundland and Labrador have entered into an agreement with Mobil Oil and the joint venture participants on the development of Hibernia.

A lot of this will be summary, but as a result of the fiscal agreement the Government of Canada will contribute 25 per cent of the pre-production capital costs, up to a value of $1 billion. It will guarantee loans for 40 per cent of the pre-production capital costs, up to a maximum guarantee of $1.7 billion. The Government of Newfoundland and Labrador will remove the retail sales tax on project capital costs, reduce the retail sales tax on operating costs to 4 per cent, accept a price sensitive royalty regime, and provide $10 million to the project for specific engineering activities in the province. In return, the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador will earn net revenues from the project of between $2.6 billion and $5.1 billion, based on 1987 oil prices. I have not yet got the projections for the present oil prices. I can only assume that they will be greater. These are conservative estimates.

Both governments will also earn a substantial share of the profits if the oil prices surge again, which they are now doing, but who knows where they are going to be 20 years from now, and if the reserves prove larger than expected.

I would have to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that I believe like the song says: "This is going to be the start of something big." We know there are two more oil fields. Twenty miles south of Hibernia is the Terra Nova oil field, and not far from the Terra Nova oil field is the Ben Nevis oil field. Who knows, we believe there are more out there.

These revenue figures basically refer to the tax principles and the royalties involved. They do not include the economic benefits that accrue from the creation of jobs or industrial opportunities for individual firms.

As a result of the negotiations that were recently concluded, the commitments to Canada and Newfoundland benefits were reinforced, and certain aspects were incorporated as formal undertakings. These undertakings are summarized.

Regarding the employment and the procurement benefits, in a sense fair opportunity is given where fair opportunity can be given. Indeed, the best efforts are being made to achieve the Canadian and Newfoundland target content on a competitive basis of 45 per cent to 50 per cent. This includes the estimated 40 per cent to 50 per cent of module fabrication and up to 90 per cent and maybe 100 per cent of fabrication of decks and preassemblies in the outfitting of the concrete base.

They are to have their performance with respect to these targets monitored by the Canada-Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board, which will examine reasons for possible shortfalls and measures to overcome them.

I will say now I am aware that the Newfoundland government is setting up a combination of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in Newfoundland provincially. I do not know the structure or the details. I believe that there is work under way to set up a special monitoring team to make sure that this project does what it says it was going to do and what it really should be doing.

Then we have the main support frame, assembly and outfitting. Of course that will take place in Newfoundland.

The engineering itself is again to make the best efforts to achieve a target of 80 per cent to 90 per cent in Canada for project management. Engineering design is for the gravity base structure, topsides and the articulated loading platform that I described earlier along with the subsea pipelines.

Fifty per cent of the gravity base structure design engineering and 100 per cent of the design engineering for the accommodation facilities—very important—flare boom, helideck and subsea export lines are in Newfoundland.

They are to package the engineering contracts, to promote participation of Canadian and Newfoundland businesses, to encourage the formation of national engineering consortia to qualify for the project, and to award the project services and topside engineering contract to a consortium with a majority Canadian equity participation and commensurate direction. That is in the process of happening now. In fact some of it has happened. Finally, they are to include the assessment of benefits as a key factor in the awarding of engineering contracts.

It has been my great privilege to stand in this House of Commons and to talk about this project. It is one that is dear to my heart. I know my colleagues support it. Many colleagues on both sides of the House see this as a vision that has come to fruition, a vision that is about to become a reality.

Again, I mentioned I was involved in two projects from the very beginning: the concept and the paper that now will be a Canadian patrol frigate program. It was written in 1977. I first saw the frigate as a whole frigate 12 years later. I cannot convey to you, Mr. Speaker, the feeling of translating the vision and words on paper to something that is a reality.

I sense that perhaps it would be inadequate just to summarize and sort of say that I am finished.

I would like to quote King Solomon who I believe was recorded to have said: "Without vision the people perish." This was a vision, but I will say also that without jobs the people starve. Somewhere in between the vision and the jobs, there has been an awful lot of hard word that has gone on—and the hon. minister mentioned it this morning—by politicians, by businessmen, by bureaucrats, by civil servants, by the average person in the field, by everybody involved.

I have not found any one person who has been touched by this project, who has been anything but positive. There are negative people, there are pessimists around and for reason. With the uncertainty involved, there are bound to be some people who will say it is not going to work, you are going to lose money, you are going to lose equalization payments or you will not get all those jobs. That is fair enough and I defend their right to feel that way, but I would say that as this project proceeds those who will be optimistic will far and increasingly outnumber those who are pessimistic about the success of this project and about the kind of benefits that we will derive from it.

There is a spirit in Hibernia. I call it the Hibernia spirit. People ask me: "Why is it called Hibernia". I say: "I don't know. I like the name Hibernia. I am sure there are all kinds of reasons for it". The spirit is there and the other thing that I sense is—I wish I could find a more musical, a more sophisticated, a more esoteric term to call it but I cannot—a psychological kick, and I like that psychological kick. I sense it in the province. I sense it on open line shows. I sense it in the newspaper, and I sense it in my colleagues when we talk about things.

One must not underestimate the power of confidence, both in the business world and among the general public. The tangible benefits of Hibernia itself may still be years away and sustained prosperity may yet still be a dream. I will acknowledge that, but the project will do its job if Canada in general and Newfoundland in particular can milk the mood of optimism and push the economic spectators and pessimists back into the playing field as we forge ahead with this omnipotent, wonderful, welcome, fantastic, project.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing the hon. member for Edmonton East, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand)—Official languages; the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn (Mr. Fisher)—Human rights; the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster)—Employment.

[English]

The hon. member for Edmonton East has the floor.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton East, has 20 minutes. I certainly do not want to take any part of that from him, but I am wondering if I could get consent for government members to split the time in the next 20 minutes so that two of our colleagues could have the opportunity to speak.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House willing to agree to 10-minute speeches instead of 20-minute speeches?

Some hon. members: No.

[English]

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, having been a representative in this House for almost eight years and two weeks, there has always been a gentlemen's agreement that the opportunity—

Ms. Mitchell: What about women?

An hon. member: And gentlewomen.

Mr. MacDougall: And gentlewomen. There has always been consent that the time allocation could be split. I am wondering if maybe we could continue along with the opportunity of individuals having the right to do so.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford, on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I don't want to harass the hon. member. However, I have been a member of this House for 11 years, and all I can say is that gentlemen's agreements belong to a time when people were prepared to respect the other person's right to speak.

Considering what happened yesterday, and I am referring to the obvious lack of co-operation with requests by the Bloc québécois, we certainly are not prepared to do government members a favour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, on the same point of order.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I think that if hon. members would care to look it up, they would find that according to Standing Order 43, the Chair has every right to recognize whom it wishes. If the Chair decides to recognize two members of the same party, one after the other, and if these two members decide they will each speak only ten minutes, I think the Chair would be perfectly free to accommodate the members. And if the members in question were each to speak only ten minutes, I would have no objection.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that after those ten minutes, members are also entitled to ten minutes of questions and answers.

Consequently, the matter is not as straightforward as he seems to think. In any case, if the hon. member wants to speak for five minutes or two minutes or whatever— In most cases, however, if they have nothing to say, they should refrain from taking the floor and give our colleagues a chance who do have some important things to say.

[English]

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I think on this point of order it is worth bearing in mind that the only reason the question arises at all is because, for reasons known best to them, certainly not understood by us, it was the government that brought in the time allocation that is guillotining this debate a half an hour from now. It is their own damn fault, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but I did not hear the question put by the hon. member for Edmonton East.

An hon. member: It's not a question. It was just a comment.

[English]

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): It is not a question, Mr. Speaker, it was a contribution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Now, on debate, do you wish to speak?

[English]

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Pardon?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Do you want to speak on the debate?

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Yes, please.

Mr. Speaker, I must admit there were times today when I thought the moment would never arrive at all. I realize the disappointment my rising now must inspire in some quarters of this House, however I feel compelled in the interests of the people of Canada to proceed, regardless, Mr. Speaker.

In setting out so to do I should like to note again for the record a brief remark delivered by the hon. minister close to the beginning of his speech this morning in which he, referring to all members that have participated in the debate over the Hibernia bill, said that they had "debated this bill but have always supported Hibernia".

I would like, Mr. Speaker, if I may, to note this once and for all. The bill that is before this House has received the vigorous opposition of the New Democratic Party caucus at every stage. Mr. Speaker, it is the bill that has received that opposition. We have no objection in principle to the Hibernia project. I wish that to be utterly clear.

Further, if a group of private sector proponents were to come to the Government of Canada and say: "Hey, Government of Canada, we've got all this money here. We want to build Hibernia," and if in so doing they were able to satisfy the EARP process, which by the way to this day has not been undertaken with regard to the Hibernia project, and if they were able to satisfy certain other social and economic criteria, fine, no problem. Let them at it.

But, Mr. Speaker, the minute a penny of public money becomes involved in a project, it is most legitimately the business of this House and it is the duty of the members of this House to closely consider the wisdom of the regime under which it is proposed that public money be spent.

It is exactly the same thing as if I was to stumble into this House one day and say: "Hey, guys, gals, we got this plan out in Alberta. We are going to extract penicillin from cowhide. The only thing is we need a billion dollars. It is going to make all kinds of jobs. I mean, we are going to employ everybody from Coutts to Fort Chipewyan, but we do need the billion bucks."

I would expect that hon. members of this House would look at that, they would sort of scratch their chins and say: "Hm-m-m. Sounds a bit fuzzy but let's have a look."

That would be proper. It would be absolutely proper for the members of this House to adopt that attitude, which is precisely the attitude that the New Democratic Party caucus has adopted in this House. I am sorry if it has disappointed many of the hon. members here that we have declined to join in the hallelujah chorus in this instance, but it is a declination we shall maintain because the terms of the bill are inadequate. It is not a good deal for the people of Canada. In fact, it is a profoundly bad deal for the people of Canada.

I say this in the main because, right at the outset, the bill proposes to give $1,040 million to the proponents of the project. That is: give, Mr. Speaker. In the quaint language of the bill itself, it is called a "contribution". The same thing as "gift". That, we cannot support.

Time and time again I have raised the question, why not equity? If indeed the project is one that has merit— and we believe it is a project with merit— why then must we give the money away if government participation is required, and we are willing to accept the argument, given the risks involved and the huge capital nature of the project? Some public involvement is quite likely warranted. Why can we not invest it as, in fact, do the private sector proponents of the project?

Mobil Oil is not giving money to the Hibernia project. Petro-Canada is not giving money to the Hibernia project. They are investing money in the Hibernia project. It is only the people of Canada, through this bill and, I should note, the people of Newfoundland through the various concessions that have been wrested from their provincial government, that are giving away money to this project. It is not warranted because that public participation could easily be undertaken in the form of equity, as has been the case in other energy megaprojects.

The Government of Ontario is a 25 per cent equity partner in the Suncor project, the very first of the large oil sands projects in northeastern Alberta. The government of Alberta, through its oil sands equity held by the trust fund is an equity participant in the Syncrude project. The Government of Canada is an equity participant to the tune of more than 31 per cent in the Lloydminster Bi-Provincial upgrader. All of these megaprojects have proceeded with public money. The difference is that in each instance that money has found its way into the project by way of equity earning a return for the people whose money it is; in this instance, the people of Canada.

I would note just in passing that in the 1980s the people of Alberta, from their 16 per cent share of the Syncrude project, reaped over $400 million net because of that equity participation. That is a tidy piece of change.

It is the sort of thing that could lighten the deficit load borne by our poor finance minister. But, no, Mr. Speaker, the bill before this House proposes simply to give that money away.

During the progress of this bill in this House and in committee, I could not help but be impressed by the wonderful congruence of interest apparently displayed by the Conservatives and the Liberals. There is a touching unanimity in this instance that has manifested itself in a number of ways and on a number of occasions from the merely obscurantist to the downright offensive.

In the former category, Mr. Speaker, I would refer you to the fact that on June 12, 1990, in committee, I directly questioned the Minister of Energy regarding the question of where the oil to be produced at Hibernia would go. I asked the minister, and I quote from the record of the committee:

> What was the department's best estimate of the percentage of Hibernia production that will be shipped to foreign market and never seen in a Canadian refinery?

The minister answered:

> Mr. Chairman, it is possible that some of the production over a given period of time entirely could go to a refinery other than Canadian, primarily refineries in the northeast United States. It will depend, quite frankly, on Canadian refineries bidding on some of that crude.

I asked the minister:

> Have you a percentage?

The minister responded:

> I do not think we do.

I asked the minister:

> Have you a ballpark, a guess, a stab in the dark?

The minister responded:

> It will only be that, Mr. Chairman, a stab in the dark.

I urged the minister, "go ahead". The minister responded:

> I cannot say, Mr. Chairman, because it would relate to the oil flow of the consortium and their supplies, both national and international.

I asked:

> So the department does not even have a guess?

The minister responded:

> Well, Mr. Chairman, it gets into the whole matter of companies and their own contracts. That makes it very difficult for an energy minister to try to assert himself at this stage.

A half a year before, appearing in the Senate energy committee where there are only Liberals and Conservatives, where there is a comfortable muzzling of anything that may be raised, the chairman of that committee, a senator from Calgary, asked the minister: "I would like to return to Hibernia for a moment and a question prompted by Mr. Hopper's testimony to the effect that if Hibernia crude comes onstream it will probably move to the United States". The minister responded: "There is no question about probably, Mr. Chairman, it will move to the U.S."

It must be a terrible thing to be a minister of the Crown, to have what was certainty in December change to the ineffable, the indefinable, the airy and ethereal, by June. That is what happened here, or perhaps it was the change in altitude between the committee room, being a room in the Senate, and the committee meeting room in the House. But regardless of what it was, straightforward answers, answers with some kind of relation to reality, were not to be had, at least not by me in the committee.

We now move to the more grotesque elements of suppression of information here. In this very House yesterday, when a motion taking at face value the assertions of those who hold that this project will be a virtual economic second coming for the people of Newfoundland and for many others across Canada as well, that this will result in a level of prosperity and employment that will just leave everybody leaping up and down with joy, taking all that at face value, the hon. member for Kamloops, the House leader of the New Democratic Party, proposed an amendment at report stage which would simply ask that once a year somebody in government put together a detailed presentation on how wonderful it had become.

We asked in this motion that a report be presented annually to the House indicating (a) the net direct and indirect economic benefits in each Canadian province which results from the Hibernia development project; (b) the net employment benefits in each Canadian province which results from the Hibernia development project, including an analysis of job classifications and salary levels; and (c) the quantities and percentages of oil production which are exported in unrefined or semi-refined states from the project site. That was it in its entirety. It was just a request to see at annual intervals how swell the whole thing had become. You know what happened? Every single member of the Conservative and Liberal caucuses present rose in their places to vote against it, including the hon. member who just took up half a day singing the praises of the project.

These folk are willing to have us buy a pig in a poke. They are willing to have us take a flyer on this project, but they are not willing to let the people of Canada see how it works out over time. What are they afraid of? What are they hiding? What is it in these wonderful predictions that they fear will not be borne out? Could it be that these full time 1,100 jobs, for example, that we are going to wind up with at the end of the project are not going to be found in Newfoundland or even in Canada but, in fact, may be found in the majority in the offices of Mobil in the United States? We do not know. In the absence of any willingness by the Conservatives or the Liberals to engage in any kind of long-term disclosure, I must confess I got me some doubts.

There is another matter here, getting back again to the financing of the project. It is not just the $1,040 million that we will give to this project, which I would like every Canadian citizen to know, is $40 for every man, woman and child in this country. Forty dollars a head, straight to Hibernia in a gift. The people of Canada can amuse themselves thinking about that when they start paying the GST in January. They can think that first $40 of GST they paid—it will take $570 worth of purchases to do it—that first $40 of GST they paid: bang, off to Hibernia. If we roll in the loan guarantees and the loans as well, that is another $2.135 billion. That is $82 per capita. Eighty two bucks in GST. That is $1,170 worth of purchases in the new year on which the GST is paid, bang, off to Hibernia. That is just in the legislation authorizing the $1.4 billion contribution.

There is as well the matter before the House now of the privatization of Petro-Canada. Part of this privatization scheme is to take the first 15 per cent share offering and plough all that money right back into the company. Market analysts who know a lot more about this than I do have been quoted publicly as saying that that is going to generate somewhere around $500 million to $700 million for Petro-Canada. Do you know what the value of Petro-Canada's participation in Hibernia is, Mr. Speaker? It is somewhere between $500 million and $700 million. That is what their equity share will amount to. That means, given that the public purse is being ripped off for this 15 per cent share that is going to be ploughed back into this heroically privatized Petro-Canada, the people of Canada are in fact going to wind up footing a bill of somewhere between $1.5 billion and $1.7 billion. Free money to Hibernia. Not to put too fine an edge on it, this is nuts. This is bizarre.

When I came to the House less than two years ago, I never thought I would see the day when these Conservatives—who keep proclaiming their undying fealty to the free market, their unalloyed devotion to the market red in tooth and claw—propose that the Canadian taxpayer with a smile on her or his lips just give $1.5 billion so that Mobil Oil can ship oil out of the Atlantic Ocean down to the northeast United States. This defies credulity, but it seems to be the case. It is odd, it is bizarre, but it is the case. It is why again I say, and again I note, that our caucus cannot in conscience support this bill.

I am astonished that the Liberals can put themselves through whatever contortions are required in order to do so. I have lost my capacity to be astounded at the actions of the government, however.

In conclusion, there are merits to the Hibernia project. These are merits that the NDP has recognized for a long time. These are merits that the NDP would like to see developed further, but not at any price and not as the consequence of a ludicrous deal struck by some irresponsible federal government with the sharpies of the private sector oil industry. Mr. Speaker, they was took and we ain't gonna to be a party to their being took.

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Since I do not have much time, Mr. Speaker, I will ask a few questions to the hon. member for Edmonton East and perhaps he might respond when I am finished.

First I should like to hear his assessment of the national spin-offs from the Hibernia project. I should like to know whether he agrees with the statement that Canadian manufacturers and suppliers using Canadian resources can provide between 55 and 60 per cent of whatever will be needed to complete the project, as compared to 25 to 35 per cent in similar works in other countries with the kind of know-how we have in Canada.

My second question has to do with the benefits for the province of Quebec. We know that, for technical reasons, some of the facilities have to be built on site in Newfoundland, but 40 per cent of the remainder of the Canadian production will go to the province of Quebec.

In his response I would like the hon. member to elaborate on his remarks about the fact that a Montreal firm—SNC—will manage projects valued at $360 million in professional fees. I would also ask him to comment on the fact that companies in Montreal like Atlas and Janin which are going to manage all the subcontracts in this area— I wish you would comment on how important it is for a Quebec company to manage subcontracts and do business with its usual subcontractors. I also wish he would comment on the fact that since Quebec engineers will do the design work, and I am sure they will do so knowledgeably, Quebec companies will tender for the projects concerned. I would appreciate his comments in this respect.

I also wish he would tell us what he thinks about the fact that his project will help develop, in Quebec and in Eastern Canada, the kind of expertise that is comparable to what they have in Calgary, a type of expertise we did not have before.

That being said, I would ask him whether he agrees that in my riding there would be two to three million hours worth of work for employees at the Lauzon shipyards and whether he agrees there might be two to three million hours of work for technicians, professionals and administrative personnel.

Finally, I wish the hon. member for Edmonton East would tell me whether he agrees that the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, the Minister of the Environment, the Minister for External Trade, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Prime Minister of Canada are to be commended on an excellent project for Canada as a whole and for Quebec in particular.

[English]

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to the last question is no.

I am sorry. I realize I should have been taking notes through all that. Unfortunately I never did learn shorthand. I will try to wrap this all together in one lump.

What the hon. member seems to have been asking me is whether or not I think it is a good thing that all these wonderful things, allegedly, will be happening in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada.

Well, Mr. Speaker, yes. I applaud industrial work in Quebec and Canada. I think it is a good thing that Canadian working people have jobs. I think it is a good thing that Canadian working people have jobs with good pay, good benefits, and long-term security. That is one of the main reasons I am in this circus, Mr. Speaker.

But I am curious. Assuming that the hon. member is right—and that is all any of us can do unless there is somebody here with a crystal ball I don't know about—but assuming the hon. member is right why would he have been so distressed at the prospect of an annual report proving him to be right?

If in fact all these delightful benefits that he alleges will transpire in consequence of the spending of somewhere around $1.5 billion of public federal money free of charge into the Hibernia project, if he is right that in fact these benefits would accrue therefrom, why hide his light under a bushel? Why defeat or, at least, join in the defeating of a motion that would have made that plain to all for years to come?

I do not know, Mr. Speaker. I do not know, but I would like to ask one other question.

An hon. member: You're supposed to answer the question.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): It is the Socratic method, don't you know?

An hon. member: No, we don't know.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Well, look it up some time.

Presumably these benefits would not evaporate like the dew in the morning if the public participation in the project were in the form of equity. Presumably, if the project proceeded with public equity, it would still need the same manufacturing, it would still require the employment of the same persons, and it would still produce the same spin-offs.

So, what's the problem? If in fact the members opposite are sincere in their desire for all these good things, and I have no reason to doubt that they are—

Mr. McCurdy: Oh? Why not doubt?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Because I am a charitable man and I try always to believe the best of everyone.

An hon. member: Don't be a naive man.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Oh, no, I would never be that. I hope I have proven that.

Mr. Speaker, add one more good thing on top. Add equity for the amount of money you put in so that the Canadian people can get the fair return to which they are entitled in the event of the success of the project. That is all we ask. Their consistent refusal to entertain that proposal leaves us asking questions. Sorry about that.

• (1640)

An hon. member: They cannot do that, that is why.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie. You have two minutes left.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, first of all, unlike what was said by the future ex-member for Lévis, there are no guarantees in this project for contracts in Quebec.

Second, we must not forget that Quebec is an importer of oil, and as far as I know, the Hibernia project will not be subject to control by the National Energy Board of Canada, according to article 41C of the Canada—Newfoundland Agreement, which only provides guarantees for the Maritime Provinces.

When we know that Quebec imports 39 per cent of its oil from Western Canada, when we consider the Sarnia regulations that were made to prevent existing refineries in Quebec from exporting, when we consider all that, it is clear this project does not offer any economic benefits for Quebec and that in case of oil shortages, Quebec is not protected by the Canada-Newfoundland Agreement. The members of the Conservative Party certainly did not consider that aspect or, if they are aware of it, next time they will probably get 3.9 per cent or 4 per cent of the vote as they did in Laurier—Sainte-Marie!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The period for questions and comments has expired. There are two minutes left.

[English]

The hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Reid: On debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An hon. member: It is finished.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that I have the right to respond to my hon. colleague's comments.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but the period for questions and comments has now expired. The hon. member for St. John's East has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, in the two minutes that I have, I want to sum up, if I may, having spoken twice in the last week on this question.

The first question that we as a country must ask is, do we want an oil and gas industry developed off the east coast of the country for the benefit of all Canadians?

The second question, therefore, is how do we—as Canadians, as governments, as industries, as people who provide jobs, create wealth and create commerce in this country—accommodate that?

Then, we must ask, is it possible that the needs and the interests of all the parties can be met in designing a project that will lead to other projects and to the creation of these jobs and this wealth?

Over the last number of years the Newfoundland government, the Government of Canada, the oil and gas companies that have the knowledge, the capability, and the industrial capacity to develop this project, have come together in the interests of those parties individually, but also in the interests of all Canadians.

We have not been able to come up with a proposal that is 100 per cent satisfactory to everybody. We never will. That cannot happen. We have a proposal that makes everyone happy. It is in the best interests of all Canadians now and in the future.

As we move from this day to the development of this project into production; as we see other projects develop and move into production; as we see jobs created; as we see Canadians across the country work to contribute to this project, the financial commitment of the government and the people of Canada will have been worth while. As all Canadians witness the benefit of the growth of an offshore oil and gas industry on the east coast of the country, a benefit that will make Canadians competitive and develop an industry, we will see others develop around it.

Those who speak against this project do not have the interests of the country at heart. Those who speak against this bill are not being reasonable and—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being 4.45 p.m., pursuant to order made Tuesday, October 2, 1990 and in accordance with Standing Order 78, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Epp), which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

PRIVILEGE

RIGHT TO DIFFER

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton East on a question of privilege.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Yes, Madam Speaker, and I already gave you notice.

Madam Speaker, in Le Droit of today, October 4, there is an article headlined "Liberals Want Duceppe Out"—

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. It is just that with the noise in the House I cannot hear her. It would be very difficult for me to have any opinion whatsoever on something I could not hear. If conversations could be held behind the curtains, it would be very helpful.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: Madam Speaker, I want to dissociate myself from these remarks of a few colleagues who do not represent the views of all Liberals. Madam Speaker, may I say that in spite of all the efforts I make to fight the idea of separation in the province of Quebec, I will defend the rights of all duly elected members of the House, including those whose political opinion I do not share.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

THE ENVIRONMENT

TREATMENT AND DISCHARGE OF WASTE WATERS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of co-operating with municipal, regional, towardand provincial governments in establishing a cost-shared program toward the implementation of innovative programs for the treatment and discharge of domestic and industrial waste waters, which programs would include alternative methods of land-based disposal.

He said: Madam Speaker, I would like you, for a moment, to imagine that you are on vacation in Quebec and you are strolling along the banks of the St. Lawrence River, enjoying the beauty of the oncoming fall colours and the peaceful respite of your solitude with nature. Suddenly, along the water's edge approaches no fewer than 15,000 garbage trucks. You are, naturally, mystified by the procession and horrified as each truck pulls up to the edge of the river bank and proceeds to dump its foul contents into the swirling waters. Naturally, as anyone would be, you are outraged. You rush to alert the authorities about the environmental horror and are even more shocked when you are politely told that this is in fact nothing unusual, that it happens every day.

Preposterous, you say. Well, quite the contrary, because although it does not happen in such an obvious manner, the fact is that these 15,000 garbage trucks represent the equivalent of the 500 million litres of untreated waste water and the 50 metric tons of raw sewage that are dumped into the St. Lawrence River every day of the year, and it represents the kind of despoliation that occurs daily across this country of ours, pollution that occurs because from Victoria to St. John's, our Canadian towns and municipalities are struggling with outdated and inadequate sewage treatment and waste management facilities.

A while back, some towns along the Ottawa River had to close beaches to swimming because the heavy rains had overwhelmed the municipal sewage treatment facilities. Out west, where six pulp mills along the Fraser River dump an estimated 32,000 tonnes of toxic waste into the river every year, environmental organizations have now labelled the Fraser the biggest open sewer line in British Columbia. In some areas, such as Newcastle, New Brunswick, creeping groundwater pollution from industrial leakage has contaminated the city water supply to the point that residents of that town have to rely on delivery trucks to supply bottled water, at a cost of some $32,000 each week.

There is a danger in our water. There is a danger in our lakes and our river systems that support our wildlife and our fisheries, and a danger to the Canadian people who must consume this resource. It is a danger that we, as Canadians, are only now becoming aware of. Many Canadians today do not believe the assurances that Canada's tap water is safe to drink. According to a Gallup poll published last October, some 95 per cent of Canadians are concerned about the health quality of their drinking water, water that often must be treated extensively to remove sewage contaminants before actually being consumed. The fact is, we have been reckless. We have been reckless about the judicious husbandry of an invaluable resource in this country, a resource we have taken for granted because as everyone, including our envious neighbours to the south believe, Canada has oodles of water. But, does it? Despite the fact that Canada holds some 20 per cent of the world's freshwater supplies, only 9 per cent of that is available for our use. The rest is termed fossil water, a legacy of the last ice age, and that 9 per cent is a resource at risk.

As well, over 60 per cent of our rivers flow northward where only 10 per cent of Canada's population lives. Major sections of our population throughout the prairies and the interior dry belt of British Columbia live in areas of chronic water shortage and must rely on groundwater supplies that are becoming increasingly contaminated.

Canadians have, largely out of ignorance, squandered their water resources. Canadians on a per capita basis are the world's second largest consumer of freshwater. We squander some 4,100 litres of water each day for every man, woman and child in this country. For too long water in Canada has been treated as a free commodity with no incentive for conservation. It is estimated that it takes some 5,000 litres of water just to put a restaurant meal on the table. The average Canadian uses about 500 litres of water each day, although his or her biological needs are only about one or two litres a day. Think about this. It takes over 10,000 litres of water to raise half a pound of beef. When considering evaporation from irrigation, it requires some 1,500 litres of fresh water every day to nourish a single apple tree growing in the Okanagan Valley.

Evidence of our over-exploitation of fresh water resources is all around us. Experts have been warning us for years. We need to curb the wasteful use of fresh water supplies. We need to develop the appropriate methods to replenish our waste waters and we need to reduce the outrageous dumping of industrial and domestic wastes into our rivers and lakes.

Our groundwater reservoirs, or aquifers as they called, are increasingly polluted by pesticides, agricultural chemicals, runoff from domestic and industrial dumps, leakage from underground gasoline, oil and septic tanks. In our lakes and rivers, pollution from human activities has destroyed aquatic life, is inhibiting the reproductive capacity of mammals and birds and now seriously threatens the health of Canadian citizens. Such pollution has seriously disturbed the composition of wildlife species and has increased the rate of species extinction in Canada. It is estimated that aquatic ecosystems in some parts of North America have lost up to 20 per cent of their indigenous species because of acidification of our lakes.

Estimates of the number of lakes at risk in Canada from pollution of airborne contaminants range up to 600,000. Already as many as 100,000 lakes have been seriously damaged. Another 14,000 are biologically dead. Over 360 chemical compounds have been found in our Great Lakes. Among them are a number of persistent toxins which due to biomagnification and concentration build up in our food pyramid and affect those animal species at the top of the pyramid, including man.

Alkylated lead, benzopyrene, ethylenediamine tetra acetate, hexachlorobenzene, polychlorinated biphenyls, dichlorodiphenyltrichloroethane, words which are a mouthful in themselves, aromatic hydrocarbons with exotic names and a deadly reputation.

Industrial polluters annually discharge over 7.8 billion litres of liquid waste into Canadian lakes and rivers, an amount that is equal to the water that flows over the Niagara Falls in one 10-hour interval. It is no wonder that of the 10 most highly valued species of fish in Lake Ontario, seven have almost completely disappeared. It is no wonder that of the species still remaining, tumours and cancerous lesions have been found in their tissues. It is no wonder that the beluga whale, the friendly giants, as they call them, of the St. Lawrence have dwindled from a population of over 5,000 at the turn of the century to only 500 today. For the embattled beluga, the victims of deadly toxins spewing out of municipal and industrial waste sites, the St. Lawrence has become a war zone, a war in which the ultimate victim is man himself.

I could go on citing specific instances of serious pollution over Canada's waters from one coast to the other, but I think my point has been made perhaps alarmingly clear. The fact is that we can no longer use our waterways as convenient repositories for our wastes. To allow our mighty rivers, the St. Lawrence, the Fraser, the Columbia, the Saskatchewan, the Ottawa, to become nothing more than open sewers is to squander the trust that has been bestowed upon us as the caretakers of this great land.

To continue along our present path jeopardizes the integrity of our environment and with it our economic well-being. In fact, what is at stake here is our very survival. Yet, despite this impending reality Canadian governments, including this government, have been notoriously slow to respond.

The Ontario government's environmental ministry—I speak of the former government—showed that half of the province's industries and one-third of its municipal treatment plants violated water pollution guidelines in 1988.

The Quebec Chamber of Commerce recently commented, an astounding comment, that the provincial government would never close down an industry if it is going to cost jobs, no matter how badly it is harming the environment.

In British Columbia, the Vancouver Sun reported that many of B.C.'s pulp mills would face criminal prosecution if federal guidelines were simply enforced. In fact, it was recently exposed that senior officials and those above, as the quote says, in the federal ministry of fisheries actually blocked legal action against major industrial polluters in the pulp mill industry in B.C. That is an absolutely scandalous situation.

In many parts of Canada municipalities unable to afford the cost of upgrading their sewage treatment facilities continue to contribute knowingly, but what choice have they, to water pollution by dumping untreated or partially treated sewage into the lakes and into the surrounding streams.

In Quebec only 250 of the provinces 1,500 municipalities actually have sewage treatment plants. I think that is about 16 per cent, but it represents only about 6 per cent of the province's population. Less than half of Montreal's sewage is treated. The rest is dumped, millions of gallons a day of raw sewage, into the St. Lawrence.

In Ontario, about one-third of the province's municipalities dump partially treated but substandard sewage into its lakes and rivers.

In Newfoundland, more than 48,000 households simply cannot afford and do not have adequate water and sewer service.

The Pearce report of 1985, entitled Currents of Change, calculated that on a national average, only 57 per cent of Canada's population is in fact served by sewage treatment plants. This compares with some 74 per cent of the American population that is serviced by sewage treatment and 99 per cent of the Swedish population who are also served by treatment facilities. So we are well behind the ballgame.

That report became the basis for this federal government's 1987 federal water policy, a policy which has been referred to in the government's often touted green plan, but a document like The Green Plan has remained a toothless statement of philosophical objectives with essentially no legislation to back it up.

However, the federal water policy does commit the government to co-operative approaches with respect to water management with the provinces who, under the provisions of the federal Constitution, exercise direct control over our water resources.

The policy states: "The federal government intends to work with the provinces and territories to encourage safe and sufficient supplies of fresh water" and to "encourage the use of fresh water in an efficient and equitable manner consistent with social, cultural, and environmental needs."

The policy also talks about protecting and enhancing the quality of Canada's waters. Also, it talks about promoting co-operative federal and provincial endeavours, as well as undertaking and supporting research and development in these issues. It also emphasizes the need for an integrated approach to water management.

A reasonable person could only interpret these comments as a commitment from the government, this administration, to become directly involved with water management in co-operation with other levels of government. This is what it says right there in the federal water policy. That commitment, I submit, although it may be well-intentioned, has never been realized.

I think it is time that the government replaced rhetoric with action. Consultants' studies, policy statements, and green plan documents—these must be supplanted with legislative commitments from the government that will take firm action on Canada's threatened water resources.

That is why my colleagues and I urge the Minister of the Environment to consider specific legislative initiatives that will allow the federal government to develop cost-shared programs for the implementation of innovative projects for the treatment and discharge of municipal and industrial waste waters.

Further, I would urge that these programs incorporate opportunities for the investigation and the experimentation of alternative methods of sewage disposal, such as land based sewage alternatives.

I have heard the arguments that, because water resources are a provincial concern, really the solutions should be left to the provinces. But I reiterate that the government's own stated policy is to work co-operatively with other governments with respect to our inland waters. When it comes right down to it, the pollution of one of our most precious resources should be everyone's concern.

I have made a lot of statements critical about the health of Canada's water resources, so I would like to point out that there are also some real success stories in the country.

For example, the communities of Vernon and Osoyoos in the Okanagan Valley have demonstrated what can be accomplished when a community sets its mind to the task of cleaning up its own back yard. These two communities—one in the north end of the valley and one in the south end of the valley—have put their sewage to work for them. They have been disposing of it as treated waste water on surrounding grasslands and crops. In so doing, they have actually helped keep the sewage out of the interior lakes and have aided in the restoration of the quality of the waters of those lakes.

I want to add at this point that the town of Vernon is now attempting to expand its spray irrigation program where the treated effluent is sprayed on the surrounding agricultural land. It wants to expand that by implementing a pilot project for what it terms wildland irrigation. In this concept, treated effluent is applied to the wildlands such as forest crops. In the case of Vernon, the wildland crop is poplar trees. The nutrients are taken up by the trees, enhance the growth of the trees, and can actually be put to a commercial use.

I want to submit that these kinds of innovative efforts take money. They take more money than our financially strapped communities across Canada can afford. Often, they take more money than provinces can afford.

Many worthwhile projects for sewage treatment sit idle because the cost is too great for these smaller players to go it alone. That is why I submit that the federal government has to lend a helping hand to the communities, as well as to the provinces, in addressing this long-term and increasingly difficult problem. Cost-shared programs between municipal, provincial, and federal authorities to clean up Canada's waters are needed and have actually been sought for some time. The Federation of Canadian Municipalities warns that throughout Canada public health and safety, as well as economic development, are at risk because basic investments have not been made in the needed facilities.

In closing, I would like to say that the government has a unique opportunity to demonstrate its commitment to water quality through a number of initiatives. For example the community of Vernon, working with a local environmental society called the Save our Lakes, or SOL, society has made application for federal funding for their wildland irrigation project that I just talked about. Through this project, the town of Vernon and the community could well pave the way for the development throughout Canada of an innovative and commercially viable means of removing sewage from our lakes and our rivers.

The application for the project was made through the newly created Environmental Partners Fund and to date it has fallen only on deaf ears by the government. I appeal to the Minister of the Environment to seize the initiative by funding worthwhile projects such as Vernon's wildland irrigation schemes. Put your commitment on the line by funding these co-operative ventures.

The time for reports, the time for policy papers is over. The time is now for action.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap for his very illuminating address and his very sincere expression of interest in a major problem, a major area of concern to all Canadians.

I would like to address his subject from a different point of view and to talk a little bit about who pays. Obviously, all members in the House would support the objective to provide Canadians with safe clean water for drinking and for other uses. However, the underlying thrust of the motion seems to be aimed at drawing the federal government back into direct subsidies of municipal infrastructure.

I am pleased to say that I had the experience some years ago of acting as Mayor of Fredericton and as president of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, participating and co-chairing the last tri-level conference of government in the country. We made a very serious effort at some formal structure to bring federal financing directly into the municipal stream through and around the provinces. We were not very successful. It was a very, I would say, aggressive effort by provincial governments to insist that municipalities were creatures of the provinces and therefore any aid to come from the federal government should go to the provinces and be distributed by them to the municipalities, and that the federal government should, in effect, keep its hands off direct municipal intervention. To some extent, I think that that remains true today.

The question of who should pay for municipal infrastructure was also debated, as many members will recall, at great length throughout the 1980s. To a large extent, the real questions being debated today is who will face the unpopular task of coaxing more dollars out of the taxpayers' pockets and who will do the more popular job of spending it.

There are three viewpoints which dominate that debate. The first group, not exclusively but primarily at the municipal level, paints legitimate horror stories about the state of our water supplies and sewage systems. They are emphatic that the job is just too big financially for municipalities to handle. They say that senior government must provide hefty subsidies and besides, they say, the senior government will get it all back through fiscal recapture and it will, in addition, solve our unemployment problems in the process.

Critics of this group did not deny that municipalities were struggling with very real problems in municipal finance, particularly as their ratepayers demanded higher levels and more elaborate levels of service. However, they questioned the logic of municipalities and their taxpayers subsidizing each other through federal and provincial coffers. They also questioned whether the fiscal recapture was real or largely illusory.

The second group—let us call them constitutional purists—generally supported these criticisms. However, they went somewhat further. They pointed to the Constitution as giving one role to the federal government and another, for matters of local concern, to the provinces. They pointed to the hefty level of transfer payments already made to the provinces and to the huge deficit and debt service charges at the federal level, about which we debate in the House almost every day.

They questioned whether federal dollars would be regarded as found money with equivalent amounts being transferred to more glamorous municipal projects and very little being done over all toward putting water and sewer systems on a sound financial footing, ensuring technological improvement, or effecting conservation of water in quality and quantity terms.

Surprisingly, the constitutional purists' group was not found totally at the federal level. Provinces frequently reminded the federal government that municipalities are their business. That was their line back in 1974 when I was last involved in this debate. Ottawa may help to provide the money, but the provinces feel that the priority, distribution of funding, and the standards by which it is distributed are their prerogatives. This sentiment also found some expression at the municipal level. Municipalities, such as Fredericton where I reside, which had provided their own residents with a high level of services, objected to the prospect of contributing to the needs of other municipalities, both within and outside their provinces, that have not yet dealt with those problems.

These debates have been useful. Although very little has been resolved, at least two things have been accomplished. First, the financial needs camp has established in the minds of the citizenry the harsh reality that we have not done a very good job in handling municipal infrastructures. Second, the constitutional purists' camp has forced us to consider who is responsible and who is in the best position to effect over-all changes in our approach to municipal infrastructure.

The third view, and it is not necessarily new, but it is gaining rapid acceptance in water management circles, not just in Canada but all over the world. This group, which is supported by this government, claims that if the user pays most of the cost directly, we will not only get the least cost solution but we also get other other water management and environmental advantages.

The Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, OECD, published a major study on the pricing of water services a few months ago. It found that the extent of subsidization of water services varied greatly within and across OECD countries, but was generally higher in the OECD's off-centre members in North America, Japan and Australia. The report strongly supported the general applicability of the user-pay principle. The essential element of that principle is that an incentive is provided for the user to economize in the use of the service of natural resources. Users of the service would in aggregate pay the full cost of the provision of the service and a charging system would share out these costs among users.

This is similar to, and indeed embraces, the more familiar polluter-pays principle, where the polluter pays for the cost which his pollution imposes on society. Under the user-pay principle, the OECD argues that subsidization by taxpayers and cross-subsidization among water service users should be abolished unless special social reasons exist for their retention.

As most hon. members are no doubt aware, the federal government supported these principles in its November, 1987, federal water policy. Since nobody likes to be characterized as unreasonable or rigid, we also hear a lot of variations and combinations of the three themes. The most common one is, yes, we accept that the real and lasting solution is full-cost pricing, but the country has such a backlog that we should revert to the subsidy route for a few years until we catch up.

Another qualification which nobody really disputes is that there has to be some financial redistribution role played by senior governments. For example, through federal transfer payments and provincial assistance to smaller communities.

I would like to touch very briefly on the temporary subsidy for catch-up question. These are some of the problems I see with senior government bridge funding.

First, the municipalities which would be able to take advantage of such funding would be those which are planning to undertake the work anyway in the near future.

Second, eligible projects and costs would have to be determined by some government agency or agencies. The rules under the CMHC program became very complicated and where they were regarded by the province as excessive federal red tape, they were not used and eventually the program was withdrawn entirely.

Third, having restored the subsidy program, there would be inevitable pressures to extend it. The initial forgiveness feature of the CMHC program was only to last two or three years. In fact, through extension, it lasted 18 years.

Finally, and most important, a bridge funding program would be counterproductive in the sense that it would simply delay movement towards a more rational long-term solution.

In closing, I would like to quote from a speech which Harvard University's Peter Rodgers delivered to a Science Council of Canada workshop recently.

> In the area of the water resources we should remember that we get exactly what we pay for. In both Canada and the United States, the prices charged for water are so low as to be not believable.

The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap said the same thing in his address.

We deliver a valuable commodity to very wealthy consumers who would be willing to pay substantial amounts for it. He suggests that by combining an aggressive pricing policy with tough, environmental laws, it will enable Canada to get control of its water resources in a way that will be efficient from the point of view of the market and the environment. Everybody will be better off.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to start by congratulating the hon. member for the NDP on his speech. It is encouraging to hear a member of the New Democratic Party in this House speak so positively about improving infrastructures in this country.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, as you will recall in the 1988 election, when this issue was raised by the Leader of the Opposition at the time, Mr. John Turner, the NDP refused to back up any kind of a plan or any kind of a thorough initiative when it came to infrastructure.

I am quite encouraged now to see that there is some sort of a policy or attitude change. That is very encouraging for the simple reason that as we in the Liberal Party have always called on all members of the House regardless of their political background, to support a federal initiative that will involve a partnership with the provinces, as well as the municipalities.

If you recall, Mr. Speaker, we had promised $5 billion towards infrastructure in Canada. In our rationale at the time, $5 billion over five years, would put us in a position to create approximately 314,000 jobs. Jobs are very much needed across the land. At the time, we used the rationale which was proposed by Informetrica, a consultant company, who stated that it was three times the number of jobs that would have been created by the then free trade agreement.

My colleague, representing the government side, have used some historical argument in order to back some of the statements he was making. He gave, in my view, a philosophical answer to a real problem. I would like to remind him that participation in municipal infrastructure goes back to between 1938 and 1949, when the Municipal Improvement Assistance Act was in place. The federal government then gave money towards roads, water and sewerage.

Then we had another program which was called the Sewage Treatment Program that was established in 1961 and went on to 1974. In 1963 to 1966, we had a Municipal Development and Loans Act which put a system into place to help municipalities deal with issues of sewage as well as transportation systems.

In 1973 to 1979 the Neighbourhood Improvement Program was put in place with the objective to bring in funding for sewer, water distribution systems, parks and other related issues.

In 1975 to 1978 the Municipal Infrastructure Program was put in place to introduce grants for pollution, sewage treatment, land development. At that time, over $1 billion was granted in terms of loans and $395 million was given in terms of grants.

In 1979 the Community Service Contribution Program was put in place with the objective also to help municipalities deal with the issue of sewer and water projects, social and recreational programs. At the time we had put in place $221 million in grants, with the final disbursement which took place in 1984. At that time, the government which the hon. member represents ended the program and we have not seen any funding coming through since that time.

On Friday, May 25, 1990 I introduced a motion in this House, on behalf of our party, and I would just like to read it for the hon. member of the NDP so he can just recall what was said then. The motions reads:

> That this House call upon the government to recognize that Canada's municipal infrastructure is facing a crisis of national proportions and that, given the serious implications to the nation's environment, economic prosperity and quality of life for Canadians, the government resume its traditional role as a partner with the provincial and municipal governments to address this national crisis.

We said that then, and we are saying the same thing again. For the Liberal Party and our caucus, the issue of infrastructure, sewage and waterways is important. We have launched a national task force to go across the land. For us it was a priority, it remains a priority and will always continue to be a priority. We have launched a task force where every single member of our caucus has participated in its deliberations and have encouraged groups in the municipalities within their ridings to come forward and make presentations. I would like to indicate that our task force had the total support of the board of management of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. For the information of the House and those who are watching, I would like to outline some of the recommendations the Liberal Party of Canada made as early as May 25, 1990.

We believe that there is no single action that will be enough to ensure the future health and viability of Canada's infrastructure. We believe that a broad range of measures is necessary to make a meaningful difference, specifically, those should include the following.

First, we want to see a federal recognition of municipal infrastructure as a crisis of national proportions. We want to see a federal commitment to share the responsibility for municipal infrastructure with its provincial and municipal counterparts. We want to see the establishment of minimum national criteria for infrastructure to provide environmental protection and uniform levels of service for all Canadians.

The Liberal Party would like to see a federal commitment to rehabilitate and expand the Trans-Canada Highway. The Liberal party supports the establishment of a process through which the federal government can take actions which include: clarifying the respective roles of federal, provincial and municipal governments in infrastructure construction and management. That would respond to some of the concerns my colleague was talking about a little earlier.

Also, the Liberal Party spoke about identifying and prioritizing needs on a national scale in consultation with, and with the concurrence of provincial and municipal governments. The Liberal Party also called for increased incentives for maintenance and reconstruction of existing capital assets and the use of low capital environmentally conscious techniques, such as waste reduction and recycling.

We spoke about exploring alternative funding sources, such options as rational user fees, as my colleague has indicated, for water services, applying fuel tax revenues to road construction and maintenance, and increased private sector involvement. Of course, we collect the taxes on oil, on fuel, but the money which comes through those taxes does not go toward specific projects such as road and sewer systems but, rather, it goes toward general revenues.

We also spoke about the increasing support for research and development to accelerate technological innovation. Finally, we are encouraging efficient municipal management methods to permit phased programs of rehabilitation and better management of infrastructure systems and effective use of funds.

These are some of the recommendations with which our task force has come forward. Of course, we in the Liberal Party do not have to be reminded about the crisis and the fact that it is reaching national proportions, because we were there. We were in Atlantic Canada. We were in Newfoundland, where 48,000 homes have inadequate water and sewer services and 80 per cent of the residents do not have properly treated drinking water.

In Nova Scotia, in the municipalities of Sydney and Halifax, sewage systems just simply do not exist, so we have to set up and put new systems in place.

P.E.I. is an excellent example again, where the problem there is out of proportion.

I want to cite this. In Quebec, 500 million litres of untreated water and 50 tonnes of raw sewage are dumped into the St. Lawrence River every day. That is incredible.

Of course I would appreciate it if my colleague in the NDP could speak to his colleagues, so at least we can in this House and Canadians can find out where the NDP are coming from, whether they have a heart or not and whether they do support the Liberal initiative or they do support a federal involvement on the issue of infrastructure. Having said all of this, I commend the hon. member. Of course, his heart is in the right place.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may offer you my congratulations and wish you good luck in your new position.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Desjardins: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join in the debate today, a debate in which certain comments must be made. This debate is typical of the kind of speeches the Opposition tends to serve up in this House, the implication being that the government is doing absolutely nothing about the environment or about implementing a water policy, which is entirely false.

I was listening to the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap, who is to be commended for bringing such a serious matter before the House for debate, and I agree this country has some major environmental problems. Anyone who represents an area like Abitibi—Témiscamingue in this House will understand how seriously our environment has deteriorated.

The trouble with the NDP is, that they are good at impressive theories and fancy speeches, but when it comes down to dollars and cents, they tend to fade. However, the hon. member must be aware that in 1987, the Federation of Canadian Municipalities estimated the contribution of all three levels of government municipal provincial and federal towards improving municipal infrastructures at about $15 billion.

Half of this amount was to be used to improve water and sewer systems. Those were the figures in 1987. In 1990, we could easily be talking about investments totalling $10 billion.

Of course, budgets have never been a strong point for the NDP. Just ask for the money and wait for it to come in!

The Liberals just told us that they had made a commitment to invest $5 billion. That is typical of the Liberal party. That is why today, Mr. Speaker, we have all these deficits, thanks to their habit of putting money on the table without having the means to pay the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have one minute left. I would urge hon. members to take a look at the Canada Water Act Annual Report for 1988–89, which shows how the government has worked together with the provinces in recent years to improve water management and water quality in this country.

We have spent millions of dollars, Mr. Speaker, and all the money we put into our regional development programs is money that is made available to Canadian communities. So we have nothing to learn from the opposition parties.

Mr. Boudria: Oh yes, you do, you have a lot to learn!

Mr. Desjardins: about how to treat municipalities. We have done a lot more for municipalities than the Liberal party did in 20 years and more than the NDP will ever do.

BOARD OF INTERNAL ECONOMY

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that David Dingwall, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Cape Breton—East Richmond, has been appointed member of the Board of Internal Economy in replacement of the Hon. Herb Gray, member for the electoral district of Windsor-West, for the purposes and under the provisions of Chapter 42 of the Statutes of Canada, 1985, First Supplement, entitled: An Act to amend the House of Commons Act.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1800)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, although Bill C-72, the new Official Languages Act, was passed by this Parliament almost unanimously on September 12, 1988, more than two years ago, and it was fully supported I might say at that time by the Liberal Party, that bill still remains inoperative because the government which presented the bill has failed to produce the regulations.

I want to point out that the content of that bill, a great improvement in our official languages legislation, had been discussed at great length for several years by the Joint Standing Committee on Official Languages of which I was a member and which committee, representing all parties in this House and the Senate, made recommendations for the reform and improvement of the Official Languages Act.

Finally the government took up those recommendations, put them into Bill C-72—and I congratulate them for it—presented the bill, and it passed. But, as I say, despite its passage and great words which were stated in favour of the bill at that time, it remains inoperative because the government has failed to produce the regulations. As a result of not producing the regulations the bill for the most part remains inoperative.

I must point out that when the bill was before the House the minister responsible for the bill, in answer to questions, said that the regulations would be produced shortly afterward. Then, in answer to questions in the House, that promise was repeated in August 1989 when the minister said that the regulations would be produced before the end of 1989. Then again last April 4, when the Commissioner of Official Languages tabled his annual report and condemned the government for not producing the regulations, and even threatened to resign, the minister said that the regulations would be presented soon after June 23 of this year. Here we are in October and we still do not have those regulations.

I would like to refer to what the Prime Minister said when we were debating Bill C-72. He suggested two and a half years ago when the Official Languages Act was being debated that the House would have to sit every day of the week, if necessary, to pass the legislation that was owed to the Canadian population. The people of Canada deserve now to see that legislation implemented; the usual politics of rhetoric by the Prime Minister. He was at that time saying that we would have to sit day and night to pass the legislation, which we did. I think the only ones who voted against it were a few members of his own party, and here we are more than two years later without the regulations to implement the bill.

Again we have had, just this past June 14, the joint standing committee pass the resolution unanimously with Conservatives, Liberals, New Democrats, senators all agreeing and saying that the government should introduce those regulations as soon as possible. That was in June. Still no action, Mr. Speaker.

While the government has failed to act in this matter, tensions have continued to grow between the language groups in this country. We had the failure of the Meech Accord which produced tension. The passage of Bill 178 in Quebec; the growth of APEC, the Association for the Protection of English in Canada, which is really a very prejudiced and bigoted group against the francophones of this country; the passage of resolutions by the Ontario municipalities for unilingualism; the rise of the Reform Party here in this Parliament and the Bloc Quebecois; all gravitating against justice and understanding for both language groups in Canada and showing a great need for this improved legislation, legislation which is government legislation.

I have only a few minutes left, but once again on September 12 of this year, just a month or so ago, the Commissioner of Official Languages once again called for the passage of these regulations. He repeated his condemnation of the government that he made in April and recommended very strongly that they be implemented. Today I ask the government again what is holding up these regulations? Where are they? How much conflict and turmoil do we need in this country before it takes action? The farce has gone on long enough.

The government introduced a bill which was a good bill. It had the support of our party and the other opposition parties. When are we going to see the regulations? I want to have a date today. I want to know exactly when we will get these regulations to implement a good piece of legislation passed by this House.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to respond once again to the concerns of the hon. member regarding the tabling of draft regulations under the Official Languages Act.

As we have said before in the House, the government's commitment to the principles set out in the Official Languages Act remains steadfast. Beyond the principles and our commitment to them, we must not forget that there is an official languages program in place in federal institutions. This program ensures a whole range of bilingual services to the Canadian public. There are already some 1,600 service points located across Canada providing services in English and French.

Let me turn to the specific question of regulations. The previous President of the Treasury Board was deeply committed to this task. His officials consulted widely with representatives of linguistic minority associations to obtain their input. This was in keeping with the process set out in the Official Languages Act passed by the House in 1988.

I know the previous President of the Treasury Board, who is now the Minister of the Environment, personally met with the Alliance Quebec and the Federation of Francophones Outside Quebec to discuss this matter. He wanted to make sure that both groups would have the opportunity to contribute fully to the success of this initiative. As hon. members know, he wanted to ensure that the end product would be fair and reasonable for all Canadians. This has always been our goal.

I know that the new President of the Treasury Board is equally committed to this objective. I know that we are examining carefully on a priority basis the groundwork already done in preparing the draft proposals.

I can, moreover, assure the House that the new President of the Treasury Board is well aware of the importance of these draft regulations to give full effect to service to the public provisions of the Official Languages Act. He is giving this matter his full attention.

As President of the Treasury Board he has assumed a leadership role, and I am sure that he will proceed with this matter in an appropriate way as expeditiously as possible.

The end product will no doubt provide Canadians with a fair and reasonable access to federal services in English and French. It will be worth the wait.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, discrimination is against the law in Canada. It is against the law in Canada to discriminate in many different ways: by way of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, marital status, family status, pardoned conviction, or disability.

On May 30 I asked a question in the House about discrimination at the CRTC, Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission. The government's answer, which I will get to shortly, was totally unsatisfactory. The basic elements of the case are that the Canadian Human Rights Commission had found the CRTC guilty of discrimination. The CRTC refused to arrive at a settlement in the case, for example it refused to admit wrongdoing. The CRTC refused to accept conciliation or at least refused to come to agreement at conciliation, thus forcing the employee to go to a tribunal, the next stage.

At the tribunal the CRTC, acting in typical management style, gave notice that no matter which way the tribunal proceeded it would appeal to the courts.

In this particular case there was an out of court settlement agreed to by the employee after more hassling than most people could bear and which I do not have the time to describe.

However, the bottom line is that—wonder of wonders—there is no record of discrimination at the CRTC. Is that not wonderful? That is only half the story. The other half is even worse. The employee who originally filed was harassed for having taken the action, which in itself is against the law, but other employees were harassed even more severely for giving evidence on behalf of the complainant.

Section 59 of the Human Rights Act provides for fines up to $50,000 for threatening, intimidating or discriminating against an individual who has filed a complaint, or for hampering the investigation process.

An RCMP investigation under section 59 of the Human Rights Act determined that by harassing those who supported the original employee who complained there were grounds for laying criminal charges against the management of the CRTC.

There is a catch. Section 60(4) provides that the prosecution cannot be instituted except by the consent of the Attorney General of Canada. That consent was withheld in this human rights case at the CRTC. Except for the discretionary powers of the Attorney General, charges could have been laid against management at the CRTC.

The government argued in response—I am getting to the response of the government at the time I asked the question on April 30—and I suspect will argue momentarily again that the CRTC is an arm's length organization and the government cannot get involved.

The employees of the CRTC are government employees. I would not want the CRTC to get involved in the day-to-day operations and the day-to-day decisions of whether or not they are going to provide a licence or withhold a licence. By God, I would expect the CRTC first of all—and in this case secondly—or at least the government to be protecting its own employees.

The government had doggone well better get involved in this case, arm's length or not. It certainly is not arm's length. These are government employees. Or else, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Human Rights Act means nothing at all.

If the discretionary powers of the Attorney General can thwart the investigations and decisions of the RCMP and the Human Rights Commission, those discretionary powers have to be removed. There is no justice if a bureaucratic management of the CRTC or a government department can hassle any individual into quitting, into ill health, or an out of court settlement which is not as satisfactory but which gets management off one's back.

I wrote to the Minister of Justice on June 1 asking why the discretionary powers of the Attorney General were allowed to be exercised in that case. So far I have only an acknowledgement of a letter received; no explanation.

More recently speaking, which rather demonstrates the government's commitment to human rights in Canada and for Canadian citizens, I would suggest, at the dinner in celebration of the Canadian tribute to human rights, Lawrence Court d'Oreille, Vice-Chief of the Assembly of First Nations, said: "I am afraid for my human rights in Canada because those who are supposed to be protecting my human rights cannot protect their own."

This government, through its actions in the CRTC case—and who knows how many others—has signalled departments, agencies, Crowns and companies within its jurisdiction that they can discriminate against Canadians and the government will not allow prosecution.

Quite simply put, this is an outrage and we cannot allow it to be continued. I call for a public inquiry into the discretionary attitude of the government.

• (1815)

I also call, Mr. Speaker, more principally for a public inquiry into the discriminatory management of the CRTC, hoping thereby that the actions of that kind of management in those kinds of situations may be prevented in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I should wish to congratulate you on your recent nomination as Assistant Deputy Chairman of the committees of the Whole.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the member for Saskatoon—Dundurn relates to three cases dealing with employee-employer relations within an independent regulatory agency, the CRTC, and which are or have been under investigation—I am trying to be helping to the hon. member—by another independent tribunal, the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

To the extent that these cases, two of which are yet unresolved, are of a personal nature, and to the extent that this government respects the independence of its arms length agencies, it would be inappropriate to enter into the details surrounding them, and I will refrain from doing so.

Instead, I will address my comments to the more general issue raised by the member for Saskatoon—Dundurn when he first raised this question on May 30, 1990.

In his question, and his supplementary comments, the member suggested that the CRTC was "forcing its employees to extreme lengths in order to seek basic justice".

It further suggested that it was "unacceptable for an agency of the government to 'force its employees' to go to a tribunal to settle human rights complaints".

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that his comments denote a seious lack of comprehension of the role and mandate of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. Furthermore, they give the impression that government agencies such as the CRTC do not have the right to respond to complaints from their employees, whether the complaints are founded or not.

The Canadian society is increasingly diversified, which makes for more complex relations between individuals and institutions, including employer–employee relations. Because of the Charter of Rights and the Human Rights Act, the Canadian people are more aware of their rights and more prone to complain when they believe their rights have been infringed upon.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, no government agency or private company can escape complaint. Besides, a complaint can sometimes be the only way to uncover an injustice and seek redress. I would add that the injustices uncovered are not always due to lack of goodwill.

It is precisely with a view to providing a forum for settling human right complaints that the Canadian Human Rights Commission was established by Parliament.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, to suggest that it is unacceptable for the CRTC to respond to complaints lodged by employees before the Human Rights Commission is to deny the important role that the Human Rights Commission was designed to perform. It is no disgrace for any employer to respond to a complaint from an employee where the employer has reason to believe that the complaint is unfounded. Indeed, to not respond in such circumstances is to invite abuse. Moreover, it is no disgrace for an employer to challenge the findings of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. No decision by a tribunal or a court of justice, except for the Supreme Court of Canada, is beyond appeal or challenge.

It is important to remember that allegations arising from human rights complaints must be proven and both parties must be able to present fairly their respective sides of the story.

Furthermore, because such complaints often involve the subtleties of interpersonal relations, it can be difficult to determine with accuracy where fault lies or what corrective measures should be taken.

In the end, a disgrace would only occur if an employer refused to co-operate in resolving the problem.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased this afternoon to have an opportunity to put before the House the question which I put to the Minister of Employment and Immigration last spring, in March, concerning the lay-off of over 2,000 employees at the Elliot Lake uranium mines. In fact, 450 have already been laid off at Denison Mines in late July and in late August some 1,800 additional employees were laid off at Rio Algom.

• (1820)

The magnitude of these lay-offs is absolutely mind-boggling for this community. It represents at least 50 per cent of the direct mine-related employment in that community. Unless drastic and determined efforts are made by the two senior levels of government, we face a loss of half of the community. This is an urban community of some 16,000 people.

I asked the minister at that time what actions were going to be taken by the federal government. In fact, some actions have taken place. Industrial adjustment committees and community adjustment committees have been established. The industrial adjustment committee was under the leadership of Harold Kenny for the Denison Mines, under the direction of Roger Taylor for the two Rio Algom mines, and the community adjustment committee was under the direction of Craig Macquarrie. In fact, those committees have operated in what I would say is in an exemplary way. They have functioned very well.

The one thing that they require is funding for the community adjustment and industrial adjustment. They need dollars for training. They need dollars for job search. They need dollars for job mobility grants. That has been our main problem all through the summer and fall months, whether we would have enough of these funds.

There is a Community Futures program in the area. In fact, they submitted a budget to the staff of the minister last April, calling for over a two-year period some $16 million. In fact, it is all happening over the course of one year rather than two years. That is the kind of funding which is required for those industrial and community adjustment committees.

So far we have received some $3 million or $4 million. Unfortunately, that whole budget of $16 million has to be telescoped into one year rather than into two, or slightly more than one year, and the committees have done an excellent job. The problem that we have is the uncertainty. The official budget for the community and industrial adjustment has not ever been approved yet, so we are going along sort of month to month, getting a commitment of $900,000 in July, $1 million in August. That level of adjustment funding I believe will be needed for another six to twelve months, depending on how successful the individuals are in securing employment.

The government of course argues: "We cannot provide the funding for the community and industrial adjustment because Bill C-21 has not been passed". Of course that argument is simply not accepted. Everybody knows that the government has been collecting money under Bill C-21 since last January. In fact, the fees for unemployment insurance have gone up by some 15 per cent collecting, I would guess, over $1 billion this year already, so my miners in Elliot Lake do not buy that argument. If they can collect the money under Bill C-21, then they can spend it under Bill C-21 or they can spend it under supplementary estimates and repay the money from the funding that is being taken from employees day after day.

Mr. Hockin has been designated by the Deputy Prime Minister to be a special liaison officer to work with the communities. He has visited the community, outlined a number of initiatives which the government has agreed to put forward, including providing an additional $1 million of funding in late August. Our concern is that we have this commitment for training and adjustment funds every month until the miners have had an opportunity to seek new employment and are able to get on with their lives, or retrained for another job.

We need co-operation from the federal government for the initiatives which are being taken by the province which are quite extensive. They include a study on a retirement living program which has been very successful. There are a number of proposals relating to the CANMET lab where it would become a field station associated with Laurentian University. The province has provided funding for a drug and alcohol addiction centre which would follow along from the Camilla Centre operated by the Sisters of St. Joseph.

We have a number of initiatives, but we need a commitment from the federal government that its portion will be funded as well.

This week I have put before the minister a number of proposals for the decentralization of government offices from Toronto and other regions of the country into northern Ontario and Elliot Lake. After all, it is the sixth largest urban centre in northern Ontario. We cannot afford a community with all assets and advantages of this community to die. We must diversify the economy. We must develop what we have. I am pleading and asking the government to do this. I believe the community is working very hard to do that as well. I am asking for the support, encouragement, and assistance of the federal government to carry its fair share in this regard.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss the initiatives the government has undertaken to help laid-off workers in Elliot Lake.

Our industrial adjustment service consultants have worked closely with Denison Mines, Rio Algom Ltd., and the United Steelworkers Union in the province of Ontario to provide assistance to laid-off workers in Elliot Lake.

For example, two separate industrial adjustment committees were set up to help workers and management deal with the Denison Mines layoff and the Rio Algom closures respectively. Through the industrial adjustment service committee, Employment and Immigration Canada provided $106,000 to help Denison Mines workers and $102,600 to help the Rio Algom workers.

The member should know that of the 420 employees laid off at Denison Mines, 344 have now positive plans for employment or training, and 26 are taking early retirement.

The Department of Employment and Immigration is also providing $114,000, matched by the province of Ontario, to establish a community adjustment centre to help other local workers whose employment could be threatened and disrupted by the lay-offs.

A co-ordinating committee for Elliot Lake was formed to set priorities and determine how training funds available to the area should be spent.

Employment and Immigration approved an $818,000 grant to finance additional activities under the Skills Shortages and Job Development programs of the Canadian Jobs Strategy for relocation, training, and community economic development and adjustment assistance.

In August, 1990, $1 million in additional federal funding was announced in relocation and exploratory assistance to meet needs of the Elliot Lake community.

The hon. gentleman should know that other assistance from the government would have been provided to communities like Elliot Lake, if it had the labour force development strategy implemented and if Bill C-21 were passed.

The member for Algoma knows that many laid-off workers requested relocation assistance or additional funds to start their own businesses because they felt that this was the way to go from now on. The government could have helped these workers if Bill C-21 and the Labour Force Development Strategy were in place. With the Labour Force Development Strategy and Bill C-21, the government intends to raise by $45 million the funding for relocation assistance and self-employment initiatives.

Many people in Elliot Lake also felt that they could take over their own destiny and work out a restructuring plan for Elliot Lake. Elliot Lake is already eligible for help under the Community Futures Program for creation of small businesses and self-employment, for training and other community initiatives. But the government cannot ignore the fact that additional assistance under the Labour Force Development Strategy could have been made available to the people in Elliot Lake if Bill C-21 had been passed by the Senate.

Finally, earlier in this response, the success of the industrial adjustment committee in helping laid-off workers at Denison and Rio Algom was discussed. The government believed that workers would have benefited from a doubling of the industrial adjustment service funds. They did not benefit from this doubling of funds simply because Bill C-21 is still in the Senate and, as a result, the Labour Force Development Strategy is not implemented.

If the hon. member truly wants to assist the people of Elliot Lake, he will reverse his position on Bill C–21, stop voting against his constituents, urge his unelected Liberal associates in the Senate to stop playing politics with peoples' lives, and have them do something useful for a change.

POINTS OF ORDER

SENATE SPEAKERSHIP

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is a time of extraordinary events.

We see the government being ready to use unprecedented means in order to force a tax, the GST, which is the most unpopular tax in Canadian history, through Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that is debate.

We may be in extraordinary times, and those who were listening carefully to the prayer would notice that I had noticed that. Certainly, I will hear the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the government is using extraordinary means to force through Parliament the most unpopular tax in Canadian history, the goods and services tax.

Therefore, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to present immediately a motion as follows:

> That this House direct the Prime Minister to take the steps necessary for the Governor in Council to appoint a person who will respect the rules of Parliament to preside over the Senate.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, in reinforcing this motion, and in speaking to the motion, I would like to call on the British North America Act, section 34, which makes it very clear that the responsibility for naming the person in the Senate who becomes Speaker rests with section 34.

> The Governor General may, from time to time—

Mr. Speaker: I am going to try to be as even-handed as I can.

A few days ago, the government rose to put forward a motion and asked for the consent of the House. There was some debate, I think 16 minutes on behalf of the government side and I think 13 minutes on behalf of the opposition side. I may have been too lax in indulging and giving everybody the latitude that was engaged in at the time.

Now before the House, there is a request by way of point of order by the hon. Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition that the House accept the motion which the hon. Leader of the Opposition has put forward on the basis of unanimous consent.

I recognized the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, but I think again we have to keep in mind that what the opposition is seeking here is exactly what the government was seeking the other day. That was unanimous consent for a motion.

My difficulty in dealing with this—I am sure all hon. members can understand this— is that it is legitimate enough, but it cannot be turned into a prolonged or extended debate.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition has put the point, and he has put it with his usual forcefulness. I am just wondering: Is there any particular need for other members to become involved? I know that the hon. parliamentary secretary is seeking the floor on a point of order, and I anticipate that he will be asking the same questions that I am putting in general terms to the House.

Probably the better way to deal with this would be to say that there is the motion. Perhaps I should ask if the House is prepared to agree to it or otherwise. However, I have some regard for our hon. friend, the member for Ottawa—Vanier. If he can persuade me that, as your Speaker, I should hear further debate, I may be persuaded. I am pointing out that the procedure that is being followed has been done many times in the House. Somebody has risen and asked for unanimous consent on a point of order. That is exactly what is happening. It is not appropriate for me to allow it to extend into a long debate.

Perhaps the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, who I interrupted, can assist the Chair, but not to debate what is or is not going on in some other place. I have some doubts as to whether that would be appropriate. I will hear the hon. member in order to decide whether I ought to hear the hon. member further.

The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I understand very clearly your need to treat both sides fairly and we on this side appreciate and respect that principle. Keeping that in mind, the other day as the Speaker reminded us—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think there is any secret that we have been witnessing extraordinary events. Some of what has happened in the last 24 hours has never happened before. As your Speaker, I have to try to find a way to allow the House to deal with it, but still stay within the bounds of reason and within the rules. I am prepared to be very careful about making sure that we do both of those things and I certainly think that it is appropriate to allow the hon. parliamentary secretary to give his remarks to the House.

It seems to me that, given the backdrop of what we are dealing with, we ought to be very careful this morning. Let us listen to each other and see if we can find a way through it.

I will hear the hon. parliamentary secretary shortly, and I remind him that his point of order interrupts the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I will come back to the hon. member.

The hon. parliamentary secretary who may be able to help me.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to make a couple of quick points.

First, you referred to the 16 minutes and the 13 minutes the other day which would lead us to believe that the opposition should have three minutes. However, yesterday, if my memory serves me right, the opposition took 32 minutes, so we should have 27 minutes.

I do want to say on the basis of the motion that the normal way for us to do this is to discuss it in House leader's meetings. We would be happy to do that. But without those discussions at this point, we would have to signal that, no, we will not give unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has given clear indication that the House is not going to agree to the motion. The hon. parliamentary secretary has also, however, left the door open for some discussion. However, I am listening to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, and I will hear him to see if what he has to say is going to help the Speaker deal with this problem.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I thank you and appreciate your comments. Indeed, the Speaker is invested with powers to maintain order and I take exception to the government trying to bootleg some phoney points of order when I have the floor legitimately. I do not agree with this attitude that there has to be a quid pro quo, just because they get a few minutes we do not get as much.

The point is that the government is responsible for the appointments of certain persons. It is done by appointment, by Order in Council. The Governor General follows up on the recommendation. We all know that. The point of the motion is to get the government to put forward an appointment of a person who will, like you, Mr. Speaker, have respect for the rules of the House of Commons and have respect for the rules of Parliament. That is our point.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops. I know that he will assist the Chair in not straying too far, given the situation.

I want to join with you, Mr. Speaker, and acknowledge as I am sure we all do that we have been witnessing some extraordinary events in the last 24 hours and it has demonstrated a whole number of very serious problems we face as a Parliament.

I simply want to say, Mr. Speaker, and I suspect I reflect the views of all of us on both sides of the House—perhaps we could call it a three-sided House—that while we might have different views on the other place in terms of its validity, we do recognize that the Parliament of Canada includes two Houses, that the work that is done here eventually moves into the other place and is concluded there, under normal conditions.

What we see this morning is that while we are here in our places to carry on important business, particularly as it refers to heritage languages in the country, we know full well that the other place is paralysed. It is non-functioning. It is not working.

While I sympathize with the point raised by my hon. friend, the Leader of the Official Opposition, I think what we have witnessed in the last few hours in the other place was a complete debacle or chaos, I think is a good way to describe it. If there ever has been a demonstration of the need to abolish the Senate, it has to be now.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has, I think, commented on events of which we are all very much aware. The hon. member has a certain minimum awareness of those events, as we all know, but this is not the place or the time to debate great constitutional changes.

I think that the appropriate thing is for me to put to the House the motion that has been proposed to us on the basis of asking consent that this House direct the Prime Minister to take the steps necessary for the Governor in Council to appoint a person who will respect the rules of Parliament and to preside over the Senate. That is the motion. Is there agreement to the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I have only heard the motion now twice, but it seems to me that some of the language in there would cause that motion to be ruled out of order because it sounds to me like a reflection on present occupants in the other House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary may well be right. At the moment, I am asking the House whether there is consent.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Just so long as hon. members and also the public that is watching understand this, the hon. House leader has proposed a motion with respect to events that are taking place in the other place. That motion has not received unanimous consent in this House.

Now, I am going to hear the hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

THE SENATE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I believe that we dealt with the previous motion that was put before the House seeking unanimous consent. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask for the indulgence of the House to ask also for unanimous consent to consider what I think is a most appropriate motion considering the events of the last number of days. I refer to Hansard of Wednesday, October 3, 1990, Motion No. 283, standing in my name, which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of abolishing the Senate and introduce electoral procedures to enable the regions of Canada to participate in government decision making in fair proportion.

I would like to ask for unanimous consent to put that motion.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as you have set the tone of fairness that is a very important principle in this House, I want to say as sympathetic as I personally am to that motion, I think in fairness it should be handled in the same way as I recommended for that of the Official Opposition, and that is to discuss it at another place with the House leaders.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, surprises, surprises. Here is the government which applauded the statement made a few minutes ago by that same member who applauded the abolishing of the Senate. I mean, hypocrisy has no limits. Here we have the NDP now proposing to abolish the Senate when last night all Canadians saw the hon. member for Kamloops on television talking to the Senate. Again, hypocrisy has no limits.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is probably appropriate to ask the hon. member for Shefford to state his opinion or suggestion.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, like millions of Canadians, today I had a chance to see what is happening in the other place, and like many Canadians, I think all this is degrading and humiliating, and I am surprised the Parliamentary House Leader of the Liberal Party did not rise in the House this morning to apologize on behalf of the Senate to this House and to Canadians, instead of moving a motion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's point of view is very interesting.

[English]

I have to say to the hon. member for Kamloops, who has proposed this motion, that there does not seem to be consent. However, in the interests of ensuring that we are dealing with these matters in a completely fair way, I think that the motion was:

> That, in the opinion of this House the government should consider the advisability of abolishing the Senate and introduce electoral procedures to enable the regions of Canada to participate in government decision making and fair proportion.

The hon. member for Kamloops has asked if there is consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are two motions in amendment in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver East as set down in the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute. Motion No. 1 is in order. A similar motion was moved in committee and negatived. However, Motion No. 1 is sufficiently different that the Chair is prepared to allow it to be put before the House.

Consequently, motion No. 1 will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 2 is in order and it will also be debated and voted on separately.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East) moved:

Motion No. 1

> That Bill C-37 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 16 and 17 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:
> "Canada and does not include aboriginal languages of Canada."

She said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to just explain a little bit about this motion, though I know members of the committee will be well aware of why we felt it necessary to be very explicit that aboriginal people do not want to have their languages, the languages of the First Nations of Canada classified as heritage languages and included in this bill.

I know that in committee we did delete the section that was originally in the bill which included "and includes any aboriginal language" after the phrase "contributes to the linguistic heritage of Canada". However, having deleted that, in the view of a number of native people we heard from and to whom I have spoken since, it does not make explicit what their intention is, so we have added the phrase "and does not include aboriginal languages of Canada", so that there will be absolutely no mistake about this.

I would like to quote just a couple of things from two of the senior native groups that appeared before the committee or have written to us on this subject. Originally, the Assembly of First Nations did ask for a deletion of the phrase, which we responded to in committee, but they subsequently did ask for a more specific exclusion. Mr. Erasmus says, in his letter to members of Parliament:

> Although we understand Aboriginal languages are not excluded from the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute Act, First Nations do not wish to be included in the definition of "Heritage Languages" in Bill C-37.

That is a letter dated dated last June, so it is referring to the original bill, before it was amended in committee. The letter goes on:

> We are the "founding" languages of Canada,—

I think that is extremely important, not "heritage" languages but "founding" languages of Canada—> —and given the precarious future of our endangered languages, require a separate Aboriginal Languages Foundation/Institute.

He goes on to quote from the presentation that he made, in committee that, and I quote:

> The First Nation's position that any federal policies or actions which impact upon Aboriginal people must ensure the recognition and affirmation of existing Aboriginal and treaty rights was re-affirmed in the Supreme Court of Canada—on the Sparrow case—in 1990. It is our submission that Aboriginal and treaty rights to language is with section 35 of the Constitution Act of Canada, 1981. Further, the federal government is obligated to consult with Indians—

This was not done, prior to this bill being drafted.

> —in the development of legislation that directly impact our lives and must prove that any involvement of legislation will enhance the Indian position for protection.

They said that they did not believe that this proposed legislation would enhance their languages and wanted to be excluded. They also asked that we support an aboriginal languages foundation. I think that this is another thing that we must not forget. It is very important. I know my colleague will be speaking on that question in a little more detail.

Finally, I would like to mention as well on the question of aboriginal languages, a statement by Phil Fontaine, the provincial leader of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs. This was interestingly enough to the people of Quebec after the Meech Lake Accord was in effect turned down. He said that they supported Quebec's passionate dedication to the preservation and promotion of the French language and culture in Canada. He said: "We also are fighting for our culture and language. We, the aboriginal people of this country, have inherited through the oral traditions of our forbears, 55 different, distinct, original languages, 52 of these original languages of Canada are now on the brink of extinction. Unlike you, we cannot retrieve these languages from our mother country. Our mother country is Canada. What we lose in Canada, we lose forever". I think that very eloquently explains why the languages of founding peoples, which are founding languages of Canada and unique to Canada and North America, must be preserved in a separate way and much more strongly through an aboriginal language foundation.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I certainly share the concern of the member for the preservation of aboriginal languages. I, too, am very disturbed by what appears to be a rather impossible situation where we have not been able, through the generations, to put forward a mechanism to guarantee the preservation of this important heritage, the languages and cultures of our founding peoples, our first peoples. This is not the issue which we are discussing today. As a matter of fact, there have been at least two excellent studies that I have had the opportunity of perusing personally. I have had lengthy discussions with the member of Parliament from Alberta. I think it was the member for Wetaskiwin. He and I are both pursuing the initiative very diligently.

However, the bill that we have before us is really the follow-up to the original Bill C-152 which was before the previous House. At that time members of both opposition parties, in particular the member for York West and Mr. Epp who was the critic—and, by the way, he did an excellent job on behalf of his party in all of the issues before us—explicitly brought forward the suggestion that aboriginal languages should be included. They had a concern that if they were not explicitly written into the bill there would be a very narrow and restrictive use of the institute, perhaps, and all aboriginal languages would not have access to any of the funding or the resources or the shared expertise that may become available by this institute and would be of great benefit in preserving heritage languages and cultures in Canada.

Certainly it was on reflection and having accepted the helpful suggestion of members of the opposition that when we brought forth Bill C-37 it was included. It was not in any way to abdicate or deny the responsibility for establishing an important process for the preservation of aboriginal languages. All of us, this summer, have certainly become much more aware of the unfairness, the inequalities, and the difficult situation that our first peoples found themselves in. There is a much greater commitment by all of us today to do everything we can to restore equality, to give full participation, and to provide the same opportunity that all other Canadians have.

Today, however, I cannot accept the premise that the member has brought forward. Her proposal would have the effect of limiting and restricting the activities of the institute. I would not want to preclude instances where the aboriginal languages and cultures could participate actively. It is on these bases that I do not accept the suggestion of the member. Certainly the mere fact that it is not mentioned would have a tendency to give people the feeling that it is not there, but as far as I am concerned all languages and cultures must be preserved and protected.

It will be up to the people who will run the institute—the board of directors, administrative people, and the community from coast to coast—to decide how those resources will be used. I do not think it is up to us necessarily to restrict or narrow the opportunities this excellent institution will have.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I support the amendment. I regret the fact that the hon. Secretary of State has decided not to support the amendment. After all, this amendment comes at the request of the aboriginal people of Canada through their representative organizations. This is not a request that was developed within the caucuses of a particular political party on the Hill. This request comes at the request of representative organizations of the aboriginal people.

If the Secretary of State would read the decision in the Sparrow case, he would find that as part of Canada's fiduciary obligations he has an obligation to consult with aboriginal people before bringing down legislation which deals with something as critical as their cultural survival and with languages which are key to cultural survival. This amendment is not coming at the request of a particular political party. It is coming at the request of the aboriginal people of Canada.

This minister in particular should respect the wishes of the aboriginal people of Canada who have made their views known in committee and to the various members of the House of Commons. It would be a shameful act if we did not consider these views, especially in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Sparrow case which calls upon the government, in recognition of its requirement for honour in dealing with the aboriginal people, to consult with the aboriginal people before legislative changes are made. The wishes of the aboriginal people should be followed in this case.

The survival of aboriginal languages in this country, as my colleague has mentioned, is a fundamentally different issue from the survival of other, what we like to call, heritage languages. If you are of Spanish descent in Canada and you feel that your language is being threatened or that you have lost contact with your mother tongue, that language will survive in Europe or in Latin America or elsewhere in the world. If you are of Ukrainian descent or German descent, the same thing applies. If you are like me and you are descended from one of the Gaelic speaking groups, that language is dying out elsewhere in the world, but there are organizations in the mother countries that are attempting to protect and to save those languages. Action is even being taken here in Canada, Cape Breton, and elsewhere to protect those languages.

As was mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East, the fact is that if aboriginal languages die out, there is no other country. There is no other place in the world where these languages can be nurtured, incubated, and protected so that people can learn them again in this country. The mother country for those languages is right here in Canada, and it is here we have to take steps to protect them.

Aboriginal people do not want to have their languages, because of this fundamental difference, included among a whole group of heritage languages. The threats to aboriginal languages are fundamentally different. As my colleague has pointed out in a letter from the Assembly of First Nations, only three of the 53 aboriginal languages in Canada are likely to survive into the next century. That is less than 10 years from today. It is important that we as members of Parliament, in respect of our fiduciary responsibilities to the aboriginal people of this country, act immediately and take steps to make sure that those aboriginal languages are protected.

It seems that the minister is operating on the principle which applies to aboriginal people in Canada, that is, first here last served. This principle has to be reversed in the case of aboriginal people. It would have been important for the Secretary of State to stand up and accept this motion and at the same time make a positive statement to the aboriginal people of Canada, first, that he will consult with them on the formation of an aboriginal languages foundation to protect aboriginal languages and to promote aboriginal languages in the country.

Second, he should have stood up and in a positive way have said that he would support the bill presented to this House in the name of the hon. member for Western Arctic, Bill C–269. He should have said that he would consult with the member who proposed that bill, with the aboriginal groups in Canada who support the bill, and with our caucus which supports the bill. He should have said that he would make sure the heritage languages legislation goes through the House and that Bill C–269 goes through at exactly the same time, and with appropriate funding, so that we can make sure these languages do survive into the 20th century because they are fundamental to the survival of aboriginal culture in this country.

We as a Parliament and members opposite as a government have an obligation spelled out in the Sparrow case and spelled out in our fiduciary responsibility to the native people in Canada to get that kind of legislation through as quickly as possible. It is shameful that a heritage language bill is going to go through this House first, before we have dealt with the founding languages of Canada.

I support both bills, but I think that the government should abandon its principle of first here, last served. We should consider the bill that has been presented to this House in the name of the member for Western Arctic, Bill C–269. That bill should be passed first and then we should pass Bill C–37.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I commend my colleague from Vancouver on her amendment that Bill C–37 not include aboriginal languages of Canada. I whole–heartedly support this amendment in that all of my life's work prior to coming to the House of Commons has been related to education or the enhancement and revitalization of aboriginal cultures and languages.

I must say that coming to the House of Commons has given me a forum in which I can express politically the views of the aboriginal people as they have been presented to me, because I come from an area that is majority aboriginal and where the aboriginal languages have been deemed official.

In the past, under Secretary of State Serge Joyal, P.C., we negotiated in the Northwest Territories a $16 million aboriginal language agreement with the federal government. This funding will come to an end this year, I believe.

My question to the minister in the body of my speech concerns whether unspent moneys will be reprofiled and whether there will be an extension of this particular funding. This has specific reference to this amendment because aboriginal languages are not specific to a debate in the House of Commons. They relate to the concerns of the over–all aboriginal community. In an area that is predominantly aboriginal, I have to say, it is very important that these people have some kind of feeling as to whether or not their work is going to be able to continue.

There have been some very major steps taken. Anyone who knows the justice system in Canada will appreciate that in an area such as where I come from there are many people who are unilingual. Being served in a non–native milieu or in a non–native environment is sometimes very detrimental in applying the principles of social justice in the courts of law.

The territorial government has amended the Jury Act. To its credit I say that it has amended the Jury Act to include unilingual speaking members. They can now sit on a jury. That is quite profound in that the unilingual speaking members are aboriginal people.

I must say also that I share similar concerns as my colleague, the hon. member for Comox—Alberni, the critic for aboriginal affairs. I have to say that he is quite right. I will take no credit for the basis on which my private members' bill, Bill C–269, an act to establish an aboriginal language foundation, was developed.

That work should be attributed to people like Mary Jamieson and other people from the Assembly of First Nations. However, I did sit on a policy development committee in 1986 and 1987 to assist them in developing a policy for the establishment of this foundation. It was the good will of Mr. Crombie that allowed this to happen.

I must say that there should be no limits set on the amount of money that it will take to preserve the 53 aboriginal languages. If I might, I would just like to say the following in my aboriginal language. That was my first language, taught to me by my grandmother.

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Dene–North Slavey.]

[English]

What I have said, Madam Speaker, is that the essence of aboriginal languages is who you are specifically, culturally, and your heart and your mind are spoken through your language. Our language is a living language. It is a language that expresses our psychology. If our languages die or are not able to flourish because we do not have the mechanisms to revitalize them or to enhance them, then the will and the culture of the people die, the spirit of the people dies.

We come from an oral tradition, Madam Speaker. This oral tradition is one that has been carried on for thousands of generations. Does it not amaze Canadians that a member of Parliament can rise in the House of Commons and speak Inuktituk as can my hon. colleague the hon. member for Nunatsiaq, and Cree as can my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. It is quite amazing that I can rise and speak in my aboriginal language when those were basically unwritten languages. They have been passed on for thousands of generations from our forefathers. It is a gift, a very special gift, and in order to keep that gift I make this appeal to the government.

Please give unanimous consent for Bill C–269, not to give me profile but to honour the needs expressed by the aboriginal community. They want an aboriginal language foundation because if there isn't one there are only three languages that can survive, Cree, Ojibway, and Inuktituk.

Madam Speaker, may I say to you that our battle has not just been on this front, not just for resources specifically, but constitutionally. I fought hard to get a clause in the Meech Lake Accord that expressed the will of my people concerning their linguistic and cultural rights. It was denied. We worked very hard in the Charest committee to entrench these in the Constitution.

I cannot believe that we can achieve a constitutional balance in Canada with other groups until the government has defined its relationship with the first people. There will never be the kind of constitutional balance that this country needs because it is inherently wrong to exclude the first nations in terms of their languages and their cultures. That is who they are.

Madam Speaker, may I end by saying this to you. If we do establish an aboriginal language foundation, it would be to the credit of the government, to the credit of the various individuals that were involved in doing all of the research and all of the work along with the Assembly of First Nations. It could be a co–operative approach.

Why did the House leader not respond positively when I wrote to him? He applauded in great glowing terms what I was trying to achieve with Bill C–269, the act to establish an aboriginal language foundation, but would not give consent. I cannot understand how that fundamental right, to be able to speak in your first language, can be denied by any government.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I do wish to say a few words on this amendment to the act to establish a heritage language institute.

I want to begin by saying that during the last three or four months I have had a very remarkable flow of unsolicited comments to my offices in Trinity—Spadina and on the Hill here, in writing and in telephone calls, expressing almost unanimous support for the general cause of Canada's first nations. Most of comments did not speak specifically about this or that issue, although they were stimulated by the controversy around Kanesatake. They simply asserted a general feeling that the first nations have not had a fair deal and that we have to act now to change that situation.

It is in that context that I want to speak about the amendment of my colleague, the member for Vancouver East, which would insert the words "that the heritage language institute mandate does not include aboriginal languages of Canada".

As has been pointed out, this proposal did not originate with the caucus of which I am a member. This proposal originated with a group such as the Assembly of First Nations. This is their request. I wish that the government would give it more careful consideration than it appears to have done.

I am not an expert on the subject of aboriginal affairs. My wife, Alice, did live for four years at the place she learned to call Caughnawaga. We now understand that its name is Kahnawake or something close to that. Her father was the United Church missionary there and she and her young sisters and brothers, as well as her parents, lived among the Mohawk people for four years. Her sisters and brothers went to school there with all their schoolmates being of the Caughnawaga Mohawk people. What she understood from that and as conveyed to me over the years, is that the use of their own language was essential for their identity, their self-respect and their survival for what they think they are, one of the first nations of Canada.

An hon. member: In that they are the same as us.

Mr. Heap: My colleague has said that in that they are the same as us. Certainly, as a person of English language origin I feel a very strong need to maintain the English language, but I do not feel it is threatened at the present time.

What has changed to some extent recently and what has impressed me this year is the very strong drive for determination of Canada's First Nations to control their own culture. Sometimes this gets into a discussion of words such as sovereignty, and people wonder if it means control of the army and so on. That is not before us today. There is nothing being proposed by the First Nations in this matter and nothing being proposed by the amendment by the hon. member for Vancouver East that in any way challenges or threatens the responsibility and authority of the existing governments of Canada. Rather, it is the opposite. What many Canadians are now beginning to learn and realize is that it was not properly presented when we went to school 30, 40 or 50 years ago in our Canadian history.

Over two centuries ago, King George III made a solemn agreement with some of the First Nations which has been applied to many of the others, that there would be a fiduciary responsibility, or an obligation to act positively on behalf of the First Nations. This would mean a legal obligation to consult the First Nations when the Government of Canada or any of its subordinate governments is initiating some change in its programs that might affect them. This was an undertaking which is still an obligation to this day of the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces. It is an obligation which has been grossly neglected or even denied far too often in past years.

When the government talks about the rule of law and law being applicable to everyone in Canada, with no one having the right to take the law into his own hands, it is very unfortunate to see the government doing exactly what it says no one can do, that is, simply abrogating its responsibility in this sense of consulting the First Nations before doing something that would affect the teaching of their language.

Therefore, I believe it would be a small evidence of good faith if the government would listen to the request of the First Nations on this point. These evidences are needed. We heard a speech by the Prime Minister promising to do all sorts of wonderful things for the First Nations if a small band of people at Kanesatake would simply lay down their arms. They have laid down their arms. They are now in the custody, that is those of them who were sought for custody, of the authorities recognized by this government. Now is the time for this government to show its good faith and give unanimous consent. We have heard from the official opposition, the Liberal Party. We now wish to have unanimous consent completed by the government.

In light of the Prime Minister's promises of a few days ago, I ask that the control of the teaching of the aboriginal languages be left with the aboriginal people, to be carried on in co-operation with the Canadian government on a consultative basis, and not to be handed to the bureaucrats of some institution that is now to be created so that may do what they please about aboriginal languages. The aboriginal peoples will have no recognized right in the minds of those bureaucrats to any say in what is done.

Please recognize the kind of desperation that is reflected in the words and in the actions of the First Nations at this time. They feel they are faced with extinction, as has been pointed out in the letter read by the hon. member for Vancouver East. Recognize that and do not exasperate them further. Do not exacerbate their fears further by this quite unnecessary insistence that if the government's appointed officials in this heritage language institution wish to do something or other with the aboriginal languages, they are free to do it. Please respect the rights granted two centuries ago by the King of England, then an authority of this land, and the promises so grandly made by the Prime Minister only a few days ago.

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): I am glad to be able to speak to the member for Vancouver East's amendment with regard to the heritage languages. The Inuktitut language must move forward and be alive for generations to come. As my colleague for Western Arctic stated, aboriginal languages are being eroded and therefore need to be encouraged. We have to ensure that future generations keep our language, and through it our culture, alive and well.

[English]

Madam Speaker, I am happy to rise today to address the amendment of the member for Vancouver East on the issue of aboriginal languages being recognized in the heritage languages bill.

Although the Prime Minister and the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs over the last few weeks have been telling the people of Canada how much more they are going to do for the aboriginal people of this country, it just drives home the point that their promises may not mean too much when my colleague for Western Arctic is denied unanimous consent to go ahead with Bill C–269 on the issue of aboriginal languages.

It is an issue too with the government House leader as to what priorities or what recognition aboriginal languages have. It is indeed a very serious issue on the part of the aboriginal people. The issue of language, the issue of being able to move forward with our language is a fundamental part of our culture. I am sure that the House leader would be just as happy if we just went away and did not drive home the point that we do indeed have aboriginal rights.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize for interrupting the hon. member. I am sure he will want to continue his speech after Question Period.

It being 11 o'clock, pursuant to Standing Orders 30(5) the House will now proceed with members' statements.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE SENATE

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, according to Rules 49 and 50, at the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the yeas and and the nays and then expresses his opinion as to the result. If two or more express their disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote. The bells are rung, and when the whips enter and indicate that they are ready for the vote, the vote proceeds.

Canadians have a right to know that their rules of voting were broken yesterday by the government in the Senate. It is a shame. It is a disgrace.

THE SENATE

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I have just been to the Senate. At 10.50 a.m, I saw one senator, Senator Roméo "Lasagna" LeBlanc, take one shoe and bang it on his desk during Senator Lowell Murray's speech.

Madam Speaker, I must say I found this offensive. It was an offensive display by Liberal Senator Roméo "Lasagna" LeBlanc who represents the riding of Beauséjour.

THE SENATE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, the Mulroney government will go to any length, including the abrogation of basic democratic and parliamentary rights, to ram through their goods and services tax, the biggest single tax grab in Canadian history.

This tax will raise billions of dollars by taking money for the first time from service transactions and 60 per cent of personal expenditures by Canadians are spent on services, services such as dry–cleaning, transportation, private lessons, haircuts, taxi fares, amateur sports and recreation, restaurant meals, and funerals to name only a few. This tax is being implemented at a time when we are moving into a recession and energy prices are doubling.

The government has lost all sense of proportion, equity, and sound judgment. The public cannot cope with this massive new tax at this time.

We must do everything in our power to defeat it and that is exactly what our Liberal senators, within their authority, are trying to do. They are not serving their own needs, but responding to the democratic wishes of millions of Canadians.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, by maintaining their solid family traditions, our ancestors were able to build this country of ours and transmit to us their strength, their faith, their ideals and their vision of the future, and thus help this country develop and prosper.

In Quebec, we were able to preserve our language, culture and values and remain a distinct society, through our respect for and our pride in our family traditions.

Across Canada, families proud of their very diverse origins overcame their differences and worked together to build a country. We celebrate National Family Week at a time when our country is going through an identity crisis.

Madam Speaker, I therefore urge all Canadians to take this opportunity to share their family traditions and renew those feelings of confidence, unity and pride that form the basis of a country's future.

LITERACY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, the Commonwealth Meeting of Ministers responsible for Women's Affairs will be meeting this weekend. The Delegates Handbook, published by our Minister responsible for the Status of Women, states erroneously that Canada's literacy rate is 99 per cent.

The government knows full well over five million Canadians are still functionally illiterate with serious handicaps for employment and this means a great loss of human potential for Canada. It is shameful to state such blatant misinformation to delegates from around the world.

As the International Year on Literacy comes to a close, I ask the government to redouble its fight against illiteracy and sustain funding for community programs.

A good place to start would be for the government to drop its proposed goods and services tax on books. Studies show that illiteracy costs Canada billions of dollars each year and most illiterate Canadians have low incomes. The added cost of the GST will only help to discourage them from learning.

THE SENATE

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, a strong and unified country needs a government that is prepared to govern. Democracy is not a popularity contest, nor a monthly poll, or even a referendum. Rather it is the selection and the election from term to term of men and women and political parties to whom a mandate is given to govern. It becomes their responsibility and their duty to do what they believe is right for Canada and for its citizens.

That is why I support our government's resolve to temporarily, at this time, add to the Senate size to ensure that the House of Commons is in control and to insist that the will of the elected members of Parliament will prevail.

That is also why I have come to believe that the Senate badly needs reform to make it elected and effective or, otherwise, to see it abolished as an institution which has outlived its role and its tradition.

GOVERNMENT OF ONTARIO

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, in The Financial Post today, we learn that the newly elected Government of Ontario, the NDP government of Bob Rae, has learned its first lesson, that is, the difference between making promises and governing.

Lo and behold, Madam Speaker, we learn that the rookie NDP Treasurer, Floyd Laughren, is suggesting that he may piggyback the 8 per cent provincial sales tax on top of the Conservative GST. That is shameful.

No sooner do the NDP get elected to govern than the NDP are breaking their campaign promises. Instead of joining the Tories, the NDP should be joining the Liberal Party and, indeed, all Canadians in fighting this tax. It should be joining the court challenge, as the rest of the provinces will be doing shortly.

Madam Speaker, mark this on your calendar as the first broken promise of Bob Rae and the NDP.

THE SENATE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, the sad antics in the Senate last night and today only confirm the need for Senate reform or even abolition.

Yesterday afternoon, the opposition Senate members called a procedural vote and then refused to show up for their own vote. When they lost the vote, the first vote they have lost in 48 years, they reacted by herding the media onto the floor to hold up proceedings even more.

As I left the Senate, a few moments ago, the opposition senators were banging their desks to deny a government member being heard. Such antics would not even be allowed in kindergarten. On leaving the Senate, I could not help but think that I was seeing the demise of a once respectable institution and part of our Parliament which has now degenerated into a circus.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, never before has the Parliament of Canada been in such a crisis. The government, at various times, has blamed the opposition parties and the Senate and, on occasion, Conservative MPs have blasted, in their words, "the ignorance of the public".

The reality is that Parliament must be reformed. The government has institutionalized closure after limited debate on important and controversial legislation. Conservatives have refused to accept reasonable amendments. They insult witnesses before standing committees. The Chair of the Finance Committee abused the rules to force through the GST. And now, the government intends, at noon today, to reduce the size of the standing committees of the House.

Why would the Conservatives do this without the support of the other parties? Simply put, they wish to retain absolute control of each committee—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has now expired.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): I congratulate our Prime Minister for acting as co-chairman of the first World Summit for Children at the United Nations where the leaders of more than 70 countries gathered to show extraordinary interest in the plight of the poorest children of the world.

The summit was a telling commitment towards world-wide co-operation to preserve our human wealth—children.

There exists a wide gulf between the hopes we entertain for our children and the appalling conditions which are the lot of so many innocent victims.

Each day, Madam Speaker, 40,000 children die of sickness throughout the world, and for millions more life means hunger and violence.

By giving world leaders the common will to face such a challenge, the summit renews our hope that we will eventually eliminate child suffering.

THE SENATE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, in the Senate, last evening, Canadians witnessed the destruction of the rules of parliamentary government.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Milliken: Parliamentary law and procedure are fundamental parts of our Constitution. They constitute part of the rule of law in this country. The authority of the Speaker of this House and the privileges of the members of this House constitute an integral part of the rights and privileges of Canadians. We are representatives of the people of Canada and, as such, we embody the privileges and rights of our fellow citizens in our great country.

In the other place, their Speaker, appointed by the government, proceeded with a vote completely contrary to the rules. He made the rule of law a laughing-stock. This action constitutes a flagrant abuse of the laws and customs of Parliament. It is a disgrace and I call on the government to remove this Speaker—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has now expired.

THE SENATE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, here are a few headline stories from around the nation that tell it all regarding our Senate problems: "Senate shouldn't stymie Commons", the Halifax Daily News; "Shame on you Liberal Senators", Montreal's The Gazette ; "Senate shenanigans intolerable", The Ottawa Citizen; "Senate actions turn the stomach", The Calgary Herald; "Liberal Senators hijack democracy", The Kitchener-Waterloo Record; "Democracy is at stake", The Toronto Sun; and, "Liberals in Senate using strange logic", The Financial Post.

The message across the country is becoming increasingly clear. Canadians do not and will not support the actions of the unelected Liberals in the other place.

THE SENATE

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I stand proudly today to congratulate my Liberal colleagues in the other place.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Clancy: In the face of naked tyranny these valiant men and women are performing their constitutional duty and defending the rights and wishes of the overwhelming majority of Canadian citizens who say to all of us: "Axe the tax".

I am particularly proud of the Nova Scotia Liberals who will not sit still for the repudiation of the rule of law and who, with their Scots heritage and Canadian fortitude, will not give in to the nefarious practices of the government.

Nearly 2,000 years ago the Emperor Caligula made an appointment to his Senate. Would that the ancient Romans had Liberal senators to defend their rights. Canadians have their defenders against the Caligula of Baie Comeau.

THE LATE FRANK LYNCH-STAUNTON

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Madam Speaker, last Saturday, family, friends, and admirers laid to rest and paid tribute to rancher Frank Lynch-Staunton, former Lieutenant Governor of Alberta and former member of the Canada Council.

Frank was born in Pincher Creek in 1905, months before Alberta became a province. He embodied the values of the foothills pioneers and shared those values with the rest of our nation in his own understated straight talking manner.

As miles of cars and pick-up trucks trailed the hearse up the dusty gravel road to Livingstone Cemetery, one could not help but know that the setting was most appropriate. Even nature paid tribute with a glorious sunny Alberta foothills day and the salute of the eternal southwest wind.

With all the Livingstone Range of the Rocky Mountains as a headstone, with the Porcupine Hills to help keep out the cold north and east winds, colleagues should know, there lies a true Albertan and a great Canadian.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION IN THE SENATE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, we have been baffled in the past by the actions of the Celtic sphinx, but his most recent escapades are beyond comprehension.

Earlier this week, the leader of the Liberals in the Senate, Senator MacEachen, told us that he opposed the goods and services tax and that he would block it in the Senate. MacEachen is the master of procedure and it was his wily strategy, we were told, that would stop the GST from being passed.

Well, last night, the real strategy became apparent. Down to the wire the Conservatives were posed to bulldoze democracy and ram the GST through the Senate. Where was the leader of the Liberal troops? Where was the master Liberal strategist? Where was the Liberal senator procedural expert? Where was Allan J. MacEachen? He was in Brussels working for the Bank of Montreal.

FOOD LABELLING

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Madam Speaker, a few months ago, the tragic and untimely death of 15-year-old Robyn Allen of Scarborough heightened the necessity for action concerning disclosure of food ingredients on food packaging.

The Allergy Information Association and citizens across the country are calling on the government to enact regulations to require restauranteurs and food retailers to provide, on demand, a list of food ingredients and additives in prepared foods.

We must do our part to assist those persons who suffer from serious allergic reactions in order that protection for health and safety can be extended.

POVERTY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, as Canadians begin their celebration of Thanksgiving weekend this afternoon, it is important that all of us remember that many Canadians will be hampered in their thanksgiving by sheer need.

In the national capital region alone the Ottawa Food Bank distributed 585 metric tonnes of food in the year ending September, 1989 and 20,000 children live in poverty in the city of Ottawa. Five hundred thousand children in Canada need to look to food banks for their nourishment.

According to the National Council on Poverty in 1987, 57 per cent of all single parent mothers and their children were poor.

This is in Canada, which as we all know is blessed with prosperity in comparison with much of the world, where malnutrition claims the lives of 30,000 to 40,000 people each day.

As members of Parliament, let us not forget the admonition to a new chief set forth in the thousand year old Great Law of Peace of the Longhouse people:

> Look and listen for the welfare of the whole people, and always have in view not only the present, but also the coming generations, even those whose faces are yet beneath the surface of the ground—

As we give thanks this weekend, let us not forget those in need.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

As you said earlier today, Mr. Speaker, we live in remarkable times here on Parliament Hill. All this stems from the arrogant and desperate desire of this government to use any means to force the GST down the throats of Canadians.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister: Why did the Prime Minister, other ministers or officials of his government instruct their appointee in the chair of the Senate to throw the rules of the Senate out the window? Why are they that desperate to ram the GST down the throats of Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think we should just step back and look at the sequence of events here.

What we have seen over the course of the past number of months is the Liberal senators holding up a number of bills: the bill on unemployment insurance reform, on the goods and services tax, on income tax changes from the 1989 budget, expenditure reductions from the last budget.

The Prime Minister, not in an enthusiastic way, felt it was extremely important to break this deadlock between the House and the Senate. He decided with reluctance to add eight new senators.

What happened subsequently is that once the Liberal senators lost the majority in the Senate, they proceeded to follow procedural battles to deny the right of individual senators to express their views, and indeed to vote on specific issues.

Yesterday, the Speaker of the Senate, after waiting for a good amount of time for the senators to come into the House and vote on a motion that the Liberal senators themselves had put, gave half an hour's notice to the senators to vote and indicated to them—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister I am sure is intending to reply to the question, but I think it is perhaps going beyond a reply.

I will hear the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has attempted to evade answering my question as to why the Prime Minister directed, or other ministers or officials of his government instructed, their appointee in the chair of the Senate to throw the rules of Parliament out the window, because in directing the vote in a shameful way, that is exactly what happened.

I have here in my hand a transcript of an interview the Minister of Finance gave on national television last Sunday. In answer to questions about the GST and the Senate, he said: "We will be able to get that legislation through. I am not going to talk about it at this point in time, Mike, but we will get that legislation through. We will see certain things happening in the Senate this week."

I ask the Minister of Finance if this is not the smoking gun demonstrating the connection between the desperation of the Minister of Finance and this government, and the unprecedented actions of the Speaker of the Senate. I ask the Minister of Finance again: why are they so desperate to force the GST on to the backs of Canadians that they have instructed the Speaker of the Senate to abandon the rules and traditions of Parliament? Why are they so desperate? Why do they not care about the wishes of Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition is really, really reaching far for something here.

Let me ask him a question. He talks about arrogance. It is ridiculous for the Liberal senators to stand up, as the hon. member is also standing up, on their sanctimonious high horse and hold up the rules of the Senate when time and time again, over the last six years, the Liberals in the other place when the rules have not gone the right way, as far as they were concerned, voted to change the rules of the House.

They have overruled the Speaker on a number of occasions and now, for the first time in 45 years, they have lost a vote in the Senate. The arrogance of the Liberal senators is: "If we can't win a vote, we are going to take our marbles and go home".

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance is so interested in the Senate, he should study the Senate rules because those rules permit a ruling of the Speaker to be overruled. That is the case there. The Minister of Finance does not explain why and how the Speaker of the Senate had the authority to ignore the clear wording of the rules of the Senate.

Why did the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister ask and direct the Speaker of the Senate to throw out the rules of the Senate? Why is the government so desperate that it is prepared to ram the GST down the throats of Canadians even though they do not want it?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to rules. I would like to see clearly what those rules are that he is referring to. I cannot read the Leader of the Opposition's mind. There are a lot of rules over there.

The key here is that time and time again, when the Liberal senators did not get their way as far as the rules were concerned, what did they do? They overruled the Speaker. They voted to overrule the Speaker, voted out the rule and changed the rule themselves. That has been done time and time again.

It is a clear responsibility of the Speaker to ensure that the business of Parliament continues. This is what the Speaker in the Senate said there yesterday: "I have taken this decision after much reflection to protect the rights of individual senators to perform their duties". That, I think, is a clear statement of the role and the responsibility—

Mr. Speaker: That certainly is a statement of the hon. Speaker of the Senate. The hon. member for Hamilton East.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. The Prime Minister poses as the champion of democracy, yet today he supports anarchy. That is what happened last night, nothing but anarchy, so I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he is prepared to assume his responsibilities under section 34 of Canada's Constitution Act and remove forthwith the man who behaved so anarchically last night, namely the Speaker of the Senate?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Hamilton refers to anarchy in the Senate last evening. I saw what I think all Canadians saw on television of what was happening, grown men acting like children, running around the Senate, inviting the media into the Senate, contrary to the rules of the Senate, as my hon. friend surely knows.

I ask my hon. friend, as I would ask all Canadians: Were you proud to be a Canadian when you saw what was going on in the Senate last night?

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. According to the official biographer of the Prime Minister, L. Ian McDonald, it was the current Prime Minister who personally commandeered the Senate appointment by the Right Hon. Joe Clark of Mr. Guy Charbonneau in 1979 and it was in fact Mr. Charbonneau and two others who commandeered Mr. Clark's overthrow.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Order.

Ms. Copps: My question to the Deputy Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: I want to remind the House again of Standing Order 18. I repeat what I said at the opening of the House an hour and a half ago, that these are unusual circumstances that are going on.

This is what the Standing Order says. I know the hon. member will help the Speaker.

> 18. No Member shall speak disrespectfully of the Sovereign, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of the Governor General or the person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any Member thereof.

Now, I think the hon. member can put her question without straying into offensive words. That may indeed be a great challenge to many members here, but I am sure the hon. member can help the Speaker.

Ms. Copps: I will remind the House that I was referring to the analysis of the Prime Minister's official biographer.

Deferring to your reference, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, given the close association and obvious strategy being developed together by the Prime Minister and the Speaker of the other place, will the Prime Minister show Canadians that he is prepared to divorce himself from the political agenda of the other place by exercising his authority under Article 34 of the BNA Act and firing the Speaker of the other place.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that we have to reflect again on what is at stake here. What is at stake is a fundamental, democratic principle which all members of the House of Commons should take seriously and that is the supremacy of the elected House of Commons, the accountable House of Commons, over the appointed, unelected, unaccountable senators in the other place.

I refer the hon. member to what her leader is quoted as saying in Le Droit a few days ago. In any case, he claims to have complete control over his 52 senators who have locked horns with the Conservative government over the GST. Mr. Chrétien said, "They'll do what I told them to do".

I ask the member opposite, is Mr. Chrétien responsible? Is he telling those 52 senators to break the rules? Is he telling those senators to—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government could end the nonsense happening in this place by bringing in a bill right away to the House, that our party would support, to abolish the unelected Senate in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nystrom: If the government is not prepared to do that—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Like the minister, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you heard this morning that the unemployment rate in Canada has gone up 1 per cent since last year. The unemployment rate in Montreal is up 2.5 per cent. More than one million Canadians are now out of work.

Here is my question, Mr. Speaker. We are now in a recession, so will the minister finally admit that and what does he intend to do for the millions of Canadians who are without jobs, the millions of Canadians who are the first victims of his recession?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure which question the hon. member wants me to answer. He has asked one question on the Senate and he has asked another question on unemployment insurance.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is not here to answer the question on the Senate. If he were here, he should table a bill to abolish the Senate right now. My question is for the minister—

Mr. Speaker: We have a rule in this place that it is not appropriate to comment on the absence of any hon. member, whether it is the Prime Minister or otherwise. I have to remind the hon. member of that. Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I want to know from the Minister of Finance on this Thanksgiving weekend, when even food banks cannot feed all the hungry people in this country, what he is going to do for the over one million Canadians who are now without work.

Can he, for example, withdraw the GST—that is the wrong tax at the wrong time—do something for the people in this country who are without work? Will he withdraw that GST now and at least do that favour for those people?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has talked about the unemployment rate today. The unemployment rate is up but so is job creation. We have more people working last month than was the case the month before.

I draw that to the hon. member's attention because it is this excessive rhetoric about what is happening to the economy which is not helpful in improving people's confidence about what is going on in the economy.

I am not happy about people in food banks. We are reflecting the weakness in the economy, which I have talked about openly in recent months, by a reduction in interest rates that has amounted to over 1.5 per cent over the course of the last three or four months. If the weakness continues, if the inflationary pressures subside, we will see further reductions in interest rates and that will help lead to a stronger economic performance in the months and years to come on a non-inflationary basis.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance would not use the word recession if his mouth was full of it.

If this is excessive rhetoric, what does the Minister of Finance have to say to the 115 people who lost their jobs at Dr. Ballards in Mississauga, or to the 94 people who lost their jobs at Fletchers in British Columbia, or to the 200 people who lost their jobs at ICI Canada in Montreal? What does he have to say to those people who are without work and cannot find jobs because of the economic policies of this government?

Will he withdraw the GST, give those people a break, and start concentrating on an employment policy in this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have made it quite clear that I am not happy about people losing their jobs. I would like to see a lot of people working and a lot of people getting new jobs.

What I do know and what the hon. member totally ignores in the rhetoric that he uses is that the GST in the province of Quebec, with the harmonization by the province of Quebec, will result in a major boost to new investment in plant equipment and technology equivalent to a 7.5 per cent investment tax credit.

On the one hand the hon. member pleads about people losing jobs. Why is he at the same time standing in the way of the government doing something which will help create jobs in this country and which international organizations say will help create jobs in this country?

THE SENATE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The Economic Council of Canada has unequivocally condemned the government's fiscal policy. The government has destroyed the confidence Canadians had in themselves and now seeks to undermine the democratic institutions of our country.

How can the minister believe it will be possible for Canadians to regain their confidence now that his government is bent on destroying the institutions on which that confidence must rest?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member who is normally a reasonable individual, his excessive rhetoric, talking about the Economic Council unequivocally condemning. It did not.

If the hon. member had read the report of the Economic Council, he would know that it did not unequivocally condemn. The council says that it is supportive of what we are doing in controlling inflation. It is looking for a better balance between fiscal policy and monetary policy, and I agree with that. We are trying to get that better balance, but we are constantly being thwarted by the hon. member and his colleagues from doing the things that are necessary to bring the deficit down.

If the hon. member were serious about the question he was asking, he would say to the senators in the other place to get on with the job of passing Bill C–21 which is a money bill designed to improve our desperate position, Bill C–28 which is a tax bill designed to improve—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, that is absolute bunk. The Economic Council of Canada said that this government is strangling the economy of this country.

As far as what is happening in the other House, for the first time in the history of this country a majority government in power is seeking a coup d'état on its own people. That is what is happening.

This government has destroyed the economy. It has destroyed national goodwill. This government has destroyed aboriginal rights, and now it is destroying the rights of Parliament.

The first issue we had to deal with was this terribly unfair tax. Now we are dealing with the future of our country. No tax policy is worth what is happening to this nation. No tax policy is worth submerging the rights of Parliament.

My question, Mr. Speaker: Will you withdraw the tax policy for the good of the nation?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Andre: That was absolutely outrageous, totally outrageous.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had made that speech back in June, maybe he would have been in a different position.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He is being just a little bit too self–righteous and a little bit two–faced about what he is saying because if he were as concerned as he says he is about democracy and democratic rights, he would reflect on the fact that the GST was part of the tax reform proposal that we announced in June 1987. It was part of the platform of this party when we went through the 1988 election. We were elected to introduce or to bring into power that platform. Now—

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): You wouldn't even debate it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member is saying what—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The question put to the hon. minister was a very vigorous one. I think the hon. minister should be given an opportunity to reply. The hon. minister.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member talks about democracy and the rights of Parliament. When a government is elected with a majority, it has a right and a responsibility to legislate its program.

• (1140)

The Senate, which is not elected, which is not accountable, does not have a right to block what the elected government has decided to do and was elected to do. When the senators in the other place without a majority in the Senate block the voting possibilities, block the right of individual senators to vote, that is anti-democratic. When they do not allow simple motions that were put by them to adjourn the House, when they do not allow that type of motion to come to a vote, that is anti-democratic. That is the fundamental principle that we are talking about.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Notwithstanding the hypocrisy of the New Democratic Party with regard to its opposition to the Senate and now its favour of the GST as evidenced by the premier of Ontario, I want to remind the Minister of Finance that Canadians are against a tax on reading, are against a tax on restaurant meals, and are against a tax with regard to health care.

Will the Minister of Finance take us into his confidence and tell members of the House and Canadians why the Prime Minister of Canada and his staff have directed their Order in Council appointment in the upper chamber to breach the rules in order to pass the GST tax?

Mr. Speaker: That is an allegation of impropriety of a very severe nature. The hon. minister.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has no basis for saying what he has just said about the Speaker in the other place. I do not think that there is any justification whatsoever for that type of comment to be made on the floor of this House.

The hon. member has referred to rules, rules in the other place. Time and time again over the course of the last six years when the Liberal senators did not get their way, when the rules of the Senate inhibited them from doing the things they wanted to do, they voted down the Speaker and they voted to change the rules of the House.

When we are talking about, using the hon. member's word "hypocrisy", let me just remind him of what his leader said: "It would be irresponsible for Liberals to promise to scrap Ottawa's goods and services tax without offering an alternative".

We have not seen the alternative, and we have Mr. Chrétien directing his senators to block this legislation without an alternative. That is clearly irresponsible.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, through you to the Minister of Finance, we would gladly provide an alternative. Just call an election. I dare you.

I am glad the Minister of Finance has referred to hypocrisy again, because we know what the Minister of Finance stated in his recent interview, and I quote: "We will see certain things happening in the Senate this week. More than that I cannot say".

I ask the Minister of Finance to take members into his confidence, to take Canadians into his confidence and explain to this Chamber as to why the Prime Minister of this country has directed an Order in Council appointment to—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this is not the Senate. Order the Government House leader to sit down.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. minister wishes to respond, he may.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make one point. The hon. member said: "Call an election". Let me remind the hon. member we did call an election in 1988. I heard the platform of the Liberal Party and one of the first items on the platform of the Liberal Party was: "We will not introduce the" Mulroney"—I think the words were—"sales tax reform proposal". If they did not have an alternative then, how can we expect them to have an alternative now?

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday the RCMP released a statement indicating that they are conducting an investigation into Technotread Tire Manufacturing. Technotread has received over $2 million of federal money.

On May 17 the Minister of Public Works told the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology with respect to Technotread: "If there has been a mistake made, I will take full responsibility for it".

Given the commitment made by the Minister of Public Works, will the government hold him to it and demand his resignation?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for ACOA, I will have to take that question as a representation and will certainly get back to the hon. member with the information he has requested.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, it is a serious matter of ministerial responsibility and a waste of government funds. My New Democratic colleagues raised these grave concerns about these expenditures with the minister on three occasions; in June 1989, August 1989 and before the parliamentary committee. The government has done nothing in the meantime. Why did the government refuse to act to save public money?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the supplementary will have to be the same as to the original question. I will have the minister get back to the hon. member with the information, if that is what the question is about, about this file.

THE SENATE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, Canadians want to know who ordered the Speaker of the Senate to break the rules of Parliament in the Senate. Why this coup d'état by a government—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I do not know that anybody established that any order was given. If the hon. member wants to ask the government if an order was given to the Speaker in the other place, that is an appropriate question. The government can answer it, refuse to answer it or give an explanation. Let us put aside the accusations. The accusation is very serious.

What would we do here? What would we do in this place if someone got up and made an accusation that someone, whether it was on the opposition side or on the government side, gave me orders to do something? That is what the accusation is, it is a serious one.

I ask the hon. member to put his question and we can deal with it, but make sure that it is not an accusation. Make sure that it is asking a question.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I intend to.

I would like this government, which is in the process of carrying out a coup d'état with its majority and wants to break the rules of Parliament, to tell the House which cabinet minister gave the Speaker of the Senate the order to proceed with this infamous decision.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let us be very clear with the words that the hon. member has just used. A coup d'état is when a minority tries to take over when a majority is ruling. That is precisely what is happening in the Senate right now.

• (1150)

As to the question that the hon. member has asked, there was no directive given to the Speaker of the Senate. What he has said in a letter to four senators on both sides of the House is, "I have taken this decision after much reflection, to protect the rights of individual senators to perform their duties."

That, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, is the role and the responsibility of the Speaker.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): I will quote again the minister this week on national television. He said: "We will see certain things happening in the Senate this week. More than that, I cannot say".

I want to tell the government, the Prime Minister, or any minister in that cabinet, using the Speaker of the Senate to give the jackboot to Canadians is wrong.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, you tell us that we cannot use offensive language against members of either House, but what happened—

Mr. Speaker: No, no. Just a moment. I did not say you could not use offensive language. I read the rule.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, what happened last night in the other place was offensive to all of us, and to all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rompkey: Because he did not answer this clearly earlier on, can the Minister of Finance say now that no member of the government has been in touch with the Speaker of the Senate at any time to advise on strategy with regard to what happened last night. Will he deny that any member of the government was in touch with the Senate Speaker at any time to advise him on the strategy with regard to what happened last night.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member was offended by what happened last night, he should reflect on the fact that the circus we saw was produced by Liberal senators and organized by the Leader of the Opposition, I am sure.

It was organized and perpetrated by Liberal senators. They opened the doors of the Senate, called on to the floor of the Senate members of the media, the member for Kamloops—Shuswap and the member for Saskatchewan—I forget his riding. It was these actions on the part of the Liberal senators that, according to the phone calls I have been receiving this morning, have embarrassed Canadians, have shamed Canadians. They say, "What is going on in this country when what we thought was a place of sober—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his supplementary.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, what offends people in northern Canada is the fact that gasoline is going up, snowmobiles are going up, the price of living for people in the north is going to be astronomical as a result of the GST.

Let the record show that the minister did not answer the question. Let me give him another opportunity to answer it. At any time was he, any member of the government or anybody representing the government, in touch with the Speaker of the Senate to advise on the strategy with regard to what happened there last night. Yes or no?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am advised by my colleague that the advice was given on the floor of the House of Commons.

An hon. member: On the floor of the Senate.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): On the floor of the Senate. It happens that the Speaker of the Senate—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —if hon. members are not going to allow—

Mr. Speaker: I am going to move momentarily to a single question. The hon. member for Fredericton.

FORESTRY

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to change to subject.

Some hon. members: No, no. Come on.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry. There is strong speculation in the forest industry in the Atlantic region that the government is considering termination of the Memorandum of Understanding concerning the softwood lumber export tariff with the United States. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic region lumber producing group are exempt from that surcharge.

I would like to ask, because this is very important to the Atlantic lumber industry, what is the status of negotiations to terminate the MOU and can he assure the House and the Atlantic lumber producers that that exemption will be retained for Atlantic Canada in some form?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, many of the circumstances and the factors that gave rise to the Memorandum of Understanding with the United States, which was a rather unconventional way to solve a trade dispute, have changed significantly since 1986. It is the intention of the government to negotiate, perhaps, a termination of the agreement over time. Extensive consultation has been carried out with the industry, the provinces, and all the other stakeholders, with a view to reaching a consensus as to the approach that should be taken.

As my hon. friend knows, I met with the lumber producers yesterday and gave them the assurance that they will be involved in the consultations and their interests will be considered and protected.

THE SENATE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Considering the degrading and offensive spectacle to which Canadians have been treated during the past few hours in the Senate Chamber, all at their expense, and considering the fact that a bunch of senile old men see themselves as a government in exile, I would ask the Minister of Justice—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would put his question.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to name them, but I would ask the Minister of Justice to take steps immediately, by way of a constitutional resolution, to move the abolition of the Senate in this House. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Finance keep criticizing the Senate. I think it is high time they did something about it and closed the damned place!

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is no doubt aware, the demise of Meech Lake has prevented us from introducing these constitutional changes because we no longer have the process for doing so. However, I hope we will be able to find another process for bringing about these changes.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. As we head home for our Thanksgiving dinners, it might be useful to remind ourselves that the food producers in this country, Canada's farm families, are in their worst financial situation in 50 years. Piles of grain are rotting on the ground while creditors come knocking on their doors.

Last week the Minister of Agriculture assured us that he recognized the urgency of the situation and was looking at the options. Therefore, I would like to ask the minister, since everybody from Harvey McEwen to Garf Stevenson and from Grant Devine to Wayne Easter have called for the restoration of interest-free cash advances as a first priority, is this, in fact, one of the options which the government is seriously looking at?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for a very good question. As of today there is a working group looking at the Advance Payments and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Acts. We expect them to have a report available for us shortly. We have a task force working with these people and we hope to have a recommendation very, very shortly.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I think the inference was that, in fact, the restoration of interest-free cash advances might be at hand. Therefore, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to assure us that this has nothing to do with the timing of a potential Saskatchewan election. When might the government announce a decision and when might the new interest-free cash advance program be available to farmers?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I was certain that the issue was dealing with farmers and the plight of the grain producers in the country, and that it had nothing to do with elections. The government will respond at the appropriate time.

I would hope that he would encourage all provincial Ministers of Agriculture to come forward and help us take part in developing the proper process to give agriculture the safety nets that are certainly required for the long-term continuation of a viable agriculture.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The central issue for Canadians is the issue of trust. For months and months, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have been saying that there are no alternatives to the goods and services tax.

The Minister of Finance knows that there are many alternatives to the goods and services tax out there, the single tax being one and the Brooks proposal another.

When is he going to start coming clean with Canadians, withdraw the GST, and start studying tax reform that will bring simplicity, fairness, and efficiency to our system?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have said that there have been no realistic alternatives because we have studied Mr. Brooks' proposal and the single tax proposal. They do not make sense. It involves putting a much heavier tax burden on small business.

My hon. friend says that it simplifies the system. It simplifies one aspect of the system in that there is a one-page form, but it omits a number of other schedules to the preparation of the tax which help business people and individuals prepare their tax returns. They can avoid mistakes that are going to complicate the whole situation.

Is the hon. member suggesting that we should increase the tax rates for low income people? Is the hon. member saying that we should increase the rate of tax for small business? Is the hon. member saying we should put a far heavier burden on income tax and remove taxation totally from consumption?

He says that, yes, he would like to do that. That would put a tremendous reduction to the incentive for working, for saving, and for investing in the country. These are things that are very important in the development of this economy.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

CONGRATULATORY MESSAGE

Mr. Speaker: I want to change the subject for a moment. I hope that what I am going to do will find favour with the House.

On behalf of hon. members, I want to express our very great regard to one of our colleagues, Mr. Stan Darling, the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka, on his 50th wedding anniversary.

I think this is an unusual and wonderful event.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

REMARKS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice during Question Period that I want to raise a question of privilege arising out of something that happened during that Question Period just completed.

After the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard finished his question, the camera and the sound cut to you, Mr. Speaker, and your microphone came on. Therefore, the entire country could see and hear the government House leader screaming into your ear. The entire country saw it and heard it. It can be viewed on the tapes.

What the government House leader was saying, in part, was: "Outrageous, absolutely outrageous." I submit what was outrageous was the blatant attempt by the government House leader to interfere with the Chair.

The government may be able to get away with that kind of thing in the Senate, but I submit the government should not be allowed—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised the matter by way of a question of privilege.

Is the hon. parliamentary secretary seeking the floor?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important that there not be left an impression that it is unusual for House leaders of any party to approach the Chair, to discuss what is going on in the House, and to make arguments about procedures. I think to leave that impression on the floor would leave an impression that is both false and misleading.

Mr. Speaker: A very brief reply.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that not only House leaders but hon. members approach the Chair. The question is: what was the purpose in the case that I mentioned of the government House leader and what was he saying? The purpose can be divined from the words, the tone, and the entire context.

I say that what we have here is a prima facie case of breach of privilege, because the Speaker of this House is the servant of all the members of this House and not of the government House leader or the government.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if you find a prima facie case of privilege I am certainly prepared to move the necessary motion.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I am going to deal with this as best I can.

First, whatever the hon. government House leader said, it had no influence whatsoever on me and that is also very clear from the tape.

Second, there are times in this place when not just the government House leader, but other members on both sides of the House are given to express themselves in—

Mr. Bosley: Strong language.

Mr. Speaker: I accept the help of a former Speaker of this House when he says strong language. That happens.

All I can say in this matter, and it is clear if one wants to look at the tape, that whatever the hon. House Leader said did not make any difference in the way I conducted the exchange between the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard and the minister. I think that the hon. member would agree with that.

I am sorry. These things happen, but I can tell you I was not influenced in any way that would diminish the dignity of this place or which would have touched on my handling of that particular exchange. After that, I do not think there is anything more than I can say.

The hon. member for Athabasca.

CONGRATULATORY MESSAGE

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, you have very appropriately commended Mr. Stan Darling on his 50th wedding anniversary.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mrs. Darling, but also, with unanimous consent of the House, I think that we should recommend her for sainthood.

Mr. Speaker: It may be procedurally out of order, but we probably would get consent. I think we can say to Mona that we think he is a wonderful guy, but we think that most of the reason for that is because of her.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

POINTS OF ORDER

REMARKS BY MEMBERS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have sat in the House during Question Period and I would like a point of clarification from the Chair.

Each time members on our side, or perhaps even in the NDP, have talked about the interpretation of the recently made appointment of the eight senators in the other place, you have stood up and said that they were putting an allegation forth as to how they were appointed.

• (1210)

It seems to me that when there are cases before the court in Canada, when many legal opinions—and you and I are both lawyers and we perhaps have different opinions on that act—that in the House we should be able to talk about those appointments without being stopped and calling it an allegation as to how the Prime Minister made the appointments.

I would just like clarification. Am I wrong in how I have interpreted your opinion at the time?

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I want to respond to the hon. member or South West Nova.

Of course, perhaps she should check the record. I have not stopped questions on the legality or otherwise on the question of legal opinions with respect to the nomination to the other place of eight senators. There has been extensive discussion of that in Question Period.

If the hon. member has got some specific instance where, again as I said yesterday, she feels that I may have erred, then I will discuss it and, if it is important enough, I would give her the chance to raise it as a point of order.

But there has been extensive discussion about whether or not there are legal opinions and who wrote them and where are they. I have not ruled those questions out of order.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I would just like to clarify one point.

I thought that each time somebody made a reference as to how they were appointed by the Prime Minister in the other place, under that section there was a censure, but maybe I am wrong. I will go back and look at each time where the Chair intervened before bringing it up.

Mr. Speaker: I want to say to the hon. member for South West Nova, who has been here for a good many years and is a long-time colleague of mine, that I would ask her to look at the record carefully.

But certainly there has been extensive questioning and responses to the issue of whether or not as to the legality or otherwise of those appointments. As far as I can remember, I have not put any block in the way of those opinions being asked.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary—Northeast): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is related to the presence in the Speaker's gallery yesterday of a guest of Canada's Ukrainian community, travelling on a Soviet diplomatic passport, and I am referring to Mr. Viatcheslav Tchornovil, a member of the Parliament of the Ukrainian Republic and President of the Executive Committee of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Lviv.

Mr. Tchornovil is a well-known dissident who spent 15 years of his life in Soviet prisons because he defended democratic principles.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: This is no doubt an important matter and a very distinguished person but I am having difficulty seeing how it is a point of order. I do not think it is a point of order. On the same point, the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary—Northeast): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: On the same point of order?

Mr. Kindy: On the same point of order. I had not finished, Mr. Speaker!

The fact that he was not introduced to the House, Mr. Speaker is a breach of parliamentary tradition. I hope that this omission.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I am not accepting that. I have been trying to make it clear that in a Question Period of 45 minutes, with the competition for time that faces us all, but especially the Chair, I will do the best I can with introductions but they will come at three o'clock or afterward.

That is no disrespect to any distinguished visitor, but my first obligation is to all members of this place. If there was not a recognition, it was because the events of this place were more important. This is the House of Commons of Canada. My obligation is to all members and that comes before polite, courteous, and no doubt very happy occasions when we can introduce distinguished people in the Chamber.

But there are only 45 minutes. This is not a question any more. Members and the public have got to understand this. It is not just the government, Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, and the other loyal opposition party, the New Democratic Party. There are independents sitting in this Chamber and all of them are contesting, and rightfully so, for time.

I am not in the position that I was many months ago where I could exercise some latitude. As far as I am concerned, the members come first.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has got up on a point of order and I have explained why, regretfully, I could not make that recognition. If the hon. member wants to take it up with his colleagues and change my approach to this, the hon. member has every right to do so. But I insist on putting the hon. members first.

Mr. Kindy: On a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has got a second point of order I will hear him, but if it is the same point of order, I am not going to hear him. The hon. member.

Mr. Kindy: I have not concluded why.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. There is another way to carry on this discussion, and I am prepared to see the hon. member. The hon. member can join with other members and come and see me.

In the meantime, I want to make very clear there is no disrespect meant. If it is impossible, given the exigencies of the moment and the hour, that we cannot get to the introduction. There is no disrespect to anybody. But this is the House of Commons of Canada and the people who are going to get the first attention from this Speaker are the members of the House of Commons.

Tabling of documents.

DOCUMENT REFERRED TO BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the other day I gave an undertaking to the House leader of the Official Opposition that I would table the document that the Prime Minister was referring to during the question on hon. Senator Hébert.

I regret to inform the member that we did look through and we do not see the apology, but I will table that document and he can look for himself.

Mr. Riis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would seek clarification. My hon. friend the government House leader yesterday indicated that a reference that the Prime Minister made to the past Chief Justices of the Supreme Court in the House and he said he would see that that would be tabled. I am curious. Did he have an opportunity to do that, and if not, would he do it as soon as possible?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I did indeed make that commitment. I have not had an opportunity to do that. I will do it as soon as possible.

STRIKING

FORTY-NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the forty-ninth support of the Striking Committee.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in the report later this day. I would ask that we dispense with the reading of that report by the clerk at the table.

I think members should know that this is the first time unanimous consent has not been given. The previous 48 reports were unanimous, the forty-ninth one is not. It is in the House on division. But we were unanimous in asking that the chairman make members aware of one paragraph that is in the report, and I would simply read that paragraph of the report at this time.

> Your committee would like it known that it is their view that standing committees should be encouraged to meet less often as full committees and more often as smaller sub-committees in order to use more effectively and efficiently the members' time.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I suspect that you will be seeking unanimous consent as the government Whip has indicated for the forty-ninth report of the Striking Committee. I must say that it is impossible for me, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, to give my consent today. We have many, many concerns regarding the report. I think it deserves much more consideration. I think to be fair, this is a unilateral effort at this point. I would like to think that we can come to an accommodation between all the members of the House and simply not have one more government unilateral decision being foisted upon us.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West on the same point.

Mr. Hawkes: Just on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have not yet asked for unanimous consent. It comes during Routine Proceedings at the point of Motions. If there are argument to be made and you wish to hear them, that would be the appropriate time. Certainly I am prepared to make some if that is your desire at that point, but normally we ask for unanimous consent, and it is given or denied. If we are going to hear arguments, I would be pleased to enter into that situation as well.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should proceed and we will see whether the matter comes up again. The hon. parliamentary whip.

REQUEST FOR CONCURRENCE IN FORTY-NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, if the House gives its consent, I am prepared to move that the forty-ninth report of the Striking Committee presented to the House earlier this day be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not agreement.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me this afternoon to have an opportunity to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from western Canada, particularly British Columbia, who point out their concern that the government has decided to attach a tax to reading material, including children's books. The petitioners feel that this is a stupid decision actually and are asking the Parliament of Canada to do whatever it can to have the government return to its senses and not proceed with taxing reading material.

On a second petition, Mr. Speaker, on a different topic but related I suppose, pursuant to Standing Order 36, and again on behalf of constituents primarily from Kamloops this time and from Logan Lake, British Columbia. The petitioners point out a whole set of reasons why they oppose the government's decision to proceed with the 7 per cent goods and services tax. They point out that 80 per cent of Canadians oppose this tax and that it is coming at a time of recession, and are asking that the government not proceed at this time.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Mississauga and Streetsville who are opposed to the application of the goods and services tax to books. They in their petition indicate that printed material has been exempt from taxation in this country and, indeed, most of the world for a very long time, they and are opposed to this tax.

They must be appalled that their representative in this House supports the tax and more so at the jackboot tactics used by the government in the other place.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions to this House. One is with respect to the goods and services tax. A number of residents in the city of Moose Jaw have presented me with a petition calling on this government to withdraw this tax. They say it is unfair and they call upon this government to bring in some fair taxation.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): I also, Mr. Speaker, want to present a petition on behalf of a number of producers from Saskatchewan. These are producers who are concerned about the future of agriculture in Saskatchewan and, indeed, in western Canada and are concerned most particularly with respect to the future of the Canadian Wheat Board. They are upset that the government has removed oats from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. They call upon this government to reinstate oats under the Canadian Wheat Board Act and to give oats and barley the same protection that wheat now has under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, namely that neither can be removed or changed without this body making that recommendation and passing that bill.

BILL C-21

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and duty to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of some of my constituents from the Sweet Bay, Portland, Charleston, Summerville, Clay Cove area. These are fish plant workers in the fish plant in Charleston and they are very concerned about the 14 weeks unemployment insurance that they need to have in order to qualify. There was a meeting of 350 of them not too long ago at which they have expressed their concern.

They have now put it on paper. They are very concerned about what Bill C-21 is going to do, particularly with the government getting out of the unemployment insurance business.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject these cuts to the unemployment insurance system and propose more meaningful reforms, concentrate on the labour force development and come up with an effective regional development policy.

FOOD AND DRUG REGULATIONS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough—Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to present this petition today, which will be the first of many petitions on this subject.

The petition is pursuant to Standing Order 36. The names of the petitioners on all the petitions total some 9,000. Recently, Robyn Allen of Scarborough died as a result of a very serious allergy food reaction.

The Allergy Information Association in metro Toronto and the petitioners are calling upon the Government of Canada to enact legislation amending the food and drug regulations. This is a very important issue.

A number of young people across the country have been subjected to death because of the information that has been lacking in restaurants as well as on packages. I am very pleased to present this petition on behalf of the petitioners.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition from constituents of mine in and around Saskatoon, Young, Asquith, Cutknife, Warman and Dalmeny and so on who ask that the government reject in the strongest terms the proposals for a goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out that what it does is tax people in a way that does not take into account their ability to be able to pay taxes.

They also decry the government's execution of the tax system which is presently in place whereby those who are wealthy and very well off pay very little tax. Those who are far less able to pay taxes are forced to share the major burden of the tax system.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 288 could be made an Order for Return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 288 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

THE SENATE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I provided you with notice that I would rise under the provisions of Standing Order 52 to seek leave to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent and pressing concern.

I do not think I need to go into any particular detail. The letter explains the reason. In a very short summary, though, I will simply say that over the last 24 hours, the crisis in the other place has deepened, and I am sure our constituents across the country are confused and angry at the apparent inability of Parliament to function.

Our ability to perform the functions with which the Constitution endows us is being undermined at this present moment. The continued growth of these concerns may result in the complete loss of faith in our political institutions.

In summary, basically all of us are deeply troubled by the situation in the other place. In a sense, the work of the Parliament of Canada—not necessarily the House of Commons—has been paralyzed. I would suggest that, if there ever has been an emergency in the country, it is this.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice today that because of the breakdown of the rule of law in the Senate of Canada, we believe it would be very useful to have a debate on this whole question.

We believe that the ultimate authority on all these questions is Parliament. Parliament right now is paralyzed, and we deplore that immensely. We would hope, Mr. Speaker, that in your good judgment you would give us a chance to try to restore some confidence of Canadians in Parliament and give us a debate later this day.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I am going to respond to both of these applications and I am going to say more than perhaps the Speaker usually does on such applications.

I am very conscious of the fact that the reform committee sometime ago recommended that no reason should be given by the Speaker when responding to these applications. As I had to do a few days ago, I am going to give some indication of my approach to this.

First, as anyone who is watching this place today knows, there is very grave concern here in this Chamber about events in the other place. Within the bounds of the rules that we have to govern us, there has been extensive comment today.

The question is whether it would be appropriate to have an emergency debate today with respect to those events. I have given this very careful consideration today because I have had notice. I am inclining not to accept the applications of the two hon. members at this time, not because this is not a serious matter, but because it is probably appropriate to see if the other place can sort out its difficulties.

I am very conscious that in turning down an application for an emergency debate there must be no confusion in the minds of the public that hears the application and hears my answer that that rejection is necessarily for all time or that it ignores the seriousness of the matter raised.

I know hon. members will understand that it is not particularly easy in a situation like this for the Speaker of the House to make this ruling but I think that today, given events as they presently are, it would be appropriate to see if the other place can resolve its difficulties.

I thank both hon. members for giving me notice. I have taken their applications very seriously.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motion No. 1 of Ms. Mitchell (p. 13846).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before Question Period the hon. member for Nunatsiaq had the floor. I will recognize the hon. member.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I would just like to continue with the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver East to the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute Act.

I would like to quote from some letters that arrived in my office with regard to the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute Act. This one is from the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, which is the representative organization for all the Inuit in Canada. I will read part of the letter which was written to the Secretary of State of Canada. It states:

> Unlike other minorities in Canada, we have no homelands in which our language and our culture can flourish, other than the Canadian North. As native people, we have special rights by virtue of our aboriginal status. These rights have been enshrined in the Canadian Constitution and are part of the laws, customs and treaties of the land. Although these aboriginal rights have not been fully defined, it is certain that they will include the right to the protection and enhancement of native languages and cultures.

That is the feeling of the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada and all the Inuit, that aboriginal languages have to be recognized by themselves and not as part of a larger group of languages.

I would also like to read another letter from the National Chief of the Assembly of First Nations to the hon. members of Parliament, which in part says:

> Although we understand Aboriginal languages are not excluded from the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute Act, First Nations do not wish to be included in the definition of "Heritage Languages" in Bill C–37. We are the "founding" languages of Canada, and given the precarious future of our endangered languages, require a separate Aboriginal Languages Foundation/Institute.

It is with these kinds of letters and the support that we have from the various aboriginal groups that we press forward not to be included in the Canadian Heritage Languages Act but that aboriginal languages be recognized on their own merits as the founding languages of this nation.

Earlier this year the Government of Canada slashed its funding to the aboriginal communications sector. When that occurred several things happened which cut back on either the education of aboriginal languages through the media or in other ways caused us suffering.

I would again like to refer to a copy of the press release by the Inuit Broadcasting Corporation which is the TV arm of the Inuit Communications Society. It says in the press release issued on February 22, 1990:

> The Inuit Broadcasting Corporation (IBC) may lose more than a quarter of its funding as a result of the new federal budget. The $600,000.00 cut will have an immediate and devastating impact on Canada's leading aboriginal television network.

That speaks for itself. The Government of Canada, through the government House leader, in refusing to recognize Bill C-269, an act to recognize aboriginal languages within the Constitution, is really telling us what priorities it has in terms of aboriginal issues. It tells the aboriginal people that it has put forward the aboriginal issues of the day to recognize the aboriginal peoples' concerns, but it does not want to follow through by recognizing the need for aboriginal languages to be recognized in the Constitution by themselves.

Again, I would also like to quote from a friend of mine, Blandina Makkik, from the Inuit Broadcasting Corporation who calls the $600,000 cut to the Inuit Broadcasting Corporation spiritual genocide, which is very descriptive of how the people feel.

I would like to tell the Canadian people how important it is that the aboriginal languages be recognized because, as everyone knows, language is part of your culture.

I am sure that the government House leader never had to cope with the problem of not being able to speak his own language because he was forbidden to do so, as we were when we were in residential schools or when we were in public schools. I am sure that he never had to struggle with that. I am sure that he would never understand why we feel we have to be recognized separately and on our own. Again I would like to quote an article from the National Aboriginal Communications Society on the issue of cutting back on communications, which reads:

> It is particularly important that Native people have access to communications giving the Aboriginal perspective during a time when such issues as self-government, Aboriginal title and equality rights are being debated.

Madam Speaker, those are the few issues that we have and I thank you for your indulgence.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to join in this debate. First, along with the number of speakers who have spoken concerning the importance of the aboriginal languages I want to be on record as stating how important I believe that this is.

Having an opportunity to travel in the Northwest Territories and Yukon during the Charest commission on the Meech Lake Accord—McKenna proposals, it was a great experience for me to sit in the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories where some 27 languages were being translated during the debate. The issue of aboriginal languages is one that is extremely important, but unfortunately this is not the issue we are debating today, although some who may be watching this debate may think that is exactly what we are debating.

What we are debating is an amendment to clause 2 of Bill C-37. I would just like to read from clause 2:

> "heritage language" means a language, other than one of the official languages of Canada, that contributes to the linguistic heritage of Canada,—

That is how clause 2 in part reads and the amendment wishes to indicate that this does not include an aboriginal language of Canada.

I would just like to go back to the history of this clause. We had a lot of discussion in the committee on Bill C-37 about this very aspect of this clause. I am a bit surprised that we are debating it again at report stage, because we had such an extensive debate at committee stage concerning whether or not aboriginal languages should be included as part of the Heritage Languages Institute. When we reflect on the previously proposed legislation, Bill C-152 which was brought before the House of Commons prior to the election of 1988, this bill, practically in its entirety, was brought in, during the last Parliament, and was not passed because of the election.

In that previous proposed legislation aboriginal languages were not included. It was not stated whether they were included or not included; it was not mentioned. Then when we got to committee on Bill C-152, the Liberal Party and the NDP were insisting that aboriginal languages should be included. In fact they made a number of motions and at report stage a Liberal member amended the bill to say that the retention and use of languages including native and aboriginal languages should be included in this bill.

So here we are: we introduced this Bill C-37 into this Parliament. We have gone through committee stage. We have had extensive discussion about it. Now the Liberals and the NDP have completely reversed themselves from what their position was just a short time ago. I am actually quite surprised that they would make such a big change in their position in such a short time.

I want to state briefly the purpose of this institute. What is this institute supposed to do for heritage languages? Well, it is supposed to promote and develop the field of heritage language learning in Canada. It is to undertake public education, and develop and disseminate Canadian oriented learning materials, assist in the development of programs to improve standards of heritage language instruction, and carry out research activities of importance to heritage language learning in general.

The institute will be established in Edmonton and will work closely with organizations, individuals, and groups from across the country, consulting with community-based organizations, educational institutions, and the provincial and territorial governments to ensure that all those who are concerned with heritage language training benefit from the activities of the institute.

This will be a charitable foundation as well as being supported by the Government of Canada. It will receive financial support from the private sector. We hope that everyone involved will be very much into making this institute the tremendous place that we think it is going to be in order to have the heritage languages expanded.

I understand what the member for Western Arctic is saying concerning Bill C-269. I wish we were debating Bill C-269 right now, but we are not. However, I think it would be very valuable to have the merits of Bill C-269 debated but unfortunately that is not what is before us today. What is before us is whether we are actually going to bar somebody from being part of the heritage language institute.

The bill states that heritage language will mean language other than the official languages that contribute to the linguistic heritage of Canada. Therefore, we do not want to exclude anybody. It does not necessarily include everybody. We have not named all the languages, but it is open-ended. If groups want to come to get research material, there will be an opportunity to do it.

Madam Speaker, I believe that the way the bill as amended in committee now stands before the House is the appropriate definition of heritage language.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I feel privileged to participate in today's debate on an act to establish a Canadian Heritage Languages Institute and particularly to follow the very thoughtful amendment of my hon. colleague from Vancouver East which suggests that we amend the bill by saying "Canada and does not include aboriginal languages of Canada".

I really want to associate myself with the comments made by my hon. colleague from Vancouver East as well as my colleagues from Comox—Alberni and Spadina on this issue because it seems to be totally inappropriate that we would not include those languages of our first citizens in with heritage languages generally.

To make my point, I want to quote from Mr. Phil Fontaine, the provincial leader of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs, who on July 14 of this year said the following: "We, the original people of this country have inherited through the oral traditions of our forefathers 55 distinct original languages. Fifty-two of these original languages of Canada are now on the brink of extinction. Unlike you," meaning the non-aboriginal peoples of the country, "we cannot retrieve these languages from our mother country. Our mother country is Canada. What we lose in Canada we lose forever."

I think that we really have to reflect seriously on what appeared at least in the beginning to be the government's motivation to include with Italian, Norwegian, Danish and German, 53 aboriginal languages to be considered heritage languages.

Regardless of what we might do to our national heritage in terms of language, myself being Norwegian, we can always go back home and learn the language, or be introduced again to it.

• (1250)

We cannot do that with aboriginal languages. This is their home. This is the only place in the world where they exist. I feel particularly strongly about representation. A group of us, members of Parliament from the interior of British Columbia, met recently in the great city of Vernon. At that meeting we were privileged to welcome four of the native chiefs of our region. They explained their concern about their language. This is the Shuswap language, Madam Speaker, a name that you are very familiar with yourself. It is one of the many languages we find in British Columbia.

I am pleased to say when I look at the list that there are 2,000 individuals who are presently speaking the Shuswap language. As the provincial leader of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs indicated, it is not one of the languages that unless something is done will not be preserved beyond the next decade or so. As a matter of fact, as I said earlier, only three of the 55 languages will remain in place unless some action is taken.

What action are we requiring? We certainly are going far beyond the suggestion of an institute. I suspect that we are getting very close to the point raised by my hon. colleague for Western Arctic in Bill C-269—which, of course, we support—calling for an aboriginal languages foundation.

The assumption we all make is that this is going to require some investment so that native people across our great country will have an opportunity to develop the necessary learning materials, provide the necessary learning infrastructure, so that young and old alike will be able to learn and become fluent in their native language. I think this is in the spirit of our country and something that we certainly ought to do as expeditiously as possible for Canada's first citizens.

I know in Kamloops the Shuswap Tribal Council has made tremendous gains in developing curriculum for kindergarten and grades beyond, in terms of the language classes as well as a cultural introduction to the reality of the native experience in central British Columbia.

The initiative the government is taking regarding Bill C-37 is one that we support obviously because of its encouragement and development of Canada's heritage languages. But again, as this amendment makes very clear, we certainly do not want to exclude the aboriginal languages of Canada from that consideration. We want to set aside a major initiative to ensure that language becomes our preoccupation in terms of assisting aboriginal people across the country. We want them to develop the necessary infrastructure to develop their own languages which will enable them to build their cultures with strength and on a good foundation.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver East. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 1 negatived.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-37 be amended in Clause 6 by striking out lines 37 to 40 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"mendation of the Minister from nominations made by organizations and institutions concerned with the teaching of heritage languages."

She said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak briefly to this second amendment which we have put forward. This recommendation relates to the board of directors of the proposed Heritage Languages Institute. The original motion in the bill says:

> The activities of the Institute shall be managed by a Board of Directors consisting of a Chairperson and not more than twenty-one other directors, to be appointed by the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the minister, after the Minister has consulted such governments, institutions, organizations and individuals as the Minister considers appropriate.

Our feeling is that this part of the bill, clause 6.(1) actually allows the minister and the Conservative Party to do what they always do and what they are doing now in the Senate, that is, to make patronage appointments to a new institute. I do not like to suspect ulterior motives but it seems the way the government has gone about establishing this whole institute, while taking away funds for all community programs for heritage language, really smacks of a political motivation. I am surprised that the Conservatives would do it in this way. This clause also allows the minister to recommend people to the cabinet who would then make patronage appointments and we can expect that they would largely be Conservatives. They would then go to the electorate and say, look at the this wonderful thing we have done for the heritage languages in Canada.

Our amendment is to change the process for appointing members to the board to make it far more democratic, more practical and efficient. We think it is up to institutions and organizations that are directly concerned and have expertise in the field of heritage languages as well as colleges that teach the languages for example, and community programs that have experienced people to nominate candidates for the boards so that they are experienced people who are not partisan and who are being appointed because of their expertise. It would also ensure that there would be regional representatives. Many witnesses at the committee wanted this as well.

I would hope that this change would be supported, particularly by the government because it would show its intention to make this a solid, democratically-appointed board rather than patronage appointments which is very usual from this government.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, this particular section of the act, clause 6, relates to the board of directors which will actually be there to direct the activities of the Heritage Languages Institute. There will be 21 directors that will be selected from across the country.

Let us reflect for a moment on what is in the bill. How will these people be selected? They will be selected after and in such consultation with provincial governments, institutions, organizations and individuals. All those people will be consulted. It is important to read that with clause 6.(2) of the bill which says:

> (2) Persons appointed to the Board must have knowledge or experience that will assist the Institute in fulfilling its purpose.

I think the amendment is looking for persons to be representing organizations and language schools. Because of the vast numbers of organizations and schools that we have, we could not have all these organizations represented because we have 21 directors.

• (1300)

What we need is to have an opportunity for the minister, after consultation, to appoint those persons with experience and knowledge. Geographic representation, as the member has suggested, would be taken into consideration, as well, in order to have people with a broad spectrum of skills and expertise to make this institute the tremendous organization that we believe it will be.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in favour of the amendment in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver East. We have no other choice but to support it. How can we guarantee fairness and, above all, professionalism and impartiality, in an institute where the members of the Board of directors are to be appointed on the recommendation of the minister?

Does this government intend to do what it did in the Senate and appoint its friends, who will have to respond to the priorities determined by the minister?

Madam Speaker, the institute should be able to make its own appointments, after consultation, of course, with cultural communities and teachers. I say this because they are in a position to select the people they believe are most competent and capable of performing their duties, and do not need the government's official or informal approval. I therefore support this amendment.

[English]

We have already seen evidence of great government partiality in the nominations of the members to a recent multicultural commission. Some of the members on this particular cultural commission are in absolutely no way linked or connected to any large national cultural bodies. Some, I believe, are really hacks.

Mr. Karygiannis: Hacks? Shame!

Mrs. Maheu: I would even go so far as to say they represent only themselves, or perhaps the minister. They have never been involved in some instances in any way, shape, or form with any cultural community.

The bottom line on this whole institute makes one wonder if it is not a political candy to Edmonton. That is why we, as Liberals, on this side of the House are supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Karygiannis: Madam Speaker, my colleague from Scarborough Centre made a comment that I could not hear, but let me reassure my colleague that my constituency assistants are also working on the problems of Scarborough Centre.

I would like to point out that I am in support of the amendment for a number of reasons. Being an ethnic myself, I have seen this bill, and after reading it very closely and seeing some of the members in action outside the House, basically and practically, the 21 directors will be political appointees. The 21 directors will be fulfilled by Tory supporters. The 21 directors will be fulfilled by who the government wants to place.

We have seen clearly that the government, beyond any doubt, uses its power to fulfil and do whatever it wants. It appointed eight senators only last week where clearly the people of the country do not want the GST. They have put the boots. This government, beyond any shadow of any doubt, will use these 21 appointments as political candies to some political hacks—

Mr. Milliken: You mean these hacks? Shame.

Mr. Karygiannis: —for some leaders of ethnic communities who have no respect whatsoever—

Mrs. Browes: You're insulting people.

Mr. Karygiannis: Oh, my colleague from Scarborough Centre said I am insulting. Well, I am glad she is saying that because I am an ethnic and I know that the political appointments of the government from the ethnic communities are real shameful.

Mr. Hudon: No, sir.

Mr. Karygiannis: Oh, there is that—well, here we go. They are saying no, sir. Well, Madam Speaker, I can speak to you from firsthand experience.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Karygiannis: The government and the Minister of Justice on that side say they were not Tories and now they are going to become Tories. Really, Madam Speaker. This just makes me want to jump to the ceiling. I know it is very far up, but the past record of this government sometimes makes me feel ashamed to say that I a Canadian with strong ethnic roots. The government is using the ethnics as lollipops and that is what they are going to do out in Edmonton—

An hon. member: And it's going to cost them.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Let's talk about the leadership campaign.

Mr. Karygiannis: Oh, the Minister of Justice says: "Let's talk about the leadership campaign." And I am glad she said that because the ethnics of Ontario and the country clearly supported the Liberal Party during the leadership campaign, and they were so ashamed.

I met people in Sarnia. I met people in Windsor. I had the opportunity to travel the great province of Ontario and person after person told me that what the members across are trying to do was so shameful that it is incredible. They want to stick out a political lollipop in front of the ethnics and it is shameful. Therefore, I have no alternative but to support the amendment.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, in addressing the amendment now being debated, I want to speak very briefly on it and say only two things. I want to note the great participation of members from the great city of Scarborough here today.

The mechanism that has been proposed by this amendment is a commendable one and one that conceptually has been addressed by no less than the Prime Minister himself in considering the issue of prospective appointments to the Senate. The mechanism was referred to in the Meech Lake Accord and it involves nominations or appointments by the government from a list supplied by, if I can use the term, the client group.

I cannot think of a better mechanism which would both purge any appearance of patronage that might be there in any particular appointment and at the same time serve to democratize further or bring the level of appointment making back toward the street, back to the people, the client group, who have need of the organization. For those two reasons I am in support of this amendment.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I also support the amendment by my colleague from Vancouver Centre and I think it is—

Ms. Mitchell: Vancouver East.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Vancouver East, sorry. I thought Vancouver Centre would be wise enough to support it but I may be wrong.

The reason I support it is that the method of appointment suggested in the bill is kind of the Tory top-down system of governing in Canada that I think has led a lot of people to be cynical about how government handles itself in this day and age. I think a lot of people are cynical and a lot of people are disillusioned about how government handles itself.

These kind of appointments come from the top down. They tend to be political appointments. They tend to be people who do not represent the grass roots. They tend to be people who in many cases are not even familiar with the organizations that they are supposed to be serving or with the issues they are supposed to be serving.

I recall a recent issue of The Ottawa Citizen that reported that in a single day the Government of Canada made a 108 patronage appointments. The article went through the resumes of some of those people and found out that, while some of them had a remote connection or were reappointed to an organization that they had served on before, a substantial number of those people were simply political hacks and flacks and not the best people available to serve the interests of Canadian citizens or, in this case, the ethnic groups or the linguistic groups who need to be served by this heritage language legislation.

It is long overdue that we change in law the way that we appoint these people. The way we should appoint these people is to make them responsible to the groups from which they come and that they be nominated or selected from the groups from which they come and the groups which they serve. This bottom-up approach is the approach we should be looking at if we are trying to restore credibility in government. If we are trying to restore confidence in government and in institutions such as the one we are setting up here, the Heritage Languages Institute, then we should really be setting up a structure and a process in this legislation which allows nomination of the people who are going to be serving on this board from the representative groups, from the groups that they are going to be serving, rather than having the campaign managers from the last Tory campaign or the wives or husbands of former Tory members of Parliament, as we saw in that article in The Ottawa Citizen a few weeks ago. Let us have people who really know the field that they are working in. Let us have people who really understand and know the constituency that they are serving.

I think that the suggestion by my colleague from Vancouver East is the kind of process that is going to result in that happening. What we will have if we adopt this amendment and adopt this process is an institute that we can all be proud of and that the people who will be served by this institute can also be proud of, have confidence in, and appear themselves to be stakeholders in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 2 negatived.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (for the Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-54, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (joinder of counts) be read the third time and passed.

She said: Madam Speaker, I want to thank all parties who made a contribution to the consideration and drafting of this bill at all stages. More specifically, I would like to thank my former opposition critics, and I hope to have the same satisfactory relationship with the new critics.

[English]

This bill comes as a result of the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Regina v. Vaillancourt. I hope that, through these amendments, justice will be expedited and, that the modernization of this law will bring it into line with today's requirements.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, it was a very brief and succinct address by the Minister of Justice.

The bill we are debating here is itself a rather brief and succinct bill. One might say it was a simple housekeeping bill in relation to the Criminal Code, but I am afraid that it is never possible to call amendments to the Criminal Code simple housekeeping. In that act, we address issues and procedures that belly up right against our rights and freedoms as citizens, and our conduct among each other in a civilized, ordered society.

I feel that it is necessary to address each of the amendments as proposed albeit that they are short and brief.

The first amendment proposed by the government deals with the deletion from the code of subsection 230(d). That subsection is one of four constructive murder charges currently in the Criminal Code.

After due consideration, the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled that that section varies or conflicts with our Charter of Rights and therefore has been struck by the courts from the code. Today the government is asking and has asked in this bill that the section be formally deleted from the code.

The only issue that arises in relation to this action by the government is whether or not the government should have addressed removing or deleting subsections (a), (b) and (c) of the same section, because those subsections deal with the same issue of constructive murder from different perspectives.

Having read judicial comment of the last few years, I think it is fair to say that constructive murder, no matter what perspective it comes from, is going to be a difficult debt with the rights and freedoms set out in our charter.

There are existing before the high courts in Canada appeals dealing with various of these constructive murder subsections, and the court will make a ruling. The real issue here—I have simply raised the flag—is whether or not the government might have shown a bit more leadership in addressing head on those rights and freedoms, those charter issues related to subsections (a), (b) and (c), dealt with them now, got them out of the way and saved the courts a whole lot of time.

The flip side of that coin is that we as legislators may well benefit from the judicial interpretations that we will be offered from the courts over the next few months. That may help the Minister of Justice, the Department of Justice and members in the House to reach better and more informed conclusions on those subsections.

Moving on to the second part of the bill, an old rule that had been imposed ages ago prohibited the joinder of a murder count with a count alleging another indictable offence. In the old days, I guess that was quite a fair rule because in the old days a conviction for murder, nine times out of 10, resulted in some pretty dire consequences. The world has changed, we have changed and while in many cases the consequences for the convicted may not be so dire, in terms of capital punishment, there is a sense that we are more capable of dealing with the sophisticated legal issues that lie behind the law as it relates to murder and the procedures related to prosecutions for murder.

So that old rule which says you cannot join any count with a murder count will now be changed to the following: in practical terms, where the murder count arises out of a fact situation where another offence may have been committed, the Crown may join the murder count with a count alleging another offence. Second, where the accused, himself or herself, consents to having the murder count tried with other counts, whether or not they arise out of the same fact situation, the joinder may take place.

The first real reason that brought us all to address joinder, notwithstanding the old rule, was the appearance of cases of failures to complete prosecutions, failure to complete the delivery of justice, as a result of the non-joinder rule. As a result, there was a feeling that the courts, the system, the taxpayer and the accused could all be better off if the courts were permitted to try murder and other counts together. All of the witnesses would be brought in and the facts set out, thereby precluding the need for subsequent trials or breaking trials up into sections with witnesses having to attend much more frequently.

The efficacy reason prompted the review of the rule, the Law Reform Commission did some excellent work reviewing it, the issue has been canvassed by academics, the courts and lawyers, and the net result is that there seems to be, on balance, a feeling that the old joinder rule should be abandoned.

The major alleged problem with abandoning the non-joinder rule is that accused may be prejudiced by this. Of course, that was an argument in why the non-joinder rule was there in the first place, but we must point out that in every single case where a murder indictment is prosecuted, an accused has the right to ask for severance of the counts. There is not likely a judge in this country who is not aware of the significance of possible prejudice to an accused in a murder trial and there is not likely a Crown prosecutor in the country who is not aware of that. At the commencement of each murder trial, there is that opportunity for the accused and his or her counsel to raise that with the trial judge and, if the trial judge believes that prejudice may occur, severance can be ordered and the trial for murder may proceed on its own, without the joinder with other counts.

We in the opposition, having stated that we have looked at these concerns, feel that on balance we can support this bill brought forward by the government.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill, which has been handed to me just recently, and to deliver my first speech as new justice critic for the New Democratic Party. The bill is now at third reading. I want to, first of all, say to my friend opposite, the Minister of Justice, who comes from a riding near where I live, that I will try to be as constructive as possible in dealing with justice matters. I know that we are dealing with some very important issues here for people in Canada. We both respect that. I may disagree with the minister, but I respect her a great deal. That is the nicest thing I am about to say about her ever. Now I will get on with the bill.

As I understand, Bill C-54 was tabled on December 14, 1989. It was approved in principle by the House at second reading. It went to committee. I have had a chance to look at some of the committee hearings. It is now back to the House for report stage and third reading. I believe we are now on third reading.

The bill would amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Criminal Code of course being the book that has all the criminal laws in Canada. It applies throughout the country, criminal law being a federal matter.

The government, of course, has to update the Criminal Code regularly, and now even more so in response to judgments of the courts which under the Charter of Rights can declare sections of the Criminal Code unconstitutional. Part of that aspect is involved in the government response in this bill.

Clause 1 of Bill C-54, as I understand it, would repeal one of the prescribed elements for constructive murder under section 230 of the Criminal Code of Canada. Clause 2 would revise section 589 of the Criminal Code in favour of a less restrictive regime for the joinder of counts where murder is charged.

I want to briefly deal with both of those changes. First, constructive murder. Section 230 of the Criminal Code, as I said, sets forth the offence known as constructive murder. It has been defined as a death that occurs in connection with the commission of a criminal offence. It is construed as having been intentional even though, on the facts, the accused did not mean the cause of death. Let me try and explain that in lay person's terms, if I might.

To be guilty of murder, you have to cause death. You have to intend to cause death. It is a very simple principle in criminal law that you have to do the act. In Latin that is called the actus reus. You also need to have to intention to do the act. That is called mens rea, your mind. You have to put your mind to it. It is quite simple. You have to do the act, and you have to intend to do the act.

Let us take a situation, God forbid, where my colleague and I decided to commit a robbery. We sit and plan the act of the robbery. We do the act of the robbery, and we intend to do the act of the robbery. During the act of the robbery, I have a gun. It is an armed robbery. Someone interferes or intervenes, or something happens, and I shoot someone in the course of the robbery, like someone in the bank, for example. That person is killed. I, on those facts, would be guilty of murder. I intended to do the act. I did the act of murder.

My friend was there for the robbery, but he did not intend to do the murder. Under this section of the code he in fact could be guilty of murder as well because he is constructively said to intend it. By the mere fact of participating in the armed robbery, he is thought of as having maybe thought that there could have been a possibility that the gun would be used and someone would be killed.

I was a criminal lawyer at one point in my checkered career. We always felt very uncomfortable with this section because people could be convicted of murder even though they did not intend to do murder. That is against the basic principles of criminal law.

I will give another example which the Library of Parliament has given us in a little different way. It said, for example, that it would be described as constructive murder within the meaning of section 230 if a perpetrator, while fleeing the scene of robbery, dropped his weapon, which accidentally went off and in the process killed an innocent bystander. It is another example of where one did not really intend to kill the person but it happened in the course of a criminal act. That was a lay person's description of how this section works.

The Supreme Court, in the case of Vaillancourt v. the Queen, in fact threw out this section, and I think quite properly.

It seems to me there is a problem with the bill. The question arises: Are there other sections of this particular section of the Criminal Code that the court might also throw out? I believe—and the minister can correct me if I am wrong—that the bill only deals with section 230(d). That is only one section that deals with constructive murder.

I believe there are other cases before the courts, and again the minister can correct me if I am wrong. What happens if the other cases are thrown out? Will we have the same problem with the other sections of the bill? Will we have to come back to Parliament to deal with it? Perhaps we should deal with it all now.

The Law Reform Commission of Canada in its 1984 publication entitled Homicide, (Working Paper 33) stated that it found the whole section 230 is objectionable and should be abolished, and I quote:

> To treat an unintentional killer as though he intended to kill involves the criminal law in artificiality and fictions and in the injustice of not treating significantly different cases differently.
> We think that constructive murder should be abolished, that the rules contained in paragraph 212(c) and section 213 (now paragraph 229(d) and section 230) should have no place within our criminal law, and that killings where death is neither intended nor foreseen should be excluded from the category of "intentional" homicide whether or not they are brought about in furtherance of some other offence.

They made the following recommendation:

> "Intentional" homicide should apply only to killings done with actual intent to kill, and cases of constructive intent should be excluded from this category.

My point is that this bill does not exclude all the possible cases of unintended murder. My position is, along with the Law Reform Commission report, that intentional homicide should only apply to killings done with actual intent to kill, and cases where we have constructive intent should be taken out of our law. I think it is bad law and always was bad law. That is my first point and that is one of the reasons why we will not be supporting the bill. However, I understand that the bill could pass today on division.

An hon. member: Soon.

Mr. Waddell: The member says: "Soon", but I want to explain to the member—and I am trying to do it in very simple language—what is involved in a very complicated bill.

The House will recall that when I started my speech I said that there were two points to the bill. Let us deal with the second point. The second point is that the bill would revise section 589 of the Criminal Code in favour of a less restrictive regime for joinder of counts where murder is charged.

Here is the problem, and maybe I can make it simple—there can be a prejudice to the accused if one joins a murder count with a lot of other counts because murder is so bad and looks so bad to a jury that the jury can be prejudiced. This is what disturbs me about this section.

I have a legal opinion from the firm of Rosen and Fleming, barristers in Toronto, that was obtained by my predecessor, the hon. member for Burnaby with respect to this bill. I just want to read what these learned lawyers have said. I will just read this section:

> If the proposed legislation is passed, the above general principles relating to the joinder of counts generally will apply. A person accused of murder will have the same onus to demonstrate a manifest need for severance. However, since the proposed legislation requires that in such cases the other offences to be added to the indictment must rise out of the same transaction, and because it follows that evidence concerning one offence will probably be admissible on the others because they are so related, it will be virtually impossible for an accused to meet the onus. If convicted, the rights of the accused on appeal will be subject to the limitations noted above of appellate review of the exercise of judicial discretion. The protection of severance cited by the proponents of the amendment is illusory at best.

It continues:

> Proponents of the amendment suggest that the accused will suffer no prejudice by joinder of counts since, if convicted of murder and any other related offences, the convictions for these other offences may be stayed pursuant to the decisions of Kienapple v. R. and R. v. Prince or the sentences imposed for them will be concurrent to the mandatory life sentence which follows the murder conviction. This position totally ignores the potential for prejudice at trial which comes from the overloading of an indictment.

Here are four examples of how the prejudice arises, but let me just go back a step. If someone gets charged with some offences, there is an indictment preferred by the Crown, Her Majesty, an indictment. It is take to court and the person has to answer to the indictment and is read the indictment.

I was in court in Vancouver just recently in the Inderjit Singh Reyat trial, the trial of the citizen who is accused of making the bomb that went on the CP flight to Tokyo which blew up and killed two baggage handlers in Tokyo; a real tragic case. The trial is being held right now in Vancouver, as I speak. Mr. Reyat was arraigned before the court and an indictment was read. There were a number of counts on that indictment: you are charged with this, you are charged with that, you are charged with this, how do you plead. What we are talking about in this clause of the bill is how that indictment works.

What could happen is that someone appears before the court and is charged with a number of offences. The defence counsel on behalf of the accused could stand up and say: I move that we sever one of the counts off, that we have another trial at another place or at another time on this particular count, and that we proceed in this trial with these counts. The reason a severance is allowed—it is at the discretion of the trial judge usually—is that it is allowed because it may prejudice the accused or prejudice a fair trial.

I think we have the best system known, so far invented in the world, for criminal justice. It is not perfect, but it is an ancient and honourable tradition in the British system that has been developed. That is why these matters are so important, and this deals with severance.

Here is the legal opinion that I was citing. Here is what they say were the problems with this section. I put it forward for the consideration of the Minister of Justice. It reads:

> (a) The jury will be distracted by the numerous other counts included in the indictment and will fail to appreciate the importance of what is at stake in the murder charge.

This is putting a murder charge with a whole bunch of other charges: robbery, assault, whatever. The first point is that the accused to be prejudiced because the jury will look at all these other counts and it will not totally focus on the one count, the one murder count, and these other counts could prejudice the trial on the murder count. In referring to many counts, it continues:

> (b) An accused who faces a multiple count indictment which begins with the offence of murder will be viewed by the jury, even before the evidence is called, as a person of disreputable character.

In other words, if you are charged with murder that is pretty serious. The jury looks at you being charged with murder as you come before the jury. However, if you are charged with murder and assault and robbery and having a weapon and so on, the jury may be prejudiced and say that is a pretty bad person; they have been charged with all those counts, all those other things; maybe they are the kind of person who might murder. That is a prejudice. That is why there is a danger in allowing all these multiple counts. That is why there is a danger in this amendment to the code. That is why we are opposing this. It continues:

> (c) The rule concerning the admissibility of similar fact evidence will be circumvented by the prosecution, since evidence admissible on one count, but not necessarily admissible on another will nevertheless be admitted before the jury. As noted above, the relevance of the evidence to the one count and the fact that all the counts are related will be cited as the reason to deny severance which might otherwise relieve the prejudice.

Again there is talk of similar evidence. Evidence on one count tends to become evidence on the other count and we get into problems with similar fact evidence. Not only on the surface could it be prejudice to a jury, but some of the evidence that comes into one count will filter into another count and there will be further possibility of prejudice. It continues:

> (d) The evidence of other related criminal conduct which may be admissible as part of the narrative relating to the homicide,—

That is the story leading to the murder case. It goes on:

> —will now be used to convict the accused of specific offences—

That is, the robbery, the possession of the gun, the breaking and entering, and so on. It continues:

> —rather than permitting the jury to consider the evidence and its weight, if any, on the issue of liability for murder only.

The real issue is that murder is such a serious charge it should be tried alone. Alternatively, if it is tried with the other offences, such great prejudice can result both in naming the different counts so the jury sees all the other charges or by the similar fact evidence coming in as the Crown attorney tries to prove those different counts. That is about the simplest way I can put it. For those two reasons there could be some real problems.

I had a chance this week to meet some criminal lawyers. Among them was Clay Ruby, one of the top criminal lawyers in Canada, and some other criminal lawyers in Toronto as well. They expressed to me their concern about this particular section on the joinder of counts.

For those two reasons we in the New Democratic Party are opposed to Bill C–54. I think I have set out, as best I can, the reasons for that opposition in some detail. I have tried to translate it a little bit away from the language of the law to the language of ordinary people.

I do not know if the government will hear any more speakers. I do remind the government that I did raise the point that we might, even if this is passed, have to revisit the section if the courts declare other aspects of section 230 of the Criminal Code of Canada unconstitutional as they did with section 230 subsection (d).

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I would like to respond briefly to some of the comments made by my colleague for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

I certainly take his point that this is a very interesting area of the law in recent jurisprudence. Martineau, Vaillancourt, and other cases have certainly changed the practice and have been instructive to governments. Since the committee studied this bill, the provisions of section (a) which are being removed from section 230 of the code have been struck down.

My colleague raises a number of interesting questions. I want to say at the beginning, though, that the whole law with respect to homicide is under intensive review in the Department of Justice now. Some of the comments that he raises will be addressed in a more comprehensive framework.

What we are dealing with here is an effort to try to address a very specific problem, which is the need to amend the Criminal Code to remove the culpable murder provisions, as they have since been struck down by the courts. Paragraphs (b) and (c) which remain are possibly at risk we well. I would be the first to concede that.

This area of the law is a very challenging one because it requires us to balance a number of interests. When we look at the whole idea of joining counts, we look at the question of what will be brought before a court.

When my hon. colleague says that murder should always be tried on its own, that may or may not be the case. The point is that if murder is the wrong count to be brought, then any other count would have to be brought separately. Are we going to look at the administration of justice as a kind of all–or–nothing situation and try to determine the appropriate count, if Crown counsel is of the view that there is in fact sufficient evidence to convict on a murder count if the jury does not agree with them, or the judge does not agree with them? Does that mean that is the end of the story for making someone responsible for events rising out of a particular transaction?

We have a jurisprudential framework within which the law is applied. We make reference to the principle of what I learned in law school to call Kienapple. It derives from a decision of the Supreme Court to protect people from a multiplicity of counts on a particular event.

So there is a jurisprudential framework which I think does protect. There is no question that there are challenges to a trial court judge in instructing the jury or instructing himself or herself if the case is heard before a judge in sorting out the evidence and I would not underestimate those.

However, I do not think those arguments are sufficient to justify defeating the bill. They simply point out that there are a number of interests to be balanced, the interest not just in the efficiency of the administration of justice in avoiding a multiplicity of trial processes and all that that involved in terms of recalling witnesses and trying to keep a case intact, but also in subjecting an accused to a multiplicity of processes which I think can be very difficult and—I was going to say in trying—but it very difficult and stressful. What we are attempting to do with this is simply address what is a very explicit issue.

I want to close by repeating that the whole law with respect to homicide is under review and I am looking forward to participation. The remarks made by my colleague in the Liberal Party were also very much to the point. He is not the official critic in this area so he will not be offended, I hope, when I say that I look forward to the participation of all interested members of this House, particularly the critics, and particularly my colleague the critic from the New Democratic Party who is a criminal lawyer of some considerable experience.

I have always found the expression criminal lawyer an awkward one to use. One tends to say the words very quickly and run them together so that there is no misunderstanding of what is involved. While he may have exhausted his store of nice things to say about me, I suspect that every once in a while he will have something nice to say about my dad with whom he worked in that particular line of work and with whom he has a relationship of very mutual respect.

The hon. member came into the House after I had made my introductory comments. Had he not done so he would have heard my expressed wish to work very closely with my new critics. I think that I am very lucky to have a colleague of his distinction at the bar to be the critic and to be participating in our attempts to make the criminal law both fair and consistent with modern developments in modern society. I hope that he will continue to be involved in that process.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the minister for her remarks.

There is a story of two criminal lawyers who go on a cruise. They are arguing during a beautiful midnight dinner and get so into the argument, as criminal lawyers always do, that they fall overboard. People were exclaiming, "Oh, my God. This is terrible. This in shark-infested waters." Suddenly the sharks come up and form a line for them and they swim right back. One of the people on the ship says: "It is a miracle". The wife of one of the criminal lawyers said, "No, no. It is just professional courtesy".

The only point I want to make to the minister is this. She says section B and section C are at risk by the court. If the court holds them inoperative too, as they have done with section D, and I think there is a real possibility of this, then I say to the government why proceed now, why not wait until those cases are dealt with. It seems to me a little odd that we would deal with this so quickly.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

[English]

Then we would have to come back and deal with the other two. I do not know if the minister wants to reply to that. It is rather hypothetical, but I think it could happen.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise for only 30 seconds.

Listening to lawyers talk about legal points is beyond some of us. I must admit that I do not know what joinder's accounts are. I do know that my constituents and many of our constituents are concerned about the increasing use of guns in violent crime.

What sounded earlier like a discussion about the reduction of available sentences and penalties becomes clearer when the minister answers the question that this is a matter ordered by the courts. Therefore, I have no problem with what is before us.

I simply want to put on the record the sense of a lot of our constituents as the homicide review goes through, that we do not need weaker penalties for those who accidentally or otherwise involve firearms in killing folks. We need stronger ones.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I would just like to say in response to my colleague and to the remarks from the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam that that is why I am not in a rush to make sweeping changes to the Code in advance of direction that we might get from the courts.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

POINT OF ORDER

STRIKING COMMITTEE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That the names of Mr. Dingwall be substituted for that of Mr. Gauthier, Mr. Marcel Tremblay (Québec-Est) for Mr. Charest and Mr. Angus for Mr. Murphy on the striking committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion as stated by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Could I have the unanimous consent of the House to call it two o'clock? I see that the hon. member whose bill would now be up on Private Members' Business is in the House.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre) moved that Bill C-230, an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act (oats and barley), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise today to speak to this bill.

The Canadian Wheat Board is an institution that has been part of the western Canadian agricultural way of life for over half a century. It is one of those institutions that receives the support of not only farmers but of a tremendous majority of western Canadians from all walks of life.

It is looked at longingly by producers from outside the board's jurisdiction. These include not only Canadian farmers in areas outside western Canada, but many Americans speak highly of the efficiency of the Canadian Wheat Board. In short, it is an institution that is held in high regard by a majority of people who know of its function.

The Canadian Wheat Board was created in 1935 with jurisdiction over the sale of wheat. This power was extended in 1943 when the government closed the wheat futures market, thus making the Wheat Board the sole marketer of wheat in western Canada.

The power of the Canadian Wheat Board was expanded in 1949 to include barley and oats. Unfortunately, the reason that we are here today is that barley and oats were not given the same protection under the act that wheat was. In order to remove wheat, the matter must be debated in the House. Only Parliament can change the board's jurisdiction regarding wheat. With barley and oats the Cabinet can, of its own discretion, without any consultation with the House or with anybody else, alter or remove the board's power with the right to market these two commodities. This is exactly what the Cabinet did through the recommendation of the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds in February 1989 when the removal of oats from the board's jurisdiction was announced.

I believe and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party believe that the Canadian Wheat Board is an excellent example of a social democratic program. It provides producers with a marketing system that works to the benefit of all farmers. As individuals functioning in the open market, producers are competing with giants such as Continental and with Cargill.

Agricultural markets are volatile because of the unpredictable production fluctuations, because of the large number of independent producers and because of the large number of consumers. Those people who have knowledge of the market situation are at a definite advantage. Information about agricultural markets is costly and not equally available. Companies such as Cargill and others pay a lot of money for this information and they keep that information close to their chest and use it to their own advantage. Therefore they have a definite and a distinct advantage over the thousands of individual farmers who have to rely largely on the public media for their information.

The Canadian Wheat Board neutralizes this inequity and is able to deal with the Cargills of this world on an equal footing. The only time that the government has to in fact incur a loss is when a deficit pool is run, because the Canadian Wheat Board is paid for by farmers and it functions for the benefit of farmers.

When I say the only time that the government is involved with any payment is with respect to a deficit pool, I mean for those Canadians who are watching or those members who may not be aware. Every year the Canadian Wheat Board sets an initial prices that it will pay for a particular grain, be it wheat or barley and previously oats. This is the price that the farmer is guaranteed to receive for his grain regardless of what time of year he delivers his grain and regardless of the world price at that particular time. If at the end of the year the board has sold all the producer's grain for a higher rate than the initial price it paid to the farmer originally, then a final payment is made. Thus, all farmers receive the same price for their particular grain whether it is delivered in January, or June, or September, or any other time of the year.

If on occasion a particular grain is sold below the initial price, then there is a deficit and that is when the government makes up that difference. This has only happened on rare occasions. It should be noted as well that with respect to the initial price; it is the government that sets the initial price; it is not the Wheat Board. It is controlled by the government. It is announced by the government and it controls what the initial price will be. Other than that, the Wheat Board is self–perpetuating financially and it is paid for by the some 140,000 permit book holders throughout western Canada.

Why did the government choose to remove oats from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board? It certainly was not for budgetary reasons. As I indicated the Wheat Board is self–financing. When I and other members in this House asked the government why it had taken this step, it was indicated to me on several occasions, and in fact the Minister of Agriculture indicated to me last year with a straight face I might add, that he had had extensive consultations over a long period of time and that it was what the farming industry wanted. They wanted oats to be removed. They said they were niche markets. They claimed that the Wheat Board could not meet those niche markets properly.

I cannot say the minister lied because that is unparliamentary but let me say that he carefully chose his facts and he considered which facts to pay attention to and which facts to ignore. Whom did he consult? In answer to a question I asked in the House on May 4, 1989, the Minister of Agriculture, speaking for the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, indicated that the government had consulted the United Grain Growers Limited and the Western Canadian Wheat Growers' Association. That is fair because oat producers are included in those. But he went on to mention the Western Barley Growers' Association, the Prairie Canola Growers' Association, the Alberta Pork Producers Development Corporation, and the Alberta Sheep and Wool Commission. He consulted with the Alberta Sheep and Wool Commission to see whether oats should be removed from the Canadian Wheat Board, and it said yes. It consulted with the Prairie Cattlemen's Association, the Manitoba Farm Business Association, the Manitoba Hog Producers Marketing Board, and the Saskatchewan Pork Marketing Board.

That is all very well, but what the minister did not say and, in fact, what the government has never said or acknowledged is that there are a number of other groups that it did not consult with. In fact, at no time or no where did the government indicate—perhaps it did, but it did not indicate—that it consulted with some of the largest grain organizations in Canada, namely the pools, the Alberta Wheat Pool, the Manitoba Wheat Pool and the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. It also did not consult with the National Farmers Union. The National Farmers Union is opposed to the move, as are the Prairie wheat pools.

It does not mention the fact that it did not consult with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which is one of the largest agricultural groups. It is an umbrella group of many organizations for the country. If it had consulted with the CFA, it would have been told that the CFA had passed a resolution calling for the government not to remove oats from the Canadian Wheat Board without the producers first voting on that issue.

What do farmers think of the claim that the government indicated it had consulted with farmers? That can be answered by a Decima poll that was conducted shortly after the announcement made by the government. In fact, Decima did a report, and I am quoting from that report at page 10 where it states: "fully 76 per cent of respondents believed that the government undertook inadequate consultation with farmers before it made its decision to remove oats from the marketing activities of the Canadian Wheat Board". It goes on to state: "substantial majorities in each of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta concur that the government failed to consult with farmers on this issue in any significant manner."

So, farmers feel they were not consulted. The people who grow oats feel they were not consulted. The Wheat Board's 140,000 permit book holders felt they were not consulted by a large majority, 76 per cent.

The report goes on to indicate what farmers would have told the government had they been consulted. At page 10 the report states: "A substantial majority, 63 per cent, of western farmers registered disapproval with the federal government's decision to remove oats from the marketing activities of the Canadian Wheat Board. Fully 35 per cent of respondents indicate that they strongly disapprove of this decision. This degree of strong disapproval indicates an intensity of opinion on this particular issue and an unlikelihood of farmers changing their opinion with regard to the government action". Those are fairly strong words, Madam Speaker.

What of oats producers? Let us focus on oat producers. The report states at page 11: "Not surprisingly, further cross tabular analysis reveals that oats farmers, 69 per cent, oppose the government's decision to remove the grain, significantly more than non–oats farmers who were 56 per cent". It is no wonder it did not consult with those groups.

The government could also have consulted with the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board. The advisory committee is a committee that is made up of farmers from across western Canada who were voted to the committee by the permit book holders in western Canada, and they are there to advise the Canadian Wheat Board and the government on matters concerning the Wheat Board. The government chose not to consult with it. In fact, the advisory committee was so upset that it publicly called for the resignation of the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

The conclusion is clear. The government did consult, but it consulted with those groups that agreed with its opinion. It did not consult with those groups and those bodies that grow oats, that are concerned with oats, and are concerned with the future of the Canadian Wheat Board. Those groups were not consulted or, if they were consulted, they were ignored because they disagreed with the government's position.

The government also said that there were niche markets that the board could not meet. In fact, this was put in a letter to one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Mackenzie, by the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds on April 13, 1989. I will just quote one line where he states that, "the private trade has the flexibility to pursue these specialty markets which command price premiums, as well as to handle bulk sales of feed oats. This will give producers a viable, price sensitive, alternative crop. The new system will provide increased opportunities for oats processing facilities on the Prairies".

Since oats was removed from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board, the price has plummeted. There have been morbid conditions, that is admitted, but the price has plummeted. There is no indication at all that the privatization or the removal of oats from the Canadian Wheat Board had any effect whatsoever other than to cause oats to go down.

There are certainly no new oat facilities on the Prairies to process oats. That is not happening. In fact, I have been advised by people in the Wheat Board that they had made a request to the government before the government made this announcement, to allow them to move into the so-called niche markets. They had made that request. They had a plan in place and they could have handled it. The simple fact is that the government chose to simply ignore this request.

Why did the government remove oats from the Canadian Wheat Board? It is very simple and very clear. This is a government that is controlled by the corporate agenda in the country. When it comes to agriculture, it is controlled by the corporate agri-business agenda in the country. Companies like Cargill do not like the Wheat Board. Cargill is a huge private corporation involved in many facets of agri-business. In fact, with respect to grain, it actually markets virtually as much grain as the Canadian Wheat Board does, plus operates all its other areas. It would like to see the Wheat Board weakened or gone. It is pursuing that agenda and has been successful. It is Cargill and others like them who have called for and received this action from the government.

While the government consulted with agri-business on this decision, there was no consideration for farming families. There was no consideration for rural communities. There was no consideration for the beneficial role that the Canadian Wheat Board has played in the development and the growth of western Canada. Rather, private agri-business has spoken and the government has once again displayed its so-called neo-conservatism philosophy and ideology.

The Canadian Wheat Board is self-financing. It functions for farmers. The government is always talking about free enterprise and having people determine their own future. If it really believed that, it would allow farmers to determine the future of the Canadian Wheat Board because the Wheat Board is paid for by farmers and financed by farmers. They should have the right to decide its future. If the government really believed in people determining their own future, it would allow the Wheat Board to do just that. It would allow farmers and producers to make those decisions.

We need institutions like the Wheat Board because we need the stability in western Canada. Lord knows, times are very difficult in western Canada and times are very unstable. The Canadian Wheat Board provides that stability.

This bill is non-votable. Its only possible purpose is to point out the error of the government and to encourage Canadians to call for a change in its approach, in its philosophy, and in its agenda. Included in its agenda, government should be returning oats to the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and undertaking not to change the Canadian Wheat Board Act with respect to oats, wheat or barley until it properly consults with the users of the Canadian Wheat Board. That includes expanding the Canadian Wheat Board.

In conclusion, I know that I am speaking on behalf of a substantial majority of western Canadians. It is very clear. I simply pray that the government is listening.

• (1410)

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, after careful consideration of the unique market potential for Canadian oats and in consideration of how that market can best be served, a decision was made to have the industry market oats.

The hon. member opposite has called for a reversal of this decision. He does not seem to believe that the successful marketing of oats into niche markets can best be achieved by having the industry market oats. His proposal would move the industry backward instead of continuing its forward strides.

The government has faith in the abilities of Canadian farmers, including those in the oats industry. We are committed to helping farmers get the highest possible return for their produce and efforts. In keeping with this commitment, the government decided that oats marketing could best be handled by the industry.

We have seen positive developments in the industry that would likely not have happened under the old system. Here are some examples.

Quaker Oats is spending $13 million to modernize and expand its facility in Peterborough, Ontario.

New oats-processing plants are being built. There are the Can-Oat Milling facility located in Portage la Prairie, Manitoba and the Westglen/Agro Company of Canada venture, near my riding in Barrhead, Alberta. At the joint venture announcement last December, Dr. Hugh Horner, the president, stated: "The announcement in 1989 by the Hon. Charles Mayer, that oats would be removed from the Canadian Wheat Board's umbrella was a monumental step in the marketing of oats for Canada and a dominant factor in our decision to locate our new facility in Alberta." These ventures present opportunities both for oats farmers and for rural communities, for example, by way of new job creation.

Other companies such as United Grain Growers and Cargill Limited are responding to the growing demand for high quality oats by setting higher standards to meet market demands. They are rewarding producers of high quality oats with premium prices.

These are opportunities farmers would not have had if the proposal we are discussing today had been in place. Can-Oats has indicated in a letter to my colleague, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, that, as is the case for the plant in Alberta, it was in large part due to the decision on oats that they decided to build their Portage la Prairie plant.

The proposed bill is flawed in some of its basic assumptions. The member sponsoring this bill seems to believe that putting oats under the Canadian Wheat Board by statute would mean they could never be removed from the board's jurisdiction. He is wrong. Parliament could always vote to rescind such legislation. Passing this bill would only hobble the federal government's ability to respond quickly and effectively to changing market conditions. Farmers would just have to adapt to unfavourable conditions while Parliament goes through the long debates necessary to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Had oats remained under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board, as this bill proposes, and had this government not had the foresight and understanding of the agriculture industry to ensure a market responsive process for selling oats, we would not be seeing processing plants built in rural Canada, such as the one in Barrhead, Alberta. We would not be seeing farmers getting paid a premium for their high quality oats. More processing plants could be built in other rural communities.

That will not happen if we move backward and reverse the decision to allow the industry to market oats. That would tie the hands of those most directly affected. For example, during my recent constituency tour, some farmers, although very happy with crops, were disappointed at the prices and asked me why they could not market their own grain themselves, such as oats. They felt confident that they could sell it if given that opportunity.

I am confident that none of the members here today want to see such opportunities lost for rural communities, such as those in the Wetaskiwin constituency. I do not think anyone wants to see the potential for further growth of the industry nipped in the bud by a narrow and unreasonable view of the future of oats.

In allowing the industry to market oats, the government was confident that the farmers who grow oats and the processors who sell oats would act swiftly to take full advantage of new opportunities. An oats producer association has been formed in Alberta as producers acted for both their own and for the industry's best interests. These producers have demonstrated that they are willing and able to undertake the work of guiding and shaping a healthy oats industry.

Oats producers and Canadian grain traders have demonstrated that they are the ones who can best sell into niche markets. The Canadian Wheat Board has demonstrated its ability to market wheat and barley in the best interests of Canadian farmers on the international markets. Oats are a niche product. Oat export volumes and revenues are small in comparison to wheat and barley. They accounted for only 1.2 per cent of the total value of wheat marketing by the Wheat Board in 1986-87. Oats are more directly affected by changes in the international market, so they require the close attention of those most directly involved in production. By allowing the industry to market oats, this government freed oats producers and traders to undertake a concerted and successful drive to market Canadian oats. Our farmers have been aggressive and successful in their efforts to market Canadian oats. Would the hon. member see his farming constituents' income reduced? I think not. And yet, his bill could have this effect.

Part of the success of letting industry handle oats marketing relates to the benefits of the Canada–U.S. trade agreement. The U.S. provides producers with a ready market for their product. Industry recognizes the possibilities. They are acting quickly to take advantage of the agreement that benefits Canadian farmers, because they now have the markets and the industrial support to make inroads into the U.S.

As pointed out by Can Oats, the Canada–U.S. trade agreement created an attractive and competitive environment for business by eliminating trade barriers between the two countries. This freedom to move into the marketplace helps oats farmers to maximize their sales and farm income. Oats producers now have new options available to them. These options enable producers to make the decisions that are best for them, decisions that are good for their own farms and for the health of the industry.

Let me give another example. The Oatman, a company started six years ago by Mr. Dennis Lank of Ponoka, began expanding two years ago into the United States and now into other parts of Canada. The Oatman is strictly in the horse industry and now continues to succeed and is planning to expand even further. With direct access to markets, oats producers now share the same benefit as other open market producers such as canola or other off-board grains. By watching cash and futures markets, talking to their local elevator manager and reading market publications, farmers have the price information they need, like those who deal directly and privately with the Oatman.

The federal government has a duty to help farmers develop this industry. Government must not take away the right and opportunity for farmers to decide for themselves how their industry should work. Consequently, Madam Speaker, I cannot support this bill.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I support the principle of this bill. The principle of this private member's bill makes a lot of sense. I think my hon. friend, the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, stated the case very well. I would not want to go over much of the ground already covered by my hon. friend, but there are a number of things that I want to say about this bill and I might even, if I dare, draw on some of the rather cataclysmic events that have been evident on the Hill in the past few hours.

It seems that one of the basic lessons for all politicians and certainly for politicians in government is that you listen to the people. If this government had listened to the agricultural community many months ago in the spring, there would have been no need for this private member's bill, none whatsoever. We would not be discussing this private member's bill if the government had listened, if the government had not removed oats from the Canadian Wheat Board in the first place.

If the government had listened to the agricultural community, we would not be carrying on with this discussion today, but this government does not listen. It does not listen. For example, as my friend, the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, said a few moments ago, 63 per cent of farmers surveyed did not want oats taken away from the Canadian Wheat Board, but this government went ahead and did so because it did not listen, it did not consult. In fact, that very same survey indicated that as few as 18 per cent of farmers who were surveyed felt that they were properly and adequately consulted by this government, specifically the minister responsible for grains and oilseeds. I think that is a pretty shabby record. We talk about reputable organizations like the prairie pools, the National Farmers Union, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the Advisory Board to the Canadian Wheat Board. They all said this was bad, this would be a bad practice, that the government would regret, that it would rue the day doing this. But the government did not listen. It did not listen.

My hon. friend from Wetaskiwin said a few minutes ago that by returning oats to the Canadian Wheat Board and giving it the protection of statute, it would not stop this government or any future government to take oats away from the Canadian Wheat Board. Well, that is true. We know it is true. But I will tell you one thing. It would not allow the government to be so arbitrary. This government is inclined to be arbitrary, inclined not to consult, not to listen to the people of Canada.

I could touch on many subjects. It is not just taking oats away from the Canadian Wheat Board. I can go through a long list of subjects where the government has demonstrated over and over again: " It is our way or no way. We will not listen. We have an agenda and we are going to follow that agenda, and we do not give a darn." That is typical of this government.

If you go back a few months, what was the farming community saying to this government about interest-free cash advances? That program had been around for more than two decades and it had been palpably successful, demonstrably successful. The government did not listen. The government did not consult. It went ahead and said no, that it was cutting it. This was a marvellous program and in a relative sense, was a cheap program, about $25 million, but the government went right ahead and bulled its way through.

So where are we today? The farm community is going into a deepening crisis, further and further into a crisis, and now we are back to that issue of interest-free cash advances. Major organizations are saying they need it back.

I listened to a spokesperson, one of the parliamentary secretaries, this morning in Question Period. He indicated that there would be some announcement on interest-free cash advances. We hope that it is going to be a positive response and a positive answer. But again the basic lesson is to listen to the people.

I want to raise another matter that is related to this. That is high interest rates, particularly as they apply to western Canada and the agricultural community right across this country. High interest rates have been punishing. They have crucified the farmer. Yet the government ignores. Just this week we had the Economic Council of Canada saying that this government's monetary policy is not working. High interest rates are not working. But you do not sacrifice farmers anywhere in this country for the sake of taking some heat out of the economy in southern Ontario, in metro Toronto, for example. It is not the way to do it.

The government has been told this over and over again, but it will not listen.

Along the same theme the government has been told about the GST and farmers as consumers will pay the GST, despite the fact of millions of petitions, telephone calls, and letters. Millions and millions of people have spoken out. The government is absolutely intransigent, absolutely stubborn on the point. It will not budge.

That brings me to the current events on this Hill. Why do you think that we have this debacle on the Hill. Why do you think what is happening is happening over in the other place? It is because we have a government that is intent upon pushing people beyond their limits.

People can take only so much, and then they reach their breaking point. That is where we are in this country today. It is not normal for hon. senators to stay up all night. They normally go to bed. It is not normal for them to go through some of the strange things that they have the last few hours, but they have been pushed to the wall.

We have been pushed to the wall in this House. Groups have been pushed to the wall. All Canadians have been pushed to the wall, because this government is absolutely bloody-minded. It takes the simplistic notion: "We won the election. We have the numbers, and because we have the numbers we can do anything."

I will tell you, Madam Speaker, that if every Canadian took that attitude, this country would be in chaos. I can tell you about major corporations. They own all the equity. They own all the shares, and they are the bosses. The shareholders are the bosses, but if they do not operate with consensus, if they do not have their workers with them, if there is no mutual respect, if there is no fairness, there will be a breakdown. This government will not understand that. That is why we are where we are today.

I would say in my few moments left that on this issue of the oats being where they ought to be, with the Canadian Wheat Board, the government should listen. There are all kinds of problems. Bankruptcies have gone up sharply in the last few months, and the government better listen.

The debt problem which has been in existence now in a very serious way for about 15 years, and it is getting worse, is something the government is going to have to address very seriously. It cannot just follow its internal agenda as if nobody else counts.

I support this bill. It is good in principle, and it is too bad that we could not vote on it.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to respond to the debate initiated today by the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre. It is a credible piece of private members' legislation to place before the House in so much as the issue is one that is arguable.

Obviously, as members who represent rural and western constituencies, we know that there is a divergence of view with respect to the question as to—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have a point of order.

Mr. Anawak: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I just want to point out that I think we have to follow some rules in this House.

I just saw the member for Portage taking something that he should not have on his desk.

An hon. member: It is coffee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I did not see whatever the hon. member is mentioning. I am sure that hon. members know that there should be no food or anything in the House except for our precious glass of water, even on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, as a matter of fact, I might like to have one of those precious glasses of water.

An hon. member: Before you sell it to the Americans.

Mr. Malone: Now, there is somebody who would not sell something when there is a market available.

The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville would like to enter into the debate. I invite him to come forward, to take his seat and to sit down.

It is about an issue that has some impact on Saskatchewan. It might be worthy of the hon. member to pay note to it. It deals with oats.

The reason I so seriously want to enter into this debate is that while oats are grown in every region of Canada, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, the hon. member for Macleod and myself, who are in this Chamber, can claim that we come from the oats province.

The province of Alberta is the largest producer of oats anywhere in Canada. We produce about 40 per cent plus of the oats.

This issue impacts very much on the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and the hon. member for Peace River. The major oat growers are in those two constituencies of that province. The fact of the matter is that of the cereal grains in our country only about 5 per cent have traditionally been oats in the last 15 years. Some 90 per cent of the oats the oats that were grown were consumed for feed and another 5 per cent was used for seed, so only 5 per cent of the oats was being marketed.

Anybody who does even a rudimentary analysis of the Canadian Wheat Board and how it operates and works clearly recognizes that put in place there is an agency that is best suited for selling massive volumes of grain particularly into export markets. It does it by shiploads and by large contracts, usually dealing in multiple millions and often into the billions of dollar contracts. Most of our contracts with the Soviet Union are in the neighbourhood of $5 billion. That is not what is happening to the oats industry.

The oats industry for some 15 years now has been an industry that markets largely to the race horse industry in the United States. It sells in 25 to 100 pound bags and into truckload lots. It leaves from the farm gate and heads to specific sources located in another country. More recently, in this past decade, there has been an upsurge of interest in oats as a health food.

What we have, as was correctly described by the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, is niche markets, small selective markets. That is not what the Canadian Wheat Board was best able to advantage the farmers to move into. He cites and lays before the House of Commons his evidence that says that farmers were opposed to this.

I recognize that taken in the over all there was an opinion from farmers all across the prairies that somehow this might be weakening the Canadian Wheat Board. But when we take a look at who were the farmers that grew the oats as a industry for export, it was those very farmers who came to government and said: "We request that we have the privilege and the opportunity to create our own market, because the Canadian Wheat Board is not opening up the markets for us and is not doing it in significant enough volumes".

It was because of the growers who grew for an industry, who grew for export, and whose business it was to be in the oats industry that the government responded and met that market. Then came the argument from the hon. member that he can now demonstrate that we can see the results of this move of folly undertaken by the government because the prices are low. It used to be higher. The Canadian Wheat Board dealt with it. The prices are low now, therefore there is a connection.

How convenient it was that he also forgot to add the enormity of the surplus of the feed grains in every grain growing region of the world and that it is not the case of the marketing situation. It would not matter if the Canadian Wheat Board was marketing it now. When you have enormous surpluses around the world in feed grains, obviously you are going to have a decrease in price. It is not a change in the marketing system that has impacted on price. It is intellectually wrong to try and draw that connection and to lay it before people as if somehow there is a connection between the two.

Mr. Funk: It brought the prices up.

Mr. Malone: I want to hitchhike on that bit of shouting from across the way. The hon. member says that the prices went up. I very much believe that that is the pressure and that will be the absolute result of being able to self-market in a small percentage of an industry where you have the opportunity to find those markets and to hit the foods.

There are three major plants in Canada that are expanding: two in Ontario and one in Alberta. They are spending multiples of millions of dollars to build new oat facilities, signalling the fact that there is a new confidence in the oat industry after years and years of decline in oat processing in this country. We then change the process and, within the year, three new plants spend multiples of millions of dollars to make the oat industry expand.

I have no qualm with any argument saying that the prices are going up. What my hon. colleague from Wetaskiwin said precisely was that high quality oat prices are going up. That market is being met. It is only the lower grade qualities that are lacking in price of any substantive amount and that is because there is a surplus of feed grains in the market.

I would like to come back to the other allegation that was made by hon. members opposite, that in the consulting process the Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba wheat pools were not consulted. The truth of the matter is that I have not seen much more enthusiasm for the opportunity to market oats than there was by the agency called Excel in Calgary. It said it could meet the market, find the niches, put oats in and, given the long haul, it would advantage farmers in a very significant way. Excel is an agency of the Alberta Wheat Pool.

In speaking at the time that this move was made, I was told by officials of the Alberta Wheat Pool that they would take a public face against this. At the same time one of their agencies was telling me that it was quite enthusiastically looking forward to marketing oats. It believed that there was an opportunity for a broadening of the market and that more farmers would be able to grow oats because they would be able to market more oats than the present system was able to do.

Where do we come back to when we come full circle on this argument? This is not a question of, as I think the NDP is trying to impute upon the government, an intent to weaken the Canadian Wheat Board. That is not the view of the Government of Canada. We believe in the Canadian Wheat Board. We believe it is doing a good job. We have taken a single commodity that represented 2 per cent of the total marketing capacity which was not being marketed adequately and have said that there is a better approach. It is going to demonstrate itself that it will be a better approach. That being done, advantaging farmers, the NDP has not recognized that the Wheat Board markets better to the larger volumes on the international scale. This is a niche market aimed at a racehorse industry, farm to farm, farm to farm, or from farm to processor to the food industry in the specialized rolled oat industry.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. His time has now expired.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-230 standing in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

This bill goes back to the spring of 1989 when the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds unilaterally announced that he was taking the marketing of oats from under the arm of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is interesting that this government which used to talk a great deal about consulting with Canadians did precious little if any consultation with Canadian farmers in western Canada when he took this action.

It seems that he consulted with the Canadian wheat growers, the barley growers, the canola growers, the hog and beef producers, but for some reason or other he did not take any time to consult with oat growers. If he had consulted with some of the big farm organizations like the Canadian Federation of Agriculture or the Prairie Pools Incorporated, which have something like 130 farm members, he would have found out that the farmers did not want oats removed from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw is proposing to put this back under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is very interesting that hon. members who spoke this afternoon from the government side suggested that somehow the hon. member was not making the presentation in a very fair way.

The Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee had its district meeting in the spring of 1989. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin who spoke this afternoon was saying that this was a great thing. If the hon. member for Wetaskiwin had taken time to attend that meeting in the spring of 1989, he would have found that 82 farmers showed up at the Wetaskiwin meeting—I assume he did not himself—and that a motion was put to reinstate oats under the Canadian Wheat Board and it passed 53 to 8. If he attended that same meeting in his own home town, he would have known that a motion was passed to remove the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. They called on the Prime Minister to take that action and that was passed, likewise, by a vote of 36 to 21.

The hon. member for Crowfoot would know, if he had taken the time to analyse the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee meetings, that similar meetings calling not only for the reinstatement of oats to the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board, and in many cases calling for the removal of the minister responsible for grains and oilseeds were held in Stettler, in Westlock, in La Crete, in Spirit River, and in Valleyview. Then he would not be opposing this motion which is before the House today.

If we look at what has happened to oat prices since the minister's announcement, we could hardly get a more dramatic telling of a tale. I believe the announcement came some time in January 1989, and the top price for oats at that time was $156 a tonne. Today, in October 1990, only some 18 months later, that price has dropped to $109 a tonne. We can see that removing oats from the Wheat Board may have done something for those producers that the minister consulted with, most of them not oat producers but barley producers, wheat producers, canola producers and others that he claims to have consulted with, and perhaps some of the livestock groups. It really has not done much for securing new niche markets or ensuring the stability of the industry. In fact it has gone down very dramatically.

What we face today is a government that is determined, through free trade and through supporting and assisting large grain marketing agencies, to try to break orderly marketing in this country. Unfortunately, it is doing too good a job in my opinion. Removing oats is the first step. Barley will likely be next. Ultimately, if it was around long enough which I do not believe it will be, it would eventually disband the Canadian Wheat Board.

Clearly, if we meet privately with the representatives of the Saskatchewan Pool, the Alberta Pool or Manitoba Pool, they will tell us that as the borders are opened up under that free trade deal the power and the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board is going to be severely tested.

I believe that two things happened in the spring of 1989. It is hard to tell which one was the most harmful but removing oats from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board was very harmful. Equally harmful was the budget of the great and powerful Michael Wilson because in that budget, in the spring of 1989, he removed one-half billion dollars of support to Canadian agriculture, everything from dairy support programs, to crop insurance, to prairie agriculture rehabilitation of branch lines, to the advance payment program, to the at and east program, to a whole broad range.

What we have as our negotiators sit down at GATT this fall in Geneva is a Canadian agriculture industry which is on its knees praying, not negotiating from a position of strength like the United States or the European Economic Community negotiators, that they will get some kind of a deal out of the GATT negotiations. The reason they are in that position is because the government has totally disarmed them to fight the subsidy war. They come to the negotiating table with no armaments. It would be like sending our ships off to the Persian Gulf without the proper armaments, without the proper military equipment. That is the position our negotiators are in.

This fall farmers growing wheat in western Canada can deliver something like three bushels per acre. That amounts to about $12 best. That is No. 1 wheat. How can a farmer spending $70 or $80 an acre to put in a crop survive? He cannot. So we go to that table having to make a deal.

Last fall, for three or four months we pleaded with the Minister of Agriculture not to take away the interest-free cash advances. It is a very inexpensive program for the Government of Canada, something like $25 million or $27 million. It provides in the short term, six to nine months, something like $400 million or $500 million of cash flow. It increases the value of the crop. It gives the farmer flexibility. They would not do it.

Everybody opposed it, with the exception perhaps of the western Canadian wheat growers, who now have reversed their position and even they oppose it. The farmer has absolutely no cash flow this fall. What will happen, nobody knows. Hopefully the Minister of Agriculture will come to his senses and reinstate it at least for this year. It will not be enough. It might be only half a billion dollars but it will provide some cash flow.

Those actions by the government have put our negotiators at GATT in a very weak position. We are moving away from orderly marketing. This bill moves us back towards orderly marketing. Therefore, I hope that at the end of the day the government might consider supporting it.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it gives me pleasure to rise and support my colleague from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre and the other members who have spoken eloquently in support of this bill. I think it is a very well thought out and timely bill that he has presented, and one that I think all sectors of the farm community would like to see us move on.

What particularly struck me though were the interventions from the government side of the House in defence of the really indefensible action of taking oats out of the Wheat Board in the arbitrary fashion that it did a year and a half ago. Their defence, I think, indicates quite clearly to everybody why this party, the political party that used to represent the public opinion of half the people on the prairies has now been reduced to a rump on the prairies, the fourth place party on the prairies and sinking even lower. They have lost touch, they do not consult, they do not have any respect for the traditional institutions of the prairies, they are letting their traditional support from the farm community whither away.

Farmers are falling like flies, but because a few of their friends are becoming millionaires, they are saying that everything is a success.

So as to allow the members here to be able to vote on this bill, not talk out the clock, I would like to sum up my remarks and ask the government to allow a vote on this issue.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Madam Speaker, I wonder as a question of clarification how much time do I really have to speak—two minutes?

I would like to clarify a couple of points that were brought up earlier. It is pretty clear to me, and I think to most knowledgeable observers here today, that the debate is really not about whether or not the Canadian Wheat Board is good or bad. I think we all agree that the Canadian Wheat Board has a very important role and maintains a very important place in the marketing of prairie agricultural products.

But I think it is important to point out that oats was causing trouble for the Wheat Board itself. It cost the Canadian Wheat Board a tremendous amount to handle most of the small orders that were being placed for oats. Most of the oat growers are small specialized growers and the transaction costs of the Wheat Board handling these orders was tremendous. Also, it applied cost to all the activities of the Wheat Board.

I was asked by the hon. member for Portage—Interlake—known by his oat farmers as the hon. member from Porridge—Interlake—to draw to the attention of the House a story dated October 26, 1989 in the Manitoba Co-operator. This is directly germane to the discussion earlier by my colleague opposite, who suggested that there was nothing going on in the prairies to take advantage of the market for oats. Here is a story that tells us all about it. Let me quote:

> Free trade and the removal of oats from the Canadian Wheat Board are responsible for an oat processing mill to be built near Portage la Prairie according to the company's president.
> A $17 million mill, when completed in 1991, will sell 70 per cent of its production to the U.S., said William Kent, president and chief executive officer of Can-Oat Milling Inc., a Manitoba-based company.
> The Canada-U.S. free trade deal broadens the new company's ability to market its product, Kent said.
> "We are looking at North America as a total market, not just Canada. Without free trade we would not have—

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–85, an act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Mississauga, Ontario, who are opposed to the goods and services tax.

The Minister of Transport may find it surprising that the people in Mississauga, who have no member to stand up and present such a petition for them in this House, are having to present it through me. They are delighted to use their ancient right to come to Parliament and object to the goods and services tax and particularly the tax on books and printed material.

These petitioners take the view, as do millions of other Canadians, that the taxation of books is inherently bad and the goods and services tax, which proposes to do exactly that, is a bad tax and ought not to be passed by Parliament. They call upon Parliament to reject that tax.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to rise and present a petition under Standing Order 36.

The petitioners are 41 in number. They are from the three villages of Redcliffe, Tickle Cove and Openhall. These small communities in Newfoundland have no industry and have nothing really except fishing and the grocery stores that keep them going.

They are very much against Bill C–21. While Bill C–21 is being considered as it is now, their interest is in having the variable entrance requirement reintroduced so that they will qualify for unemployment insurance after 10 weeks as opposed to 14 weeks, which would make it impossible for them.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to revoke these measures.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present a petition bearing the signatures of nearly 4,000 Winnipegers, many of whom live in my riding of Winnipeg St. James.

The petitioners are deeply concerned about the plight of David Milgaard, who has been in prison for 21 years. He is serving life for murder for a crime he maintains he did not commit. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to demand that the Minister of Justice release David Milgaard forthwith or direct the courts to review his case.

This is an urgent matter. People familiar with the Milgaard case have for many months been urging the Minister of Justice to take action. Nothing has happened, causing intense frustration. Some people are at the breaking point. The petitioners implore the minister to take action now.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am honoured to present petitions on behalf of 224 Canadians from coast to coast who are concerned about the impact of the GST on the printed word, which we know is the cornerstone of democracy and literacy.

These petitioners pray that the House ask the government to reconsider its position and withdraw the GST.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure of presenting two petitions.

In these petitions citizens are saying: Whereas the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as the cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by the GST application, we ask that the historic principles embodied in pre-tax status for the printed word be maintained by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have hundreds of signatures from Canadians, right across Ontario, objecting to the government's cancellation of the self-exile class of refugees. As an example, they point out that Ukrainians do not have any office in the Ukraine where they can apply to come to Canada. They have to go all the way to Moscow. The government agreed to open a consular office in Kiev, but to date there is no such office. They are appealing to the government to restore the self-exile class to many east Europeans who do not have full service offices in eastern Europe through which to apply.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition from Canadians right across Ontario and from other provinces, objecting strongly to this government putting a tax on the printed word. They claim that the Government of Canada since Confederation and without hiatus applied a zero rate of tax to magazines, books, and newspapers, and now proposes to include them in the GST. They just abhor this.

At a time when we are trying to fight illiteracy in Canada, which is a very severe problem, it is just not comprehensible why a government would put tax on the printed word. They object strongly and ask the government to remove any GST on the printed word.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition this morning pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of a number of residents of several communities in the province of Ontario who point out that the government has decided for the first time in our history to tax literature. They say that uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy and for that reason ought not to be taxed and made more difficult for people to access. I agree with that, Mr. Speaker. They are asking the Parliament of Canada to do whatever it can to have the government back off from that decision. Mr. Speaker, again pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have another petition from the communities of Agassiz, Mission, Chase, Tumbler Ridge, 100 Mile House and Kamloops, British Columbia, Calgary, Alberta, Louis Creek, Knutsford, Savona, Cloverdale, and Princeton, British Columbia.

The petitioners are all against the government's decision to proceed with the goods and services tax. While they outline a variety of reasons why they oppose the tax, fundamentally they say do not go ahead with it at all and introduce real tax reform as opposed to this tax deform.

LOWER FRASER VALLEY FLOOD CONTROL IMPLEMENTATION

Question No. 318—Ms. Langan (Mission—Coquitlam):

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

THE SENATE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice, pursuant to Standing Order 52, and ask the House to discuss a very important matter, namely the Parliament of Canada, which is in a crisis situation at this time, and I believe that since the House of Commons is at this time best suited, if I may say so, to take the initiative, it is therefore urgently necessary for this House to consider the entire question of parliamentary rights in the Senate and the order to be established and maintained by the Chair in the Senate. Furthermore, and I say this without prejudice, I think it is in the interests of Canadians that we should have a debate on this issue here in the House of Commons, in order to launch a wide-ranging discussion and restore the confidence of Canadians in Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier for his comments. As hon. members are no doubt aware, similar points of order were raised last Friday and, as I said, it is probably not appropriate to have an emergency debate. However, I think that this week we would do well to consider with some measure of concern the events that occured in the other place. Today, however, I regret to say, is not the appropriate time. I thank the hon. member.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to provide Canadians with policies designed to assure full employment through international competitiveness and consistent with the principles of sustainable development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. deputy House leader on a point of order.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Pursuant to Standing Order 57, I give notice that at the next sitting of the House, before the Order is called for resuming debate on motion No. 16, in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, and on any amendment thereto, I shall move that the debate shall not be further adjourned.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On debate, the hon. member for Etobicoke North.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, the motion that we have placed before the House today reads:

That this House condemns the government for it failure to provide Canadians with policies designed to assure full employment through international competitiveness and consistent with the principles of sustainable development.

We have presented this motion before the House at a time when Canada has entered a period of recession. Canada has seen six consecutive months of negative growth in our economy, the standard definition of recession. But, to put our current situation in more tangible terms, if one could take a snapshot of the Canadian economy today, what would one see?

One would see first of all high interest rates throughout our economy, throughout our country, decidely higher than those in our principal trading partner, the United States. We would see an inflated value for the Canadian dollar, an inflated value that drives down Canadian exports, making Canadian products more expensive for other countries to purchase. Not surprisingly, Mr. Speaker, given those two factors, high interest rates and a high Canadian dollar, we would see higher unemployment.

We have in fact seen high unemployment. We have seen it go up again this past month as it did the previous month. The Canadian economy is now characterized by increasing unemployment.

We would see underfunding of government programs to make us more globally effective, more globally competitive. We would see an economy that is unable to generate the necessary support programs necessary to ensure our further global competitiveness.

All that is to say that Canada has entered a recession.

We hear frequently the Minister of Finance speaking about how Canada is on a debt treadmill. He is wont to offer the House and to the Canadian people a whole litany of problems that arise, in his view, from the very large debt that Canada has accumulated and the service charges that Canadians must pay on that accumulated debt. And yet it is this same government, this same Minister of Finance, who has not succeeded in bringing down the debt. He speaks of the need to do so. He tells us on every occasion that the debt must be reduced, but the debt has been growing faster than our economy.

Since the Conservative government took office the national debt has more than doubled. It has risen from $170 billion in 1984 to almost $400 billion by the end of this year. That has been allowed to happen despite an unbroken period of economic growth beginning in the early 1980s. And yet the deficit is expected this year to exceed that of last year and is expected by some to approach the record level in the post-recession year of 1984.

We Canadians all know that the Minister of Finance's forecasts about his deficit have frequently been wrong, almost consistently wrong; so too have his forecasts about interest rates. Indeed, his interest rate forecasts for 1988 and 1989 were wrong. Certainly those for 1990 will be as well. The 1985 budget tabled soon after this government came into office forecast the annual deficit to be only $17 billion by the end of this decade. And yet here we are at the end of the decade, and the government has not reduced the deficit to $17 billion. It is much more likely to be more than twice that amount, $34 billion or more.

Earlier this year the Minister of Finance forecast a budget deficit of only $28 billion. He based that forecast, which is bound to be erroneous, upon an average rate of interest of 11 per cent this year. But now that it is October and we are well through 1990, it must be evident to every Canadian that average interest rates this year are not going to be 11 per cent; they will average closer to 13 per cent or 13.5 per cent.

This is where the failure of the government to provide Canadians with a budget, offering hope and stability in our economy becomes most evident. The Minister of Finance makes much of the undeniable fact that the government has reduced its official spending. All Canadians are aware of that. All provincial governments, all pensioners, all patients in hospitals, all students and a myriad of other Canadians are fully aware that the government has been reducing its spending. But what should be profoundly unsettling to this government, and indeed to all Canadians, and what gives rise to our motion today is that despite such reductions as it has made in its official spending both the debt and the deficit of Canada continue to increase.

Why is that so, Mr. Speaker? There are two reasons, basically. One is that the government has not related its reductions in spending and, principally, its reductions in social spending, to any broadly based reforms. It has offered Canadians no other vision of the future than curtailing spending on present social programs. It offers no coherent policy of social development in our country. It offers no program of education support or of retraining. It offers no programs of support in the medical field or in terms of unemployment assistance, other than to tinker with and reduce the programs that past governments have put into place.

A major problem with this government's economic policy—and one major reason why it has placed itself in a position where both the deficit and the debt continue to increase despite its protestations to the contrary—is interest rates, a subject of which all Canadians are painfully aware.

We know that interest rates are already playing havoc with the forecast of the Minister of Finance for 1990. For example, the minister recently forecasted a likely deficit of $30 billion this year instead of the $28 billion that he had earlier forecasted, but all economists, observers and commentators know very well that even the minister's revised estimate of $30 billion is substantially lower than the deficit that this government will incur this year.

And yet, despite its protestations during a time of real economic prosperity, the government has failed to do what it set out to do. Further, with recession now upon us, social costs will go up as unemployment increases. Tax revenues will go down.

Interest charges on the debt now equal our annual deficit. The reason why interest on the deficit is so high is simply because interest rates are so high. The reason why interest rates are so high is because this government has relied solely on the Bank of Canada to combat inflation through high interest rates.

Fighting inflation by high interest rates only works when the high interest rates bring on a recession. And that is precisely what we see in Canada today. By the end of July, Canada had experienced six consecutive months of negative growth. Translated into more tangible and immediate terms, that means that unemployment has again increased in our country in September, reaching 8.4 per cent nationally. Regionally, of course, that unemployment rate is much higher, reaching 17 per cent in Newfoundland. Housing starts have fallen yet again this month, as well as last month and the previous month, a sure indicator that our economic growth is faltering.

High interest rates have also done precisely what one expected them to do in inflating the value of the Canadian dollar. As short term money flows into Canada seeking higher returns, it contributes to an exaggerated value for the Canadian dollar. The Canadian dollar has in fact increased by almost 20 per cent against the U.S. dollar, with devastating effects on our export trade. Ask anyone in the business community whether they feel they can effectively export from Canada with that sort of penalty.

In effect, the costs of many Canadian goods and services has increased by 20 per cent, while the cost of many imports has declined by a like amount, leaving the Canadian exporter at a real disadvantage. The result of course is the loss of markets abroad and indeed the loss of jobs at home.

The irony is that this government, which promised the people of Canada increased prosperity in the years ahead largely on the basis of the United States–Canada Free Trade Agreement, has itself created the very circumstances in which the agreement cannot work for Canada's benefit, if it can at all.

Mr. Speaker, if you were so foolhardy as to enter a free trade agreement, a bilateral agreement, with only one other partner much bigger than you are, the last thing that you would do is saddle yourself with interest rates that are many points higher than that of your principal competitor. In the case of Canada's free trade agreement with the United States, our interest rates are five to six percentage points higher than those of our trading partner. Our dollar is today inflated well beyond its real value in terms of Canadian productivity.

Mr. Speaker, all those who supported the free trade agreement must now be wondering why they did so in the face of plant closures and transfers to the United States. They must wonder how a government which was so committed to a bilateral free trade agreement could be the same government that has created the very circumstances in which the free trade agreement will bring no net benefits to Canadians, whatever the intrinsic merits or demerits of the agreement itself may be.

In keeping with other so–called monetarist governments around the world, the present government has viewed the control of money supply, largely through the manipulation of interest rates, as the key to Canada's greater economic growth. It is a central feature of monetarist theory that inflation is caused by too much money chasing too few goods. Inflation, in turn, destabilizes the economy, undermines investors' confidence and handicaps a nation's exports.

The theory is, of course, that the manipulation of interest rates controls the money supply in two ways; it can dampen borrowing which in turn dampens investment and consumer demand, and it can slow over–all growth and employment which can, in turn, dampen wage demands. Increasingly, this idea, this simple preoccupation of the government, this sole policy it pursues with such single–minded intensity, is being called into question. Specifically, it is now everywhere evident that inflation cannot be combated through monetarist policy alone without inflicting severe damage on Canada's over–all economic performance.

Let me say a word about why this government's policy has failed. Its economic prescriptions can be traced, at least in part, to the fact that its fiscal and monetary policies are out of step. The government has consistently failed to reduce its deficit at a time when there was an upswing in our business cycle, which should have led government to pursue counter–cyclical fiscal measures.

Governments' mounting deficits themselves have emerged as a significant brake on our economic growth. At a time when domestic savings should have been employed to finance investment in our private sector, the domestic savings have instead been used to finance excessive consumption in the public sector. The private sector, therefore, has been forced to go offshore for capital, leading to higher foreign indebtedness. That is on top of the high levels of offshore borrowings recently undertaken by the government itself to finance its continuing deficits.

At present, $41 billion flows out of Canada each year simply to pay interest rates on our growing foreign debt. The problem has become acute. Ideally, at this downward turn in the business cycle, as we cross the threshold into recession, the government should have been producing surpluses in order to make up for the short-falls in private investment. Instead it is employing the savings of foreigners on top of our limited domestic savings to finance excessive public sector expenses. Not surprisingly, dividends paid to non-residents more than doubled in the second quarter to $10.5 billion, from $4.3 billion in the first quarter, aggravating the problems of foreign indebtedness.

More important still, high levels of government spending over the past six years have served to over-stimulate an economy which at least in central Canada was already heated. This is the fiscal policy from a government which pursues the goal of dampening inflation through a single-minded preoccupation with high interest rates.

Concurrently, the inflationary impact of the government's tax increases has further damaged our economy. Partly because tax increases and real wages in Canada have failed to match the cost-of-living increases, leading to recent demands in both the private and public sectors for higher wages. The implementation of the GST will only aggravate this situation. Wage settlements are outstripping productivity gains, leading to a rise in Canadian production costs and an erosion of our national competitiveness.

Thus the government finds itself in the ironic situation of fighting inflationary pressures, which to an extent it has itself created. As I have already noted, it has used one tool and one tool only, the sledgehammer of higher interest rates, to attempt to achieve its goals.

Under the circumstances, monetary policy alone cannot exclude inflationary pressures from our economy. Indeed, in many respects monetary policy actually serves to fuel the problems that Canadians are facing today.

What fundamentally undermines the government's efforts to curb inflation is, as I have noted, the national debt. Every time interest rates increase, the government has to spend more to service its debt, and it has to raise taxes to finance its other spending. In short, monetary and fiscal policy have become inseparable, and we have a vicious circle from which the government seems wholly unable to extricate itself.

It is worth asking whether this government's monetary policy, that is to say high interest rates, is serving the ends for which it was intended: presumably economic growth, economic well-being and jobs for Canadians. The purpose of tackling inflation is to ensure price stability, which in turn enhances the long-term health of the Canadian economy.

Yet, the Canadian economy today is visibly suffering. We are in a recession. Monetary policy is inequitable across regions of Canada. What is euphemistically described as slowing the economy or taking the heat out of the economy really translates into pursuing slow growth and, more important, unemployment.

High interest rate policy is undermining Canadian exports. High interest rates also increase artificially the Canadian dollar by increasing demand for Canadian dollars to purchase of short-term paper.

We must keep in mind what inflationary policy really means. Our level of government spending has accelerated through high interest rates. Our productivity and competitiveness have been undermined, and our economy is passing into a recession.

Indeed, if the problem is that consumption is outpacing growth, it is time that the government realized that the solution does not lie simply in curbing or limiting demand—the goal of monetarists everywhere—but in increasing our national productivity. High interest rates cannot further that goal. On the contrary, we must reduce interest rates. We must reduce the costs to Canada if we are to compete internationally.

We must look at ways of improving labour mobility. We must look at many more ways of increasing labour productivity such as through education, through social security or through human resources development. In that way, we shall create the circumstances in which a motion, such as I have had the honour to table today, would not be needed in this House.

• (1140)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by congratulating the hon. member on an excellent presentation. Also I want to commend him on his motion and, in particular, the fact that he is relating the issue of the labour force to the international competitiveness of our country.

Fairly recently I was in the process of consulting with some of my constituents on the issue of education. I received a little note from a Dr. Pugsley, a professor of management at McGill University. No one could have summed it up better than he did. He said that "there is an important connection between a well trained labour force and international trade for a country the size of Canada, but mentioning this just makes people yawn". No one could have put it better and I am very happy to see one of my colleagues bringing forward this correlation between the two.

I would like to ask him a question about his views on the issue of education and the connection between education as it relates to the labour force and to the reshaping of the status of Canada on the international market. I would like to ask him if he could put some emphasis on the need for a national strategy to deal with the issue of education, as it relates to that.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, has raised the question again, which I touched on in my speech, of the central importance of education, in the broadest sense, to increased productivity in Canada, that is to say, our ability to compete with other countries in an increasingly globalized economy.

Any education strategy which he and I would both urge would, I am sure, embrace a spectrum of activity for a federal government. It would range from short-term adjustment programs necessary to cushion the impact of the changing nature of international trade and Canada's role in it, through to the longer-term contribution that a federal government can make to the education of Canadians so that they can compete effectively in a global economy.

Of course, all of us in this House recognize fully that the provincial governments bear the prime responsibility in our federation for education. But equally, I am sure that we have all recognized that over the years the federal government of Canada has played an important role in transferring funds and making support available to education in Canada which is an area, unfortunately, that has fallen to a degree, victim to this government's cost-cutting measures. This has, therefore, not placed young Canadians in the position of being able to compete effectively in the world economy.

I would hope that when the next government comes to office, which will be a Liberal government, we shall see a plan put into place. Such thinking has already been discussed and examined with Canadians across the country. We must define the role that the federal government can play not only in the short-term adjustment assistance that is often necessary to afford a transition for an industry or a company, in terms of global competition, but also in the longer term which my hon. friend, I am sure, had in mind when he raised the question.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my hon. friend. I listened very carefully to his opening speech on this important motion and, frankly, a great deal of what he suggests comes very close to the orthodoxy of our party, not the orthodoxy of the Liberal Party.

For example, first he is concerned about inflation. I want to ask him then three questions. The first question is about inflation. We have inflation now running between 4 per cent and 5 per cent. Could the hon. member tell us where inflation was in 1982 under a Liberal government?

Second, the hon. member for Etobicoke North speaks about spending and the deficit. He knows of course that on operations of the government we are running now a surplus that I think is over $14 billion. Could he tell us what the operating surplus or deficit was in 1982 or 1983 when the Liberals lead government?

The third and final question has to do with the whole question of a vicious cycle which he thinks that we are moving into. He used a conservative analysis, saying that high interest rates lead to inflation. Is he aware of how high interest rates were in 1982 and how high inflation was in 1982 in Canada? Is he aware that, today, after a great deal of spending and monetary relaxation in Great Britain, what interest rates and the inflation rate are in Great Britain compared to what we have in Canada?

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not the hon. member was was in the House of Commons in 1982. In any event, he should know very well that the period of 1980 to 1982 was a period when Canada, and indeed the world, was making a transition from the severe recession triggered largely by the oil price increases of the late 1970s. The member will know very well that global interest rates then shot up, as they did in Canada. The member will know very well that governments of the day in Canada, and indeed in other countries around the world, sought to offset the recessionary impact of higher energy costs by instituting public measures to promote employment and to help stimulate the economy.

The member, who prides himself on being a small businessmen, will recognize that in terms of recessionary periods governments must step in to assist the economy. During a period of prosperity, such as we have just experienced, governments, in terms of good Keynesian economics, will reduce to a degree their activities in the economy so as to permit the expansion of the private sector. The minister knows that there is no point in him taking time telling us about some spurious or imaginary circumstances in 1982 which did not exist.

What I am saying to the minister and what he should recognize is that inflation rates in the United States, our principal trading partner to which 70 per cent of our exports or more go—are today no higher than in Canada. In fact, they are lower. But what are interest rates in the United States today? Substantially lower than they are in Canada. In such circumsdtances, how does the government think that we can compete with the United States? How does it think that it is going to get any benefits from its much vaunted free trade agreement if it runs interest rates that are typically 4 to 5 percentage points higher than those in the United States and if it drives up the value of the Canadian dollar to the point where tourism, among other vital Canadian industries, drops off because of the cost of Canadian goods and services are beyond their real value in terms of any productivity measurement?

Does the government think that pursuing a monetary policy of this sort places Canada in a competitive position in the world today? The minister knows better than that. He knows better than 4 or 5 percentage points in interest rates over those in the United States is bound to have a deleterious effect on our international trade and to render us less competitive than Canadians should be and less productive than Canadians should be.

That is the real answer to this member's questions, not some sort of imaginary world in 1982 when presumably the government from its own ideas thought that it would like to have high interest rates, divorced from the rest of the world and divorced from the inflation that had been triggered by the oil crisis of the late 1970s. He knows better than that.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I have some remarks I want to go through rather systematically, but before I do so I would like to answer the questions I just posed to the member for Etobicoke North who refused to answer the questions I put to him.

First, in 1982 we all know that interest rates were about 22 per cent to 23 per cent. They are now considerably below that. We know, too, that in 1984 when the present government took over the deficit was running at $38 billion, 8.6 per cent of the total wealth of the Canadian economy, compared with today where the deficit is now less than 4 per cent of the total wealth of the Canadian economy. He knows the answer to that.

As well, when he talks about plant closures, he very carefully omits the news that there have been a tremendous number of expansions, enhancements, and improvements of plants in Canada at the manufacturing level, the service production level of the economy, as well as some very good news in terms of employment creation since the trade agreement.

All of what the hon. member said on his motion, quite frankly, ends up being in many ways a kind of reverse hymn of praise to what our government has been doing. We have lowered inflation. We have lowered interest rates from when he was here. We have lowered the burden of the deficit as a percentage of the economy, expanded trade, and seen a tremendous number of jobs created in the last six years.

He also talked about the last two or three quarters where we have had flat or negative growth in the Government of Canada. He omits to tell us of course that we have had seven and a half years of economic expansion largely as a result of the policies of this government. As a result of that, we have a stronger economy and a better balanced economy as we move into a global recessionary context.

I am very pleased to be able to raise a number of issues in this debate that go beyond what the hon. member has raised. He has talked essentially about macroeconomic policy, interest rates, deficits, and so on, and I have dealt with that.

Let us go beyond that to the actual mechanics of how we increase international trade in this great country of ours. We have trouble with the NDP and the Liberals on this, but we have to realize that markets around the world are becoming increasingly integrated. In other words, we cannot operate in isolation in Canada. We have to integrate ourselves with world markets and be competitive in that integrated context.

Therefore, I want to speak for a few minutes today about what we are trying to do as a government to support Canadian exporters around the world. Canada as we know is a leading trading country in the world, but in many ways our trading performance outside of agriculture, automobiles, and automobile parts has not been that vigorous. We as a country have to strengthen our economy throughout in order to make us an exporting power. To do that there has been a number of very exciting programs that I want to make reference to.

This month is Canada International Trade Month. It was announced last week by the Minister for International Trade. This announcement was a way to try to sensitize Canadians to the importance of exports and the importance of international trade for Canada. It flows from something else and that is our national trade strategy which was established, not just by our government, but by first ministers in the country in 1985.

The hon. member will be interested to hear that that strategy had three objectives. The first is to secure and enhance access to foreign markets—the first ministers all agreed to this. Let us secure access to foreign markets, of course the FTA is crucial to that, as is GATT. The second objective is to improve our trade competitiveness. All first ministers, together with the Government of Canada, wanted to make us more competitive and our programs flow from that. The third objective is to strengthen our international marketing efforts. As Minister of State for Tourism, I recognize the tremendous importance of marketing to sell the image of our country, but marketing is very important for almost all segments of our economy, and that too was recognized as part of this strategy.

To do this I think hon. members will remember the government proposed a two track policy to accomplish that strategy. One track was multinational through the Uruguay Round of trade liberalization. I had the honour of representing the Government of Canada at those negotiations with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I remember the week in Punta del Este very well. It was was rainy, just like today, all week long. The meetings were held in a gambling casino. Maybe that is where trade meetings should be held. It was very difficult to tell whether we would ever end up with an agreement.

Our government worked very hard, together with the Cairns group and others, to help break the log jam on services and agriculture and to promote trade liberalization on goods and textiles. We now are into the fourth year as a result of that Uruguay Agreement. It still, however, difficult to tell whether we are going to end up this January 1 with the kind of agreement we hoped for in the Uruguay Round. The government is giving all the leadership it possibly can to help bring that about.

The other track we looked at, of course, was the more controversial one of the free trade agreement. As a result of the free trade agreement, we secured and enhanced our access to the American market. I shudder to think what we would have done in the last year and a half without that agreement when we had unilateral American actions. A good example is pork. There was a ruling just last week that said that the Department of Commerce research and positioning on pork was not accurate or tenable. Therefore, based on that research, they could not proceed.

That sort of good news for Canada would never have been possible without the dispute settlement mechanism of the bilateral trade agreement. Not only was the dispute settlement mechanism which allows the country one-tenth the size of another country to have equality accomplished, but it has also produced a much more vigorous and competitive economy and, of course, we have had 250,000 jobs created since the agreement was signed.

This two track trade policy is the heart and soul of our over-all strategy. Beyond that, we have to do a number of pragmatic things to enhance our trade. We now deploy investment counsellors from the private sector to key locations around the world. Our trade officers more aggressively promote investment to Canada. We now have some 2,000 investment related events conducted annually, together with extensive advertising and extensive communications program, likewise, our science and technology activities abroad. These activities are not just in Canada, but abroad, and are designed to maximize access to R and D outside the country. They have been strengthened. We now have 32 officers in 24 posts servicing about 3,000 technology inquiries per year.

The mainstay of our trade promotion thrust to increase the efficiency of our international marketing program is the well-known program for export market development, the so-called PEMD program. With an annual budget, PEMD has $35 million. It provides for company participation in fairs and trade missions and supports individual corporate marketing efforts. We have adapted PEMD to the changing world scene to better assist the efforts of small business.

As the minister of small businesses, I am extremely pleased to see that this particular approach, which under the previous government was not a bad program for big business, has now been made much more adaptable for small business. I could show to members of the House the Canadian business guide, just produced last week, entitled: "Exporting to the United States". If an hon. member has a small business in his or her constituency that does not know how to export to the United States and needs some primer and some help, this document is very helpful.

We have adapted PEMD, then, to the small business community as well as to the medium and large business communities, and it is working. In 1989, 59 per cent of PEMD approvals went to Canadian companies with total sales of less than $2 million. I am very pleased that that program is not only up and running, but that it is better balanced.

Another pillar in carrying out our marketing effort is the trade commissioner service. Some 240 trade commissioners located in 129 countries are responsible for analyzing markets, assisting in markets, promoting foreign investment, and identifying foreign technology.

Also, in order to ensure that this high level of service reaches more Canadian companies, we established 12 international trade centres across Canada. They are the local points of contact for every actual or potential exporter for all the department's services. There is a deeper problem that Canada faces that this government is coming to terms with, and that is awareness. People are just not aware of the importance of exporting or how to export. We have a program in place to improve that awareness by making small and large businesses more export ready and to support exporting capacity.

A variety of programs are in place to do this. They include the high technology seminars, the Marketplace program and the export awards program. As well, there is the InvestTech Cross-Canada Tour and a variety of ad hoc seminars and briefings on subjects, ranging from the FTA and Europe '92 to export controls and transportation, which have been organized. They have been a tremendously useful set of seminars to help make our business community more aware of the opportunities of export.

In 1988, the Minister for International Trade was pleased to announce a $57 million, five-year trade development program with a focus on the United States. That focus has been working very well. It includes the Nexus program, the NEBS program, but also there is a wider program, which members will recall. Last fall the Prime Minister announced a $93.6 million series of programs to aid businesses in expanding their market efforts into the global marketplace, with a focus on Europe and the Pacific. The government has dedicated over $150 million to trade development over the past two years, and this comes at a time when budgets are being tightened everywhere. It is a very clear example of the kind of commitment that this government has shown to enhancing awareness of exports and assisting in exports in terms of trade mission fairs, knowledge, technology, transfer and so on.

I would like to make a comment to summarize what has happened. We have some very interesting numbers that I do not think have ever been read into the record here in the House. As a direct result of our efforts, our clients have reported in 1989-90 1,736 export sales worth $4.8 billion; 129 new joint venture and licensing agreements worth $198 million; 68 foreign investments in Canada worth $746 million; 62 Canadian investments abroad worth $116 million and 86 technology transfers worth $82 million. These results speak for themselves. These programs are working. There is more dynamism and export orientation in this country than ever before.

The Department of Industry, Science and Technology, of which I am a part, also has been very much a part of this strategy. We do not have time to go through all the programs that ISTC is responsible for, but many of them are co-ordinated with External Affairs. Therefore, the programs I have spoken to involve the Department of Industry, Science and Technology.

There are two crucial things I would like to mention before I sit down. First of all, we in Canada feel that there has not been an appropriate entrepreneurial culture in Canada. What we have been trying to do is develop an entrepreneurship awareness or stimulation in Canada through an awareness program, and also through the new National Entrepreneurship Development Institute. That awareness program is working. We have all 10 ministers of education across Canada working with us to put entrepreneurship programs into the high schools. We are creating a culture of entrepreneurship in Canada which will help us greatly in terms of world competitiveness.

Second, with regard to the Department of Industry, Science and Technology generally, we have put in place a Strategic Technologies Program. This is a very interesting program that affects the whole Canadian economy. What it does is promote technological capabilities and competitiveness across all sectors. This includes the resource sector, the high tech sector and the service and medical sectors. It responds to world-wide trends demonstrating the value of strategic alliances. It enhances networking and linkages across Canada. When it does that, it also promotes Canadian unity.

An example is a Vancouver company getting together with a Trois-Rivières company. I know of a company in London that has just done a joint venture with a company in Newfoundland. These things are uniting for the country and they flow from the Strategic Technologies Programs. These strategic technologies include biotechnology advance materials and informatics, for example. This program has been very well received by companies. It is enhancing our ability to be competitive. This adds up to not only a set of good intentions for Canada, but programs that are out there working, in place, enhancing our competitiveness.

That, together with responsible fiscal policy leadership which we have had from the Minister of Finance for the last six and a half years—the only topic to which my hon. friend really referred earlier—and together with an ability to moderate inflation, to make us more competitive in terms of inflation in other countries in Europe, Asia or elsewhere to decrease our deficit in a continuous way, will also allow us to be more competitive.

All of this fits together. Today, we have a government committed to competitiveness globally and programs to make it work.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to what the hon. Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism was saying.

I was curious about whether there was a single person in the House of Commons who would agree with the points he was making in terms of the general thesis that the government is on the right track with support for small business. I have just completed a three week survey of the small businesses in my constituency during which I asked them what they thought about how the present federal government was handling the economy in terms of their interest.

I am pleased to say that two out of ten businesses thought that the government was not doing too badly. Fair enough. One of the ten did not really know because it was too busy surviving and was not able to make an intelligent decision. But seven out of ten businesses thought that the government was on a disastrous course, one on which, if it continues that way, will not allow them to be in business for any length of time.

I want to ask the minister responsible for small businesses what he thinks of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and its survey regarding the impact of the goods and services tax on the small business sector. This, of course, represents in excess of 70,000 small businesses across the country which were surveyed in an objective and scientific fashion. I say relatively.

The point is that an overwhelming majority, virtually everyone, says that the government is taking them on a suicidal course, that its monetary policy and its fiscal policy are exactly wrong for what is required today.

I want to ask my hon. friend and colleague what he thinks of John Bulloch's suggestion when he, as the spokesperson for the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, asked the government to withdraw the goods and services tax in an effort to save the small business community of Canada.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to finally hear the hon. member quoting John Bulloch after ten years of disparaging him, criticizing him and defending himself against John Bulloch's complaints about socialist tendencies to spend too much and to intervene too much in the economy. Suddenly, he is standing up and quoting him.

That is fine. I am glad he is starting to read some different materials. What John Bulloch has argued for is very important for the government to hear as well as the opposition. What he is arguing for is an integrated sales tax with the provinces. He is disappointed that we have not accomplished this, but we are starting to accomplish it.

Newfoundland emphasized the other day that it is going to participate. Quebec and other provinces are looking at it. As soon as we have a national sales tax, John Bulloch will be much happier, as will his client group.

The second thing that John Bulloch wanted is a broader based tax. He did not want to exempt food. The hon. member wants to exempt food. John Bulloch does not want to exempt medical care in hospitals. The hon. member does not want that included in the tax base either, so the hon. member would be with us on that. He would want them exempted just as, indeed, we want them exempted. That is our problem with Mr. Bulloch.

I want to tell my hon. friend that I was fascinated this month to see the latest material from Mr. Bulloch in which he says: "Look, the government has made some interesting changes on the GST. It is doing some things that are helpful, and instead of constantly criticizing the GST I would like to explain how the GST works for my membership."

I think he had eight pages of how the GST works and how it can be made useful. In that material, he emphasized that the GST is very good through input tax credits, through the input credit arrangement, improving cash flow for small businesses. This is something we have been arguing for six months. I am very glad that Mr. Bullock now recognizes that.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I will quote someone whom I have been quoting for a long time, I say to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, a person who from time to time he has quoted. Indeed, at one point, lest he forget, his fearless leader from Baie Comeau actually appointed this person to her present position. The person is Judith Maxwell. She is the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, thanks to the Prime Minister, the minister's boss. She said quite recently, indeed in the last few days, that "relying solely on the Bank of Canada to combat inflation through high interest rates is harming rather than helping the economy". That was said by Judith Maxwell, the same Judith Maxwell appointed by the boss of the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

That same Judith Maxwell goes on to say that "there is a better way to fight inflation than through high interest rates".

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): The Liberal way.

Mr. Simmons: Yes, it is the Liberal way, and I thank my friend for indicating that he is not completely oblivious to what we stand for on this side of the House. I thank him for that. It is the Liberal way. There is a better way, I say to him.

Mr. Riis: Unwittingly.

Mr. Simmons: I say to him and his friend, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, there is a better way than high interest rates. Of course there is a better way, and I am glad that at least one Tory—is he really a Tory—at least one Tory agrees with me, and I compliment him. But, now I digress.

I want to ask the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism if he agrees with Judith Maxwell's prescription. I want to read it to him. She says there is a better way. She said that better way could include a commitment to full employment. That would be welcome news in Newfoundland where we have an unemployment rate of 17 per cent plus, thanks to the policies of this government. Does he agree that there is a better way than high interest rates? Will he stand now and disown the high interest rate policy of his government, and, more to the point, will he tell us that he will recommend to cabinet a policy of full employment? Two fairly simple questions, and I am sure he will resist the temptation to get smart alecky at this point. I see a smirk on his face, but I hope that in his heart there is some concern for the 17 per cent of Newfoundlanders who are unemployed, thanks to the policies that he is unwittingly supporting.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, that was not a smirk, that was a smile. I was enjoying the intervention of my hon. friend. Two points on interest rates. The hon. member quotes Judith Maxwell, who has also made the Government of Canada very aware that in the last year credit formation in Canada was up 15 per cent. It was up even higher the year before. Credit formation in this country, people using credit cards, wanting to buy things, is outstripping the money supply. This adds inflationary pressures and the only way you can moderate or come to terms with this is to have somewhat higher interest rates in order to dampen demand, and this has worked. My hon. friend fails to tell us that the federal discount rates in Japan, Germany, Britain and the United States are up by 2 per cent, 3 per cent or 4 per cent more than they were a year ago. So, we are part of an over-all global trend. The hon. member always forgets to mention that. We are affected by that.

What has happened is, in fact, interest rates have been coming down. They have been coming down for about 14 straight weeks. They are coming down slowly, but they are coming down. Therefore, the policy is working and the furnace is cooling off. The hon. member would just fiddle with the thermometer. The government believes in dealing with the furnace. The furnace and the fires of inflation are what really matter, not what the thermometer reads. What the government has done is put in place a situation whereby interest rates have come down for 13 or 14 straight weeks.

On employment, my hon. friend says we should aim for full employment. There was a comment made beside me saying that of course the Soviet Union has full employment and East Germany has full employment. You can have full employment in a formalistic way by paying people nothing and putting them through make-work schemes. The best way to have full employment in this country is in fact to pass that unemployment insurance bill now in the Senate, which would train people, which would decrease the deficit, and this we are determined to do.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I just returned from five days travelling through my riding, five days in which I visited with farm families at their kitchen tables, on the steps of their combines, and at the gates of the barns. Every one of those farm families that I talked to talked about being on the brink of bankruptcy. Government policies have pushed them to the point where they can no longer maintain their existence on the farm producing food for Canada and the world. Those farm families are concerned about the low price of grain, high interest rates, high fuel costs, and the removal of the interest-free cash advance for grain.

The government is talking about maintaining high interest rates to keep the use of credit cards down. We are losing an entire industry in western Canada. We are losing an industry that is maintained by people and individuals who have been on that land for years. The government over there has the audacity to say that it has to keep interest rates high and that it has to keep fuel costs high because of this international marketplace.

Surely this minister who talks about support for small businesses that are going down because the agricultural economy in western Canada cannot support them any more can answer a simple question about how it is that they can continue to talk this way when we are losing the industry.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his intervention because it is quite true that one of the unhappy results of this overheated economy in urban Canada has been to put pressure on interest rates, which hurts the small business person especially in the outlying regions and especially the farmer. I think his intervention is understandable for that reason.

That is why the government, though, has brought forward income stabilization programs in the agricultural sector to come to terms with that. Those programs are very well received and very respected. They should be furthered. They should be enhanced, and that is what this government is committed to.

In terms of small business, though, the NDP wants to have a minimum tax on all corporations regardless of their size. I quite agree that we should have a minimum tax on financial institutions: those big companies, big trust companies, banks and insurance companies. We brought one in.

However, small businesses now, when they have years of losses, are able to put the losses against when they finally make a profit. This allows a small business to survive. The NDP policy toward small businesses is to tax them every year, even if they have loss carry-forwards. We do not believe in that. We believe in a healthy small business sector of our economy.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): I think the minister is distorting our policy a bit, Mr. Speaker. We are talking about profitable corporations, and he knows that.

Mr. Thacker: Can you carry forward losses?

Mr. Nystrom: Yes.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville has the floor on debate.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today deals with the need for full employment in this country. It talks about being more competitive internationally and having a policy of employment that is consistent with the principle of sustainable development in Canada.

I think those are very laudible goals and very laudible objectives. We should seek to have in this country, first of all, full employment and, second, we have to be more competitive internationally in terms of exports to begin with and in terms of developing more of our own resources and products in this country instead of importing many things from abroad. All that must be done according to the motion keeping aware of the importance of sustainable development in Canada in terms of the environment.

I want to begin by saying that I think Judith Maxwell, in terms of the Economic Council of Canada, has hit the nail on the head when she said in her annual report a little while ago that there is something fundamentally wrong with the Canadian economy, fundamentally wrong with the way we have organized our country for the last 10 or 20 years. All members of Parliament should take a very close look at the table on page 40 of that particular report. That table compares 16 countries in the OECD, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, in terms of their long-term unemployment rate between 1970 and 1989, a 20-year period. Of those 16 countries we rank number 15 in terms of the highest long-term unemployment. Switzerland, Japan, Norway, Austria, Sweden, West Germany, and Finland over those 20 years all had unemployment rates of well under 5 per cent, but Canada ranks number 15. We are behind Belgium. We are behind Italy. We are behind the United Kingdom, with all the problems it has had in the last few years in terms of restructuring its economy. The only country of the 16 that we are ahead of is Spain.

I think that tells us a lot about the situation with which we are now faced in this country in terms of a major failure of government and other key players in the Canadian economy. She also says in the Economic Council Report at page 45: "Canada has never made more than a timid commitment to full employment". Here she is talking about not just the last six years under the Conservative government but about previous Liberal governments in this place and about the short nine-month Conservative government back in 1979-80 as well. I think we have to take a look at what is wrong with our economy structurally.

The other thing we should look at is the cost of high unemployment. When I am talking about the Economic Council of Canada and its report, I am talking about a group, as a member from Newfoundland said a few minutes ago, that was appointed by the government itself. These are appointees of the federal government. They have issued one of the more critical, one of the more thoughtful annual reports about current government policy that I have seen in this institution for a long time.

Another thing we should look at are the costs of high unemployment and how much it is costing this country of ours. We have an unemployment rate now that is more than twice as high as many other highly industrialized countries around the world. There was a recent study by the Toronto-Dominion Bank which said that the average

Canadian worker produces around $54,000 worth of output per year. That same Toronto–Dominion Bank study says that if we were to cut our unemployment rate by half, in other words by 575,000 people, and multiply that by $54,000 per year, we would have an extra output of $31 billion per year or 5 per cent more in terms of output in this economy. This is a study by a fairly conservative organization, the Toronto–Dominion Bank.

I think Canadian people should realize what this means. The average worker produces around $54,000 per year in output. This is not somebody who is working at a very high salaried job and producing all kinds of goods and services or somebody who is at the low end of the scale. This is the average per worker, $54,000 per year. If we had an unemployment rate that was down around the level of western Europeans or Scandinavians, that is an extra $31 billion per year. Just think what we could do with $31 billion per year. That is a lot of money in terms of the government's deficit, in terms of educational and health services, in terms of research and development, and in terms of making our economy more productive, more humane and more equal for Canadians across this land.

It is not only the benefits of $31 billion per year, but let us imagine the costs of having over one million Canadians unemployed, the money that we spend for unemployment insurance benefits every year. The money that is spent by the federal and provincial governments on social welfare and social services is astronomical. We do not even have a proper mechanism of calculating the other costs to health care. How much does it cost our country in terms of additional health care every year because we have an army of over a million unemployed? What does it cost in terms of higher crime rates in this country or the unhappiness that people suffer through because they do not have a job, and a proper mechanism to feed their families?

I think this government would be serving this country well if we would devise a way of calculating the cost of high unemployment so we could see what the costs of this country are and see what the cost to the individual is of an unemployment rate of over a million per year in Canada.

With these kinds of statistics, I think it is about time that this government devised a policy that has as its number one objective full employment in Canada. I do not see that happening when I look across the way.

This country, in terms of job creation and in terms of money it spends on unemployment, tends to spend most of its money on things like unemployment insurance and welfare benefits and social benefits rather than spending money creating jobs. In Sweden, for example, around 2.38 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product of that country is spent in labour market programs. In this country it is around 2.1 per cent, a little less but not much less.

However in terms of how they spend it, it becomes very interesting. In Sweden about 71 per cent of the money goes into training, counselling, and other programs to get Swedes working. Around 29 per cent goes into stay at home unemployment insurance benefits. In this country it is the opposite way around. We spend 76 per cent on things like UI and benefits to the unemployed, and about 24 per cent on structural changes to create jobs.

The minister says that is a very valid criticism, and I agree. We should be changing that. I fully agree with the minister that we should be changing that and spending a lot more of our resources and a lot more of our creativity trying to create long–term jobs for workers. That historically has not been the case, and that is a valid criticism that has been made by a number of people, including I believe the Economic Council of Canada.

It is not just the government of this country that seems to be spending too little money in trying to find decent jobs and training people, but the business community is doing the same. My understanding is that the business community spends about 0.5 per cent of its payroll on training people, one–half of one per cent on training people. The United States to the south of us spends about 1 per cent, which is around double, in terms of training people.

The American economy is not going that hot either. The Americans have unemployment rates much higher than the Scandinavians or the western Europeans or the Japanese. However, in the United States they spend twice as much in the private sector in terms of training people for the jobs in a modern industrialized society.

Of course the federal government is, in relative terms, cutting back on spending in terms of retraining and counselling for people who are out there in the labour market. These are some of the facts we should be looking at as a Parliament in terms of trying to improve the situation here at home.

Also in terms of training, I look at the record in this country in terms of employment equity. We are looking at the review of that very shortly. I do not think the government program in terms of providing more job opportunities for women, the minorities, the visible minorities, aboriginal people, and disabled people has been a good one.

We passed an employment equity bill in 1985 or 1986. It was a voluntary bill that coaxes and cajoles the federally regulated companies to employ more minorities and more women. That has not worked. There are many countries around the world that make their employment equity programs more mandatory and that have targets that are enforceable. In those countries the programs tend to work but in this country it is not working.

We are also failing when we look at jobs for older workers. The older workers in this country are often the people who are discriminated against. They are not getting the proper breaks that they should be getting.

• (1230)

For a modern industrialized country, I believe the illiteracy rate is one of the national disgraces of Canada. The further east one goes towards Atlantic Canada, the higher the illiteracy rate. I think a lot of the reasons for that ties in with the lack of economic opportunities and economic possibilities which exist in other parts of Canada.

In Newfoundland we find the unemployment rate is officially at 17 or 18 per cent. One sees in many parts of Newfoundland a real illiteracy rate of around 40 per cent or more. I think that is a very sad commentary on something that is lacking in Canada.

If you look again the Economic Council report, Mr. Speaker, you will notice that one thing they are commenting on in terms of failure of the government policy over the last 20 years is the area of regional disparities.

I remember very well, back in 1968, when Pierre Trudeau campaigned across this country. He campaigned on the idea of a just society, where there would be more opportunities for people in outlying areas of this country. I remember him introducing in the House a structural change in creating a Department of Regional Economic Expansion, or DREE, later changed to DRIE.

But if you look at the Economic Council report on page 34, they point out that over those 20 years, despite the money we spent on regional expansion and regional disparities and the targeting of certain areas by governments over the years, there has been no real decline in this country in regional disparities. The difference in the unemployment rate between the parts of Canada doing the best and the parts doing the worst has not changed in any significant way in the last 20 years.

There is something fundamentally wrong, as Judith Maxwell says, with the way we organize our economy in Canada, when despite the lip service and the money we are providing to parts of this country, such as Newfoundland, many parts of Atlantic Canada, many parts of Quebec, northern Ontario and parts of the west, these mandate programs have made no real change in the narrowing of the gap between the haves and the have nots. Again, I think that says a lot about the need to have some significant change in this country.

Another thing that strikes me—the Economic Council has not been timid to mention this as well—is that we have problems with the economic structure per se in this country. When the government tries to remedy some of the problems it will make the worst situation in many other parts of the country. I refer to a recent example of the monetary policy of the Government of Canada.

The government saw a highly overheated economy in southern Ontario. The housing market was going through the sky, the economy was going very well, the unemployment rate was down. So they brought in a monetary policy to allow the bank rate to escalate to where it was more than 5 per cent higher than the bank rate in the United States.

Where does it have the most negative effect, Mr. Speaker? It has the most negative effect on the parts of this country that are the least advantaged economically, such as Saskatchewan where its farm population is barely making a living. It is one of the first parts of the country to suffer from a high interest rate policy. The small business community for which the minister is responsible, particularly in the prairies, the Gaspé of Quebec, or Atlantic Canada, is another area that suffers because of high interest rates.

As long as we have these tremendous disparities and discrepancies, the application of macro or global economic policy is going to discriminate and hurt very badly many Canadians that live in my part of the world, more so than Canadians who are fortunate to live in areas with high employment.

Mr. Speaker, we have a lot of problems that are structural. The government is not responding to those problems. If we had a meaningful parliamentary system where we could hold the majority government accountable, then government backbenchers and opposition MPs could force this government to address those problems. This is the reason why we need some serious parliamentary reform so this institution has more clout in trying to get the government to address the problems of the day.

We have serious problems that have been brought about because of globalization, because of massive technological change. We have to be competitive internationally. We have to specialize in certain things and do them very well.

As someone who comes from the prairies, I have said that for a long time. We have to specialize in things like upgrading the raw materials that come out of western Canada, or our other resources or our food. We have to develop a mining equipment industry and a farm machinery industry, things we do not do very well. But there are a lot of things that we could be doing well and should be doing well and we are not. That is the real world that is out there. But we have not been doing that. As a result we now have tremendously high unemployment.

What has been the government response? The response has been high interest rates which have driven a lot of people out of work; a free trade deal that has given up a lot of Canadian sovereignty and independence in terms of addressing our problems; Americanizing this country in terms of giving away some of the flexibility and freedom we had in the past to deal with problems of this sort. We are starting to see that exhibited now more and more.

The government is now trying to negotiate a free trade deal with the Mexicans. If this is accomplished I suggest it is going to hurt Canadian workers. We have a high Canadian dollar, partly because of the free trade deal which is making it even more difficult to create jobs. It makes our goods more expensive to sell abroad. It makes Canadian grain, potash, oil and our manufactured goods more expensive to sell, which is creating more unemployment.

We have across the way a government that perhaps lacks in imagination more than any government in the history of this country. Our country that has so many resources and so much skill and so much possibility is really going down the drain.

As I said, of the 16 countries that were studied by the OECD we rank number 15 in terms of the highest unemployment rate and that tells you, Mr. Speaker, a lot about the lack of imagination. Of the countries that were studied, as I said, by the OECD we ranked fifteenth out of 16. Only Spain is beyond us, Mr. Speaker, and that tells you a lot about the failure of this government over the last number of years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments, the hon. member for Québec-Est.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Lotbinière, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Lotbinière, of course.

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): There is a difference, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Excuse me, there is a difference but you are both Tremblays.

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): Indeed, Mr. Speaker. We will not ask the Chair to explain the difference.

That being said, and to get back to my speech, there are limits to tolerance and indulgence. Perhaps I may comment on some allegations made by the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville with respect to an OECD report that ranked Canada fifteenth out of sixteen. First of all, if I understand correctly and if my version is might, as far as I know the OECD has 24 member-countries, and in fact, I believe the hon. member mentioned the past twenty years.

Mr. Speaker, we must not forget here in Canada, that if we go back 20 years, this includes fourteen years of Liberal government. According to OECD reports since 1984, Canada, in terms of its Gross National Product, now ranks second—not sixteenth—among OECD members, behind Japan. In terms of job creation, Canada ranks first. This means that as far as job creation is concerned, Canada has created more jobs in the past five years than Italy, France and Great Britain combined.

Facts are facts. It is all very well to quote figures, but they must reflect the facts.

The hon. member also referred to training and mentioned that in Canada, 0.5 per cent was budgeted for training, compared with 1 per cent in the United States. I may remind the hon. member of the New Demoratic Party that for months, and now nearly a year, Bill C-21, one of our major mechanisms for upgrading the qualifications of the unemployed, has been delayed and in fact blocked by the Senate. When it suits the New Democratic Party, it supports the Senate's outbursts, its strategy, but then it turns around and says the Senate should be abolished. Mr. Speaker, this reminds me of the debate on Meech Lake, when the New Democratic Party said: We are not against Quebec, we are against Meech Lake.

• (1240)

Mr. Nystrom: Not me! I never said that!

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): Possibly because your familiarity with French culture has made you perhaps more sensitive, more aware of what is involved. I was referring to your party.

As for regional disparity, here again, the hon. member quoted the same report for the last twenty years. Once again, we must not forget that during those twenty years, fourteen years of Liberal government did not improve regional disparity. They made it worse, despite all the talk in 1968 by the former Liberal leader, Mr. Trudeau, about justice and a just society. However, despite Mr. Trudeau's electoral platform, we were left with a terrible legacy. On the other hand, since 1984, when this government came to power, we have had two major and extremely effective agreements: the Western Diversification agreement and the agreement with the Atlantic provinces, both of which are vitally important economic instruments. And only last week, the House voted on a very important bill, Bill C-44, thanks to this regional agreement.

I think we should be allowed a certain amount of time to make up for the legacy we received from the Liberal party. This cannot be done. I would appreciate hearing what the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville has to say.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I compared the unemployment rate in our country with that in other countries. I realize that the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development has 24 members. However, according to the Economic Council of Canada and Judith Maxwell, they did a study of 16 countries, including France, Switzerland, the United States and so forth, and of the 16 countries they analyzed—this is on page 40 of Judith Maxwell's report—Canada ranks fifteenth in terms of the highest unemployment rate. The study was done during the 70s and 80s. I don't have the figures for the last six years. However, the study discusses structural problems in this country. Maxwell also refers to the problems of the present government under Mr. Wilson and Mr. Mulroney, who have spent too much time fighting inflation. She said just that: we have spent too much time fighting inflation. As a result, we now have an unemployment rate that is still climbing. If we look at the latest figures, the unemployment rate in Canada is now over 8 per cent. In this country there are still over one million people out of work.

They drew a comparison with many other countries such as Switzerland, Japan and Norway, whose inflation rate is similar to Canada's, but these countries also have a job creation policy, and their unemployment rate is about 2, 3 or 4 per cent, not even half the unemployment rate here in Canada. Those countries have a system under which there is co-operation between the government and its economic partners.

Mr. Speaker, I recommend that my Conservative friends read very carefully the report by Judith Maxwell and the Economic Council of Canada, and her recommendations and proposals for dealing with the economy. She is against the present policies of the federal government.

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I have just three very quick questions. The hon. member quotes the Economic Council of Canada and Judith Maxwell who also supports the GST and the free trade agreement, two things which the hon. member does not support. He is very selective in quoting one sentence from a recent report.

The hon. member spoke quite well on the question of training. Does the hon. member support the emphasis in our unemployment insurance legislation now stuck in the Senate, which tries to shift some resources from simply payments to training? Does he support that thrust? That is my first question.

The second question is about small business. The hon. member's party has said it wants every company in Canada taxed. I am asking the hon. member if a small business has losses, would he allow it to carry the losses forward in order to protect it against tax in the year when it does make profits? If he does not support that, it is tremendously bad news for the small business community, especially in Ontario under an NDP government.

Third, our Department of Industry, Science and Technology has made a shift somewhat similar in response to some of the criticisms the hon. member quoted in one of his references. He said that the departments of regional economic expansion in Canada in the last 20 years have not really done a very good job in dealing with unemployment. When we took over, the federal government was spending $17 billion or $18 billion on one kind of regional expansion program after another. We took a look at these programs and found that most of the programs were paying businesses to do what they probably would have done anyway. It was a tremendous waste of taxpayers' money. We have changed ISTC from a grant-giving type of department to one that gives strategic intelligence and advice and helps companies adapt to new technology. What does the hon. member think of that new change of strategy?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, first, the minister asked about Judith Maxwell's views on the GST and the free trade agreement. I did mention those two things, but I concentrated on unemployment because the motion before the House today deals with employment. It deals with the unemployment problems we have in the country and the report by Judith Maxwell and the Economic Council is one that zeros in on unemployment and the structural problems we have. She has said that we need fundamental change. That is why I was talking about this today. I assume that is why the motion was proposed by my friend from the Liberal Party in Ontario. That is the response to that particular question as to why I concentrated on unemployment.

In terms of the specifics of the questions, the hon. member asked if I support the shift away from payments to the individuals to training. This is unemployment insurance money in the bill before the Senate. I do not support robbing Peter to pay Paul. It is a shift away from giving people adequate benefits or training.

What I am saying, and what the report and many other studies have stated, is that we should not penalize the unemployed, but, at the same time, we should be putting a lot more money into training. In other words, do not take it away from the unemployed and put it into training. Take it out of the general coffers of the Government of Canada. The private sector must put more money into training, which it does in the United States and Europe. That is what we are saying, and that is what Judith Maxwell is saying as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time is expired.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I want to take part in this debate to explain what we as a country should do to get ourselves out of the economic mess where this government has left us.

We are all aware of the serious economic problems dragging our country down the drain: 34 tax increases since 1984; an accumulated debt which has tripled since 1984; one third of our expenditures goes to pay the interests on that debt; and one of the lowest growth rate in the western world. The Minister of Finance does not want to admit it, Mr. Speaker, but we are in a recession.

The government will tell us it cannot be held responsible for that, but it is wrong. As my colleague from Etobicoke North told us, the fundamental error is that after the free trade agreement there were no adjustment measures to help employees and companies that stood to lose something as a result of the agreement. At five per cent higher than those of the Americans, our interest rates made it impossible to modernize our industries, not to mention the fact that keeping our dollar above 80 cents is a serious handicap for our export companies. As a result we lost 160,000 manufacturing jobs and Canada's agriculture has taken a turn for the worst.

Of course the government will claim that its policies were designed to win the fight against inflation, but again the government is wrong.

Allow me to recall what the Economic Council said last week about the fight against inflation: "At our own expenses we have learned that fighting inflation through restrictive monetary policies will produce results only if it paves the way for a recession, but that in turn reduces employment, investments and export sales. Therefore we should seek other solutions."

Mr. Speaker, the economic policy of this government is utterly dated, our economy is stagnant, we have lost our competitive edge, and our economic posture is decadent. What can be done? It is very simple. We must quickly reset our sights and regain our competitiveness, and it is in that context that I would like to tell you about sustainable development.

[English]

Our economy is in tatters. A dramatic reversal in government policy is required if we are to turn the situation around and it is within that context that I would like to discuss with the House for the remainder of my time the concept of sustainable development.

Before going on, let me say a couple of things about environmental protection. Environmental protection in my opinion, and in the opinion of all of those on this side of the House, needs no economic buttressing. Environmental protection is a moral value. We are part of the ecosystem. We are not dominant over it. It may have been in the earliest of prehistory, when humankind had to struggle for its very survival, that the concept of being dominant over nature was important, but surely ever since the Industrial Revolution when we had it within our power to totally destroy the planet on which we live, the concept that humankind must be dominant and must be engaged in a war with nature is one that is no longer applicable.

Environmental protection is a moral value and for that reason I do not raise sustainable development here because it needs economic buttressing. Quite the opposite. I raise sustainable development because I believe that it is virtually impossible to have a strong economy unless one takes into account the needs of the ecosystem of the earth on which we live.

Furthermore, properly costed, I do not believe that it is possible for any kind of a project—industrial, private sector, municipal, provincial, or federal—to take place that in any way degrades the environment. It is simply faulty economics to say that one can build a project and degrade the environment because the costs to successive generations will be so great as to negate whatever returns one has. If anybody in this room has any doubt about that, then I would simply ask them to take a look at the terrible scenes of pillage that have occurred in eastern Europe as whole societies tried to build an economy without taking into account the environment. Whole societies are now on the ground economically because they did not understand that you cannot destroy the air we breath, the water we drink, and expect to maintain any kind of competitiveness within the industrial agricultural process.

What is sustainable development? It has been defined by some as more of a compass than, indeed, a finite target toward which one must go. I tend to share that view. I also have always liked the definition of sustainable development that was first given to us by the Haida Indians on British Columbia's coast. They said that the environment, the earth, is not a heritage which we have inherited from our ancestors, but rather it is something very precious which we have borrowed from our grandchildren.

In more recent times, the Prime Minister of Norway, Mrs. Brundtland, defined it as development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs.

Unfortunately, sustainable development does not appear to be a part of the government's vocabulary. In the preamble and in the purposes of Bill C–78, the Environmental Assessment Review Act, the government did not see fit to put in the words "sustainable development". We are about to embark upon a new generation in the way in which we are going to govern the economy in the environment and the government does not have the decency or the understanding of the way in which the world is going, to even bring up the word sustainable development, such is their fear of coming in to the 1990s.

Over the last five years, since 1984 when this government took over in power, what have we seen but dramatic cuts in research and development for alternative energy sources. Today, less than 10 per cent of all the research and development done on energy, is done in terms of renewable energy resources. Is there no understanding on the other side of the House with regard to the needs of economy and the needs of people?

What I am expressing is not simply a personal opinion. In a report card published this summer on those nations which make up the G-7, it was stated and I quote: "How does Canada, in relationship to sustainable development, score relative to other countries?" The result is, poorly. Over all, Canada was tied with Japan for fifth place out of seven. We were behind West Germany, France, the United States, and we were behind Margaret Thatcher's United Kingdom. The reason for this is as follows: "The reason for Canada's poor performance is that when it comes to translating high-sounding principles into domestic policies, regulation enforcement and funding, the federal government"—the government that the members opposite represent—"really falls down." In other words, we are good at espousing principles such as sustainable development, but we do not yet possess the national political will to translate such principles into effective domestic action.

That is the problem that we have faced in the country since 1984. This government has not had the political will or the leadership to bring this nation into the last decade of this century. How can the government be so short-sighted? Sustainable development applies to every single field of economic activity. It applies to agriculture. The Canadian farmer is struggling. Farm debt is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have nine minutes remaining in his debate, plus 10 minutes of questions and comments.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

CANADA POST

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, for over a year and a half the people living in the Atlantis Housing Complex at 143 Ryland Avenue in Bible Hill, Nova Scotia, have been fighting to get door-to-door mail delivery to their homes. All the units have separate sidewalks and similar service comes all the way up to their units and then past them to the next houses.

Because of a very small technicality, these people, many of whom are seniors, have been denied door-to-door service. In the last several months I have been in touch with officials at Canada Post many times regarding this issue. Although they have been accessible and co-operative, my constituents still do not have a satisfactory resolution to their problem.

This case is now under its final appeal and I urge the post office officials to apply common sense and extend this service to 143 Ryland Avenue.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, over the last few weeks we have heard a lot of talk about democracy and the supremacy of the will of the people. The GST debate is a case in point. It is no secret that the people of Canada overwhelmingly reject the GST. Over 80 per cent of all Canadians oppose this regressive tax, and the number continues to grow. In fact, from my riding of Nipissing alone, I have received well over 6,000 protest cards on the GST and how it will escalate the cost of such basic services as hydroelectricity.

Despite this opposition, the government is continuing to push ahead, regardless of what the people believe. Who is being undemocratic here when the will of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance can prevail over the will of millions of Canadians? How democratic is it when people with incomes of $100,000 or more pay

$1,600 less in income tax today? How democratic is it when corporations get their taxes cut, only to have them shifted to a segment of the population that is being hit with 32 separate tax increases?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Lethbridge.

STANDARDS COUNCIL OF CANADA

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to ask other members of this House to join me in congratulating the Standards Council of Canada on 20 years of outstanding service.

The Standards Council is actively involved in international standards work through the International Organization for Standardization and the International Electrotechnical Commission.

Members of the House may be interested to know that these two organizations recently conducted a global survey to forecast needs for the future. The study attracted 2,700 respondents in 40 countries, including 100 from Canada, representing a broad cross-section of industry, academia, government and standardization experts. The results, Mr. Speaker, are interesting. Respondents identified cancer diagnosis, nuclear waste disposal and environmental protection as the areas of highest urgency.

It is fitting, therefore, that these two international organizations have selected the environment as the theme for world standards day, which is being marked on Sunday, October 14. I am pleased to join with other members of the House in congratulating the Standards Council and its record of service these past two decades—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, as November 1 approaches, Canadians who make their living from the sea, fishers, shore workers and their families across the country are facing a devastating winter. The cause of this crisis is our own government with its blind determination to gut the unemployment insurance system while sacrificing the needs of Canadian workers.

Last November, the New Democratic House leader asked the Minister of Employment to introduce legislation for the variable entrance requirements. In a callous disregard for the plight of seasonal workers and workers in areas of high unemployment, she refused.

Had the minister followed my colleague's advice, representatives of fishers and shore workers from the west and east coast would not be here today scrambling to avert a disaster.

The New Democratic Party has opposed Bill C-21 because of the harm it will cause. The minister is well aware that had she brought forward legislation last fall for the variable entrance requirement, we would not be in the mess we find ourselves in today.

I call on the Minister of Employment to give up her childish policy of her way or no way, because we know in this instance her way is wrong. Avert a disaster. Withdraw Bill C-21. Bring in the variable entrance requirements now.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, the government has consistently given support to grain farmers under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and the Advance Payments for Crops Act.

A further step to aid farmers with their cash flow problems would be to reintroduce interest free cash advances. I am encouraged to hear that a working meeting of farmers, industry and government representatives was held in Winnipeg on October 5 to consider this matter. That this meeting did take place is reassuring news to all Canadian farmers.

I urge the group to present their recommendations as soon as possible.

PALESTINE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the bloody events in Old Jerusalem this past weekend have prompted a stronger call by the international community for a just solution of the Palestinian situation.

This type of violent activity can no longer be tolerated and should be dealt with immediately by the Security Council, with the full support of the Government of Canada.

As we approach the annual United Nations debate on Palestinians, I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to urge all members of the Security Council to accept, if offered, a resolution calling for an international presence, either in the form of UN observers or officials from the office of the Secretary General.

It is only in this way that attempts to tie the invasion of Kuwait to a settlement of the Palestinian question can be pre-empted. The international community can then work further in solidarity against force and aggression toward a peaceful and permanent solution of the Palestinian-Israeli situation.

Listening to both Palestinians and Israelis this summer, I know, Mr. Speaker, that both sides want peace. The international community should help set up the process to achieve a lasting peace.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Public Works is planning the construction of a parking lot and a shopping mall under the Parliament of Canada, at the cost of $68 millions. Many people are opposed to that because of the environment, on the grounds that the historical character of the buildings must be preserved, and so on.

Mr. Speaker, with that money, we could build 136 shelters for incapacitated senior citizens, 250 youth centers as well as housing for the poor across Canada.

I am against that project. I already have an outdoor parking spot on the Hill, like all factory workers in Canada.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Prime Minister announced to the Commonwealth ministers responsible for women's affairs how much the Canadian government is doing for women. What a surprise this is for the women of Canada! Particularly offensive is his assertion that his government is dealing with violence against women, which is a serious problem in every country of the world, and Canada is no exception.

Today, women gathered on Parliament Hill to display 150 banners dealing with the reality of women's lives. Nearly a majority of them were about violence against women. In Canada, one out of every two women seeking refuge at a shelter for battered women is turned away because of lack of space. Thirty-seven per cent of the murders in Canada are related to family violence. Almost 100 women a year die at the hands of men they live with or have lived with. This government's policies—cuts to women's programming and capping of funds for battered women's shelters—are costing women their lives. This, Mr. Speaker, is the reality for Canadian women.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr Speaker, few would argue that skills training will play a vital role in Canada's future economic growth and competitiveness. Yet, too often, we overlook the fundamentals. Basic fundamentals—basic literacy and numeracy skills—are the foundation for skills development. We must then begin with the basics, basic skills and their formation.

Canadians recognize that the seeds for skills development occur during childhood. Such an observation adds to the appreciation of our children as our most vital resource. Our children must receive greater attention.

The successful completion of the world summit for children is a good starting point, helping to focus attention on the urgent needs and problems of our children.

With the creation of the children's bureau and the pledge that the welfare of our children will be a high priority, I, like the families and children across Canada, look forward to the initiatives which will arise from this agenda.

If we are going to progress and have the basic skills to compete, our children must be a higher priority. In this light, I readily applaud our government's commitment to do so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the lessening of tension in Europe has led to a decision to bring 1,400 NATO troops back to Canada. More recently, there has been a Soviet–American agreement to reduce troops and military hardware in Europe. This will facilitate a further Canadian withdrawal of its NATO forces, which number 6,200 army and air force personnel.

It is time for the Department of National Defence to do some serious re–examination of its policy on base closures. For example, where will the 2,000 air force personnel be stationed when they come back?

The Department of National Defence now has an opportunity to correct or at least partially correct the error made in closing CFB Summerside and leaving Prince Edward Island as the only province without a military base. Leaving 413 Squadron, Search and Rescue, in Summerside will complement the helicopter repair business being recruited to locate on the base, will encourage the location of similar types of industries in Summerside, maintain Search and Rescue in its proven best location and show that DND has the ability to adapt to changing world realities and implement policies which make military and economic sense.

NATIONAL RENOVATION MONTH

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress again the enormous importance of housing in this country, both as a material and social asset.

Canadians in general are well housed, but our houses are getting old. More than 20 percent of all houses in Canada are now over 40 years old, and this will increase to 50 percent by the end of the century. Many of these houses, which are an important source of affordable housing, will need major repairs. In fact, some 10 percent of our apartments are already in need of serious attention.

The month of October was designated National Renovation Month in Canada. The federal government, through Central Mortgage and Housing Canada, will work together with the renovation industry to protect and promote this important national investment.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Canadian Home Builders' Association and the Bank of Montreal for their role in raising awareness on this important issue.

HEALTH

Mr. David Berger (Saint–Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in June in this House I raised the question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare's $4 million cut to the budget of the National Health Research and Development Program.

Over the summer I was in touch with leading researchers and learned firsthand of the damage caused by these cuts. It is important to understand that this is the government's only program for funding applied health research, which includes preventive health care, health promotion, disease prevention, work place hazards, cancer prevention and native health care.

As incredible as it may seem, all innovative health care research has been put on hold or permanently cancelled by this short–sighted government. One University of Quebec researcher affected by the cuts proposed to study the risks of cancer due to asbestos exposure in the general environment. The Minister of National Health and Welfare knows as well as anyone that it is far less expensive to prevent cancer than to treat it.

I urge the minister to restore the funding for health care research now.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Chalk one up for Mother Nature, Mr. Speaker. This fall the Adams River in British Columbia has witnessed the largest migratory run of sockeye salmon in 77 years. Twenty–one million sockeye returned from the Pacific Ocean to begin their 560 kilometre odyssey to the spawning beds along the Adams—proof positive that environmental conservation and restoration programs do work.

The run, still only one-tenth of the size that it was at the turn of the century, will continue to rebuild as long as man continues to remain vigilant to the necessity to clean up his act. What better way to build environmental awareness than to celebrate this annual occurrence?

The federal ministers of environment and fisheries should seriously consider the construction of a permanent historical exhibit, highlighting a salute to the sockeye along the banks of the Adams. As well, the government should redouble its efforts to enhance salmon fisheries throughout the entire Fraser River watershed through the development of community hatcheries and a thorough clean-up of the river.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, another business has fallen prey to the Conservative's free trade deal.

The American-owned Olan Mills photo finishing plant in Kingston, Ontario, announced this summer that it will be closing its doors by year end, throwing a total of 94 people out of work. The photo finishing done by this plant will be taken over by the firm's U.S. operations.

With this closure, we are one again witnessing the export of Canadian jobs south of the border. When the Prime Minister promised that the free trade deal would bring employment and prosperity, he neglected to mention that the employment and prosperity would be going to places like Michigan, New York and Wisconsin, not to Ontario.

The government should hope that the people of these states are eligible to vote in the next Canadian federal election because without their votes, this government has as much chance of forming itself into a new government after the election as a branch plant has of remaining in Canada.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party wants to take a broad axe to Canadian social programs by cutting spending 10 to 15 per cent right across the board. Reformers want to thank veterans by chopping their pensions by 15 per cent. Reformers want to pay tribute to our pioneers by chopping old age security by 15 per cent. Preston Manning will charge each pensioner a $200 user fee for health care, that is after chopping it by 15 per cent.

How many hospital beds will be closed by these policies? How many fewer hip replacements will be performed? Our seniors deserve more, not less. To reduce spending we need a deft Conservative scalpel, not a bloody Reform broad axe.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

JUSTICE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

On October 2, speaking of his unwillingness to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the government's use of section 26 of the Constitution Act to appoint the eight additional senators to force through the GST, the Prime Minister said:

> —the government has received the full assurances of the senior legal advisers of the Crown, that all the actions that we have taken have been pursuant to the statutes, convention and appropriate custom.

On the next day, the Prime Minister said:

> —the Government of Canada has already acted pursuant to advice it has received from the most senior law officers of the Crown.

This morning, the government's lawyers told a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada that they were not ready to proceed to argue the point today and that they needed another two weeks.

If the matter had been so fully researched and thought through, if the matter was so clear on the legalities some two weeks ago, why was the government not ready to argue the point in court today? Why was it seeking a delay?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it will come as a surprise to the judges on the Supreme Court of Canada to hear that we were in front of them this morning, because we were not.

We were in court in Ontario pursuant to a number of applications, one of which I might add was dismissed. The lawyers for the Government of Canada took the position that the case should not be argued today but should be given some delay partly because other parties were in fact served at a very late date. I understand that members of the other House received notice yesterday. It was the view of the Government of Canada that all parties who were to be involved in the applications should have full and fair notice.

The hon. member will be aware of what kind of notice that should be. In fact the Government of Canada is prepared to make its arguments at any time.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice says that the government is prepared to make its arguments at any time.

If that is the case then I ask the Minister of Justice: Why won't she refer this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada today? Why does she want to allow the doubt and uncertainty to continue? If she is serious about being ready, refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada today. I give her that challenge.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we are not uncertain about the matter, and that is why we are not referring it to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the governement is as certain as indicated by the Minister of Justice, why did it ask the Superior Court of Ontario for two week's delay? Why is the government not ready to proceed with this case today?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, because some of the parties were advised about these proceedings only yesterday and we want to be fair to all of them.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Canadians have been deeply disturbed by the violence and bloodshed that have taken place in the holy areas of East Jerusalem yesterday.

Could the minister tell us if Canada as a member of the Security Council is taking any initiatives to help move toward a just and lasting settlement, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs outlined yesterday, based upon resolutions 242 and 338? In particular, are we still supporting the motion of a UN presence or team to go to Israel to investigate those circumstances?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will share the concern I expressed on behalf of the government yesterday at the events in East Jerusalem, which are dangerous at any time but particularly dangerous given the circumstances in the Middle East now. I think that the energies of all of us must be deployed to try to ensure that a cycle of violence which erupted there again is contained and that elemental problems are solved.

There is a meeting of the Security Council in progress now. There is a resolution before the Security Council that would call for a presence of the United Nations to conduct a specific inquiry in the region. It would be the intention of Canada to support that resolution.

I may have to absent myself during Question Period for telephone consultations with other foreign ministers as part of an attempt to try to ensure that we might have a resolution that could command the support, if not of all members of the Security Council, at least the Permanent Five and the majority including Canada.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, taking into account the worsening situation that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just described, Canadians are also concerned about reports this weekend that Canadian ground forces are being prepared for possible deployment in the gulf.

Can we have the assurance of the government that there will no deployment of any further ground forces or any Canadian forces into the Middle East or the gulf area, without the sanctioning of a United Nations resolution and without the approval and consent of this Parliament?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is debate in progress in this House now initiated by this government the first day Parliament was back. While there is no absolute legal requirement for the House to come to a vote on the matter, it would certainly be helpful to the government and to the flexibility of Canada if that vote were taken. I understand that opposition parties are reluctant to have the matter come to a vote, and I regret that because I think it would be helpful to our—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Excuse me, Mr. Speaker. This is an important question—

Mr. Riis: Where did you get that idea?

An hon. member: You're not in the Senate now, Nelson.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): It may not be both opposition parties. It may simply be the New Democratic Party that is reluctant to have the matter come to a vote.

I have indicated before that the Government of Canada intends to continue to use all of the resources of Canada in a way that will lead to a peaceful solution to the situation in the gulf, including the withdrawal by Iraq from Kuwait.

We naturally expect to consult as fully and completely as is possible with Parliament. The hon. member knows that sometimes events develop very quickly. I have given him my assurance on an earlier occasion that if something develops that requires immediate consultation when the House is not physically sitting, I will be in touch with him and with his counterpart in the Official Opposition to ensure that there is advance notice of what Canada is contemplating.

THE SENATE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Never before in the history of Canadian Parliaments has so many well-heeled corporate business types owed so much to one man.

The latest transfusion of bluebloods to the other place has Mr. Trevor Eyton, holding 26 directorships; Claude Castonguay, holding 16 directorships; and recently, when things got hot in the other place over the GST, the Bank of Montreal called in its chips and sent Mr. Allan MacEachen off consulting in Brussels.

In light of the fact that Senate directorships run the gamut from banks to pork bellies, I want to ask the Prime Minister as we look at this newest infusion of bluebloods in the other place: will he keep his promise, which he made in 1985 following the fiasco of Sinclair Stevens, that he will introduce and have passed effective conflict of interest laws that will govern both the Senate and the House of Commons?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I noted that my hon. friend pointed out with some enthusiasm the presence of successful business people from the Liberal and the Conservatives Parties as the newest members of the Senate, but he neglected to mention the member of the NDP, the hon. member for Kamloops, who distinguished himself in the Senate on Friday of last week.

An hon. member: Thursday.

Mr. Mulroney: On Thursday or Friday of last week. Right there, Mr. Speaker, right there on the floor of the Senate was the member for Kamloops, encouraging very strongly what the Liberals were doing. Yet on Friday he was in the House of Commons on his feet on a question of privilege saying what the Liberals had just done was absolutely outrageous.

I want to welcome him back from the Senate. We missed you, Nelson. Don't leave us alone any more.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Save yourself from the senators. Some of the people who were appointed to the Senate recently are men and women of accomplishment across Canada. There is an aboriginal leader from Alberta, a woman from New Brunswick, and so on. They are all very successful people. I know that the NDP is offended by the notion of success and accomplishment, but I will continue to appoint successful people to the Senate unless my hon. friend indicates a preference himself.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. I want the Prime Minister to know that Canadians far and wide are not so jocular about the jigging and jogging that is taking place in the other place.

The Prime Minister knows well that there is legislation that is before this House. There is the privatization of Petro-Canada. There is the deregulation of financial institutions. There is a communications bill. Yet we have Mr. Twinn on the board of directors of Petro-Canada. We have Mr. Castonguay, Mr. de Nino, and Mr. Eyton on the boards of directors of financial institutions. We have Senator Pat Carney on the board of directors of Rogers Cable.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this, and he does not have to go down to the Senate. He can do the same thing he did the other—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put the question.

Mr. Rodriguez: Did the Prime Minister ask the new senators to give up their directorships so that there would be no apparent potential conflict of interest as perceived by Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, at the Meech Lake meeting of the first ministers I proposed the abolition of the Canadian Senate. It was not fully endorsed at the time.

We then brought about fundamental reforms in the Canadian Senate as a result of the Meech Lake discussions. Indeed, had Meech Lake passed in June we would now be on our way to British Columbia for the first of a series of meetings which would result in a thoroughly reformed and elected Canadian Senate, to which this government is committed.

I can give my hon. friend the assurance that the appalling display of misconduct by the Liberal senators has set off a wave of revulsion across this country and will result, I am absolutely certain, in a completely reformed Senate of Canada.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, surely the Prime Minister is not suggesting to Canadians that the way to reform the other place is to put a whole pile of business men with obvious and potential conflicts of interest into the other place without the proper legislation that controls such potential conflict of interest.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to call them in and ask them to resign as directors.

Mr. Saint-Julien: In the unions!

Mr. Rodriguez: And in the unions.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr Speaker, this House and the Senate will eventually adopt a piece of legislation under which people who sit on boards of directors of unions or financial institutions which may be in a conflict of interest with the legislative provisions will have to make a choice about their career.

The government has brought before Parliament this very important measure on conflicts of interest, and I am confident that my friend will want to make sure that all members and all senators respect the provisions of this bill once it has been signed by the Governor General.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

The third meeting of the Commonwealth Ministers Responsible for Women is being held in Ottawa this week. Violence against women is on the agenda. Two Canadian women are killed weekly by their partners. Domestic disputes and wife battering are on the increase. Statistics show that sentences for men convicted for spousal assaults are minimal, if at all.

What concrete action will the Minister of Justice take to ensure that abused women are protected by our judicial system?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question because it is an issue of grave concern to all Canadians, not just to Canadian women.

The government's program with respect to family violence spans a number of different departments. It is a $40 million initiative. I am pleased to respond with respect to what the Department of Justice is doing.

The Department of Justice has made the protection of women from violence a major focus of its work. This includes reform of the Criminal Code. The law governing sexual violence was amended in 1983, and the department is assessing the impact of those changes.

In addition, we are analysing measures to deal specifically with violent pornography. We have funded research to other projects; for example, a television program to inform the general public about the existing law of sexual assault and an evaluation of programs for men who batter their spouses or lovers.

Also, in the area of policy development, the department has set up a departmental committee to develop policies relating to women, especially violence against women, and it participates in an interdepartmental committee developing policy on family violence.

With respect to the administration of justice, the department has provided support for conferences and seminars designed to sensitize justice professionals on sex equality issues, especially as they relate to violence against women.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for her very comprehensive report on what her department is doing.

I think that action has to speak louder than words. I believe it is time that the Minister of Justice brought the attorneys general of the provinces together to amend the Criminal Code to protect women.

Will the minister take this action immediately?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, at the federal-provincial meeting of attorneys general in June at Niagara-on-the-Lake, a decision was made to form a federal-provincial task force on women and the law.

One of the first things I did was invite the provincial attorneys general to participate with me. I indicated that I would host a federal-provincial conference on women in the law which, I hope, will be held in the late spring of 1991, with an agenda formed by this federal-provincial task force. The thrust of that conference, I hope, will be threefold: women in the legal profession, women in the courts, and the substantive law as it relates to women. I think this will provide a very timely opportunity for us to work on the federal-provincial level to address the very questions that she raises. I might add that they are excellent questions and I share her commitment to them.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Justice.

P.O.W.E.R., a Winnipeg based community group has been praised by the Commons justice committee as being a model project for helping women. Yet it was forced to close its doors several weeks ago because of a lack of public funds.

Will the minister commit herself today to helping this organization get started again?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am unaware of the issue which the hon. member raises. I would be very pleased to review it to see if it is appropriate for our department to be involved in it. I cannot give you an answer beyond that.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for her answer. I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

P.O.W.E.R. is helping women who are prostitutes who wish to get off the streets to do so. This was an issue raised and reviewed in the justice committee and one that concerns women in several cities.

I would like to ask the minister today if she will take the initiative to see that projects like this are sponsored across the country.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General which raises a similar issue is a very good one. It makes some very significant recommendations with respect to dealing with the root causes of the problem of violence against women on the streets.

I can only say that I have not had the opportunity to review it with enough depth to come forward with policy proposals. I respect those recommendations and I respect organizations that are involved in dealing with the problem that way. I hope to be able to bring forward positive initiatives to this House before too long.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It deals with the shock Canadians received this weekend while reading the newspapers. In a time of restraint and serious government cutbacks of critical programs, particularly social programs, Canadians were informed that the Government of Canada is soon going to send out a 16–page, three–coloured propaganda brochure to every household in the country.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, surely this is an error. Will the Minister of Finance tell the House and the people of Canada that the government is not going to spend hundreds of thousands of taxpayers' dollars to send out a three–colour, 16–page propaganda brochure to every single household in the country.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it may interest my hon. friend that there have been some 384,000 phone calls made to the GST information number seeking out the very information that is in this brochure, as well as in the one that we sent out in May of this year.

The hon. member talks about the cost of this. It works out to 13 cents a copy. That is a quarter of what it costs to go out and buy The Globe and Mail here. I think this is a very cost–effective way of responding to the concerns that people have. It responds to their questions in an open, frank and direct way, providing information to give direct answers to questions.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Finance obviously knows, only one–half of 16 pages are devoted to the goods and services proposal.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: The rest is filled with absolute garbage. It is government propaganda. At a time when we are cutting back on women's programs, when we have tens of thousands of children lining up at food banks, when we are having serious cuts to native programs and social housing programs, is this the way the government feels it should be spending taxpayers' money?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what we have tried to address in this particular document is the broad range of economic policies that must be followed if we are going to be able to finance the social programs that my colleague wants to have.

That is why on page 1 we talk about the importance of this country maintaining and building its competitive position so that it can trade effectively and create the jobs here at home. We talk about the importance of having a skilled workforce as part of the major part of our economic plan, about how people who are unemployed can get training.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that it is important to get the bill on unemployment insurance reform through the Senate so that we can continue to provide these programs. Many people have asked about how taxpayers' dollars are spent. That is precisely what this document tries to do.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. He says that the people of Canada are going to get accurate information from this particular pamphlet it is distributing.

I wonder if it is the same kind of information that has been rejected by the CBC as being ill–conceived and inappropriate. It has been rejected by the Advertising Council of Canada because it is false advertising.

Has the Minister of Finance made sure that the information in this brochure is more accurate than what he has already provided Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I invite my colleague to read the document himself. He may find that it is absolutely accurate and he might also learn something by doing so.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker.

Now that the minister has had more than six months since he tabled his budget in the House, can he tell us whether he is still sticking to his forecast concerning interest rates? Does he still think that the deficit will be less than $30 billion, of has he come to grips with Canada's economic reality and will he table a new budget to reflect that reality?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know very well what economic reality is in Canada. I have been presenting a very clear, open and honest picture of what to expect from the economy, as set out in my budget of February this year. My colleague is probably not aware that I made a speech on September 17 in Edmonton where I set out clearly what we expect for the balance of this fiscal year. The questions that he has just posed were answered fully in that speech.

AIR CANADA

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Persistent reports indicate that Air Canada is planning massive lay-offs of upwards of 2,000 to 3,000 people.

Given that deregulation has moved our air industry closer to monopolization, and given that the government is preparing to negotiate an open skies agreement with the United States, is the minister not concerned with this dramatic down-sizing of our largest Canadian air carrier, which may be a premonition of things to come for the entire Canadian air industry?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will be aware that deregulation has vastly improved the number of routes, the number of flights that are available to Canadians, has increased the number—

Mr. Allmand: Where? Name one.

Mr. Lewis: Why don't you try Sudbury? There were two flights before deregulation and now there are 17.

My hon. friend knows that from time to time all companies go through rationalization. What my hon. friend is doing is reacting to headlines and pure speculation. I invite him to wait for the actual facts.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the fact of deregulation is that two Canadian air carriers have basically gobbled up most of the regional air carriers. Most communities in the regions no longer have jet service, thanks to the deregulation policies of this government.

Given that the predicted number of lay-offs at Air Canada are very disturbing, what kind of adjustment programs is the minister prepared to introduce to help these and future displaced workers in the Canadian air industry. Can he assure this House that communities in the regions will not be isolated as a result of such massive and disturbing cutbacks?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): I suggest to my hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, that as a result of deregulation the communities do not have less jet service, they have better air service. That is what all the communities wanted and what they got from deregulation.

As far as pure speculation is concerned about what lay-offs what company might have, I suggest to my hon. friend he has got the plane in front of the pilot.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for ACOA.

On three separate occasions my New Democratic colleagues have raised serious questions about this government's involvement with Technitread and now there is an RCMP investigation under way. This is but one of a litany of horror stories connected to this minister's department.

The minister said he would accept full responsibility if mistakes were made. Well, mistakes were made. When will he do the honourable thing and resign?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised at the tenor of my friend's questioning. It is really out of left field.

I told his colleagues from Nickel Belt and Essex—Windsor that I respected their acumen as regional development critics. As a result of what they indicated at committee I stated that I would have a second look at this particular project. I did that. There was no further public funding for this project.

I explained to my colleague from Nickel Belt that I would tell him what the purchase price was. He was of the erroneous impression that it was $1 for the property which was part of No. 26 colliery. It was $250,000. Also, there is a lien on the equipment of this company for $1 million held by ECB. While this project is in trouble, I want my colleagues to know that I did take responsibility. I did cut off the funding. I ordered my officials to do this.

I am a little surprised that the member opposite seems to take such obvious delight in attributing a lot of horror stories to an economic development agency that has done so much for an area in Canada that needed it so badly.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of taking delight in horror stories. It is a question of making sure that public funds are well spent. In this case they have not been well spent. There are any number of occasions in which they have not been well spent in Cape Breton and elsewhere.

My supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister and it is about ministerial responsibility. The minister said, and I quote from the committee proceedings: "If there has been a mistake made, I will take full responsibility." There clearly have been mistakes made, the minister has admitted that there have been mistakes made. Does ministerial responsibility not mean anything any more? Is it not time the Prime Minister removed this minister?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if my colleague equates taking responsibility with doing the right thing and doing what his colleagues advocated as being cause to resign, that indeed is a new concept of ministerial responsibility.

Again, I repeat that ACOA has, with the understanding of colleagues from his party and from the Liberal Party, made modifications to some of the rules that govern economic development. It should be noted by the House that well over $1 billion has gone into Cape Breton, through various programs of assistance, all well deserved.

What we are trying to do is find out how we can get a better return for our investment and do a better job of regional development planning. This is why we have recently obtained the services of Mr. Tony Brait, a respected Newfoundland businessman, to do a comprehensive assessment of what we have been doing right and what we have been doing wrong in Cape Breton. I hope we will have the support of all colleagues opposite in this regard.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works.

Last week, Le Droit reported that your department planned to build a parking and shopping centre under Parliament Hill, and that this project would cost $68 million.

Would the minister agree this project is useless, since all members have outside parking space like any factory worker in Canada and we have more important priorities on our minds?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will tell the House that this is a discussion paper that was circulated widely by some people who apparently are seized with an edifice complex.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacKay: While there may be need for increased parking and other facilities, I am not particularly impressed with this concept. I want to assure my colleague that no moneys have been appropriated, no decisions have been taken and I, for one, am not too impressed with this concept.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. The government recently announced that Canada will participate with Mexico and the United States in discussions intended to lead to the negotiation of a North American free trade agreement.

Will the minister confirm the statement of the United States trade representative that the three countries have agreed to the end of January, three months from now, as the deadline for determining whether Canada will be at the table?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that in this negotiation we have the support of the Liberal opposition in the House, as was shown by the statements made by the members for Broadview—Greenwood and LaSalle—Émard.

I can say this: There is no deadline but we would like to settle these preliminaries by January or February, if we can. But there has been no deadline set and of course these are only preliminary discussions to ensure that we can agree on an agenda and the modalities for such negotiation, if it occurs.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, given the current levels of wages, working conditions, and environmental abuse in Mexico, will the minister identify which labour-intensive industries in Canada will be hit the hardest by Mexican competitors? Has the government yet undertaken any sector-by-sector studies of what adjustment assistance will become necessary to help Canadian workers and Canadian industries?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am appearing before the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade this afternoon and I invite all members and spectators who might want to come to attend.

We are not concerned about wage levels alone because, of course, wage levels alone are simply one item in the factors that affect competitiveness.

• (1450)

The greatest competition for this country lies with the United States, the European Community, and Japan—the highly industrialized, high wage countries which have the research, development, and technology to compete with us—not low wage countries.

We are not going to follow the advice of the NDP and cut off all trade with the developing world so that the developing world will never become developed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In his absence, I will ask the associate minister to respond.

The minister knows that world wheat prices are the lowest in 60 years, so low that in fact the Canadian Wheat Board can hardly make sales on the international market.

How can farmers pay their bills this year when the Wheat Board is not able to make many sales on the international market and the prices are the lowest since 1930? What is the government going to do to help these producers?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I would say, first, that the $500 million we put on the table this last spring was the response of the federal government to the needs of the farmers in Canada.

We asked the provinces to share the burden with us, because we think agriculture is a shared responsibility in Canada.

The other reason is that at the international level we worked, since the Prime Minister's speech in Tokyo, to put agriculture on the agenda of the world's trading nations. Since that time, we have brought agriculture as the first priority so that all countries reduce their subsidies in this field.

In these last few weeks before December, what we have done and what we are going to do to help farmers in the west is to make all countries around the world realize that those subsidies are just destroying agriculture.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, grain farmers are facing the worst cash flow crisis in their history this fall with practically no markets and very low prices.

How can a farmer even meet his direct out-of-pocket production costs of some $65 per acre, when he can only deliver $11 per acre? That results in a loss of some $54 per acre. What is the government going to do?

The government did away with interest free cash advances last fall. There is no cash flow from the sale of wheat. When is the government going to act? What is it going to do?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that the government has done everything it could to help farmers, not only this year—We have spent billions of dollars to meet the most pressing needs of Canadian farm producers. To a certain extent, we did so to protect them against the negative impact of this subsidy war between the United States and the European Economic Community, which has forced our farmers to sell their grain at a ridiculously low price. That is why we have made representations on the international scene to make people more aware of the situation and, once this price war has been stopped, restore fair prices that will be far more helpful for Canadian farm producers, both in western and eastern Canada.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

The Minister of Science and Technology has just today opened National Science and Technology Week by hawking posters which tell Canadian youth: "We need your imagination."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCurdy: Meanwhile, using the deficit as an excuse, the Minister of Health and Welfare has made a nearly $4 million mortal blow to the National Health Research and Development Program, which is a program intended to save health dollars through science. I understand further outrages are on their way.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: Is it that we are going to need youth's imagination to see this government's imaginary science policy?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if I may answer on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I would just like to tell the hon. member that since we came into office in 1984 health and welfare research combined as a whole has increased dramatically. That is what we have done since 1984.

In the Centres for Excellence, we have also put in $240 million and, through Bill C–22, we made a $100 million transfer from the federal government to the provinces for medical research. That is what we have done for research in Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, in fact, the record will show that the government's share in research in the country has fallen and that the ratio in regard to the GDP has fallen.

My question to the Minister of Science and Technology is, what is his intention with respect to the government's matching program for the granting councils? That is an issue that is of serious concern. I want the Minister of Science and Technology to deny that those moneys that are in the granting councils now will not be used for some other purpose beside supporting basic research in the universities.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my hon. friend, both with respect to his previous question and this one, that the granting councils last year received the largest increase in the whole of the Government of Canada.

With respect to the matching funds, we have always made it very clear that the matching funds would not disappear. They are an integral part of what the government is trying to do to bring science, the universities, and industry, close together for the benefit of the economy of the country.

WAR MEASURES ACT

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

October marks the twentieth anniversary of the War Measures Act in Quebec. The Canadian government apologized to Japanese Canadians for using the War Measures Act against them and paid compensation totalling several million dollars. My question is this: Is the Canadian government, on this twentieth anniversary, prepared to apologize to the people of Quebec for imposing the War Measures Act and jailing 500 people without a warrant, and is the government prepared to offer a certain amount, as compensation for this unfair treatment, as they did to Japanese Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has already done better than that. About two years ago, the government completely revised the War Measures Act to ensure that the events of 1970 would not happen again. I think that is—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: And furthermore, I can inform my hon. friend that on the weekend, I called Mrs. Françoise Laporte to transmit, on behalf of the government and the Canadian people, our profound admiration and deep affection for her and the members of her family.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. It is about the cut to the National Health Research and Development Program.

The top priority of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the government ought to be to provide the best possible health care to Canadians while controlling or reducing costs. Yet, the minister has cut the only program which funds innovative health care research in Canada and since 1984, contrary to what the minister answering for the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said, this program has been frozen and will now be reduced by $2.5 million as a result of the cut to this research program.

Will the minister restore funding for health care research which, for example, would study the methods of encouraging the elderly to get vaccinated against the flu?

• (1500)

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that the budget for the Medical Research Council of Canada has increased by 9 per cent in this last fiscal year, bringing it up to $216 million.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danis: Second, as I said a minute ago, when this House passed Bill C-22 thereby making available $100 million to the provinces for medicine research, his political party blocked it in the other place. So we are doing something about research. The Official Opposition is not.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning all the hon. members in this House. Those of us who truly care for our heritage are concerned, and rightly so, by the prospect, as reported in the press, of an underground parking and mall being built in front of the Parliament.

First, Mr. Speaker, the officials in Public Works may have had serious plans that the minister knew about, but the opposition members certainly knew nothing and were never consulted.

Second, Mr. Speaker, the issue concerning all the hon. members is that we have been portrayed in the press as——butchers of historical sites. I would like to bring to the attention of the House that this caricature of the members of Parliament, indicating that we were in favour of such a plan, is totally ridiculous. Mr. Speaker, as it is the responsibility of the Board of Internal Economy, it would be in the interests of this House and all members that you make a statement on this matter as soon as possible.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, had the hon. member been paying attention during Question Period, he would have heard the minister responsible say that in fact he does not like the idea, does not support the idea, it is an idea somebody else raised.

The point of privilege was undoubtedly heard by the hon. member's constituents and I am sure they will applaud him for raising it, but it was totally unnecessary.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre. I am not persuaded that the matter is a point of privilege, but the hon. member has, I think, made a point and I am sure that there are other ways to deal with it.

The hon. member for Ottawa West.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a point of privilege arising out of Question Period on October 4 last, and the notice I gave you at that time that I intended to rise on this point of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, on that day three different comments by government members unfairly imputed motives to me and accused me of suggesting impropriety on the part of senior public servants and starting a rumour regarding a public servant who had no right and no forum in which to defend himself.

I deny categorically the motives imputed to me. I have nothing but the highest respect for the integrity of those who serve the Canadian public. To say otherwise is to undermine my credibility and my ability as opposition critic for Public Service employment to represent in this House the interests of Public Service employees, many of whom are also constituents whom it is my duty to represent.

Mr. Speaker, if anything, the question was prevented from being put, and I think your own comments in Hansard make it clear, whereas the comments from the Prime Minister, the House leader and from the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley may have suggested that I was suggesting something other.

I think your own words, Mr. Speaker, make it clear that there was some question as to whether I was leading in an improper direction. However, the question I was prevented from putting would have made it absolutely clear that my intention was to ensure the ongoing integrity of the Public Service by questioning why the Public Service Commission has been allowed to become non-functional and effectively defunct. That is effective today.

It is clear that government members—and I will be happy to amplify on this in detail—are attempting to construct an atmosphere, perhaps to filter perception by inferring motives, as was done three times on that day.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mrs. Catterall: Rather than the words being spoken, it is the interpretation being put on them that is guiding what members are hearing in this House. Such attempts to colour the perception of the public and other members are not infrequent, and I question whether they are accidental.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, my right to speak freely in this House, to represent the constituents that I am here to represent and to have my credibility with those constituents based on what I say, not what other people have imputed to what I have said, was undermined by what happened in the House on October 4.

I am quite prepared to amplify. I want to make simply one more point. A comment was made in this House following Question Period by the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley that very clearly said that I had started a rumour regarding a public servant who had no right to defend himself. That member was allowed to make and to complete that comment not on a point of order, not on a point of privilege, but simply as a comment.

An hon. member: It is on the record.

An hon. member: It is in Hansard.

Mrs. Catterall: Subsequent to that I was not able to complete my point of privilege so that I could challenge that statement and so that in fact I could challenge the statement of the Prime Minister that I had suggested impropriety on the part of a senior public servant.

Mr. Speaker, I know that you have had the opportunity to review Hansard. I ask you to consider whether both the Prime Minister and the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley might be asked, as you have done on other occasions when imputations of motive were made against members and when their credibility was under attack, to consider whether they might want to clarify the statements they made at that time; whether those were appropriate comments to have been made under the circumstances; and whether my having been denied the opportunity to ask a second perfectly proper question may not have been influenced by the comments made by the members in the House—

Mr. Speaker: Wait a minute. Wait a minute. The hon. member has been given a lot of leeway. She rises on a point of privilege. The point is whether or not motives have been imputed. It puts the Chair in a very great deal of difficulty if she is now suggesting that the Chair's conduct was in any way affected by anything that was said. I think the hon. member would want to leave that alone. I have listened very carefully to what she had to say. The hon. House leader.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure we need to deal with this at great length because the question which gave rise to the concerns of the hon. member for Ottawa West was her question on October 4, where, quoting from Hansard at page 13803, she said:

> Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The very day Mr. Peter Lush resigned his patronage appointment as chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission because of information revealed in this Chamber, and before the law firm to conduct the investigation in the whole affairs was even named, Mr. Glen Shortliffe was moved out of his position as deputy minister of transport and into the Privy Council Office.

That leaves in my mind the implication that somehow this move by Mr. Shortliffe was related to a desire that the facts about the Hamilton Harbour Commission not be brought to line. That is the clear implication from this, to which the—

Mr. Speaker: The House has listened very patiently to the hon. member for Ottawa West in putting her point of privilege. I think that the House also ought to listen to the reply.

Mr. Andre: —to which the Prime Minister replied that in fact the move of Mr. Shortliffe to associate secretary of the Privy Council Office was on the advice of the secretary of the Privy Council, Mr. Tellier, and that it was a part of the normal movement, that Mr. Shortliffe in fact was in essence being promoted, brought back to the centre because of the talents and abilities he showed.

As the hon. member knows, this is not a Public Service Commission appointment. It is an order in council appointment. Deputy ministers are employed at pleasure, if you will, and are appointed by the Governor in Council. That is what the Prime Minister said: Please do not implicate Mr. Shortliffe in terms of some sort of alleged cover-up or hinted at cover-up, that in fact he is an outstanding public servant who has been moved into this new position of authority and that it is simply wrong and a discredit to him to suggest that somehow this movement is related to the issue of what happened at the Hamilton Harbour Commission. It was in that regard, to protect Mr. Shortliffe's reputation, to see that in no way, shape or form was his change of position within the government in any way related to an alleged or hinted or suggested cover-up, so that the facts would not be known and so on. It was in reaction to that.

If the hon. member is now saying that in no way was she suggesting that Mr. Shortliffe's move had anything to do with the Harbour Commission and it was unfortunate that those two paragraphs of her question happened to come one after another and they were two different subjects, well then she should merely stand up and say that. I am sure that everybody on this side will say: "Fine, we agree with that. We agree that there is no effort to disguise the facts, cover up any facts in terms of the Hamilton Harbour Commission". There is also no effort to move any public servant because of that. Mr. Shortliffe is still a member of the Public Service of Canada serving in a very high position and the Prime Minister was doing nothing more than to make sure that there was no alleged suggestion or hint allowed to remain out there that somehow this is related to a cover-up.

That is what this is all about. The hon. member should not take offence at that defence of the Public Service by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West in brief reply.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. House leader has simply repeated the error made. At the time I asked the question in the House, I had no knowledge that anybody had recommended the appointment. If he reads Hansard on page 13804, he will discover that it was not the propriety of Mr. Shortliffe's actions that the Prime Minister suggested I was impugning but the propriety of the Clerk of the Privy Council. I had no knowledge as to who might have recommended an appointment or if somebody had, only that the Prime Minister made an appointment and, therefore, I was certainly not imputing any motives to anyone. I was simply commenting on an appointment by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West has raised for the second time a matter which has given her a great deal of difficulty. I should make it very clear that the other day I did interrupt her on a question, and there is always difficulty when the Chair interrupts because sometimes the Chair can interrupt too soon. However, I suggested to the hon. member that perhaps she would want to discuss the matter with me, that she certainly would want to look at the "blues" and that her right to carry on her question of privilege would remain.

I confirmed that with the hon. member this morning. She has raised the question. I have the point and, having listened to argument on both sides, I will return to the House when it is appropriate to do so. I thank both hon. members.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. Earlier today when you asked me if I had the question of privilege, I was not aware it was going to be raised today. I thought it might be tomorrow.

It is a most important matter of privilege. It is a practice—

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure the hon. member that I would not want to delay a question of privilege unless the hon. member wished it delayed. I was put in a state of confusion. However, the hon. member is now rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege regarding a practice that has come to light from a Crown corporation. It is a practice which, if continued or expanded either to other Crown agencies or to other areas of government, would lead to the erosion of both the independence and the rights of individual members and of the House.

In particular, I refer to a letter that I received dated September 14 from Government Affairs of Canadian National Railways. It is a letter I believe most, if not all, other members of the House received. It opens by saying:

> Dear Mr. Fulton:
> It has come to CN's attention that some of our pensioners have begun a letter writing campaign to members of parliament regarding the indexing of pensions.

Then it says:

> For your easy reference, I have enclosed a draft—

It also ends the draft by saying that the letter is available on a five and a half inch floppy disk for users of Word Perfect.

The letter needs to be put, just in terms of a few sentences, on the record. I think you will see quite quickly, Mr. Speaker, that the practice which has been undertaken by CN—I think perhaps meaning well in hoping to cut down in the work of members of the House—in fact does something quite different in that it could lead the offices of some members to send back an answer that is both erroneous and contains false information to CN pensioners across this country.

It starts by saying: "Dear xxx so that you can type in the name of the person who has written to you from your constituency. Then it says:

> —your pension is guaranteed for life. The CN pension plan also has a very fair spousal benefit, which is also guaranteed.

It carries on at some length and concludes by saying:

> It appears that CN pensioners are being treated fairly by all concerned. I hope this letter helps clarify matters for you.

The concern that I have is: first, without me soliciting any information whatsoever from CN, it has on its own decided that because there may be some CN pensioners somewhere in Canada writing letters to MPs, it will draft a letter on its own from a corporate perspective, put it on a five and a half inch floppy disk and make it available to 295 members of Parliament to respond to their constituents with information that is neither correct nor in any way appropriate to responding to the individual concerns of the constituents who are writing.

It is important for the record. I have been involved, perhaps because of the nature of my constituency, in hundreds of CN pension cases over the years. In almost every case, cases that resulted from deliberate actions taken by CN to withhold or to deal inappropriately with—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has made his point. He has received a letter which apparently all hon. members have received from the Canadian National suggesting a reply that might be sent to CN pensioners.

The hon. member says that this could or might create a situation in which I take it the hon. member's or other hon. members' privileges might be affected.

First of all, I point out that wherever this came from it does not seem, nor is it alleged by the hon. member, to have come from any government department or from a minister of the Crown. While it may very well be a complaint, I think all of us at times have received recommendations from one group or another to write letters to the government or to other members of Parliament with respect to certain matters of concern to whomever brought the matter to our attention.

It may well be that in some circumstances offence may be taken to it. There may be very well a question of debate as to whether a Crown corporation ought or ought not to be doing this, or whether or not it is a matter for a minister of the Crown to intervene in, but I think that that is a matter primarily for Question Period and a matter for debate.

I think I have to say that under the circumstances I cannot find that it is a question of privilege.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege and also on a point of order, in the sense that as of today this House, which usually relies on the Public Service Commission of Canada for its duties in protecting the merit principle, has to put up with a situation where the commission in itself does not exist any more. In other words, the commission has one commissioner only, not the three required by law, and therefore cannot function. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to think of the importance of this situation.

The Public Service Commission tables a report annually in this House, answers to Parliament and, as such, protects the merit principle and protects Public Service employees that we all have in our riding. As of today, there is only one commissioner. The law requires a quorum of two, at least, to hear appeals, to hear grievances, and to make appointments to senior levels.

This House has to take notice that we are at this time without a commission and therefore paralysed in so far as protecting the rights of individuals across this land who work for us as government employees and who deserve better than negligence. Untold disorder will occur when there is no order in the Public Service Commission at this time.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised a matter which is obviously of great interest to this House. However, I would ask the hon. member or other hon. members, if it is to be raised further, to bring it up at another time.

Depending on the answer that is or is not received, it may be appropriate to bring it back to the Chair, but I just say to hon. members the matter has been raised; there it is. I am sure it is a matter which is not unknown to other hon. members or necessarily being taken lightly, but it is not appropriate to proceed as a question of privilege or a point of order. However, there certainly may be other ways to pursue it.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, can I ask for some clarification on that. If the commission reports to Parliament and if it is directly accountable to Parliament—and I have been told several times in the House that the minister who tables the report on behalf of the commission is not answerable to Parliament for the commission and that only the commission is answerable to Parliament—may I ask what your role as Speaker then is in ensuring that accountability to Parliament is maintained. At the moment that accountability does not exist. Not only is the chair vacant, a second position has been vacant for over a year. The chair is also the chief executive officer. This means that the commission now has no chief executive officer either.

Mr. Speaker: I will check carefully the request of the hon. member. I think there may be some misunderstanding as to how the body of which she speaks reports. If there is any way in which it is the responsibility of the Chair, I shall report back to the hon. member and to the House.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacLaren (p. 13900).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the House recessed for the luncheon break, the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard. He has nine minutes remaining in debate, plus ten minutes for questions and comments.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, when one o'clock was called, I had just finished reading from an international report which basically said that the reason Canada is not pursuing sustainable development is simply that this government lacks the requisite national will.

The question is: How can this government be so short-sighted? Does this government not realize that sustainable development applies to every field of economic activity?

In the case of agriculture, the Canadian farmer is struggling. Five major droughts in the prairies in the 1980s have certainly brought home the effects of climate change. The contamination of groundwater, the result of fertilizers and pesticides, is but the tip of the iceberg as are indeed the concerns about food safety. It is clear that this nation needs new arrangements to secure a food system that is both economically and environmentally viable.

Turning to forestry, properly managed forests will bring together two seemingly irreconcilable objectives, economic and environmental. On the one hand is the preservation of the basic resource for our largest export industry. On the other are the benefits of biological diversity and wildlife habitat. An improperly managed forest simply means that we in this nation will face a race to see who will suffer most: the next generation's jobs or the next generation's ecosystem.

The point is that you simply cannot have a strong economy if you do not make protection of the environment your number one priority. If there is any doubt about this, then I would simply ask the members present to look around and take a look at what we and our international partners and competitors have done with the fishing industry.

The issue is: wherein lies the problem? The problem lies with this government. This government believes that sustainable development is simply a cost as opposed to the prevention of a cost before it occurs. This government indeed looks upon sustainable development only as a cost and fails to understand the tremendous opportunities that are involved.

I would suggest to members on the other side of the House that they take a look at West Germany and ask themselves why it is that West Germany is both the environmental leader of Europe as well as the economic leader of Europe. It is no coincidence. One follows the other.

When will this government begin to understand the demands, the needs, and the opportunities of the 1990s? There are many solutions to the degradation of the environment, all of which have positive implications for the economy.

Is it a coincidence that Japan has cut its consumption per unit produced of fuel by 30 per cent? Is it a coincidence that Japan has cut its material usage by over 43 per cent? Japan does not necessarily have the best reputation, as I discussed earlier this morning, in the world in terms of environmental matters; but in terms of the development of its own economy the Japanese have understood the application of sustainable development to industrial development. It is in the process of winning the battle, while we under this sterile government are losing the battle.

Turning to new technologies, 20 per cent of the world is in the process of polluting it for the other 80 per cent. Over the course of the next 30 years as the Third World or the developing world begins to improve its standard of living, it too, if it follows our lead, will begin to pollute. As the population of the world doubles from five billion to ten billion, the problems without the development of new technologies will simply become unbearable.

This is an enormous opportunity for a country like Canada to take the lead, to build a whole new industrial base, not on the provision of arms as others have done but on the creation of new technologies to win the ultimate battle, that is the battle for the preservation of this earth.

[Translation]

The environment does not bear only a social cost. It also provides a magnificent opportunity to lay a new industrial base, as the United States did in 1910 with the automotive industry and both the States and Japan did between 1945 and 1950 with computer technology. We could take the lead in industrial development. The time is right. Now we need to be imaginative. We need initiative.

[English]

In conclusion, I began by talking about the economy. I began talking about some of our problems. I now end having talked about sustainable development and the tremendous opportunities that it provides. Let us never forget that the protection of the environment is a moral value. It needs no economic support. Preservation of this planet is the essence of what humanity must fight for over the next 25 years. Let us also realize that sustainable development provides us with the opportunity in regard to our economic dilemma. It gives this country the chance to lay a whole new industrial base and pick up where we have often lost. It gives this country the opportunity to show the moral leadership that the world so requires. It gives this country the opportunity to show the kind of moral leadership that national unity requires if, indeed, Canadians are going to believe in something beyond themselves.

• (1530)

The issue is, are we as a nation up to the challenge? I believe we are. We believe in this planet. The time has now come to take the lead in preserving it.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully, as did all members of this House, to what the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard had to say about the opposition motion, and I intend to deal right away with the focus of the hon. member's comments: the importance of sustainable development policies for the future of our environment and our ecology.

The hon. member for LaSalle—Émard is right when he refers to the importance of protecting our forests and our environment and of having development policies that will protect our environment in the future. However, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the hon. member when he criticizes the government's so-called failure to act. There are limits to what can be— I thought the hon. member made an excellent speech and a very eloquent one. However, I do not agree when he says the government has a miserable reputation in this area.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member described this government's lack of leadership with respect to sustainable development and, at the same time, expressed himself in critical terms regarding Bill C-78, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. And why, Mr. Speaker? Because the preamble does not contain the words "sustainable development". What does the preamble contain? It says this:

"WHEREAS the Government of Canada seeks to achieve an appropriate balance between economic development and the preservation and enhancement of environmental quality—"

Mr. Speaker, what is this supposed to be, if not a definition of a procedure for achieving sustainable development! It is even better than the words "sustainable development". It goes even further. A procedure is defined for achieving sustainable development. A little further on in the preamble, it says this:

"—the degradation of environmental quality at the same time ensuring that economic development is compatible with the high value Canadians place on environmental quality."

Mr. Speaker, it is easy to wax eloquent and say that—

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): It's an old speech.

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-78 has been tabled in the House to replace an old order in council issued at the end of 1984 by the former Liberal government because at the time anything to do with the environment was dealt with not through serious legislation, but by way of last-minute orders in council when the government knew it was going to be turfed out. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard should make these fine speeches before his leader Jean Chrétien who, during over 20 years, let Consolidated Bathurst management pollute one of the Mauricie's most beautiful river, the St. Maurice river, without ever denouncing them. He was rewarded with a seat on the Consolidated Bathurst board of directors shortly after leaving politics.

Mr. Speaker, my question to the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard is quite simple. He claims that Bill C-78 shows how very little the government cares about sustainable development. The Liberals have yet to come up with an alternative to the GST bill, so what kind of proposition does the hon. member have in mind to improve Bill C-78?

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my colleague for his comment. If he agrees so much with me, I wonder what he is doing on that side. You are welcome to join us because we are the only party really willing to defend "green" concepts in this world.

What changes, did you ask? For one thing, I would not be afraid to mention sustainable development in Bill C-78. You are right, the preamble does touch on many things. But the question is: why is it not mentioned? Why be so afraid to use the word and its definition which is now internationally recognized?

You also asked for a few examples of improvements. First, I would mention sustainable developmentt in the preamble. Second, when we look at section 4, which states the purposes of the bill, we clearly see that the government has no intention to implement sustainable development. It reads: "The purposes of this Act are to ensure that the environmental effects of projects receive careful consideration before responsible authorities take actions—, to encourage responsible authorities—, and to ensure that—" That is all jargon. No concrete purpose is stated and sustainable development is not mentioned, even among the purposes of the bill.

Come to think of it, what justification could there be for Bill C-78 besides implementing sustainable development? I believe that the fact that sustainable development is not mentioned in this document shows again how backward this government is with regard to the evolution of the Canadian policy.

[English]

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to be able to take part in this debate today because I think that when we look at it, 1990 will go down in history as a major turning point in world history.

The scope and range of the developments of the past 12 months really rival anything we have seen since the Second World War. We are on the verge of a new era that may seem threatening to some people, but I like to look on it as offering magnificent opportunities for countries and firms prepared to master the challenges we now face.

We in this government intend to meet those challenges not by being negative, but by building a strong co-operative partnership between government, the private sector, and provincial governments to exploit the competitive opportunities of globalization.

Let me review how quickly things have changed in the past year. I guess the most significant one is the total collapse of the U.S.S.R. They have a bankrupt ideology, ethnic tensions. The ideology of state ownership was obviously not working so something had to be done. Now we see the logic of the market principles.

This magnitude of change has been underlined with the destruction of the Berlin wall and the very real rush for eastern European countries to move in and try to set up democratic governments similar to ones we see in the western world. The unification of Germany took place just a few days ago. In the other end of the world we see the reversal of 40 years of apartheid in South Africa. We admire the courage of the people in Latin America who are now throwing off the wasted governments of dictatorship and corruption and are pushing for democracy and freer markets. Of course, we see Mexico moving in this direction to a freer market economy.

Across the Pacific we see Japan and the four tigers, and now the emerging cubs of Malaysia, Thailand, Indonesia continue to outpace growth everywhere in the world. Inter-regional investments are leaping the national frontiers and moving into these other countries.

Finally, the economies of Europe have discovered with renewed fervour the promise of co-operation and open borders. The second half of the 1980s marked a renaissance in the European ideal leading to the stirring prospect of a strong and united European market for close to half a billion people in the next few years—half a billion people, a strong market. A free market—a free movement in those areas.

It is exciting both politically and economically. It is an exciting time for everyone interested in building on Canadian strengths through new or expanded trade investment and technology ties.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a time for wringing hands and deploring the lost opportunities of the 1960s, 1970s and the 1980s, but a time to build on the promise and success of what we initiated in the 1980s.

We are a government that is acutely aware that we must look outward and forward, rather than inward and backward. Our policies must respond to these challenges and seize the opportunities because failure to grasp these emerging opportunities for Canada in the global economy in this decade of the 1990s would doom Canada to second class citizenship status. This government will not make that mistake.

We know these global forces and developments mean that Canada will face increased competitiveness as well as tremendous opportunities in years to come. This government will elaborate an ever more sophisticated and complex approach to our trade and industrial policies and to our trade relations. We will build on the achievement of the past six years. We will adapt our policies to meet the constant challenges posed by rapid global developments.

We know the challenges we have to be aware of—continued globalization of industries through the investment decisions of multinational enterprises. These multinational enterprises now produce and sell their products wherever they can reap the greatest advantage.

We accept the increasing importance of the investment and service sectors complementing the more traditional resources and manufacturing sectors. We are aware of the increasing risk, largely due to the United States Congressional protectionism and heavy handedness, of a shift to unilateralism, with key decisions of trading issues being reached by a bilateral basis along the Washington-Tokyo and the Washington-Brussels axis, with the interests of smaller players like Canada, sometimes ignored and forgotten.

We recognize that the Gulf crisis has hastened development of a potential third global energy crunch which, if not well managed, will undercut new opportunities. We realize that the greater integration of eastern Europe into the global economy will place great strains on available capital—capital, of course, is the engine of growth—and increase political pressure for more debt relief.

We know that debt relief also represents an awesome challenge for both developing and developed countries. The total debt load of developing countries now surpasses $1.3 trillion, with little immediate prospect that the trend can be reversed.

Many LDCs remain mired in slow growth, poor trade prospects and continued corruption. We know that. We recognize the challenge that this presents for this government.

On a brighter note, however, Mr. Speaker, we are pleased by the new market orientation of many Latin American economies. It is an encouraging sign that there remains potential for growth in the development world.

Finally, we are alert to the emergencies of the environment as an economic and trade related issue because our fragile environment calls for responsible trade and industrial policies. At the same time, we will need to be wary of green protectionism, the abuse of environmental principles with restrictions that meet narrow protectionist ends rather than environmental protection which we see starting to emerge and restrictions aimed at responsible forestry practices where Canada can be particularly vulnerable. We have to be careful of those things.

The rapid pace of change that we have seen makes everyone a little uneasy. It makes Canadian citizens a little uneasy. They are fraught with risk, we know that. I prefer to see it as filled with promise. The challenge is to respond constructively and thus exploit the opportunities for growth.

It is too easy for the critic opposite to throw up assertions that we need his constructive analysis of these changes and a co-operative approach to mastering them. That is what we need, we need co-operation.

The conclusions we draw and the policies we erect are critical to Canada's ability to grow in this new interdependent, highly competitive world. The world is shrinking. The last time that the world faced such momentous change was more than four decades ago. The result was a bold new global system to create order out of the chaos of 15 years of depression and the Second World War.

Based upon an unselfish United States commitment to liberalism and multilateralism, institutions like the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, known as the GATT, and the United Nations brought about the greatest increase in economic and political well-being in the history of the world. If we can keep the risk in check, 1990 offers potential to unleash another round of similarly creative forces, forces that achieved so much in the 25 years after 1945.

Canadians will have to accept the globalization of the economy and the pressures of market realities cannot be ignored. At best their impact can be delayed for only a short period.

No government can long develop its trade policy or its domestic economic agenda in isolation from the realities of the global marketplace. This is what previous Liberal governments did in the sixties and the seventies. They followed a policy that sought to isolate Canadians from the international economy. The result of course was the decline in our competitiveness.

This government is determined not to repeat the mistakes of our predecessors. For a middle power like Canada, our commitment to the principles of reciprocity, non-discrimination, and transparency cannot be over emphasized. It means that a stable, open, non-discriminatory, global economic system must remain our number one goal as we adapt to a rapidly globalizing economy. It means that we must recognize that liberalized trade is a two-way street. Canadians not only benefit from open, secure access to foreign markets, but Canadians also benefit from foreign competition in their own market.

The challenge of competitiveness is the best medicine for any business. One only has to ask Northern Telecom, Alcan, Spar Aerospace, Lavalin, or any of the hundreds of successful Canadian companies which have found that meeting the competition at home means beating the competition abroad.

The government is acutely aware of the importance of creating a spirit of entrepreneurship. We understand the critical role of international trade to Canadians. Indeed, October is export month and our ad campaign is aimed at making Canadians more aware of the importance of our international trade effort to their jobs, to their incomes, and to their economic well-being. The ads are in a language even the opposition should understand. We are responding to the competitive challenge at home and abroad with the following priorities. I will outline them briefly.

We will pursue and enhance access to our major market, the United States, which we gained through the free trade agreement and through the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

We will continue to push strongly and constructively for a substantive and large conclusion to the multilateral trade negotiations in Geneva.

We will continue to explore with our European trading partners how we will jointly build the right kind of instruments to ensure that Canadian entrepreneurs will be able to reap the benefits of the European Renaissance symbolized by 1992.

We are prepared to build on our initiatives towards Latin America, going beyond our OAS membership and a free trade agreement with Mexico, and build new partnerships throughout Latin America.

Finally, we will continue to pursue policies and partnerships that will ensure that Canada will be a major player in the Asia/Pacific region.

We are working on these priorities with much intensity through the Departments of External Affairs and International Trade.

There are challenges that exist when these things happen and we know what the challenges are. The challenge of the 1990s is to get our house in order. Today's debate places the spotlight on this critical issue. I thank the opposition for creating this opportunity. I deplore, however, their negativism. We, in Canada, must speak with one voice, a voice that tells the world that Canadians are confident about their future. We cannot continually allow the negative comments that come forward strictly for the political agenda to mar the opportunities that face us in the future.

More than ever, we must attain the national agenda that we have before us. It is critical to the achievement of our international goals.

Since 1984, the government has sought sustained, non-inflationary economic growth. We have pursued a productive employment strategy, creating more than one million jobs. In the past year alone, our policies have resulted in a net increase of over 150,000 jobs.

I know you are signalling me about my time, Mr. Speaker. I would like to carry on because there is much more to say. I would like to address for a moment the Economic Council of Canada.

In the Economic Council of Canada report, one always hears very isolated facts. I have heard it from the opposition. The Economic Council of Canada states clearly that controlling inflation "is a policy objective that benefits Canadians in all walks of life—In a sense, inflation control is a public good, and this means that all Canadians should contribute to the avoidance of unnecessary pressures on prices and costs."

That observation succinctly summarizes a critical element of the policy thrust of the government. The fact is, through 1989 and into this year, underlying inflationary pressures were significant. These pressures were taking their deadly aim on costs, on workers whose jobs would be lost when their products were priced out of markets, and on all Canadians who depend on fixed incomes.

For example, during the second quarter, total unit labour costs—a critical measure of a country's competitiveness—were growing at an annual rate of 6.6 per cent per annum. That is not only a rate higher than in 1989, but half again higher than in the U.S.

As well, through the first quarter, borrowing both by consumers and business—another measure of inflationary pressure—continued to advance at a rate reflecting an overheated economy. In April, consumer credit was up 12.4 per cent over the same period in 1989, more than double the American rate. Mortgage credit was up 17.1 per cent, a growth about two and a half times faster than nominal income growth in Canada.

The government has acted on its obligation to use the levers available to ensure that these dangerous and destructive forces were not allowed to proceed unchecked. In such an environment, as Minister Wilson has said: "Interest rates had to rise. With the strong inflationary pressures and demand for credit already present in the economy, it would have been irresponsible to reduce the cost of credit." This would only have encouraged further inflationary demands that would have been financed by a greater accumulation of corporate and personal debt. The inevitable result would have been explosive rounds of wage and price increases leading to an even more pronounced and longer-lasting slowdown that we currently face. We saw that in the early 1980s when inflation rose to double-digit rates. Then we had double-digit unemployment and interest rates rose to 22 per cent or 23 per cent.

This is not a might-happen scenario I have outlined, it is what did happen in the late 1970s, as inflation and interest rates soared. The consequence, as we all should remember, was the 1981-82 period with double-digit unemployment.

This is not the prospect Canadians face today, fortunately. Yes, we are going through a period that does involve pain and hardship. The government's policies, which we have been pursuing since the start of our mandate six years ago, have positioned us so that Canadians will not suffer the truly drastic and destructive economic conditions of the start of this decade. We are now in a position to weather the current storm and emerge stronger and more prosperous. This is surely what all Canadians, including my hon. friends in opposition, desire.

There are a number of other areas in which the council report and the direction of government policy are consistent. The council, for example, supports the direction of the government's unemployment insurance reforms, away from income support and toward job retraining. Similarly, the council supports the kind of decentralized approach to regional development that the government has adopted through bodies such as ACOA.

I want to thank you very much for allowing me to participate. I would be happy to answer any questions which might come from the opposition.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member's intervention and what he said about sustainable development.

I wonder whether the hon. member would like to comment about sustainable development as practised by his government in the field of energy and natural resources? Would he comment about the fact that Canada has so far failed to ratify the Law of the Sea at the United Nations? That is a very important piece of legislation that would protect resources in the oceans.

Would he comment about the fact that over the last four years the Government of Canada has virtually eliminated energy research in the field of renewable sources of energy? Would he comment about the fact that over the last four years the Government of Canada has increased its dependence on fossil fuels, thus exacerbating for a long time to come the problem of climate warming because, as we all know, the consumption of fossil fuels leads to the production of greenhouse gases?

Would the hon. member comment about whether he is aware of the fact that the government is not spending one penny in the promotion of energy efficiency, which also makes good economic sense? Nevertheless, it is not being promoted in the budget of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Therefore, on that front, we have nothing positive to say, as he urged in his speech, to show a united front to the world? How can we if we have nothing to report that is positive in relation to the reduction of our dependence on fossil fuels, in promoting energy efficiency, and finally, in promoting alternative sources of energy? Canada has a tremendous endowment for a renewable source of energy, particularly in biomass. For that also we have no message to give to the rest of the world because the budgetary restrictions and cuts have eliminated these types of initiatives on the part of his government. Would the hon. member care to comment?

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, one of the things that we faced when we took office in 1984 was program spending that was increasing at approximately 14 per cent year after year after year.

I would like to bring to the attention of my hon. friend that the hon. Minister for International Trade, who was at that time Minister of Finance in the short lived government, brought in a budget, a budget in which he identified very clearly the problems that we would be going to be facing if we did not come to grips with the debt and a deficit that presently existed. He then put forward in his budget that he was going to increase the price of gasoline by 18 cents a gallon across the country.

We all know the result of that budget. We all know that it was defeated in this House of Commons irresponsibly by the Liberals and the NDP. In 1980 they went across the country and decried the budget of the hon. Minister for International Trade that was going to attack the deficit and the debt directly.

What I am suggesting to my hon. friend is that because of the economic situation that this country faced in 1984 when we as a government got a look at the books and saw the drastic position we were in, it was impossible for us to continue on with the programs. We had to cut program spending, which we were able to do, and we brought program spending down to 3.5 per cent. It was an unprecedented turnaround in the economy of this country, one that we had to do. You cannot do the kinds of things that that member over there is crying out to do when you have not got the money to pay the debts and pay for the programs of this country.

In 1984, we were actually borrowing $16 billion to live. We were not borrowing it just to pay the interest on the accumulated debt. We were borrowing $16 billion to pay old age security, to pay our health care programs. We were borrowing from foreign nations to live in this country because of the wild, irresponsible spending of the Liberal government between 1980 and 1984, and even previous to that.

Mr. Speaker, that member stands up and says we are not spending enough money on all of these programs. We are not deserting those areas. We are still doing the research, but we are doing it in a more reasonable way and one that we can afford. We cannot afford the unreasonable, irresponsible kind of spending that went on with the Liberal government that brought us into this mess that we are in today.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, as you will recall, this morning I had indicated to you that I had spent much of the last five days travelling throughout my constituency, talking to farmers about the plight on the western prairies.

Firsthand I saw the piles of grain being dumped in yards throughout the entire western prairie countryside that I was visiting. In my constituency alone, I am sure there is not a single farmyard that does not have a pile of grain sitting in it because the system is not moving. The grain system is not moving the grain from the elevators to the ports for whatever export markets there might be.

That aside, Mr. Speaker, a lot of the farm people that I have been talking to have been telling me that in addition to higher grain prices, they need the interest-free cash advance. If their grain is not moving because the system cannot move it, the only way they can gain assistance is through loans from the banks. In fact, all of the national farm groups have called for the reinstatement of the interest-free cash advance.

My colleague from Athabasca drives through a lot of farm country to get to his home every weekend when he goes to visit his constituents. He must realize the difficulty that the farm population has throughout western Canada.

He talked at some length in his speech about government policy and the net increase in jobs that government policy has created. I tend to look at the net decrease in farm jobs that government policy has created.

I am convinced that government policy, removing the interest-free cash advance, is going to further increase the number of job losses on the farm and off the farm in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba.

Earlier today during Statements by Members, the colleague of the hon. member for Athabasca. the hon. member for Wild Rose, called for the reinstatement of the interest-free cash advance. I am wondering what the position of the member for Athabasca is on the interest-free cash advance. Does he support reinstatement of the same?

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, what a short memory we have.

This government, with the leadership of the right hon. Prime Minister, for the first time in the history of this country was able to bring the number one agenda item to the GATT, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. It is being discussed now.

For the first time we are seeing the disruption in the farm community being addressed by working on and reducing the subsidies that the European Common Market and the United States have for the agriculture industry.

Having said that, my hon. friend mentioned that we could not move grain across the country. Certainly, we can move grain across the country, but there are no markets. The markets are dwindling because of the grain trade war that exists between the United States and the European Common Market. We all know that.

The hon. member asked me about support for the farmers in the agricultural community. Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you that no government in the history of this country since Confederation has been more generous and more supportive to the farming industry in Canada than this one.

Billions of dollars have gone into the agriculture industry, literally billions. The member also stands in this House and condemns the goods and services tax. Does he not recognize that the goods and services tax will put over $.25 billion into the farmers' pockets by the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax.

That member goes around, talks out of one side of his mouth and then the other. The prairie advances and those kinds of things, just watch us. Just watch and see what happens. This government has never deserted the farmer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it seems to me that you should look closely at the watch. There is still one minute left for questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I look very close at the watch. I have given him exactly 30 seconds over the time allotted.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should say at the outset that I want to divide my time today in this most important debate between myself and the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell because we both have a specific area that we want to touch on.

I rise to speak briefly on the motion presented by my colleague:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure to provide Canadians with policies designed to assure full employment through international competitiveness and consistent with the principles of sustainable development.

Indeed, it is a most opportune time to take stock of just where this government is and where it is leading us through the current round of GATT negotiations.

The government seems bent and bound to avoid a debate in this House on these issues, and in fact has been quietly dismantling the support mechanisms of our marketing organizations while negotiating away the legislative base of our dairy organization and poultry marketing agencies that have brought stability to both the dairy and poultry sectors.

This government has been negotiating away the powers that were given by legislation passed in this House by elected members of Parliament. It has conducted secret negotiations behind closed doors in the GATT and in the free trade agreement. The government is undermining the programs that have served this nation well, and which are indeed the envy of the world.

In fact, when the Canadian documents were tabled in Geneva just over a week ago, we knew that they would provide both the measures of support and tariff equivalent calculations. These are suggestions put forward by the U.S.—the aggregate measures of support or the differences between the domestic price and what the world price is—and are identifying the difference as subsidies. The tariff equivalents are a series of tariff reductions that will be phased out over a period of 10 years, whether from 30 per cent down, 3 per cent per year, or from 40 per cent down, 4 per cent per year.

The dairy industry and poultry sectors of Canada should be exempt from these calculations or measures because they clearly do not make any sense for industries that operate a planned production system in compliance with Article 11 of the GATT. But the exemption from the GATT was not addressed in the Canadian document. Rather, the Canadian position was that Canada should receive a credit to reduce the aggregate measure of support, but this is not acceptable.

The dairy industry has rejected the calculations of the market price support. The basis for 86 per cent of the aggregate measure of support calculation is simply the difference between Canadian milk prices and world prices. In this situation, world prices are simply U.S. prices, in close proximity to the Canada–U.S. borders. These prices for the aggregate measures of support of $2.2 billion are clearly misleading, and the government should admit this error and apologize to the dairy farmers of Canada.

The only direct subsidy for the dairy industry is $266 million for industrial milk and is designed to keep the consumer price of cheese, yogurt and butter at a low level. This subsidy only represents 12 per cent of the price received by producers for industrial milk and, of course, we have no subsidy on fluid milk. The aggregate measures of support are based on the false premise that production costs are equal in both Canada and the United States.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the dairy farmers of Canada have shown, beyond a doubt, that Canadian input costs are much higher and it is beyond the power of the Canadian dairy farmer to correct these differences. In fact, just this weekend, I gathered prices from a friend and a constituent of six major input costs on a dairy farm. They are shocking. These are differences between the cost of an operation in Middlesex county in Ontario and an operation in St. Clair county in the state of Michigan. Let me just cite those six examples.

First, let me give an example of the interest rates. The difference between the amount of interest, paid over a 10-year period on a $100,000 mortgage, between Ontario and the United States is $14,690, in favour of the American farmer. That is a difference of 22.4 per cent more interest that the Canadian farmer has to pay compared to his American counterpart.

Gasoline costs $1.35 per U.S. gallon and there is a tax rebate sent to the farmer on an annual basis, provided he buys gasoline with a 10 per cent ethanol content to make sure that he shows concern for the environment because ethanol–based fuels are less polluting. Gasoline, delivered to a farm, in bulk, as of Thursday, was 54.9 cents a litre. The difference between that price and the U.S. price, converted to U.S. gallons, is 61.6 per cent higher in Ontario. When it comes to fertilizers, there is a difference of 20 per cent per tonne in favour of the American farmer, again.

When it comes to dairy feed, there is a shocking example of a dairy supplement with 40 per cent protein. Again, these are two comparisons, made not more than 70 miles apart, one in Michigan and one in Ontario, and the Canadian price is 73 per cent higher in Ontario than it is in the United States. Machinery parts is another example. A package of six Case International French bottom plough points costs $115 Canadian in Emmett, Michigan. Those six points, made by the same company in Exeter Ontario, are $143.70, a difference of 24 per cent.

When we speak of veterinary supplies, the cost is 200 per cent higher in Canada. I am speaking here specifically of penicillin and streptomycin. In the United States, a 250 cc bottle sells for $19.55 Canadian, while a 100 cc bottle in Ontario costs $24, a cost difference of over 200 per cent.

While our government is working toward increasing the import levels allowed into Canada under the GATT, it is interesting to note that on November 1, 1990, 11 of the major milk producing states in the U.S. will be starting a system of production management or, as they call it, inventory control. Michigan, Wisconsin, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Minnesota, Iowa, California, Texas, Washington, and Indiana are the states involved. This amounts to about 80 per cent of the milk produced in the United States with 1989 as the base year.

Just as the Canadian government is committing a sin by even talking about dismantling supply management systems, other countries like the United States and Europe are starting to see the necessity for the survival of their food growers. It will soon be impossible for Canadians even to have a TV commercial urging us to buy Canadian to keep our workers working, our producers producing.

Surely those who remember food conditions during the Second World War shudder at the Middle East situation that exists today and realize the absolute necessity for food grown at home.

I ask government members to realize that if they are going to open up up import quotas to give away yet more of our Canadian markets, they have a responsibility to ensure that our farmers are not being ripped off through higher input costs which place them in a non–competitive cost position. I also wish to ask them why they have failed not only to protect our producers but to ensure these GATT negotiations guarantee that any agricultural products entering this nation are produced in countries practising sustainable development.

We have the best marketing system in the world. This misguided government is responding to a few multinational traders in a way that is not acceptable to our own people.

The dairy farmers of Canada cannot accept the government's current position simply to claim a credit in the calculation of aggregate measure of support for supply management programs. Such a position is contradictory to the stated objective of the federal government to maintain a viable supply management program in Canada. Any commitment to place a ceiling on or to reduce the price of milk in Canada would automatically undermine one fundamental principle of supply management or planned production, which is to ensure fair and equitable returns to the producers.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure this afternoon to take part in the debate in support of my colleague's motion of non–confidence which states:

> That this House condemn the Government for its failure to provide Canadians with policies designed to assure full employment through international competitiveness and consistent with the principles of sustainable development.

Mr. Speaker, as far as the government's economic policy is concerned, the Economic Council released on October 3, as you know, a report in which it condemns this government's policy. Allow me to quote from the report:

> "—there is something inherently wrong in the way we tried to solve our economic problems in the past.

Further in the release is the following statement:

> The annual review also indicates that new economic problems could arise if the decision-makers count only on high interest rates to fight inflation or if the various governments adopt divergent economic policies.

And further still, it reads:

> "Canada's options are few and unappealing", according to the Council.

This government's economic policy is clearly wrong, Mr. Speaker. On the one hand, we have industries closing their doors because the free-trade agreement this government signed had devastating effects in the riding I have the honour to represent.

• (1620)

At the present time, the government is negotiating a new GATT agreement. Of course, everyone agrees we should be part of GATT and have agreements with this international organization. However, there are some grave concerns with respect to the government's policies in this respect.

Mr. Speaker, the government opposite seems to prefer giving away the store first and negotiating afterwards. I would like to read to you part of a letter I received on September 4, 1990, from the Dairy Farmers of Canada, about the GATT negotiations. It reads as follows:

> Deeply concerned, the Dairy Farmers of Canada would like to bring to your attention the enclosed policy statement about the use of aggregate measures of support in GATT negotiations.

Further on:

> Applying a ceiling or reducing domestic support by way of an aggregate measure of support might eliminate altogether any resulting benefits. The Dairy Farmers of Canada are vigorously opposed to applying, in GATT negotiations any AMS commitment to programs subject to the provisions of Article XI.

Mr. Speaker, Article XI is the GATT article that allows supply management in Canada.

Despite these concerns and objections, we just heard our colleague, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, himself a former minister of Agriculture, inform the House that the government has in fact submitted a position that includes the aggregate measure of support, and has done so against the will of the Dairy Farmers of Canada.

The Dairy Farmers of Canada are not the only organization to be concerned about the government's policy on external trade. I have another letter, this one dated September 18, 1990, signed by Mr. Jacques Proulx, president of the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec, the UPA.

Mr. Proulx says in his letter, and I will read you parts of it:

> The policies developed by Cabinet and the upcoming negotiations in Geneva must not be allowed to undermine the performance of our supply management system by taking away the ability of producers to make a decent living with prices based on the production costs of our most efficient producers.

And further on:

> Canada must maintain the structure and scope of farm credit programs, crop insurance and farm income stabilization insurance.

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): When is it?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, all this was dated September 18—if the hon. member would bother to listen, he would know—and this was the letter we received, as I said earlier, on that date.

What happened since then? Well, I just told you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, the worst scenario expected by farm producers has just come true. In other words, the position of the government opposite is completely at odds with what farm producers wanted.

It does not seem to worry our ministers opposite. However, I can tell you it does worry farmers in my riding, the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec, Canadian Dairy Farmers and, I am sure, all Canadians who want a prosperous agricultural industry in this country.

[English]

This morning a number of my colleagues and I had the pleasure of meeting with the egg producers of eastern Ontario. Egg producers of some 15 or 20 constituencies in eastern Ontario met first with Liberal members of Parliament this morning. After our meeting they also met with Conservative members of Parliament. I am sure that members in this House who were at the meeting this morning will no doubt be aware of their tremendous concerns as well in regard to the GATT negotiations. They are concerned with the issue that I raised just moments ago, the aggregate measure of support issue. They are also concerned with this whole business of tariffication.

The tariffication issue basically involved a proposal, heaven forbid, whereby some of our supply management devices would be replaced by a so-called tariff equivalent eventually to be phased out in the future.

The government got us into the Canada-U.S. free trade deal nearly two years ago now— it feels like 25 years, but it has only been less than two years— whereby tariffs are gradually eliminated over 10 years. Let us assume for a moment that this government is so wrong-headed as to proceed with that policy of tariffication and then those tariffs are gradually decreased and eliminated pursuant to the trade deal.

It has an alleged 10-year phaseout even under the trade deal now, but obviously there comes a point at which the tariff fails to protect. Say, for instance, that the tariff established is deemed to be a value of 20 per cent for the purposes of the argument and it is phased out over 10 years, and that the advantage we have over the United States producer is only 5 per cent. Needless to say, after two and a half years the tariff ceases to give any protection at all. At that point when the U.S. product becomes cheaper than the Canadian one, no matter what tariff we have it will not do any good because the U.S. product will already be cheaper.

That is the point which I think needs to be raised and that is what is wrong with this whole business of getting into tariffication as a method of eventually replacing some of the supply management devices we have right now.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Canada's poultry producers, the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency, the Chicken Marketing Agency and the Chicken Broiler Marketing Agency got together and spelled out six objectives for the GATT negotiations. Here is a brief summary.

> The maintenance of GATT Article XI: 2(c), the strengthening and clarification of its code of interpretation—
> With respect to improving the code of interpretation of Article XI: 2(c):
> —a flexible process of notice to GATT;
> —a clear definition of goods including those that are controlled in a refrigerated or frozen form—
> —a regulation governing a minimum contents of 50 per cent in the case of imports [—] concerning an end to unregulated imports of processed goods—
> Tariff support only in the case of non-tariff barriers now illegal or contrary to GATT provisions—
> The rejection of a proposition aimed at including programs under Article XI: 2(c)—
> The maintenance of a well-established GATT principle that imports must given access proportionally to the market share held during a representative period—
> The elimination of government export subsidies on a fair basis, taking into account the significant variations in current levels of support in the countries involved.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the positions set forth by the poultry producers. I told you earlier about the positions of the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec and of the Canadian Federation of Dairy Producers. But as usual it seems that the government opposite is not listening to anyone. If you never listen to anyone, Mr. Speaker, sooner or later you find yourself in a tight spot. I have the impression that by the time the next elections roll around—if it is not too late for the Canadian agricultural industry and if we still have farmers left after the devastating policies we get from the other side—the farming community will decide once and for all to get rid of the Conservative government.

• (1630)

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed my colleague's comments very much. I just wondered if he would comment on the fact that the figures for the aggregate measure of support that were used in the calculations that were tabled by the Government of Canada last week really reflect world prices, including their cost of production, or are they fire sale prices?

I noticed that eggs had used a price from the New York market. I do not know if this was for the last 25 cases at the end of the day that nobody wanted, or if they were really market prices. The milk prices came from selected border points along the Canada-U.S. border. Do you think that really reflects the world prices?

I would also like to ask him if he feels it is proper to go with such a measure of support based on these calculations when there is such a difference in input costs? Does he feel that if our costs and climatic conditions were equal to theirs, where we could pasture cattle for eight to 12 months of the year as they do in some of the American states, would we not be in a better position to compete under the current conditions and proposals as tabled? What do you think is the long-term future for dairy and poultry in Canada?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am glad my colleague raised that issue. I had actually forgotten to mention that part of it when identifying what those prices have been over the last few years and their actual reflection of world prices, or at least what we normally understand as being world prices.

We are looking at the area of eggs particularly. I will use that example because it was raised this morning at a meeting that we had on prices that were abnormally low for the last three years. We are starting off with that base which is artificially low in the case of egg prices.

We are also using prices that were in effect in a period of the post-U.S. farm bill, if I can call it that. I think the actual date of implementation of the U.S. farm bill of 1985 was January 1, 1986. The U.S. farm bill contributed some $70 billion U.S. in farm subsidies so that the U.S. could recapture what it thought was its so-called rightful share of the world market.

What happened, of course, is that grain prices and the prices of a number of commodities were artificially lowered by the subsidies brought in by the United States. It follows quite reasonably from that that if prices are lowered on feed grain and beef—which has happened as a result of the U.S. farm bill and the so-called whole herd buy-out program—then prices are deflated on many agricultural commodities, not just those two. In the case of feed, obviously that is a product that is fed to the other animals, and in the case of beef it is a competitor to other meat products. When you lower the price of one, you lower the price of the others at the same time.

What we have, in fact, is an artificially low price period. That period of time is then utilized to make this base. Obviously the base is going to be incorrect. It is going to be artificially low.

To make matters worse, we do not have a similar low cost period to compare with in Canada because we did not have many of these exaggerated subsidies that they had south of the border. So we are comparing apples with oranges. To make matters even worse, as my colleague has pointed out, the input costs, property taxes, fuel costs, minimum wages and social benefits are different in Canada than in some of the U.S. states. A further dimension to that is we have the climatic differences to deal with.

We may be good producers. We may be smart people in Canada, but we cannot recreate the weather of Louisiana and Georgia no matter how smart we are.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. The hon. parliamentary secretary for employment and immigration.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate many of the sentiments expressed in the motion we are considering today. I understand the desire to achieve full employment in this country, and I too believe that Canada's future is dependent on our international competitiveness.

Furthermore, I respect the wish to sustain our nation's development. That is why I endorse the principle of investing training dollars in Canadian men and women. I believe it is vital to develop their skills and to provide them with training and retraining opportunities that will allow them to participate fully in our economy. I believe this, because like everyone else in this government, I am determined to build a strong and competitive future for our great country.

I would like to point out that although this motion before the House contains many commendable features, the wording displays a disturbing inability to grasp the complexities of our labour market. The motion boldly claims that our labour market programs are a failure. That is simply a distortion of the facts. This government has always understood the importance of investing in our citizens. Indeed, we are at this very moment making the very types of social investments this motion claims that we are failing to fashion.

These investments come in the form of training and retraining Canadian workers in programs offered through the Canadian Jobs Strategy and our Labour Force Development Strategy. To suggest, as this motion does, that we have failed to provide Canadians with appropriate employment opportunities distorts the reality of our training record.

Indeed, we have always maintained that the failure to preserve a competitive work force would have a direct consequence, not only for the individuals who have lost their jobs, but for Canada's international economic prospects as well. That is why we have dedicated more dollars to job training and skill enhancement than any government in the history of Canada. In fact, we have always acknowledged that the federal government has a significant role to play in achieving our employment objectives.

To help us achieve our employment goals, we have enlisted the resources and the energies of the provinces, the private sector, employers and workers in comprehensive training plans. This creation of partnerships in employment training has been an important part of the over-all job development strategy.

In doing so, we have not simply cobbled together short-term make-work projects, the traditional approach to job-creation. Instead, we have adopted a different long-term strategy, a strategy that addresses unemployment and labour market dislocations with an eye to establishing prolonged stability. This strategy has proven its effectiveness by adapting to local conditions. Indeed, our training efforts are specifically designed to produce permanent jobs that are in demand now and will be in the future.

As I have already stated, I am proud that the federal government has provided consistent leadership in helping Canadians prepare for the labour market of the 1990s, and I am prepared to outline the actions we have taken.

In September 1985 we launched the Canadian Jobs Strategy after intensive consultation with the provinces, business and labour. Since then the strategy has helped over 400,000 people each year receive training they need for tomorrow's jobs. Unlike previous programs, the Canadian Jobs Strategy is decentralized, relying on people who understand local conditions to come up with solutions that best suit their needs. It places an emphasis on co-operation with the private sector at the local level. It offers a mix of tools and programs and has provided a unique and integrated approach to the labour market.

These programs include such programs as skills investment, job entry, job development, skills shortages, community futures and innovations. All of these programs can be creatively mixed and matched to produce the most appropriate training package to meet the specific local conditions. Best of all, the Canadian Jobs Strategy has an excellent record in helping those who are on the margins of the labour force and are most in need. Because of this, I can assure my colleagues that our work through the Canadian Jobs Strategy will continue.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, we are now moving further and further away from the passive support programs into the skilled development and relevant career training. Bill C-21, the bill now languishing in the Senate, is an important part of this dynamic job development process. This is all a part of our labour force development strategy which updates the Canadian Jobs Strategy for the 1990s.

This strategy builds on the successes of the Canadian Jobs Strategy and places a major emphasis on skill development and employment training. I would like to remind hon. members that the development of the Labour Force Development Strategy did not come about by chance. It did not emerge spontaneously to fill a vacuum. It was all part of a deliberate plan.

In the 1988 election, we promised to provide Canadians with the best possible training programs for our labour market. We made the commitment during that campaign to build a strong, adaptable and effective labour force. The Labour Force Development Strategy is the fulfilment of that pledge. The Labour Force Development Strategy is a comprehensive, wide-ranging formula for improving the functioning of Canada's labour force. It contains measures geared specifically to help communities experiencing economic difficulties.

These measures include strengthening of the Community Futures Program and the Industrial Adjustment Service. Both programs would receive additional financial support under the Labour Force Development Strategy. Community Futures, for example, will see its 1990-91 budget increase by $50 million to some $198 million, while the Industrial Adjustment Service allocation would be doubled from $15 to $30 million.

Because employment difficulties remain in certain regions, we have undertaken a new regional development initiative to meet these problems. The creation of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the Western Diversification Initiative are cases in point.

The Canadian Jobs Strategy and the Labour Force Development Strategy programs have already had a major impact on the labour market. When the Senate finally passes Bill C-21, I am confident we will see positive results from the initiative as well.

I notice that the motion before us today did not define full employment. This is understandable. Organizations such as the Canadian Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, who are also keen to see full employment have stated:

> It would be impossible to come up with a definition of full employment with which everyone agrees.

In effect, the advisory council acknowledged that defining full employment could be as complicated as Rubik's cube.

In its recent report on unemployment, the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council suggested that the figure of 4 per cent unemployment might be considered full employment. It is our view that the selection of a single unemployed target, such as 4 per cent, is not feasible, nor is it realistic because Canada remains a country of great regional diversity.

Governments cannot push a button to replenish cod stocks in the Atlantic or force automobile plants to be relocated on the Gaspé coast where unemployment is particularly severe. On top of that, Canada, like the rest of the industrial world, is facing rapid economic changes as international trading and manufacturing patterns evolve in a new and unprecedented global economy.

The choice of a target such as 4 per cent to view as full employment can also be very misleading. In fact, an unemployment rate of 4 per cent or less can even mask great disparities. To illustrate my point I need only mention the state of economies in eastern Europe where so-called full employment was the norm.

But we do not have to go to eastern Europe to point this out. We can compare the unemployment rate in Canada in 1967 with that of 1988 to clarify the situation. The unemployment rate in 1967 was 3.8 per cent, and 1988 was 7.8 per cent. A single comparison of two numbers would suggest that Canadians were better off in 1967 than in 1988. After all, if we stick to the advisory council's definition of full employment in 1967, we were actually there with an unemployment rate of 3.8 per cent.

However, a closer look at the numbers suggests that not everything was quite so rosy, particularly when we compare for the two years the numbers of people who held full time jobs year round. In 1967, with apparent full employment, 39 per cent of the population worked full time all year. In 1988, a full 5 per cent more—44 per cent of the population—held full time jobs year round.

Let us compare what this has meant in dollars for Canadians, and let us adjust the comparison to 1988 dollars so there will be no confusion. In 1967, the year that meets the Advisory Council's definition of full employment, 14 per cent of the Canadian population had adjusted annual earnings of $25,000 or more. In 1988, we had an unemployment rate of 7.8 per cent and 25 per cent of the youth and adult population who earned that much. Were we closer to full employment in 1967 or 1988?

What I am pointing out is that full employment is much more complicated than this motion suggests. The government believes that increased employment is desirable. We also believe that the federal government has a significant role to play in achieving this goal. We also believe that, to meet this objective, we must enlist the resources and the energies of the provinces, the private sector, employers, and workers.

I believe the government's record on job creation speaks for itself. Since September 1984, almost 1.6 million jobs have been created, which is one of the best job creation records in the industrial world. Almost 85 per cent of these new jobs are full-time jobs employing people year round.

Over the same six year period, the unemployment rate has fallen a solid 3.2 percentage points. It was 11.6 per cent in September, 1984. This year, it is 8.4 per cent. We intend to do even more.

We have recently authorized a new ceiling of $130 million for work-sharing agreements in 1990. That is double the amount of money that we set aside for work-sharing programs under the current unemployment insurance plan. Because of these allocations, people who would otherwise have been laid off will continue to work. It will keep them in the labour force and allow them to retain their skills through work sharing. When the economic fortunes in the area return to normal, these workers will be ready to assume full-time positions once again.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, countries around the world are now emphasizing training and re-employment over passive support programs. In Sweden, for example, the government has adopted an activist approach towards labour force adjustment to produce a low rate of unemployment. A full 70 per cent of Sweden's labour market programs are directed to training the unemployed and re-employment assistance. Only 30 per cent is directed towards income support.

In Canada, without Bill C-21, our labour market programs would continue to direct only 25 per cent of their resources toward training and re-employment policies. The giant share of the labour market expenditure pie will continue to be eaten up by passive income support measures. Canada's labour force development strategy mission is therefore a challenging one, but I am confident its measures will set up a ripple effect that will benefit many layers of the economy. Already we can see that our programs are realizing dividends.

The World Economic Forum recently released its world competitiveness scoreboard for 1990. In its report, Canada ranks among the best. We now sit fifth in place, comfortably ahead of Sweden, Finland, Norway, Australia, Britain, and France. The report states that "U.S.A., Japan and Canada have the human resources best suited to competitiveness". The World Economic Forum used such factors as skills, motivation, flexibility, employment, vocational training, educational levels, age, and health to arrive at its conclusion. It ranked Canada third in the world in human resource competitiveness.

These facts show that the government has displayed a willingness to work closely and co-operatively with the provinces and the private sector to achieve better human resource development than ever before. We have exerted less government control over the economy and have encouraged private initiative and promoted confidence in business. Nevertheless, we recognize that employment difficulties remain in certain regions. That is a major motivation behind our doubling of work-sharing funds.

Our Canadian Jobs Strategy has had a lasting and continuing impact on the job market, enabling more Canadians to obtain full employment at a higher level than in 1967 when unemployment was 3.8 per cent. The passage of Bill C-21 will enable even more of our citizens to participate in full employment.

We are tackling unemployment on many fronts. That is why, for instance, we have introduced Bill C-21. It places a new emphasis on training Canadian workers for the jobs of tomorrow. Bill C-21 has been carefully designed to improve the unemployment insurance program. It changes UI from a passive program to an active one. In other words, it places new emphasis on training Canadian workers for the jobs of tomorrow.

As Judith Maxwell, head of the Economic Council of Canada put it, this measure is part of a much-needed "transformation of the UI fund into an 'employment insurance' fund".

The report of the Economic Council of Canada had many things to say. The Council's research indicates that governments must promote adjustment in the labour market by moving from passive income support to active labour market policies with special attention to the employability of the disadvantaged groups like older workers. The Labour Force Development Strategy and Bill C-21 emphasize the active programs the council calls for.

With the Labour Force Development Strategy, $100 million has been set aside to provide training assistance to displaced workers and older workers. The council states on page 51 of its report that "there has to be the provision of improved opportunities for the unemployed to undertake training while still receiving unemployment insurance benefits". It calls for our commitment to increase funding under section 26 as "a step in the right direction". We want section 26 to rise to $350 million.

The council also believes that communities can play an important role in rebuilding regional economies. We want to provide assistance to communities and, with the Labour Force Development Strategy, we propose to increase the Community Futures budget by $50 million.

The council recommends efforts be made to develop a greater consensus among the main social partners on major economic policy decisions. They support the effort to involve business and labour in the Labour Force Development Strategy consultative process, managed for the government by the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre.

I am confident that any objective analysis of the realities of the job market leads to one clear conclusion: To fund passive income maintenance programs at the expense of training and skill enhancement measures is extremely short-sighted. Such a single-minded approach would be disastrous to our competitive and economic health as a nation.

Rather than assume our traditional income maintenance practices are carved in stone, we have chosen to incorporate a more dynamic capability into our programs, capabilities that help prepare our workforce for the realities of the labour market of the 1990s.

Bill C-21, the bill that is now bogged down in the Senate game-playing, is part of our long range Labour Force Development Strategy. This Labour Force Development Strategy dedicates more dollars to job training and skill enhancement than ever before. We are designating $350 million a year for an additional 60,000 UI recipients who previously were not eligible for job training.

We have earmarked $200 million for new training programs for older workers now out of work or in danger of losing their jobs. We plan to quadruple funds for co-operative education. We will set aside another $100 million to direct young people into training programs and apprenticeships that will help them land their all-important first jobs.

I would like to emphasize that Canada's social security system, including our program of assistance to the unemployed, is one of the most generous in the world. With the introduction of this legislation, the Canadian UI program continues to be one of the most generous in the world and we continue to offer benefits far superior to those available in the U.S.

In most U.S. states, people may receive benefits for as few as eight weeks and not more than 30 weeks. Yet, under Bill C-21, unemployed Canadians can receive benefits for up to 50 weeks. In no case, even where the unemployment rate is below 3.5 per cent, as in Toronto, will the length of benefit entitlement be less than 17 weeks. That is more than four months of entitlement and the differences do not end there. In Canada, a person can receive as much as $363 a week in UI benefits, whereas, the majority of Americans can receive no more than $150 to $250 a week in benefits. I could continue documenting the contrast between the two systems but I think my point is obvious. Our commitment to unemployment assistance remains unchanged.

Millions of Canadians will continue to rely on the UI safety net to tide them over between jobs, but they need more. It is time to augment that safety net with another strategy that will lead to the development of an adaptable workforce and this means skills training and lots of it. The Labour Force Development Strategy and Bill C-21 will help Canadians rely less on income support and more on developing and maintaining skills that lead to productive, well-paying jobs. These policies will build a foundation for a strong and competitive future for a Canada that works full-time and year-round.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member speaking about the UI legislation, Bill C-21, as it relates to jobs and jobs training. I could not find the direct correlation between his speech and the motion and speech of the hon. member for Etobicoke North.

Having said that, I would like to point out to the hon. member some information contained in a brochure which was put out by the Minister of Finance. The heading states: "A skilled workforce is a major part of the economic plan" and I totally agree with that. The article goes on:

> Canada's edge in world markets used to be our rich supply of natural resources. As more and more trade barriers open and competition intensifies, the focus has shifted; services and finished products, not raw materials, now offer the greatest trading opportunities.

This is very true, Mr. Speaker. The article continues:

> Between now and the year 2000, nearly 50 percent of all new jobs will require five years of education and/or training beyond the high school level.

Now, let us look at a document from the Department of the Secretary of State which deals with the profile of higher education in Canada to find out what the government has been doing about it. This is a very shocking piece of information and I am sure the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands will be listening very carefully. The document compares Canada with the rest of the industrialized countries and shows expenditures on research and development as a percentage of the gross domestic product of Canada and eight other developed countries. It compares Canada to the United States, Japan, Germany, Sweden, the United Kingdom, France, The Netherlands and Italy and, believe it or not, Canada spent relatively less on research and development than any of those other industrialized countries, with the exception of Italy. Italy is shown with 1.2 per cent while Canada is shown with 1.34 per cent.

Another table addresses the highly trained and highly skilled workforce. I cannot help but address the issues of science and technology, research and development, and education, because we cannot talk about a skilled labour force without talking about those three issues together.

When you look at the scientists and engineers engaged in research and development per 1,000 inhabitants in Canada, United States and eight other developed countries, you find out that Japan is No. 1, followed directly by the United States, Sweden, Germany, The Netherlands, Australia, United Kingdom, Canada, France and Italy.

Here, once again, if we are to compare it with the rest of the world, we have seen that Canada is nowhere to be seen in the international market when it comes to research and development and the number of scientists per thousand. My question to the hon. parliamentary secretary is this: If we are really moving into the 21st century as a competitive country looking for a balance between the raw material industries and the high tech industries in the world, what is the plan for dealing with this tremendous issue?

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, that was such a long question that one hardly knows where to begin, but let me say this: The previous government had—

I would like to say to the member for Kingston and the Islands that he is dipping away when other people are speaking, yet when he speaks he likes everyone to listen intently to what he says.

Mr. Speaker, the previous government had a scientific research tax credit in place. When it was announced everyone thought, oh boy, here we go, here is another program to develop research and development, science and technology in Canada. There has not been a full accounting of that yet because there is some lawsuits still in the courts, but we know to date that it has cost the Canadian taxpayer more than $11 billion for the throw-away of money on that research tax. It is an absolute disgrace. I hope one of these days some of these journalists around here will pick that out and write the true story of how more than $11 billion of Canadian taxpayers' money was thrown away on this.

We know that the world is changing. We know that the manufacturers have to move into a global market. That is part of the development of trade throughout the world. We know that specialties have to be made. We have put in place some research and development programs. I think we have increased many of the budgets this year and we are still working on it.

We need trained workers and more skills in our labour force. That is the purpose behind the thrust of Bill C–21. We cannot do everything all at once. We need trained workers in place, capable of operating some of the machinery that is around.

I looked at a machine the other day that cost more than $100 million. It is pretty well run by computer, but the gentleman who is going to run it has to have a university degree in order to run it. That is the type of thing that we are moving into. We have to equip our industry to respond to the marketplace of the world. We are no longer looking at what is around us. We are looking at what is next door to us. The American Gross National Product is almost $6 trillion. It is beyond the comprehension of most people We are sitting right next door to a $6 trillion market. We want to have a piece of that and we have to train our people. The only way we are going to sustain our labour force down the road is if they are trained to enter into high tech operations and so forth.

Our scientists have done very well in the world, looking at the number of them that we have and what they are doing in the world market. We intend to do more. I go back to our ability to train workers. It has to be a combined effort between government, labour, the provinces and business.

I have run a business for many years. I have run training programs in my own business. Like other people, I found that I was alone on an island, training workers for my competitors. I found that I would train people, just get them right up to the point where they become really valuable to me, and one my competitors would steal him away. That caused me a lot of difficulty over the years, but still we trained a lot of people.

This is what business has to do. It has to take a larger view of the marketplace and say: "The success of my business is not that labour contract that I signed or the fringe benefits that I give to the workers, but it is going to be skills that I can impart to my workers, that I can continue to upgrade them so I can go out and actively bid for more work for my type of business". That is what we are endeavouring to do. We cannot do it all at once. This is a giant step forward in our labour training with Bill C–21, and that is what I was trying to express in the comments that I made.

We still have a long way to go but if the Senate will get off their—as I said to one of my colleagues, what we should do is cut off their Geritol and double the Metamucil. Maybe they would move a little faster, get that Bill C–21 passed and get it into operation.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member for Etobicoke North for presenting this resolution which deals with his non–confidence in the government because it has failed to bring about full employment, to improve our international competitiveness and also in accordance with the principles of sustainable development.

I listened to most of the debate that went on in the House on this resolution. I think that Canada could learn a great deal from some of the countries in northern and western Europe. The member who previously spoke talked about eastern Europe, but I do not think there is much of a comparison there between Canada and eastern Europe. I think that we can learn a great deal from what has gone in terms of labour force development in countries of northern and western Europe where they have in many cases far stronger economies than ours, far more diversified economies than ours and also far lower unemployment rates, so they seem to have an advantage in all three of those areas.

Another way they have an advantage is that many of these countries have a long tradition of social democratic institutions that have been left in place by successive social democratic governments, whether you are talking about Germany, The Netherlands or the Scandinavian countries. The economies of those countries seem to be based on the fact that the economy exists to serve the people rather than the people being there to serve the economy. I think that Canada can learn a great deal from that principle.

When I heard the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism discussing the programs he has in his department, he did not seem that much concerned about the actual people who work in those industries. He talked about programs to generate exports. He talked about programs directed toward businesses that they could use in order to develop exports overseas, but he did not really talk about the people and I think it is the people that this motion is concerned about. When we talk about unemployment, we are talking about people who experience unemployment, people who want to get back to work, and that is a serious problem in the Canadian economy.

The same thing was true in the speech of the member for Burlington that again talk about programs and talk about statistics and talk about numbers, but I think we have to deal with the actual problem of unemployment as people in Canada face it because it is a serious problem. I think there are mechanisms and models that we can look at in northern and western Europe that we can learn from and that are adaptable to our situation here in North America and that may help us reduce our unemployment with something along the same lines as what happens in northern Europe.

I was looking at a comparison in The Economist magazine between unemployment in Canada in July, which was at about 8.1 per cent, with unemployment in Sweden, which was at about 1.6 per cent, so there is a substantial difference. When the member for Burlington talks about perhaps 4 per cent being full employment in Canada, there are some countries that have bested that figure. I think that we could take a close look at the models that they have presented to see how adaptable they are to Canada. I think we might find that 4 per cent as a full employment figure, as the hon. member for Burlington suggested, may be far too high and we could employ even more Canadians.

I am not sure that we can do that in the traditional means talked about in the House, making more steel mills, attracting more industry to the country, and encouraging investment. I think there are ways of improving the quality of life and the quality of employment of workers that can actually reduce the level of unemployment and has succeeded in reducing the levels of unemployment in those countries I mentioned.

I would like to suggest just a few. One of them has been suggested many times over in this House by former colleagues of mine, the Hon. Stanley Knowles and his colleagues in previous Parliaments, who have discussed the possibility of lowering retirement ages in Canada so that they are more comparable to retirement ages in Europe. I am not talking about compulsory retirement here, but I am talking about the age of voluntary retirement where people can retire at a relatively young age, perhaps 55 would be the cut-off line in Europe, and at the same time enjoy a relatively decent pension.

There has been discussions on pensions of members of Parliaments around the country recently, how generous those pensions are to members of Parliament. I think people do have a tendency to make comparisons between having to work to the age of 65, going on Canada Pension or old age pension and finding themselves introduced for the first time in their lives, after a long history of employment, to poverty on the very low levels of pensions provided here in Canada.

I think if the Government of Canada took a look at some of the models available in northern and western Europe, it could develop a system where people could have voluntary retirement around the age of 55 and retire at relatively decent pension levels. I am told by people from Holland that pension levels in Holland are around 70 per cent to 75 per cent of income earned while working so that they do not have that sudden collapse into poverty that people in Canada feel when they leave work. They are reluctant to leave work for that reason, because they do not want to end up in the poor house.

At the same time, if we were able to reduce voluntary retirement to the age of 55 at a relatively decent pension, it would create openings in the existing work force for younger people to move into the work force, to move up in the work force, and to bring people into the work force. A major problem in this country is that youth unemployment is always far higher than the unemployment among older citizens from the age of 25 up. It becomes a serious problem because many of those young people end up either unemployed for long periods of time or going in and out of the job market, working as hamburger flippers or working at the very minimum wage. As a result, they really do not build up the kinds of skills needed for a long-term attachment to the work force.

I think it is extremely important that we take measures in this country that will bring younger people into the employment system so that they can develop the kinds of skills and discipline necessary in order to carry on a long career in the work force and not remain dependent on social programs such as UIC or welfare systems in the various provinces.

It is interesting that in the 1986 election in British Columbia, the New Democratic Party proposed a system of early retirement for teachers in the provincial education force. The same thing had been implemented in Manitoba under the NDP government, where the NDP government of Manitoba offered teachers who were at the high end of the salary scale and also reaching their retirement years, early retirement with no loss of pension. Many teachers who had grown over stressed, tired, or just wanted to leave the job after 20, 25 and 30 years of service, in fact, took that opportunity, rejoiced at that opportunity, left the work force and retired at a relatively decent rate of pension. It did not mean poverty to those people.

On the other hand younger teachers, who had received the latest training in universities, who had the latest skills, who had the enthusiasm that comes from coming right out of an institution of higher education and going into the workforce, were happy that they were able to get into the workforce and apply those latest techniques on the students in the school system. I think that everyone benefited.

At the same time, teachers who wanted to leave the workforce were able to leave without penalty on their pension. Younger people were able to come in and get the kind of work they had been waiting for and were desperate for. The students were pleased to see these young, enthusiastic teachers with the latest techniques come into the school system. I think it improved the quality of education, the morale on the teaching force, and the morale among the students. It was better for all concerned.

At the same time, it reduced the unemployment levels in the province of Manitoba. When it was finally adopted by the Vander Zalm government precisely the same thing happened in British Columbia. The older teachers were able to retire. Younger teachers who had been waiting for years in some cases for jobs in the workforce were able to move into the schools and become teachers. As a result everyone was pleased.

This is something that could be done with public sector employees all across the country. Even in the federal Public Service it would allow people to retire at an earlier age. Younger people could move into the Public Service. We would see a tremendous reduction in the level of unemployment, simply by taking the step of lowering the voluntary retirement age to 55, with no penalty on the pension. It would be good economically and it would be good by lowering the unemployment rates. It is a model that has been used for years in those thriving countries of northern and western Europe which have that democratic socialist tradition I have been talking about.

It does not simply work in the public sector workforce. It also works in the private sector workforce as well. Mr. Speaker, you will probably recall that there was an International Woodworkers of America strike back in 1986 in British Columbia and that it carried on until 1987. One of the main demands of the union strikers in that dispute was the right to retire at age 60 with no loss of pension benefits, whereas before the retirement age was 65. Another was the right to retire at a age younger than 55 with only minor losses in pension income.

That long strike which dragged through the late summer, the fall, and the winter of 1986 and early 1987 resulted in a settlement. Many of the older workers in the forest industry workforce are people who work hard in sawmills and planer mills, in shake and shingle operations, and in logging operations. When you get up in years it becomes more and more difficult to sustain that kind of work every day. Even though these people are strong and committed, it becomes very difficult when you reach the age of between 60 and 65 to continue doing that kind of labour on a day to day basis without having health problems.

As a result of the settlement of that strike in the private sector, many of those workers did not come back to work after the strike. They simply took advantage of the early retirement benefit that the union had won for them and that the companies had agree to. They were able to leave the workforce. Between 1982 and 1986 my community of Port Alberni, which has a population of about 19,000 within the city, had lost about 2,500 workers in the forest industry. As a result of the change in the pension plans of the International Woodworkers of America, hundreds of young people were able to move into the workforce. People who had not worked for five or six years as a result of the decline in the forest employment in that area were able to move into the workforce as the older people retired and enjoyed the benefits of their pensions without penalty.

It was a terrific boost to employment in our region without any further trees being cut down, without any further development taking place in the forest industry. What happened was that everybody was happy as a result of that move.

The forest industry has not gone broke as a result. It is perfectly able to pay those pensions. In addition, it has new, enthusiastic, young workers who are coming into the system, who are no longer on unemployment insurance and welfare, and who are feeling good about being back in the workforce again and contributing productively to the local economy, to the provincial economy, and to the economy of Canada.

That is one thing I think the government could consider. It is something that has been proven elsewhere in the world. It is possible to lower the voluntary retirement age to 55 with no loss of pension benefits so that people can leave the workforce earlier and that young people who are currently unemployed and drawing welfare or unemployment insurance, or working at part-time jobs for very low rates of income and not feeling very much self-esteem as a result, can get into the workforce on a continuing basis and do what they want to do as continuing workers in the Canadian economy.

It astounded me, when the member for Burlington talked about the various training programs and the adjustment programs included in Bill C-21 or under the ministry he serves, that we generally wait until people are unemployed before we make these programs available to them. It does not seem to make sense, so let me propose another idea that has been used in countries of northern and western Europe that might be of value here in Canada. One of those ideas is paid educational leave.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, a story that was told to me by the principal of the College of New Caledonia in Prince George when I went to visit him a few years ago. He said that they had a meeting between the pulp and paper workers of the pulp industry in Prince George and pulp and paper workers who had come from the Scandinavian countries of Sweden, Norway, and Finland. They had meetings. They went through the mills in Prince George. They took a look at the equipment at which the people were working and the machinery with which people were working. They took a look at the amenities that were available to workers here, the payment rates and the programs that were available to workers here. At the end of this visit the Scandinavian workers sat down with the Canadian workers and the principal of the College of New Caledonia asked them to be perfectly frank about what they felt was right and wrong about the Canadian pulp and paper industry.

One thing that the Scandinavian workers mentioned about Canadian workers was that they could not understand how people with such low level of education could survive in such a high technology industry involved in competition world-wide and that has some of the highest technology in terms of the equipment they use in that industry.

It was a fact, and I think if you analyse the workforce across Canada you will find that education levels in our workforce are much lower than they are in places like northern and western Europe where paid educational leave is encouraged.

I was listening to the member for Burlington when he talked about the fact that he was training his own workforce. He was worried that people who took the training in his workforce would then be snapped up by other employers. That is a problem. I think that is one of the reasons why the government should share with industry in paying for paid educational leave.

One thing that is going to happen is that many people may take the training they have always wanted to take in order to make a career change so that they do not have to go back to work in the same industry. You can understand, Mr. Speaker, that if a person is working in an industry he does not want to work in he is not going to be as productive as if he does make a career change, gets the required education, and goes on to work in an industry where he feels he will be more productive and wants to make a greater contribution.

On the other hand, everybody who leaves the workforce in order to take advantage of that paid educational leave will create a vacancy for others, younger people who want to move in. I think that is the value of paid educational leave. It creates employment for people who do move into the industry. In addition, it expands our education system and it makes our education system responsive to the needs of industry and to the needs of our workforce.

I would like to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to participate in this debate. I thank the member for Etobicoke North for presenting this motion. I certainly hope that the government will take my positive suggestions to heart and that we can improve the employment in this country by listening to those suggestions.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): I will be dividing my time with the member for Ottawa West. In the few minutes that I have, Mr. Speaker, I would like you to think back with me to a couple of days ago. I was sitting at home—one of the rare occasions I had—and I happened to catch one of the American League play-off games when Boston edged out the Blue Jays. There was quite a pitchers' duel going on. We got into the eighth inning and before we knew it Boston had been blown away. Their bull pen was not up to the task of facing the hitters from Oakland.

I could not help but think as I sat there watching how that game went that what we are seeing in Canada today is that pitching-catching duo that the government has put up of the Minister of Finance as pitcher and John Crow, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, as catcher. They are just letting the economy drive them out of the game.

The Minister of Finance has a few pitches that he likes to throw. He has a fast-ball. That is his deficit reduction pitch. He has a curve ball. That is his tax reform pitch. He has a spit-ball. That is the GST pitch. Now some of them have got past a few of the batters, but lately he has been getting hit. His fast-ball, his deficit reduction pitch, they have been driving that one right out to the big green monster. They have been hitting that one so badly that he had to come forward a couple of weeks ago and say: "Sorry, folks, my deficit estimate for this year's budget was off by $1.5 billion."

His curve ball, tax reform, we know what happened to that one. He managed to get it past the batter the first time up. He said this is phase one, and he squeaked it past and lowered taxes for a few groups of people; but the next time he threw it he thought he was throwing a curve ball—it was actually a spit-ball and called the GST—and he cannot get it past the batter. In fact the last we saw it was a wild pitch and it had rolled back to the back stop behind the catcher. I think it is clear that it is time that the pitcher comes out.

Now the catcher they have got is a solid guy. He maintains pretty consistently what pitch it is he wants thrown to him. He gives the same signal every time to the pitcher. He wants high interest rates. That is the pitch he calls for. So far most of the pitches have been pretty high in the strike zone. Lately they have been starting to come down, but it has not been working anyway.

What we have here, if I can put my analogy aside for a second, is a situation in which in the words of this motion some of the key things we ought to be looking for from our policy makers in government have been abandoned. We should be looking for full employment. We should be looking for international competitiveness. We should be looking for sustainable development. Instead what we have been getting is a steady diet of deficit reduction and high interest rates, an attempt to bring inflation down to zero. Now those pitches have been getting hit. It is not working.

Let me just talk for a second about full employment. Clearly this is not one of the objectives that this government is pursuing. Employment policies have really been one of saying we will sacrifice employment on the altar of low inflation. We are going to try to bring inflation down by literally creating unemployment, so we have this month's employment figures. We are now at an unemployment rate of 8.4 per cent. The rate has been going up steadily since April of this year. It was 7.2 per cent. There has been an increase in unemployed individuals. The rate was 987,000 unemployed in Canada in April of this year. Now it is at 1,150,000.

The government likes to talk about efficiency. It likes to talk about how it wants the economy to operate more efficiently. Mr. Speaker, I challenge you to think of anything that is more inefficient than creating that many new unemployed individuals in Canada because every one of those unemployed individuals represents somebody else who is disheartened, losing out, maybe collecting unemployment insurance, welfare or social assistance, is not earning money to pay taxes, is not producing goods and services, is not helping the Canadian economy operate efficiently. Surely to goodness in this day and age, we should recognize that a policy of forced unemployment is one of the most disheartening, inhumane policies that a government can pursue.

We used to think we knew what full employment meant. We thought it meant that if you wanted a job, you could get a job. Now they are talking about about full employment meaning something they refer to as NEIRU, the non-accelerating inflation rate of unemployment. In other words, what level of unemployment are we going to live with in Canada just to keep the rate of inflation down.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come for a new pitcher to get into the game and start throwing a good, clean, fastball for full employment and stop throwing this high interest rate ball that is getting nowhere but put out.

What about international competitiveness? This is something that has been of great concern to a lot of us for some time, but when we look at the figures we see that if you consider competitiveness in the context of the necessary investment in science and technology, the government has not been attempting in a serious way to achieve an increase in our scientific research and development in such a way that it will create our competitiveness. We still rank, according to so many indicators, well behind other countries in the world.

If you compare us, for example, to the U.S., Germany, France, U.K., The Netherlands and Japan, our gross expenditure on R and D as a percentage of GDP, Gross Domestic Product, is the lowest. Our industry-funded R and D as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product is the lowest. Government-funded R and D is the second lowest. Higher education R and D is the second lowest. Advance degrees awarded by population are in the middle. Domestic patents granted per 100,000 individuals are the second lowest. International patents are the lowest. Our total R and D personnel in the labour force is the lowest. We cannot be competitive and maintain facts like those. Our rating in the world has got to improve.

My colleague for LaSalle-Émard spoke quite eloquently earlier today on the issue of Canada's role in sustainable development. It was not that many months ago in this House when the government brought in its bill to create the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, a major department bringing about industrial development in Canada. When it had the option of including in the mandate of that department sustainable development quite in keeping with the recommendations of the Brundtland commission, it refused to do so. It defeated that amendment. It refused the recommendations of the Brundtland commission on the floor of the House of Commons. So much for sustainable development.

Then we have the whole question of what the government's policy is with respect to the economy, the GST, the budget. We have a Minister of Finance who has repeatedly said that his mandate for the goods and services tax, for example, comes from the 1988 election. If you go back and look at what he was saying in that election about the goods and services tax, Mr. Speaker, you will see that he was talking about a national sales tax, integrated with the provinces, visible, fair and revenue neutral.

What has he delivered in the goods and services tax? He has delivered a tax which is at the federal level only. Canada will be the only country in the world with two levels of retail tax, federal and provincial. He has delivered a tax which will not be visible, which is not going to be integrated with most of the provinces, and which is anything but revenue neutral. By his own admission he claims that the GST is central to the strategy of lowering the deficit. If that is revenue neutral, I would like to see how he works his numbers out.

Mr. Speaker, my time is up and I defer to my colleague from Ottawa West.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, given the nature of the motion, some of the statements in the House on the government side today have been truly remarkable, because they have dealt with unemployment rather than with employment as this opposition motion does.

I want to touch very briefly on some of the social implications of a high unemployment rate, a failure of the government to address the need of its people to work to provide for those basic needs. Such a policy falls disproportionately on the most disadvantaged in society. It falls disproportionately on women leading to the poverty of women. It falls disproportionately on children, many of whom grow up without adequate nourishment, adequate clothing and adequate security to do well in school, to be able to contribute in the long run to the betterment of society and to provide for their own needs as adults. It falls disproportionately on those who always have a problem in employment, those who are of visible minorities, persons with disabilities, problems which we have not yet been able to solve in our society or even in our public service of giving every one of our citizens, everyone who is working in Canada the opportunity to develop fully their talents and abilities to make the best contribution they are able to make to the well-being of society, to the well-being of the country and to the well-being of the world.

It is only when we accept that full employment is possible, that a job for everyone who wants a job is possible and stop saying that having well over one million people consistently unemployed in this country is essential to fight inflation. Only when we believe that there is another way will we develop policies and programs that make that happen.

Common sense tells anyone that it is better to have someone working, paying taxes, contributing to the health of the economy through the purchase of goods and services and creating jobs for other Canadians than to have them idle, their talents under-utilized in society and to have them in fact drawing on public funds. That is a less desirable option clearly than a full employment or near full employment policy.

I want to address the environmental implications in this motion and our international competitiveness. I have written to the Minister for International Trade drawing to his attention the fact that whatever extreme measures we might take to fight global warming or to fight the depletion of the ozone layer, those measures will be without result if we do not come to grips with the fact that most of the continuing environmental degradation is attributable to poverty in the developing world. We must come to grips with the fact that we in the developed world have to play a major and responsible role in allowing the poorer parts of our world to achieve the material comfort we have achieved without doing the environmental damage we have done. Yet we continue to have a policy on international trade and on international aid that says that they will not be subject to the same kind of environmental criteria we are applying at home.

We have a minister now going into negotiations on free trade on a tripartite basis with Canada, the United States and Mexico. I wonder if he is prepared to start Canada's leadership role in ensuring that international environmental standards will be part of any trade agreement, any trade negotiations and any trading relationship? As long as we continue to export polluting technology to China, Southeast Asia, India, and South America, any steps we take at home to reduce environmental degradation, will be rapidly overrun many times by what we are helping to happen in less developed parts of the world.

I want to take a final couple of minutes to comment on the implications of sounder environmental policies for employment, and for economic opportunities and international competitiveness. The minute we talk about doing things in a more environmentally sustainable way, by reducing our demand on the finite resources of the planet, by reducing the damage we do to the ecology of the world with our use of those resources, some member around a committee table or in the media will say: "We cannot afford it, it costs more".

Experience is telling us quite clearly that doing things in a more environmentally sound and sustainable way is less costly, leads to greater productivity and increased competitiveness, not the reverse. It is self-evident that if you use less energy to produce products, you are more productive, not less productive and your operating costs are cheaper. It is self-evident that if you find ways of reducing waste production, operating costs are cheaper and you are more productive. It is self-evident that if you use less of the various components, products, resources, and so on, that go into your product, you are more competitive, not less competitive. We have to explode this myth, that being competitive means it is necessary to damage the environment, not only at home, but abroad. We have to start promoting the truth that saving the environment saves dollars, saves productivity and saves jobs.

There are unique and valuable opportunities for Canada in developing the technologies that will save the world, that will allow the poorer countries of our planet to start enjoying some measure of material comfort without doing the tremendously destructive damage that we in the industrialized world have done to this planet. Research, education and science are all part of Canada's seizing that unique opportunity which is there before us, not only to be competitive and do well in the international markets, but also to make a major contribution to reverse the damage done to the world and therefore leave a better world to future generations.

This is a brilliant motion in that it combines a call for a policy that is socially and economically beneficial not only in Canada but beneficial to the environment around the world. I commend it to the House for approval.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply pursuant to Standing Order 81 (14).

The question is on the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

[Translation]

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. MacLaren), which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost.

It being 6.15 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—BILLS

[English]

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, May 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Plamondon that Bill C-201, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (scabs and essential services), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to participate in debate on the Private Member's proposed legislation, Bill C-201, this evening.

I would like to congratulate the member who introduced this bill for discussion. Labour legislation, I suspect, is of interest and concern to all members of Parliament, not just those who claim to represent labour. Our New Democratic friends so often claim that they, alone, represent labour, and possibly some of my Liberal colleagues believe that they are the ones who represent labour and the unions of the country. The fact is that that cannot be the case. If that were so, they would be in government today.

An hon. member: Cheap shot.

Mr. Holtmann: The hon. member calls it a cheap shot, but if all labour supported the New Democratic Party, it would be in government today. In fact, we do have a lot of labour who support the Conservative government. I still commend the member who brought forth this bill for discussion concerning the use of scab labour and the term "scab labour" during labour disputes or strikes which occur in the Public Service and in Crown corporations.

When these disruptions occur, members of Parliament from all sides probably have an interest in their effects on the country. These disruptions are caused by an inability to come to a new consensus in respect of working agreements. Herein lies the debate.

It is Quebec which has adopted such legislation and it is the only province which has adopted such legislation. In fact, to this date, Quebec has no conclusive evidence that this has worked as it should have.

Let us analyse this particular legislation. If it goes through, as is, one would have to wonder what ramification or effect it would really have in terms of how we determine what is essential work in the workforce. Members on all sides of the House know what it has done to Canada when we have had disruptions because of strikes by civil servants and in our Crown corporations.

There are times when I believe all workers should have the right to ask for more benefits, more funding for their hourly wages, and better conditions. I speak as a westerner, a prairie farmer, and one who has experienced so many disruptions by our national railways and the private rail companies. In the case of the national railways, I can tell you that the plight of the farmer was never considered, in my view, by those who implemented such a strike by a Crown corporation.

Looking at our record as a nation in terms of strikes—whether against the Post Office or other Crown corporations such as the national railroad, or even against non-governmental corporations—which have put a tremendous hardship on the economy of the country, there may have been times when some of us in the House would accept that the insecurity of an extended period without a contract is not acceptable to anybody in the workforce.

All too often I have seen a strike hit at a time when the very services of commerce was too disruptive, and we have seen this happen. We have seen the shipping on the St. Lawrence brought to its heels.

An hon. member: That is the purpose.

Mr. Holtmann: A member of the New Democratic Party says the purpose of the strike is to disrupt national commerce. This may be so to some individuals, but I thought the purpose was to gain a better contract for the worker. To disrupt so many people in the commerce across the nation without the consideration of the pride and the national unity of this country could jeopardize the very thing that holds us together. The very thought of that scares me.

There is no argument that there are times that a strike may be warranted. But when it disrupts so many other innocent people in the chain of the economy, I have a lot of difficulty in saying such a strike should be sustained.

I know the word "scabs" is used. I never had the opportunity where I was on the payroll, so to speak, of such a corporation. I am sure many in this hall have never been on the payroll of a Crown corporation or a federal department—maybe some. My point is, however, that those who have been paid over the years by a corporation have sustained a fairly balanced, and probably a better, package than those in the private sector.

Generally speaking, federal Crown corporations look after their workers pretty well. It is based on tradition. It is not like the private sector. Federal administrators are not as conscious of profit-making. They are not geared the same way. The net result is that the packages to the workers are generally fairly lucrative compared to others.

To suggest that when a disruption takes place, no alternative worker be allowed to take over affects the services of so many other Canadians to their financial detriment. In effect, they are saying: "We will force the Crown corporation of the government to come to their knees." I do not think that is a responsible Canadian agreement.

There are those occasions when one would tend automatically to say: "Well, that's it. We're shutting this thing down. Nobody else can come in until we get exactly what we want." In looking at what the demands are, they are not an inflationary increase in wages. They are not just an extra few days. But every time I have heard what the union demanded, I could not believe it. It would be something such as a 30 per cent pay increase. They tell me that they have to ask for that because management will offer substantially less. Somehow they try to meet half way.

Those are the scary things that happen in our society. We play these shell games between management and labour, which leaves us all totally frustrated. I accept that this should be discussed in a common place like our House of Commons on a regular basis, and I accept there are other points of view.

On top of that, I sincerely believe that collectively we should find ways out of these disruptions before asking for the most ridiculous amounts of money to settle strikes or the most ridiculous kinds of things we hear, maybe from management as well sitting so tightly.

My position is that I cannot support this private intervention on this basis.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the member who brought this bill forward. It gives us an opportunity to talk to particular areas of the legislation which I think are very meaningful.

Under Bill C-201, if it is read very carefully, there are two portions to the bill. One is the anti-scab legislation and the other is the central service legislation which in effect has a two-tier mechanism as it relates to this particular piece of legislation we are talking to.

First of all I would like to indicate the good news. I think the anti-scab legislation has some merit. The reason is that in this party we understand that there are certain corporations, be they private or Crown corporations, that are within their beliefs that using scabs during a strike is of importance in order to maintain the company or to carry on with its service. That is why I say to the members opposite that the anti-scab legislation portion has some merit.

The difficulty I have with this bill is simply the essential service part. Mr. Speaker, when you take a look at the bill and break it down, it relates particularly just to Crown corporations. If members opposite would look back into the history of Crown corporations, one of the reasons we put it at arm's length to the government was to allow it to do business in a private sector world in the same manner that a private company would.

Having said that, putting in legislation that would tie the arms of one particular corporation because it is a Crown corporation versus a corporation in the private sector would create some phenomenal problems. For that reason, I think this particular piece of legislation would not carry much weight in the labour movement, in business for that matter, or in the Crown corporations themselves.

One thing I found very interesting in the intervention of the sponsoring member of this bill was his discussion about Canada Post and the fact that Canada Post is probably one of the biggest problems in the Crown corporation world that this government has as it relates to scabs.

When I read this piece of legislation, it almost seems like it is tailor-made for Canada Post. The fact remains that when there are disruptions between management and labour there is a particular reason for it. There are many reasons, but the major reason is that they are looking for a good collective agreement and a good contract.

The other one is that even though they may be getting a good contract there are other reasons, for example, contracting out. The fact remains that in this particular corporation scenario one may look at Canada Post as an example. Its biggest problem seems to be that it does not honour the contract it has.

When one looks at the number of grievances at Canada Post now, I would suggest that that is the reason there are strikes there. That is the reason why it uses scabs. Canada Post is entering into a phase of changing the way it does business versus what its original intent was, that is to be a service for Canadians. Now they are entering into what they call a business mode, particularly to make profit. When you change the mandate and the reason why you came into being, then you create difficulties for the union that is there. That union is there basically to not only supply a good wage and a good livelihood for their members but also to present good service under the mandate of that Crown corporation.

There are some other aspects of Bill C-201 that I want to mention in the short time that I have. Under this bill there is no definition of what an essential service is. It talks about safety to the public. It talks about safety to the individual, but what does that mean? Does it mean we are talking in economic terms? The fact that a third party could be affected as it relates to dollars and cents? Are we talking about the fact that there are some physical safety problems when scabs are being used? There is no definition in this private members' bill. That is a difficulty because when you are talking about changing the labour code you also have to talk in very specific terms about what you mean.

If we want to look back at the abilities of the government to stop what it considers to be essential services from striking, as we all know we have back-to-work legislation which the Parliament of Canada can use whenever it sees fit. That is what really disturbs me about this particular bill. I would like to mention clause 90.9(1), the suspension of the right to strike, which is really in essence an executive power which is given to the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the minister.

It is a very dangerous precedent when you start to allow ministers of the Crown under their recommendation to have executive powers of a magnitude where they can, in essence, because all Crown corporations are now under this umbrella, at the stroke of a pen, without debate in this House I might add, put a stop to a particular company, union, or labour force that has a legitimate grievance.

I think it is a very dangerous precedent to look to change because the legislation we have on the books right now took many years to put in place, many hours of debate, and many years of refining. Now all of a sudden to just take that away and give it to the executive of a particular government I find to be a very dangerous precedent.

Also, I go back to clause 90.3(1) where it allows the Governor in Council again to give the opinion that a strike in a Crown corporation might endanger the public health or public safety. I am very nervous about what public health or public safety means. It has to be defined and hopefully if this piece of legislation goes a little further the opportunity for it to be debated will give the definition they need.

Having said that, I would like to say on behalf of myself and my party I think it is a good undertaking, a good endeavour to look at in a serious way as it relates to scab legislation. If it was brought back just with the anti-scab legislation portion I think we could seriously consider supporting it. I think that is what the difficulty is when you have these kinds of strikes in quasi-essential services like Canada Post or CN Rail where there are third parties affected a great deal.

When they turn around and use scabs it creates violence on the picket lines and other places, man against man, woman against woman. If this bill remedies that, I agree. But I do not think that making all Crown corporations into an essential services would do us any good because of the fact that under their original mandate they were put there essentially to be able to do business in the private sector world and to tie their hands behind their backs—and I mean by that the private sector itself because now you are giving an unfair advantage to the Crown corporations. I do not think that was what was intended and I would not agree to that point.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before allowing the Hon. Member for Chambly to rise, I will recognize the Hon. Member for Saint-Hubert.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give my views and make some comments on the bill introduced by the Hon. Member for Richelieu.

I wish first of all to emphasize the importance of this issue which has serious consequences on Canadians as far as maintaining essential services in some industrial areas under the Canada Labour Code.

I wish also to emphasize the fact that my hon. colleagues have for once an opportunity to discuss labour relations in an atmosphere more constructive and less tumultuous than is the case during a debate on a back to work legislation.

The Hon. Member for Richelieu has brought to our attention a very thorough bill with many features indicative of the care which the hon. member brought to its drafting.

This bill is directly related to the provisions of the Canada Labour Code dealing with the operation of Crown corporations. According to Section 90.1 of Bill C-201, "Crown corporation" means a corporation referred to in section 5 of the Canada Labour Code, Part I. Well, the said Section 5 states, and I quote:

> "This Part applies in respect of any corporation established to perform any function or duty on behalf of the Government of Canada—, except any such corporation—that the Governor in Council excludes from the operation of this Part"

Mr. Speaker, this bill my hon. colleagues are dealing with applies to a number of Crown corporations, but not all of them. For instance, among the Crown corporations which would be affected by this bill, let us mention Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, all the administrations of the Canada Ports Corporation, from Halifax to Vancouver, the Canada Post Corporation, the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Atlantic and Pacific Pilotage Authorities, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority as well as the Royal Canadian Mint. Those are the various industries which would be affected by this bill, if adopted.

Next, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with another aspect of this bill, namely the essential quality of the industries which come under the Canada Labour Code. I will be satisfied with saying that this essential character, within a labour relation context, is not a static principle. The notion is linked to the duration and the circumstances. So, what is applicable in some instances may not be in others.

Among the Crown corporations I mentioned, there are obviously some which provide goods and services vital to the economic well-being of the country or to another essential aspect, while others will not fit the definition of "essentiality" that we could agree on. Therefore, we must ask ourselves if the bill accomodates the uniqueness of these corporations. I mean is it appropriate to make all Crown corporations comply with the stringent restrictions provided for in the bill? Does the essentiality of public goods and services warrant such constraints? It must also be pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that collective bargaining is not standard procedure and only a few unionized workers are protected by collective agreements in certains fields. In others, many competing corporations would be likely to look for alternate goods and services suppliers in the event of a work stoppage. In both cases, the essentiality of the corporation itself is irrelevant, since essential goods and services will normally be maintained.

One aspect of essential services we may find worthwhile to reflect upon for a moment is the point or stage of a work stoppage when an intervention would be warranted. In certain essential industries, the work stoppage will generally not have negative economic or social side effects in the firt stage of the strike or lockout, say during the first week. I suggest that it is unrealistic to think that an immediate response is necessary. The reason being that a premature response could adversely affect collective bargaining by reducing the pressure to settle placed on both sides and therefore allowing workers and employers to evade their responsibility toward collective bargaining and the public.

Mr. Speaker, when I look at the bill and keeping in mind the various aspects of essential services I can only experience a feeling of doubt with respect to what I would call a measure of equity when we are dealing with the many Crown corporations that are subject to the Labour Code. For one thing, Mr. Speaker, the prohibitions provided in the bill concerning the use of outside workers during a strike would seem to apply to all Crown corporations.

Leaving aside the more contentious question of whether it is appropriate to restrict the ability of the employer to make an effort to maintain operations during a strike, as proposed under the bill, we can see that the interdictions in the bill would apply to all Crown corporations regardless of the extent to which the goods and services provided are essential. There would be no point in applying such measures to Crown corporations which are governed by the Canadian Labour Code and which do not provide essential public services. If the interdictions of the bill were to be applicable in such cases, that would thwart the normal process of collective bargaining. In fact that would thoroughly upset industrial relations and the collectivwe bargaining process.

According to the provisions of the bill, Mr. Speaker, exercising the right to stike implies the agreement of the employer who must accept designated limits covering services to be provided and employees expected to be on duty during a work stoppage. For starters, when employees and employers in an essential industry are completely at odds in collective bargaining, I think it is highly unlikely they will manage to reach an agreement about services to be provided and employees to be designated as performing essential duties. The fact is that in a labour dispute the negotiations would more likely relate to their respective economic strength.

I would venture to say that no employer, public or private, would endorse an arrangement enabling a union to shut down an industry by a strike. In all likelihood the collective bargaining process would be seriously impaired if both parties had to make designations, and their chances of concluding an agreement would be next to nil because they would almost certainly wait until the government or Parliament intervened.

Mr. Speaker, I wish I could be more optimistic in connection with the likely impact of the bill on the prospect for peaceful industrial relations in Crown corporations offering essential goods and services. I cannot, and so I conclude that under this bill collective bargaining would be either upended or less effective than it is now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Chambly.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased and honoured to support my colleague, the hon. member for Richelieu, whose riding borders my own riding of Chambly. It is a rare occasion when a private member's is introduced by a member who knows something about that bill by experience. Bill C–201 is about scabs and its main purpose is to prohibit the hiring of scabs by Crown corporations.

The hon. member who introduced that bill has himself experienced the problem of scabs. He was on the picket line in 1987. He is a lawyer who understood union members' problems very well. He was aware of union problems that existed in Quebec before Bill 45, a provincial anti–scab legislation. He was able to appreciate the impact of Bill 45, which created a much better environment for union members in Quebec.

I have often said here in the House how proud I am of Quebec's labour legislation. I have often mentioned Quebec's consumer legislation, the Petty Claims Court Act, Bill 101 on the French language, and I am also very proud of Bill 45, which is more or less reflected in the Private Members' Bill of the hon. member for Richelieu.

This bill is extremely important. It can improve the circumstances of union members, because when a strike is called and union members are out of work and on the picket line, they will not be inclined to use violence of any kind against those we commonly call scabs or strike breakers, who are hired by an employer to lessen the impact of the strike.

The hon. member for Portage—Interlake said he was against strikes, because they tend to disrupt business across Canada. Mr. Speaker, the whole purpose of a strike is to disrupt business! Its purpose is to disturb the employer, to disturb people, to attract their attention to union members because they have a serious problem which must be dealt with right away.

The situation is different now in Quebec, thanks to legislation similar to the bill proposed by the hon. member for Richelieu. Before Bill 45, strikes in Quebec were very violent. There were some very long strikes.

Among companies that were not affected by Bill 45, we saw some very long strikes, like the one at Voyageur which lasted two years. The strike occurred after Bill 45 was passed but in Quebec, Bill 45 did not apply to Voyageur. I met union members winter and summer, since my office was nearby and the strike lasted two years. They were on the picket line. Today, I know one of the Liberal members of this House was president of Voyageur and wouldn't even give them the time of day—

The strike went on because they hired strike breakers, scabs and because of that, workers involved in the Voyageur dispute were unemployed for two years in Quebec.

I don't want that to happen to anyone. It's very hard on a family. And that is why I am delighted to support the bill presented by the hon. member for Richelieu.

Now, to give you an example of the impact of Bill 45 on which the Private Member's Bill of the hon. member for Richelieu is based, if we consider the hours or time lost as a result of labour disputes in Quebec—this bill was passed ten years ago in Quebec—the average number of days for a labour dispute dropped from 171 to 111 today. That is what I call progress.

If we accept the fact that some strikes are inevitable, because some employers are smart and others are not so smart, and if we give employees the right to strike and at the same time give an employer the right to hire strike breakers, what are we really doing? Well, Quebec's statistics tell the story. We are telling union workers: Go ahead and go on strike. You don't have to eat. You don't need money. You don't need peace of mind. Other people will take your place. I am the employer, and the government gives me the right to hire whoever I need to replace you. Go ahead and strike! I don't mind, as long as it doesn't hurt me. By giving unionized workers the right to strike, we have made matters worse, because their strike has no impact and it does not in any way disrupt the company. This means that workers are out of work, are not getting a salary and have to beg for their minimum needs. Meanwhile, the employer can play "Joe Cool": Sure, there is a strike, has been for two years, but who cares? And that is what the situation is like, Mr. Speaker.

The bill presented by the hon. member for Richelieu could vastly improve relations between labour and management. That has already been poved in Quebec.

I heard critical comments from the Liberals and the Conservatives. I thought it was rather funny to hear the criticism coming from Conservatives, especially since the hon. member who presented the bill is a former Conservative member who saw the light, who realized what it meant to be a conservative and changed his affiliation. Now he is right next door to us, on this side of the House. When I hear his former colleagues speak out against him, saying that this bill is bad for the country, I think that is pretty farfetched. They say this bill is going to disrupt business when the exact opposite happened in Quebec! Instead of disrupting business, it settled a number of disputes in almost record time, Mr. Speaker.

I heard both Conservative and Liberal critics say the bill only affects Crown corporations. And so what! We have to start somewhere. You start with Crown corporations, and you will see how effective this kind of legislation can be. I don't think this criticism is valid.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I must say essential services are not defined, and that this does not allow a department any discretionary authority. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the Quebec legislation, provides for a commission that determines what services are essential and hands down rulings in this regard. For the past ten years, this has worked well in Quebec. I hope that by supporting this bill, we may then be able to amend it, if necessary and at least refer it to committee for consideration.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, once again hon. members of the House are asked to give further consideration to Private Member's Bill C-201, introduced by the hon. member for Richelieu, and first debated in the House on May 31, 1990.

From the time of our first consideration of the bill, we have had an opportunity to reflect and consider the arguments that were put forward in support of the bill when it was first debated. We have since had an opportunity to weigh the strengths and shortcomings of these arguments and to review the basis of our own views on the bill.

I would like to take a close look at some of the arguments that were put forward by the hon. member for Richelieu in support of the bill, especially those that deal with the duration of strikes. In this regard, I have to ask whether or not it is realistic to expect the proposed legislation to have the beneficial effects on strikes that the hon. member claims it is likely to have.

Before doing so, I will make a few observations on the level of strike activity in recent years. This is important because it gives us an indication of the environment that prevails today, compared to the 1970s and the 1980s.

One observation that I think should be made off the top is that the level of strike activity in Canada has been generally less than what it was in the early 1980s and the late 1970s. For example, the average number of strikes in existence per year over the five-year period, covering 1985 to 1989, was 683. This is a considerable reduction from an average of 823 for the previous five-year period, covering 1980 to 1984, and from an average of 1,024 strikes in the last five-year period of the 1970s.

There has also been a downward trend in the number of person-days not worked during work stoppages. Very briefly, the notion of person-days takes into account the number of workers involved in strikes, as well as the period of days that each individual worker is not at work because of a strike or lock-out.

The number of person-days not worked per year in the later half of the 1980s has been reduced considerably from earlier years. In comparison with the later half of the 1970s, the number of person-days not worked during work stoppages has fallen by almost half. There is clearly a downward trend in the level of strike and lock-out activity over the period.

We can place this amount of working time lost during work stoppages in the perspective of a measure of over-all production time for the labour force and arrive at an estimate of the percentage of working time forgone during work stoppages. In the later half of the 1980s, the percentage of estimated working time lost during work stoppages amounted to 0.17 per cent, compared to approximately 0.25 per cent in the first half of the 1980s, and 0.38 per cent for the last half of the 1970s. Significantly, the figures for the last half of the 1980s reflect a reduction in the amount of production time lost during work stoppages of approximately one-half. The figures reflect an absolute reduction, as well as a reduction relative to the amount of production time available in the workforce.

With this brief overview of the trend in work stoppages in Canada, I would like to turn now to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Richelieu regarding the trends in work stoppages that he associates with the anti-scab legislation in the province of Quebec.

The hon. member for Richelieu indicated in his remarks on May 31 in the House that he obtained data in support of his support for Bill C-201 from a study by the Quebec organization Le Centre de recherche et de statistiques sur le marché du travail. The title of the study is Les briseurs de grève et le code du travail, and it was published in 1982. It is interesting to look closely at this study since it is one of the few studies on the effects of the anti-scab legislation adopted in the province of Quebec in 1977, and because it is the empirical foundation of the hon. member's remarks.

The data in the study covers two periods, the six-year period prior to the introduction of the anti-scab legislation, 1972 to 1977, and the three-year period following its adoption, 1978 to 1980. There are a very few brief observations that I would like to make concerning the comparisons made in the study on the effects of the legislation.

The study indicates that prior to the introduction of the legislation, 27 work stoppages representing 4 per cent of the total number of work stoppages in the period, were work stoppages in which employers made use of replacement workers. In the period following the introduction of the legislation, the incidence of such work stoppages increased to 56, representing 5 per cent of the total number of all work stoppages.

It is interesting to note that in the two time periods in this comparison, there was a reduction in the average number of workers involved in all work stoppages while the number of workers involved in work stoppages in which replacement workers were used almost tripled from 166 to 479 workers. I caution any hon. members against rushing to conclusions on this information, except to note that perhaps replacement workers tend to be used more by larger companies, as is suggested by this information.

In a comparison of the two periods, we might have expected as one of the favourable aspects of the legislation, an actual reduction in the number of person days of work time lost. In fact, there was a slight increase in the number of person days lost during work stoppages. The number increased from 9.1 million person days to 9.8 million person days of work lost during work stoppages. For work stoppages involving the use of replacement workers, there was very little change. The average number of person days lost in work stoppages involving the use of replacement workers was 1.1 million person days in both periods.

On each of these points and on each of these measures of work stoppages, including the numbers of workers involved in work stoppages where replacement workers are used, on the average numbers of workers involved, and in the person days not worked due to work stoppages, the statistics point to a worsened situation in the period after the introduction of anti-scab legislation.

While the hon. member has cited a reduction in the average of duration of work stoppages, as evidence of the effectiveness of the legislation in the province of Quebec, it should be pointed out that the study he has made reference to also indicates a reduction in the average duration of all strikes in the period, not just those involving the use of replacement workers.

There is one final observation from the study by Le Centre de recherches et de statistiques sur le marché du travail. I earlier described the trend in some of the work stoppage statistics for all of Canada. I noted that there is a declining trend in the number of strikes and lockouts. There is a declining trend in the number of workers involved in strikes, as well as in the absolute decline in the number of working time lost and as a percentage of total working time.

There are any number of factors that might be considered in trying to determine an explanation of trends in work stoppage statistics. The state of the economy, for example, is one important factor. The high and rising rate of inflation in the 1970s is referred to by students of industrial relations as one factor in particular that caused a difficult period of adjustment for labour and management. Relative wages, industrial structure and job security are several other factors that have a bearing on trends and developments in work stoppages.

What I find difficult to come to grips with is how a single piece of legislation such as the legislation on anti-scab practices in the province of Quebec can be singled out as a source of improvement in the incidence of work stoppages when the evidence that I have just cited from the same study by Le Centre de recherches et de statistiques sur le marché du travail makes such a claim questionable.

Finally, there is one further observation that I would like to make regarding the average duration of work stoppages since this is the indicator used by the hon. member for Richelieu as evidence of the effectiveness of anti-scab legislation.

• (1905)

From 1972, the first year of the study by Le Centre de recherche, to 1977, the year of the introduction of the anti-scab legislation in Quebec, the average duration of strikes and lockouts in the province of Quebec was higher than in all of Canada. In the years since the introduction of the legislation, there has been no change in this relationship and work stoppages in the province of Quebec continue to be longer than those in all of Canada.

I hope these few remarks have been helpful in providing the House with a perspective on the information in the study cited by the hon. member for Richelieu. I believe the evidence on the effectiveness of anti-scab legislation, such as is proposed in Bill C-201, is less than satisfactory and I frankly doubt the soundness of the measures proposed.

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the bill before the House concerning the maintenance of essential services in Crown corporations and the prohibition respecting the hiring of workers to replace their own employees in the event of a strike or lock-out. Let us examine the main elements of this bill.

First, after the filing of a negotiation notice Crown corporations would not be allowed to hire new employees to perform the work done by those who have gone on strike or who are locked out.

Second, the bill would also prevent the corporation from re-assigning striking or locked-out employees to other corporate departments, or from hiring in the striken unit people who normally work in a company other than the Crown corporation.

The bill also provides that, at least seven days before the strike, both parties must reach an agreement concerning the maintenance of essential services. Should they fail to agree, the union gives the corporation and the minister a list of essential services. In both instances and under the proposed legislation the minister shall assess whether or not the essential services provided for in the list or in the agreement are sufficient. Those are the two main components of the bill.

Let us get back to the hiring of so-called replacement workers. We know that replacing workers out on a legal strike is a touchy and controversial issue. In Canada, only the Quebec Labour Code has provisions which, for all practical purposes, prevent an employer from calling in outside workers when the strike is legal. When examining the relevance of this kind of legislation with respect to the federal jurisdiction we must take into account a number of characteristics of industries regulated by the federal and provincial governments.

The Canada Labour Code applies to a sector of labour relations which, by and large, includes companies which play a leading role in the major economic sectors. For example, national and regional transport companies account for a large number of companies under federal jurisdiction. Once the requirements of the Canada Labour Code concerning the settlement of disputes have been met, there is no restriction on the right of employees to strike. In the Province of Quebec, note that some sectors such as health and municipal public transit services are protected in the sense that some workers are designated and cannot go out on strike. There is no comparable provision applicable to federally regulated private sector companies subjet to the Canada Labour Code.

Each level of government has evaluated its legislative needs taking into account the uniqueness of the industries concerned. One of the basic characteristics of the federal collective bargaining system is the recognition of the fact that competing interests between unions and employers often put their economic strenght to the test.

For the union, the ultimate expression of strenght is the planned withdrawal of the workers from the employer's premises. We know that in reality more that 95 percent of all collective agreements in the federal jurisdiction are bargained without work stoppage.

The employer, for his part, has an equivalent power. He can impose a lockout or strive to keep operating in spite of the strike.

The Canadian Labour Code, with its procedures and steps to get bargaining agents certified and to eliminate obstacles to efficient and constructive collective bargaining, including mediation, is aimed at allowing the parties to settle their disputes with minimal government intervention. In that context, Mr. Speaker, the Code states that the parties can voluntarily accept to be bound by the recommendations from a conciliation commissioner or a conciliation board.

Let us take a look at the effects the bill could have on operations, given the type of industries the Canadian Labour Code applies to. The national industries concerned, such as railroad companies and airlines, are characterised by their numerous bargaining units.

Instead, they are grouped on the basis of trades or ranks, as is the case with pilots, mechanics, stewards and train conductors, all of them having their own unions. For instance, CNR employees are represented by 14 unions and are subjected to dozens of different collective agreements. In the case of industries under provincial jurisdiction most are structured on the basis of individual industry and very often each plant has its own bargaining unit.

To determine the usefulness of the proposed bill, it would be necessary to examine the consequences of giving a fairly small bargaining unit the power to paralyze the whole national transportation system. If it were impossible for a railway company to hire other workers to carry out the duties of its striking employees, that company would be unable to remain in operation.

In such a situation, we realize that the proposed legislation would make it possible for a small bargaining unit to paralyze a major corporation.

Another problem could arise from the consequences such legislation would have on the current structure of multi-union bargaining. In the railway industry, for instance, several unions represent dozens of joint bargaining units.

In some cases, management and unions in the railway industry have deemed appropriate to get together to organize a major multi-union multi-employer bargaining structure. Such arrangements have the advantage of limiting the number of possible strikes for employers and unions during the bargaining round.

We must ask ourselves two questions: Would these multi-union multi-employer bargaining structures which both parties appreciate, continue under a scheme forbidding the hiring of replacement workers? Also, would not the increased power of bargaining units run the risk of dividing the system and, therefore, increase the number of conflicts within the system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but I must interrupt the Hon. Member.

COMMUNICATIONS

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the American radio station WBLK today holds a virtual monopoly on the southern Ontario market for black urban contemporary music.

Toronto has become so lucrative for WBLK that it now has an advertising office in metro. Regrettably, Canadian black artists have no commercial outlet for their music while Canadian advertisers pay WBLK for access to Toronto's large black population.

This summer the CRTC rejected a strong bid from the black community and awarded the final Toronto radio licence to a country and western application. The CRTC has turned a deaf ear to the needs of black musicians and has ignored the fact that other radio stations in Toronto are abandoning country and western due to low audience demand.

If this government is serious about its commitment to multiculturalism, it will reject this decision and send it back to the CRTC for reconsideration.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from an intensive five-day tour of one corner of my constituency during which I talked to more than 400 people, most of whom were farmers concerned about their present and their future.

Piles of grain are on the ground, and they are unbelievable. The elevators and bins are full. The grain is not moving anywhere, but the need for movement and sales is evident everywhere.

The message from my constituency is loud and clear. The grain must be moved. The price of grain must be higher. The interest-free cash advance must be reinstated and the government must intervene in the energy crisis holding down gas prices so the oil companies do not make profits at the expense of the cash-starved producers of the prairies.

I call on this government to listen to the needs of the farm and rural people of my constituency and across western Canada, and address these concerns immediately.

AIR CANADA

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, Air Canada announced drastic staff cuts, close to 3,000 lay-offs including mechanics, flight attendants and pilots. These cut-backs will affect all employees and are due to fuel price increases.

Financial circles have long since been asking for this kind of rationalization, even before oil prices began to go up.

When we had the last two increases I praised the oil companies for not raising their prices immediately. Rather I was afraid that companies, wholesalers, air carriers, taxis, and public transit companies would take advantage of the situation to boost prices or cut staff.

Where were these companies when we had a decrease of 12 cents a litre in 1987? What reduction did they pass on to consumers when oil prices went down as low as $10 a barrel?

Mr. Speaker, I have a very simple question. Will these 3,000 employees be rehired if oil prices decrease to the levels of two months ago? To that I answer I do not think so.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport, aided by the Minister of Justice, failed to provide the necessary instrument to answer all the outstanding questions pursuant to the resignation of Peter Lush as chairman of the Hamilton Harbour Commission.

A Tory government will look into the conduct of a Tory appointee, himself a Tory supporter, to the private law firm, Tory, Tory, DesLaurier and Binnington, which will report back to the Tory Minister of Transport.

The private law firm does not have the powers to compel witnesses, to take evidence on oath or to subpoena documents. Only a public inquiry would have the tools necessary to gather evidence on this issue. The legal question put to the law firm by the minister is far too narrow. It does not address section 27 of the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners Act, nor sections 120 to 126 of the Criminal Code of Canada, or the General Law of Agency which may entitle taxpaying Canadians to get back the $400,000 commission cheque paid to Peter Lush.

What has this Minister of Transport got to hide?

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, Canada is an indebted nation. It took a generation of free-spending governments to get us to the point where almost 40 cents of every tax dollar is spent on interest to service that debt.

This is something a lot of Canadians are embarrassed about, but not too many people actively try to help those like Michael Wilson who are trying to solve the problem.

So I am delighted today to say that $1,200 of our national debt can be retired, thanks to the efforts of several Chamber of Commerce groups in my riding.

The Halton Hills Chamber and the Burlington Chamber sponsored a Deficit-Reduction BBQ earlier this year in a direct attempt to help our country through grassroots fund raising. Over 600 people came, listened to the finance minister speak, and did something positive for Canada.

Critics abound, Mr. Speaker, but so do the average, concerned and involved Canadians like the constituents of my riding who today give money in order to help Canada's future.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to draw the attention of the House to one of the most incredible feats of swallowing oneself whole ever witnessed in Canadian political history.

I refer, of course, to the phoney comments made by the House leader for the New Democratic Party dealing with the GST. On the one hand he issued an open letter urging the public to support the Liberal senators' fight to kill the Tory GST. Then only two days ago in front of the cameras he decried the very existence of an unelected Senate and wanted it abolished. Now we see his forthright buddies at Queen's Park, led by Premier Bob, about to endorse and embrace the GST and they have already dropped their opposition to the Tory stacking of the Senate.

Will the hon. NDP House leader now fish or cut bait? Are they in support of the Liberal Senate's actions, or will they continue with the cynical double-speak that is now the trademark of the federal New Democratic Party?

BUILDING OF AN AIR TERMINAL AT LG-2

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the James Bay Development Corporation is building a new $7 million air terminal at LG-2 in Abitibi with the co-operation of Hydro-Québec, the James Bay power corporation and the government of Canada.

The new flight information station will be located on the second floor of the air terminal and manned by five flight information experts and three electronic technicians serving a region of 145,000 square kilometers around James Bay.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have worked with the employees of the James Bay Corporation and of the municipality of James Bay to get these facilities which will be useful to James Bay and Quebec workers.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, 16,000 steel workers remain out of work, 10 weeks and counting.

The trade minister said yesterday with regard to two negative free trade panel rulings that "you can't win them all". Mr. Speaker, we have not and will not win any of these rulings.

While the dispute lingers, American producers begin to assume a greater and greater share of our Canadian producers' market. Despite the animosities created by the labour dispute, Stelco president, Fred Telmer, and USWA director, Leo Gerard, agree that high interest rates and the resultant high Canadian dollar are decimating the steel industry.

It is not just the steel industry, Mr. Speaker, but all of the manufacturing sector is in a freefall: employment is down 6.4 per cent over the third quarter of 1989.

Even if the playing field were level, we would be playing on two separate fields. Canadian steelworkers, producers—all Canadians—are asking this government for assistance.

Lower the interest rates.

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak on behalf of the grain producers of Brandon—Souris in particular and of the west in general who are suffering from a severe cash flow crisis.

Although the crops in much of the west were better than average, the combination of reduced grain prices and low delivery quotas means that the farmers in my constituency have had little or no cash flow to date. Meanwhile their obligations to their creditors must be met.

• (1410)

Although the export price for grain is essentially beyond our control due to the continuing insane policies of the EEC and the U.S.A. to subsidize export sales, and as delivery quotas may not improve until Russia and China begin to buy, the federal government can and should assist grain farmers by agreeing to restore interest-free cash advances for the current crop year.

Although the cost to the federal treasury may be as high as $50 million or more, we as a government should act now to assist grain producers financially, just as we have done in the past.

The need is great and the time to respond is now.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, at this moment in the other place my colleagues in the Liberal Party of Canada are valiantly defending the rights of Canadian men and women and resisting with all their might the imposition of the goods and services tax.

Their cause is the cause of the people of Canada because the people of Canada do not want the GST. Nonetheless, they face a barrage of opposition from the government opposite and yes, from the New Democratic Party, the waffling, wishy-washy New Democrats who are determined to shamelessly scale new heights of hypocrisy and perform new feats of political opportunism. They demand one day that the Senate be abolished, the next day the NDP suggests rather sheepishly no doubt that the Senate stop the GST. Where does the New Democratic Party stand? Who knows? They cannot make up their minds.

What is important is that all Canadians know where Jean Chrétien and the Liberal Party of Canada stand. We stand beside Canadians, ordinary Canadians, Canadians who are fighting back, Canadians who work for a living and are struggling to put food on the table, Canadians who want to axe the tax and kill the GST.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Mercier.

MATERNITY BENEFITS

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Today, Mr. Speaker, pregnant women can receive up to 15 weeks of unemployment insurance benefits. If Bill C-21 had been passed, they or their spouses could get 10 additional weeks, which means a total of 25 weeks of benefits.

Mr. Speaker, if the Liberal senators took their jobs more seriously, were more conscientious and stopped playing games in the Senate and ringing bells and tapping their feet, thousands of Canadian men and women would be able to receive the additional maternity benefits they deserve.

Mr. Speaker, could it be that at their age, the senators have forgotten what motherhood is all about?

ISRAEL–PALESTINE SITUATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise to strongly condemn the recent violence and brutality of the Israeli army against unarmed Palestinian protesters, some on the site of the Al Aqsa mosque, Islam's third holiest shrine. While the stoning of Jewish worshippers at the Wailing Wall is of course wrong, the response of the army, using bullets against rocks, is an outrage and tragically, an all too familiar one. Over 150 children have died at the hands of the IDF since the start of the intifada. Israel has displayed contempt for international law and human rights by its policies of collective punishment, forced deportations and settlements.

Canada must strongly condemn these tragic killings, support the sending of a UN Security Council investigative team to the area and actively promote the early convening of an international peace conference on justice and self-determination for the Palestinians.

[Translation]

We cannot have a double standard in the Middle East. People who condemn the invasion and annexation of Kuwait by Iraq should also condemn this annexation.

THE SENATE

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, during the last few days we have been treated to a less than edifying spectacle in the Senate.

While Canadians are flabbergasted at the Liberal senators' grotesque and degrading antics, the fact remains that the neediest in this country, the unemployed and the regions, are being hit as a result of systematic obstruction by Liberal senators.

Tens of thousands of unemployed workers in Canada are deprived of training courses because the unemployment insurance reform bill is being blocked by the Liberal Senate.

All community development committees in this country have seen their development projects blocked becaue of a lack of funds, all because of the Liberal Senate.

Ville de Laterrière, for instance, in the riding of Jonquière, will have to delay its recreation and touris development project because of obstruction by Liberal senators.

Mr. Speaker, abuse of power has superseded, common sense, and it is high time democracy was allowed to take its hightful place in this country.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Today the Conference Board of Canada in its quarterly report said: "the Canadian economy is in a recession", and it went on to say that a recovery is not expected until the spring of next year.

The Conference Board puts the blame for this recession squarely on the shoulders of this government. The Conference Board also says: "This will be a made-in-Canada recession".

Will the Prime Minister admit today that it has been the policies of his government which have caused this recession, bringing about the loss of tens of thousands of jobs and misery and despair for thousands of Canadian families? Will the Prime Minister begin changing those policies today to policies that create jobs, create economic growth, and will not drive this economy even deeper into recession?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the policies that we have been following as a government are designed precisely to avoid the type of recession that we had in 1981–82, with which my hon. friend is very familiar.

What we have indicated last year and this year was that we must avoid the increase in inflationary pressures that were clearly building in the economy and that were clearly going to lead us into a position where we would have major loss of competitive position, precisely what is happening in Great Britain today. In Great Britain today there is a 10.6 per cent inflation rate. Its inflation is much less under control. We are trying to avoid that problem so that we can get back on to a track of non-inflationary growth, at a very early time.

The Conference Board report clearly points out that in the second quarter of next year we will have growth at the annual rate of 3 per cent. That is what we are trying to achieve.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister, in his blind and arrogant way, is refusing to listen to organizations like the Conference Board and his own Economic Council. He keeps talking about inflation, and yet the Conference Board in its report says that not only will the GST, a key policy of this government, "have a significant impact on inflation", but that "the implementation of the GST at the beginning of next year will erode purchasing power at a time when the economy will be in recession and interest rates will still be high".

I ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance: Will this government have the common sense and the decency to withdraw the GST right now, before it drives this economy even deeper into recession and does even more damage to Canadians and their families?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member accuses me of not listening. I would suggest that he listen also and not quote as selectively as he has the Economic Council report.

What the Economic Council report does is say: support the policy that we have been following to get inflation under control. I suggest the hon. member read the report where he will see that.

What the Economic Council is saying is that it would like to see more action taken on getting the deficit down. If my hon. friend would be honest with Canadians himself, he would say that he has never proposed anything to get the deficit under control. That is a key element of what the Economic Council is proposing to Canadians, and we are listening to that.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Finance if he, the Prime Minister, and his government will be honest with Canadians and say the reason they are desperate to force through the GST is that they want to close down this House as soon as possible so they do not have to stay here and listen to the music about the recession they are causing.

• (1420)

They do not want to stay here and face the music from Canadians about the GST induced recession that they are bringing about.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, why doesn't the Prime Minister withdraw his disastrous GST today? Why does the Prime Minister want to do even more harm to Canadian families who have already been hard hit by a recession created by this government's policies?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will tell you one type of noise that I am getting kind of fed up hearing—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Resign.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the music that I was referring to are the kazoos and the noisemakers in the Senate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister could complete his answer.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests the reason why we are trying to push through the GST. If he would look back to what the Senate has said itself, it believes that it is important that we move to the GST because the existing sales tax is not working. Senator Buckwold, Senator MacEachen—

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, there is a stranger in the House behind that curtain.

An hon. member: Who is that?

Some hon. members: Chrétien.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: He snuck out. There he is.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, a Senate committee that included Messrs Buckwold, Kirby and MacEachen said: "We recommend that as soon as is practicable, the government introduce legislation to implement a broad based multi-stage sales tax"; in other words a GST to replace the existing federal sales tax system.

This demonstrates very clearly the cynical and cheap politics that the Liberals are following by blocking this GST when they know they have no alternative to it and they know it is a thing that this country needs.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Following the Tory policy of privatization and deregulation we have seen two major airlines gobbling up 14 regional ones. Air fares have risen faster than the cost of inflation. Jet service has been reduced in the regions. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians who invested in Air Canada shares have lost money, and now we have close to 3,000 people out of work in Air Canada.

How can the government continue with policies that have only served to destabilize our airline industry in Canada? What measures does the minister propose to stop its further decline.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, there has been no decline in air service in Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: It is an improvement.

Mr. Lewis: In fact, deregulation and the hub and spoke concept have greatly increased opportunities for Canadians to travel.

I note that Air Canada welcomes the government's policies of open skies. It says that the prospects of an open regime which will allow carriers from each country to operate services between any point in one country and any point in the other, as well as between points within the country, is very encouraging.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, it is time this minister wakes up and recognizes the turbulence that our airline industry is in today and how he can begin to sacrifice an already fragile industry into head-to-head negotiations with the United States.

[Translation]

My supplementary is directed to the same minister. Considering the devastating impact of the government's policies on our airlines, with the thousands of lay-offs that took place recently, how can the government possibly sacrifice an already weakened industry by starting bilateral negotiations with the United States, which might well deal a fatal blow to Canada's airline industry? Why?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I refer to the same gentleman, Mr. Claude Taylor, the President of Air Canada. When commenting on the open skies concept that we are entering into with the United States, he said: "Air Canada fully supports a gradual phasing in process including transitional mechanisms to ensure an orderly integration of airline services to the public".

Mr. Marchi: What about the safeguards?

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday we had the Air Canada announcement of the largest airline lay-offs in history, with some 2,900 working families being affected. These job losses are added to the 150,000 jobs lost in the manufacturing sector.

Today we heard from people in the fishing industry, 3,000 of whom will not be eligible for benefits because of this government's policy. The Conference Board of Canada is saying today that unemployment will increase mid-next year up to 9 per cent. In November 1988 the Prime Minister said that they would "ensure innovative and generous adjustment and retraining programs will be introduced whenever and wherever required, with the chief priority being the well-being" of individual Canadian worker and their families.

I ask the Prime Minister: Where are those adjustment programs? What are you prepared to do for the working people in Canada today who are being laid off at an unprecedented rate?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, provision for many of those adjustment programs has been paralyzed by the Liberals in the Senate. My hon. friend should be encouraging the Liberals to get the bill out of the Senate and back into the hands of the working people of Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the economy from 1983 to 1989 grew at an average annual rate of 4.25 per cent. There have been 1,600,000 new jobs created since September 1984.

Mr. Allmand: Nobody believes you, Brian.

Mr. Mulroney: Over 80 per cent of them are full time. As the Minister of Finance predicted in his budget, in an attempt to squeeze inflation out of the economy there has been a slowing down in the economy, obviously. While we regret that, the most insidious ill of all in an economy is inflation, because inflation robs those on fixed incomes and it hurts the poor, the sick, and the elderly most of all.

We have chosen the hard way of dealing with inflation now to have a sounder economy later.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

The people who are experiencing the hard way are the poor people of this country. The one in six children who live in poverty, the 40 per cent of food bank users, are the ones who are experiencing the hard way in Canada.

The Prime Minister knows that he could introduce an amendment to the variable entrance requirement for unemployment insurance. He could do that now to ensure that those workers could receive benefits.

• (1430)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this government does not seem to understand that the GST will aggravate the recession. People across the country know this. A consulting firm, Informetrica, estimates that as far as the airline industry is concerned, the GST will cause 4,000 jobs to be lost between now and 1991 and 7,000 by 1993. Will the Prime Minister finally make a decision and withdraw the GST now?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the NDP began her question by referring to children in poverty.

It is one of the blights on any industrialized society. One child in poverty is one child too many. However, in excess of 250,000 children have been removed from the poverty line since this government came to office.

We plan to maintain those policies so as to reduce even further the number of children in poverty in Canada.

[Translation]

My hon. friend's question was about the GST. She suggested that the GST will have an impact on inflation. That is quite true. The Minister of Finance said so when the GST was first discussed. There will a definite impact, but it will not last, as confirmed by the Conference Board in its report. This impact will last for one fiscal year, and it will a negative impact on the inflation rate. I agree.

However, for the past 50 years, a number of task forces and various royal commissions of inquiry have been asking the Parliament of Canada to get rid of the existing tax on manufactured products and introduce a GST, in order to streamline Canada's economy so that this country can create more jobs and be more competitive on international markets. Despite the problems, the GST will modernize our economy, and that is exactly what we intend to do.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): On a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote Gordon Sinclair, the President of Air Transportation Association of Canada who said in October 1989: "The proposed tax treatment for U.S. travel renders Canadian air carriers less competitive vis-à-vis their American counterparts". Mr. Sinclair was talking about the GST.

There are other experts who have said that Canadian airlines will find it very difficult to compete with American airlines because of the GST and because of the lower fuel prices in the United States.

In fact, why does the government continue to pursue its programs of free trade with the United States, the GST and deregulation of airlines?

The experts in the industry indicate that these are causing greater unemployment. We are into a recession. Why does the Prime Minister not withdraw the GST, back down with the deregulation of airlines with the United States and save Canadian jobs?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, every socialist country in the world from Poland to Czechoslovakia to eastern Germany has recommended liberalized trade, the shucking of the regulations that existed in the economy. The only people who believe in protectionism are the NDP in Canada.

My hon. friend has quoted a number of people with regard to the GST. She may choose to be very helpful to the process by speaking to her seatmate who moonlights in the Senate—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister could complete his question.

Mr. Mulroney: I was talking to my old aunt Mabel in Kamloops, and she cannot believe that she voted for Nelson for the House, and now he wound up in the Senate.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I hope there are no more aunts—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my aunt twice removed.

I just wanted to say to my hon. friend, the leader of the NDP, that when she is talking to the embryonic senator, there is a quote with regard to the GST by one of Canada's distinguished columnists that says this and perhaps it should be brought to the attention of her seatmate. "The Liberal members of the Senate of Canada are collectively a disgrace to this nation. To witness those underworked and overpaid foul-talking, desk-banging senatorial anarchists acting like animals within the Parliament Buildings"—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, we know that aunt Mabel won't vote for him again in the next election.

The Conference Board of Canada said today that we are in our first made-in-Canada recession. What the government has offered us is this made-in-the-Tory caucus propaganda sheet that sanctimoniously promotes the government's economic policies.

I would like to know from the Minister of Finance why he has not admitted in this propaganda sheet that it is his high interest rate policy that is driving tens of thousands of Canadians out of their jobs and putting Canada into this recession that the Conference Board has described.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have policies. We have set them out very clearly.

To quote what the hon. member has said himself, "The Liberal Party would not have a shred of credibility if they didn't propose alternatives." Where are the alternatives of the Liberal Party of Canada?

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows about not having a shred of credibility.

Yesterday, he justified this propaganda sheet by saying that he sent it out to Canadians because it responds to their questions in an open, frank and direct way.

I would like to know whether the minister thinks it is open, frank and direct that in this sheet, he has not admitted that the GST is going to deepen the recession that we are already in. He has not admitted that the GST is not visible or revenue neutral as he had promised. He has not admitted that the GST tax credits are not indexed. Why did he pass up a $1.3 million opportunity to tell the truth?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, maybe what my hon. friend is looking for are statements from the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development which says we should have a goods and services tax, which supports the monetary policy of the Government of Canada, which supports the fiscal policy of the Government of Canada, which supports the free trade agreement, which supports deregulation, which supports privatization, which supports trade. That is what the OECD says. That is also what the Economic Council has said.

Mr. Gauthier: No, no.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member is saying no. If he would read what the Economic Council has said—I have read it—he will see that they do support the policies. They are saying they would like to see the deficit down and what has the Liberal Party of Canada ever done to say—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, this is an example of where pig-headed vanity replaces economic reality in this country.

The Conference Board of Canada report makes clear today that this government's economic policy, specifically the policy of the Minister of Finance, is needlessly driving tens of thousands of Canadians to the unemployment lines in the face of the winter of 1990. The Conference Board says we are experiencing our first ever made-in-Canada recession, created, authored, made by this government, this Prime Minister and this Minister of Finance.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Why is the Government of Canada insisting on completely eliminating government support for the unemployment insurance fund? It is the complete elimination of $2.7 billion of government support, at a time when the Conference Board of Canada tells us that tens of thousands more Canadians will join the 1.5 million already unemployed in Canada and in need of support this winter from the UI fund? Why the cuts?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand the hon. member talking out of both sides of his mouth. I remember a made-in-Canada recession that began in 1981 and it was the worst one that this country has ever experienced.

Let me say as well, Mr. Speaker, that for him to talk about unemployment insurance benefits when what is happening in the other place is a disgrace to his party and to the Parliament of Canada is absolutely talking out of both sides of his mouth.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister, who would be aware that fishermen and plant workers on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts are being savaged because of her continuing and stubborn refusal—this is not a matter for the Senate—to bring in a simple amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act—

Mr. Crosbie: Speak to the Senate.

Mr. Simmons: You would like to think so.

The Canadian Labour Congress and fisheries union on both the Atlantic coast and the Pacific coast have said today that unless the minister brings in this amendment, tens of thousands of people will wind up on welfare.

In the name of basic compassion, will the minister instead of blaming it on somebody else in the other place, will she relent and bring in the amendment like her government has done for the past five years, like governments have done for the past 14 years in this House?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, all the grandstanding that is going on on the other side of the House is not going to help the people who are in the fishing industry in this country. Let me point out, first of all, that under Bill C-21, which is the bill that has been stuck in the Senate since last November, we have fisher people who are not affected and they will be better off when Bill C-21 is passed.

Mr. Simmons: VER, Barbara.

Some hon. members: VER.

Mrs. McDougall: The VER will not help the repeaters, the seasonal workers, the people over 65 and the people looking for maternity benefits.

Some hon. members: VER.

Mrs. McDougall: It will not help one of those people, and that is why this is hypocritical.

Some hon. members: VER.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, we have all enjoyed the jokes from the Prime Minister, the rants from the Minister of Finance, but none of these can take away from the fact that the Conference Board of Canada said quite clearly today and I quote: "Canadians will see no gains in their real disposable income in 1991."

This Minister of Finance has been voted the worst minister of finance—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Let's try to put the question.

Mr. Langdon: Is the minister prepared finally to admit that the country is in a recession? Will he admit that it is a made-in-Canada recession for which he is responsible, and will he tell the country what he intends to do about it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can take my hon. friend back to the budget of 1989 and 1990, where I said very clearly that we had inflationary pressures that we had to get under control. Those inflationary pressures were caused by the very strong growth that we had during the 1984-1988 period, during which time we saw an increase in personal disposable income after taxes and after inflation of 14 per cent.

It is a natural progression in an economy when there is that fast a growth, that there has to be a slowdown. I clearly predicted that in my budget of 1990 when I said: "This will be a testing year for the Canadian economy. The economic news will not be encouraging in the months ahead." We have been very open and honest with Canadians.

We are getting the inflationary problems under control. As we have been getting them under control, we have been bringing interest rates down. As this continues to happen, we are setting the stage for strong non-inflationary growth which, as the Conference Board of Canada projects, will start in the second quarter of next year.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There is a big difference between slow growth and no growth: decline. That is what the government has given the country, economic decline.

Will the Minister finally start to care about Canadians—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Langdon: —and will he demonstrate this by leading our House to adopt immediately the variable entrance requirements for unemployment insurance for fishing communities right across the country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have made it very clear that what we are going through right now gives me no pleasure whatsoever—

Mr. Tobin: Well, quit doing it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —but I do know, if we do not have a period of time when we get these inflationary pressures under control, then we will go through the same sort of mess that we went through in 1981-82. I am sure my hon. friend does not want to go through that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): What my hon. friend is ignoring when he talks about one aspect of the unemployment insurance reform bill, the variable entrance requirement, is the fact that we are improving maternity benefits. We are adding some $500 million to $700 million worth of moneys for training of people who are out of a job. We are putting moneys to allow people over the age 65 who want to continue in the workforce to continue to have the support and benefit of an unemployment insurance.

These are the things that are hung up in that bill on the other side. His party is supporting the Liberal senators to continue to hold up that bill. That, Mr. Speaker, we say is dead wrong.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister who is responsible for corporate losses in Canada and who is well aware that yesterday Air Canada cut 3,000 jobs. Hardly half an hour ago, the Canadian National Railways announced an additional loss of 1,500 jobs throughout Canada, including 750 in the City of Montreal. For the past 5 months, the minister has been hiding a report which foresees the end of Quebec shipyards.

While his colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources claimed last week that there would be major spinoffs throughout Canada from the Hibernia project, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology remained silent. Why did he not say anything?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly pleased to answer the Hon. Member for Hamilton East. The way she keeps asking her questions, Mr. Speaker, we had quite a rest for three months without having to answer them.

That being said, the hon. member is absolutely not informed of the situation. She should have listened to our briefings on the Quebec shipbuilding industry. Since 1987, Mr. Speaker, this Conservative Government has provided Marine Industries in Quebec with $150 million to help them increase their competitiveness and continue their operation. We are currently working together with the Quebec Government on a possible solution to the frigate and destroyer problem.

Mr. Speaker, everybody is aware of the fact that the shipbuilding industry throughout the world is experiencing difficulties and we have done for the shipbuilding industry in Quebec what her government had never done in 20 years.

As to the spinoffs from the Hibernia project, I am pleased to advise the hon. member that beyond the persons-years guaranteed to Canada, a contract worth $360 million has been awarded to a Quebec firm, and that a second contract has been awarded to a firm whose assets are 60 per cent Quebec-owned. Mr. Speaker, if those are not spinoffs for Quebec, I am sure I do not have the same definition as the hon. member of that province's interest!

• (1450)

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton-East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology remained silent in this House, although he knew five months ago that the Quebec shipbuilding industry was going to disappear. He remained silent again when Air Canada announced that 2,900 workers have lost their jobs, and when hardly half and hour ago, the Canadian National Railways announced that 1,500 workers had also lost their jobs.

What is he doing as Minister of Industry, when all we see here in Canada are industries being lost?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Further to what the Minister of Finance said, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that we live in more difficult economic times. But contrary to what my colleague's party did during the 1981-82 recession, we are taking steps to help the industry.

When she referred to the lost jobs, she overlooked the fact that in the area of industrial development, especially in Ontario and Quebec, there were major spinoffs and that last week, the Economic Council of Canada insisted on the fact that through the Western Canada and Atlantic Canada diversification agencies, the government had taken steps to meet its obligations through privatization and tax incentives.

What makes a recession under a Conservative Government different from a recession under a Liberal Government, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that we have answers which you never had which led to this country being left in an unbelievable financial mess!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In December, 1988 the Canadian Security Intelligence Service initiated a national inquiry into what it called native extremism. In June, 1989 that report was presented to the Conservative government warning the government of the possibility of "sporadic outbreaks of violence" by native people.

Will the Solicitor General first confirm that, yes, indeed his government was in receipt of this report in the spring of 1989, and can he explain to the people of Canada why his government did absolutely nothing to prevent the unfortunate and tragic events at Oka and Akwesasne when it was prewarned?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, with respect to that particular report on native extremism, which is referred to in the annual report of SIRC for 1989–1990, the report was received by the Solicitor General and was made public.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the report, in fact, was not made public and he will know that in this year's report his government was criticized for not making public a report that SIRC put together based on the report of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. He knows that that is in the report.

I ask the Solicitor General whether that specific information about the potential for sporadic violence was passed on to the Government of Quebec and, in particular, to the provincial police in Quebec, the Sûreté du Québec? Will he immediately table the complete report here in the House of Commons?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I follow my hon. colleague, but if I may quote from the 1989–90 annual report, on page 28, it states: "On February 5, 1990, the Solicitor General released a version of the report"—

Some hon. members: A version.

Mr. Cadieux: That is correct, "—with significant portions blacked out for reasons of national security and privacy, accompanied by a news release".

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Minister of Communications told me that he had rejected a cabinet appeal of the CRTC decision denying the last FM station in Toronto to the Afro-Canadian applicant because, and I quote: "English Canada insisted upon an arm's length relationship". Yet, the government has intervened with the CRTC more than any other government.

If the government could act on behalf of Callnet three times and Tory interests in connection with the News Network, why can it not intervene in support of the three commissioners who considered the CRTC decision was an affront to the visible minority community and the multicultural nature of the country?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, cabinet reviewed the CRTC decision and was satisfied that due process had been followed.

My colleague, and in fact all members of cabinet, are very aware of the concerns of members of the Toronto community for another format. The fact of the matter is, that this decision has not precluded the possibility of a dance music station in Toronto. The CRTC has already asked for public comment on the use of the former CKO-FM frequency and the Minister of Communications has invited the public to make views known to the CRTC before October 31. I wholly support and endorse this call.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Communications also said that ownership was not the issue, but there are no Afro-Canadian owned stations in the country. He said that dance music was available, and so showed his insensitivity to black culture. He emphasized the French-English dichotomy which shuts many Canadians out.

Does the government not recognize in this an example of systemic discrimination at the highest level? What action does the government intend to take to rectify this insult to 300,000 visible minority members in the city of Toronto?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, we have no lesson to learn from the opposition on our commitment to multiculturalism.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Weiner: We are the government that introduced the Canadian Multiculturalism Act. We are bringing forward legislation to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation. We are creating the new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

We will pursue a very active program of race relations and cross-cultural understanding right across this nation to help Canadians understand each other better and become more comfortable with each other.

ENERGY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy and it concerns the status of methanol as a transportation fuel in Canada.

As the minister knows, oil passed the $40-a-barrel mark yesterday and may be poised for more oil shocks as the Persian Gulf crisis continues. Given that, alternative fuels like methanol assume a greater importance for our energy security.

• (1500)

As the minister knows, vehicles powered by 85 per cent methanol are clean burning and practical. In fact, Canada is exporting 2,000 methanol burning cars to California.

Therefore, my question is this: Why can Canadians not buy methanol in Canada? What is the government intending to do to look at alternative fuels so that we can have more energy security for this country?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, let me thank the hon. member for the question. It is a sensible question.

I want to tell the hon. member and the House that the 85 per cent methanol is still in the experimental stage. As he mentioned in his question, Canada will be participating in the California test.

Canadian technology will be available, and we believe that it can be an export market for us as well as helping us in terms of alternate energy.

Also, I remind him of the MILE program where we are using methanol in heavy duty engines, two cycle engines. I want to inform him that in the near future, we will be announcing with a Winnipeg company called New Flyer Bus Lines a new program on methanol.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

LONGUE-POINTE MILITARY BASE

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. A study done by the firm Productivity Group at the request of DND last January recommends shutting down Longue-Pointe's military base. This would affect 1,200 workers and thousands of indirect jobs because the military base awards almost $2 million worth of contracts annually to Montreal companies. Mr. Speaker, does the minister intend to follow up on or even consider this recommendation?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the study that was done was a preliminary study.

As the hon. member is aware, the Department of National Defence has had a reduction in its budget. Before any further action would be taken on the preliminary study, there would have to be a detailed study.

Hon. members must be aware that the responsibility that the Department of National Defence has is that of providing security to Canada. We do it in the most efficient manner possible.

POINTS OF ORDER

REPLY DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Yesterday in the House, the Minister of Public Works told the House in reply to a question concerning Technitread Tire Manufacturing that the company had purchased the land upon which the plant was constructed for $250,000.

However, on May 17, 1990, the minister and his officials testified before the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Issue No. 46, pages 25 and 30, that the property was purchased for $125,000.

What we have been trying to get from the minister are the full facts about the government's relationship with this company. Yesterday for some reason, the minister—either because he was ignorant of the facts or because he no doubt inadvertently misled the House—

Mr. Speaker: Surely, this is a debate over facts that are on the floor of the House. Points of order are not supposed to be used to redebate a matter or redebate an exchange.

The hon. member can pursue it in another way, but I do not think it is a proper point of order.

If the hon. member has something further to add, I will hear him.

[Translation]

BLOC QUÉBÉCOIS—ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to remind the Chair that there is a group called the Bloc Québécois which, now and again, would like to have an opportunity to ask questions in the House and to hold the government responsible for its actions.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to go over your list of the past few weeks to see to what extent the Bloc Québécois did not get its share of questions on the basis of its representation in this House. Worse still, Mr. Speaker, on each occasion we had time for only one question, which gave the government a chance to make a statement to which we could not respond.

Mr. Speaker, why should we be limited to half questions when other members of the opposition are entitled to a full question, plus a supplementary? We are not half members, we do not have half privileges, and we are not here for half measures, Mr. Speaker!

I should like to remind you that we represent as many constituents as any other member in this House, and we are beginning to be fed up with being treated as if we were charity cases!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I am going to respond to that. I do not need to hear further members. If members will consider carefully, and the public that is watching, this was a very vigorous Question Period and we did not reach the usual number of members. I only have 45 minutes. I am sure that the hon. member can accept the fact that I have heard his representation and will try to do the very best I can tomorrow and on other days.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to contain themselves and behave in this House. Many years ago hon. members stopped behaving that way because the public was sick and tired of it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

MOTION TO ADJOURN PURSUANT TO S. O. 52

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52, I ask for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of debating the utterly disastrous impact of high interest rates.

In a city like Montreal, Mr. Speaker, with a population the size of Manitoba's, we now have in the early stages of the recession an unemployment rate in excess of 14 per cent. We cannot accept—

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I read with some concern his request for an emergency debate. But after all this is an issue which could have been debated yesterday. It is a problem, it is a very important matter, but it would not be appropriate to hold such a debate today.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With respect to your remark concerning the attitude of certain members of the Bloc Québécois who have been rather noisy, you said you had never seen anything like it in the House of Commons. I for one can tell you that I have never seen a group so deprived of its rights as is the Bloc Québécois when it comes to the question period, to its right to speak, and to all privileges which are normally extended to any group that represents the public. This is hardly acceptable.

Mr. Speaker, we are asking for a private meeting with you to solve this problem.

Mr. Gérin: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Very well. I thank the hon. member for his intervention. Each member is entitled to disagree with the Chair. I did not say I had never seen such disorder. I said that the banging-the-desk approach has been abandoned by members of this House a number of years ago.

Besides, as I was saying—

Mr. Gérin: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is on the same point of order, it is not appropriate to be rising. If it is something different, I will hear it.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, a Bloc Quebecois member claims that his privileges have been breached, and that is the worst thing that can happen in this House. In addition, another member is requesting a meeting with you to talk about the partiality or impartiality which the Chair must show in the House. We did not get an answer to that question. We would like to know whether we can meet with you within the next few minutes to discuss the impartiality of the Chair concerning all members of the House, including the members from Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: I took exactly the same attitude with respect to the hon. member as I did with respect to other members on the government or the opposition side.

Some hon. members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: Of course if a member wishes to talk to the Speaker the door is always open.

Routine Proceedings

DESIGNATION OF MEMBERS

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you could clarify something for this member before you. Often an independent member is referred to in the press—and the case in point is the member for Beaver River—as the member of Parliament for the Reform Party of Canada. Is that member recognized as a member coming from a party or is she recognized in this House as an independent?

If I could, I would put the same question to you to clarify the situation of the members who are elected, the media says, by the Bloc Québécois. Are they recognized as Bloc Québécois in this House, or are they recognized as independent members of the House of Commons?

Mr. Speaker: I would advise the hon. member for Athabasca that that very question is under advisement at the present time.

CO-OPERATIVE ENERGY CORPORATION AND LOWER CHURCHILL DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORTS

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I am pleased to table in both official languages the annual reports of the Co-operative Energy Corporation and the Lower Churchill Development Corporation for the year ending December 31, 1989.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we are all aware that the Campeau-Bélanger Commission has begun its work and the Prime Minister indicated that we could count on him so that we would not simply be looking at one shopping list.

I wonder if the government could indicate when the Prime Minister would be tabling the government's proposals for this discussion across the country.

Mr. Cooper: I will have to take that as notice of an intervention by the member and we will see what we can do to find the information he requests.

PETITIONS

TURKEY

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am presenting to the House two petitions today. The first one is on behalf of Amnesty International, requesting that the House of Commons bring to the attention of the Turkish government its opposition to capital punishment and the hope that any death penalties imposed by the Turkish government will be commuted.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from residents of Rosedale riding in Toronto, urging the Canadian government to take immediate and effective measures to secure the release of a Canadian citizen, Mr. Yi-Sheh Leo, who is imprisoned at the moment in Taiwan.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 36 to present petitions signed by scores of dairy and poultry farmers across Ontario who ask this House to provide a remedy.

They are calling on Parliament to instruct the government to hold out our Canadian marketing system as an example to the rest of the world and to protect it in its entirety at all costs in the current round of GATT negotiations.

It is not acceptable that systems which are legislated by this House are being traded away in negotiations behind closed doors circumventing this Parliament.

VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, today I wish to table a petition with more than 2,000 signatures of residents of the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean area, and more specifically the riding of Jonquière, who call upon Parliament to do what is necessary to encourage television broadcasting networks and cable companies to ban children's programs that show violence as a normal means of conflict resolution.

They also call upon this government to introduce regulations to ban children's programs that show violence and war, as well as the sale of toy rifles, machine guns, and so forth, and to set up a special fund to support the production of television series for children in which heroes and heroines are concerned about human rights, peace, international co-operation and so forth.

CANADA POST

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to present to this House petitions containing hundreds of names from the federal riding of Cardigan, Prince Edward Island.

The petitioners are opposed to the post office's harmful proposal to eliminate Saturday rural mail in Prince Edward Island. The people want this decision by Canada Post reversed and at the very least a six-month extension so that the decision can be examined to see if we can restore the service.

VARIABLE ENTRANCE REQUIREMENT

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise in accordance with Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of 56 of my constituents. They are from the Bay Roberts, Harbour Grace, Carbonear, Bristol's Hope, Perry's Cove area, and Salmon Cove.

They are concerned that they need 14 weeks instead of 10 weeks in order to qualify for unemployment insurance in Newfoundland.

They note also that the unemployment rate in Newfoundland is, if not the highest, among the highest in the country. They the undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament simply to introduce the variable entrance requirement without delay.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition to this House signed by by numerous residents of Mississauga, Ontario, who object to the government's proposed goods and services tax in particular as it taxes books and the printed word.

• (1520)

They indicate to the House that the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy. Freedom of the press, of course, is one of the freedoms we enjoy under our Charter of Rights and Freedoms in this country.

Yet this government, in its contemptuous move, has elected to seek to impose a tax on the printed word that these petitioners object to. They call upon Parliament to reject such an iniquitous measure.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, like my colleague from Kingston and the Islands I have a petition containing numerous signatures from one end of Mississauga to the other.

These petitioners are highly indignant about the policy of the government to impose the goods and services tax on the printed word. They point out that through the history of our country taxes have never been imposed on books, that this is unprecedented, and that it is in violation of the fundamental understanding of Canadians of the importance of the printed word.

They call on the government to withdraw the tax in so far as it applies to books.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of many Canadians from various parts of Toronto and surroundings, including Mississauga South and Mississauga West which are currently held by members who are unwilling to present such petitions. They are also from Thornhill, Newmarket, North York, Downsview, Toronto, Scarborough, and so on.

They humbly petition this Parliament to implore the government to withdraw from its decision to impose a GST on books and printed matter, on matters of democracy, culture and education, and all matters pertaining to the development of a literate and productive society. These matters will be affected negatively by the GST because of the government's decision to move away from a zero rate of tax on magazines, books, newspapers, et cetera.

HERITAGE LANGUAGE FOUNDATION

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet, I would like to make reference to another petition that did not conform to Standing Order 36.

Similar citizens refer to the decision on the part of the government to withdraw funds from the Heritage Languages Foundation. This decision also impacts negatively on their ability to promote democracy, culture, and education in a literate society among a very specific group of individuals in Toronto and in Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present three petitions signed by many concerned Canadians who are opposed to the GST being charged on magazines, books, and newspapers.

They call upon Parliament to reverse this decision. These Canadians are saying: "Don't tax reading".

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to this House a petition, which has been certified correct by the clerk of petitions.

It contains the signatures of not only individuals in my riding of Hamilton West but many of them in the riding of Burlington. There are others from Guelph, Fallingbrook, and Appleford.

These petitioners are all opposed to the goods and services tax and call on this government and the other place to reject this unfair and regressive bill.

OPPOSITION TO GST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and the privilege of presenting a petition signed by a number of constituents in the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell which I have the honour to represent.

These residents live in communities like Sarsfield, Clarence Creek and several other villages in the riding.

Mr. Speaker, the hundreds of Canadians who signed these petitions and who are from communities all over my riding, call upon this government and Parliament to ensure that the GST bill is abandoned immediately.

I hope that once and for all, the Conservative Government will listen to the constructive advice given by constituents in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[English]

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present two petitions today. First I have a petition from a number of residents in the city of Moose Jaw who are opposed to the goods and services tax. They say that the goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for taxpayers' ability to pay.

They further state that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax, while forcing lower and middle income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

They call upon this government to reject the GST tax and put in a fair form of taxation.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): I also have a petition, Mr. Speaker, once again from a number of farmers in Saskatchewan who are opposed to the withdrawal of oats from the Canadian Wheat Board. These farmers are concerned that the Wheat Board is now being weakened.

They call upon this government to re-place oats under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. They also call upon this government to give oats and barley the same protection as wheat now has under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, namely that it cannot be changed or removed without the consent of Parliament.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition with names of hundreds of residents of Burnaby—Kingsway and elsewhere in British Columbia, collected by the B.C. Amateur Hockey Association and the Burnaby Minor Hockey Association, pointing out that individual amateur hockey consumers in British Columbia are not eligible for the goods and services tax credit and therefore will undoubtedly absorb this tax after every other producer receives a tax credit.

They note as well that the amateur hockey community in British Columbia, the hundreds of local community associations, the thousands of amateur hockey teams, tens of thousands of young players, the hundreds of thousands of taxpaying parents, and the millions of amateur hockey volunteers and supporters across Canada will ultimately bear the burden of this iniquitous goods and services tax.

For that reason they note as well that the impact of the GST on the amateur hockey community, the players, the parents, the fans, the coaches, the team officials, the referees, the linesmen, the volunteer executives, and the sponsors will be very serious.

For that reason, they urge the Government of Canada to withdraw the application of the GST on provincial non-profit sports organizations such as the British Columbia Amateur Hockey Association.

CANADIAN NATIONAL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting another petition which notes that an all-party parliamentary subcommittee was created by order on April 17, 1985 to examine, inquire to and to report on all matters of CN pensions.

This subcommittee made comprehensive recommendations which have been ignored to date. Therefore these petitioners call upon Parliament to introduce legislation directing the CN railway company to comply with all recommendations of this subcommittee as detailed by the subcommittee report forthwith.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have another petition, again signed by hundreds of residents of British Columbia, noting that the railway passenger service as carried on by VIA Rail is essential for many Canadians and has been a part of Canada for more than 100 years.

They object to the cuts to the VIA Rail budget and service. They call upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment, and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger rail service in Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of the residents of Logan Lake, Lac le Jeune, Rose Hill, Knutford, Monty Creek, Monty Lake, Westwold, Pillar Lake, Chase, Pritchard, Dallas, Valleyview, Barnettville, Red Lake, Deadman's Creek, Louis Creek, and Pinantan Lake.

All of the petitioners point out that the government's proposed goods and services tax is very unfair and that 69,000 profitable corporations pay no income tax.

They do not see any reason why they should be punished now with this cruel and brutal goods and services tax, so they are asking the government to back off.

I have another petition, Mr. Speaker. These petitioners from Kamloops, Calgary, and Ottawa point out again that the government has decided to tax magazines, books, newspapers, and children's story books. They feel that taxing children's story books is at an all-time low in terms of a government that is gouging people for taxes.

They are asking the government to come to its senses and stop taxing literature because we will be the only country in the world that does so if the government continues along this course.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise again in this House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by several people from all over the place. They are petitioning Parliament to reject the proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and to cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform. Wise words, Mr. Speaker, wise words.

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)) moved that Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege for me to introduce legislation which will authorize the government to sell shares of Petro-Canada to the Canadian public.

Before I speak to the legislation itself, I would like to remind hon. members of the origins of this government's privatization program. In his 1985 budget, the Minister of Finance announced that the government would take a critical look at its Crown holdings. Those companies that no longer required government ownership to fulfil a public policy role would be considered for privatization.

Since that time, privatization has become a major component of this government's economic agenda.

Canada is not alone in realizing the value of privatization and helping to redefine the role of the state. Indeed, governments throughout the world are questioning the methods of the past.

This is no more obvious than in eastern Europe where the long awaited benefits of state ownership are proving to be too costly and too elusive. Interventionist ideology is being abandoned in favour of the simple common sense of the market system. In these countries, privatization is viewed as a necessary step in achieving this important objective.

A number of these companies are looking to Canada for advice in this field. We have responded to requests for guidance from Australia, New Zealand, Venezuela, Senegal, Tunisia and Romania. Officials of my department have recently been in Poland and Hungary actively supporting the privatization efforts of those governments.

Canada is honoured to be of assistance to these countries in their privatization efforts. At the same time, we are mindful of the important work that we need to undertake right here at home.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Petro-Canada is the most important integrated oil company in Canada that belongs to Canadians, and Bill C-84 intends to make sure it stays that way.

The corporation is present in all cities and towns in this country. To many Canadians, however, Petro-Canada is not just a place where they sell gas. It has demonstrated its commitment through a host of activities, ranging from fitness and amateur sport to improving the environment. The corporation has been deeply committed to promoting national pride. Remember the great Canadian rally, "Share the flame", that took place in 1988 at the same time as the Calgary Winter Games.

Petro-Canada is involved in this type of activity, and I am sure its involvement will continue, not because of any government directive but because it is appropriate for a company to express its commitment to serving Canadians.

[English]

Petro-Canada is part of a competitive and dynamic industry. If it is to remain competitive, we must ensure that the company has a reliable source of new equity. Instead of forcing the company to continue to rely on the taxpayers of Canada for that equity, privatization will give Petro-Canada direct access to an alternative source of capital, the individual investor.

Petro-Canada will benefit from this development. The company will gain a measure of financial flexibility that has always been enjoyed by its private sector counterparts and competitors.

But there are some who say that we would be giving up too much in the process.

I would like to respond to these concerns by briefly reviewing the original mandate of the company. In simple terms, Petro-Canada was to pursue the following objectives: to increase petroleum supplies and Canadian presence in the industry; to act as the agent in any state-to-state training; and finally, to serve as the government's "window on the energy industry".

This government's decision to proceed with the privatization of Petro-Canada should be viewed in light of these original objectives.

Clearly Petro-Canada has established itself as a major integrated energy producer in Canada. Between 1975 and 1984 the company expanded its presence in both upstream and downstream activities. Today it represents 6 per cent of the exploration and development side of the industry and 19 per cent of the refining and marketing business in Canada.

But Petro-Canada is not the only thing that has changed in the energy industry in the last 15 years. The world energy markets have changed and Canada's energy policy has moved from an interventionist approach to one that relies on market forces, one that applies to all of the industry participants and not simply to one player.

The focus of that policy is to establish the conditions in which economic development of our energy reserves can occur. In Petro-Canada's case, getting on with this important work will be greatly assisted by the capital infusion made possible by privatization. That is what this bill is about; letting Petro-Canada get on with the business of doing what it does best.

The September 14 signing of the Hibernia agreement should help bring this point into sharp focus for the members of this House. As a partner in the Hibernia project, Petro-Canada will be expected to carry its fair share of the development costs. Considerable financial resources will be required by the company to take advantage of the opportunities for developing its interests in projects like Hibernia, Terra Nova and the oil sands.

This bill will give Petro-Canada a way to raise equity without placing the burden on the Canadian taxpayer.

• (1540)

Let me turn briefly to the company's state to state trading function. It is worth noting that Petro-Canada only entered into one such agreement in the past 14 years. As it turned out, this particular transaction proved to be an awkward arrangement for Petro-Canada to manage. Eventually, it was allowed to lapse.

Finally, we come to Petro-Canada's best known but perhaps least understood objective, to be a window on the energy industry.

I believe that it is important that Canadians realize that today we have a direct line of sight into what is going on in the oil business in Canada. We now have at our disposal the accumulated expertise and knowledge of government agencies such as the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration and the National Energy Board.

Whatever vacuum may have existed in the early 1970s has been more than filled by these agencies.

Through these and other means, the government is able to maintain a broad perspective on the workings of the Canadian oil and gas industry. Petro-Canada is one of over 2,500 companies involved in the business here in Canada. What possible benefit can be gained by tying up billions of dollars of taxpayers' resources in the ownership of Petro-Canada to get the narrow view offered by this one oil company?

We are not here to debate the validity of Petro-Canada's original mandate. This bill is not about the past. This bill is about the future, Petro-Canada's future.

Before dealing with this, however, I would like to turn our attention briefly to a matter that is very much in the present.

Many Canadians—I am sure they have expressed this to you, Mr. Speaker—are concerned about the current tensions in the Middle East. The uncertainty caused by this situation is reflected in the international energy markets. The Minister of Energy recently addressed this House on the issue and made it quite clear that existing energy policies on security of supply and emergency preparedness provide the framework for Canada's response to these developments.

There are those opposite who will argue that the government must maintain its ownership of Petro-Canada, one of several oil companies involved in the exploration and development of Canada's energy reserves, in order to insulate Canada from these uncertainties. Those who make that argument, I contend, ignore the reality that Canada's economy is part of the world market. They also ignore the fact that what Petro-Canada really needs is a reliable source of new equity.

Let me be clear on this point. Government ownership of Petro-Canada does not add one drop of oil to Canadian production.

Neither will government ownership of Petro-Canada lower the price Canadians paid at the pump.

The government has carefully considered Petro-Canada's original mandate in coming to this decision. While some members opposite may want to ignore reality and put their ideology ahead of common sense, this government has an obligation to do what is right for Petro-Canada and for the people of Canada.

It is not just the government that wants to see individual Canadians given the opportunity to participate directly in the ownership of this important national enterprise.

The company and its employees are also looking forward to the prospects of privatization, because it will give Petro-Canada access to capital that their current shareholder, the Government of Canada, cannot provide.

They recognize that direct ownership of Petro-Canada by individual Canadians will strengthen the company and improve its prospects for growth.

Let me now turn to the legislation. The essential purpose of the legislation is first, to give Petro-Canada, through direct public participation by individual Canadians, the financial flexibility it needs to continue the exploration and development of Canadian energy reserves. Second, it is to allow individual Canadians the opportunity to share directly in the future growth of this great Canadian enterprise.

Throughout Canada's history the federal and provincial governments have used various methods to meet the public policy objectives of the day. These measures have been tempered with a recognition of the prevailing economic realities facing our nation.

At times governments have created Crown corporations where state ownership was deemed the most appropriate means to achieve a public policy purpose. In other circumstances governments have chosen not to intervene in the market through the direct ownership of capital assets, but rather by regulating the activities of the private sector. At other times, tax incentives have been used or grants provided to encourage desired behaviour on the part of the private sector. In still other circumstances, we have wisely decided to stay out of the way and relied on competitive market forces to produce the best result for producers and consumers.

In short, Canadians have been quite practical about the way in which governments influence the activities of the private sector. We have called for government intervention when necessary; but Canadians have usually focused on the ends more than the means.

In the case of Petro-Canada, the end product is a contribution to the health of Canada's energy industry. But as the chairman and chief executive officer of Petro-Canada has stated publicly, unless the company gains additional funds to reinforce its capital base, the company simply cannot get on with the job of developing Canada's energy reserves and marketing petroleum products to Canadians without raising its debt to unsustainable levels.

Without new equity, Petro-Canada will not be able to contribute fully to this important task. Our decision to privatize Petro-Canada is a pragmatic, common sense response that will benefit Petro-Canada and the Canadian taxpayer.

By offering Petro-Canada shares to the public, we are giving individual Canadians the opportunity to take a direct stake in this great Canadian oil company and to share in its future. Perhaps more importantly, we are giving Petro-Canada a source of new equity that simply cannot be obtained by a wholly-owned Crown corporation. I believe that a privatized Petro-Canada, with individual Canadians participating in its ownership, is destined to become an even greater source of national pride.

Our conclusion that state ownership of Petro-Canada is no longer necessary to achieve a public policy purpose is shared by many beyond the government. It is the view of Petro-Canada's own employees and management. And it is the view of the Economic Council of Canada—which the opposition has been prone to quote over the last few days—which studied the issue of public ownership in a report entitled: "Minding our own Business". It is a report which I recommend to all members.

This legislation will allow for the sale of all Petro-Canada shares. Petro-Canada's privatization will take place in stages, with the first offering of a size sufficient to give the company the equity required to improve its financial position.

This initial public offering will create a broad market for the company's shares, while ensuring an orderly transition from ownership by the Canadian government to ownership by the Canadian people. The net proceeds of future sales of the government shares will be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

While the government will continue to hold a majority ownership position in the company for the time being, our intention is to manage these shares as an investment and to reduce our holdings over time. The government will negotiate a shareholders' agreement with the company which will confirm our intentions concerning the management of our remaining shares.

In keeping with the successful approach to employee share ownership undertaken in a number of previous privatizations, the board of directors of Petro-Canada will develop an employee share ownership plan as part of the initial offering.

• (1550)

No individual, regardless of residence, will be allowed to own more than 10 per cent of the publicly available shares. In addition, the legislation limits total non-resident ownership to no more than 25 per cent of publicly available shares. By limiting the amount of cumulative foreign ownership, Petro-Canada can gain access to significant sources of new capital while ensuring that the company remains Canadian owned and Canadian controlled.

Through section 9 of the legislation, the articles of Petro-Canada will require that the headquarters remain in Calgary. The articles will also require that Petro-Canada continue to provide services in both official languages.

Following the successful process employed in the sale of Air Canada's shares to the public, Petro-Canada will be responsible for managing the initial public offering of shares. Only when final receipt for a prospectus is received from regulating authorities will the price of shares be determined. At that time the price will be negotiated between the underwriters and the board of directors based on prevailing market conditions.

I might say that we have made an offer to both our opposition critics, whom I am sure we will hear from later today, for a complete briefing. Neither of them have contacted us to set up a date for that briefing, but I want to assure them that the offer is still there and we would be pleased to provide that in-depth briefing at their convenience.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the privatization of Petro-Canada will help strengthen the corporation's financial base by providing the funds that will help it to continue to exploit our energy resources. That is the kind of common sense approach from this government that Canadians appreciate. Economically speaking, Petro-Canada will thrive as well. Thanks to this bill, Canadians will own the corporation and have a controlling interest. It will give all Canadians a chance to participate directly in this great national enterprise.

[English]

I think that I have made it very clear that, in order to pursue its commitment to Canadians, Petro-Canada needs to have a new source of equity. Those funds can come from individual investors through privatization, or they can come from the Canadian taxpayer. The government has chosen privatization.

While Petro-Canada may have been created as a product of ideology and political expediency, its privatization is a matter of simple common sense. I therefore commend this legislation to the House and recommend its early passage into law.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to address the second reading of Bill C-84, an act to privatize our national petroleum corporation, Petro-Canada. Before jumping into my remarks dealing specifically with the privatization, I would like to make a couple of preliminary remarks.

The first has to do with what appears to me and several of my colleagues on this side of the House to be the unseemly haste with which the government has moved within the last several days with respect to the Petro-Canada privatization. It was introduced into the House last week and one would think there was a national emergency or something. Lo and behold, a few days later, it is here for second reading.

I know that Canadians spent all last summer pleading with the government to recall the House of Commons so that we could debate and discuss issues of significant national importance—I am thinking here of the Persian Gulf crisis and the events at Oka—and we could not get the government to move. And now, within one week, we have the introduction of a bill and second reading. We have not even completed the debate on the motions on Oka and the Gulf. There is something out of balance here and I do not really understand it.

Someone said to me, earlier in the week, that the government was going to run this up the flag-pole just to see how Canadians reacted, just to see if they really wanted to sell Petro-Canada, and that is possible. I do not want to be too cynical, but that may be exactly what is happening. The government simply wants Canadians to register their response and we will see in a few months, depending on how the polls turn out. That is government by poll.

In any event, we have to get on to this debate, but I do want to say that one does not just rush through a disposition of a $6.8 billion government asset. One may want to, but I do not think one does it. I do not think we want to do it and I do not think the government wants to do it, unless it is trying to hide something or it does not want to tell the whole story.

The second item to which I wanted to make reference is related and very important. That is the movement of the price of oil in world markets. Yesterday, the price moved above $40 a barrel. It has more than doubled in a two-month period. That is a big hike, a spike as they have started to call it, and it could go a lot higher.

We, on this side of the House, want to know what the government's policy and response is to this radical change in environment in the world energy market. I am not sure that we have a response, but the timing is awfully poor. The same week that this happens, we seem to be rushing through the privatization of our state oil company.

Other governments around the world, over the last few days, have made adjustments. They have got their state oil companies into gear and they have proceeded to analyse the markets. About a week ago, the United States released about five million barrels of its strategic petroleum reserve. Why? To attempt to stabilize the market.

What is our government doing? There has been no discussion of what our government will do. There appears to be a policy vacuum, based on a premise that we leave energy policy to the marketplace, to the same people who valued our oil at $20 a barrel two months ago and $40 a barrel now. That is the foundation of our oil policy. Canadians are concerned about that and if the government does its polling it will see that. It will see how concerned Canadians in eastern Canada are about the price of home heating oil. The government will see how concerned constituents in my own riding of Scarborough—Rouge River are about simply the price of gasoline at the pumps.

Where is the government's policy on pricing for gasoline and home heating oil? Where are the government's policy objectives on security of supply, on competition in the upstream and downstream sectors in the oil business, and on enhancement of exploration and of recovery? We have not heard a lot about this in the last while. The government has been spending too much time planning to sell Petro-Canada.

These are questions that Canadians and my colleagues on this side of the House are asking, and we are not getting an answer.

Let us look at Petro-Canada. The hon. minister indicated that it would not be necessary in this debate to look at the objects of Petro-Canada. The minister wants to sell Petro-Canada. He wants to dispose of it. The government really wants to get rid of it. By saying that, the minister is indicating that he does not care what purpose Petro-Canada had because he and his government do not want anything to do with it.

• (1600)

I am going to refer to those objects. I am going to look over some of the goals that Petro-Canada had when it was founded and incorporated in 1975.

One of the objects was to engage in exploration for the development of hydrocarbons and other types of fuel or energy. Petro-Canada has done that, and it has done it well. It was to engage in research and development projects relating to fuel and energy resources. I do not think Petro-Canada has really executed on that. I would like to point out that Petro-Canada tried around 1980 or 1982, but when the Conservative government came to power, it simply shut down the R and D subsidiary called Canertech, and PetroCan was not able to continue with that object. Fair enough.

There are other objects: to import, produce, transport, distribute, refine and market hydrocarbons of all descriptions. Petro-Canada does that, and does it in spades. Another object is to produce, distribute, transport and market other fuels and energy. Last, to engage or invest in ventures or enterprises related to exploration production, importation, distribution, refining and marketing of fuel energy and related resources. That is a fine mandate. Those are the objects as set out in the original Petro-Canada Act. Petro-Canada has delivered on those.

It has, in accordance with those objects and the mandate it was initially given, fulfilled its role as a state oil company. Dozens of other countries around the world, almost every country that has a play, a stake in the oil energy business, has a state oil company. For some reason, we in Canada did not prior to 1975. Our neighbour to the south did not. We all know why it did not. It was because it had what came to be known as the seven sisters. It had a good handful, a multibillion dollar handful of multinational oil companies engaged in all sectors of the oil energy business right around the world. It did not need a state oil company. It already had its corporations active in the field. Countries such as Norway, India, Venezuela, Brazil, and the list goes on, have state oil companies that are active today in the oil market, whether the price of oil is $50 a barrel or $20 a barrel. Each of those companies is fulfilling a mandate on behalf of the citizens of the country those companies represent.

In 1975, Canada decided to create its own state oil company. It built its own corporation. It became the second largest integrated oil company in Canada, and Canada did it on its own. It was big enough to compete and work with the majors, domestically and internationally.

Why did Canada need a state oil company? Why do other countries need them? Why have they come to be? I submit that there were three principle reasons. First, to Canadianize our oil and gas sector. Second, to engage in exploration for oil and gas. Third, to provide what has become known as a window on the oil industry. Let us look at those three areas in a bit more detail.

Do you remember the sixties? I am not doing this for nostalgic purposes. I am doing it so we can remember a little bit how things were in the 1960s. We were being eaten alive by non-Canadian oil companies that wished to purchase, expand and be present in the Canadian market. They were gobbling up our oil and gas concerns. Do you remember Supertest? Do you remember BA or White Rose? I can see the Speaker remembers White Rose.

These former old oil companies were all absorbed by the multinational majors and disappeared. Each of them had an element of Canadian control. We got a little nervous in the 1960s and 1970s when we suddenly realized that our whole energy sector was being not so much manipulated, but worked over nicely by the multinationals. We were quickly losing our presence as Canadians.

Who are the majors who participate in Canada now, and where are their head offices? It is just not a geography lesson here. The head offices are where the dividends go, where the major board decisions are made on just what corporate enterprises are carried out and how they do it.

One of them, the biggest, is Exxon. I think their home is Fairfield, Connecticut. Shell, The Hague, The Netherlands; Mobil Oil-Chevron-Amoco have offices in Chicago, California and New York. It is fair to say that each of those corporations does not give a darn about the goals of Canadians in the energy sector. Why should they? I am not even saying they should. I do not believe they do, and I do not believe they should because their goal is to generate profits for their shareholders. That is their mandate. They do not care about security of supply in Canada. They do not care about Canadian conservation efforts or off oil efforts. Off oil efforts may in fact shrink their business. They have no reason at all to push that element of a government energy policy, if there was a government energy policy.

To recap simply, their goal is profitable—and that is not a bad word, it is a good word—operations for their shareholders, most of whom reside outside Canada. An example of that not caring, not being interested, occurred within the last couple of years. You will recall that Texaco, one of the seven sisters, a big major, had a bit of a problem with a lawsuit in Texas, I believe. I will not mention the other oil company in case I have the name wrong, but the oil company claimed Texaco had reneged on a handshake. Ultimately the courts in Texas and the appeal courts in the United States found that Texaco did in fact have a deal on a handshake—lawyers beware—and as a result of that Texaco became indebted to this plaintiff in the amount of several billion dollars.

Texaco simply did not have that money sitting in the bank. Its solution, among other parts of the solution, was simply to get rid of Texaco Canada. Sell it, take the cash, pay off part of the judgment. That was fine but that sell-off, that change in ownership took into account none of the policy considerations which I maintain our government must be placing in the forefront. It had the right to do that. It had to be given the freedom to do that. It is a free player in our energy industry here.

The result of that was that some aspects of that disposition and sale did not fit within our competition framework. Ultimately that disposition went to our competition tribunal. The competition tribunal decided that piece of Texaco in eastern Canada could not be sold to Imperial Oil, which is a part of Exxon, and it had to be spun off into another corporate entity, another purchaser. That ultimately done, there were over 600 commercial units in this sell-off, and it was placed in the hands of another corporation in Canada.

Exploration. Why must we pay attention to our frontier oil exploration? Projections are now that within about a decade or a little more, Canada will become a net importer of light crude oil. Light crude is the basis of our gasoline industry, the cheapest basis of our gasoline industry. It should make some people around here very uncomfortable. We have a 10, 11 or 12-year clock running.

As an example, the Japan National Oil Company has and continues to invest billions of dollars all over the world for the exclusive purpose of securing a supply of oil for Japan that is Japan controlled. What does this government plan to do for Canada? What is its security of supply plan for Canada over the next 10 years? How are we going to replace the reserves which will be consumed over the next decade? Many of those reserves will become tied up in mandatory energy transfers and sales to consumers and customers in the United States under the free trade agreement. I think the figure now used, if you do the calculations under the free trade agreement, whereby we would continue to be obligated to provide about 30 per cent of our production to the—

Mr. Harvey: Forty.

Mr. Lee: Someone says forty. We will do a calculation a little later but it is a big chunk, 30 per cent to United States customers. That figure runs completely contrary to any concept of security of supply for Canadians. That policy goal is gone, at least it is 30 per cent gone. If we do not get busy with an energy policy for Canada, it is going to be gone even more. I just want to make sure that everyone here recognizes how vital oil is to our economy, our economy as one of the industrialized countries.

Third, having looked at Canadianization and exploration, this concept of the window on the industry. Why did we want it? There were a lot of reasons. We were not just nosy, we were not just curious, we were not just coming of age in wanting to know how people traded in oil and things like that. What we needed was to accumulate and ensure the presence of know-how in the trading of oil and oil commodity on the world market because we could see that it was a world market. We needed that know-how right here in Canada, not in government necessarily. We wanted to place it in our national oil company. A lot of other companies rely on their state oil company in doing that, and we wanted it here in Canada. That expertise is here, but it is not Canadian controlled, it is controlled in the head offices I referred to earlier, and they do not care about our Canadian objectives.

The second reason for the window was that we needed a view on price competition. I know the government will come to recognize in the next few weeks how short the fuse of Canadians is on the issue of gasoline prices. That will turn up in the polls as sure as I am standing here. The government will then, I am sure, want to react and at least let Canadians know it is alive and it has a policy.

The third reason was that we wanted to monitor progress and development in the exploration field, particularly in the frontier, exploration for those oil reserves that we needed so badly to ensure that Canada stayed as an energy self-sufficient country.

I want to make sure that no one has any doubt about the importance of the price of oil here. It may be just my own personal view, but it is my view that the price of oil is the reason that the Canadian dollar has remained as high as it has on world money markets over the last few weeks. It is my view that the world views Canada as being energy sufficient at this time, and that as a result our Canadian dollar is able to more than hold its own in the world market.

How did Canada get into this oil sufficient status? One of the reasons is the accomplishments of the Canadian oil industry. We cannot underestimate its importance as a driving force in ensuring that we have a supply of reasonably priced oil for Canada.

There were other reasons for that condition. One of them was the off oil programs of the late seventies and early eighties. We moved consumers in Canada from oil to natural gas and from oil to electricity. We all paid for that. Sometimes it was simply good consumer choices, but we moved consumers away from oil. Therefore, we now consume less oil than we would have otherwise done.

We offered exploration incentives, and we expanded the market for western oil and gas farther east into Montreal. I have to point out that Petro-Canada played an integral role in every one of those reasons. We would not be here now if it were not for that. Maybe there could have been another vehicle, but it was not another vehicle. It was Petro-Canada. It did not do it by itself, but it was a player. It played a role.

We would not be in Hibernia now if it were not for Petro-Canada. Read me the story. Tell me how it developed. Tell me how Hibernia developed. Petro-Canada was there right from the beginning.

I want to make a comment about a statement made in an energy discussion paper that was published recently on the part of the government. It states that market forces should be allowed to allocate resources and determine prices for energy. That sounds like an economic class discussion, but it assumes that the marketplace is in equilibrium. That is the question that I really want to raise.

Do we ever have a market that is in equilibrium? Do we ever have a market in oil and in energy that does not have some form of intervention? I am going to suggest that it is pretty rare that we do not. We have intervened physically in the Middle East, and we have reasons which we state diplomatically for doing so.

One of the big reasons we are there is to protect the security and stability of the world oil supply which is based, to a large measure, in the Saudi Arabian peninsula. We have state oil companies intervening in the marketplace all over the world right now or the OPEC cartel. That is what it is. It is a cartel. It fixes prices. It makes the market. It does not throw a coin up in the air and wait for it to fall. It fixes a price. That is not marketplace. That is a cartel at work.

Clearly in our own country we were prepared to intervene in a Texaco matter in relation to price competition. It was an oligopoly when Texaco sold to Imperial, which sold off those eastern Canadian assets.

I submit that any policy that simply turns over the energy well-being of this country to the marketplace is blind and is unaware of what Canadians want and what they need. The market to be sure is the driving force. We cannot operate against it, counter to it, but someone has to be in charge for Canadians. Some has to monitor and fine tune the system, and Petro-Canada was our vehicle to accomplish this.

• (1620)

A word about Canadianization. The figures that have historically been generated in this regard show that after Canada decided that it wanted to have 50 per cent control in the Canadian oil and gas sector, we moved from a figure of 26.1 per cent ownership in 1980, and not control, to a figure of 48.2 per cent in 1985. These were five or six good years of Canadianization.

Then,the Conservative government was elected in 1984, and after 1985 the figure falls markedly to where in 1989 we are back—not all the way back—to 44.9 per cent. There was a little blip there because when Imperial took over Texaco, Imperial was partly Canadian owned and therefore the numbers went up just a bit.

However we are falling back on that objective. The government has obviously abandoned that objective. Canadianization is no part of the government's goal here, but I think it is part of the goal of Canadians.

What would the government's position be now, I wonder and I ask, if we were back now in 1980 and the figure was 26 per cent? What would the governments position be? What would Canadians think?

Mr. McDermid: That's the trouble with the Liberals. They are living back in the eighties. We are in the nineties.

Mr. Lee: Tell me where we would be if we only owned 20 per cent to 25 per cent of our oil and gas sector. What would Canadians be thinking? What would they want their government to be doing?

I say shame for abandoning that goal. It does not matter to this government. It does not care. I submit that we want to be and we want to be seen as masters in our own energy house.

A bill in relation to the Hibernia development has just passed through this House. It is a big deal, an offshore development. It is the biggest oil development we have ever undertaken. Newfoundlanders think it is big. Quebecers think is it big. I think it is big; I know it is. A lot of people are very happy about the prospects for Hibernia which we are developing, but who is "we"?

It breaks down as follows, very simply: Mobil Oil and Chevron are participating to the extent of 50 per cent, and Petro–Canada and Gulf Resources are each participating to the extent of 50 per cent, 25 per cent each. Gulf Resources is Canadian controlled and Petro–Canada is Canadian controlled, but where would we be now with Hibernia if Petro–Canada were not there?

Would we be so generous as to offer grants and incentives for a project which was foreign controlled and where every barrel of oil product produced was targeted to go to the U.S.A.? Would we? I submit that we would not.

Mr. McDermid: We can regulate that.

Mr. Lee: We would be giving away the store.

Mr. McDermid: Don't be silly. We can regulate that.

Mr. Lee: I do not think we would be, but Petro–Canada is there now because Canadians put it there 15 years ago. That is why Petro–Canada is there now, and thank goodness it is. Until this government generates a national energy policy, I submit that is exactly where Petro–Canada should stay.

I will say a few words about Canadian unity and nation building. Remember those, my friends opposite. We are still building a country here. Sometimes we do take a lot for granted. We have a lot of freedoms. We have a lot of wealth, some of which is being redistributed and some of which is not. We have a lot of food. We have a lot of government. Most of it works well, but not all of it.

An hon. member: Too much government.

Mr. Lee: I think we do have too much government. I accept that comment, but what we have is a lot more than a lot of others in this world.

Petro–Canada may not be in the category or class of a venerable old institution. I am quite sure it is not but, like many other Canadian creations, we had to get out there and build it. We had to get out there and create it. We paid for it and we developed it.

Mr. McDermid: You bought it. You didn't develop it.

Mr. Lee: It is a manifestation of this country's presence in that commercial sector. It is a manifestation of our nationhood on Pelee Island and up in the Arctic. Maybe it is not perfect, but it is ours and we want to keep it. We are proud of it too. Maybe the government should be thinking more carefully about selling off our heritage like this. Maybe the government is starting to look a bit too much like a bunch of neo–Conservative carpetbaggers: just sell it because we do not care about it any more, just get rid of it.

Turning to financing, there is some complaint and argument that Petro–Canada is unable to finance itself and is using debt. There are three sources at least of financing commercial ventures. One is the cash flow, and that is why, as I understand it, Petro–Canada acquired its downstream assets 10 years ago and 5 years ago. It acquired a lot. The downstream assets, the marketing and the cash flow, are used in part to finance the other exploration and development aspects of a vertically integrated oil company. That is why it is there. The cash flow is there, and Petro–Canada has been using that cash flow for that purpose. There is no argument there, but it isn't quite enough according to Petro–Canada.

The other two means are equity and debt. At the moment there is a kind of equity in there put in by the government, preferred shares, but Petro–Canada has really done most of its financing with debt. There is a big debt. It is $1.9 billion. Down on Bay Street that is not a very good mix. There is not a very good mix there at all. I can understand why by the textbook that would cause some people some problems.

I do not accept the premise that a government Crown corporation is incapable of financing its ventures through debt. Why don't I accept debt? It is because I can see others that do.

Let us take a look at Hydro Quebec. Hydro Quebec has total assets of $33.952 billion or $34 billion. Its debt is $28 billion. No equity, just debt. The entire venture of Hydro Quebec, a huge undertaking, a vertically integrated monopoly, is financed by $28 billion in debt.

Ontario Hydro has total assets of $36.27 billion and a debt of $26.8 billion. That is a lot of debt, but it works. That is how we have financed in Ontario the infrastructure, the marketing of hydroelectricity, nuclear, and all other sources.

I do not accept the premise that debt financing does not work, because obviously it does for these two provincial Crown corporations.

Now I want to talk about Petro–Canada, a national Crown corporation which is having problems, it is said, with $1.9 billion in financing. I just do not accept that it cannot get on with its business if the government wanted it to do so. I do not see a difficulty and I am sure there is not one.

To begin to wrap up, I want to indicate that Petro–Canada, our national oil company, had a mandate when it was founded. In 1984 the government removed and tossed into the garbage that mandate and said: "You will have no public policy function". Now the government comes to the people in the House and says: "Petro–Canada has no public policy mandate, therefore we should sell it". The reason Petro–Canada does not have a mandate is because the government took it away. If the government had not taken it away, it would not be able to say that Petro–Canada is not fulfilling any public policy mandate. It is like a self–fulfilling prophecy.

We cannot afford to abandon our energy policy to the marketplace exclusively. We cannot do that. We knew it in 1970. We knew it in 1980. We know it now. Our energy policy must be clearly articulated by this government, and it is not. Until it is, we cannot dump the only vehicle we have to execute certain types of national energy policies, and that is Petro–Canada. We cannot because once the privatization is complete, it is for all practical purposes irreversible. I say we should have a policy and Petro–Canada should be a part of it.

Petro–Canada must be made a part of our country's national energy policies. That is why Petro–Canada must remain Canadian, must remain a wholly–controlled Crown corporation.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion as follows:

That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "That" and by substituting the following:

This House oppose in principle Bill C–84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, because it considers it irresponsible to abandon public sector involvement in the Canadian petroleum industry in the absence of a coherent Canadian federal government energy policy at a time of increasing international uncertainty with regard to petroleum supply.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will have a look at the amendment. Carry on with debate.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, before getting into the main text of my remarks here this afternoon, I would like to say that I too look forward to seeing a copy of the amendment of the hon. member. It is my guess that should the amendment be ruled in order, it will be our intention to beef it up just a bit. Unfortunately, I will be unable to do that myself at the conclusion of my remarks because, of course, the amendment has just been moved. However, you can rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that if the amendment is deemed to be in order, it shall be improved upon.

Second, I should like to note that in his remarks this afternoon, the minister said that invitations for briefings had been extended by his office to the offices of the pertinent critics. I took the opportunity of checking back with the staff in my office who can't recall and do not note having received any such invitation. I checked—

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Nystrom was the critic at the time.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I was wondering about that. I checked with Mr. Nystrom's office as well and was told that Mr. Nystrom's assistant attended a briefing on privatization a couple of weeks ago during which Petro-Canada was not even addressed.

Mr. McDermid: She was invited and I can give you her name.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Her name? His name was Norm.

In any event, I wish to turn now to the pertinent question before us, which is the second reading of the bill for Petro-Canada's privatization.

For the first time in more than a decade Canadians are experiencing an oil price shock. I should note that about six years ago Albertans started experiencing an oil price shock, but it was a different kind of shock. It was a collapse in the price which, in fact, cost somewhere between 25,000 and 40,000 Albertans their jobs. As that was the other kind of price shock, the price shock of a declining price, the rest of the country did not notice much.

Now we are experiencing the generally accepted definition kind of oil price shock, that is, prices are rising rapidly and now exceed 60 cents a litre virtually everywhere. Furthermore, most observers expect they will keep on rising. Many Canadians fear, not without cause, that unscrupulous multinational energy companies will take advantage of the current situation to reap windfall profits at the expense of Canadian consumers.

As well, it is now public knowledge that this House's own Standing Committee on Environment is about to present a report recommending a 20 per cent cutback in CO_2 emissions from their 1988 level by the year 2005.

I know of no one who believes such a target can be met solely through the gentle workings of the market. Virtually every sane person is of the opinion that to achieve such an essential goal, government intervention is required.

And what is the government's response in the face of these two major new elements in Canadian society?

This Conservative government is going to privatize Petro-Canada. What is more, it is going to sell it off at a huge loss to the Canadian taxpayer and it is going to increase foreign ownership of the Canadian energy industry in the bargain.

Mr. McDermid: Wrong.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Far from retaining a public enterprise that can ensure Canadians are treated fairly in the energy marketplace, the government is going to toss our one remaining Canadian major to the same rich and powerful few who control the rest of the industry.

Furthermore, it is going to throw away what is potentially one of our best vehicles for positive environmental action for moving Canada away from being one of the world's most irresponsible wasters of energy toward a more environmentally responsible energy future.

Welcome to the 1990s, Mr. Speaker.

Why should Canadians fight the privatization of Petro-Canada? What does it mean to Canadians?

Let me put the matter this way. During the 1973 oil crisis, New Democrats argued long and hard that the country needed a national oil company to serve the interests of Canadians. In effect, we argued that since there was no bus service, in other words there was no public utility supplying gasoline to Canadians, and taxis were too expensive, in other words relying on other mostly foreign concerns to meet our needs was getting very costly, we needed to buy a car of our own, our own oil company.

Faced with widespread concern for energy security during the Middle East oil crisis of the early 1970s, the Liberals were forced to agree. The country got its car, Petro-Canada. Unfortunately the Liberals, manipulated nationalist sentiment and added shiny chrome and paint and a lot of expensive gadgets.

But the real tragedy of the Liberal government was that it could seldom muster the courage to take this new car out on to the road and when it did, it was quite clear that it did not really know where to drive it.

Then came the Mulroney Conservatives. They are blinded by their marketplace religion, the public interest be damned. They pathetically place virtually all of their faith in the magical goodwill of huge powerful American oil companies, most of which have a documented history of gouging Canadians.

The Conservatives have always hated Petro-Canada and their policy now is the equivalent of yanking open the hood on that car, slashing the hoses, snapping off the spark plugs, and banging on the engine with a sledge hammer.

With the introduction of this bill, the Conservatives are in essence telling Canadians that the car we all spent so much to buy does not run very well, that it is worthless, that we really never needed it anyway, and will never need it again.

We, the New Democrats reject this utterly, totally. We believe, and we think that Canadians believe, that it is about time we stopped destroying the car we spent so much money to buy. It is about time we fixed it up, chartered a course to a sensible energy future, and hit the road. Obviously the government disagrees. It would prefer Petro–Canada to hit the skids.

But before examining the government's intentions as embodied in Bill C–84, it would be useful to remember how we got to our current situation.

It was less than 20 years ago that Canada experienced the situation to which the government now proposes to return us. There was no national public oil company. It was 1973. In the wake of the Yom Kippur war the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, OPEC, arose out of the Arab countries' bitter determination no longer to be the pawns of the western oil oligopoly, no longer to be the favoured but powerless handmaids of the seven sisters of oil.

Overnight the world price of oil reached heights previously unimagined. Line–ups appeared at gas stations. Gas guzzlers were put up on blocks in the family backyard, and the multinational oil corporations, which in those days controlled most of the fields in the western sedimentary basin, could not believe their good fortune.

Indeed, the Alberta provincial government actually increased royalties on oil and gas, something that has not happened since for more than a decade. Amazing profits were made, and gas consumers felt cheated, isolated, and preyed upon.

Everyone knew the oil companies were making a killing but nobody outside the business knew how, or how much. Nobody knew how long the remaining oil would last because overnight the industry's official tales of endless surplus had become grim warnings of impending shortage. Even the federal government was caught, necessarily relying on the industry for the information with which it tried to devise policy to meet the new realities. Something had to give.

• (1640)

In debates in this House in 1973 even the Conservatives were demanding public intervention to protect the public interest. So with a national oil company as part of the price for continued New Democrat support of the minority Liberal government, the legislation was drawn up.

That legislation was introduced in 1974 shortly before that year's general election. It was part of the program promised to Canadians by the Liberals in that election and they got their majority back.

Petro–Canada was born. Still the Liberals' three immediate aims were anything but radical. First, they wanted to speed exploration for new energy sources in Canada's frontiers, the so–called Canada Lands. This was seen as crucial to ensure the availability of adequate domestic supplies.

Second, the Liberals wanted to improve security of oil imports to eastern Canada by cutting out, or at least providing an alternative to, the multinationals that acted as intermediaries, dealing instead with oil exporting countries one–on–one, state–to–state.

Third, they wanted to hold on to power and to do that they had to be seen as doing something, anything, about the oil crisis.

They were not actually going to upset the existing nature of the industry, especially not after they won back their majority in 1974.

Just in case there was any residual fear in this regard among the major oil companies, Maurice Strong, Petro–Canada's first chairman and president, smoothed their ruffled feathers. He pointed out this new creature would even be a blessing in disguise, "The time will come", he said, "when it will be recognized that the private petroleum industry's survival in a large measure has been ensured by Petro–Canada's existence—For one thing our presence relieves the pressures for the nationalization of the whole industry".

This was gilding the lily perhaps, but the message was clear enough; Petro–Canada would not be treading too heavily on the toes of big oil. Instead it would concentrate its efforts, initially at least, on the upstream sector and leave the lucrative refining and marketing downstream sector to the multinationals.

In 1976, Petro–Canada embarked on an aggressive exploration campaign in the Arctic and off the east coast. Prices would keep rising, it was thought, and focusing on these Canada Lands would mean that the benefits of major new discoveries would flow directly to Petro–Canada and thus to the federal treasury.

Trudeau's Liberals were less than contrite when Albertans pointed out that this focus on the frontier siphoned activity and jobs away from the western sedimentary basin, a situation radically worsened by the early 1980s National Energy Program.

However, frontier exploration was risky and frightfully expensive. The fledgling company's resulting dependence on the public purse generated few defenders and a great deal of sniping, particularly from opposition Conservatives. This was not Trudeau's idea of fun and it was not Petro–Canada management's idea of security. The solution to both problems was to allow the company to finance some of its own expenses and the way to do that was to get into the profitable refining and marketing downstream sector.

In 1978, Petro–Canada moved to take over Pacific Petroleum. Not to put too fine a point on matters, the Conservatives went wild. Liquidate it, demanded Joe Clark. Sell it. Give it away. Anything. Just get rid of it.

And less than a year later, the Conservatives got their chance, their first chance. But although they won the 1979 federal election, Petro–Canada proved more popular, or at least more long–lived, than did Joe Clark's prime ministership. Petro–Canada survived, the mathematically–impaired Clark government did not.

The Liberals returned to power with the National Energy Program and a whack of new cash for Petro–Canada, much of it funnelled through special grants paid for by new energy taxes.

That the Liberals had won the election in large part because of their loud and protracted campaign against such taxes, as proposed by the Tories in their ill–fated "short–term pain for long–term gain" budget was deemed no impediment, merely an inconvenient quirk of history best quickly forgotten.

Seeing what appeared to be a blank cheque, as well as the Liberals' political need for Petro–Canada gas stations in eastern Canada, the company gobbled up PetroFina in the name of Canadianization.

How much did it cost? Only Petro–Canada and a few Cabinet insiders know. The Canadian public and the Auditor General never found out.

Sharp criticism of the PetroFina deal and tough times in the oil patch followed. Petro–Canada responded by hunkering down, cutting costs and staff, and concentrating on its bottom line.

By the time the Mulroney Conservatives came to power in 1984, despite its effective use of nationalistic advertising slogans like "It's Ours", "Canada First", and "Pump Your Money Back Into Canada", Petro–Canada itself had essentially blunted its public policy role. Henceforth, under the resurgent Tory regime, the company would operate under a new commercial mandate. As the company's 1984 annual report put it: "Petro–Canada is not to be perceived in the future as an instrument in the pursuit of the government's policy objectives." In short, the company would now operate like any other big integrated oil company, and public policy be damned.

In a similar vein, the Mulroney government moved quickly to deregulate the energy industry generally. Price and export controls were removed. The National Energy Board was neutered. The 1988 free trade agreement created an integrated continental energy market utterly free of significant government intervention.

Then, long after memories of energy crisis rip–offs had faded to a hazy sepia, at least until the new Middle East crisis and attendant oil price hikes starting this past August, and with their second mandate safely tucked into the ballot box, the Conservatives struck. Canada's national oil company was off to market—not as the buyer, but as a nice fat sale item.

The axe fell as part of the finance minister's budget speech on February 20 of this year. Petro–Canada was to be privatized.

Interestingly, February 20 is known by some as Hoodie Hoo Day. It is a day when all the residents of the Northern Hemisphere are to go outdoors at high noon and yell: "Hoodie hoo," at the top of their lungs. The idea is that by so doing the Hoodie hoo–ers will chase away winter and all the cold and nasty things associated with winter. Obviously, there were far too few participants in Canada this last year.

Speaking the next day, February 21, in the House of Commons, Minister of State for Privatization, the hon. John McDermid, gave the government's rough idea of why and how it was to be done. He said: "It—", that is to say Petro–Canada, "—must improve its debt position to more manageable levels and it must have the financial flexibility to compete alongside its private sector counterparts." He continued: "Petro–Canada needs equity capital and financial freedom."

As well, like Robert Frost's sledder beside the snowy woods, the government had promises to keep. The minister said: "In last April's Speech from the Throne, the government announced that it intended, and I quote, 'to further privatize those Crown corporations which no longer serve a public policy role'".

This is all highly reminiscent of the remarks delivered today in opening the debate on second reading. I have underscored some, and just going through them briefly we find the following, for example. On the second page of the minister's speech notes we find: "If they are to remain competitive, we must ensure that the company has a reliable source of new equity." Further down on the same page it states: "Getting on with this important work will be greatly assisted by the capital infusion made possible by privatization." On page 3, we find: "The bill will give Petro–Canada a way to raise equity without placing a burden on the Canadian taxpayer."

On page 4, we find: "What Petro–Canada really needs is a reliable source of new equity," and "It will give Petro–Canada access to capital that their current shareholder, the Government of Canada, cannot provide," et cetera.

It carries on in light vein through eight pages of rhetoric, the burden being at every step of the way as the minister said on February 21: "In fact, only blind devotion to state enterprise would be a reason for denying the company, and its employees, the chance it wants and has earned to be Canada's independent, world–class integrated oil corporation and a source of national pride."

This prideful striding onto the stage of world classiness was to be accomplished within certain guidelines. As the minister said: "Legislation will allow for the sale of all Petro–Canada shares," but not all at once. Again, I quote the minister: "Once legislation is passed, and appropriate financial and regulatory steps are taken, and with market conditions permitting, the board of directors of Petro–Canada will be asked initially to offer a treasury issue of about 15 per cent of the company."

I note with some interest that fairly clear statement: "The board of directors of Petro–Canada will be asked initially to offer a treasury issue of about 15 per cent of the company." This itself has faded to a rather hazy sepia to be replaced today with the note that: "The first offering will be of a size sufficient to give the company the equity required to improve its financial position." Mush, Mr. Speaker, gooey mush.

In the absence facts noting otherwise, I will stick with the February estimate of a treasury issue of about 15 per cent of the company. How things will proceed after that initial offering was then, and remains, even with the benefit of the legislation before us, still murky, every bit as murky as the murky quote just referred to in the minister's speech today.

• (1650)

Equally murky were the government's intentions for the estimated $500 million to $700 million expected from the sale of that 15 per cent share. However, in what some in this House apparently deem to be a brilliant marketing move and cited in The Ottawa Citizen on February 21, 1990, unnamed finance department denizens speculated that it would all be ploughed back into the company.

Indeed, this now seems certain to be the case, this being the background, the backdrop, the point behind the oft–repeated citations of a need for equity capital being the reason for the privatization. The argument is that privatization and the ploughing back into the company of the results of that initial 15 per cent offering is the only way the newly privatized Petro–Canada can get the capital it needs.

Imagine, Mr. Speaker. Such a deal! Mr. Capitalist could buy shares knowing that the Tories would give him back the money he paid for the shares in the form of equity in the company of which he had just become a shareholder. Equity and assets built up in a Crown corporation on behalf of all Canadians would be torn out of public hands and given away. And these are the guys known for their shrewd management of the public purse?

But I digress Bill C–84 does set out some promised conditions, although some ambiguous wording leaves the final effect somewhat in doubt. There will be more on this in committee study.

No one will be permitted to hold more than 10 per cent of the privately–held shares and there will be a 25 per cent cap on the aggregate foreign ownership of shares.

There will be "an employee share ownership program as part of the initial offering," as the minister put it. He also said: "The company will continue to adhere to the Employment Equity Act and employees of the company can be assured that Petro–Canada's policies governing salaries, pensions, benefits, relationships with the unionized workforce, and official languages will be continued." I was again quoting from the minister's remarks of February 21.

Just in case anybody missed the historic nature of the event, the minister concluded his remarks on that day with a rhetorical flourish. "Petro–Canada's time has come," he said, eyes no doubt misting, "and it has earned the right to be an independent, Canadian–owned, Canadian–controlled national corporation without the state in the middle."

Yes, well, perhaps. Yet, it is obvious that there is more here than meets the visored accountant's eye.

The main rationale for privatization seems clear. "The company needs capital," thunder the Tory proponents, company honchos, and stock market touts. By the way—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. I am sorry that I will have to interrupt the hon. member. I would like to say that the Chair will accept the motion by Mr. Lee, seconded by Mr. Pagtakhan:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and by substituting the following:
> "this House oppose in principle Bill C–84, an act respecting the privatization of the National Petroleum Company of Canada, because it considers it irresponsible to abandon public sector involvement in the Canadian petroleum industry in the absence of a coherent Canadian federal government energy policy at a time of increasing international uncertainty with regard to petroleum supply."

I thank the member for Edmonton East. He may carry on with debate.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, if I recall correctly, I had just mentioned stock market touts. Returning to that thought, I should note that those stock market touts stand to make a tidy little packet off this privatization move.

Remember that RBC Dominion Securities and Wood Gundy Inc., the two firms that conducted the August, 1987 study for the government on whether or not Air Canada should be sold, themselves underwrote that privatization one year later, walking away with over $30 million for their troubles. The total of brokerage fees, bonuses, and miscellaneous payments on the Petro–Canada sell–off could amount to more than $175 million. On behalf of the financial services and brokerage industries which, as we all know, are not subject to the GST, let me offer a heartfelt "Thanks, Canadian taxpayers."

The claim is that the government needs capital and privatization is the only way to get it. As the Minister of State for Privatization put it: "The industry, including Petro–Canada, has worked together in exploration efforts that have resulted in the discovery of more than one billion barrels of estimated reserves. And today, with excess international oil supplies and more stabilized prices—" and please recall, Mr. Speaker, that he was making these remarks last spring "—the industry must look at ways of financing the development of Canada's massive reserves."

As you might suspect, this is not quite the whole story. It is true that massive reserves of oil sands, heavy oil, and lighter grades stashed away in the difficult–to–reach–and–mine frontiers and offshore, have been discovered. But the cheap, easily accessed light and medium crude, characteristic of the western sedimentary basin, is all but gone. Indeed, Canada has been a net importer of light crude for several years. Developing these non–traditional sources will take massive amounts of capital, resulting in oil much more expensive than the stuff we have been selling to the Americans.

Anyhow, it is true money is needed. The problem is that, according to the government, the taxpayers' fiscal welcome mat is no longer out for Petro–Canada, and its large $2.8 billion debt—less than half of which is long–term debt—precludes further borrowing of a scale necessary to finance anticipated operations.

Starting with its equity financing of Petro-Canada's first major acquisition, the purchase of the assets of Atlantic-Richfield Canada for $342.4 million in 1976, the Canadian government built up a total equity of about $4 billion in the company. Last year this equity figure was slashed to $2.8 billion by a convenient change in bookkeeping methodology. Along the way the company has also incurred long-term debt of about $1.2 billion, less than half of which matures before 2000, and other debt of about another $1 billion.

The company declared $8.6 billion in total assets in 1988, but, in the same bookkeeping adjustment which resulted in that 30 per cent decrease in government equity I just noted, the adjusted figure for total assets—adjusted in preparation for privatization—was reduced in 1989 to $6.8 billion.

So, the question which confronts us is this: Is Petro-Canada really lumbered with debt to the point where it cannot borrow any more? The answer is no. In fact, Petro-Canada's long-term debt of $1.2 billion compares favourably with that of other such industry notables as Imperial Oil with a long-term debt of $3.8 billion; TransCanada PipeLines Limited with a long-term debt of $2.2 billion; and Nova Corporation of Alberta with a long-term debt of $3.6 billion.

More to the point, Petro-Canada's long-term debt to equity ratio at 1:2.2 is well within industry standards. Many industry players have ratios similar to or worse than Petro-Canada's. Among them are: Canadian Occidental Petroleum Limited at 1:3.3; Alberta Energy Company Limited at 1:1.5; Norcen Energy Resources at 1:1.2; Total Petroleum (North American) Limited at 1:2.9; and Pan-Canadian Petroleum Limited at 1:4.1. They remain active participants in the industry and all enjoy long-term debt to equity ratios comparable to or worse than Petro-Canada's. Indeed, the two oldest, best-established multinationals in Canada, Shell Canada and Imperial Oil, have long-term debt to equity ratios of 1:3.4, which is only marginally better than Petro-Canada, and 1:1.9, which is considerably worse, respectively.

In an attempt to forestall needless quibbling from across the way, let me note that the entire array of bookkeeping methods are present in these examples. The choice of individual methods seems more a matter of convenience and advantage, than determined illumination in the best of instances, regardless, Mr. Speaker.

Given these figures proving Petro-Canada's relative fiscal health, it was no real surprise when last December the well known New York rating agency, Moody's Investor Service Incorporated, gave Petro-Canada a triple A rating on about $400 million of newly-filed debt securities. As The Toronto Star observed in its report, "Such a rating, a shade lower than the highest designation for debts of the federal government, suggests strong borrowing status." Quite.

It would seem by all standards that Petro-Canada could comfortably assume a great deal more debt than it has now and still remain a healthy and vigorous player in the Canadian petroleum industry. In fact, as the Moody's rating shows, while in the public sector the company can support greater debt, because of lower service costs occasioned by its status as a federal treasury-backed Crown corporation, than it could as a private sector player.

Okay. But what about the other side of the capitalization coin? What about all that money to be made for Petro-Canada from a huge stock issue? Sorry, unless the federal government is willing simply to give away money to the company by continuing to plough the proceeds of share sales back into Petro-Canada as the shares are sold, Petro-Canada will not get that money at all. The taxpayers of Canada, depending on whose estimate you want to accept, have ploughed between $6 billion and $10 billion into Petro-Canada during its life. The balance sheet says we have only $2.8 billion worth of equity in the company from all that investing. But God help the government that tries to return from the market with significantly less than at least the company's net worth of between $4 billion and $4.5 billion.

As we know, the government is apparently planning to give back to the company the proceeds of the first offering, again that 15 per cent of the total, between $500 million and $700 million. Presumably, Mr. Speaker, it would have serious political difficulty pursuing such wonderful generosity further, especially at a time when it is cutting back on health care, education, and social services, because of the fiscal holy crusade against the deficit. So that leaves the energy equity markets having to absorb a subsequent issue of $3 billion to $3.5 billion, all of which has to go back to the federal treasury before Petro-Canada can haul in so much as one more loonie.

Let us put that into perspective. During the period 1983 to 1988, new Canadian energy issues averaged an annual total of about $2 billion. That is all energy issues combined, Mr. Speaker, which is probably what Mr. James Doak, an oil analyst with First Marathon Securities Limited, was thinking of when he responded to the Petro-Canada news last winter by observing "the privatization will compete with every other company trying to tap the equity market". The immediate implication? "They probably won't be able to get a good price for the shares," said Doak.

Of course, the government knows all this. That is why the Minister of Finance said in the House of Commons on February 23, 1990, as reported at page 8747 of Hansard, and I quote:

> —the sale of the shares of Petro-Canada will take place over a period of time, depending on market circumstances, depending on the attractiveness of the market to the company and to ourselves and of selling into that market.

The government is still saying more less the same thing: we are going to sell it, but God alone knows when.

Again, I must stand and wonder. These people are generally credited, by those ostensibly in the know, with having, if nothing else, the virtue of good hard-nosed business sense. It is amazing, and no small cause for deep-seated worry over the fate of our major business and financial institutions, because most of them are piloted by people who apparently believe this.

In sum then, dumping Petro-Canada onto the energy equity market, especially at a time when Imperial Oil will be struggling mightily with the capital task of swallowing Texaco Canada, seems to be just about the worst way one could go about raising the further money the company needs.

It will be cumbersome, necessarily long-term, and unavoidably entail a raid of some scale on the public purse.

There is plenty of corporate elbow room for further debt financing anyway.

But, having noted all this, we must eventually come face to face with the real question posed to this House and to all Canada by Bill C-84: Is there a reason to keep Petro-Canada in public hands? Does the company have any public role to play?

It is patently obvious that Petro-Canada is not now playing an active public policy role. It is equally obvious that the government can conceive of no such role for it.

The hon. minister set out reasons why not in his February 21 statement. He summarized Petro-Canada's original mandate as: "to engage in state-to-state trading, to give the government a window on the industry and to contribute to the energy security of Canada". He then dismissed each goal in turn. Quoting the minister again, as reported at page 8619 of Hansard of February 21, 1990:

> —in the past 14 years, Petro-Canada entered into only one state-to-state deal and it is very evident that these arrangements are no longer an important component in today's world oil market.
> As for the window on the industry issue, the government understands and has available to it all the information it requires in order to provide safe and secure energy to Canadians today and into the future.
> And finally, if one is concerned about Canada's energy security, they would naturally support a decision which would allow Petro-Canada to participate and develop the reserves that have been discovered in cooperation with other private sector partners.

I know it will delight those across the way to listen to me say that it is at least arguable that his first two points have some merit. There is at present no pressing need for a state-to-state trading vehicle and industry information collection mechanisms available to the government, through the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the National Energy Board, the petroleum monitoring agency and others, can be made adequate for review and policy formulation purposes in normal times of modest price fluctuations such as those obtaining when the minister made those remarks.

I would note, parenthetically, that the contention that a Tory government would actually make use of such information, actively to provide safe and secure energy for Canadians is an arguable, some would say laughable, contention, but the potential is there at least in normal times.

The third point, that privatization will allow Petro-Canada better to participate with its private-sector partners is simply rhetorical market-worship voodoo. There is no evidence to indicate Petro-Canada is having any difficulty participating right now. Quite the contrary. One of its biggest problems is its propensity as a Crown corporation to participate entirely too much.

More to the point, as we contemplate Bill C-84, are those mandates Petro-Canada could and, in our view, should be assuming? We believe that there are several legitimate, even crucial, public policy roles that any sane government in a sparsely populated northern country would want a national energy company to play. First, the maintenance and—what the heck—increase of Canadian ownership and control in the oil and gas industry remains a vital policy goal.

With the buy-up of Texaco Canada by Imperial Esso, there are now just three major integrated oil companies operating across Canada: Imperial, Petro-Canada and Shell. Only Petro-Canada is not foreign controlled.

Under the terms of Bill C-84, Petro-Canada privatization cannot help but result in a further increase in foreign ownership which, after declining in the first half of the 1980s, enjoyed a Tory sanctioned renaissance in the second half. One-quarter of the company will be offered up to foreign ownership.

There is another more chilling factor in this vein. The free trade agreement makes it clear in article 1602 that Canadians could never claw back that 25 per cent share of Petro-Canada once it was allowed to fall into foreign hands. That 25 per cent ceiling on foreign ownership can never, ever be lowered. It can, however, be raised. So, in effect, the ceiling would become a floor and Petro-Canada could never again be made a 100 per cent,—or even 90 per cent or 80 per cent—Canadian-owned energy company.

The second major public policy role which Petro-Canada ought to play is to ensure that energy industry profits are reinvested in Canada. This is no small consideration when you recall that the 1980s saw away over $7 billion shipped out of Canada by the petroleum industry in dividend payments alone. This is Canadian money, the equivalent of more than half of Alberta's heritage savings trust fund, that will never be used to contribute to energy security in Canada.

Remember, Petro-Canada consistently earns a profit. 1988 was a comparatively bad year and the company still pulled in earnings, revenues less expenses, of $30 million. In 1987 it earned over $314 million. In 1989 it earned $169 million. That money stays in Canada.

Third, and most important, Petro-Canada should be used to actively promote Canada's transition to a more environmentally sustainable future.

There is a revolution of sorts under way in the energy industry. Energy development is beginning to be judged by the impact it has on the environment. People all across Canada and around the world are coming to the realization that, as the by now much abused but still to the point Brundtland commission report put it "choosing an energy strategy inevitably means choosing, an environmental strategy".

During its short history, Petro-Canada has pursued energy security by discovering and developing new oil and gas supplies in Canada's frontiers. The focus of the future will doubtless shift from these geographical frontiers to the frontiers of creative responses to the earth's environmental imperative.

Petro-Canada is a superb, ready-made vehicle available now for the purpose of leading the energy industry toward greener pastures, a place the industry seems in no hurry to get to on its own. This will be absolutely essential if, as we in the New Democratic Party hope, the government accepts the proposal of the Standing Committee on Environment for significant environmental action.

For starters, operating under public mandate, Petro-Canada can lead the way in recycling ozone-depleting chlorofluorocarbons from automobile air conditioning units by setting up reclamation facilities at many of its service stations.

Similarly, Petro-Canada can take the lead in recycling used engine oil. After contaminants are removed and new additives included, this re-refined oil is indistinguishable from the new lubricants it replaces. Recycling this non-renewable resource provides jobs and keeps millions of litres of it from fouling our biosphere. A green marketing strategy, together with a commitment that all Petro-Canada oil products include re-refined oil would, result in the creation of a major new environmentally salubrious market.

Petro-Canada can also move into the forefront of promoting alternative energy sources. Following Mohawk Oil's commendable lead, Petro-Canada should move decisively into the provision of fuel ethanol blends at the gas pump. Ethanol, distilled from grain and other agricultural crops, is blended in a 10 per cent solution with gasoline. It has been used for many years in the United States and western Canada as an octane enhancing replacement for hazardous lead. Since ethanol is produced from plants that absorb CO_2 from the atmosphere, thereby recycling existing carbon and thus replacing fossil fuel carbon dredged up from the lithosphere, its use significantly reduces emissions of new carbon dioxide from automobiles.

• (1710)

On September 8, 1990, Environment Canada announced that it considers ethanol blended gasoline an "environmental choice" product. A healthy grain based ethanol fuel industry would also provide our hard-pressed farmers an alternative to domestic markets for grain and thus, a much needed stimulus to Canada's rural communities.

Unfortunately, the big oil companies, including Petro-Canada have actively discouraged increased use of ethanol. The company recently backed away from establishing an ethanol plant in Dawson Creek, B.C. and seems intent on continuing to use other, more environmentally hazardous, gasoline additives. Recent reports indicated that it still uses MMT, a manganese-based octane enhancer, which has been banned in the United States. The company is also constructing a plant in Edmonton to produce another non-renewable additive, MTBE, effectively killing any possibility for an ethanol fuel industry in northern Alberta.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but there is a lot of noise and I want to listen very carefully to the speech by the hon. member for Edmonton East. The hon. member has the floor, and he has two minutes left.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I have two minutes left. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

There are many more things that Petro-Canada can do on the environmental front, Mr. Speaker. All of these we can do.

So we Canadians once again are faced with a choice about Petro-Canada. We can choose to be satisfied with Petro-Canada as it is now, imitating the big American owned multinationals that we see through our window on their industry. Or we can let the Tories privatize Petro-Canada, thereby closing the shutter on that window forever and placing our blind trust in an Exxon-envisaged profit-driven energy future or we can move forward.

We can turn away from the window of the past, remembering what we saw and learned through that window, and apply it elsewhere, creating our own more sustainable energy future. It is our choice.

In an aid toward this House making the right choice, I should like to propose and amendment to the motion previously moved by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. I move:

> That the amendment be amended by adding the following words:
> "and at a time when the development and wide dispersal of alternatives to traditional fossil fuel energy sources is an environmental necessity."

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The Chair will take under advisement the motion for a sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton East. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

[English]

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have waited for this day for a long time. I can assure you that it gives me a great deal of pleasure to stand here and discuss this Bill C-84 with regard to the sale of the shares of Petro-Canada to the general public.

In introducing this legislation, the minister responsible for privatization and regulatory affairs has laid out a reasonable and a practical rationale for the government's privatization initiative. The rationale flows from the basic principles of the privatization process. In our government's agenda for economic renewal, which was presented in 1984, we expressed the intention to do a thorough review of the role of individual Crown corporations. The agenda paper noted that, and I quote, "Although each corporation was established to serve—

Mr. McDermid: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the give and thrust of debate in the House, we do the odd strange thing. The hon. member for Edmonton East is sitting whistling the American national anthem, which has absolutely no respect for this House or the hon. member for Calgary Southwest and her speech. We were very patient listening to him—

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Ha.

Mr. McDermid: We gave the odd gibe, and I got the odd gibe from the hon. member when I was speaking as well. However I think sitting here whistling the American national anthem in the House is totally irresponsible and extremely childish.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to come to the defence of the member singing an anthem, but one of the great ironies is to have that minister who has been catcalling every speaker for the last two hours suddenly turning around and finding somebody else's behaviour bad. If he wants to set a standard then perhaps he can begin with his own.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, I would also like to comment that that was not worthy of him or his party. Perhaps, if he is to continue with silly things like that, he might be more ably engaged in that other place down the hall where they had a great Friday.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I rise on this point, Mr. Speaker. I am indeed sorry if I have distressed hon. members across the way. I understand that the distress centres principally on my choice of material, that in fact strong objection has been taken to my version of the Star Spangled Banner, although I note that in other instances that has not been the case.

However, if the problem is the song, I would cheerfully move to Yankee Doodle Dandy or America the Beautiful.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I don't think this point of order should lead to further debate. There have been messages hither and yon, and I again recognize the hon. member for Calgary–Southwest.

[English]

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I was saying that we have done a thorough review of individual Crown corporations. I would like to quote from the agenda paper that we followed and noted:

> Although each corporation was established to serve what at that time might have been an important public policy purpose, we must ask ourselves whether that remains the case. If it does not, it is surely important to consider whether the corporation should be retained.

We completed such an examination of Petro–Canada and concluded that no public policy purpose was being served by continued Crown ownership of Petro–Canada. We also concluded that the public ownership of Petro–Canada was not and is not required as an instrument of energy policy.

Today I would like to demonstrate in my remarks that the privatization of Petro–Canada will not put at risk Canadian energy policy objectives. It is quite the reverse. Many energy policy objectives will be better served by a privatized Petro–Canada.

First, I would like to start by recalling the main features of this government's energy policy. We have implemented a market oriented energy policy in the belief that the private sector, guided by efficiently functioning markets, is in the best position to make optimal decisions concerning energy consumption, production, and investment.

Consistent with this philosophy, the government has reformed the regulations governing the energy sector and allowed energy prices to be set by market forces. This government has also negotiated secure access to U.S. markets for Canadian energy products by the free trade agreement.

It has created an atmosphere which fosters investment, including foreign investment, while it ensures continued opportunities for Canadians to participate in the oil industry.

It was this government which terminated the National Energy Program through the western accord in March 1985. We deregulated oil in June 1985 and moved toward deregulation of gas starting October 29, 1985. The market forces set the prices.

• (1720)

Many questions have been raised about the possible negative effects the privatization of Petro–Canada could have on the oil and gas industry and the Canadian energy policy. Statements have been made—and I am sure you have heard them, Mr. Speaker—that privatization would impede the development of the industry, that it would put Canadian security of supply at risk, that it would lead to unacceptable decreases in Canadian ownership of the industry, that it would lead to an inability by the government to ensure environmentally responsible development of energy resources, and that it would remove an essential window on the industry for the government.

I would like to review each one of these concerns. Petro-Canada is a major player in the Canadian petroleum industry. Decisions by Petro-Canada can have an impact on the industry which extend beyond their direct effect on the company Petro-Canada. Recognizing this, the government gave Petro-Canada a commercial mandate in 1985. Acting in concert with that mandate, Petro-Canada has become a major player in several of our megaprojects. It also has the second largest proven reserves of oil and of natural gas liquids and the fourth largest natural gas reserves of any company in Canada. How it got those reserves is another story. I would like to talk about them a bit later.

The privatization of Petro-Canada will give the company the freedom that it requires to develop, sell or acquire other properties and assets, without the necessity of seeking government approvals for these transactions which really could otherwise slow down the process or truly impose some conditions which would not be attractive to potential private sector partners.

Security of energy supply has always been a key component of our energy policy. The government's policy is this: security of supply can best be achieved, first, by ensuring that Canada possesses a strong, diverse and growing energy sector; second, by developing domestic procedures to deal with the possible shortages; and, third, by taking appropriate multilateral actions in concert with its IEA partners.

We have done this. Energy procedures have been established for the domestic market. Canada has agreed to energy sharing procedures with the IEA partners in the event of any physical shortage of oil that should threaten any of the IEA countries.

By far the most important steps we have taken really and truly relate to our domestic industry. We have put in place policies to encourage the development of all economically viable forms of energy. We, this government, has encouraged the development of infrastructure which has lessened the dependence of the eastern part of our country on imported oil. Yes, the east imports all its needs.

Through regulatory reform and the removal of oppressive and discriminatory taxes like the PGRT that those people implemented we have created the conditions that are going to enable the domestic oil industry to grow, to find and to develop new reserves of oil and gas that Canada is going to need for its future.

Privatization is going to enable Petro-Canada to play a major role in that process. Putting the company on the same footing as its private competitors will increase the range of business arrangements which it can use to develop its assets. At the same time privatization will permit the company to have access to the full range of private sector financial markets in instruments. This will help Petro-Canada to develop its many prospects in timely fashion.

Members opposite have criticized the privatization of this company on the grounds that it will amount to turning the corporation into multinational interests, as the member for Edmonton East was saying just a few moments ago. Those members could not be further from the truth. Petro-Canada will remain a Canadian owned and controlled corporation after privatization.

Total foreign investment in Petro-Canada will not be permitted to exceed 25 per cent of the non-government shares held. The maximum 25 per cent foreign ownership in Petro-Canada would reduce over-all Canadian ownership in the upstream sector by approximately 1.6 per cent, if it were not offset by new investment or growth in the Canadian owned sector industry.

Privatization, on the other hand, is going to allow the company to grow and to prosper. It is going to be interesting because by this means of privatization it really can assist this Canadian company to increase, grow and improve Canadian ownership within the industry throughout Canada.

The protection of the environment, especially in the ecological sensitive offshore and of course in our northern regions, is a central element of our government's policy. The government intends to announce a green paper plan before the end of this year which would affirm an approach to environmental protection through improved decision making.

This government is committed to establishing a decision-making process in which environmental considerations become an essential part of investment decisions made in all sectors. This has already been done by the National Energy Board. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources requested the chairman of the energy board some six or eight months ago to make sure that environmental assessments were done.

Besides this the government will deploy whatever instruments are required and appropriate to ensure environmentally correct behaviour. In the past regulations have been an important tool in this regard, and they will continue to be important in the future.

There will also be a growing role for market based instruments such as tradable emission permits. Petro-Canada, whether publicly owned or privately owned, will be subjected to the same environmental laws and regulations as any other company. Public ownership of one oil company is not an acceptable substitute for an environmental policy which will ensure environmentally sensitive behaviour on the part of all participants that now takes place in our economy.

Petro-Canada's policy is to meet or exceed all regulatory requirements. We would expect that this policy of environmental awareness and good corporate citizenship would be unchanged by this privatization. This company Petro-Canada is no longer needed by the government as a tool for gathering information on the Canadian oil and gas industry.

The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources now has more than adequate information to give the government the insight it requires to make policy decisions affecting the industry. Since the inception of Petro-Canada, two agencies have been created and are able to collect information.

One is the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration, COGLA, and the other is the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, PMA. They can give the government a broad perspective on this important industry instead of the limited view of one company such as the Crown corporation.

In summary, privatization of Petro-Canada is consistent with government's privatization policies and with its energy policies. The environment will have assessments and be protected.

I would like to remind some of our colleagues in the House of a little history, just to refresh their memories. This Crown corporation was set up in 1975-76 by the Liberal government of Mr. Trudeau for ideological reasons. It had a meet in Ottawa mandate. I do not know how much exploration and development is done in Ottawa, but this is where the mandate was made to act as a window on the oil and gas industry and to negotiate state-to-state oil purchases. I could talk all night on their ridiculous deal done with Mexico: high prices, and it was not even high quality crude. We had to re-refine it when it came in here, and of course it was there to promote self-sufficiency in energy.

Today it has assets of $6.8 billion. Actually, just for our information, Canadian taxpayers have pumped more than $10.4 billion into Petro-Canada. That represents $400 for every man, woman, and child.

How did it obtain its assets? Mr. Speaker, I know you will find this interesting. It got its assets through acquisitions, buy-outs, and backings: Atlantic Richfield, Pacific Pete—Mr. Speaker, you remember Pacific Pete, a good Calgary company—PetroFina, and Gulf Downstream, just to name a few of the acquisitions. How much did the Liberals pay for PetroFina? Every Canadian has contributed. I would like to ask my colleague across from me if Petro-Canada has discovered any oil or gas. I would like you to name me one barrel of oil or one MCF of gas that this company has discovered. You cannot do it.

• (1730)

In 1980 the National Energy Program devastated the west. It literally robbed Alberta of over $60 billion. You remember the PGRT. It killed us out there. The program gave Petro-Canada a neat right, the right to gain control of 25 per cent of the discoveries on all Canada Lands. Sure, private enterprise went out. They did the work and they took the risk and guess what? Petro-Canada could have its choice of 25 a per cent back in of the deals it wanted. Or it could say no to the deals it did not want. Their assets came through the back door.

Petro-Canada has to prove it can be sufficiently profitable and this is the way to go about it. The company has been working towards self-sufficiency and profitability since 1984. Since we took office, they have had to. It was this government, when we took office, that told Petro-Canada to make it on its own and operate as a private corporation. Yes, we cut off that money pipeline. The company was born to spend money and it sure has.

Petro-Canada has spent $7.3 billion during the 1980s and it showed net earnings of about $38 million. The company has not been successful on the profit side of the ledger. With $6.8 billion in assets—and I would like the hon. member for Edmonton East to check that figure—their profit last year was about $56 million. That is $56 million on $6.8 billion assets. It is really not a good record.

The company has committed billions to developing Hibernia, the Terra Nova oil fields, Alberta Syncrude and also its Wolfe Lake heavy oil project. In all fairness, I would like everyone to realize that the Canada Lands exploration that we have done over the past 10 or 15 years has provided us with a wealth of geological information.

Canada is very fortunate to be blessed with natural resources. As we move through this decade, we have to strive to become more self-sufficient. Petro-Canada needs capital. They need capital to succeed. It is time they raised their own financing, competed straight up in the marketplace, and got on with their own exploration development and production.

Roughly 80 per cent of the company's revenue stream comes from its refining and marketing operations. Their refineries need cash to improve their systems, to meet environmental standards so we can have cleaner air. That is what they need to do and that is what privatization can help them with. It is truly going to improve their growth of opportunities for the company. They are needed out there. They are one of 16 Canadian oil companies across Canada, not one of three or four as the hon. member mentioned. Perhaps he would like to do more research on that. We have a lot more companies than Imperial Oil, Shell and Petro-Canada.

Privatization is going to encourage more development of our Canadian resources. It will enhance Petro-Canada's ability to really respond to market opportunities and that is great. It is not going to impair our ability to achieve its national objectives because Petro-Canada is not and has not truly been for some time, used as a government policy.

I would like to say how pleased I am to stand up and support Bill C-84, and really explain to people that the only way to go is to put the company out on the market and sell shares. Obviously it will meet the market demands and we will have a truly better secure supply of oil and gas in this country.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before proceeding to questions and comments, the Chair wishes to announce that it will now hand down its decision on the proposed sub-amendment presented by the NDP critic. The motion is in order.

For questions and comments, the hon. member for Laval East.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate you on your new job, since this is the first time I have had a chance to do so in the House.

I also would like to congratulate the hon. member for Calgary Southwest, with whom I have had the pleasure of working on this bill for almost six years. My colleague, who is an expert on "upstream", has been looking forward to this day for a long time. At last she is able to announce a decision long awaited by Quebecers and more specifically by the people of Laval whom I have the honour and the privilege to represent here in the House.

[English]

I would like to congratulate my hon. colleague from Calgary Southwest and ask her a few questions. Why did the Liberal government install this beautiful maple leaf on every street corner, and in some places on three corners. I was stuck between the tree leaves to compete in private enterprise. I was one of them, unfortunately, in those days.

How did the consumer benefit? What was the benefit to the lessee in being able to announce the new maple leaf logo, which I thought was propaganda stuff for Mr. Trudeau in those days.

I would like the hon. member to tell me what the real benefit was for this country and for the Canadians who had to pay for this?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my colleague from Laval-Est for his questions.

Yes, it was some years ago that we did work on a position paper for the privatization of Petro–Canada. I believe it was 1985. At that time it was quite obvious that Canada no longer needed the Crown corporation as it was not fulfilling its mandate.

My colleague asked me what did this company do for lessees. I am scratching my head because I am having trouble coming up with a specific answer. I would like to pose the question back to the hon. member, although that is not quite what Mr. Speaker would want. What is the Government of Canada doing owning 3,300 gas stations across this nation?

The prices are set by the market, and I think you probably realize that, Mr. Speaker. For the lessee–owner, one of the things that probably hurt a lot of people was that it put some out of work. No doubt the Government of Canada has 3,300—I will check that—gas stations across the country. It certainly did not benefit the consumer.

The major thing is that Petro–Canada can play a role in the security of supply. What it really needs and where it should be is out in the marketplace raising its own capital, be it through debt equity or whatever type of cash infusion. It will probably be floating some bonds or a debt equity issue, but it is to go out and to explore, develop and produce. Production is not needed so much today but when we have proven reserves we certainly know that in the future we will be able to support the needs of Canadians.

What is interesting today, and when my colleague asks what did it do for the lessees or did not do, is not so much that it did not really help the lessees, but that Canada today produces about one and a half million barrels a day. We export 615,000 barrels of oil a day and import about 550,000 to 570,000 barrels a day. This means that we are net exporters and that leaves us in a good position and with our IEA agency and our commitments to the OECD people, this does put us in a good spot. We want to maintain and always be net exporters so we are giving Petro–Canada a vehicle where it can raise the funds. It will be able to go out and develop or discover these new proven reserves that will enhance the future of this country. I thank my colleague and say, I think it is time we got rid of those 3,300 gas stations—

• (1740)

An hon. member: The lessees must be—

Mrs. Sparrow: The lessees will be happy.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask two very simple questions of my friend, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest. First of all, she has described Petro–Canada as a corporation in fairly damning terms. If it is really as bad as she said, who in the private sector is going to want to buy it?

Second, I would like to ask her why, knowing that she has been very interested in much of the work that has been done by other provincial public companies in Canada in the energy sector, such as Hydro–Quebec and Ontario Hydro, would she explain to me why she thinks it is necessary that Petro–Canada be sold, equity–wise to the private sector, and cannot raise the capital that it needs through debt financing?

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the questions from my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa South. I certainly had the opportunity to work with this colleague on the Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, and we are sort of into that right here. I enjoy working with the hon. member.

Yes, I did mention things about Petro–Canada and the whole question is about its future as a private company. That is where its future is going to be. By not subsidizing or pumping in billions of dollars, which our mandate was and it changed in 1984–85, the company really has no other source of funds. Well, yes, it has profits, but what I was discussing today is that Petro–Canada has assets of about $6.8 billion and those have been written down in the last four years too. If you have assets like that and you only generate about $56 million in profits, there is something wrong. But it does need capital and it certainly will be able to go out into the market.

Mr. Manley: Borrow.

Mrs. Sparrow: It cannot borrow, it has too much debt. What we need to do is to allow it to go out into the market where it will be able to meet its obligations.

It is involved in the Hibernia program and I think we just voted on that the other day in regard to the east coast and bringing some sort of security of supply there. Petro–Canada also has a large interest in Terra Nova, I think about 25 per cent but do not quote me. It has a large interest in the Beaufort and it is going to be sooner rather than longer that we will see our reserves on our northern Canada Lands, up in the Mackenzie Valley, brought on stream, after environmental assessments have been done. The future of this company depends upon its privatization and that is why we are doing it.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I did want to ask a question of the NDP speaker but, as that is not permitted under the rules, I will ask the question of a member who knows what she is talking about. I would like to ask the hon. member for Calgary Southwest first, has Petro-Canada ever discovered one teaspoonful of oil, and second, I would also like to ask about this question raised about foreign ownership. The hon. member said in her comments that there would be maximum of 25 per cent foreign ownership allowed. Even presuming that whole maximum was taken up, what would the effect on the foreign ownership in the country be?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Calgary Southwest. Very briefly.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for Calgary Southeast. First, he asked the question: "How much oil has Petro-Canada found?" It has not discovered any oil or gas. Its assets have all come through acquisitions, buy-outs, and backings.

The hon. member's second question was with regard to the foreign ownership. This is going to be a Canadian-controlled company. If the 25 per cent was indeed taken up by true foreigners, it perhaps might lower the upstream by 1.6 per cent. That is basing the fact on the total 25 per cent that would be allowed to foreign ownership that would completely go that way. It would be 1.6 on upstream.

It is not who owns it. It is who explores, develops, and produces for Canadians and gives jobs in security of supply for this country. That is what this private company is going to do.

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-84

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I, too, want to congratulate you. It is the first opportuntiy I have had to do so.

I have been informed that to date, agreement has not been reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) and (2) with respect to an allocation of time in the second reading of Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of of the national petroleum company of Canada. We will continue to try to get an agreement with the opposition parties on a reasonable length of time that we debate this on second reading and get it into committee for an in-depth study.

However, under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allocating a specified number of days or day for the consideration and disposal of that stage of the said bill.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It could not have been anything else. The Minister of State has already spoken in the debate. It had to be a point of order.

On that point of order let me say that I am little short of astonished that the government after hearing only three speakers in the debate—

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order raised by the hon. minister. He is certainly within the provisions of the Standing Orders to move notice of his particular motion, but I just wish to draw to the attention of members of the House that this is a real breach of what has transpired between the various—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Dingwall: —House leaders concerning business of the House. Once again, the government has gone back on its word.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for York Centre.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are rapidly approaching six o'clock and I am very pleased to have the opportunity to rise to speak as my colleague did for the opposition and to make it clear to members of the House, and to the government in particular, that the opposition does not support the privatization of Petro-Canada and that we will be voting against this measure.

We oppose very strongly the government's concept of Petro-Canada, that of being a company such as any other. We find it ironic that the the government should make the point that Petro-Canada should be privatized because it is performing no public sector role. That, to me, is a very circular argument. It was this government in 1984 that acted to deprive Petro-Canada of any role in the public sector.

Our submission is that Petro-Canada should have a mandate that touches public sector interests, as well as private sector interests. If it did so as part of a national energy program in general, it would be part of a national energy policy which the government, in spite of what it says, does not have. We would find Petro-Canada, indeed, earning its keep and justifying the support of Canadians.

• (1750)

Mr. McDermid: Why do we keep it?

Mr. Kaplan: Why do we keep it, the minister asks. He made the point in his remarks, and I noted them, that it was only common sense to sell Petro-Canada.

To me, if anything, that betrays the small-minded view that the government is taking, not only of Petro-Canada and not only of energy policy, but of its whole responsibility as a government. "It is only common sense to sell it".

I noted the Edmonton Journal on October 3 dealt with the suggestion of the minister that it is common sense to sell it. It caught my eye that the Edmonton Journal, which opposes selling Petro-Canada, made the point that it does not make sense to begin disposing of the national oil company just as prices are sky-rocketing in the crisis produced Iraq's invasion of Kuwait.

The invasion of Kuwait by Iraq reminds us of the first of three brief points that I want to make on this subject. The first is that energy is not just a product like any other. It is a strategic resource. For the government to take what it calls a common sense attitude toward Petro-Canada and to feel that common sense requires that it be sold shows a failure to understand the significance of energy and the proper roles of Petro-Canada and government in dealing with it.

I will just summarize the three points that I want to make and I hope I can return to each. The second point is that the government really has no energy policy at all. It thinks that when it talks about the marketplace being the proper allocator and the proper determiner that that is a policy. It is far from being an adequate policy.

Third, I want to make the point that an important element of nation building is being overlooked by the government, again, not just in connection with Petro-Canada but in its general approach toward its responsibilities.

The country is deteriorating. The national government of the country is evaporating. The national values of Canada, the things that hold us together and that make us want to survive together and to build together as a country, are diminishing and becoming smaller. For us in the opposition, the decision to privatize Petro-Canada is just one more step along the road taken by a government which fails to realize what is the essence of governing this country, and that is nation building.

Let me return to the first point I made about the government's theory that there is a marketplace that it supports, that it believes in, and that determines the price of energy. What is a marketplace? A marketplace is a metaphor for the place where willing buyers and willing sellers meet and transactions are completed. There is no such marketplace in the field of energy. This is a highly concentrated industry. When one seller raises its prices, the buyers are not given the opportunity to go rushing to the lower-priced sellers to buy from them and see them make bigger profits. If that happened, there would be a marketplace.

What happens when one seller raises its prices in this industry? There is price leadership, we all know that. Every other seller follows it and the prices go up. That is not a marketplace. The government itself knows that there is not a properly working marketplace in this field, because the government itself set up a price monitoring agency in the energy field. That is a recognition that these prices do not operate like the prices of food, or automobiles or industrial products. There is something there that needs to be watched.

We have lots of evidence in the past. We have convictions. The Minister of Justice is in the Chamber. She knows there have been many convictions in the energy field for price-fixing, for tide selling, and for every market abuse that one can bring into that sector.

Petro-Canada was meant to perform the function of being an honest participant in that market, to the extent that there was one, that would give Canadians the break at least of some honest competition. I am not saying that the other companies are performing dishonestly. The record speaks for itself. They have done from time to time in the past. I am saying that having Petro-Canada government owned out there in the so-called marketplace would be one ingredient assuring Canadians that there was some element of opportunity for willing sellers to look for the best deal.

I also wanted to make the point that the government needs an energy policy. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has just come into the House and I am very glad to see him. He uses the rhetoric from time to time of there being a marketplace, when the government's own actions, half-baked and tentative as they are, shows that it recognizes itself that there is not a marketplace. This country needs an energy policy.

We are a uniquely situated country. Most countries in the world do not have a choice about what their energy policy is going to be. They do not have the margin to do very much picking and choosing or structuring about what their energy policy is going to be. Either they are exporters of one particular kind of energy, or they are importers. They are stuck in an international situation which pretty well dictates what their energy policy is going to be.

Canada is unique in having the opportunity to have a real put together, considered, multi-faceted energy policy. We are so well endowed with so many options as you move from coast to coast. There are tidal opportunities. There are hard metal and uranium opportunities. There are conventional oil sources. There are tar sands. There are offshore opportunities. Every variety of possibility that the mind can concede is a possible option for Canada.

The government says the marketplace is going to tell us all about that, as if it did not know itself by what it did in Hibernia, for example, that the marketplace is not going to deliver. It is not going to be the decision maker for us about where our future is going to lie. The marketplace is a very short-term, reactive phenomenon. Canada can have an energy policy which, if we want to support it, can be a strong factor in national unity for the country. We can have an energy policy that looks to every region of our country and to its opportunities and offers as a nation to see them supported.

Some energy opportunities take 10 years to bring to market and a lot of new technology and new thinking about conservation, distribution and refining. It is not something that the marketplace can adequately respond to. It is something that we ought to put together in the same way that we put Canada together in 1867 with the concept of a railway, something that the marketplace would not have given us, something that needed to be a kind of national vision.

I put it to the government that energy for Canada is not just a marketable product. It is a strategic resource in which we have so many options and ways to go and such a possible long horizon of planning and opportunity, that to put forward a false premise or theory of common sense, which it says dictates that Petro-Canada must be sold now, is an insult and a betrayal of our future as a country.

It does not surprise me that the government is not thinking about the future of the country or that it is not trying to build or to enlarge. So many of the things that the government has done have backfired, but even the ones that have been successful have resulted in the diminishing of what it means to be a Canadian and to know what Canada is all about. It has to learn. I hope there will be a government in office one day that will know that to hold the country together, one has to keep building, not privatizing, deregulating, Americanizing, or turning over to the provinces. That is not a future for our country.

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED LACK OF CONSULTATION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this morning I gave the Chair notice that I wanted to raise, at the first opportunity, a question of privilege on the manner in which the government proceeded yesterday, and I am referring to the fact that the Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) gave notice pursuant to Standing Order 78(3). I would like to read the following which appears at page 2095 of the Votes and Proceedings for Wednesday, October 10, 1990:

> Mr. McDermid, a Member of the Queen's Privy Council, from his place in the House, stated that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2) with respect to an allocation of time to the second reading stage of Bill C-84, An Act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, and, under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), gave notice of his intention to move a motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days, or a day, for the consideration and disposal of that stage of the said Bill.

Mr. Speaker, this happened late yesterday, after we had heard three speakers in a debate that started yesterday in the House—three speakers on a very important bill.

Mr. Speaker, I will try to be as brief as possible. The notice given by the minister is irregular, because he misled the House by implying that Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2) had been used. Not so, Mr. Speaker! Neither 78(1) nor 78(2) were used, and as for 78(3), according to us, according to the traditions and customs of this House, in fact for more than 20 years, Mr. Speaker, since 1969, when the Standing Orders were amended, the government has always been required to make every effort to consult with the party of the government's Official Opposition—in this case the Liberal Party—and the other parties in this House, in this case the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that neither the Parliamentary House Leader of the Liberal Party nor the Deputy House Leader and Whip, the hon. member for Cape Breton—Richmond East, nor my colleague, friend and deputy, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, nor the Deputy Whip of the Official Opposition, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Mr. Boudria, were ever consulted.

Therefore, no one in this House can say there has been any attempt to consult with the Official Opposition pursuant to Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2). Mr. Speaker, what do these Standing Orders say? I will read them, because this is very important.

[English]

> 78.(1) When a Minister of the Crown, from his or her place in the House, states that there is agreement among the representatives of all parties to allot a specified number of days or hours to the proceedings at one or more stages of any public bill, the Minister may propose a motion, without notice, setting forth the terms of such agreed allocation; and every such motion shall be decided forthwith, without debate or amendment.

Mr. Speaker, that has not been done. That was not done by the government.

Standing Order 78(2), Mr. Speaker, which flows after Standing Order 78(1), reads as follows:

> (2) When a Minister of the Crown, from his or her place in the House, states that a majority of the representatives of the several parties have come to an agreement—

And I underline "several parties have come to an agreement":

> —in respect of a proposed allotment of days or hours for the proceedings at any stage of the passing of a public bill, the Minister may propose a motion, without notice, during proceedings under Government Orders, setting forth the terms of the said proposed allocation; provided that for the purposes of this section of this Standing Order an allocation may be proposed in one motion to cover the proceedings at both the report and the third reading stages of a bill if that motion is consistent with the provisions of Standing Order 76(10). During the consideration of any such motion no Member may speak more than once or longer than ten minutes. Not more than two hours after the commencement of proceedings > thereon, the Speaker shall put every question necessary to dispose of the said motion. Any proceeding interrupted pursuant to this section of this Standing Order shall be deemed adjourned.

Mr. Speaker, that was not done. Standing Order 78(2) was not followed. From all this flows Standing Order 78(3) which says that if we could not get agreement under Standing Order 78(1) and we could not get agreement under Standing Order 78(2), then the government can come and consult with the parties and possibly after that consultation give a notice. I will read it:

> (3) A Minister of the Crown who from his or her place in the House, at a previous sitting, has stated that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of sections (1) or (2) of this Standing Order in respect of proceedings at the stage at which a public bill was then under consideration either in the House or in any committee, and has given notice of his or her intention so to do, may propose a motion during proceedings under Government Orders, for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at that stage; provided that the time allotted for any stage is not to be less than one sitting day and provided that for the purposes of this section of this Standing Order an allocation may be proposed in one motion to cover the proceedings at both the report and the third reading stages on a bill—

And so on. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I submit to you, this House was misled intentionally by this government, was not—

• (1110)

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Gauthier: I am using my words carefully, Mr. Speaker, and I will use those words carefully and I use them knowing exactly what they mean.

Mr. Speaker: Well, it is a very serious charge. I just want to consider my position for a moment or two. I would ask the hon. member to take his seat. I want to consider my position for a moment or two.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has raised, by way of a question of privilege—

Mr. Cooper: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Sorry, Mr. Speaker. I just want a point of clarification. If you are rising to make a ruling, it would be important that we on this side have an opportunity to respond. I just wanted to clarify that. It is not to interrupt the Chair in any way.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. parliamentary secretary and perhaps I should have made that clear. I am not, at this moment, making a ruling on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I am dealing with another matter that has emerged during the hon. member's intervention. But I want all hon. members and I want the public to understand where I am and what it is I have to do at the moment.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has, by way of a question of privilege, said in effect that the notice given by the hon. minister yesterday under the rules is not a proper notice because the minister has said that agreement could not be reached and that things that should have taken place have not taken place.

Earlier in the argument he said that the minister rose to give notice late yesterday afternoon after three speakers had debated and that by saying that agreement could not be reached he misled the House.

I would ask for hon. members' attention, please. that is not an easy subject. At that stage the hon. member had said the minister had misled the House.

Mr. Gauthier: No, I said the government misled the House.

Mr. Speaker: All right, through the minister the government had misled the House.

At that point there had been no accusations of deliberateness. Now, at a later stage in the argument, there is an accusation of deliberateness. If I have misunderstood what the hon. member said—and if what the hon. member said is that the government deliberately misled the House and that is not directed at the minister—then I would like clarification for that.

I do have the "blues" in front of me. I want to be absolutely sure that we do not have an accusation of deliberate misleading against the minister which has emerged from an argument that may or may not be valid on other grounds. That is the difficulty the Chair is in.

I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops and maybe he will be able to assist the Chair. I will hear the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier in a moment.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. Then I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I will just use the documents that are available to all members. I will leave it to the House to decide if what I have just said—

Mr. Speaker: That is not my problem at the moment. It may become my problem as I deal with the argument the hon. member is putting up. What I want to know is: Is the hon. member taking the position that he is making an allegation that the minister—

Mr. Gauthier: No.

Mr. Speaker: —deliberately misled the House? No.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I want to correct that impression that you got because I did not use those words. What I did say was that the government misled the House, and I said deliberately misled the House, and I can argue that point.

An hon. member: That's right.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops can help me.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to concur. I was listening obviously very carefully to my hon. friend for Ottawa—Vanier presenting his arguments. When he indicated that there had been misinformation, he did in fact refer to the government misleading the House as opposed to any particular member of the government.

Mr. Speaker: I am prepared to proceed to listen to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, but on the clear understanding that the House has had an assurance from him that there is no allegation that the minister has deliberately misled the House.

Hon. members will realize that that is something we have to clarify now. There may well be other arguments that I will have to listen to. I think I know where the argument is going, but I do not want to have any misunderstanding at this point.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I think I clarified what I said, what I meant to say, what I thought I had said—

An hon. member: And what you did say.

Mr. Gauthier: —and what I did say, I still maintain and I will repeat again. The government misled the House of Commons and did it deliberately. That is the argument that I want to make, Mr. Speaker, and I will make the argument using the documents that we all have in hand today.

I take Standing Order 78(3)—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. Let us get the first issue cleared away. I will hear further. The hon. parliamentary secretary was seeking the floor.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, first of all may I say that any attempts by anybody to mislead the House, I do not want in any way to have reflected on the minister. I think that responsibility is mine, as it is an area of my responsibility to negotiate with the other parties and attempt to come to an agreement.

I would like to enter into the point of privilege raised by my hon. friend because I think that he has raised an important point. It is one that I think deserves a serious response.

• (1120)

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. We are still dealing with the question of the words used. I listened to the hon. member for Kamloops. I think it was appropriate to listen, at least momentarily, to the hon. parliamentary secretary.

I want to assure the hon. parliamentary secretary that before I make any decision he will be heard on the substantive argument that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is raising. There was no need to go any further than that.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has given us his word that he is not directing any accusation against the minister for intentional misleading. I will accept that and I will hear his argument further. Then I will call on other members.

Mr. Gauthier: It went through my mind, Mr. Speaker, but I just will not say it. I just would like to continue with my argument to the effect that this is a faulty notice. I want to make the point using documents that we have before us. In Standing Order 78(3) it states:

> A Minister of the Crown who from his or her place in the House, at a previous sitting, has stated that an agreement could not be reached—

I underline "could not be reached". In the statement the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs made in the House yesterday he said:

> I have been informed that to date, agreement has not been reached—

There is a difference. The Standing Order says "could not" and the minister of state said yesterday "has not". To have an agreement, one must have two or three people participating in a kind of dialogue where exchanges are made. That is what an agreement is. An agreement is when people, in accord with the parameters of the problem before them, decide to do certain things.

The minister yesterday said there has been no agreement. How the heck could he say that when he knows darn well that there was no consultation with anybody on this side of the House? How could the minister, in his great intelligence, decide that the opposition, after three speakers in the House, had been consulted because he heard from this side opposition views on that bill? Is that what he did? I would like to hear from the minister as to why he put that in there, that it has been a fact that an agreement could not be reached. That is wrong and false.

In the standing order the use of the language is the same as in the notice given: an agreement has not been possible. The wording does not precisely say that the minister has tried to reach an agreement. It does not say that. The following is stated in yesterday's Hansard at page 14016:

> I have been informed that to date, agreement has not been reached—

What does that mean, Mr. Speaker?

I have been around here for 18 years and a lot of people in this House believed and thought that the customs, the procedures, and the usual way of doing things, the courteous thing, was to have consultations under Standing Order 78(1). That is the practice in the House, for those who are listening.

The rule says that the government comes to the opposition and says: "We would like to limit the debate on such and such a measure, or such a bill or motion. Would you agree to give us debate for maybe two or three days?" That has been done over the years since 1969. As I said before, that has been the practice. That has been the custom. That has been the rule of the House.

If the government could not get agreement under Standing Order 78(1) from all parties, maybe a majority of the parties, maybe two of the three parties in the House, would agree. That was Standing Order 78(2). If not, then it could use Standing Order 78(3) and give notice that no agreement could be reached. But, Mr. Speaker, to get an agreement you have to try to get an agreement and they never even tried to get an agreement.

My argument to you, Mr. Speaker, is that by saying to Canadians and to the House that Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2), as we used them, is false. The government never used Standing Order 78(1). It never used Standing Order 78(2). It is jumping the rules and using, in my view, the wrong approach. They are using the wrong—

Mr. Tobin: It is against the rules.

Mr. Gauthier: As the member says, it is against the rules to go and make that kind of statement.

There is more than an implication of the government. At least it must try under Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2). Technically the government could argue—I will give him that—that it has not been possible to reach an agreement. It could say that and that we would have to accept.

Mr. Speaker, you would have to start by stating that you tried to get an agreement, and the government never tried to get an agreement.

In my experience here in this House as Whip and as House leader, every time the government has come to us for consultation on this matter we have given a fair, an open and a direct answer to its questions. And it has used it. Time allocation and closure are well known to this government. It will go down in history as the government that misused, abused, and used that continuously to gag the House, but that is not the point I am trying to make.

We have been consulted on this matter before. It is true that sometimes we do not agree, but at least it tried. Then it comes in and says: "Because we cannot get an agreement, we move the time allocation procedure allowed under Standing Order 78(3)." We accept that. We know that.

The government has to get this legislation through. We know there are time limits on debates sometimes. The throne speech debate is eight days. The budget speech is five days. We accept those things. Those are rules of this House, but you have to operate within the rules of the House.

Mr. Speaker, you are to be the protector of those rules. That is why I appeal to you under my privileges and those of my group to protect us from those kinds of Senate oriented habits it has acquired. The way the Senate is doing it is the same bloody practice that the government wants to put here in the House of Commons. We will object to that as strenuously as we can.

I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to use your good judgment and your good offices to think this through and, based on what you have told me before, to try to come to grips with what is an agreement. It is not a debate. It is a process of consultation.

I am not debating with the government side as to whether or not we should or should not have time allocation. I am just saying that consultation with the opposition is required by the Standing Orders. They must be followed if we are to follow the rules, and I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to rule this notice as void and null, and absolutely non-existent.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in listening to my hon. friend I must say that I am almost persuaded by his very eloquent argument.

However, as I think anyone who spent any time in this House will know, there are always two sides to every debate and every question. In this case this is no exception. There are in fact two sides to the question.

It is interesting that in the four years prior to 1984 the government which the hon. member was a part of used time allocation and closure some 26 times. My information is that in the six years following that date we have hit an anniversary: we too have used it 26 times. Unfortunately, we were two years longer in that process than were the Liberals when they were in government. My point is this—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The matter that has been raised is not an easy one. I have to interpret the orders as they are written.

It does not help the Chair and it does not help the reputation of this place, when the hon. parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Kamloops, or anybody else is arguing a difficult and technical point, that some other member who is in general disagreement with the position taken but is not engaged in the technical and difficult debate is shouting from his or her seat.

Please, I ask hon. members to assist the Chair and to do it in a civilized and careful way. The country is desperately looking to some place where these things can be done and are done in a civilized way. I know that hon. members are very conscious of that, and I know that I can count on their co-operation.

• (1130)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the point I want to make is that in fact what has happened is time allocation and closure. These are the rules which are provided for our use in this House. They have become part of our operating system and have been used for more than 10 years. It is interesting that today it balances out, 26 times in the previous four years prior to 1984, and six times since.

It is interesting to read Standing Orders 78.(1), (2) and (3). I would like to refer to phrases in them. In Standing Order 78.(1) it states there is an agreement. In 78.(2) it states that the majority of the representatives of the several parties have come to an agreement. However, Standing Order 78.(3) says in the third line that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of the previous sections.

What is interesting about that particular wording is that it mentions an agreement but it does not mention the process. That is very crucial here. It is very central to the issue we are discussing at the moment. The reason it is so crucial is that it does not say or lay out a process that has to be followed with a little check list, and at the end of that check list one says the check list is completed, therefore this action takes place.

There is a very important reason, I believe, why the drafters of the Standing Order chose that particular wording. Essentially, what we are up against is that in order to have an agreement, you have to have a conversation. You have to have a discussion. However, there have been times, and it is not only today, but at other times in the past, that it is impossible to have that conversation. Therefore, just because that particular conversation does not take place does not mean that there have not been attempts for consultation and that the requirements of Standing Order 78.(1) and (2) have not been fulfilled.

I would like to make a point which is very germane to the argument we are facing today, and upon which, Mr. Speaker, you will have to make a decision. I would like to read the words of the minister when he rose in the House yesterday afternoon to propose this motion. I quote from page 14016 of Hansard, the top right hand column:

> We will continue to try to get an agreement with the opposition parties on a reasonable length of time that we debate this on second reading and get it into committee for an in-depth study.

In other words, the minister offered once again at the time of the introduction of the notice, an opportunity for negotiation. I use the words "once again" because I think those words are very crucial.

I would also like to point out that at page 14015 of Hansard the time listed at the bottom of the page on the left hand corner is 1740. I am guessing that roughly the time the minister put the proposal to the House was somewhere around 1745 or 1746. In other words, it was late in the debate yesterday.

Why did the minister move at that particular moment? Was it a time pulled out of the air? No, it was not the time pulled out of the air. The reason it was not a time pulled out of the air is because yesterday, in my role as parliamentary secretary to the leader of the government in the House, I tried to discuss with the opposition parties an attempt to come to agreements on a whole basket of legislation.

Yesterday the hon. member who rose on the point of order, the House leader for the Official Opposition was doing some important work in committee. I know that. As a result of that, yesterday I attempted to talk to the Whip of the Liberal Party. I attempted on three different occasions to talk to him. He was in and out of the House so we kept missing one another. I left word in the back room that I wished to speak to him. I waited until a few minutes to six, and in fact, as the timing shows in Hansard, I think it would work out to roughly 5.45, before I asked the minister to proceed with the notice on the time allocation.

The reason I point this out is that there were attempts on my part to have a discussion with the Official Opposition to go through this process. While going through the process of trying to have my discussions yesterday, I ended up talking with the House leader for the NDP. During the conversations we had it became very obvious to me that in fact there was no possibility for agreement under Standing Order 78(1). That one was clearly ruled out.

I attempted then to have conversations with the Official Opposition but was not successful. There were further attempts made and in fact, finally last evening, I ran into the Whip for the Official Opposition as he was going up in the elevator and after talking to him a moment indicated to him that it was our intention to proceed with this notice, but that we would still want to talk. I also had a conversation this morning with the House leader of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Speaker, what I am tying to demonstrate to you, I hope successfully, is that there have been several attempts, both publicly and privately, to proceed with discussions which would allow us to come to an agreement. But in fact, Mr. Speaker, those consultations did not take place other than the discussions that happened at the House leaders' meeting on the Tuesday previous, 48 hours or more ago.

I think it is very crucial because, again, if you go back to the wording of Standing Order 78(1), (2), and (3) it becomes very apparent from that wording that an agreement could not be reached.

Mr. Speaker, we could not reach an agreement. We have offered on several occasions, including as much as an hour and a half ago, to have further consultations to come to some sort of agreement. That was refused and obviously we do not have an agreement.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the notice of motion that was given yesterday by the minister was a perfectly legitimate motion. It was obvious that there was not agreement, and there was every reason to believe, as has been confirmed, that there was no agreement.

So, Mr. Speaker, we are left with a situation where the government wants to continue with its legislative agenda and do that in a reasonable time frame, it has to resort to the tools that are provided by the House of Commons in its Standing Orders.

We have done that. We have done that in this case. We have done it in previous cases. So although my friend makes a very persuasive argument, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that it simply is not a legitimate point of privilege. We offer once again to have consultations and to continue to have those negotiations.

Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate that we are more than happy to negotiate on a reasonable timetable for all legislation.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my friend the parliamentary secretary and while I find his comments to be interesting I do not find them terribly relevant.

I want to say right from the beginning that this is a most serious issue which the House leader for the Official Opposition has raised. The rules are there to be followed precisely and I would suggest that they were written with care. Any of us who have gone through the process of attempting to write standing orders recognizes the care and thought that goes into the wording of a particular standing order.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to some precedents first of all. I want to go back to April 14, 1987, during the debate on Bill C-22, when the Speaker at that point made this comment:

> Rules of procedure—are designed to allow the full expression of views on both sides of an issue. They provide the Opposition with a means to delay a decision. They also provide the majority with a means of limiting debate in order to arrive at a decision. This is the kind of balance essential to the procedure of a democratic assembly. Our rules were certainly never designed to permit the total frustration of one side or the other—

Mr. Speaker, I also refer to the February 7, 1990 Hansard at page 7948 when you made the following comments:

> Notice of time allocation motions after only a few hours of debate at any stage of a Bill can also be an abuse.

• (1140)

First of all to put this into some context, and I think the record is very clear, the Conservatives have in their six years doubled the use of closure and time allocation in the whole history of Parliament since 1867. In other words, no other government has used closure and time allocation to the extent of this particular government in our entire history. We have seen in committees, in this House, as well as the other place, an abuse of the rules, tradition, custom, interpretation and convention.

My recollection is that at the most recent House leaders meeting, which took place on Tuesday afternoon, I do not recall at that time whether there was a discussion as to the limits of debate on the privatization of Petro-Canada. I do not recall that. I do, however, agree with my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary, that we had discussions about the debate. But I point out that we only had three speakers, the minister responsible, the critic for the Official Opposition and the critic for the New Democratic Party spoke.

When my hon. friend the parliamentary secretary says that it was his intention to discuss this with somebody but he could not find anyone to discuss it with, Mr. Speaker, I submit to you with all respect that there are a number of people within each party with whom the hon. member could have discussed this issue, for example, the critics who were speaking. The critic for the Official Opposition was not consulted. The critic for the New Democratic Party was not consulted. Then there are House leaders, then there are deputy House leaders, then there are whips and there are deputy whips.

My friend the parliamentary secretary, if he is listening, knew where the House leader of the Official Opposition was yesterday afternoon. He was in committee, as was the whip for the New Democratic Party, in a very important committee meeting, namely the meeting on the Parliament of Canada Act. He was aware of that. It was a few steps down the hallway.

When the parliamentary secretary says that he attempted to converse on this issue, I suggest that he made very little effort to converse.

Mr. Layton: Were you consulted?

Mr. Riis: We had a discussion.

Therefore, I want to reinforce that I think my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, made the case well. We are all familiar with Standing Order 78(1), (2) and (3). When in Standing Order 78(3) it says an agreement could not be reached, surely to goodness that means that consultations or discussions of some kind would have to take place. When the parliamentary secretary now has admitted today that absolutely no conversations took place with representatives at least of the Official Opposition on this matter, it is perfectly clear.

I might say that I do not recall precise discussions of this nature, but we have had ongoing casual discussions for many days. I think what it does clarify is that if the government is going to use closure and time allocation again we had better formalize and use the formal meetings where the House leader of the government and the House leaders of the other parties meet regularly and formally to discuss the work of the House. Surely to goodness it must be at that time, or else another formally convened meeting when discussions of this nature must take place.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, with all seriousness that for Standing Order 78(3) to be used by the minister responsible for privatization and quoted in this House yesterday, where it says that an agreement could not be reached, and when we have determined today, without any question, that there was no discussion regarding an agreement at least between the government and the Official Opposition, I submit that if we are going to follow rules that are written for this House, we must do just that, follow the rules. If the rules are not followed, Mr. Speaker, I beg of you to recognize that at this point we have seen a breach of those particular rules, as they were intended to be followed. It would be appropriate for us not to proceed at this point with a time allocation motion and subsequent discussion and debate.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would just like very quickly to correct the record in terms of what the hon. member for Kamloops said about the use of closure. I have here all of the time allocations. The rule, which is now 78(1), (2) and (3), was imposed in 1971 by the Trudeau government. Between 1980 and 1984 inclusive, it was used 29 times in that four-year period. In the six-year period since then, it has been used 27 times. So, we have used it fewer times in six years than the Liberals used it in four years.

That is to answer the atrocious distortion by the hon. member for Kamloops that this government has used it more often than any government in history. We have a long way to go to catch up to the Trudeau government.

Mr. Arseneault: That's debate.

Mr. Allmand: Nobody believes you Harvie.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, apparently the facts are unacceptable to the Liberal opposition.

On March 29, 1990, the hon. member for Kamloops raised a complaint about the use of time allocation. Mr. Speaker said at that time, and I quote from page 9917 of Hansard:

> The hon. member for Kamloops has raised a complaint. At the same time, he has indicated that at least in his mind there was a possibility of obtaining a workable understanding.

—on time allocation. Mr. Speaker went on to say, and I quote:

> The hon. minister has said that in his view that was not possible.
> I have had to deal with this matter before, as hon. members know. I refer all hon. members to a ruling made on August 16, 1988, as reported on page 18380 of Hansard. In the very last paragraph I had to say this:
> Standing Order 117—
> Which is now Standing Order 73:
> —provides for a Minister to act if there is no agreement and as I stated on June 6, 1988, the Chair must take a Minister's declaration at face value and cannot judge the quality of negotiations or of any proposals that may have been made.
> I think that is the position that the Chair has to take.

I think that clears it up and we can get on to the business, Mr. Speaker. We have now taken up 45 minutes.

At the House leaders' meeting on Tuesday, I asked whether there would be agreement on some sort of reasonable period on this bill. There was no such agreement and it was obvious. I, indeed, asked, "Are you suggesting I will have to move to time allocation?" The acknowledgement was that I probably would have to do that. You have heard my parliamentary secretary state his efforts to reach some sort of agreement under 78(1) or 78(2).

I would repeat my offer now: if we can reach an agreement, under 78(1) or 78(2), I am prepared to reach such an agreement. I am prepared to do that now, right now, if there is such an agreement from the Opposition. I was not able to get it at the House leaders' meeting, which is the reason we have those meetings—in order to have those discussions.

My parliamentary secretary followed up yesterday, in the afternoon, with an attempt to reach an agreement, thinking that, after their caucuses, perhaps there was some inclination maybe to reach an agreement. There was not. On that basis, we are moving with 78(3) which, Mr. Speaker, but for the time we waste today, would have provided for three days at second reading on this legislation, which is quite a considerable amount of time, given the other processes that have to go through.

I would humbly suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the ruling you made on March 29, 1990, as a result of the complaint of the member for Kamloops, is appropriate in today's circumstances as well.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, some certain comments have been attributed to me by my friend, the honorary Parliamentary Secretary to the government House leader. I do not know if he is "honorary" or "honourable" of whatever, but I have to take him at face value.

It reminds me of the occasion when I defended a convicted individual in court in Halifax. The gentleman, at that time, was up for living off the avails of prostitution. When we went before the judge, the judge wanted to ask a specific question of my client—this is germane, Mr. Speaker—and he asked a question of my client. He said: "Were you at such and such a place on such and such a date?" My client responded: "Well, Your Honour, the weather outside is very nice." He would not answer the question which was put to him. When you hear the comments from the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, he does everything but go to the substantive part of Standing Order 78.

There are certain preconditions, Mr. Speaker, in order to put this particular standing order into effect. They are outlined in Standing Order 78(1), 78(2), and 78(3). Those are the facts. To suggest that there was some sort of nefarious agreement which nobody on this side of the House has ever heard about, was ever informed about, or consulted about, is not accurate.

The hon. parliamentary secretary has made allusions to the fact that he had tried to attempt to get a hold of me. If the parliamentary secretary would be clear in his own thinking, he would know that we both have been trying to get hold of each other, to discuss a particular matter pertaining to the striking committee. That was the reason, Mr. Speaker, that I have attempted to reach him and he tried to reach me. There was never a scintilla of a sentence, a message—absolutely nothing with regard to wanting to talk. Not a smidgen, as they say in Newfoundland. Not one smidgen, Mr. Speaker, of an attempt to try to get any kind of an agreement and/or to discuss the prospects of an agreement.

The parliamentary secretary is correct. He saw me enter into an elevator after six o'clock last night, after the Minister of Privatization stood in his place and gave the notice. He—

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but the various versions of what happened or did not happen may not be very much help to the Chair, keeping in mind past past rulings. I think we have heard enough. Both sides have indicated that they have a certain position to take on whether there was or was not adequate consultation or enough effort made.

I am much more concerned about the plain wording of the rule and what the minister may be required to say when he rises in his place. The minister said an agreement has not been reached. The plain wording of the rule says that the minister is to say that agreement could not be reached. I would ask the hon. member to address that point specifically.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, in response to your direction I will follow that, but for the record, the hon. member opposite has talked about process. He has tried to stack his argument with regard to process.

Mr. Andre: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. In order to help hon. members, I have just indicated that this is a very narrow procedural point. I have allowed a certain latitude with respect to what was or what was not said.

I am asking anyone who intervenes or is recognized by the Chair to address this narrow procedural point. I am bound by rules. The rules say certain things. The minister said something else. That is the point I am coming to.

Mr. Dingwall: Under Standing Order 78, it is very clear. It states in 78(1):

> —that there is agreement among the representatives of all parties—

Standing Order 78(2) says:

> —that a majority of the representatives of the several parties have come to an agreement in respect of a proposed allotment of days—

Mr. Hawkes: Did that happen? Did either of those things happen?

Mr. Dingwall: Standing Order 78(3) states:

> —has stated that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of sections (1) or (2)—

Mr. Dingwall: "Could not be reached," Mr. Speaker. We suggest to you respectfully, Sir, that under the provisions of Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2), there was no attempt at any agreement whatsoever.

The provisions of Standing Order 78(3) are not applicable. Therefore, the motion is null and void.

In conclusion, one of the most fundamental responsibilities of the Chair in the House is to make certain members of Parliament, all members of Parliament, abide by the rules of the House of Commons.

If members came into this Chamber dressed inappropriately, Mr. Speaker, you would draw that to their attention and corrective action would be taken. I suggest to you, Sir, that these rules have been broken by hon. members opposite. It is clear beyond a shadow of a doubt that they are in breach of the Standing Orders and I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that you would find a prima facie case on the question of privilege of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to be quite brief in my dealings with Standing Order 78(3). It seems to me the rule is very clear, notwithstanding the precedent that the government House leader has cited in Your Honour's ruling in March of this year, I believe it was.

I submit that the quality of the negotiations is not what we are asking Your Honour to inquire into. We are asking Your Honour to determine that there were, in fact, no negotiations. It is our submission that negotiations are required under Standing Order 78(3) before the minister can stand in the House and say that agreement could not be reached.

The minister himself is now saying that he did not say that. He said there was no agreement. I submit that saying that there is no agreement is one thing, and it is not what he is required to say. He has to say that no agreement could be reached, and in order to reach an agreement you have to have negotiations. That is elementary. There were no negotiations in this case. There was no consultation in this case. I came into the House at four o'clock. I was in here for a short time. I was in my office. The parliamentary secretary knows he can deal with me.

Mr. Speaker: I can save a lot of time. We are all interested in all interventions. I do not need to hear anything more on what was or was not said. I am asking the hon. member who has considerable legal training in his own right to address the very direct question I have posed, and that is the wording of the rule.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the wording of the rule is that an agreement, and I quote it again:

—that an agreement could not be reached—

It is my submission that, in order to attempt to get an agreement, you must negotiate. You must make an effort. You must go and ask, and I submit there has been no asking in this case.

In my limited experience in the House, and I will admit that my experience with this rule in terms of negotiations is relatively limited, but I did witness it once with the predecessor of the current government House leader. He came into the opposition lobby one day and said: "This is a formal consultation. Is there agreement under 78(1) or 78(2) to limit debate on this bill?" Our House leader at the time, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, said: "No, there is no such agreement." The minister said: "Thank you very much." He left and moved a time allocation order. That is the way it is done. It is elementary.

I submit that that was not done in this case. For the minister to stand up and say, in fact, that there has been no agreement may have been true, but there was no negotiation and he had to say more than that. He had to say that he could not get an agreement and he did not say it. In my submission, the notice given yesterday is null and void.

Mr. Speaker: I will reserve for a little while my decision on this matter. In the meantime, we will proceed with Routine Proceedings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could ask the hon. member, before raising the point of order, to allow me to render the judgment, which I said I would do.

Point of Order

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED LACK OF CONSULTATION—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier rose earlier this morning on a question of privilege concerning whether or not the hon. minister had given valid notice pursuant to the provisions of sections 78(1), 78(2) and 78(3) of the Standing Orders relating to time allocation.

The hon. minister said "I am informed that to date agreement has not been reached under the provisions," et cetera. I point out that he also said "we will try to get an agreement with the opposition parties on a reasonable length of time".

There has been considerable discussion this morning with respect to what is or what is not required under the Standing Order in terms of consultation or exchange of views between the government and others in the Chamber.

I want it clearly understood that my ruling today does not turn in any way, or on any particular, on any of the comments that were made during arguments as to the question of discussions between, or lack of discussions between, anybody in this Chamber at all.

My ruling does not take anything away from rulings of past Speakers, and especially my ruling of some months ago, in March I think of last year. It made it very clear that under the rules it is not for the Speaker to go behind the statement of the minister and try to make a factual ruling as to whether or not discussions were adequate or inadequate or, for that matter, try to strain the rules and to try to give an interpretation that substitutes for the plain wording of the rule.

I have also indicated that it might be in the interests of the House that the entire rule was looked at again, reconsidered, and perhaps redrafted.

The rule I am bound by, and this place lives by the rule of law, is the plain words of Ruling 78.(3) and it states:

> A Minister of the Crown who from his or her place in the House, at a previous sitting, has stated that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of—

[Translation]

In English:

> (3) A Minister of the Crown who from his or her place in the House, at a previous sitting, has stated an agreement could not be reached—

[English]

It sometimes happens that when one has to try to interpret what is meant by words, some guidance or some difference shows up between the English and the French. There is, in my opinion, absolutely no difference whatsoever in the meaning of those words either in English or in French.

As I have pointed out, the hon. minister said: "I have been informed to date that agreement has not been reached." I find on this very narrow ground, but one which I cannot ignore as your Speaker because it is clearly there in the rules, that the minister should have said "could not be reached." That is what is required under the ruling and, as a consequence, I have to rule that the notice given yesterday is not valid. Of course, it is for the government to decide whether it wishes to give the notice again.

POINT OF ORDER

REQUEST TO REVERT APPLICATIONS PURSUANT TO S. O. 52

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I had given you notice earlier today of my intention to rise at the appropriate time to seek your judgment on a matter of an emergency debate.

I wonder if the House would agree to revert to that point to allow me to make that presentation?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the request. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Sorry. It is not agreed.

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill C-84, an Act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

And on the amendment of Mr. Lee (p. 14001).

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

"this House oppose in principle Bill C-84, An Act respecting the privatization of the National Petroleum Company of Canada, because it considers it irresponsible to abandon public sector involvement in the Canadian petroleum industry in the absence of a coherent Canadian federal government energy policy at a time of increasing international uncertainty with regard to petroleum supply."

And on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Harvey (p. 14010).

That the amendment be amended by adding the following words:

"and at a time when the development and wide dispersal of alternatives to traditional fossil fuel energy sources is an environmental necessity."

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting for this opportunity for several years. Last night, when I was preparing my notes, I tried to figure how long it was since the last two elections, and in fact it was exactly six years, two months and fourteen days ago that I promised my constituents that under a Conservative government, Petro-Canada would be privatized.

Today, I am proud of the fact that as a member to be part of this Conservative government I was able to bring my ideas to this place and work for the well-being of my constituents in Laval, in the province of Quebec, on behalf of whom I intend to speak today. The others did a very good job, and my fellow members from Laval are not far away. Nevertheless, I am sure that I speak not only for myself and my constituents but also for the residents of Laval Centre and Laval West.

Speaker's Ruling

• (1250)

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I think we should proceed with the debate on the Petro-Canada privatization bill, Bill C-84.

In 1984, I had a small pamphlet in which I described my campaign promises. There were about ten. In 1988, during the second campaign, people would show me this pamphlet, saying: "One promise was not kept; you made us a promise you didn't keep". It was the promise to privatize Petro-Canada. The only answer I could give them was to say, quite honestly: "Don't worry, we are working on it".

Well, today, Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be able to rise in the House and tell my constituents in Laval: "We did it"! To the retailers I had the privilege to represent during the past 20 years, I want to say that Petro-Canada was a real problem for us. It was really unacceptable that the Liberals should create this corporation with our money, to compete with us. That really took the cake.

I had a poster which goes back to the last announcement made by former Minister of Energy Marc Lalonde in Montreal, on October 24, 1981.

An hon. member: Father Superior!

Mr. Della Noce: He was the father of Energy Canada. If he were still here today, with his ideas, and if the Progressive Conservative Party had not changed the National Energy Program, we might be paying as much as $117 or $120 a barrel for oil. Imagine what it would cost at the pump!

This government did what it had to do. It got rid of the National Energy Program. And since that time, we are paying world prices. Considering what is happening in the Persian Gulf, we may not be necessarely happy about it, and this may not be the right time to talk about prices, but I think it would take more than one war to reach Mr. Lalonde's price of $117 or $120 a barrel, the price he forecast for the 90s.

This photograph, Mr. Speaker, which I am willing to table in the House, brings back some very unpleasant memories. It was on the wall of my office in one of my service stations in Laval. I asked my employees to leave it in the building. What a nightmare, Mr. Speaker! What a nightmare for consumers. What a nightmare for retailers. What a shock for Quebecers when they saw this photograph in the Montreal newspaper La Presse on Tuesday, October 2, 1990. It was published with the announcement that Petro-Canada would be privatized. The photograph was taken on October 24, 1981. You should see what he looks like, pumping gas!

But to get back to our subject, Mr. Speaker, since I was waiting for this opportunity, when I was asked to join the party in 1984, I was semi-retired.

Mr. Bélair: At your age?

Mr. Della Noce: Yes, at my age! Someone approached me—

An hon. member: It wasn't the Liberals!

Mr. Della Noce: Someone approached me to ask if I wanted to join the Progressive Conservative Party. I said: "That sounds interesting, because in my field, only the Progressive Conservative Party would be able to meet my expectations". In fact, I wrote to Mr. Lalonde, the former Minister of Energy—

An hon. member: Did he answer your letter?

Mr. Della Noce: —the guy with the cap. But Mr. Lalonde never answered my letter, although I wrote on behalf of 7,000 Quebec retailers. At the time, of course, Quebec was not very popular with the Liberal Party, but after all! I also sent a copy to a marvelous man, one of my ex-colleagues—I never thought I would be his colleague one day when I wrote the letter—the hon. member for Joliette, Mr. Roch LaSalle. He got back to me three days later, he called me to ask if he could help us. You will say, of course, that is the opposition. No, this was a man who liked Quebec, who liked Quebecers. When you represent 7,000 members, it seems the least you can expect is an answer to your letter.

M. Tétreault: And he was not arrogant.

Mr. Della Noce: No, he was not an arrogant man. It seems to me Mr. Lalonde could have answered my letter.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, I said that I would run if I could find a party which shared my views and my ideology, for example on Petro-Canada and on the National Energy Program for which I did not have any use. I had a meeting with the Prime Minister who at the time was Leader of the Opposition here in the House. I told him about my concerns and my views. I will always remember what the Prime Minister told me. I did not know him any better than anybody else, but I liked him. Like a great Canadian he said to me: Get elected and go to Ottawa to defend your own cause. I thought this was such a good answer that I did come here to defend my cause.

In 1985, with my colleague from Calgary Southwest who made a very good speech yesterday, I began working on a privatization project. Six of my colleagues were members of that committee. Today I see that the dream of Canadians, consumers and retailers is coming true.

Yesterday I listened to members opposite, a member of the New Democratic Party, Liberal members, including one of our outstanding colleagues the Liberal member for York Centre who said, and I quote from page 14016 of yesterday's debates:

> —the opposition does not support the privatization of Petro-Canada and that we will be voting against this measure.

They do not support the privatization of Petro-Canada, sure enough, but they are the ones who set it up in the first place. It is a rather embarrassing thing to say.

Why put Petro-Canada on the block? Why privatize it? Why keep it? These are the questions they should be asking. What did Petro-Canada ever do for consumers? Did it give them lower prices? No. Did it treat retailers better that the private sector did? No. Did it help get what is called a "window on the industry? I can tell you that Mr. Lalonde was not even anywhere near the window and already things turned sour. What was Petro-Canada doing, Mr. Speaker? Let me tell you. I was a retailer in those says. I owned a station, and there were another three or four in the vicinity. There was Petrofina, BP, Supertest and others. All of a sudden, Petro-Canada gas stations swarmed in like flies or mosquitoes and I found myself surrounded. They all had a face lift at the taxpayers expense, you know. They were using my money to compete with me! That was too much! That was liberal all right! Red maple leaves were put on. That was Trudeau propaganda! How nice to see all those maple leaves across Canada while Quebec is separating. The hell with Quebec, right!

Mr. Speaker, when I got up one morning and saw I had four Petro-Canada stations for competitors, that they each had a $50,000 budget for a face lift using my money while I had only $1,000 for painting and maintenance, I promised myself that I would shut them down. I had to work very hard, but I succeeded. They had no idea of how it works in the private enterprise. They were not getting up at five in the morning to attract the clientele. They were subsidized by the people, with government money. I was so easy to run the business on government money. But if you is with privatization, you will see changes. Wait and see what will happen once they are privatized.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, because I thought I had twenty minutes. I do not understand. You are telling me I used merely ten minutes. Maybe I will be allowed to continue—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I hate to disturb the hon. member because he is just getting wound up. He will have 10 minutes remaining in his speech, plus 10 minutes for questions and comments, after three o'clock.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chamber until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, the people of the north continue to oppose the goods and services tax proposals. The government of the Northwest Territories says the tax is unfair and the timing is wrong. Unemployment is rising. Interest rates are too high. The economy is in recession. The higher prices the GST will create could not come at a worse time.

Prices of goods and services in the north are already, on average, 44 per cent higher than in southern Canada. In isolated Arctic settlements, prices can be more than 100 per cent higher. Because of these higher prices, the value of the federal sales tax credit will be much lower for the northern Canadian family than for the southern Canadian family.

Under the goods and services tax, all freight to the north will be taxed.

A resolution passed by the Kitikmeot regional council last month stated simply: "This tax is going to be terrible for all northerners".

The Northwest Territories does not want the GST. The government must scrap it now.

THE LATE ED BARRETT

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, Red Deer said goodbye to one of its best this week with the passing of former mayor Ed Barrett. I was privileged to join a packed congregation to celebrate the life of a well loved and respected community leader.

Mr. Barrett gave a lifetime of service to his community. He served 13 years on city council. He was mayor from 1965 to 1974. He was president of the Alberta Urban Municipalities Association, and very active in his church, especially the choir, where he was known for his fine singing voice.

He retired in 1974 and was named Red Deer's Citizen of the Year. But Ed Barrett did not stop there. He became very active in organizing seniors' groups and was still heard singing in the hospital last week.

Ed Barrett will be remembered for many things, most importantly for his honesty and integrity. He was an example for everyone who was privileged to know him.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, a number of items mentioned in the recent report of the Economic Council of Canada have been conveniently forgotten by many opposition critics.

The report states that in order for industry and workers to adapt to emerging markets and new patterns of international trade, there must be more emphasis on job retraining at every level rather than passive income support programs.

The council calls for more co-operation between all levels of government, labour, and employers in regard to job retraining and other important economic matters in order to have a better balance between fiscal and monetary policy.

The report indicates that Bill C-21, presently being held up in the other place, is a significant start toward changing our policies regarding job training and thus adapting to changing world markets.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberals in the other place must end their antics and allow these progressive initiatives, supported by the Economic Council to move forward.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to deliver a message to this government on behalf of the dairy and poultry producers of Haldimand—Norfolk.

They join thousands of other farmers across Canada in urging this government not to compromise supply management as it enters the final round of the GATT negotiations. Farmers all across Canada have been hurt by this government's anti-farm policies. Our dairy and poultry farmers and their supply management systems were sold down the river by concessions this government gave under the Canada-U.S. free trade deal.

Canada must not sell out its farmers under these negotiations as it did under free trade. Canadian dairy and poultry farmers are under the gun now, thanks to this government. I am telling this government not to return from the GATT negotiations unless it helps our supply managed commodity farmers. It is time for this government to finally stand up for the rights of our Canadian farmers.

[Translation]

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I have here a notice sent to employees who work for Mallette in Timmins. The company's owners have announced layoffs for an indefinite period because of the present economic situation.

This notice is very similar to ones received by employees at Air Canada, Imperial Oil, Canadian National, and so forth. What the Prime Minister calls a slight slowdown is, in fact, a recession.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance put a stop to these disastrous economic policies which include high interest rates, the goods and services tax and other measures that have led to the present situation.

[English]

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it has been deeply disappointing and frustrating to most Canadians, and certainly to me, that some of our citizens, particularly in Quebec but also among our native Indian bands, seek a separate sovereignty, apart from Canada. I cannot and will not support any directions that promote a separate Canada.

The unity of this country is our most compelling priority. However, this is not to say that we should try to prevent anyone from exercising his or her freedom to feel or to think or to speak differently in Canada, even though it may be for extreme positions such as separation. Our democracy is surely strong enough for that. It will stand the test of dissent and division. In fact, it will be that very spirit of free democracy that will ultimately keep us together.

For example, as much as I oppose the separation of Quebec, which is the cause that motivates some of our independent members from Quebec, and as strongly as I will work to defend Canadian unity against their efforts, nevertheless I do support their elected right to represent their constituents as they see fit.

We shall not be able to demonstrate the virtues of Canadianism by obstructing or squelching free thought or free speech. Rather, we will establish those virtues by tolerating dissent and debate and by defeating wrong directions in democratic ways.

HIBERNIA PROJECT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Quebec Conservatives did not wait until September 1990 to defend the interests of Quebec in the Hibernia project. Yesterday, Quebec Minister Gérald Tremblay, a Liberal, proved this when he said that "we should not look at the situation in terms of Lévis alone". Mr. Tremblay maintained that without the presence of Benoit Bouchard, the minister and member for Roberval in Ottawa, "we would not have the economic spinoffs we have in Quebec today".

Mr. Speaker, the Quebec Conservatives, Minister Bouchard and the Conservative member for Lévis have always worked very hard to maximize economic spinoffs for Quebec and its workers.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Canadians found out to their amazement that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service had warned the Solicitor General in March 1989 that there were serious problems in Canada's native community and that there was a potential for violence.

It seems the Solicitor General did not give further consideration to this report.

All Canadians want an answer to the following questions: When did the minister find out that illegal arms were entering Canada in Akwesasne, in my riding? Why wasn't the information passed on to the Sûreté du Québec? What steps has the minister taken to avoid the kind of violence that led to two deaths in Akwesasne and one in Oka?

Mr. Speaker, we must have a parliamentary inquiry to find the answers to these questions. I therefore ask that the Standing Committee on Justice of the House of Commons start such an inquiry immediately.

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the unbelievable manoeuvring resorted to by Liberal senators with Mr. Chretien's approval are a clear demonstration of the confusion the Liberal Party has fallen into.

What is at stake here is the very principle of Parliamentary democracy, meaning the pre-eminence of an elected House of Commons over an appointed Senate.

The Liberal senators are blocking legislation stemming from the 1989 budget, major changes to the unemployment insurance scheme, as well as the GST legislation. They are playing a very dangerous, costly and irresponsible game. In terms of money, their tricks will add $8.3 billion to the annual deficit, taking into account the fact that the Liberals are currently blocking four other finance bills.

Since we came into office in 1984, the Senate has delayed as many as 50 bills.

In short, the Liberal Party is usurping power and, such tactics could very well undermine the very foundation of the Canadian legislative system.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, we have a grain crisis in Saskatchewan. Our grain cannot be sold at a decent price. Sales have dried up, the elevator system is plugged and farmers are left to pile the grain on the ground.

Farmers used to receive interest-free cash advances. The PC government cancelled this and instead, because of the GST, it is the farmers who will be giving the government interest-free cash advances. Those tricky Tories.

My colleagues in the Saskatchewan legislature have collected 2,000 signatures in response to a single ad. The Prime Minister's office should be receiving these today. These 2,000 farm families of Saskatchewan have taken the time to send an important message to the Prime Minister.

The message, Mr. Speaker, is as follows:

> Dear Mr. Mulroney:
> We ask you to help ease the grain delivery crisis. Bring back interest-free advances. It's one way your government can help Saskatchewan farmers immediately.

ENERGY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon a very important cavalcade reached Ottawa, cars which are fuelled in four different ways: by gasoline, natural gas, propane and 85 per cent methanol.

As these vehicles cross Canada, they dramatically illustrate that there are viable alternatives to our slavish dependence on oil as the fuel that powers most passenger cars. Of these four fuels, only methanol is not available to consumers on a consistent and wide scale basis. Yet cars powered by methanol are clean-burning and environmentally friendly. Because methanol can be made from natural gas, wood, coal, corn or grains, Canada could have an inexhaustible supply of energy—if we were to put the resources and determination behind it.

• (1410)

Already methanol is a billion dollar industry in western Canada, with most of the production going to the United States where clean air laws favour that fuel.

I urge Canadians to consider methanol and I invite members of this House this afternoon to have a look at the World of Wheels alternative fuel vehicles outside.

The time has come to think beyond oil.

CANADA POST

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I received 310 letters and two petitions, signed by some 751 people, all in protest of the proposed closure of the post office in South Ohio, Nova Scotia. They are the latest victims of Canada Post's drive to close rural post offices in Canada.

They join other angry people in South West Nova whose vigorous protests against the closure of their post offices have been ignored by Canada Post.

These are the people missed by Canada Post when it did a survey that showed 90 per cent of its rural customers are happy with these closures.

These are the people who have not been fooled by Canada Post's efforts to hide the serious impact these closures will have on all rural Canadians by announcing only one at a time.

Mr. Speaker, I call on the minister responsible to direct Canada Post to come clean with its rural customers and reveal the total number of post offices it intends to close so that they have an opportunity to all come together at once to defend their clear right to the best possible postal service this Canadian government can give.

JUSTICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, this morning Canadians awoke to the news that Conservatives want to be above the law. Yesterday the Tories used their majority muscle in a legislative committee to force through changes in the law which govern MPs and Senators. They want to be tipped off to any RCMP criminal investigations into their parliamentary affairs.

In other words, the Conservatives are creating a two-tiered justice system—one level for Tory MPs and another for ordinary Canadians.

Earlier this year, the Minister of Justice said there could only be one law for Canadians. She told the House: "We cannot pick and choose when we want to apply the law and we cannot pick and choose which laws we want to obey". A few weeks later her colleagues are looking for special laws for Tory MPs.

There seem to be no limits to the abuses of this government. To further their misguided agenda, the Tories are willing to break all conventions, abuse closure, stack the Senate, and now they want to give themselves special legal privileges.

No wonder Canadians have such contempt for this government.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, enough is enough. Moncton has been hard hit by the Conservative agenda. We lost the CN shops for a total of 1,500 jobs, the government destroyed VIA Rail for a loss of 200 jobs. The closure of CFB Moncton will result in the loss of another 400 jobs, and now CN says it is looking to cut 70 jobs, and Air Canada expects to cut 13.

Taking 70 jobs out of Moncton does not sound like much, but it is roughly equivalent to taking 1,800 jobs from a city the size of Montreal.

We are in a made-in-Canada recession as a result of this government's high interest rate and high dollar policies. We need a government that is sensitive to communities, especially those that have already paid a hard and heavy price for the disastrous Tory economic and fiscal policies.

Seventy jobs when you are looking at a balance sheet are just numbers on a sheet of paper, but 70 people with family and friends who have to suffer the dislocation and emotional upset of job loss is too high a price to pay on the altar of bottom line economics.

Enough is enough.

HOUSING

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, recent statistics have come to light which show 9 per cent of people living in housing co-ops have incomes in excess of $50,000.

Over one-half of all the people living in federally subsidized housing co-ops can afford the carrying costs of a modest home. Many housing co-op projects are financed by 8 per cent or 9 per cent mortgage money over 50 years.

As people's incomes rise, they should move on so that the homeless and low-income Canadians have access to affordable housing.

I call upon the minister to introduce a policy which would encourage high-income Canadians to move out of these heavily subsidized projects.

We as a country can no longer afford to subsidize whole projects like the Sundance Housing Co-op in Edmonton with 8 per cent money so that high-income Canadians can enjoy a co-op lifestyle.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The thousands of Canadians who are losing their jobs, their homes, and their businesses due to the policies of this government know that we are in a recession.

The respected economists of the Conference Board of Canada confirm that we are in a recession. They say that it is our first made-in-Canada recession, in effect one caused by the policies of this government. Everybody in Canada knows that we are in a recession except the Minister of Finance.

Therefore I have a very simple question for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister finally admit that we are now in a recession? Yes or no.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I may be so bold and say to the Leader of the Opposition, that is a silly question.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Let us deal with the facts of what we have as an economy, the facts that I have been setting out very clearly since my budget of February of this year where I said we were going through a slowdown in the economy, a slowdown that is necessary for our economy to go through, because of the extent of the inflationary pressures that are in the economy, inflationary pressures that were a good deal higher than those of our major trading partners.

It is important that we see an easing in these inflationary pressures so that we can get on to a path of non-inflationary growth with lower interest rates and we can see a continuation of the tremendous job creation record that we had in the first six years of our mandate.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Canadians will be sickened by the callous and heartless evasion of the basic question by the Minister of Finance.

The thousands of Canadians who are losing their jobs due to the recession caused by the policies of this government are not being silly. The thousands of Canadians who are losing their homes and their businesses due to the recession caused by the policies of this government are not being silly.

Why won't the minister stop trying to tell Canadians they are being silly when they are stating the facts? Why won't he admit there is a recession and start doing something about it by reversing his policies starting with the GST?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was not referring to Canadians as being silly. I am referring to the type of question that the hon. member is asking.

If he has sensible question as to why we are going through a period of a slowdown in the economy, I have addressed that question. If he is asking the question as to what we are doing to move ourselves through this slow-down in the economy, I have answered that question as well.

As we have seen the economy slowing down, as we have seen the inflationary pressures subside, we are getting interest rates down. As we get those interest rates down, the positive effect of that will be felt in every corner of the country. That is precisely the response that we are following as a government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this morning, when the minister was asked by the press whether there was a recession, he said "the whole discussion is silly".

Canadians will want to know why he is so unwilling to say the r word. They are not going to wash out his mouth with soap if he states the fact and says the word "recession". Why won't he say it? Why won't he admit it?

I repeat my question: Why won't the Minister of Finance admit, himself, that there is now a recession? Yes or no.

[Translation]

Why does the minister refuse to admit that his policies have created a recession?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition is trying in a very awkward fashion to dance on the head of a pin.

I am trying to deal with the realities of the economic environment that we find ourselves in.

• (1420)

The economic realities are very clear. I have been talking about them long before the Leader of the Opposition talked about them. I said in my budget that 1990 was going to be a difficult year.

We must get ourselves through this year by getting a clear decline in the inflationary pressures so that we can see a reduction in interest rates. As we see that reduction in interest rates, we will be able to put ourselves on to a solid path of growth in the future. That is the policy that we have been following. It is a consistent policy and the policy is going to work.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have not created this recession. It is the policies of the Minister of Finance and his Tory government that have thrown Canada into a recession which everyone in this country, except the Minister of Finance, seems to recognize. Now, Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Is the Minister of Finance finally prepared to stand up as a man and honestly tell Canadians that we are indeed faced with a recession? That is all we want from him. Yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, these are esoteric questions that the hon. member is talking about. Perhaps he would deal with the issues.

Does the senior finance critic for the Liberal Party have any suggestions as to how we can get through this period? Is he going to respond in any way to what the Business Council on National Issues said today on how we get the deficit down lower?

Are these questions that the Liberal Party are prepared to address, or are they simply going to ask questions which have no bearing on the actual facts that we have to deal with?

Canadians want to see political parties and politicians dealing with the issues in an honest way on how we are going to find our way through the difficult period that I have talked about for all of this year? That is the question that the hon. member should be responding to.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has been at this for five years. He refused to listen to the Canadian premiers. He refuses to listen to Canadian business. He refuses to listen to Canadians who have told him over and over again that his high interest rate policy is driving the country into a recession.

I am sick and tired of listening to the Minister of Finance and his weak—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that hon. members have heard the question.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think there is one thing that is fairly clear and that most Canadians would acknowledge, that if there is a recession a Liberal would recognize it. As the authors of the worst recession in 55 years, the Liberals would recognize it.

My hon. friend has been referring to comments made on the economy. Perhaps he could have, in justice, referred to two comments made this morning in regard to precisely the situation of the Minister of Finance and his record.

The President of BCNI said at the press conference this morning: "Mr. Wilson's performance has been better than that of all the provinces."

The President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association said at the press conference this morning: "The manufacturers' sales tax is a disaster. The GST ought to go through". If the member of Parliament had any sense of commitment to a modern economy, he would urge the Liberals in the Senate to pass it now.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

One of the groups that has been hardest hit in Canada by this government's failed economic policies is the aboriginal people of Canada. The Prime Minister said during the Oka crisis that when it was over he would have a plan that all Canadians would be proud of.

What is the plan for those one-half of aboriginal children who live in poverty? Where is the plan for the 90 per cent of the aboriginal families in Restigouche who live on welfare or unemployment insurance? Where is the plan for those people living in substandard housing on bands and reserves across this country?

We have heard the Prime Minister's promises. I ask the Prime Minister: Where is the plan?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend's questions are inadvertently misleading.

There was never any suggestion in the major commitments made by me in this House or by the minister that we could solve overnight the very serious social problems that have developed among aboriginal peoples now over decades and centuries.

Ms. Blondin: Just change your attitude.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says that there ought to be a change in attitudes. She is quite right.

The fundamental commitment that I made on behalf of the Government of Canada, and I believe on behalf of all parliamentarians, is that what is owed native peoples is a fundamental change in attitude to bring about the social justice to which they are entitled.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Prime Minister that there has not been one concrete proposal to address the severe poverty which is abysmal in aboriginal communities across this country. The economic policies of this government continue to fail Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. This morning the Minister of State for Finance was telling us about an "adjustment period". This adjustment period is in fact a real tragedy. Still more families live in poverty, still more youths cannot find jobs.

Mr. Speaker, again I quote the minister who said this morning: "Many Canadians are suffering and feeling helpless." I ask the Prime Minister, where are the jobs which would put an end to their sufferings and their feeling of helplessness?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is a well-known fact that for six years now Canada has been the leader in job creation, that it has created jobs faster than any of the G-7 industrialized nations. We have created 1.6 million new jobs in Canada, an achievement for which our country deserves full recognition. Since September 17, 1984 the unemployment rate among young people has dropped 4.6 per cent.

With respect to children or individuals living in poverty, I said yesterday that 250,000 Canadians no longer live in poverty as a result of our government's policies. This has to be a commendable achievement for a country like ours.

Miracles we did not have, but we did make real progress and our performance would have been better still had the hon. member and her Party given us their full support.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister knows that the Economic Council of Canada showed that Canada had, out of 16 countries, the 15th highest level of unemployment. We should be ashamed of our level of unemployment. We should not be bragging about our level of unemployment. We should be planning for full employment in this country.

This recession that has been created by this government, created by its economic policies of free trade, privatization and deregulation, has been all too effective. We can ask the poor across this country, working families who are out of a job, and companies that have moved across the border as a result of this government's policies.

I say to the Prime Minister that his policies have been very effective in getting us into a recession. What kind of policies does he have to get us out of a recession?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it is generally acknowledged by all members of the House, or certainly most members of the House, that for the last six years Canada's job-creation record topped the G-7 and that our record of economic growth was second only to that of Japan.

Apart from some of the job-creation figures, it is true that the economy is in a slow down. But during that period since 1984, 757,000 Canadians have been removed from the poverty rolls. That is a major contribution toward social justice by any standard. What we are seeking to do is to create new wealth in the country in a non-inflationary climate. That is why the policies of the government were designed to avoid what is taking place in some other industrialized countries where inflation is now approaching 10 per cent and 11 per cent. Because we believe inflation to be the most insidious of ills in an economy since it hurts the poor and those on fixed incomes more than anyone else, we are maintaining the elements that have brought about record economic prosperity for six years and it is our hope to do so in a non-inflationary manner.

If my hon. friend has one single idea that would improve upon that, please stand up and tell us because all we have heard is more spending, more spending, more spending, more taxes and more taxes and more taxes from the NDP.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Resign.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Last week the Economic Council said that the activities of his government are the main cause of inflation. Yesterday, at long last, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology did admit that we are in a recession. Again yesterday the Conference Board of Canada said that the recession will be harder on Canada than on any other country in the world, harder on Quebec than on any other Canadian province. Yesterday we lost 1,000 jobs in Montreal. Why? Because of the crushing interest rates we have to endure. My question is this: What does the minister intend to do to get us out of the mess he made, to get us out of the recession he has created?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me take my hon. friend back to how this all started. It was 1988 and 1989 when inflationary pressures in the economy started to increase. We had a point where the inflation rate got a good deal higher and the inflationary pressures, as measured by the unit labour costs got a good deal higher than those in the United States, Japan and Germany. We had to take action as a government to ease those inflationary pressures.

That resulted in higher interest rates. The higher interest rates were also designed to slow down the rate of growth of credit, which was growing two to two and a half times faster than the nominal rate of growth in the economy. If we had let that go on, we would have got ourselves exactly back into the position that the Liberal Party of Canada got us into in 1981-82.

Surely my hon. friend, who was not part of that government can recognize from a distance that that was a mess we should avoid if we possibly could. That is precisely what we are trying to avoid with the policies that we have been following.

Since the spring when we have seen the inflationary pressures ease, we have been seeing interest rates ease. As that continues further, as the economy eases, we are getting interest rates down further. They have come down in the last three and a half months by one and a half percentage points. That is the direction in which we are going. We believe it is the right policy. We believe that if we had followed the policies that my colleague and his friends are suggesting we follow, we would be right back into the mess of 1981–82 when we had a far, far more serious recession than anybody is contemplating today. That is the problem that we have to avoid.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, with regret this Minister of Finance is living in cuckoo land.

The problem that we face in this country is jobs. The GST does not create jobs, it costs jobs. High interest rates do not create jobs, they cost jobs.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, Freud said it very well. He said that you have to admit that there is a problem before you can solve the problem. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, we are in a recession whether this minister will admit it or not. What this government does not need is another economist, it needs a psychiatrist.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put the question very clearly.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, we are in a recession caused by the Prime Minister, by the minister, by this government—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint Léonard.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, in the past 48 hours we lost 3,000 jobs at Air Canada, 1,500 jobs at CN and 3,000 at Esso. Meanwhile, there has been a 50 per cent increase in bankruptcies in this country.

My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. How many companies and how many jobs do we have to lose before the minister admits that his monetary policy is disastrous and that we are in a recession, a recession he himself created? What is he going to do now? How many jobs and companies do we have to lose?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentions Air Canada. Surely he acknowledges that the biggest problem that Air Canada has today is the increase in oil prices, which in turn has been caused by the international problem in the Middle East right now.

Now the hon. member says, "What are we going to do about it?". I would like to ask him to reflect back on what the Economic Council said. It had some criticisms for the Government of Canada. It said that we should be getting the deficit down more quickly so that we can get interest rates down more quickly.

What is the hon. member suggesting we do to get the deficit down?

Some hon. members: Resign.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We feel we have the right balance between taxes and spending, but if the hon. member feels we can get the deficit down faster by increasing taxes more or by reducing expenditures less, then let him say so.

The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood said, "The Liberal Party can't hang-glide to power without alternatives. They must have alternatives". We are the alternative because I agree with the hon. member, you can't hang-glide to power.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the minister wants to know what to do to reduce the deficit. Well, start reducing interest. If the minister had listened—

[Translation]

If the minister had listened to the Government of Quebec, the Conseil du patronat, and all economic partners in Quebec, we would not be in a recession today!

What is he going to do now? Now that he has his recession, the one he created, what is he going to do before it is too late for Canada?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the hon. member probably has not read all of the reports that we have seen in the last few days.

But the fundamental basis for them saying we must get interest rates down is to get the deficit down. If my hon. friend has some ideas on how to get the deficit down, let him join in the public debate. Let him—

Some hon. members: Resign.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Prairie farmers are not able to sell their grain. Thousands of bushels are in danger of simply rotting on the ground. Farmer and rural bankruptcies are up by 25 per cent over last year. Every western MP can tell tragic tales about constituents in his or her riding. Western Canada is in a recession.

When is the government going to provide some real assistance to prairie agriculture instead of rhetoric. We need help now.

• (1440)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question and recognize the serious problems that agriculture is facing in western Canada in particular.

As the hon. member knows, we did provide some $500 million worth of emergency assistance in the spring. We had hoped that that would be matched by the provincial governments. Unfortunately, it was matched in part only but I think has gone some distance in helping farmers get their crops in. We now have a record crop and it is causing congestion. Several alternatives are being looked at.

However, I want to remind the hon. member that this problem has been with us for quite some time. We are trying to deal with the issue at the GATT negotiations, to try to bring some order out of the chaos in the international marketplace. We are working very diligently on a long-term safety net program.

I am sure the hon. member will be pleased to know that I am looking very favourably at the reinstatement of interest-free cash advances, provided it can be linked into a long-term solution to the problem.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The policies that the Minister of Agriculture is talking about today are not doing anything to alleviate the immediate farm financial crisis. I find the discussion about the reinstatement of the interest-free cash advance to be in order. Members of his own party have been talking about reinstating the interest-free cash advance.

Can the minister tell us today that by the end of this week interest-free cash advances will be available to western Canadian farmers so that they are not at bay with the banks at the immediate time?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I did indicate that we were giving the matter urgent consideration.

Also I would like to remind the hon. member and his colleagues that this morning the Prime Minister, myself and other members of Cabinet met with Mr. Dunkel, the head of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade who is in Canada at the present time working in a co-ordinated effort to try to bring some order out of the chaos that exists in the international marketplace.

The Prime Minister is the one who brought agriculture to the top of the agenda of the GATT and he should be applauded for that. We now have an opportunity to address the long-term situation which will not only serve us in the long term but will serve us in the immediate term as well.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who was warned last spring by western premiers about a made-in-Canada recession. They used that term, made-in-Canada recession. They warned him about the use of high interest rates, the lack of confidence in his policies and the imposition of the GST, which would only worsen the condition of the western economy.

In the face of 268 farm bankruptcies on the prairies, the loss of 11,000 manufacturing jobs in Manitoba alone, will the minister now admit that he and his policies are a total and dreadful failure?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is selectively referring to what the premiers said. He neglects to say that in 1988 they unanimously came out with a recommendation to get interest rates down. If we had done that, we would have a rip-roaring inflation problem today, the likes of which they have in the United Kingdom today. I remind hon. members that the inflation rate in the United Kingdom is 10.6 per cent.

The hon. member criticizes the GST, saying that it will be tough on agriculture. What my hon. friend should do is go and speak to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. They will explain to him that they support the GST because there will be a $250 million saving to agriculture. Let me repeat that, Mr. Speaker, a $250 million saving for agriculture as a result of the elimination of the federal sales tax and the introduction of the goods and services tax.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I wish this minister would come west. My home city of Winnipeg has a proud heritage in transportation, yet this week there were 223 more lay-offs at Air Canada and 125 more lost jobs at CN Rail, which will result in taking $8 million out of the Winnipeg economy. I have said nothing about the total collapse of the trucking industry in my province.

I want to ask the Minister this. Will he now realize that Manitobans are hurting, as are all Canadians, and that his policies are crippling the Manitoba economy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have never said that Canadians are not hurting. I understand—

An hon. member: You said it was silly.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): No, no, I said the Leader of the Opposition was silly.

I have said that I understand that the period we are going through now, which I anticipated some while ago, would be a difficult one for Canadians. But what we have to understand is the alternatives.

We could have avoided this period we are going through now. We could have let the party go on for another three, six, or nine months, but then the problems would be that much greater. What we are trying to do is avoid the boom and the bust that we had in 1981-82 by taking steps earlier to anticipate the problem and to get the problem under control before we lose control of it, and that is precisely what we are going through now.

I said in my budget that there will be great demands for quick-fix solutions to this, quick-fix solutions that are not possible. Unfortunately, my colleague is looking for a quick-fix solution which simply will not work.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic provinces are in agony. Prohibitive interest rates, hundreds of jobs gone, yesterday, at Air Canada and its Atlantic service division, the looming GST, and now a man-made recession. I have a question for the man, the Minister of Finance.

Why is he hell-bent on destroying the Atlantic provinces and why does he consider their fears about this situation, in his own words, silly?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is silly for the hon. member to suggest that I am hell-bent on destroying the economy of the Atlantic provinces. What I have tried to explain to the hon. member and her colleagues is the basis for the policy that we have been following.

She should reflect back to what happened in the 1970s and the early 1980s. The government of the day swept the problem of inflation under the carpet and allowed inflation to go to 13 per cent. That resulted in interest rates of 20 per cent to 25 per cent and that, Mr. Speaker, did destroy the economy of Atlantic Canada. If she could understand the fact that we tried to anticipate the problem in this business cycle, not let inflation get out of control, and avoid the problems that we ran into in the 1970s and early 1980s, she would understand the basis for the policy that we are following today. It is a policy of leadership, of avoiding problems before they get out of control.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. minister avoids any more problems, the Atlantic provinces will disappear. Overnight, in Nova Scotia, heating oil is up three cents a litre, gas is up two cents a litre, and the other Atlantic provinces will soon have to follow suit. In our region, this winter, Canadians will be unemployed and they will be freezing in the dark. Will the minister, for the love of God, change his policy?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister who promised, during the federal election, to provide generous adjustment programs for workers who lose their jobs because of his government's policies.

Since Tuesday, 2,900 jobs at Air Canada, 1,500 jobs at Canadian National, and up to 3,000 jobs at Imperial Oil have been axed because of the government's policy of transport deregulation and lax rules on corporate mergers and take-overs. When will the Prime Minister produce those generous programs so that workers and their families will not be left high and dry and broke by the government?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the NDP ask the same question day after day after day, at the same time as they are defending the Liberal senators who are holding up $800 million worth of benefits for Canadian workers.

Some hon. members: VER, VER.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, if the government thinks that the cut-backs and meagre half measures of Bill C-21 are generous programs, then I worry about the future for Canadian workers.

• (1450)

Transport deregulation has cost the industry 4,400 jobs within the past 44 hours. That is 100 jobs an hour and now the government wants to open things up completely with continent-wide free trade in the skies.

I ask again, Mr. Speaker, will the government produce the programs it promised to help workers? Better yet, will the government dump policies such as deregulation, high interest rates, and the GST, that are killing those jobs in the first place?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, out of the litany of problems that my hon. friend referred to, he referred to deregulation. I would like to point out that in the National Transportation Agency's annual report it stated that Canada's airline industry has always been concentrated, but when examined closely it is less dominated by one airline now than it was before the relaxing of regulatory controls in 1984. The increased level of competition in the domestic airline industry has produced a much broader selection of services and prices for the Canadian transportation industry.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

We now know it's official: Canada is in a recession and it is going to hurt. This was according to the Conference Board, and yesterday, one of the government's ministers was honest enough to admit it was true. We also know that Quebec is going to hurt more than the others. With 40 per cent of Canadian business bankruptcies, an unemployment rate of 10.5 per cent, compared with 6.5 per cent in Ontario, and this week's announcement that 4,000 jobs will be lost in Montreal alone, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister what he intends to do about turning the situation around. And when is the government going to give us a new economic statement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have repeated several times the reasons behind the policies of the Canadian government. There was a problem in the past with inflation, and our inflation rate is still higher than that of our trading partners in other countries. That is why it is very important for our country to reduce inflationary pressures. By doing so, we can then reduce interest rates. That is our government's policy. It is a policy that created a large number of jobs in Quebec and across Canada during the first year of our term, and that same policy will produce the same results in the years to come.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean has the floor, for a very short supplementary.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, only the Minister of Finance fails to see that unreasonably high interest rates are a drastic remedy that is killing, not curing the patient. This policy is draining Quebec. It is pulling the plug on a whole generation of hard work and success in business in Quebec. Mr. Speaker, when will this government finally take the responsibility for its own actions, set interest rates itself and stop hiding behind the Governor of the Bank of Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must say that when the hon. member was on this side of the House, he agreed wholeheartedly with our government's policies.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The government's economic policies have set the transport industry into a complete tail spin. In just a matter of days, Air Canada has laid off close to 3,000 people and CN has let go another 1,500 hard working Canadians.

Given the government's failing right wing economic agenda of privatization, deregulation, and high interest rates, what is the minister prepared to do to save the thousands of much needed jobs in the transport sector? It is a key industry in our national economy.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to our policies of privatization, deregulation, and high interest rates which are designed to control inflation.

If he would look at countries around the world, such as the eastern European countries, Australia, or New Zealand which do not call themselves right wing countries, he would see that the exact same policies of privatization, deregulation, and inflation control are being followed there.

The whole point that I am making to my hon. friend is that if he would take his head out of the sand and look at what is happening around the world today, understanding the types of economic policies that are followed throughout the world to deal with the economic challenges we have as a country, he would be supportive of our economic policy.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, talking about sand, if the minister removed the sand between his ears, he might see what is happening to our country.

My supplementary question is directed to the same minister.

Upon announcing the policy of deregulation, the Deputy Prime Minister said: "This government will monitor the effects of change upon the employees and will respond to any adverse consequences as humanely as possible."

I ask the minister: Will the government keep this promise and provide the necessary adjustment programs to help the thousands upon thousands of Canadian workers who have been displaced, particularly now that we are into a full blown recession, created by this one Minister of Finance?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, only the Liberals would regard $800 million worth of adjustment programs as being insignificant. That is what is being held up by the hon. member's colleagues in the Senate.

Some hon. members: VER, VER.

Mr. Speaker: I remind hon. members that each time I have to restore order, precious time is fleeing out of Question Period.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, the adjustment programs that we have put forward to deal with exactly the kinds of problems that the hon. members keep hammering away at are in the Senate. It has been eleven months since they were sent to the Senate.

BILL C-21

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, over the last number of days, representatives and the president of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union of British Columbia; the president and representatives of the Fishermen's Union of Atlantic Canada, representing tens of thousands of fishermen, have been in Ottawa to meet with members from all three parties.

In the case of British Columbia, 90 per cent of the fishermen will not quality for unemployment insurance because of the regulations now being imposed by the government. There are thousands more in Atlantic Canada.

My question is very simple. Given that both these unions have made it crystal clear that they do not support Bill C-21, why will the government not do as it is asked and put an end to this economic terrorism, introduce the VER, and put an end to economic hostage taking of—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a temporary VER bill is not going to help the new parents in Canada who are looking for maternity and paternal benefits. A VER bill is—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

• (1500)

Mrs. McDougall: If the hon. member is so concerned about the workers—

Some hon. members: VER, VER.

Mrs. McDougall: —then I would suggest that they take into account the needs of seasonal workers—

Some hon. members: VER, VER.

Mrs. McDougall: —in the fish plants as well as the fishermen and the other people who are concerned. All the shouting in the world is not going to help those people.

FORESTS

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and deals with the Canada-Quebec Subsidiary Agreement on Development.

On August 24, 1990, the federal government submitted to the minister of Forestry for Quebec a proposal for the renewal of the Canada-Quebec Forest Agreement.

Considering no answer has been received yet, could the Minister tell us how he intends to ensure that the Quebec forest industry benefits as soon as possible from the federal governement funds?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his excellent question.

We have indeed offered, on August 24th, the Quebec government to renew the Forest Agreement. As of yet, we have not received an answer. However, we believe that the Quebec government intends to make a valid proposal toward finding a solution, as producers in Quebec expect, which is extremeley important for the forests in Quebec.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is customary for the Opposition House leader to ask what the government's legislative agenda will be for the next few days. I ask the question.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, today we will continue with second reading of Bill C-84. Tomorrow, I would like to call and perhaps deal with in its entirety Bill C-37 for third reading, Bill C-74 to complete second reading, and Bill C-73 to complete second reading.

I understand in all of these cases we are near completion. Discussions can carry on informally. In terms of order, I understand there is some concern about what might be called first. Certainly that is subject to agreement with the opposition as well.

On Monday, I am not quite sure at this point what business will be called, probably Bill C-84. But there might be a change.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, just as a matter of information. I wonder if the House leader could tell us what he means by "probably" so that people can plan their business for Monday. Can he give us an indication of what he has in mind except Bill C-84 for Tuesday next week? What does he intend to call? It is all very well to point out probably, but I would like to have some indication so we can organize our work here on this side of the House.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to get some certainty so that we can organize our work as well. Last Tuesday we had a House meeting and talked about Bill C–84. Today, a point of order was raised which the Speaker ruled in contravention of citation 732 of Beauchesne's. That has thrown the schedule off. I am sorry.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, unless I heard incorrectly, it seems to me that the government House leader has questioned the decision of the Chair. I think you will find that entirely inappropriate. First of all, he has no right to question the decision of the Chair by saying it was an inappropriate decision.

I want to say, representing people who want to make this place work as effectively and efficiently as possible—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: When we asked the government House leader to give us a platform for a few days so that we can plan ahead so that the appropriate speakers can be brought into their places, all he could do was tell us what we are going to do tomorrow. He said: "Maybe we will do something on Monday". Not a word for Tuesday. We cannot conduct business in a proper way unless the government House leader does his job.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this is absolutely ridiculous.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cooper: I appreciate their applause when I refer to their ridiculousness of their arguments.

Their arguments are ridiculous because in fact what the House leader has said is that he would like to have discussions with the other House leaders to talk about the agenda for the next few days. We have had those discussions. I had some of them—

An hon. member: Drop it.

Mr. Cooper: Sorry. Go ahead. Would you like to take the floor?

An hon. member: You are taking all the floor.

Mr. Cooper: Take the floor.

An hon. member: You sound like a Liberal senator.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I can wait all day here.

An hon. member: On the same point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will hear the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and then I will hear the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Gauthier: This is unbelievable, Mr. Speaker. We have the parliamentary secretary now apologizing for the behaviour of his leader in this House, who tells us that we have had meetings—

An hon. member: You do.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we meet every Tuesday. I have been decent in not giving this House my impressions of those bloody meetings because sometimes it is waste of time. But if he wants to have meetings and afterward say that there was consultation when there was no consultation, and then appeal a decision of the Chair, I think the leader on the government side has to eat crow sometimes and he has to admit he made a mistake today.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to make one point. I think we have co–operated with this government and the proof is the agenda. We have been very co–operative with the government up until now. But if the government keeps insulting the opposition, not telling us what is going to be done tomorrow or Monday, or Tuesday, and play the game by surprise, Mr. Speaker, we have a couple of surprises up our sleeves too.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, if the House leader had responded to the House leader for the Liberal opposition with what was going to be the business of next week without having consulted with the hon. member, he would accuse him of ramming legislation down their throats. The bottom line is that the minister has indicated that today we will continue with Bill C–84; Friday, we will do Bills C–37, C–73 and C–74.

We are prepared to have discussions with the opposition House leader and the leader of the NDP to talk about the legislation for Monday and Tuesday. We are prepared to have those discussions simply because we do try to negotiate an agreement that is acceptable to all members of the House. That has been our practice and it is a practice that we will continue to live up to.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the exchange that just took place. I know what it is as a result of. It is a result of an impatient minister of privatization who wanted to put closure before he should have. However, I think that the House leader somehow looked at the decision that was made earlier this day by the Speaker and I think you should look very carefully as to whether or not the House leader has impugned the Speaker's decision. I reserve the right to look at it.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I think the evidence is clear that this government continues to run roughshod over the opposition.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Nunziata: If the parliamentary system of government is to work—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have a point of order, or is he talking about government business?

Mr. Nunziata: If the House of Commons is to operate in an intelligent, prudent and effective manner, there has to be co-operation between the House leaders. The House leader of the Official Opposition is trying to get some understanding from the government in terms of its plan. The government has the authority to set the orders of the day. We simply would like to know what the government intends to call at the beginning of next week. How can Canadians have confidence in this government if they do not know—

• (1510)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think there has been enough negotiations coming across from the government side and the opposition. If there are to be any more negotiations, I think they should be done either behind the curtain or at another locale, where they always are done. I think we should get on with the government business today.

The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to negotiate, as you suggest, behind the curtains or wherever.

I think there is another important matter that we simply cannot leave. It is that we always respect the decision of the Chair. I heard very clearly the government House leader say that the Speaker's decision was in contravention of Standing Order 78(3). That means he is questioning the decision of the Speaker. I suggest that before he returns to this House, he must withdraw those comments in the traditional way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sure we will have a look at the"blues". We will carry on.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance) moved that a Ways and Means motion to amend the Income Tax Act (child tax credit), laid upon the table on Wednesday, October 10, 1990, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed, on division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) moved that Bill C-86, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (child tax credit), be read the first time and be printed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and on the amendment of Mr. Lee (p. 14001); and on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East), (p. 14010).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When we adjourned at one o'clock, the hon. member for Laval-Est had the floor. He has 10 minutes remaining in his debate, plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, before you left the Chair, you said I had ten minutes left. I will now continue my speech on the privatization of Petro-Canada.

As I said this morning, I have tried to explain why Petro-Canada has been of no use to either retailers or consumers. I tried to find some benefits, and found not a single one. Petro-Canada was a failure. There was nothing in it for Canadians.

Mr. Saint-Julien: That's true!

Mr. Della Noce: First of all, the government has no business selling gas, Mr. Speaker, any more than it does selling tooth brushes. It is absolutely ridiculous to use taxpayers' money to take over a company in the private sector, considering the private sector was in perfectly good shape.

This party feels that private sector deserves our confidence. Today, Mr. Speaker, I thought again during lunch about the fact that Petro-Canada never played the leading role it was supposed to play. Petro-Canada was always a bone of contention. Let me give you an example. When Petro-Canada sold gas for one cent a litre less than private companies like Esso, for instance, the next day, everybody called the government to complain that Petro-Canada was cutting its prices. Whenever Petro-Canada decided to charge one cent more, the next day Canadian consumers would be on the phone, saying: This is our company, so why do we have to pay more? It doesn't make sense. That is what we had to contend with for six years, when we got those calls in our ridings.

As a company, Petro-Canada was in a conflict-of-interest situation from the outset because it was powerless. It was always an extension of the government and only did what the government told it to do.

Petro-Canada's slogan was something like: "It belongs to us". Mr. Speaker, I have given this a lot of thought over the years, and I think I have the answer. It doesn't belong to us, because nobody can go there and get free or cheaper gas. Several times it reminded me of the time when Shell had a slogan: Shell helps those who help themselves. The Shell retailers I represented said: Help yourself, because Shell certainly won't. Petro-Canada belongs to you. Maybe they left out something and it should read: Petro-Canada does not belong to you. Maybe that's what they meant. Although the Liberals said at the time it was a window opening on the industry, I didn't see a very big window and I didn't see what consumers stood to gain either.

Mr. Speaker, Petro-Canada will have a fantastic future thanks to privatization. With or without a war in Kuwait, according to the experts and analysts the next five years will be excellent for the oil industry, and that includes Petro-Canada.

Members opposite who like Petro-Canada and who still object to the bill—only yesterday, we had one member who said he was going to vote against the bill. The hon. member for York Centre, from the Toronto area, said that the opposition was not in favour of privatizing Petro-Canada. He has forgotten that oil companies are promised a bright future, whether or not there is a war in Kuwait. They are going through difficult times just now. The Opposition just cannot admit that Petro-Canada should not be a Crown corporation.

Petro-Canada has not discovered a single barrel of oil, not even a glass. It was supposed to show leadership and assume the duties of existing organizations. Not a barrel, not even a cup. Yet, the people opposite want to keep it. On a diet for the past year, Petro-Canada has dropped a lot of deadweight. It has sold 1,200 of its service stations. From now on, therefore, this company will be able to do its job like the others, on the same level as the others, and will be able likewise to get financing. The good thing about that Petro-Canada will no longer be a political tool in the hands of a minister such as Mr. Lalonde who could call and say: On such and such a day, you are going to do this, you are going to do that.

That era is over! We must let private enterprise operate without government interference. Why is the government not selling tooth brushes? I wonder why. What did the retailers get? At first, when they received their Petro-Canada signs, they were happy because they were part of a big organization and expected to make millions. They were even forbidden to hang on the wall pictures of their families. They would work like slaves from 7 a.m. to 11 p.m. because their manager in his ivory tower in Calgary had said that those were the opening hours. When retailers complained that not a single customer would show up after 9 p.m, they were told that it did not matter, that Petro-Canada stations remained open until 11 p.m., and that was that! Do you call that living? I know a number of retailers who ruined their personnel lives, their family lives, received hardly any salaries and got no return on their investments. They lost everything because Petro-canada, a Crown corporation, was forcing them to remain open until 11 p.m. Petro-Canada wanted to keep a nice profile, because the minister used to call it once in a while; it had to look good politically, especially once every four years, come election time. That is what Petro-Canada did for our people.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my colleagues who, with me, formed a team in 1985 to suggest this privatization to the government. I wish to thank also all the ministers, their advisers and especially our Prime Minister who listened to us and other Canadians, because in my own riding of Laval, in Quebec, I have not met many people who are great supporters of Petro-Canada. Each time there was a price increase, Petro-Canada, which was supposed to monitor the industry, just went along. When there were decreases, it went along too. But it never led the way. It just followed; they were a bunch of "followers".

Today, Mr. Speaker, I am proud to tell my constituents who are listening to me that I did keep the promise I made in 1984 and repeated in 1988, that Petro-Canada would be privatized and that the National Energy Program would be abolished. Today, Mr. Speaker, I can tell them "mission accomplished!". And it is a mission accomplished for a number of Quebec ridings. I toured Quebec and visited quite a few service station operators, I knew 7,000 of them when I was their representative. All the way from Montreal to Gaspé, and along the Ontario border as well. The agents who wore the Petro-Canada cap certainly did not have it made, quite the contrary, they had to work harder and for lower returns than others operating in the private sector.

I had the pleasure of working 14 years with Imperial Oil. These turned out to be the 14 most disastrous years of my life because Imperial Oil management were heartless. I do not know if they have mellowed since, but I rather doubt it. Their one and only concern was the dollar. When private sector dealers are battling it out on a level field, fair is fair, but when war is being waged with Canadian taxpayers' money I can tell you that you may be hard pressed to stand the competition.

As I said in my remarks this morning, each private station service operator had an annual budget of $1,000 for sprucing up the place, while each Petro-Canada agent could spend as much as $50,000 for the same thing. They would even break up the concrete to clean up although it was not necessary. It did not matter, they were spending taxpayers' money. The Liberals are second to none when it comes to spending money. Goodbye, thank you, not to worry! Marc Lalonde, a nice picture I have kept since 1981, Canada's No. 1 gas jockey, "Marc Lalonde, October 24, 1981". See what he looks like! He created a lot of problems for the retailers, but he never dealt with the industry's problems, because Petro-Canada never did anything to improve Canada's position. Let my colleagues opposite tell the House whether in Gaspé, gas was cheaper at Petro-Canada! Certainly not! In fact, it was more expensive. Did they sell gas cheaper in Petro-Canada stations in Abitibi? No, they charged more! Was the service any better? Certainly not!

They came down hard on the retailers and told them; Petro-Canada was now a national company and had to force its way into the market. Sure, but they ignored the rights of employees. And this was all because Mr. Trudeau wanted to see a maple leaf on every block. That is why Petro-Canada was so important.

Mr. Saint-Julien: A red maple leaf!

Mr. Della Noce: They got their little red leaf. They got their red maple leaf. But they lost the election. And they alienated retailers. The retailers didn't vote for the Liberals because they got the short end of the stick. I represented those retailers, but when I asked Mr. Lalonde to help us, he didn't have the courtesy to reply.

Mr. Speaker, all this should come as no surprise. You have heard this kind of story before. All I want to say is that Petro-Canada will have a successful future if it goes private. I want to congratulate the minister and the government for making this possible, and I am proud to be a member of this government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Quebec spoke well, but I must add that, originally, Petro-Canada was intended to benefit not only for people interested in making money here and there but all Canadians. About the service stations that were built in Quebec, their people who built them sure made money, because they were tearing down old buildings and putting up new ones. I can assure you the government made no money on that. Private businesses wanted to take advantage of the situation.

[English]

I do not want to get into a full scale debate, but it would seem to me that Petro-Canada, is something which was owned by Canadians for Canadians and not solely for the abuse of private industry, so that it could gouge and fill its pockets. Today in this House I accuse private industry and I accuse the gas companies of going ahead and gouging us at the gas pumps.

We still have Petro-Canada. Thank God, we have not sold it off. It is one of the last things that we had that we can say virtually is our own as Canadians. Now we come along and for a couple of dollars, he says—

[Translation]

We are going to put an end to the maple leaf, which stands for Canada.

[English]

And so it is, Mr. Speaker. The red ensign is on it because it belongs to us. All these people who want to get in simply by saying their little piece over on the other side, let them listen because Petro-Canada is our birthright.

I wonder if my hon. colleague could perhaps address himself to these questions which I pose: Would Quebec indeed be enjoying the facilities of getting all the gas it needs now, notwithstanding the fact that we made a deal to give most of it away with free trade? Would Hibernia have taken place?

My hon. colleague says that he was in gas stations all over Canada. I ask my colleague: Was he ever in the tar sands? Did he ever go out to see what Hibernia was all about? Did he ever go up to the Beaufort Sea? I would like to hear what he has to say about that. I would like to put that in the perspective of what we as Canadians have sacrificed so that we can own them—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Parent: I never asked you. It was for the man who was speaking. The whole thing is, I say to the man over there, that most of us have been to these places. I think it is only right that the man over there who is defending the sale of Petro-Canada should be the one to answer the questions that I pose to him today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope the hon. member would be succinct because there are two other questioners.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I will be as brief as possible. The questions of my colleague from Welland were so good that I will be delighted to answer them. I have been waiting six years to answer these questions. I am very proud today to stand in this House and do so.

My colleague says that if we destroy stations we could have people working. Yes, that is the Liberal thinking: destroy something that does not need to be destroyed, just to spend money. I am against that.

The situation is that if we compete I have to have the same tools to compete. This was not so. One day I woke up and three service stations around me that were poor like me became rich people, and the name was Petro-Can. This was not fair. Why throw me out of business? I had a family. I had employees. Why throw me out of business with Canadian money? That is not fair. You should give me the same share. That is what I do not like about it.

An hon. member: Your own money.

Mr. Della Noce: My own money. The government took my money to replace a floor or a station that was not needed because the private owner had it and it was okay. Now I have to sit back and applaud the federal Liberal Party for what it did. This is abuse of the industry and abuse of money that people have to pay tax on a daily basis.

The hon. member said that Petro-Canada was there to eliminate the abuse of the oil company. What did it do? Give me one example when Petro-Canada stood up and fought with Imperial Oil. There was none. It did nothing. Imperial Oil was increasing one cent; Petro-Canada was increasing two cents. Nothing, nothing was done, and they call that police to monitor the price. It was even excluded from the Competition Act. It could do anything. You could not even apply the Competition Act.

Today it is part of the Competition Act like Imperial Oil, like Shell, and like Texaco used to be. Why should it be excluded from the Competition Act? You call that a police who is allowed to shoot with no rules. That is what it was. That is what I did not like and that is what they did not like.

It is too bad, Mr. Speaker, that you tell me my time is up. I could speak to him for two more hours, as an example, but I will give a break to my other colleague.

• (1530)

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a remark and to ask a question. The hon. member for Laval-Est has stood up for the interests of the people of Canada and Quebec like few other Quebec member of Parliament. And he did not wait until September 1990 to do so. On many occasions, in caucus meetings and in the House, Mr. Speaker, he kept us informed on the gasoline issue.

Mr. Speaker, we were always told that Petro-Canada belonged to us, but some of my constituents kept asking me why Petro-Canada was not cheaper and was indeed more expensive at times than other companies. My question is the following: Will the Quebec Conservative member for Laval-Est tell us why the gas sold by Petro-Canada does not cost less?

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Having been involved for 20 years in that industry, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you and the Hon. Member for Abitibi, also the Hon. Member for Welland—I wanted to tell him earlier, but I will reply to both of them now.

Mr. Speaker, Petro-Canada was experiencing tremondous difficulties. It was in a conflict of interest situation every day and every hour. It could not lower its prices because that move would have been detrimental to the private sector. If it raised them, that move would have hurt the government, come election time. Therefore, it was between—

Mrs. Bourgault: —a rock and a hard place.

Mr. Della Noce: —yes, between a rock and a hard place. If there is an Hon. Member here who feels that Petro-Canada has done a good job, he should tell me whether in his riding, his street or near his house he ever saw a Petro-Canada station selling gas not two, not three, not four, but one cent cheaper, as I did myself when I was a private retailer! Let him identify a single case. I challenge anybody. Petro-Canada could not do so—and this is my reply to my colleague—because it was a Crown corporation and, as such, it had to obey like a tin soldier, meaning that it could not move. Sometimes it would be the Minister calling, at other times it would be the board or the private sector. And you had better listen to the private sector. In short, do this, do not do that. It was a big waste of time and money, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time allocated for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Burin—Saint-Georges has the floor.

[English]

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, first of all, let me say how saddened I was the day my leader told me I would no longer be able to shadow my good friend, the minister responsible for privatization.

Mr. Boudria: Lots of time.

Mr. Simmons: The short time I spent in that assignment was enjoyable all the more so because the minister was always very cordial. Without tongue in cheek, I want to thank him for that. We did not agree often, but that is why he is on one side of the House and I am on the other. I wish my successor in that position, the gentleman from Scarborough—Rouge River, the same kind of cordial relationship with the minister.

I thought one of the more interesting speeches in this Chamber in recent times was the one just given by my good friend from Laval-Est. He and I should share with you a little secret. I inherited the office I presently occupy in the Confederation Building from him. I got one of the big ones when he went on to a bigger one. You called that one. You probably called that one as badly as you are calling this bill, but that is another story. I just wanted to let you know, Mr. Speaker, that he and I have been in the same place but not at the same time. I inherited his office.

I want to take this licence just in passing, friend to friend, as one who sits where he sat at one time. I heard him talk about Imperial Oil and his less than happy relationship towards the end, and I think it was something like the worst fourteen years of his life. I heard him toward the end of his speech when he got into the business of symbolism which Petro-Canada has, the maple leaf and that kind of stuff. I do not think that was the real brunt of what he was saying. I think what he was saying was that if they had had a skull and cross-bones or the flag from Timbuctoo as their symbol, his emotion would have been the same. I do not think it was the maple leaf that set him off but his basic compulsive hatred for the administration that was led by the Right Hon. Mr. Trudeau. I want to say again friend to friend, I understand. We all have less than happy experiences either with administrations, with companies or other entities. He ought not to be consumed by this terrible passion called hatred. It is kind of debilitating. It is like revenge in a way. It destroys only the aggressor only, the person doing the hating or trying to affect the revenge.

I would hope he would not give us too many more dissertations along those particular lines. We are only yet on the amendment. I am sure he will want to address himself to the main motion, once we have dealt with the amendment.

Maybe at that time, he will be more forthcoming not in so far as his immediate passion, his hatred is concerned—I found this interesting but not terribly uplifting—but that he would spend some time telling us why it is that if privatization is the best thing since sliced bread, he did not spend a little time putting some butter on it, why he did not spend a little time telling us why he supports privatization?

His hatred of PetroCan I can understand. I do not agree with it, but I can understand it given his circumstances.

Let us go on to two or three things that I would like to say about the bill in the few minutes that I have. My friend and colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River has spelled out extremely well our position on this bill, as did my colleague from York Centre.

I know this debate will be touching on various aspects of our concern and our position here. What I like to do with almost any issue is put a Newfoundland perspective on an aspect of it. Members will be aware that the Hibernia agreement, which was recently signed, has an oil consortium made up of four partners as part of the agreement. Of course, one of those partners is Petro-Can.

PetroCan has a 25 per cent share in the consortium, which is now in the process of beginning the commercial development of the Hibernia oil field located a couple hundred miles southeast of St. John's, Newfoundland.

The lead partner is Mobil, which has a larger percentage than any of the others. It has a 28 per cent share. Then, of course, we have Chevron and Gulf with shares, with Chevron having about 21 per cent, and Gulf about 25 per cent. But that is not the point of my comment.

I want to draw attention to the very point that the hon. member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold alluded to a minute ago, the fact that Hibernia has the involvement of PetroCan. He also mentioned the fact that the Beaufort Sea has the active involvement of PetroCan.

Those who would criticize PetroCan as the instrument of public policy that it was intended to be—I submit that it has been very successfully—in that context need to go no further than the two examples that the hon. member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold has given the House in the past few minutes.

Let us consider these points. Beaufort Sea, frontier exploration. Hibernia, offshore Newfoundland, frontier exploration, and now development. Surely there alone you have an adequate argument for an instrument of public policy in the hands of the federal government.

I understand that when the right hon. member for Yellowhead, now the Secretary of State for External Affairs, came briefly to office in May 1979, he had intended to privatize at that particular time. I understand equally that when the right hon. gentleman from Baie Comeau, the current Prime Minister, came to office in 1984, he has together with his immediate Tory predecessor, the gentleman from Yellowhead, in tandem, one after the other, dismantled PetroCan as a public policy instrument.

• (1540)

Therefore in the argument implicit in the question, do we need PetroCan has to be followed with another question, which PetroCan? The watered-down PetroCan of today or the PetroCan that was embodied in legislation initially and allowed to pursue its mandate until 1979, and to some extent until 1984. Mr. Speaker, you really have to answer the question generically first, do we need a public policy instrument in the oil industry area?

The answer in the 1970s was yes and I believe the answer clearly is yes today. Many of the same conditions apply right now in 1990 as applied in the seventies when this Crown corporation called PetroCan was first envisaged, first put into legislation and first put into place.

One has to look no further than the current goings on in the Middle East, the tragic Persian Gulf situation and the economic domino effect it is having on prices right here in Canada. You heard my friend and colleague from Halifax today during Question Period cite the increasing gas prices in Halifax. We could mirror these figures for her in all of Atlantic Canada, certainly in my own riding of Burin—St. George's and I am sure in the riding of my good friend from St. John's East and in many other ridings. Indeed, it is only a matter of time before we will be able to mirror it in every riding in Canada. That is part of the terrible domino effect that the Persian Gulf situation is having and will have on the whole world and we are not immune to it.

The whole Persian Gulf issue and the oil aspects of it is a subject in itself and as much as I would like to digress on that point, I think in the interest of getting on with the job and some relevancy, for which I am known, as my friend from St. John's East will concur—

Mr. Reid: Emphasis on the word "some".

Mr. Simmons: Emphasis on the word "some", as he says. In the interests of all the above, Mr. Speaker, I think I should reluctantly bring myself back to this fascinating subject called Petro-Canada.

My friend from Laval-Est is now demonstrating one more time the brilliance of that person who came up with the idea—I think the French actually have a term for it. They call it esprit d'escalier or in good old fashion American-Canadian-Newfinese, "Monday morning quarterbacking". Is it not always the case that after you have sat down, having given what you absolutely believe is the most brilliant speech of your life, you think of even more brilliant things to say?

I say to him, if he wants to shout some witticisms across the floor to me, let him go ahead. He probably notices it just fuels my engine. I enjoy it. But if he wants them to be heard particularly by his constituents, he would be well advised to wait until we get through with this amendment and then, when we get back on the main motion, he will have a further opportunity to get up and speak in this debate.

I appeal to him that during that period, not to indulge in hate mongering because that is not his strong suit. He does terribly at it. He went on at length with it but he does terribly at it. I ask him not to engage in either hate mongering or in vested interests. The floor of this chamber is not a place to peddle your vested interest, I say to the gentleman from Laval-Est.

With those qualifications, I will sit here in rapt attention and hear every word he has to say and maybe agree with some of them, though I do not make that as as firm commitment.

There are the detractors of this marvellous instrument called Petro-Canada. I say to my friend, the hon. member for St. John's East, about this marvellous instrument called PetroCan, his constituents believe that. But they also believe we should bring in a variable entry requirement as well, and either he does not seem to want to agree with them on that, or he has adopted a very convenient silence on the matter. That is another issue, Mr. Speaker, how I digress. Let me get back to this.

Some of the detractors of this particular marvellous Crown corporation would say and do say that a Crown energy corporation cannot possibly finance its debt as well as if it were a private corporation. That is the argument, that somehow, if we derobed it or rid it of its Crown corporation trappings, it would suddenly become a super, energetic animal that would go out and take on the banks and the financial giants out there and debt would not be a problem, and so on and so forth.

Let us look at three energy corporations in the country, all owned by the Crown, either provincially or federally, but, as we say, all owned by the Crown. I just happen to have the figures here in front of me.

There is an outfit called Hydro-Québec, an organization that has done brilliantly well. It is a well run organization. I have had the opportunity to visit its headquarters in years past. I do not know a lot about its operation, but there is one important detail I do know about its operation—and my friend, the hon. member for St. John's East, would know this too because he and I read a lot of the same books. We come to different conclusions but we read the same books. He will know that one of the important details which relate to Hydro-Quebec is that it is raping Newfoundland, day after day, after day, because of that terrible Churchill Falls agreement. We in Newfoundland and Labrador have more than a passing acquaintance with Hydro-Quebec.

Let me get back to the point I was making. Hydro-Quebec's current debt is $28 billion. Its assets, in round figures, amount to $34 billion. In terms of the debt-to-equity ratio, that is a fairly frightful situation if one had a company in that kind of situation.

Mr. Hockin: Asset-to-debt.

Mr. Simmons: I understand, yes, the word was wrong, asset-to-debt. I thank the minister. That is why he is the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, because he knows so much about those things. I am just a poor carpenter's son from rural Newfoundland, still trying to get my tongue around all those terms. But you get the drift of what I am saying. That 28 is somewhat like 34. Proportionately, it is almost one-to-one.

Mr. Duhamel: Six difference.

Mr. Simmons: My friend, the hon. member for St. Boniface, gets the message that 28—You are motioning that is time already, Mr. Speaker. When you are having fun, it goes very quickly.

With Hydro-Quebec, the asset-to-debt ratio is $34 billion in assets and $28 billion in debt. Ontario Hydro has $36 billion in assets, compared to $27 billion in debt. In both cases, in rough terms, that is an almost one-to-one relationship. And for PetroCan, this much reviled, do-nothing organization that should be run out of town as quickly as possible and that we should rid our hands of just as fast as possible and right away, before it does us any more damage, just listen to the terrible ratio it has between assets and debt. Not one-to-one like Hydro-Québec, not even one-to-one like Ontario Hydro. No. Here are the figures. The total assets of PetroCan today area about $6.8 billion or $7 billion in round figures and its debt is $1.9 billion, or let us say, $2 billion. Its asset-to-debt is roughly $7 billion in assets and less than $2 billion in debts. Its ratio is about three to one, or better than that, about three-and-a-half to one.

• (1550)

If members are going to stand in the House and mislead—and I am sure it is inadvertent— they will have to realize that at some point we will get some facts into this debate, whether it takes just today or several other days. If they want to tamper with one of the most marvellous public policy instruments we have had in the country, they will have to face up to some facts. One of the facts staring them right in the face is that when the government says a Crown corporation cannot finance its debt, it is lying. It may not be doing it deliberately, it may be doing it unwittingly. But it is surely lying when it gets on with that particular nonsense.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: I am sure the minister feels a speech coming on, and in time we will hear from him. I have no doubt that he will be able to inform the House much more than I am on this subject. Remember, I am just the carpenter's son that stumbled in here to give you a few comments—

Mr. Reid: Looking for a place to spend the night?

Mr. Simmons: Looking for a place to spend the day, at least, yes. I just happened to stumble in and thought I would unload my opinion of what the government is doing while I was passing through, my humble opinion of what it is doing to a very good public policy instrument. What it is doing, I do not like, and that is why I am agin it. If I had more time I would tell you, Mr. Speaker, the other several reasons I have in front of me as to why it is

I cannot support the government's present effort to privatize PetroCan. What it is doing is wrong. The people of Canada are not being well served by this move.

I see my time is up, but maybe I will have another crack at it later on.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to be able to respond to my friend from Burin—St. George's.

First, I would like to assure my friend that I have nothing but the utmost respect for Petro-Canada, for the job it did in its early days of formation and particularly, if I may say, for the job it has done in the last ten years as it operated more and more as an oil company, free from the fetters and control of government which has hindered its job as a Canadian oil company. It has been so successful in developing in a variety of frontiers in the country. It has made a substantial contribution through Petro-Canada International and other organizations. I would agree with him on that.

If I may, I would also tell him I agree absolutely on the variable entrance requirement. But there is so much more to Bill C-21 that is essential for his constituents and mine that we must move ahead with that. The hypocrisy in not recognizing that Bill C-21 does so much more is not acceptable. No one wants the variable entrance requirement more than I.

I would like to refer the hon. member to the question he raised concerning the debt-to-asset ratio, and I make no pretence to understand it. It is important that all members in the House recognize that, as Petro-Canada plays a more substantial role in the development of the offshore, particularly off the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, it must continue not only not to have the political constraints put on it but the financial constraints as well. If Petro-Canada, with its ownership in Terra Nova, which is approaching something like 45 per cent, is to participate in the development of that project, surely my hon. friend will agree, and I would like to hear his comment on this.

Mr. Simmons: On the last point, again?

Mr. Reid: The last point being that, if we want Terra Nova to be developed with the assistance of Petro-Canada, which today, as I understand, controls about 45 per cent, it is not realistic within the constraints of the fiscal pressures of this government, or any other government, with the burden of its debt and the responsibility that its debt places on the Government of Canada and its books. It is not realistic that we constrain Petro-Canada from a new infusion of equity and a new ability to get debt. Debt is only part of the point, and the equity that can be raised through becoming a private corporation, or a publicly traded corporation, is to the benefit of his constituents and mine, as we move to develop Terra Nova and then so many other projects in which I hope Petro-Canada plays a substantial and, indeed, a lead role.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the last question could be dealt with most quickly. I do not know my friend's expertise in this area, but he will know mine and it is limited. If he is having difficulty with the question of how PetroCan can tap the markets, he ought to talk to Hydro-Québec which does it very successfully on a regular basis.

The member for St. John's East seems to be labouring under the illusion that somehow government is a disease. Government is not a disease. Government can do some pretty unhealthy things, but this notion that everything associated with government is, by definition, abhorrent, I just do not buy that idea.

Mr. Reid: Neither do I, absolutely.

Mr. Simmons: I am glad for that clarification, because the impression that he gave at the top of his intervention was that somehow, the main problem with PetroCan is that it was owned by the federal government. I find that of itself not a particular problem.

I would like to address the variable entrance requirement.

Mr. Reid: Order, relevancy.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, it was the member from St. John's East who raised the question with me about the VER. We can deal with this very quickly. I know he is afraid I might answer, but I am going to answer anyway.

If he is completely candid with the House, he knows very well that, while the VER is an aspect of Bill C-21, for the past 40 years the issue has been dealt with quite separately from any new bill about unemployment insurance.

We have passed it every year. We have passed it under Mr. Trudeau, and we have passed it under the hon. member from Yellowhead. Under the present Prime Minister, we have passed it five years in a row. In the sixth year, that member got up and voted against it twice. Sorry, my time is up.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, now it is my turn. The hon. member told me I would have my chance. I now have my chance, if he would listen. I have a chance to ask a question.

I know my hon. colleague now has the office I used to have. I did not move because for a bigger one. It is because the location is different and I prefer it here. But I do miss my old office and he is spoiled to have such a nice office. I will visit him soon.

I heard my hon. colleague speaking on Petro–Canada. Of course, he knows I do not like Petro–Canada. It is not because I do not like the leaf. I am a good Canadian. I am of Italian origin. We are all Canadians. We are proud of the country. It is strong when it is together.

The idea I do not like is the unfair competition it gives to a private enterprise. I speak as a private enterpriser. It is very hard to compete as a private enterprise when the government comes with the big bucks and the big people.

Petro–Canada had 10 people to inspect a service station. In private enterprise, we have one person and he cannot stay there for more than an hour. This allows him to make 10 stations a day. When it is public money, it is easier to spend a few days. Sometimes they might sleep over near the station and try to get a free dinner on the company.

Private enterprise cannot run with the idea that PetroCan used to have. If my hon. friend understands this, then why should the government sell gasoline or toothbrushes, or even airplanes? Why does it not keep the money to administer the services that all Canadians need. That was the argument we had in Quebec and across the country with the national association. We have nothing against being a Canadian. We are very proud. But when the government said it was a police force for the industry, I did not see anything good for Canadians. I did not see a single deal.

It was giving out hamburgers when people bought gasoline. Why did it give hamburgers to the customers? Why did it not give a one–cent discount like I used to give to my customers. That is what I did not like. Some smart guy, an administrator in Calgary, decided that to sell gasoline one has to give McDonald's hamburgers to the consumer. Why? They do not need that. They need gasoline at the bare price. This is what I did not like. This you do not see in private enterprise. Why do you not go to the small businessmen who need your help?

• (1600)

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Laval Est. He makes a very good point. The initial point he made had to do with unfair competition.

I will say to the hon. member in all candour, I do not know the details. I made light of it earlier, just in fun. I am sure he understood it within that context. I made light of his relationship with respect to PetroCan, but I do not know the details of it and I do not want to make light of it. That is not the issue.

I have not said that PetroCan is a perfect agency. What I have said, first of all, is, let us not throw the baby out with the bath water. If there are some things we want to correct about this, if it is doing some things it ought not to be doing, if it is engaged in unfair competition, let that be the target of our legislation here in the House. But let us not get rid of a good entity just because probably, according to the member's allegation, it has done some things which are less than desirable, or less than perfect. I do not know if that is the case, but I take the hon. member at his word if that is what happened.

I gather from the vibes we are getting from this issue that the member's experience on this issue has been less than pleasant. I will not do anything to make it any less pleasant.

Mr. Della Noce: Esso did not help.

Mr. Simmons: Esso did not help, and I understand you to say that.

To his second point very quickly, Mr. Speaker. He talks about PetroCan, the gas stations and the hamburgers and that kind of issue. He asked who came up with it. I suppose the glib answer is, I guess the same fellow or woman who comes up with marketing gimmicks, balloons or coloured brochures, or whatever during election campaigns for Tory parties and other parties.

People get carried away with marketing gimmicks. Sometimes the hamburgers or the balloons given out have nothing to do with the purpose of the organization at all. I am sure that happens with oil companies every bit as it does with political parties.

But, Mr. Speaker, the substantive point I would say to him is this: PetroCan is a vertically integrated company. It has come to depend, rightly or wrongly, on its downstream, on its gas station cash flows to finance its upstream, some of its exploration activity.

Now, if he is raising the question, should they be doing that, that is a whole new question. It is quite possible for this legislature, this House, to say that we want to keep PetroCan as a public policy instrument, but we do not want interfering at the retail level. We can cut them off at the knees in terms of the downstream activity. That is an option for us. But the option again is not to throw out the whole thing.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a couple of questions with my colleague. Perhaps because of limited time, he can concentrate on the last one.

I have been led to understand that there were a number of objectives to the initial conception of Petro-Canada which we have not discussed a great deal. For example, the exploration of additional reserves. In a paper I just read today, it says that if we continue present consumption rates that we have roughly 13 years of reserve only.

I have also been told that the study of alternative sources of energy was another important objective. We all realize that much of that, if not all of it, has been dismantled. That concerns me, particularly in terms of what is happening in the world today. Perhaps this is the most important point.

I have also been informed that the increase of Canadianization was an important goal of this particular institution and I have been told that there has been some significant success in certain areas of Canada that have benefited from this. I believe one of those areas has been the Atlantic provinces. I wonder if my colleague might respond to that. He might also want, because he was cut off rather shortly, to expand upon the variable entrance requirement and the maternity-paternity benefits in Bill C-21, that we are willing to bring in as a separate bill, as has been done in previous years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Burin—St. George's. Very briefly, please.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, first of all let me thank you for your tolerance. I shall be very brief. I thank my friend from St. Boniface for his questions. To do justice, I wish I had time to deal with these questions that they need. Let me cover them very quickly.

The short answer to his second last question, of course, is that we are in a considerably worse off position in 1990 than we were in 1984 in terms of Canadian ownership.

That is one of the direct results, as members will realize and as Canada realizes. One of the important side effects of the process of disarming and taking away from PetroCan's mandate as the Prime Minister has so shamefully done is that the instrument, which was doing very well in terms of helping us to get extra Canadian ownership of the industry, was cut off in mid stream.

In 1984, it was stopped from pursuing that objective, and the fallout is in front of us. We now have an industry that is more foreign owned now than it was. The figure has escaped me, but it is dramatic.

Today, we have far less Canadian ownership than we did in 1984. The hon. member for St. Boniface is equally correct when he talks about the VER, the so-called variable entrance requirement. It is true that in June 1990 and in December 1989 the hon. member for Laval-Est, the hon. member for St. John's East and everybody else on that side of the House got up and voted against the same amendment that their colleagues had voted for for five years: in December 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988.

It was the same amendment that had been brought into this House for 14 years in a row. Then, in the 14th year, they voted against it. What is this? Is this some kind of revenge on the people out there in rural Canada? What kind of nonsense is this?

Today, we are prepared with 10 minutes. Mr. Speaker, give us 10 minutes. Give us four minutes. Give us a guitar and we will sing it to you. Give us two minutes, and we will put through that variable entrance requirement so fast you will not know what happened to this place. We will put an end to the misery of tens of thousands of people in my riding in Newfoundland, in all of Atlantic Canada and across this country who are out there suffering needlessly because we have a stubborn government that says: "My way or no way."

My friend says that this is a stupid government. No, Mr. Speaker, I have to disagree. It is not stupid. It is too conniving to be stupid. No one has ever said it is stupid, but it is uncaring. The net result is that thousands upon tens of thousands of people are suffering. These are people to whom we can come to the aid of with this bill. We could bring in a bill on maternity benefits, if that is what they want.

What we want is to vote for a bill that removes the government involvement to the tune of $2.7 billion in the unemployment insurance plan, because that would wipe out UI for the fishermen completely in the short term. I am not going to stand by and have that happen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Before I recognize the hon. member, it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Comox—Alberni, the Budget; the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, Labour; the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap, Agriculture.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in listening to the hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

It is always nice to know that there are other common people in this House. I guess that is not improper since this is the House of Commons.

The hon. member is a carpenter's son who found his way here. I am a poor rancher's boy who found his way into the Chilcotin plateau. I, too, am struggling to understand the complexities of this major bill for us.

Earlier, the Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) laid out in clear and simple language the reason for this government proposal. Today, I would like to discuss how this proposed transaction fits into the broader approach to privatization which has been followed by the government since 1984.

When the current government was elected in 1984, one of its first priorities was to restructure the country's economic framework to enable Canadians to become more competitive to meet the challenging of the emerging global marketplace.

In the past six years, this government has pursued an economic policy based on less government involvement in the private sector, a more disciplined use of the taxpayers' resources. Privatization, I am glad to say, is a key component of that policy. As many of you know, in the last half of the last decade governments of every political persuasion started to critically examine the old solutions to see if they had utility in a modern world of global competition. Not only did they find that the old practices of central planning and excessive intervention by governments were ineffective, they were counter-productive. They impaired the nation's ability to compete.

In the struggle to transform the economies of many of the democracies of eastern Europe in particular, governments there are embracing the notion of privatization in different ways and in varying degrees. While Canada is providing assistance to several of these countries in implementing their privatization programs, we cannot forget that we still have a lot of work to do in our own backyard.

At last count the Canadian government owned 53 Crown corporations and 113 subsidiary Crown corporations and had partial holdings in a number of other firms. This is after having successfully privatized 13 Crown corporations and Crown holdings in five mixed ownership corporations. Some of these include Canadair, an aircraft manufacturer; Teleglobe Canada, our overseas telecommunications carrier; and of course Air Canada, Canada's largest airline which was sold through two public share offerings to over 100,000 shareholders.

The success of Canada's approach to privatization is due largely to the fact that it reflects, and attempts to reflect the country's unique demographic, economic, political, and historical considerations. Consider for a moment the disparity between our geography and our population. Canada is the largest country in the western hemisphere. Compared to the U.S. with only 3.6 million square miles, Canada has 3.8. On the other hand we have a population of only 26 million, a tenth of that of the United States.

This disparity between our geography and our population has encouraged a reliance on government ownership as a way of supplying vital national services such as rail and air transport. Some of the customers of these services express concern that a change in ownership will mean a reduction in service or safety, or increased prices. Therefore, in developing its privatization plans the government gives special consideration to the concerns of these customers. Where necessary, regulations are introduced to ensure that health and safety standards are maintained.

Another factor explaining Canada's approach to privatization is the role of foreign ownership in our economy. Canada's economic development gave rise to the industrial base dominated by branch plants. Most of Canada's manufacturing and petroleum product sectors are still dominated by subsidiaries of companies headquartered outside of Canada.

As a result, Canadians have welcomed the financial benefits of foreign investment while remaining a bit nervous about the consequences of foreign influence on our economy. Because of this, the government's privatization program looks at the foreign ownership question on a case-by-case basis to determine whether non-resident restrictions are indeed required.

Canada's privatization program is also influenced by our Constitution, in particular its division of powers between federal and provincial governments. Canada's Constitution gives the provinces control over the regulation of the securities industry. The provincial securities commissions each impose constraints on what can be done to promote a public share offering. In these instances where a public share offering is used as a method of sale, this regulatory environment must be taken into account.

One final factor which contributes to the uniqueness of our privatization policy is the character and condition of Canadians themselves. Canadians are highly educated, participate actively in a free enterprise economy, and enjoy a high standard of living compared to other countries. Most Canadians own their own houses. Many of them own shares as well.

Canada did not have to promote "popular capitalism" as part of its privatization program because it was already a reality in the Canadian culture.

In fact more than four million Canadians or 23 per cent of the Canadian adult population own shares in a publicly traded company or in as stock mutual fund. This represents an increase of about one million share owners since 1986, when 18 per cent of Canadian adults participated in the stock market.

All these uniquely Canadian circumstances—a small population in a large land mass, the predominance of branch plants, our Constitution with its complex division of powers between the provincial and federal governments, and the nature of our domestic capital markets—had to be taken into account when the government first got itself into the business of owning commercial interests. They must be taken into account now as we get out of some of them.

The minister has assured us that the government's privatization program is based on a pragmatic, common sense, case by case approach. The time is taken to examine very carefully the circumstances associated with each company in order to determine the best method and timing of the sale.

It may be useful to look back on some of the major privatizations which have taken place since 1984 to show the pragmatic and intelligent approach that has been taken. In my opinion three transactions stand out: the sale of Canadair to Bombardier, the sale of Teleglobe to Memotec Data, and the privatization of Air Canada. I would like to take each one in turn.

First is the sale of Canadair. Canadians know that the sale of Canadair to Bombardier has been a tremendous success story. They know that Canadair was going nowhere under state ownership. It was a company with excellent technology but poor marketing and poor management skills. Those are exactly the ingredients which Bombardier brought to the enterprise. There is simply no question that the privatization of Canadair has given the company a bright and exciting future.

Second is Teleglobe. The Teleglobe case in an excellent example. You do not have to own a company to control it. In this case the price of overseas telephone calls can easily be controlled through regulation if that is desired. What was accomplished by relying on regulation, not ownership, was the creation of a dynamic new force in the Canadian telecommunications sector, Memotec Data. Once again it was a win win situation.

Third is Air Canada. Crown ownership of Air Canada may have been necessary in earlier days to achieve the public policy objective of creating a national air system, but we all know that circumstances have radically changed in air transportation since those early days. Now we have two major airlines in Canada with myriad commuter lines servicing smaller centres. We now have a national air system with many participants. In short, public ownership of Air Canada was no longer essential to ensure a national air service.

Furthermore, Air Canada required a large infusion of capital to finance fleet modernization. We therefore had the choice of raising that money through higher taxes or higher deficit, or raising money through public share offerings. Since Crown ownership was no longer necessary, we chose to offer shares to the public which were well received by Air Canada employees and the general public alike.

These transactions are not the product of ideology. In my view, they represent the triumph of common sense over the impassioned rhetoric of the proponents of state ownership. They have set the stage for the government's latest privatization initiative: the sale of Petro-Canada.

As the minister stated earlier, Crown ownership is no longer necessary to achieve the principal public policy objective in the energy sector to establish the conditions in which economic development of our energy reserves can occur.

What is necessary for Petro-Canada to participate aggressively in the development of our oil and gas reserves is access to a new and reliable source of equity. Once again, we are left with a choice in the House of finding that money by taxing Canadians, by borrowing even more money on their behalf, or by inviting Canadians to take a direct stake in the company to share the challenge which lies ahead.

The decision by the government to allow Petro-Canada to raise equity directly from individual investors is not a product of ideology. It involves a lot of common sense.

• (1620)

Ideology, though, is at the root of much of the opposition that we are hearing. Many members opposite will oppose this legislation based on the belief that state ownership is an end in itself, that it is better to have a weak state owned company than a strong company owned by individual Canadians. Surely it is this glorification of state ownership for its own sake, regardless of its consequences, which is inconsistent with Canadian traditions.

This legislation is good for Petro-Canada. It is good for hard-pressed Canadian taxpayers and those Canadians who, like myself, are concerned about the debt burden we are leaving for the next generation. It is good for Canada since it will allow Petro-Canada to get on with the job of securing our energy future. That is why I support its passage.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments my colleague made and I want to make a few comments as well as ask a few questions. First of all, I am not one of those who are mainly concerned with ideology. I believe common sense must be used, regardless of one's political allegiance. My colleague mentioned cases of firms and businesses where privatization was beneficial in his opinion.

[English]

While I appreciate the examples that he has given, I want to just question a few.

He did not mention, for example, the sale of Route Canada where he will recall that some 1,900 Canadians from across Canada have suffered significantly. Some of them have not received their termination pay, severance pay, or holiday pay. I think it is unfortunate that the minister responsible for that particular portfolio has not seen fit to order an inquiry to see whether or not we could help those suffering men and women across this nation, people who have waited for a long time to be responded to appropriately.

The minister mentioned Air Canada, but he did not mention of course the 2,900 jobs that have just been cut. I guess I am concerned as well about the privatization of Petro-Canada. Is there a possibility here that a significant number of jobs will indeed be cut in the near future?

I am not one who argues that jobs should be kept at any price. Obviously that is not possible. But, clearly, have we thought about that ahead of time so that if it is going to happen the men and women of this country who are affected can continue to live their lives with dignity and respond to their needs and the needs of their families?

Just one final point perhaps and a question. Is it the member's opinion that consumers of gas and oil products today are being gouged? If so, is it by the private sector? If yes, who in the private sector is doing it to them? Certainly the men and women who are calling me really are feeling as if they are being taken advantage of.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. I do not think anybody in this House or in this country enjoys the spectre of lay-offs, especially large lay-offs like we have seen occurring.

The fact that as an airline company, or as any company, it is in a position to respond as quickly as it has to to market conditions is an indication of why the company should be under private ownership, if it is at all possible. It is exactly the reality that if it can respond quickly to be more efficient, to continue in productivity, and to continue to take advantage of the realistic business opportunities that are there, it will be able to secure a better future for itself and all its existing employees and, in the future, will be able to hire more.

I think it is recognized by most that falsely supporting an inefficient company just to maintain jobs is the worst direction to take in employment-type policy.

I would share the concern of the hon. member. I thank him for his question. However, I believe he is actually supporting the argument that where possible companies should be in the private enterprise so that they can stay efficient, stay strong, and continue to provide the jobs we so badly need.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I heard the comments of the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin. I am sure that he spoke very sincerely of what he believed in. It probably will not surprise him if I say that I do not agree with any of his conclusions. However, surely he will agree with me that this is a very important issue. This is a bill for the Government of Canada to divest itself of the largest corporation that the Canadian government has ever sold off. The assets of the corporation are close to $7 billion.

Given that that is the case and that this is the partial divestiture of the largest Crown corporation that this country has ever owned, what does my colleague across the way think of time allocation or closure, if you wish, to have been put on this bill after only a few short hours of debate?

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member opposite for his question.

I share the hon. member's interest in a full and open debate on this bill because it is a very large undertaking and a very serious bill. It requires the most careful of consideration. I also know that the minister responsible for this bill also wants to see it fully debated.

The characteristics of this bill that are going to require the most careful exploration can more properly be done in committee. We are going to have to ensure that all the factors necessary in privatizing a Canadian company have been followed, and that we have properly assessed the need for Canadian ownership balanced against the need to get the greatest return for Canada from the shares.

We have to foresee possible problems that could occur and make sure that they have been adequately looked at. There is a whole myriad of very complex issues that can more properly take place in the committee room than they can on the floor of the House. I share the hon. member's interest in having full debate on the bill. I also would like to achieve that.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have just a short question for my colleague. I know he is very interested in the point, and I know he knows the answer.

The hon. member who spoke before him was comparing Petro-Canada to Hydro Quebec. The problem I have with this argument is that Hydro Quebec is selling electricity in one big machine. It is in a position of monopolizing. It can sell its electricity at any price. Quebecers cannot buy their electricity somewhere else; they have no choice. Petro-Canada, on the other hand, is in competitive position.

I want to ask my colleague: Why don't we put more money to help the situation like Hydro Quebec does? I look forward to his answer.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated when I started, I am not an accountant or a person who necessarily understands the full complexity of financial statements. I do not believe that you have to understand the complexity of it to understand this: The difference between a monopoly and a company that is trying to compete in the open marketplace is like night and day.

We have to add to that the terrible debt that Canadian taxpayers are now faced with and have struggled with since the Conservative government took over. It has to be the highest priority in our minds, as legislators. It has been by this government and it will continue to be. To ask Petro–Canada to take on that debt is asking the taxpayers of Canada to increase their debt load. I will not do that and I am sure my friend would not.

• (1630)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words on the bill which proposes the privatization of Petro–Canada. We on this side of the House have indicated our opposition to this privatization. We think that at this critical time in the history of our country, with the problems facing the Canadian economy and the uncertainty of oil supplies because of the events in the Middle East, this certainly is not the time to be privatizing Petro–Canada.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin, who indicated that he was opposed to the government using closure or time allocation. I hope that, if the government ever moves it again, and I am sure that after his words, the government will not move to try to close down debate on such a massive, important issue as the privatization of Petro–Canada, he will vote against any move by the House leader on the government side to move in that direction.

This is a very important bill; it is a very important issue. Petroleum products are to the economy of a country what red blood is to the health of a human being. Because of the uncertainty back in 1973 and the first oil shocks of that year and again in 1980, the government of the day moved to establish a national petroleum corporation.

I had the opportunity of working on the committee which studied the bill to set up this corporation. At the time I do not believe we thought that the corporation would be as large as it is today. We saw it more as an instrument for exploration and development. It has moved on, through successive governments, to expand into the retail trade.

I was surprised, when the present government came to office in 1984, that one of the first things it did was to spend almost $1 billion to buy the downstream assets of Gulf Canada. Surely after all of the uncertainty of the Clark regime in 1979 as to whether it would privatize, partly privatize or not privatize Petro–Canada, it was amazing to me that the government bought up the Gulf Canada gas stations in eastern Canada. At the same time, I believe it provided assistance to the Reichmann organization to buy the upstream resources of Gulf Canada by giving them a tax credit. So, in fact, through that marvellous device known as the Little Egypt bump, the Reichmanns were able to acquire those assets with a great deal of the cost being borne by the taxpayers of Canada.

So given the Tory philosophy and position, it is really amazing that they spent $1 billion dollars, buying up a bunch of gas stations when they could have been committing that $1 billion to exploration and development. Nobody has quite ever explained exactly why they did that.

Now we hear them talking about selling off 15 per cent of the Petro–Canada assets in order to provide $500 million worth of funds that are really needed, according to Wilbert Hopper, President and Chief Executive Officer of Petro–Canada for oil and gas exploration and development. It seems to me that if they are needed now, the Tories might have been better to have saved those dollars back in 1984 and 1985 when they spent almost $1 billion. If it had not spent the money in that way, by giving a tax advantage to the Reichmann organization to purchase the upstream resources of Gulf Canada, it probably would have had all of the operating capital that was required at that time.

Clearly this proposal will not work if the government's plan is to sell off 15 per cent of the shares. No investor I know wants to buy into an organization that is as volatile as the oil industry. All you have to do is look at the lay-offs announced today by Imperial Oil of from 3,000 to 4,000 employees to know just how volatile that industry is. I do not know that many investors want to invest in a Crown corporation of which 15 per cent will be sold. It makes for a very unhappy wedding, if there is one.

The investors are concerned that the government would use the Crown corporation for its own purpose as an instrument of public policy. It is not very workable to do that because the shareholders are supposed to be protected, but they are still with an 85 per cent interest.

Naturally the privatized corporation is going to be very interested in the views and the position of the minister of industry or the Minister of Finance, whoever holds the shares for the federal government. I do not think that kind of arrangement is ever going to be very happy for investors and probably not very happy for the government. It has been tried in other jurisdictions and usually has been a dismal failure, as it was in the case of B.C. when it tried its B.C. resources privatization scheme.

If ever there was bad timing for the sale of Petro-Canada, it surely must be now. The price of oil has gone from $16 or $17 a barrel to over $40 a barrel today. Shares of Petro-Canada, if they were on the market, clearly would be up because their resources in the ground would likewise be up. But the need for security of supply must be weighing heavily on the mind of the minister of energy these days.

Our reserves in the western sedimentary basin have been reduced almost annually. We are committed under the free trade agreement with the United States, regardless of what the oil shocks are—if war broke out in the Middle East today, as it could—to maintain our level of supply to the U.S. With those resources dwindling day after day, how is it possible for a government to sell off PetroCan, which can be a massive instrument of public policy? You only have to look at the percentage of the reserves and a market of something around 20 per cent, which if sold, is gone forever. We have already made a commitment under the FTA that it will be a total market situation. The instruments that the government has left for enunciating or having an energy policy are all being given away. This is a very important instrument we have now and it will be given away if this bill passes.

The government has said that it wants to privatize this company so that it will gain more capital from the marketplace for exploration and development. I have already asked, why did the government buy a bunch of gas stations if it wanted more money. Why did it spend $1 billion only four years ago to buy a bunch of gas stations if it was really short of capital for exploration and development? But the Canadian capital markets are only so large.

We are having difficulty finding capital resources for the manufacturing industry, the mining industry, for transportation, for all kinds of needs in areas like mine in northern Ontario. Yet it is proposed to privatize this and suck up those scarce financial resources from the Canadian marketplace into Petro-Canada.

Likewise, if Petro-Canada is privatized and these resources go into Petro-Canada, where will these other sectors of the industry, which are not as profitable at some stages, go? Clearly the mining industry is in a terrible state because the government has removed the flow-through shares and the MEDA incentive program.

Only a few weeks ago a number of members of our caucus had meetings in Kirkland Lake and we heard how that whole exploration and development for the mining industry has been destroyed in the last year because of the flow-through shares and the incentive programs are not there. They cannot get resources. If Petro-Canada moves into the marketplace to scrounge up even more resources, that industry and other industries, manufacturing and processing will be even that much more strapped.

The alternative under this bill is that 25 per cent can be sold off to foreign investors. Already we are seeing a dramatic reduction in the Canadian control of the oil industry. If we look at the downstream resources between 1985 and 1989, Canadian control has dropped from 42.7 per cent to 36.1 per cent.

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, in just four years with the Tory government in power, we have seen a 6 per cent—more than that actually, 6.5 per cent—decline in Canadian control of downstream energy resources. It is happening in many other areas because what the government is saying is that it does not matter who controls. The oil companies with their headquarters in Houston or Chicago or wherever will be just as interested in Canadians as they will be in Americans.

Well, one does not have to be very wise to know that that is simply not the case. When the American administration in Washington, whether it is the Congress or the Senate, or the President, put the twist on the arm of corporate America, it responds. There is no question about it. If we look at the review of upstream resources between 1986 and 1989, a period of only three years, Canadian control has slipped from 49 per cent to 39 per cent, a drop of 10 per cent. If this bill goes through and there are not Canadian funds available to invest in those shares, naturally they will look to the United States for those resources.

One of the reasons that we wanted to establish Petro-Canada back in the seventies was to provide a window on the industry. We know it is controlled by five, six, or seven big oil companies operating internationally. We know that most of those, with the exception of Shell, are headquartered in the United States. We wanted to have, not only to have an instrument of public policy, but a window on that industry to have some influence on it and to know if there is a rip-off taking place.

People in my constituency complain about the high price of oil. Petro-Canada is a window and has been a window on the industry, not only at home, but abroad. Mr. Hopper is the President of the Canadian Petroleum Association. How much closer can you get to the industry than to have that position in Calgary?

Under this proposal, I predict that the national petroleum corporation, Petro-Canada, will cease to be a window on an industry where we know that in 10 or 20 years the level of resources are simply not going to be there. We have seen the level of reserves in the western sedimentary basin dropping all the time. That window could be lost.

In connection with that, in international affairs, we lose. We have Petro-Canada International which has been a valuable instrument for assisting Third World countries to develop their petroleum resources. Surely we, as a nation, have a responsibility through CIDA, international development agencies, the NGOs, and so on, to assist in international development. Petro-Canada has been a valuable instrument in that regard. Surely, Third World development is helping them to develop their resources. We did it, along with other countries, in India and other countries to develop their green revolution back in the sixties to see them able to grow their new varieties of dwarf wheat so that they could become self-sufficient or at least able to feed themselves.

Surely, petroleum is the life-blood of any economy. Assisting Third World countries to develop their mineral and energy resources is a valuable aspect. That will be lost under this proposal, the ability of Petro-Canada to be a window on the petroleum industry, not only in the nation, but abroad, and also to be an important international instrument for the development of Third World energy.

Petro-Canada has been the instrument of public policy development for projects such as Hibernia. I believe that the exact percentage of the development of Hibernia is 25 per cent owned by Petro-Canada. Surely, to throw that over into the private sector will not ensure the development of Hibernia. What about the others: Terra Nova, 44 per cent owned by Petro-Canada; OSLO, 15 per cent owned by Petro-Canada; Syncrude, 17 per cent owned by Petro-Canada; and the Wolf Lake project, 50 per cent owned by Petro-Canada. Those are projects that governments have difficulty in knowing exactly how to approach those and what percentage to be involved.

How can we be sure that, if Petro-Canada is privatized, these important projects which the government is committed to will go ahead? How will its share in OSLO or whatever simply be sold off? Ultimately, if privatization takes place, investors will not be satisfied with 15 per cent. Investors simply will want 100 per cent private sector to be sure that it is not an instrument of public policy. The ability of government to invest soundly and wisely in these projects will be lost and the responsibility for doing it will be lost.

The government has got a lot to answer for in proposing this at a time when oil prices on the world scene have risen from $16 or $18 a barrel during the past year to over $42 a barrel now. Can we be sure that the government knows what it is doing by privatizing this? Can we be sure that consumers are not going to be ripped off at the gas pump?

The government really should review this whole scheme again. The advantages are not very great. The disadvantages are very extensive. We can look at the 2,900 lay-offs at Air Canada today. Of course, it has been privatized. In Petro-Canada, we see 6,400 employees. Has the government got some secret agenda to do the same to the employees of Petro-Canada that it has done to Air Canada already today?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. Questions and comments.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to what the hon. member said, and I am not sure he understands what he did say. I want some clarification.

He talked about rising oil prices, and he alluded to the fact that Petro-Canada somehow controlled prices of energy, whether it be gas or oil, that it is primarily involved in and that because of these rising prices, we should hang onto Petro-Canada to control these prices. That is the impression he left with the House.

He is quite a veteran of the House. He has been around here a long time. As a matter of fact, I think he might have been here when Petro-Canada was born. He is that long in the tooth, at least 15 years.

When has Petro-Canada has ever controlled the price of energy in the country. Was it ever initially mandated to control prices of energy in the country? If so, can he point to me where that mandate was? Can he point to me when at any time did it control the price of energy in the country?

The point is that the privatization of Petro-Canada has absolutely nothing to do with the rising energy prices that we see in the world today. It is the situation in the Middle East that has forced the speculative price of oil to increase. It has nothing to do with Petro-Canada, the privatization, or, I might say, its mandate when it was first envisaged by the cartel of Liberals and New Democrats back in the early seventies.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, of course, the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs speaks of cartels. The cartel, if there is one, is the cartel of the five or six big oil companies working in collusion to try to push up the prices of oil in the country.

When we established PetroCan back in the 1970s, we established it to extend and expand Canada's energy reserves and resources. The hon. member knows that what is important is that we have a window on the industry. What the government is proposing is that we sell this off and that we make sure that the government has no instruments for public policy with regard to energy.

The government has defanged the National Energy Board so it has no power to control exports. We have pushed up exports of natural gas and oil so that that whole area of national policy has been given away in the FTA. He knows that.

Mr. McDermid: That is nonsense. I do not know that at all.

Mr. Foster: He should know.

Mr. McDermid: It's all nonsense.

Mr. Foster: He knows that that is the truth and he does not like to hear it because it really upsets him.

Mr. McDermid: It is not factually correct.

Mr. Foster: That is exactly what the minister did and now he wants to get rid of the one instrument for a public policy in energy. The minister has proven that the government talks about getting more privatization, but this policy just gives them all away.

The government is talking about privatizing 15 per cent of this so that it can generate $500 million worth of exploration funds. If the government really wanted to have $500 million or $1 billion worth of funds for exploration to do this, why did it buy some $900 million worth of gas stations in 1984? If it was really interested in exploration and development, which was the primary role of Petro-Canada as originally envisaged, it did not need to spend $800 million or $900 million. It was not this minister because he was not there at the time, but it was this government that said: "We do not want to spend the money on exploration and development. We want to buy up Gulf's oil and gas stations in eastern Canada." So that is what it did.

Now, Petro-Canada is strapped for money because it spent it all on gas stations which really does not increase its reserves very much. I really do not understand why, if a government was being prudent with the taxpayers' money, it would go and buy up a whole bunch of gas stations, when it could have been using it for exploration and development—and not just using it today. It could have been using it and rolling it over each year.

I really think that the Minister of State for Privatization does not know what he is talking about. This bill is really a bad bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments. The hon. member for St. Boniface.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague spoke about the element of Canadian control and Canadianization. He had the figures in front of him. Could he just expand upon them somewhat and perhaps give an example or two of other areas that have slipped and have less Canadian control than they had?

I do not know if he has time to answer, but he may wish to comment on this. I have been receiving a lot of calls from constituents who feel that they are being taken advantage of in the current situation with respect to increased prices of gas.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might be able to answer that privately.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed in today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

[English]

CHARLOTTETOWN CONFERENCE

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the city of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island should be designated as the "Birthplace of Canada" to mark the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the 1864 Charlottetown Conference of the Fathers of Confederation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of satisfaction and pride to move and begin debate on this motion.

I am very happy to have had my motion chosen in the draw at this time. I feel that most Canadians do not understand the order in which motions and Private Members' bills appear for debate because it is chosen by lottery, better known as the luck of the draw. Of course, I am going to need much more than luck to see this motion through to completion.

As the member of Parliament for Hillsborough, I have worked since June 1989 to achieve this designation and, of course, there have been many, many Islanders who have worked much longer than this to see Charlottetown given the recognition it deserves.

In 1989 the 125th anniversary of the Charlottetown Conference was celebrated. In 1864 at the conference, delegates from Canada and the Maritimes agreed in principle to form one union, the Dominion of Canada. At this time in Charlottetown a feeling of excitement and endless possibility was born. Delegates representing several provinces decided to form one nation. They realized that in unity, there is strength. Today, in 1990, Canadians hope to recapture that sense of unity and optimism.

It is possible to recapture the atmosphere of the 1864 conference if you walk around Charlottetown. Charlottetown is a community which was already 100 years old when the conference took place. You can begin this by walking up Great George Street from the harbour, the route followed by the Fathers of Confederation, the route they took after they disembarked from their steamer, Queen Victoria. Trees shade the area, and as you walk through the trees, Province House comes into view. Province House is where the conference took place, and it is where today the legislative proceedings of the province take place.

Province House is a great source of pride to Prince Edward Islanders. It was built as the colonial house between 1843 and 1846, with the official opening in January 1847. It has served as the seat of government from that time onward. It is a beautiful but aging building, and the aging of the building led to an agreement between the federal and provincial governments in 1974 to restore many of the rooms in Province House to the 1800s. This job was completed in 1986.

The room that most people want to see as they visit this building is the red chamber, the chamber in which the Fathers of Confederation met.

The National Capital Commission has worked with the province of Prince Edward Island in recognition of the role that the provincial capitals play in the evolution of the country. The commission has created direct linkages with Charlottetown in recognition of its valued role as the historic and symbolic capital in the creation of Confederation.

Through a cultural exchange program, Charlottetown and Prince Edward Island were made more visible in Canada's capital; and the national capital is now more familiar to the residents of Prince Edward Island. Their efforts help to highlight the potential educational importance of debating this motion.

Canadians need unifying symbols. We need to be reminded of our great past so that we can think of the future with hope. I am afraid that if we do not make an active effort to affirm our identity as Canadians, to affirm the reasons why this country was created in the first place, we could lose it by default. That would be a tragedy, with such greatness behind us and so much to look forward to.

Canadians desire to renew the bonds that hold us together, to regain a sense of nationhood, as is evidenced by the huge numbers of people who come here to Parliament Hill. They come here not only to watch their democracy in action, but to see a building which symbolizes the nation. The Parliament Buildings and this Chamber, in particular, command our respect and our pride. And I do not think anyone leaves this Hill untouched.

Dignified and treasured as these buildings are, they are only part of the story of Canada. I think that Canadians should experience the same sense of history in Charlottetown as they do here in Ottawa. While any Islander knows the story of the Dominion's birth, and is happy to tell it to visitors, we would appreciate the support and the resources of the Government of Canada in letting all Canadians know about it and experience it.

Canadians learn in school that Charlottetown was the location of the conference where Confederation was born. What they might not realize is that Charlottetown's streets and buildings bring these history lessons to life. Many homes and buildings that date from that era still exist and have been fully restored to give Canadians a true sense of the times. One mansion, at which some of the delegates stayed while in Charlottetown, has been declared a national landmark. Government House, the home of Prince Edward Island's Lieutenant Governor, has been preserved beautifully. And the home of William Pope, one of Prince Edward Island's Fathers of Confederation, is now designated as a national park. Also, some modern landmarks commemorate this important moment in Canadian history and add to Charlottetown's appeal, such as the Confederation Centre of the Arts, the living monument to Canada's founding fathers.

All of this was accomplished through the dedication of many Islanders and many other people over a period of many years, such as the Charlottetown Area Development Corporation, through the Charlottetown Area Beautification Project, city council, members of the Legislative Assembly and the Heritage Foundation of Canada, as well as the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada. The people of Charlottetown are conscious of their historic surroundings and they have worked very hard to maintain the physical aspects, and as a result, the spirit of the Charlottetown conference.

Mr. Speaker, I could stand here all day and list the individuals whose contributions to this effort have made it worth while. But, one person who stands out in my mind is a person by the name of Eddy Rice. Over the past year, I have sought the input and the advice of many people regarding this type of motion and their help was invaluable to me. But Eddie Rice, who has worked to preserve and promote Charlottetown's special place in history, was one of the first people to discuss this idea with me, so I especially appreciate his role. I think he summed it up best when he said: "We are guardians of our own heritage".

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that, due to a drafting oversight, my motion now reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the city of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island should be designated as the "Birthplace of Canada" to mark the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the 1864 Charlottetown Conference of the Fathers of Confederation.

Later in the debate, my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Cardigan, will rise and move an amendment to this motion. The amendment will change the words "Birthplace of Canada" to "Birthplace of Confederation".

Mr. Speaker, on September 27 of this year, during Routine Proceedings, I moved for leave to introduce Bill C-330, An Act to Commemorate the Birthplace of Confederation. This was agreed to, the bill was read the first time and ordered to be printed.

This bill would promote the unifying symbols in the history of Canada in a time when the country seems divided. The bill shall, by means of plaques or other signs or in any other suitable manner mark the sites and buildings where was held, prior to 1867, the Charlottetown Conference, during which delegates from the Maritimes and from Canada agreed to explore the possibility of one union.

It is my hope that all members of this House will support both my motion and my bill. Prince Edward Islanders have worked for the official designation of their capital city, not only out of a desire to preserve and enhance its unique historic role but also to strengthen the local and the provincial economy which, I am sure, all hon. members know is in great need of strengthening. Prince Edward Island's economy is based, to a great extent, on tourism.

• (1710)

According to the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, in 1989 over 740,000 people visited P.E.I. That is a large number of people for a province with a population of about 130,000. P.E.I.'s tourism sector must continue to grow so that its economy will be strengthened. Tourism is a very competitive sector, and we know we can compete. To do so, we need the help of the Government of Canada.

The official designation of Charlottetown would be of great help in this competitive market appealing not only to Canadian visitors, but to international ones as well. With increased tourism comes increased activity in all areas of the economy. P.E.I.'s existing tourism base presents Canada with a wonderful opportunity to showcase a very special event in our history.

Canada was created in a way which would be known around the world as the Canadian way of doing things. Delegates gathered in an atmosphere of hospitality and optimism. Meetings were held and vital business was conducted. Also, festivities took place. Festive dinners and parties were enjoyed by all. This has become a famous image of the conference. In September 1864, Charlottetown was the place to be, and the following quote from a letter by Charlottetown conference delegate, George Brown, to his wife, Anne, will help to give a visual view of the hospitality and optimism.

"Amid most beautiful scenery, we came suddenly on the capital city of the island. Our steamer dropped anchor magnificently in the stream, and its man-of-war cut evidently inspired the natives with huge respect for their big brothers from Canada. I flatter myself we did that well. Having dressed ourselves in the correct style—we pulled away for shore and landed like Mr. Christopher Columbus."

In fact, the S.S. Queen Victoria had caused some alarm that morning when it entered Hillsborough Bay because it had been mistaken for a Yankee commerce raider. With this auspicious beginning, the Charlottetown Conference was under way, and the discussions of the delegates at that conference shaped the lives of Canadians for the past 126 years. That is why I stand here today asking for the support of this House.

The conference was originally planned as a discussion of a possible federation of the maritime provinces, but when the Canadian delegation arrived, it turned into a discussion of a much larger scheme, the federation of British North America. The delegates heard speeches by John A. Macdonald, George Cartier, Thomas D'Arcy McGee, George Brown and many others. The debate was lively. Before the delegates left the Island in 1864, the government and the citizens of Charlottetown threw a gala ball at Province House where they danced, dined and made fine speeches until the wee hours of the morning. The ball was recreated in 1989 on the 125th anniversary during a memorable party in the streets surrounding Province House.

If there was ever a time when Canadians needed living symbols of their history and an understanding that nation building is not over, it is now. I urge the people in this Chamber to support this motion. It would be a simple gesture, but an important one for Prince Edward Islanders and for all Canadians.

I would like to conclude with a quote from one of Prince Edward Island's delegates to the convention, and Father of Confederation, Thomas Heath Haviland. He said: "Never was there such an important meeting as this held before in the history of British America; and it may yet be said that here, in little Prince Edward Island, was that union formed which has produced one of the greatest nations on the face of God's earth."

I urge all members to support this motion.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to speak to this motion of the hon. member for Hillsborough.

Most of us recognize the importance of the Charlottetown Conference. In our grade school history class we learned about the great deeds done by people like John Hamilton Gray, George Coles, and others. When Canadians like Sir John A. Macdonald and George Etienne Cartier landed at Peakes Wharf in Charlottetown, little did they know how important their actions were. Indeed many people could learn today from the example of Canada's founding fathers.

The Charlottetown Conference was originally intended to be a discussion on the form of Maritime Union but then the Canadians arrived and they never looked back. Dr. Francis Bolger, an authority on the Charlottetown Conference, said:

> The Charlottetown Conference was indeed a success. The 23 delegates reached an agreement on the desirability of Confederation and on the general outline of a future constitution. Perhaps more importantly, they dedicated themselves to the establishment of a new nation. Subsequent conferences in Quebec City and London, England, formalized, refined and systematized the constitutional principles agreed upon in Charlottetown, and in 1867 the Dominion of Canada was formed.

Despite the great importance that we place on the Charlottetown Conference there is no official recognition of Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation. What the motion does is encourage the House to designate, in law, that Charlottetown is indeed the birthplace of Confederation.

The city of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, is a beautiful city with a remarkable sense of history. There are plaques in front of Province House, the sight of the conference, commemorating those Islanders that participated in the Charlottetown Conference of 1864. The plaques list the many achievements of the men who helped found this great nation. The time has come for the federal government to recognize formally that Charlottetown is the birthplace of Confederation.

The federal government could play a special role in helping develop historical sights in and around the city related to the events of 1864. Using the resources of Environment Canada and the Department of Communications, much can be done in and around Charlottetown to help preserve, restore, and revive many of the places associated with the conference. Sights like Government House and Pope House have been restored to their original condition, allowing for a vivid recollection of the history. Much has been done recently around Peakes Wharf where the delegates to the conference landed, restoring old shops and the like. Such restorations have added much to the life of Charlottetown and attract many visitors.

Recognition of the historical role in Canadian history played by Charlottetown would help strengthen the local economy. Prince Edward Island relies more heavily on tourism as a supplier of money and employment than any other province. With careful promotion of Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation many more Canadians who have yet to enjoy the history and spirit of Prince Edward Island will come to visit the Island.

It must be remembered that a move to commemorate the Charlottetown Conference will not only affect the city itself, but it will have a lasting impact on the tourism industry on the whole Island.

As the 125th anniversary of Confederation approaches in 1992 Canadians should become more aware of the history surrounding the great event. It has been said that Canada was a "noble experiment", and nothing could be more true today. As we look around and see the tensions that have built up, we find a Canada in need of unifying symbols. Recognition of Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation would be such a symbol, and I encourage all members to support the motion of the hon. member for Hillsborough.

Before I end my remarks I would like to move an amendment to the motion to correct a minor error. Therefore I move:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the city of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island should be designated as the "Birthplace of Confederation" to mark the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the 1864 Charlottetown Conference of the Fathers of Confederation.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): After taking counsel, the Chair has come to the conclusion that the amendment is relevant.

On debate. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship).

[English]

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, let me congratulate you on your position in the chair here today. This is the first time I have had an opportunity to speak in the House when you have been in the chair, so I congratulate you on your appointment.

I am honoured to participate in this debate in the House of Commons today and to support the sentiments of my colleague from Hillsborough and thank him for putting forth his motion.

The motion before us today asks that we recognize the importance of a meeting that occurred in Charlottetown almost 126 years ago. The Charlottetown Conference in 1864 was indeed a pivotal event in the history of Canada. It saw the leaders of the emerging Dominion of Canada come together to propose the founding of a new country. That initial meeting led to Confederation and eventually to Canada as we know it—Canada from sea to sea and from the 49th parallel to the far-flung reaches of the Arctic.

Those leaders, the Fathers of Confederation, had a vision. It was a revolutionary vision, one of disparate colonies uniting to form a strong young nation with a great future. Above all, it was a vision of a new way of doing things.

Here were the representatives of two peoples from two homelands, England and France. They saw the opportunity to reach out to one another, to unite for mutual benefit, and to live together in peace and mutual respect. At Charlottetown, in 1864, the idea of a country of people who would stand together while embracing their differences was born.

Over the decades Canadians have enlarged and enriched this vision. In our way we are giving new meaning to that concept of partnership of all regions and citizens of this country.

There is no doubt that the Charlottetown Conference was a key step in our evolution as a nation. I want to agree with the hon. member for Hillsborough and also the hon. member for Cardigan who has moved am appropriate and accurate amendment to the motion to call Charlottetown the birthplace of Confederation rather than the birthplace of Canada. With the amendment to the motion I want to say that I endorse this motion whole-heartedly.

I was doing some research on who were some of the renowned persons born in Charlottetown. One of the Fathers of Confederation, George Coles, was born in Charlottetown. The son of one of the Fathers of Confederation, Sir Joseph Pope, was born in Charlottetown. The present Lieutenant-Governor, Marion Reid, was born in Charlottetown. Our friend, journalist Mike Duffy, has Charlottetown as his birthplace. The former environment minister in the previous Parliament, the hon. Tom McMillan, was born in Charlottetown. It is as well as the birthplace of the great story Anne of Green Gables.

Confederation is the heart and the soul of Canada. It was by no means an easy road that our forefathers had to take. It was the road of compromise, of accommodation, of seeking the middle ground. Those were the principles upon which this country was built. Those are the principles which still guide us and which we must still honour.

This is the fair, the decent, the Canadian way. This is the legacy that was born in Charlottetown in 1864.

When our forebears came together for the Charlottetown Conference and at a subsequent conference in Quebec City, they had to grapple with some very difficult issues. In those days there were only a few provinces that were involved in those discussions. There were delegates from the three maritime provinces, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and there were representatives from Upper and Lower Canada which encompassed what is now Ontario and Quebec.

It was a much smaller geographical entity than Canada is today. Nevertheless, the Fathers of Confederation under the leadership of Sir John A. Macdonald faced the task of bringing together small sparsely populated communities scattered over immense distances. These communities also were divided by different economic interests and by different cultural, linguistic, legal and educational traditions.

How could they form a union while still satisfying local and regional interests? How could they accommodate the aspirations of both French and English speaking peoples in one political entity?

To remain separate colonies was to risk being swallowed up by our neighbour in the south. To merge completely and to try to submerge our differences would have meant losing the diversity already of great significance in those early days.

There was only one acceptable answer: a federation, a union that gave us a strong central government and Parliament and an ample measure of self-government and autonomy for each of the federating provinces.

How did our ancestors work out the details of that alliance? It was by sitting down together, debating, negotiating, and compromising.

Let us remember that the British North America Act, our Confederation document, guaranteed certain language and education rights and Quebec's system of civil law. Subsequent generations would have to improve on these arrangements.

Confederation was not a one-time event. Indeed it is an ongoing, evolutionary process. The partnerships that Canadians formed with one another in the early days of our history had to be renegotiated, renewed, and refined over the years.

Canadian historian, Senator Eugene Forsey, put it this way in an article that he wrote in 1962:

> The Fathers wrought well, and laid our foundations deep and strong. But the building is still unfinished and parts of it have suffered some damage through the years. It does not need a bombing squad or a wrecking crew. But it does need alterations, repairs, additions, the expansion of certain rooms; and all of us must be made to feel at home in it.

Since 1867 we have seen many constitutional milestones. Each round of constitutional talks had its heartwrenching moments as Canadians confronted their differences and sought common ground in the complex maze of competing interests and priorities.

• (1730)

Yet the unifying vision prevailed. We Canadians maintained our faith in the process that our ancestors set in motion.

From those first dreams of our ancestors of a daring new national experiment, Canada has grown to become an ever more mature, fair, and caring society. Nations around the world admire us for our principles and traditions.

We are known as peace-loving, tolerant, generous. We were not born with these characteristics—we honed them through the process of learning to live together, of standing up for one another through the long haul.

In 1864, in Charlottetown, our ancestors conceived of the idea of Canada—one nation created out of a collection of colonies.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is vital to celebrate the Charlottetown Conference of 1864, to acknowledge the role it played in the birth of Confederation. Looking back on those times helps us gain a better understanding of the constitutional processes that will continue for many years to come.

It is up to all Canadians to continue the work of reaching out to one another, of building a new climate of understanding that can be fulfilled by the faith and goodwill of every citizen of this country.

As we stand on the threshold of the 21st century, we continue to strive for a strong and prosperous Canada for all citizens, mindful of the first discussions and decisions made in Charlottetown, at the birthplace of our Confederation.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join this debate and congratulate the member of Parliament for Hillsborough who has tabled this bill for our discussion today.

I guess I should state at the outset my vested interest in seeing that this particular matter is proceeded with. It goes back many years to my grandfather, who was born in Charlottetown, and of course my dad, who was born in that great province as well. So I state at the outset my vested interest, but I do want to compliment the member of Parliament for Hillsborough as well as his colleague for Cardigan who has put forward an amendment which I am supporting, and I know other members on this side of the House, as well as on the government side, have now indicated their support.

I would like to pay tribute particularly to the parliamentary secretary who has just spoken. I found her words both eloquent and timely, and very fitting. I am happy to see that a government representative has taken the time to participate in this very worth-while debate, in assuring that this particular measure can proceed and proceed with despatch.

The Charlottetown Conference, like many events in history, was the result of precedents and accidents, the outcome of which few could have foreseen. While the conference was held ostensibly to debate the possibilities of a maritime union, a greater purpose soon unfolded.

Two-thirds of the Canadian cabinet had boarded the Canadian government steamer Queen Victoria in late August and sailed from Quebec to Charlottetown. They carried with them far-reaching proposals for Confederation.

I would like to quote a passage which an author wrote with regard to the voyage to Charlottetown:

> From Gaspé our course was direct to Charlottetown, the little capital of little Prince Edward Island. I was up at four in the morning!—Thursday morning (September 1)—to see the sun rise and have a salt water bath. We had just reached the westerly point of Prince Edward and were running along the coast of as pretty a country as you ever put your eye upon—About noon we came to an inlet which we entered, and running up for some miles what appeared to be a river but was in fact but an inlet of the sea (Hillsborough Bay), amid most beautiful scenery, we came suddenly on the Capital City of the Island.

That describes clearly the voyage which took place from the Gaspé to Charlottetown. Twenty-three statesmen and three secretaries sat down at a massive mahogany table in the legislative council chamber in the graceful Georgian Province House.

John A. Macdonald and Cartier began by setting out the general arguments in favour of Confederation with a broad outline of the Canadian proposal. They sought to show that such a union of the provinces was indeed possible. Confederation promised something that Maritime union could not, a trans-continental country. Their purpose, shaped by a faith and the power of hope over adversity.

The Charlottetown Conference thus laid the foundation upon which Confederation was built. It was in Charlottetown that the grand plans of the statesmen who were to become known as the Fathers of Confederation were first given practical shape. Perhaps the most remarkable achievement of the whole conference was the conversion of a significant proportion of the Maritime delegates to the cause of Confederation. For the sake of Confederation not a few would put at stake their political careers and in some cases even their personal reputations.

The Charlottetown Conference gave the delegates a sense of common destiny and a devotion to a cause greater than their local loyalties.

It is, therefore, Mr. Speaker, fitting that this city, this great little city, which saw the high hopes and quiet labours of our political forbears develop into a great community of peoples be recognized as the "Birthplace of Confederation".

The challenges the Fathers of Confederation faced over a century ago are challenges that we in this Chamber and across this great land continue to confront. Nonetheless, we can draw from their example and from their example. The imagination, the determination, and, yes, the courage that distinguished their great effort 125 years ago is needed anew.

Surely the hope of our country lies, just as it did in Charlottetown in 1864, in the acceptance of our differences and, Mr. Speaker, as you will well know, our distinctiveness; and in the recognition of our common problems and our common purpose.

That is what Macdonald, Cartier, John Gray of Prince Edward Island, Tilley from New Brunswick, and, yes, a fellow Nova Scotian by the name of Tupper and other distinguished statesmen had in mind in Charlottetown in 1864, when beneath the old gas lamps in the Provincial Building they committed themselves to a new political arrangement of the British North American colonies.

Today the country these men dreamed of has matured into one of the great and to some extent untapped bountiful countries of the world. It is a country of talent and opportunity, a country civilized in its human relations, a country rich in culture and literature.

Canada is not just a few acres of snow, but a country of immensely varied beauty of landscape and season, of people from a hundred worldly professions who now call Canada their home, of valued diversity and of rights and privileges envied throughout the world.

• (1740)

Apart from honouring Charlottetown as the "Cradle of Confederation", we ought, perhaps as a Chamber and as humble representatives, honour the efforts of our 19th century nation builders by demonstrating, as so ably put by the parliamentary secretary, that we have a vision of how Canada can grow and evolve in response to the different and difficult times ahead.

Considerations of the new agenda remain unfinished. It is up to all of us to propose solutions and to chart the new course. To be involved in that effort is to be involved with the same spirit that fired the imagination and efforts of the Fathers of Confederation at Charlottetown almost 125 years ago.

With great humility, it is my pleasure to participate in this debate and join with my colleagues, the four members of Parliament from Charlottetown, in supporting them and the government in their quest to have Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation of this great nation.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased to be able to speak today on this motion put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough, and amended by my colleague the hon. member for Cardigan, on designating Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation.

First I want to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Hillsborough in taking the initiative in introducing this motion before the House. I feel that it is very appropriate that we are discussing the designation of Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation here on the floor of the House of Commons, for it is here that we plan for the future of our country. It is only fitting that it is here that we recognize where our country was planned.

In identifying Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation, it is both a recognition and an acceptance of the importance of our historical heritage. We have listened to colleagues this afternoon speak of the events of the Charlottetown Conference of 1864 and how those events have helped shape the future of the country. I congratulate each one of them for their comments.

There are numerous reasons why the official designation of Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation would be beneficial. Today in the time allotted to me I would like to deal with three of these reasons.

First, and most important, Canada needs to officially identify historical events. This identification will help all of us develop our national pride.

Second, at a time when our country has become somewhat divided, it is imperative that we concentrate and celebrate those events which bind us together as a nation.

Third, not only will this designation of Charlottetown contribute to the well-being of our country, but there is no doubt it will contribute to the well-being of my province of Prince Edward Island.

I believe that we can continue to learn a great deal from those early Fathers of Confederation who met for ten days in Charlottetown 126 years ago and found compromise among their differences.

It was the Charlottetown Conference that really set Confederation in motion. Maritime union had long been talked about in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island. In fact, in March of 1864, all three legislatures passed resolutions to have a conference to discuss it. Nothing happened until after the June, 1864 and the constitutional crisis of the province of Canada, when the Canadians asked to attend the conference to propose a union of all British North America.

The request at first rather staggered the Maritime governments, but then the place and date of the meeting were selected: Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, September 1 to 9, 1864. It might be of interest to members of the House to know that at the time of the conference, Charlottetown was the eleventh largest city in British North America.

At the conference, Maritime union was virtually dropped and the delegates agreed on the outline of a scheme for a more general union. It was the Charlottetown Conference which produced the momentum which was so obvious at the Quebec conference in October and so necessary to carry Confederation.

Prince Edward Islanders have learned a great deal from their heritage and affiliation with the Fathers of Confederation. All Canadians should be able to commemorate the birthplace of Confederation and understand the events, the players, and the location of the activities to comprehend fully our national heritage.

As Canadians, we have long sought after some pre-packaged identity, often disregarding the facts of our own history which contribute to our true make-up and, therefore, our identity. This past year of our nation's history has been one of conflict within our confederation. It is now more important than ever that we look to our past for strength and, in some cases, direction for the future.

We need to feel patriotic about our great country and Charlottetown has a moral obligation to help. It has the stage.

At times, we often look toward the United States, not for guidance but because of the simple fact that it seems to be able to produce patriotism on command. It has been pointed out that at different times within the year, Washington is packed with school children from all over the United States. They also travel to Philadelphia and come from everywhere in the United States. Canadian school children could travel to Charlottetown, to learn and to see where, what, and how Canada was conceived. In doing so, they would have a better grasp of our country's beginnings and a better grasp of their national heritage and identity.

As an Islander, I am proud of the beauty and historical importance of our provincial capital, Charlottetown. It is truly an exceptional city. The older part of the city includes our provincial legislature, known as Province House, where the meetings were held in 1864. It also includes stately mansions, refurbished shops, and commercial buildings dating from the last century which line the streets. It is possible to walk and see exactly where the Fathers of Confederation spent their time.

Charlottetown has received national recognition before. In 1964, people in Canada showed enough faith in their history that they built the Confederation Centre for the Arts in Charlottetown as a memorial to the founding of Canada. This concrete and glass complex comprises a theatre, a splendid gallery, and the provincial archives. Each year, as part of the much acclaimed Charlottetown Festival, the flexible 1,000 seat theatre holds a revival of the musical based on the island novel, Anne of Green Gables.

There is no question that the designation of Charlottetown will help improve our provincial economy. It is distinctive among Canadian cities as being the birthplace of Confederation and that represents an important tourism resource whose development has the potential for bringing benefits to the entire province.

I realize that you are telling me, Mr. Speaker, that my time is up. I just want to close by once again commending the hon. member for Hillsborough in his initiative on this issue. I am proud and honoured to have the opportunity to address and support the designation of Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today in debate on my colleague's motion. I am an islander as well, but I am not from Prince Edward Island. I am from another island called Cape Breton Island. Those islands in the east have had great historical significance in the development of the northern part of North America.

As anybody who has visited Prince Edward Island knows—and it is not that far from Cape Breton Island—the people there are among the finest in this great nation. That little town of Charlottetown is something unique. There is a special ambience that is there. I am not quite sure how one would properly describe it.

When one looks at the island itself, the island of Prince Edward Island, it truly is like a rolling pillow of lush green in the summertime, with the surf that pounds in on its miles of sandy coastline being like a braid that defines it. The capital city of Charlottetown is like an emerald on the coastline.

It is little wonder that when men and women of vision over 125 years ago pulled into that harbour that something took over their spirit. My colleague from Cape Breton—East Richmond read a passage which I think was very appropriate. They stopped talking about what could not be done and started to dream the impossible. At that time, the impossible was a nation called Canada.

For some reason, Charlottetown has perhaps hallowed soil. Maybe it has always had a destiny. I do not know. Some people believe in that. For some strange reason, the political divisions and the difficulty of geography we still face today—think of it. This was 126 years ago.

Today, we talk about how vast the country is. Today, we talk about the problems between our regions. Today, we talk about the problems between our languages. This was 126 years ago. There were no airplanes, no telephones, and no cars. There were boats, horses, and wagons. There were great distances. For some reason, Charlottetown pulled all those positive energies together and let those men and women dream the impossible, put aside their differences, and forge the great nation that is Canada.

I have had many opportunities to go to Charlottetown and Prince Edward Island and I go back as often as I can. These are times of great trouble in our land with the great divisions politically, economically, and linguistically across the country. Once we get this motion through and the designation comes for Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation, maybe for every future constitutional conference, when everybody does their agenda, they want to do their horse-trading, and they want to make sure that their needs are at the top of the agenda, maybe we should make it compulsory that our leaders from across Canada take a little trip to Charlottetown. They should walk the streets, go into the buildings where those meetings took place, and think about the history that was created. Men and women 126 years ago put their differences aside and stopped talking about what could not be done and started to talk about what could be done.

Maybe, just maybe, they should do the same thing and go to L'Anse-au-Meadow in Newfoundland where the first people landed. Then maybe they should go to the Citadel in Quebec so that when they all get together that infectious spirit, that special something, that little bit of magic that Charlottetown has caused for all Canadians, will be a little infectious.

I am very proud that my colleague, the member for Hillsborough, has had the foresight to put this motion together, and I am so pleased to see the support on both sides of the House. Maybe once again Charlottetown is weaving its magic, because I cannot recall the day, at least recently, when we have had members from all sides of the House getting up and speaking from the heart, and speaking eloquently and positively about a motion that is on the floor and before the Chair of the House of Commons.

I cannot think of any time since I was elected when we have had an hour in which people sat down and put their differences aside, and with the very eloquent remarks of the hon. parliamentary secretary. It gives me reason to feel kind of good.

Maybe, Mr. Speaker, just maybe, that special ambience, that special something that the hon. member for Hillsborough is trying to recognize in this motion, has once again touched this place.

The history of Canada is a history we should all be proud of. But it is a history that many times we forget. It is a history perhaps that we learn in grade school, but it is not one that we carry with us.

There has been mention of the importance of having symbols of national unity and that is important. It is important to remember the positive reasons why we are a nation and why we are together. I cannot think of a more fitting symbol, more pleasant symbol, or a more appropriate symbol of national unity than the city of Charlottetown, that city nestled on the harbour on the east coast of Canada that drew all that energy and drew all those people together.

It would do well for each and every one of us in the House tonight, after we vote in a positive way to proceed with this motion as quickly as we can, to make a commitment that maybe, just maybe, the next time we get a break—and goodness knows, that might be sooner than later—that maybe what we should do is go down to that beautiful city of Charlottetown, the birthplace of Confederation, and have a little walk around. Then maybe the next time we come back and meet in the House, we will get on, not to dismantling and damaging this nation as we are all a little guilty of in some of our partisan comments, but to furthering the cause and building this great nation, Canada.

It gives me a great deal of pleasure to support the motion that is before the Chair today.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity at this time of adjournment to discuss a question which I put in the House on February 23 last in which I asked the Secretary of State about the cuts that took place to native programs in the Secretary of State department. The House will remember that in the budget this year, the Secretary of State made substantial cuts to native representative organizations. In fact, they were cut in many cases by 100 per cent. Cuts were made to native communications programs and, in many cases as well, those native communications programs and native newspapers received cuts of up to 100 per cent, and the same thing happened in native broadcasting.

As usual, the minister gave an unsatisfactory answer to my question. He simply indicated that everybody had to take cuts during a time of budget cutting in order to curb the deficit. But, in this case, he made substantial cuts for a group of people in this country who have not been fairly treated by the Government of Canada and by the people of Canada, and yet seem to be bearing or are being forced by this government to bear the deepest cuts in their programs and, as a result, substantial damage and difficulty was created for the native people of this country. For example, as Mr. Speaker will know, native newspapers have been forced to shut down. One of the most recent shutdowns was at the Micmac News, a newspaper in Atlantic Canada that communicates both between Micmac people and Canadians as a whole. You will know, Mr. Speaker, that that newspaper was the one that was responsible for pressing the case of Donald Marshall, Jr., who was unjustly imprisoned in Nova Scotia for 10 or 11 years for a crime which he did not commit. It was the Micmac News that pressed that case and made the Micmac people and the people of Canada aware of that case and, as a result, a royal commission was struck in Nova Scotia. It found that the justice system in Nova Scotia was in error, an appeal took place and Donald Marshall was, of course, released from jail.

I think what is even worse is that the cuts to the native programs in the Secretary of State department created some serious difficulties in the relationship between native people in Canada and the Government of Canada and non-natives in Canada. Poor relations during this last summer broke into virtual open civil disobedience and conflict with the people of Canada at Kanesatake and at Kahnawake in the province of Quebec. I think, as a result of those conflicts, the federal government ended up spending tens of millions of dollars, some people have suggested over $100 million, to deal with that conflict through the armed forces and the police forces of Canada and Quebec.

It does not make sense for this government to be constantly attacking native programs and to be constantly cutting native programs even though native people are not the people who are responsible for the huge deficit that this government has sustained. As a result of cutting a few million dollars out of the Secretary of State programs for native people, we ended up destroying good relations between the native people of Canada and the Government of Canada and the non-native people of Canada. As a result, we spent tens of millions of dollars and perhaps over $100 million to send the military into places like Kahnawake and Kanesatake. It simply does not make sense.

It is not good sense from the point of view of economics; it is not good sense from the point of view of cutting the deficit; and it is certainly not good sense from the point of view of maintaining good relations between the native people of Canada, the Government of Canada and non-natives in this country. It is extremely unfortunate that the Secretary of State does not realize that and that the Secretary of State earlier than this did not take steps to restore those programs, native broadcasting, native newspapers and funding for the aboriginal representative organizations that assist in communications between native people and non-native people in this country so that we can have a productive relationship.

• (1805)

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the question by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni that he asked the minister on February 23, 1990, quite some time ago.

I would like to state a few of the facts, and I am pleased we have an opportunity to give some of the facts today to show that native groups and women's groups, which are part of the question asked in February, are not being neglected by the government.

In regard to native groups first. There is a budget of over $30 million dedicated to the enhancement of languages and communications, and a transitional fund of $1 million to assist native communications societies in becoming more financially self-sufficient. The decrease in the funding, which the hon. member refers to, does not indicate in any way a lack of commitment on the part of the government.

I would like to remind him that in the budget of 1990, the over-all government funding for native peoples has been increased rather dramatically, a $77 million increase for social services, a $59 million increase for education, and a $35 million increase for health services. I would hope that the hon. member for Comox—Alberni, who has done some significant work with native groups, would be assured that these priorities of health, education and social services are priorities which I am sure he would endorse as the priorities of spending money.

With regard to women's groups, the Secretary of State reaffirmed that they would receive transitional funding for 1990–91. We are working with women's groups on an ongoing basis across the country to ensure that the resources will be available beyond 1990–91.

When budget cuts are made, it is because of the serious deficit problem we all know about. I want to assure the member that this government continues to be committed to aboriginal peoples and to women's groups.

LABOUR

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening with regard to a matter that I have been raising consistently on the floor of the House of Commons since 1985.

More recently, I had put a question to the Minister of Labour concerning the Program for Older Workers Adjustment. It just so happens that there are a good number of these individuals in my constituency of Cape Breton—East Richmond who have been attempting since 1985 to become part and parcel of the Program for Older Workers Adjustment.

In 1985, the Minister of Finance announced approximately $200 million to be set aside for a program for older workers adjustment. Thereafter, negotiations were entered into by the provincial and federal governments respectfully, and they came to an understanding whereby individuals would get certain benefits under that program.

Individuals in my constituency, particularly construction workers, have not been able to come within the meaning of these agreements. As a result, as good Canadians that they are, they are being denied the benefits of that particular program. I find it unacceptable that the Government of Canada would deny these individuals the benefits of a program which are supposed to go to older workers. The reality is that on the island of Cape Breton, unemployment is at an all time high. The prospects for employment in the construction industry are as likely as an individual going to go out and win the million dollar lottery. There are no jobs. The prospects of jobs in the very near future are just not there.

There is a body of individuals who are 50 years of age, 55 and some older who would like to retire with some sense of dignity. Seventy-five per cent of construction workers on Cape Breton Island are unemployed, 75 per cent. There is a need for the Government of Canada to take positive, affirmative action in order to address that particular problem. The Government of Canada blames the province, the province blames the federal government. It happens to be two Tory governments.

Nevertheless, who are the victims? Who are the individuals without these benefits? They are individuals who have paid their taxes to help build our schools, they have built our churches. Now, when they do not have the wherewithal, they seek dignity from the Government of Canada which has said at every turn: "No, no, no".

If they had not put those eight illegal people in the other place, they would have had the money to amend the program for older workers adjustment and to include the construction workers in Cape Breton. They convinced individuals and have convinced the provincial government of their need. The provincial government is now willing to amend the program for older workers adjustment, but the federal government is not prepared to assist in any way.

I want the parliamentary secretary to the minister involved to stand in his place and show some real signs, demonstrable proof that he has compassion, that his government has compassion and understanding for those individuals who have been without the assistance of the program for older workers adjustment.

I raised this issue in 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990 on several different occasions during that time frame. The construction industry itself, the union representatives and others have made repeated representations to the minister involved, as well as some of the other cabinet colleagues who sit around the table.

We are not seeking a billion dollars in new taxes or income for this particular program. We are talking of men and women, perhaps the age of the hon. member opposite, who have children in university and have mortgages to pay. I would ask him, as the parliamentary secretary, for fairness, for compassion, for understanding and for a positive decision to give to those men and to those women in the construction industry a chance to continue their lives with their families and friends and loved ones and to be able to do it with a sense of dignity and pride, knowing that the Government of Canada does care and is prepared to do something about it.

I ask, Mr. Speaker through you, to the parliamentary secretary if he would respond in a positive way.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond for presenting his question. I know he has deep concern about the older workers in his area.

He is concerned about an amendment that we could possibly make to the agreement between the Government of Canada and, as he says, the province of Nova Scotia in order to include construction workers of Cape Breton under the program of older workers adjustment.

• (1815)

As the member is aware, POWA is designed to help long service older workers—that is the way it was set up—who had been permanently laid off and had little or no prospects for employment. As he mentioned, maybe I do fall in that category because it was for the 55-year olds and over.

Mr. Dingwall: But you still look young.

Mr. James: Thank you. Lay-offs that occur in all private sector industries and commercial Crown corporations, including the construction sector, are eligible under POWA. The criteria are to be applied consistently, as the member knows, to all lay-offs across the country.

I would stress, however, that the program for older workers adjustment remains a program really of last resort to be applied after all other adjustment measures had been considered. That is the way it was set up with the provinces.

With regard to the member's request that the agreement be amended in order to include Cape Breton construction workers, I believe it is a bit difficult to be changed at this time. After all, the adjustment program was implemented after extensive consultations. As he knows and as the member for Hillsborough sitting next to him knows—he also has a great interest in all this—it has only been operating for one year.

I would like to reassure the member that the federal government does recognize the contribution that older workers have made. I think we have to take into consideration the presentation that he has made and his great concern for the older workers in the construction industry in Cape Breton.

I believe in his presentation last June the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond asked if the minister would meet with the union people in Cape Breton. The minister did meet with representatives of the Cape Breton Island Building and Construction Association Trades Council to discuss the issue. He has taken up that matter with them.

The minister has also met with the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He has further consulted with his Nova Scotia counterpart, the honourable Ronald Russell and has received information from the department of industry, trade and technology on the construction industry in the province.

Based upon these discussions and the information received, he believes that a number of alternatives are now being considered for presentation to his federal and provincial colleagues so that a decision can be made.

I see Mr. Speaker indicating that I should finish my presentation, but I would like to tell the member that the minister has taken to heart his presentation. Hopefully, if we are not able to amend the current program for older workers immediately, there may be some other measures that can be taken to construction workers in Cape Breton.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, on June 4 of this year, I asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture regarding the difficult situation faced by dairy farmers not only in British Columbia but virtually right across Canada.

The difficulty concerns the growing loss of revenue, particularly in those communities that are close to the U.S. border. About $72 million in gross sales, for example, have been lost to the British Columbia dairy industry due to B.C. consumers purchasing cheap fluid milk and milk products south of the border.

Three of the five major crossings in B.C. have actually become known as milk and gas runs. Over 13,000 B.C. residents cross into Washington's border communities each day from B.C. often, I might add, for periods of less than half an hour basically just to fill up with gas, to purchase milk and dairy products, and then to return. I must point out that nobody can blame the residents of B.C. or anywhere across Canada for that matter, for trying to save a buck, particularly in a period of escalating gasoline prices and a weakening economy.

I would like to look at the consequences of what is happening with that haemorrhaging of money out of the provinces and down to the United States. In B.C. there is the loss of some $72 million is gross sales to British Columbia's dairy industry, some $30 million lost in provincial revenue from gasoline and transit taxes and $28 million lost in annual federal revenues. It can only be called a haemorrhaging of dollars from our economy. It is kneecapping the British Columbia economy. It is helping to put people out of work.

This economic haemorrhage to the U.S. markets very clearly continues to grow, as the Canadian dollar has continued to be artifically elevated to accommodate the implementation of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Canada's economy is still tied to an artificially strong dollar.

I might add that when one looks back from 1986 to 1989, the Canadian dollar rose 16 per cent against the U.S. dollar, making Canadian purchases of U.S. products increasingly attractive. This is the essence of the problem. What has resulted is an astounding 54 per cent increase in the number of Canadians travelling to the United States on same–day visits, presumably one would assume, to purchase cheaper U.S. goods. Of course, that would include dairy products.

I would like to point out that this correlation of a high Canadian dollar to this surging exodus of Canadian consumers is not coincidence. It is, I reiterate, an accelerating haemorrhage from our economy due to the fiscal policies of this government. It is hurting all economic sectors, particularly our dairy industry.

On June 27 I wrote to the minister again to press this issue further. The minister confirmed in his reply that studies done both in British Columbia and New Brunswick verify that up to 7.6 per cent of B.C. milk sales, and some 4.5 per cent of New Brunswick milk sales come from the United States. In other words, it is milk coming in from south of the border.

The recent attempt by the federal government to control this consumer import of dairy products, according to the dairy industry in B.C., has largely failed. Dairy farmers across Canada have asked the minister to consider the amendment of general import order No. 1, under the Export Import Control Act, to possibly include a provision for a minimum 48–hour stay or time allocation of some sort, so that one can use an import permit to control those dairy products coming across the border.

At the time of the original question in June, I asked the minister what steps he was prepared to take to curtail this loss to the economy in general, but in particular, to the dairy industry in British Columbia and elsewhere.

The minister at that time said that he was studying the situation and assured the House that once the data was gathered, he would sit down with the industry to consider an action plan. Five months have passed and I would like to know whether or not the study is completed and whether or not the minister and his associates have sat down with the dairy industry to work out a possible solution.

Does the minister have a solution to the problem at this time? I am not suggesting that we punish Canadian consumers by imposing stringent restraints. I am not suggesting that they be forced to endure large border line-ups by having customs officials process virtually every litre of milk that comes across the border into Canada. I am suggesting that we consider the provision of a time allocation for duty-free status and have a look at that option.

We should be looking at some mechanism to get the word out to Canadians throughout the provinces that every dollar that goes south of the border for U.S. purchase of milk, dairy products, gasoline and other products costs jobs in Canada. Essentially, it is a drain and a haemorrhaging of our national economy.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the chance to discuss this government's concern over the purchase of U.S. dairy products by Canadian consumers.

Purchasers of dairy products are allowed if their value does not exceed $20 and are for personal use. In particular, they are allowed under general permit No. 1, issued by the Minister for International Trade. These imports are also subject to duty.

Agriculture Canada has undertaken surveys in co-operation with customs and excise officials at border crossing points in British Columbia, New Brunswick and northern Ontario. The survey involves the use of statistical sampling techniques to estimate the extent of milk and cheese imports.

In 1988, at five border crossings in British Columbia, it was estimated that imports amounted to 7.6 per cent of fresh milk sales and 4.5 per cent of cheese sales. The survey also showed that retail prices of milk were from 36 to 60 per cent higher in British Columbia than in Washington state.

Retail prices for cheddar cheese were from 40 to 80 per cent higher on the Canadian side of the border. The results of that survey and a similar survey conducted in New Brunswick have both been published, and the results of a survey covering some border crossings in northern Ontario are also expected to be published by mid-November.

This issue has been raised on numerous occasions with dairy farmers, processors and retailers. When all the data is available, the Minister of Agriculture as well as the Minister for International Trade will sit down with the industry to see what steps can be taken to address this very serious issue.

However, I would like to point out that the regulation of fluid milk including pricing falls under provincial and not federal jurisdiction.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, just before we move to Orders of the Day, I want to bring to the attention of the House a motion, and I believe there is unanimous consent for it. It flows out of the work of the committee of the House of Commons on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. I think there is unanimous consent for this motion:

> That the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons travel to Cologne, Germany, from October 13 to October 18 1990, to study the Federal Republic of Germany's progressive accident prevention and rehabilitation programs.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Otto Jelinek (for the Secretary of State) moved that Bill C–37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate. The hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville. On a point of order, the hon. opposition Whip.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I clearly understood that the parliamentary secretary to the very distinguished government House leader would take the opportunity to explain this. I believe we were to be proceeding with Bill C–74, the Fisheries Act, on second reading, and not Bill C–37. If there is another change in the agenda, I would hope that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader would want to clarify these changes. They seem to have more dekes than Bobby Orr, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I think a better analogy might be Wayne Gretzky, something more current.

Mr. Speaker, there obviously is a misunderstanding. It was our intention to call Bill C–74 and then Bill C–73, followed by Bill C–37. So it should have been Bill C–74 that was called first. If we could perhaps, by consent, go back to that and call Bill C–74.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Do we have consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Valcourt that Bill C-74, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Good morning, Mr. Speaker. I just had to take a moment to get organized.

Mr. Friesen: It will take more than a moment.

Mr. Simmons: The member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley needs a new writer at the very least.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to take a minute to get myself organized because with that confusion about whether we were on Bill C-37—

Mr. Friesen: It will take more than a moment.

Mr. Simmons: For a bunch of people who are at 15 per cent in the poll, they are in marvellously good humour this morning. I must say that for them.

Mr. Jelinek: Excellent humour because there is no election this morning.

Mr. Simmons: As we were saying, Bill C-74 is a very important piece of legislation. It is important for all the reasons that my colleague at that time—he is temporarily not my colleague—Mr. Robichaud from New Brunswick. I can now say his name because he is not currently a member of this House.

An hon. member: A very fine member.

Mr. Simmons: That will change with the next election, but my colleague at that time who led off the debate on the bill in June when we started second reading on this bill, did a very good job at that particular time.

I have to give credit to my friend for St. John's East. This is another example of how he and I, to quote a mutual friend, are cheek to cheek on so many issues.

An hon. member: Two peas in a pod.

Mr. Simmons: He promised me this morning that he would say that my friend, Fernand Robichaud, did a good job when he introduced for the opposition this bill at second reading. He laid out very well many of the reasons why we are in support of this good piece of legislation.

Perhaps before we go to the substance of this particular bill, we ought just to pause for a moment to reflect on what I just said. We believe this is a good piece of legislation.

So often we get flayed in this House by the government for always being against everything. The public is getting the message that we will be against it if we have reason to believe it is not good for the country. That is why we are so unalterably opposed to Bill C-21, the Unemployment Insurance Act, and why we voted against it and will do so again if the government brings it before the House again. That is why we are unalterably opposed to the goods and services tax legislation.

It is also, by the same token, why we are for the bill now before us here, Bill C-74. It addresses a number of the issues that the industry has been asking for, that fishermen have been asking for, for a long, long time. Indeed, perhaps the only question is why it has taken so long to get the legislative proposals to the stage they are today. But better late than never. At least we are now going to beef up the penalties for polluters, people who go out and dump in the ocean. We are going to see to it that if they insist on dumping harmful substances in our oceans, they are going to have to pay the price for it.

Pollution of fish habitat is unconscionable in the first instance and it can no longer be allowed to happen. There is a bunch of people, a bunch of cowards, who in the dead of night are emptying their bilge tanks and dumping crude. They are messing up the habitat there. They are messing up my front yard, in effect. Don Jamieson, one of my predecessors in this particular seat, the Burin—St. George's seat, put it so well many years ago when he was talking about the geographic confines of Burin—St. George's. He said that it must be the only electoral riding in the world which is 1,800 miles long, referring to the coast line, and a quarter of a mile wide. That is true. The only qualification I would make on Don Jamieson's statement is that it is now 2,500 miles long and a quarter of a mile wide because they have added Stephenville and the Port au Port peninsula since Don's time.

The point I make stands. It is that the people who live in Burin—St. George's, like the people who live in all but a handful of communities in Newfoundland and Labrador, live within gunshot, within view of the ocean. It is their front yard; it is their doorstep. They almost step in the water when they step out their front door. The whole history of Newfoundland, the whole history of the settlement of Newfoundland, was that people selected a spot near to the fishing ground. That was the prime parameter, the main reason that communities like François in my riding, like Grey River, and like Rencontre East. They were not selected for the reasons that Carleton Place down here a few miles from us was selected. I suppose one of the reasons had to do with the fact that it was on or near a good highway network. The people who settled in those communities in the 1600s and the 1700s did not know what a highway looked like. Their highway was the ocean. Their bread and butter was the ocean.

To this day in 1990 the bread and butter for the people who live in Garnish, for the people who live in McCallum, for the people who live in Grand Bruit is the ocean. Their highway still is first and foremost the ocean. It is true that one of those communities I just mentioned, Garnish, also happens to be hooked up to the Burin peninsula highway. That allows them to get to education facilities, to hospital facilities, and to shopping facilities; but the highway that allows them to get their bread and butter is still by and large the ocean, particularly for the fishermen who live in Garnish and other communities along that coast. It is their highway. It is their breadbasket. It is their front yard. For all those reasons we do not take a very kind view of people, of cowards in the night, who empty their bilge tanks in our front yard, who mess up our breadbasket, and who strew our highway, our ocean, with their leavings or their waste products.

I salute the minister of fisheries. I salute his parliamentary secretary, the gentleman from St. John's East. I salute those who take—

Mr. Dingwall: Who? Really?

Mr. Simmons: Yes, I salute the gentleman from St. John's East.

Mr. Nunziata: Isn't he a Conservative?

Mr. Simmons: Now the question comes up: "Isn't he a Conservative?" That question is asked all the time in Newfoundland. Is he a member of the Conservative Party? The answer is yes. Is he at heart a Liberal? I will let him answer that question. I can only tell you that I have seen him sometimes when he thinks nobody is looking doing very liberal things.

Mr. Nunziata: Such as?

Mr. Simmons: Such as bringing in this kind of legislation. Let's give the man from St. John's East credit where credit is due. I would put it the other way around. I would say to him that he is modest and all that, but I would submit to the House that the parliamentary secretary is one of the reasons why we have this piece of legislation here today.

Mr. Nunziata: Did you vote for him?

Mr. Simmons: One of the problems with my good friend here just off to my right, philosophically and otherwise—

Mr. Nunziata: No, just otherwise.

Mr. Simmons: One of the problems with my friend from York South—Weston, Toronto, is that sometimes he takes a particular example and generalizes. Because I happen to believe that the gentleman from St. John's West is supporting here a good piece of legislation, the kind of legislation that a Liberal government would write were it in office at the moment, that does not mean that I am going to get carried away and suggest that all the things he does needs to be embraced.

• (1020)

For example, he opposes the variable entrance requirement. He voted against it twice in this House.

Mr. Nunziata: Does he support the GST?

Mr. Simmons: He supports the GST.

Mr. Nunziata: Shocking.

Mr. Simmons: There are differences between the member for St. John's East and us, but that does not mean that we cannot pool our resources when it comes to something as important to our respective ridings as this particular bill. That is what we are doing in this particular instance.

I say to my friend from York—South Weston that when I went to university in Boston some years ago—and they had universities in those days—

Mr. Nunziata: Did you graduate?

Mr. Simmons: That is another question. When I went to university in those days in Boston I had a professor who when using the example that was current at the time said: "All Indians walk in single file. At least the one I saw did." Of course he was making a very important point, that we ought not to overgeneralize from one particular instance.

I am just encouraged that the hon. member for St. John's East is onside on this particular bill, but I am not going to get overly excited that he is about to cross the floor to join us, because that would create a whole set of problems on its own.

The bill is a good bill because it is going to chase down those cowards in the night, those people who when nobody is looking dump their waste in my front yard, in the ocean off Newfoundland. That has got to stop, and I believe this bill goes a long way toward helping to put an end to that kind of cowardice.

If we want to get into one or two details, the very first amendment in this bill would increase the fines for general fishing violations. Quite apart from the pollution issue that I have spent a few moments on, this bill would also increase fines for general fishing violations.

At the moment offenders are liable to a $5,000 fine or a 12-month prison sentence. The new bill increases that fine to a maximum of $100,000. As my good friend and the former premier of Newfoundland would have said, "not $10,000, $20,000, $30,000 or $50,000, but $100,000 all the way up from $5,000".

I commend the drafters of the bill and the people in this House who are responsible for increasing that fine all the way from $5,000 to $100,000 in the case of a summary conviction and $500,000 on indictment, as the maximum for the indictable offence. That is exactly as it should be, and we on this side have no difficulty supporting the bill.

We come to a third point which this bill addresses. We talked so far about the question of pollution of the fish habitat. We talked about the bill's intention to bring in heftier penalties. There is another issue of course, and that is the question of adequate surveillance.

We happen to believe over here—and we have said so many times—that if the government is failing the fishermen, the fish plant workers, and the fishing industry on a number of counts—I could go into that, but let me stick with a particular item—it is failing them most miserably in the area of surveillance or, more to the point, the lack of adequate surveillance.

I could take you, Mr. Speaker, to a community in my riding called Seal Cove in Fortune Bay. I remember one time last winter when I was there just over the Christmas season. It was seven o'clock or eight o'clock at night and it was dark. I was sitting at a kitchen table having a bit of saltfish and so on with one of my friends, and we looked out the window.

Mr. Malone: What is saltfish and so on?

Mr. Simmons: He wants to know about the so on. We had saltfish. It is a good question. He wants to know what we had for supper. We had boiled saltfish, we had boiled potatoes, and we had what we call drawn butter. We had a few onions. It was a good combination.

While we were having our bit of saltfish and potatoes and drawn butter, I looked out the window into the darkness and I saw those lights. They are almost up there. I say to my host: "I thought I knew the harbour. There are no houses in that direction. What are the lights doing out there? There should only be water out there". He said: "Yes, that is all there is. That is the harbour, of course". He said: "These are not lights from a house in Seal Cove. These are lights from the foreign boats". I said: "They must be right on top of the wharf". He said: "Yes, just about".

They are supposed to be off 12 miles somewhere. They are so close that, as you look out this guy's kitchen window, you have to stare up to see the light on the mast because they are right in on the shoreline. Why are they in there? Because those foreign ships and the captains on those foreign, be they Spanish or Portuguese— in this case they happen to have been French—know that surveillance in Canada is an eight to four job. It is basically an eight to four, Monday to Friday job. You don't push your luck if you are the captain on one of those boats between those hours. After four o'clock, particularly after dark, you have a free run of it. It is the equivalent in urban terms, to use an example that maybe people in more urban centres might identify with, of saying that the cops are only going to police the streets at certain hours of the day.

Guess what happens at the other hours. Guess what the irresponsible people do. Guess what the drunken driver does. Guess what people who would breach the law do. They obviously time their actions to ensure that they are not breaking the law when the cops are policing. That is basically what is happening in another context. That is what is happening right there off Seal Cove, Fortune Bay in my example and off all those communities.

The ocean cops, the people who are supposed to be providing surveillance, I do not blame them. They have not been given the person-years, the manpower, the womanpower, or the boats and facilities to do their job. They are prepared to have additional numbers out there. It is not their problem. It is the problem of a political decision that has been taken, that in the interest of scrounging a few bucks we are going to sacrifice an entire fishery. That is what is happening out there.

In my example, off Seal Cove that night, here were French draggers within literally a thousand feet of the shore where the law said they ought to be 12 miles off.

That does not happen one night. That happens literally every night of the year during the appropriate fishing season. It happens every single night without exception.

The authorities have been told many times. They say "we know", and then throw up their hands and ask: "What can we do about it?" If they provide surveillance at night, they will have none during the day because they are locked into a very tight schedule in terms of what kinds of resources they can expend on providing surveillance.

If there is one weakness in this bill, it is that it does not do any more than pay lip service to that important question of surveillance. That is a big term for what we saw that night out of the kitchen window in Seal Cove. That is what Newfoundlanders all along that 2,500 miles of coastline in my riding see. It is what people along the coastline in the riding of the member for St. John's East see every night. They see people raping their fish stocks, and they see it being done blatantly though in the dead of night. They are allowed to do it for a very particular reason, because they know all too well that the Government of Canada does not have either the political will or the resources, as the case may be, to get out and protect our fisheries. That is sad, but it is true.

• (1030)

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in a very difficult position because I want so much to comment on some of the things that my colleague has said, but first I want to thank him for his very kind words, and for his support in a number of areas of the fisheries.

Yes, he and I agree on some matters. He voted against the variable entrance requirement last November when we passed Bill C-21. We disagree certainly on the goods and services tax, which will create jobs in my province and his as well. But we certainly agree on things like overfishing and some of the actions that should be taken there.

I want to express in this House my appreciation for his very active, vocal and visible support in the activities and the undertakings of a number of people to draw the attention of the world to this tragic problem.

I also want to congratulate him on his clearly different approach to this piece of legislation than of his colleagues. I have been stunned by the attitude of some of his colleagues which was based on the assumption that everybody in the fishery would be subject to the provisions of the Fisheries Act because everybody in the fishery was committing an offence.

The real approach, and the approach of my friend opposite, is that this Fisheries Act with its $100,000, $500,000 and in some cases much larger fines is for those that a breaking the law. It is those who are jeopardizing the fishery and putting at risk the resource for the 99 per cent of the fishermen who obey the law, who have conservation on their minds. I appreciate his approach because it is very different from what we head the other day. I think it is an important distinction.

However, I would like to comment very briefly on the question of surveillance. I remind my friend opposite that observers will be on all foreign vessels fishing inside 200 miles. They will have new powers given to them by the Minister of Fisheries and will play much less of a monitoring role and much more of a role of imposing law. We have seen dramatically increased air surveillance out of St. John's and the other Atlantic provinces.

For about the same amount of money the number of hours have been increased to well over 3,500, which have been provided by the—

Mr. Dingwall: Is this debate or comment?

Mr. Reid: This is questions and comments.

I also remind him that we have new vessels in the gulf to support the surveillance opportunities.

My colleague made a very good speech, a very flattering speech for the government. I thank him for all he has done. I think he is right in recognizing that surveillance is absolutely critical. I just want to remind him that we have moved very quickly and very dramatically over the last 18 months to address exactly that question.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, my friend mentioned the GST in passing. If he genuinely believes that the GST is going to create jobs in Newfoundland, he must be making an announcement that the centre that was going to Summerside is going to Newfoundland because the only jobs that are going to be created by the GST are those jobs done in Summerside and an appalling lot here in Ottawa, appalling lot in terms of numbers, not the quality of the people hired, mind you—

Mr. Reid: Don't be so sure.

Mr. Simmons: So outside of Ottawa, unless he is moving the capital to Newfoundland, which is not a bad idea, unless he is moving the tax centre from Summerside to Newfoundland which is not a bad idea in Newfoundland terms but a lousy idea in Summerside terms, unless one or two of the above, then I would say that he is not being very candid on this issue.

Let us come to the issue of surveillance. The member says that there are going to be observers on all the boats within the 200 mile limit. Is he telling us that the government is now reneging or otherwise abrogating the treaty, the last agreement between Canada and France?

Mr. Reid: I note what you are saying.

Mr. Simmons: Exactly. Because, Mr. Speaker, in the last 24 months his other cheek-to-cheek friend, the member for St. John's West, went out and signed one of the more crazy documents ever. Basically the agreement with France says, "From now on if you want to rape our fish stock you have got to give us notice." That is what the document said. France may say it differently, Mr. Speaker. Under the agreement, signed in 1988 I believe, Canada has to say to France, "We want to board your ship. We want to board this particular ship." We, Canada, have agreed in writing to give notice that the day we come to check on them we are going to give them lead time so they can get ready.

Well, let's think that one through. What do you think will happen if we say to France next week that we are going to put an observer on its boat? Do you think France will be stunned enough, stupid enough, on that particular trip to commit any violations? That is what we have locked ourselves into with respect to the Canada-France agreement of 1988.

If the member for St. John's West tells the House that we are going to have observers on all the foreign boats within the 200-mile limit, I say to him that, in principle, it is a great idea but he is wrong at least in one important respect that comes to mind without having benefit of checking my notes. I can tell him right off the top of my head that he is wrong in so far as the Canada-France agreement is concerned because under that agreement, as he well knows, we have to give prior notice to the French that we want to put an observer on board the boat.

That is like saying to me, "Simmons, drive down the highway at 150 miles an hour for 10 miles, but after 10 miles there are cops." Now what do you think I am going to do when I get to the 150-mile mark? That is exactly what the French fishermen are doing. They have been given notice in the agreement. They have it in writing that they will be given notice if they are going to be raided. Well, if I were them I would be on my best behaviour during the raid.

The member and I agree that we have observers on the vessels by prior arrangement. They know in all cases before the fact that there are going to be observers aboard. But more to the point—here's the point that I think my friend from St. John's East misses; I will say it in a sentence and then I will sit down—it is not important to know which boats the observers are on. If you are out to break the law it is more important to know which ones they are not on. They also know that, too.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): The member for Burin—St. George's has given a very good speech with regard to Bill C-74 and it shows beyond a shadow of doubt that the expertise with regard to fisheries related matters is certainly on this side of the House.

I wonder if he would care to comment with regard to other issues of surveillance. It is fine to have provisions under the act in order to increase the various penalties and sanctions. Could the hon. member indicate to the House whether or not, as a result of Bill C–74, additional individuals will be retained by the Government of Canada in order to facilitate the enforcement of those new laws. It is my understanding and that of some other colleagues that the Government of Canada is not intending to proceed with the hiring of additional individuals in order to assist with the enforcement of these new standards.

Mr. Simmons: I thank my friend for Cape Breton—East Richmond. This is my first opportunity to congratulate him publicly on his latest achievement, having been designated by our leader, Jean Chrétien, the next member for Beauséjour, as the chief Whip of the Liberal Party. I want to congratulate my friend.

Mr. Speaker, I see your signal that I am out of time so I will be very quick and to the point. He asked a question and then he answers it. Are there going to be additional enforcement personnel? Of course he answered the question because it is blatantly obvious to the whole world that this government is going to bring in some marvellous legislation, legislation that we can support. But it is a case again that this government does not put its money where its mouth is. It says fine words, and nobody can knock this piece of legislation.

What it can knock and what it does knock, and what the gentleman for Cape Breton—East Richmond just knocked in effect, is the appalling fact that this government is going to create the mandate for extra surveillance and then fail to provide the resources, the manpower, the womanpower, the person-years to follow up to enforce that surveillance. That is the tragedy.

• (1040)

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to participate in this debate on Bill C–74, amendments to the Fisheries Act. I want to join with colleagues on this side in giving just due to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who I know has some understanding.

Mr. Nunziata: Don't get carried away.

Mr. Dingwall: I am being very liberal, Mr. Speaker, when I say some understanding of some of the concerns of individuals in Atlantic Canada.

The substance of this bill, has received the support of many of my colleagues on this side. I know that the parliamentary secretary has had a fair amount to do in making certain that this bill has come forward.

I want to put on the record, though, that by increasing summary conviction fines up to $100,000 for general fisheries offences, and then indictable offences up to $500,000 with options for imprisonment of one or two years, I can concur with that. I fully understand, as my colleague has said, the importance of increasing those fines.

There is another part to the equation. It is well and good to have sanctions under a statute, but if those sanctions cannot be enforced by the Crown, it is all for nought. Members can argue, and argue correctly, that this is a signal to those who wish to breach the Fisheries Act that there will be substantial fines against them.

On the other side of the coin, there is no reasonable guarantee that fisheries officers and the Crown will supply the individuals to do the enforcing. Therefore, one has to question the bill both from an intellectual perspective as well as from a practical perspective. It is great to have a sanction, but if one cannot enforce that sanction, it is just window dressing.

There are fines of up to $300,000 on summary conviction for the alteration of fish habitat. On an indictment, it is $1 million. The Crown in a criminal case has the option to proceed on summary conviction or it has the option to proceed on indictable offence, depending upon the value of the product which is in question.

I have great confidence in our judiciary system, but what the act fails to state is what is a minimum fine. I know members opposite and perhaps members on this side would agree that the judiciary has to have some latitude in the exercising of its role in the adjudication of different cases. But there is a big difference on summary conviction when you talk of a hundred bucks versus $300,000. A substantial difference.

Likewise, if you proceed under the indictable, there is quite a difference between $301,000 and $1 million. I would have thought that somewhere within the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, and to use a phrase—aided and abetted—by the Department of Justice, the bureaucracy in the minister's office would have wanted to try to clarify for us what the minimum fine is going to be. I am afraid that some of these fines will not have a minimum, but in fact will end up being very, very, low, thereby defeating the purpose or the purposes of the act.

Again, where are the practical aspects of the act? Have we heard from ministers of the Crown that additional individuals will be retained? Have we heard that various enforcement agencies are going to be utilized to enforce these sanctions? We have not heard that. We have heard the opposite. In point of fact, no additional individuals will be retained in order to enforce the sanctions under that particular statute.

The same sanctions under Bill C–74 have to do with the pollution of fish habitat. The Harris report, the Haché report, and, I believe, under the auspices of the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program, all alluded to greater sanctions under the Fisheries Act, and I think the parliamentary secretary, who is nodding his head, would concur with me on that.

There is a bit of a concern, and I just flag it. I do not think it is an overwhelming omission, but I think it has to be put on the record, and it is this. Is this new law and these new sanctions, under the Fisheries Act, discriminatory in this sense? Many individuals, in the Atlantic fisheries particularly, believe the sanctions are earmarked for the inshore fishermen.

I hope the parliamentary secretary would avail himself, when it is his turn to speak, to inform the House in greater detail. But there is that concern. These sanctions are in place and, if they are to be enforced, they will be enforced on one sector of our fishery, namely, the inshore fishery.

The policies opposite and the made-in-Canada recession, or as the Prime Minister says, the slowdown or the shutdown—whichever one you wish to pick—have had an overwhelmingly negative impact on inshore fishermen in Atlantic Canada. Members on this side, my colleagues, the hon. members for Cardigan and Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, have brought to the attention of the House on several occasions our attempts to provide a variable entrance rate, to assist fishermen. But the government, for whatever reason, refuses to put that into play in order to assist our fishermen and our inshore fishermen, in particular.

There is legitimate concern out there because of the recession and because fishermen are not obtaining the benefits of the variable entrance rate which was in place for 14 years. It was brought in annually by the respective governments opposite as well as this party. The governing party does not wish to go along with that at the present time. And, of course, there is the fact of fish stocks. All of those, collectively, have played very negatively on our inshore fishermen and now the sanctions of Bill C–74 seem to suggest that it is discriminatory against the inshore fishermen.

Why would I say that on the floor of the House. I say that, Mr. Speaker, because there are some groups who have not had meaningful consultations or who feel that the consultations that they did have have not been meaningful. In particular, they have been organizations in the inshore fishery.

• (1050)

I would hope that when the bill is referred to a legislative committee that it will make a concerted effort to seek out those groups who have expressed legitimate concern about the discriminatory aspects of Bill C–74 and, as they say, clear the air by having that rectified.

The industry has generally supported the provisions of Bill C–74. But I want to flip from the inshore to the offshore. I hope the parliamentary secretary, when he gets up to speak later, will be able to outline in spades for members of the House as to what the Government of Canada is going to do to enforce the sanctions under Bill C–74 with regard to the corporate sector.

Before the hon. member rises and alludes to the fact that members on this side are perhaps against corporations, that is not the case at all. We are very supportive of businesses and free enterprise, but there has to be a measure of fairness. Under the provisions of Bill C–74, are we going to charge an inshore fisherman $250,000 because he has a general offence against the Fisheries Act? Then National Sea Products, bailed out by banks and governments, will get a fine of $150. That is the fairness, but there is no minimum. There is wide latitude, and we know what happens. We have clear evidence before us. We see it all the time where inshore fishermen are sustaining the worst, while in other instances individuals do not share their fair burden. I would hope the parliamentary secretary would want to address himself to that.

There are several other points I want to raise because I think they are germane to the debate. The parliamentary secretary knows that the Maritime Fishermen's Union is questioning, as I have questioned here this morning, whether or not the purposes of Bill C-74 are directed against the right people. Who are we talking about? Are we talking about an inshore fisherman who has a wife, a family, a mortgage, and a business loan, and who is mortgaged to the hilt at the bank and the fisheries loan board? Or are we talking about those who deliberately, intentionally, consistently, and repeatedly go out and breach the act? I think we are talking about all of them. But, again, I come back to the measure of fairness, and the bill lacks fairness.

The parliamentary secretary is shaking his head. He is a reasonable individual at times, for fleeting moments in the dark, in the night. I can tell him that individuals who are gainfully involved in the inshore fisheries believe that this act has been put in place in order to hit them. I hope he can dispute and clarify for all members as to whether or not that aspect of what I have raised here this morning is on point.

My final point has to do with the over-all issue of surveillance generally.

Canadians on the Atlantic coast, the Pacific coast, or wherever they may be, are sick and tired of governments allowing individuals to pollute our waters for whatever reasons. They ought to feel the full effect of Canadian law.

If we are concerned about the environment as has been alluded to by the minister now responsible for environment, by the Prime Minister, by members of the cabinet opposite, it is just not satisfactory to have provisions within a federal statute of increasing the fines without having the human resources to put them into effect. I made that argument with regard to fisheries, and now I am making it with regard to the environment. Either one is serious or one is not serious. The lack of a financial commitment by the Government of Canada to see to it that these sanctions will be enforced has caused not only great concern among fisher people—persons in the fisheries—but great difficulty for Canadians who live in urban centres as well that our environment is not being protected. The likelihood of it being protected is not very good.

The track record of the government opposite demonstrates to most reasonable Canadians that its report card is at about 22 per cent, 7 percentage points higher than what it is in the polls. That is not very good. Just recently we saw an example in Saskatchewan with regard to an environmental project.

I say to you, Sir, and to the parliamentary secretary, to whom I am going to listen when he has the opportunity to stand in his place and try to defend the indefensible, I will listen.

Mr. Reid: You shouldn't prejudge.

Mr. Dingwall: That is right. I should not prejudge.

Hopefully, the parliamentary secretary will take to heart the omissions in the federal statute, will want to clarify the discriminatory aspects of Bill C-74, will want to engage actively and enthusiastically such organizations as the Maritimes Fishermen's Union, the various co-ops, the fishermen's organizations in all of Canada and will listen to them. It should provide recourse so that they do not feel or are under the impression at any time that Bill C-74 is discriminatory.

The comments that I have made in this debate, I hope will be taken seriously because they are offered in a serious way. They have to do with criminal law, the enforcement, the human resource aspect—a failure by the Government of Canada—and, of course, the environmental concerns that all Canadians share from coast to coast.

More important than the parliamentary secretary is the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. He is the one who has to enforce this bill and in whose name it is. He is the one who must show some leadership. He must come to the Commons and to the committee and tell us all the new moneys he will provide for enforcing the sanctions under Bill C-74. That is what he should do. He should come to the committee and talk about the human resources. He will come to the committee and give us provisions with regard to minimum fines. Maybe the minister—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 11 o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 35, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

CANADA POST

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post has cancelled Saturday rural mail delivery in Prince Edward Island, the country's most rural province, effective October 15. This decision was made without the consultation of those whom the decision most affects, the people of Prince Edward Island.

I have written several times to the minister responsible for Canada Post, asking for a reversal of this decision, or at the very least, a six month extension. This six month period would allow for proper review and consultation to take place.

I am also concerned with Canada Post's recent cuts to the hours of service of rural post offices throughout Prince Edward Island. Today, in the House of Commons, I am requesting the minister responsible for Canada Post to grant a six month extension and demonstrate to rural Prince Edward Island that this government is interested in supporting rural life, not dismantling it.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, despite all evidence to the contrary, this government refuses to face the truth and admit that we are in a recession. It refused all week to consider alternatives that would help Canadians survive the hard times.

This week fish workers from the west and east coast tried to get the government to listen. Instead, they found bull-headed Tories who cannot or will not grasp the fact that there is a crisis. I want to point out to the Minister of Employment and Immigration that her government can do something right now for the fish workers in Canada and re-introduce variable entrance requirements to unemployment insurance. It would be a step in the right direction.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the Western Diversification Office recently provided a $3.3 million repayable contribution to assist in the installation of a flue-gas desulphurization demonstration unit at the Poplar River Power Station near Coronach, Saskatchewan.

The LIFAC process, which involves limestone injection in furnace and calcium oxide activation, should reduce by 90 per cent the sulphur dioxide released from coal fired power stations.

Sulphur dioxide is one of the leading causes of acid rain. This new LIFAC technology will provide a cost effective means for assisting in meeting the goal of reducing acid rain causing emissions by 50 per cent by 1994.

I congratulate Western Diversification for its initiative in this partnership with SaskPower and Tampella Ltd., a partnership which could have far reaching environmental benefits for all of North America.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the most pressing mission now before us is to rekindle our visions for a united country.

I would like to speak for a moment about our commitment to multiculturalism. Multiculturalism is going to be a difficult concept to initiate and establish in Canada. Many of my citizens talk about the melting pot philosophy in the United States and how it appears to work well for that country.

I would like to say that we in Canada have always stated very clearly, and did so in the free trade debate, that we are not Americans, we are Canadians. That difference, and as our French citizens would say, vive la différence, is multiculturalism. The differences, variety and diversity it brings to our country will make us stronger and will make us great. It is a concept that I support completely.

CANADA POST

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, on July 12, 1990, officials from Canada Post announced the elimination of Saturday rural mail delivery in Prince Edward Island. Since that time I have written to the minister responsible numerous times and I have been pushed off.

The minister must know that the people of Prince Edward Island are outraged. There was no consultation with the public or members of Parliament from the island. Indeed, officials from Canada Post have admitted to me that the decision makes no economic sense.

On Wednesday, I presented hundreds of petitions protesting this decision. The people of Prince Edward Island want Saturday mail delivery. On Monday, Saturday rural mail delivery will be no more because of the attitude of this government. The people of Prince Edward Island will not forget what this government has done to them and this unnecessary action will be remembered when the people go to the polls.

I urge the minister to listen to the people of Prince Edward Island and maintain this customary service.

NATIONAL SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY WEEK

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, today marks the beginning of the first ever National Science and Technology Week in Canada.

In our ever-changing world, Canadians need science to succeed. Technology is advancing at an extraordinary pace and in order to compete in a global market, Canadians must continue to be on the cutting edge of new technology.

In our riding of Elk Island, there are some exciting new initiatives. In Fort Saskatchewan we have Westaim, a world class research and development centre for advanced industrial materials. In Strathcona County a Canada-Finland joint venture will produce MTBE, an octane booster to replace lead in gasoline, and at the Beaumont High School, a pioneering high tech curriculum program designed and taught by instructor Paul Wozny will enable his students to encounter high technology applications in their science studies.

Let us work together to make National Science and Technology Week a success. Let us all work together to build a stronger Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance claimed yesterday that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture was in complete and utter support of the GST, but reading their brief of June 28 to the Senate shows something completely different.

"The federation worries that the tax will have a negative effect on households. Net farm income will be extremely affected." That is a quote from their brief. Farmers worry about the visibility of the tax, and the paper burden. Farmers wonder if the 7 per cent rate will be raised in the future. It is likely. The current sales tax was raised 50 per cent by the Tories.

The federation wants an independent body with real power to monitor consumer complaints, not the toothless, feeble watchdog recently set up. I quote: "The usual response to the first whiff of inflation is to raise interest rates. Farmers don't need higher interest rates on top of tax increases."

Farmers know that the GST is the wrong tax at the wrong time. Farmers across the nation are part of the 85 per cent of Canadians who say loudly and clearly: Axe the tax.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, ethanol blended gasoline has been declared an environmental choice product by Environment Canada. The environmental choice program and the Canadian ecologo is a program involving environmental advocates, consumers, business and the scientific community, and is designed to provide reliable independent information to consumers so that they can make wise environmental choices.

Ethanol blended gasoline becomes the only transportation fuel which has been determined to result in a more positive effect on the environment. The blend reduces carbon monoxide and benzene exhaust emissions. In addition, the production of ethanol would provide an excellent market for lower grade grains.

I urge the cabinet to produce the financial stimulus with which the production and utilization of ethanol blended gasoline could expand.

TRIBUTE TO PASCAL PITRE

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to draw the attention of the House to the remarkable bravery of one of my constituents in Petit-Rocher, fifteen-year-old Pascal Pitre.

On August 5 last summer, on Kelly's Beach in Kouchibouguac Park, New Brunswick, Pascal Pitre saved the life of a seven-year-old child.

The child had apparently lost consciousness in water two metres deep, because of a strong current and high winds. Pascal bravely dived into the water and saved the little boy. If Pascal had not acted at the right time, the child would have died. I think that what Pascal did deserves our recognition and applause.

And I would also like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the heroism of all Canadians who have acted similarly. In fact, Mr. Speaker, there is no greater act of bravery or heroism than to save the life of another human being.

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): The Government of Canada, through the Department of Agriculture, has announced a new agricultural training program. Young farmers and future farmers from Eastern Quebec, thanks to a training program that has received federal assistance totalling $650,000, will be able to upgrade their technical skills and develop their ability to use new procedures, while improving and diversifying their practical experience and training. This program is part of the Canada-Quebec subsidiary agreement on the economic development of Quebec's regions.

Thanks to the involvement of the Canadian government, many future farmers will be able to develop their skills and gain valuable experience.

Mr. Speaker, this is one more initiative by the Conservative government that will ensure our regions have a future in the agricultural industry.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, throughout British Columbia lumber mills are closing and people in the forestry industry are being thrown out of work because of a made in Canada recession brought about by this government's policies.

Recent closures at Tolko Industries at Heffley Creek have thrown 120 people out of work. At Valemont, B.C., there is a temporary closure of Slocan Forest Products, throwing more workers out.

In Kelowna and Armstrong, Fletcher Challenge is reducing operations 20 per cent. Since May 1989, the company has eliminated 1,114 workers throughout the province.

Weldwood Canada is cutting production by 30 per cent in Williams Lake and Quesnel. At Vavenby, Weyerhauser is reducing operations, cutting 60 more jobs.

In the Okanagan—Shuswap, the future of up to 200 more jobs are on the line as mills consider further lay-offs, their only option.

The New Westminster IWA Local has lost over 1,000 members in the last few months and throughout British Columbia, 5,000 forestry workers have been sidelined this year.

When will this government wake up and smell the coffee? It's blind allegiance to an artificially high dollar, it's outrageous high interest policy and it's capitulation to U.S. interests to enshrine the 15 per cent export tariffs—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Fundy Royal.

THE SENATE

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, in their attempt to undermine the legislative agenda of the legitimate elected government of this country, the Liberal senators are clearly displaying their contempt for democracy.

Perhaps the Liberal senators are unaware of the practical implications of their irresponsibility. The people of Canada can only stand and watch as an unelected body holds up the passage of important pieces of legislation in the name of partisan politics. No group is paying a higher price for the delays associated with the Liberal antics in the Senate than the people of Atlantic Canada.

Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project, as passed in the House of Commons on October 4, 1990, is a tremendous opportunity for economic development in Newfoundland, Labrador and throughout the Atlantic region. In delaying the final passage of this bill in the Senate, the Liberals are saying no to the immediate undertaking of a project which will mean increased prosperity for Atlantic Canada.

I therefore call upon the Liberal senators to end their self-interested manipulation of the rules of the Senate. I call upon them to let consideration for the interests of those who eagerly await the passage of this key piece of legislation prevail over the narrow-minded partisan politics which have up until now determined their actions.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has won a prestigious R and D 100 award in an international competition sponsored by the American journal R & D magazine. These awards recognize innovators and organizations for outstanding practical development of significant new technical products.

The product IMPELA is the world's most powerful high energy industrial accelerator. Its development is based on work carried out at Chalk River in the 1970s and 1980s as part of its fundamental science program.

IMPELA will provide an economic source of electrons for use in the manufacture and high speed processing of plastics, rubbers and other materials, the sterilization of medical products, the disinfestation of export commodities and the processing of wastes to enable re-use or recycling. Industrial applications include strengthening plastics in the automotive and construction industries, treating sewage wastes, treating hospital and airport wastes and treating rubber products.

This award underlines the importance of how continued support for AECL's research programs can result in innovative products for all kinds of industries, and we congratulate them.

JUSTICE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice has two functions. In the second function, as Attorney General of Canada, she is responsible for federal criminal prosecutions, such as drugs, taxation or immigration cases, for examples.

The Law Reform Commission of Canada has just pointed out that this puts the minister in a potential conflict of interest situation. The best example is in my home province of British Columbia where there was an alleged fraud by the tourism minister, Bill Reid, allocating Loto grants to friends.

The then attorney general, Bud Smith, decided not to prosecute. If I can put it charitably, this was a controversial decision and caused an uproar in B.C. politics.

I believe the solution is to appoint a director of public prosecution, both federally and provincially, appointed by cabinet but responsible to the House. The new office would increase the independence of Crown counsel, lessen the apparent conflict of interest and, by placing control in the hands of a person with security of tenure, provide greater continuity to the prosecution service.

I advocate the Government of Canada do just that.

BILL C-21

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I heard from a constituent caught in the system: a woman 49 years of age, unable to find work, lacking skills required to find a decent job. She found hope in a course available in a Calgary college, but that hope was dashed when she found her only subsistence, a UI cheque, would be stopped if by going back to school she stopped looking for work. Catch-22, trapped on the welfare treadmill.

This woman suffers needlessly because this House passed amendments to correct that inequity. The elected members of Parliament passed amendments to the UI act to support retraining on November 6, 1989. Those amendments have been held up by the Senate, by Liberal senators, for 11 months. This poor woman suffers while MacEachen plays petty politics.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday both he and the Prime Minister lacked the courage to use what is for them the dreaded r word, recession, even though every other Canadian knows it is a fact that we are in a recession. But the Prime Minister made some progress. He used the s word, slowdown. Yesterday he told reporters in Montreal:

> —we have induced a slowdown. Mr. Wilson said as much in his budget of February. Look at the budget. It's as clear as spring water.

Those are the exact words of the Prime Minister.

Well, yesterday and earlier this week, more than 5,000 Canadians were told that they were being induced out of their jobs by this government's planned slowdown. I want to ask the Minister of Finance: How many more thousands of Canadians are going to be induced out of their jobs next week? What is the government's plan for next week?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me get back to this point that the hon. member is referring to about his cute little expression, the r word.

I have been quite forthright with Canadians in explaining what is the government's policy, what is happening in the markets and what is happening in the economy, but as Minister of Finance I have to base my comments on facts. What I have said in a very clear way—and I go back to a speech that I made September 17 of this year—"I now expect that the second half of this year will see little or no growth, with the possibility of a further decline in output in the current quarter".

If there is that decline in output in the current quarter then we would have a technical recession. When we see the data and the end of November this year then I will be prepared to use whatever words are appropriate to describe that.

If the hon. member is asking whether we are in a recession as defined by Alan Greenspan as follows: "a period in which business activity not only slumped but dropped significantly enough so that the downturn feeds on itself", that is not what is going on in the economy today. I do not know of any economist who is saying that that is going on in the economy today. If that is what the hon. Leader of the Opposition is trying to imply, he is exaggerating the situation.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Canadians will be surprised that Alan Greenspan, the head of the Federal Reserve Board of the United States, knows more about the Canadian economy than Canadian economists at the Conference Board of Canada.

Why does the minister not listen to the economists of the Conference Board of Canada who say that we are in a recession, the first made-in-Canada recession?

Why does the minister insist that what is going on is only technical? To the thousands of Canadians who are losing their jobs due to this government's policies, it is not technical. It is serious. It is damaging. To the thousands of people who are losing their businesses due to this government's policies, it is not technical. It is a fact. It is damaging. Will the minister change his plan from one that is creating recession, inducing the loss of jobs? Why does he insist on making this recession more and more bad and harmful for this economy?

• (1120)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): The type of recession we are trying to avoid, Mr. Speaker, is the type of recession that my hon. friend was directly associated with and directly implicated in, in 1981-82. It was that type of recession that was induced by the policies followed by the government he was involved with that let inflation get out of hand, that let inflation move to 13 per cent, and that allowed interest rates to go to 20 to 25 per cent.

To stop the inflation that was getting totally out of hand at that time, we have been trying to restrain that inflation and have been reasonably successful at doing so. Now we have been able to reduce interest rates, as we have done over the last three and a half months, by one and one-half percentage points and will be able to continue that process as we see the progress in the economy continue.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Conference Board of Canada said we are in a recession, the first made in Canada recession, as a result of the policies of this minister and his government.

I want to ask the minister why, if he is so worried about inflation, he insists on introducing his GST policy which, according to the Conference Board of Canada and all the experts, will create even more inflation. Why doesn't the minister withdraw his GST, if he really wants to fight inflation?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I note that my hon. friend has omitted referring to some of the experts that the media have referred to in the last day or so where they talk about the importance of getting the GST—the Business Council on National Issues, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Chamber of Commerce. Each one has said that it is important, in the interests of the economy and the progress we can make in strengthening our economy, to bring in the goods and services tax.

Why is it on the one hand the Leader of the Opposition can get up on his hind feet and say "do something about the economy" and, on the other hand, he condones this activity in the Senate where the senators are holding back on a principal piece of legislation that is very important for the health of this economy, as endorsed by many of the experts to which he likes to refer?

It is this piece of advice that the Conference Board is saying is right for the economy. It is this piece of advice that the Economic Council is saying is right for the economy. The only reason why this is being held up is pure partisan opportunism.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday, in response to the government's aversion for the r word, the Prime Minister said that this is not a recession, that this is, and I quote, "a planned slowdown".

How many more planned bankruptcies has the Minister of Finance in store for small businesses in this country? How many more planned lay-offs and mortgage foreclosures? How much more planned misery does he have in store for the Canadian public before he recognizes the bankruptcies of his own economic policies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware of what is going on in the economy. I have had widespread discussions and consultations with people who have told me of the difficulties they are going through in the economy today. I understand that. I have said on many occasions I take no pleasure in that.

What I do know is that if we had gone the other way, taken the alternative of letting the inflation get out of control, letting the party go on even further, the problems to the economy would be far more severe and the people that my hon. friend is concerned about would be far more disadvantaged by the problems which would result from that.

This is what we are trying to do: demonstrate some leadership, look ahead, try to anticipate these problems, snuff the problems out before they become a real problem, and in that way get on to a path of non-inflationary strong growth in the future at an early stage.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

At the same time as this government's economic policy has wrung the neck of the Canadian economy, this government spends over $1.5 million in the production of comic books and now cartoons in newspapers across the country to sell the unsaleable, the GST Consumer Information Office.

When is the minister going to stop providing comic relief for Canadians and start providing some economic relief to this government caused made-in-Canada recession?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me refer again to these business leaders who came out yesterday somewhat critical of the Government of Canada where they—

An hon. member: Somewhat?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Let me refer my hon. friend to Mr. D'Aquino says: "Mr. Wilson's performance in this area has been better than that of all the provinces. In fact this problem includes all of us. We are all part of the problem. We are not pointing the finger at Mr. Wilson".

The point that these organizations were making is that they want to see interest rates come down. I want to see them come down. Their message is: get the deficit down faster and further and that will help take the pressure off interest rates and allow us to get interest rates down.

I have been Minister of Finance for six years and, in those six years of time, every time we have brought out a measure to reduce a deficit, every time we have brought out a measure to reduce government spending, the Liberal Party opposite has opposed us every inch of the way. Now that we have this goods and services tax proposal, which is designed to stabilize the fiscal position of the Government of Canada, what do we have from the people opposite? We have them supporting the unelected Senate, supporting it in thwarting the democratic process.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Yesterday the independent panel studying the Alameda-Rafferty Dam project suspended its operations in disgust and frustration over the blatant disregard by the Government of Saskatchewan for an agreement signed last January with the federal government.

The agreement was signed to comply with a Federal Court order which stated that an independent environmental assessment be conducted on this megaproject. The court indicated that if there was no panel inquiry the licence should be immediately revoked.

Now that the panel has suspended its inquiry, will the minister comply with the court order and revoke the licence today?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in answer to that question I would like to give a bit of the history. This has been a very contentious issue for quite a while.

In July I toured the site. I met with residents. I met with the premier. I met with environmental groups. I met with the governor of North Dakota. Since that time I have tried to reach or to find a reasonable situation where on one hand the interests of the review panel, Saskatchewan, the environment, and the economy could be met.

I have had numerous conversations with both the Government of Saskatchewan and members of the review panel. I must say that common ground could not be found and that led to the decision yesterday by the panel of suspending their operations until a more reasonable situation could be developed. I respect their decision. We are trying to meet the questions they have raised in their letters that I received this Tuesday.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Yesterday Premier Devine claimed that he and the federal environment minister struck a secret agreement on September 5, which dramatically changed the scope of the panel and allowed Saskatchewan to go full speed ahead on the construction.

Did the minister sign such an agreement? Does such an agreement comply with the court order?

• (1130)

Did the minister inform the panel? Why did he not inform the public? If there is such an agreement, will he table that agreement right now in the House?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague has raised five questions. The answers are no, no, no, no and no. There was no such agreement so it was not communicated to anybody. There is no secret agreement in this deal.

There is one agreement with Saskatchewan. It is an agreement that was signed between the Government of Canada and that of Saskatchewan in early 1990. That agreement is the one that is signed. It is the one that is in force at the moment. That agreement calls for a number of measures on both sides.

We expect to honour our side of the agreement. Saskatchewan should agree to honour its side of the agreement. If that compliance with the agreement is not met, I can only say that the federal government will take all possible actions to make sure that that agreement is honoured.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): My supplementary question is for the same minister, Mr. Speaker.

We have heard that answer before. We have heard that answer continuously, even from the previous minister. In the meantime, the Saskatchewan government continues with its construction.

Canadians are watching this new minister and this government very closely. They are judging what real commitment it has to the environment.

Here we have a province which continues to defy three court orders and a premier who is thumbing his nose at the laws of the land. The minister's support for this lawless behaviour by another Conservative government is undermining our institutions, in this case, the courts.

Who is in charge here? Is the minister going to allow Premier Grant Devine to violate the court order, or will he put a stop to it right now and revoke the licence?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, since this controversy came to light publicly yesterday, I immediately instructed my officials that, under the agreement and until we are satisfied that both parties are living up to it, no further payments be made to Saskatchewan.

That has been done, so that the payment for October has been suspended. The payment for November is frozen, and it is really frozen.

Also this morning I asked for further legal advice on the enforcement potential which the government has with regard to the January agreement, which I still consider to be the agreement under which we are currently operating. I want the project to have a full and complete review. I want to make sure that the interests that were protected under the court order are respected.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the same minister.

It is very clear that the Premier of Saskatchewan is flouting the federal jurisdiction. He is challenging the right of the federal government to exercise its constitutional powers to protect the environment, and the minister is not prepared to take the necessary action.

I want to ask him this. Under the International Rivers Improvement Act, the federal government clearly has the power to revoke the licence to stop the construction. Why will the minister not go forward and use the powers that are clearly his, rather than the kind of obfuscation and delay he is talking about today?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how my hon. colleague defines delay. I acted immediately, as soon as the news release was put out by the Government of Saskatchewan last night. There is no delay there.

On the other hand, I am sure that my hon. colleague would grant me the possibility of receiving legal advice on the matter before initiating any further measures. I said very clearly that further compensation payments to Saskatchewan had been frozen, that we, as a government, are extremely disturbed by this turn of events. We understand why it has come about.

Before going further, I want to consult with legal experts to know exactly the scope of the means of intervention we have in this whole case. But we are acting, and there certainly is no delay.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the delay is not taking place in Saskatchewan where the government is starting the bulldozers. It is starting to expropriate land while this government dithers.

He has clear powers under the International Rivers Improvement Act. He does not need that kind of legal advice. What we are concerned about is that the past collusion between this government and the Government of Saskatchewan will be repeated again.

Why will the minister not issue an order today under this act to revoke the licence, to stop the destruction until there is a proper environmental assessment? This is the real test of where this government is—

Mr. Speaker: The question has been put. The hon. minister.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it might be helpful if my hon. colleague opposite checked his facts. Nothing is going on than what has already been decided and for a very simple reason. The government of Saskatchewan cannot proceed with Alameda because they do not have the land.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): They are expropriating, that is what they are doing.

Mr. de Cotret: They have not even started expropriating. Not only do they not have the land, they have not started the expropriation process, and that will take quite a while. All I am suggesting is that we act reasonably, firmly, but with full legal advice. Given that this has happened over the last 12 hours, I think I should be given until the end of the day to get that legal advice before I move on it.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. The minister will know that one of the federal government's first responsibilities is to ensure that each province and each territory is treated fairly and equitably. Why in this particular instance is the Minister of the Environment allowing the Prime Minister to bail out his friend, Grant Devine, at the expense of the people of Manitoba? When will he ensure that everyone is treated equitably and fairly?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my colleague that everybody is being treated equally and equitably in each province, each territory throughout the country. Our policy is very clear. We want to do what is right for the environment, we want to do what is right for the economy. We believe that the environment and the economy can work hand in hand. We have policies designed to do that and we are implementing them.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. This decision by the Minister of the Environment appears to ignore the environmental assessment process and federal environmental policy. What is he prepared to do for the environment, aside from his million-dollar advertising campaigns? What does the minister intend to do to restore the confidence of Canadians in this government's commitment to the environment?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in the case we are talking about today, the government's position is that we want a complete environmental assessment of the project. That is what the courts ruled and that is the way I intend to go. The Government of Saskatchewan issued a press release last night, which said basically it was in favour of going ahead with the project before the assessment was done. I immediately pointed out that compensation payments to the Government of Saskatchewan for the requisite waiting period would be frozen until the committee's report was released. There will be no more payments. We will also try to talk to the parties concerned, including members of the project assessment committee and members of the Saskatchewan government, to try and reach a compromise. However, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that this project will undergo a complete assessment, as ruled by the courts.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, this week has shown clearly that the finance minister has lost the confidence of the country. Major business groups attached his policies yesterday. Important think tanks say he is wrong. Provinces representing over half the population of this country are taking him to court to try to stop the GST.

I ask the finance minister what his government is going to do to change its policies to win some confidence from people and to stop this economic decline.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the hon. member has drawn that conclusion. It says here clearly: "Mr. Thibault says our message is not directed only to Mr. Wilson. It is a problem we have as a country on a federal, local and provincial level. We are not just talking here about the federal government or the provincial government. We are talking about Canada and the Canadian people."

What these people are pointing out is that we have a national problem. It needs a national response.

• (1140)

They have gone on to say: "Mr. Wilson's performance in the area of government spending has been better than all of the provinces."

We have a major problem and the rhetoric which the hon. member uses is not helpful in dealing with the problem. What would be helpful from the hon. member is how he feels we could get the deficit down, as is the objective of these business leaders, as was the objective of the Economic Council of Canada, as was the objective of most knowledgeable and intelligent observers of the political scene.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, let me suggest that the minister is very selectively quoting from business leaders who yesterday said things such as "bankruptcies among small and mid-size companies are soaring. Business confidence has dropped to levels not seen since the 1981-82 recession".

They talked about "the damage caused by Canada's dismal fiscal policy". I want to ask the finance minister about this. He has described this slowdown as a healthy thing for the economy. Is that his only answer to the thousands of people who are being thrown out of work across this country? Is that his only answer to governments that are facing vastly increased deficits at the provincial level? Is that his only answer or is his answer cartoons in newspapers to try to prop up the GST?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should reflect back to the number of statements I have made in this House on many occasions over the last six years as Minister of Finance. I have taken great pleasure in seeing business activity strong, people having good jobs and taking advantage of the opportunities that are there.

I recognized some two years ago that we had a problem that was derived directly from the inflationary pressures that were in the economy and if we did not get those inflationary pressures under control, we were going to get back to the type of recession we had in 1981-82. I would like to avoid that.

I want to do everything I can to ensure that we get on a path of non-inflationary strong growth in the future. That requires us to go through this temporary period where we have a slowdown in the economy, so that we can get those inflationary pressures under control. As we get the inflationary pressures under control, we will be able to get interest rates down. The benefits of that will seep into every nook and cranny of the economy. That is the best thing we can do to get the economy moving again.

TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

I am speaking on behalf of thousands of Canadians who got their walking papers this week, in particular the 550 employees who were told last month that they were surplus to operational requirements of the Tridon Corporation in Burlington.

The minister will know that at the same time he is leading Canadian workers in a made-in-Canada recession, he is permitting the export of taxpayer-financed technology to the United States.

I would like to ask the minister a very specific question. Given that it was government financing that permitted the development of two new products that are going to be creating thousands of jobs in a cheaper labour market in the southern United States right now, is he prepared today to order his colleague, the Minister for Industry, Science and Technology, to put a lien on all Canadian technology and all equipment at the Tridon plant in Canada so that they cannot spirit more Canadian jobs south as a result of his fiscal, monetary and trade policies?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the situation at Tridon has been made clear to the hon. member for a number of weeks.

The company has clear obligations to the Government of Canada which they will be kept to. They have to obtain our consent to transfer any kind of technical data, inventions, methods or processes resulting from the project financing that they received from the federal government.

They also have to consult with us, if during the term of the agreement, they decide for sound business reasons not to proceed with the project or the subsequent production and marketing.

Officials of the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology are meeting with them next week. This particular company knows its obligations and we will keep it to it.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the member for Burlington said today that the company has met its obligations. Quite clearly the minister, in cahoots with his government's backbenches, is planning to allow Tridon to take those jobs to the southern United States. I am speaking on behalf of the workers in Oakville who have nobody to speak for them, as well as the workers in Burlington, Hamilton, and area.

Will the Minister put a lien on all technology so that none of the technology developed by Canadian taxpayers' money will contribute to making jobs in the southern United States at the loss of Canadian jobs?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, whether or not a lien should be put on these properties is a question for the minister to decide, but I would remind my hon. friend that she better be careful in the advice she gives. There has been a great transfer of jobs, of course, from the United States to Canada—

Some hon. members: Where?

Mr. Hockin: —we do not want them putting liens on their operations.

The hon. member asked what has happened. There have been, for example, Ford Motor Company, a $500 million investment in the last year; CAMI, $500 million investment, 2,400 jobs; GM of Canada in St. Therese, $450 million; Ford Motor Company, $64 million; Goodyear, $200 million; Freight Liner, $30 million; and Defasco in Cambridge just announced two days ago another $30 million.

There is a tremendous amount of industrial activity in Canada and the hon. member would like the Americans to put a lien on all of that to make sure that it could not move to Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and it is very simple. Many individuals and families in northern Canada order their basic groceries directly from southern Canadian suppliers. These groceries are shipped to them by air or by sealift and, of course, there are freight charges.

Will these northern families have to pay the goods and services tax on the freight cost of their groceries?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no goods and services tax on the freight cost. That is credited out of the cost of all food in any part of the country. That is particularly important to people in northern Canada. There will be no goods and services tax in the price of food after January 1, 1991, whereas today, there is federal sales tax on the transportation costs and also on other costs of food that we consume. It amounts to some one to two percentage points.

Mr. Andre: Northerners will be better off.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Of course, businesses get tax credits on the freight, but individuals do not.

I have a letter in my hand from a major Canadian air carrier that states: "The vast majority of shipments destined to northern communities usually contain a mix of various commodities, that would make it quite difficult for our front-line staff to manage should a tax waiver be implemented for specific types of cargo". They have not been instructed by the government to exempt food shipments from the goods and services tax, nor do they have the staff to isolate taxable and non-taxable commodities.

Will the minister now admit that certain Canadians, namely northern Canadians, will be taxed on their food?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be interested in receiving the information that the hon. member has read out. It sounds to me from what is said in the document that he read from that there is a misunderstanding on how the tax on the food today will be changed as a result of the GST.

The simple fact is that all federal sales tax today, whether it is on transportation, packaging, computers, cash registers, or building materials to build stores, will be backed out of the system so that under the GST there will be no tax on the cost of food. As I indicated in my earlier response, that amounts to some one to two percentage points of the cost of food. This will ensure that all food that is consumed by northerners will be removed from tax and will be cheaper.

BILL C-43

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. A survey of Canadian obstetricians and gynaecologists, the physicians who provide 95 per cent of the abortion services in Canada, showed that 59 per cent will discontinue this service if Bill C-43 becomes law.

The minister has said to the media, and in a letter to the Canadian Medical Association, that she would not proclaim the bill unless the doctors were ready. The doctors are not ready.

Will the minister keep her promise to the doctors of Canada, to the women of Canada, and will she guarantee today in the House not to proclaim this regressive, criminal legislation?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have been working very closely with the Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists of Canada to deal with the concerns that its members have expressed. I am very hopeful that that consultation will be successful in alleviating many of the doctors' concerns.

In my discussions, both with the executive of the organization and with doctors across the country—and my consultations are ongoing—I find that their concerns are based on a misunderstanding of the legislation. It is a labour-intensive process to try to get that message across and to explain how the bill works. There is a lot of misunderstanding. As I have said before, doctors are not lawyers. I have committed myself to doing that because I think it is very, very important for the doctors' well being and for the well being of the women of Canada. I will keep to my commitment that the bill will not be proclaimed until that process is complete.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I hope that what the minister means is that she will not proclaim the bill as long as doctors are in opposition to the bill. The minister has been very patronizing, thinking that she can explain the bill to doctors and to women and that they will agree that there is not a devastating effect on access for women.

Tomorrow thousands of women will be on the streets of Canada demonstrating against this bill. Will the Minister commit herself to ensure these women and doctors that the bill will not be proclaimed?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that I say about the implications of Bill C-43 that is not supported by independent experts in criminal law. I certainly accept the right of people to protest on either side of the abortion issue, as they will do tomorrow, and as it happens every day on the other side of the issue outside this building.

I would like to caution the hon. member that, in the process of people arguing their political views on this particular issue, a distortion of the implications of Bill C-43 is not, in my view, a legitimate tactic. Much of the misinformation that doctors have about Bill C-43 and how it works does not come from the Department of Justice, does not come from the Government of Canada, and does not come from people who understand it. It comes from irresponsible statements made by people in pursuing their particular policy goals.

I would like to see from the hon. member a commitment to fight the battle on fair grounds, not to distort Bill C-43, and not to create fears that are unfounded. Doctors have nothing to fear from this legislation. To create these kinds of fears is to play very high stakes politics, which I think is unconscionable for anyone on this sensitive issue.

ENERGY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The World Climate Conference in Geneva at the end of this month will undoubtedly be setting demanding goals to control global warming and particularly to bring about reductions in carbon dioxide emissions. We are told in the environment committee that one of the major areas for reducing these emissions will be alternative sources of energy and alternative fuels for the production of energy.

What initiatives for increasing and accelerating Canada's research into alternative energy sources are on the board presently, including nuclear power?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I have mentioned before in the House, the Department of Energy is working with our colleagues with respect to the Green Plan and the insertion of alternate energy fuels as part of the reduction of CO_2 and greenhouse gases.

The hon. member knows that a number of times in the House I have mentioned the research and co-operation of the government, whether with methanol as we had yesterday, for example, in front of this building, with a Clean Across Canada drive, or the work that has been done in ethanol, propane, and natural gas.

Specifically, in respect to nuclear energy, which the hon. member is probably interested in, the federal government has conveyed a proposal to the Government of New Brunswick and particularly to New Brunswick Power respecting Lepreau II and in reference to the reduction of CO_2. The nuclear option obviously has a great advantage in the reduction of CO_2.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Agriculture). Yesterday, the Minister for International Trade confirmed our worst fears when he said his government would have to play down its attempts to protect Canada's supply management of farm products at the GATT talks.

I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture why the government intends to sacrifice our quota system in this country and why it wants to sacrifice the jobs of our farmers. When is the minister going to stand up for Canadian farmers?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member can see, I am on my feet, and I will explain what we have done.

Last March, the Canadian government maintained its position that it would defend our marketing boards. However, I may remind the hon. member that during the past two or three years, people involved in the marketing board sector across the country have been consulted regularly in committee about their concerns. In fact, it is because of their concerns—they did not agree we could maintain the status quo—that we are going to submit proposals next Monday that will respond to the needs of Canadian farmers in both eastern and western Canada, so that Canadian farmers will be able to face the future with confidence. These proposals will reflect our respect for the agricultural industry in this country. I have no worries on that score.

[English]

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the part-time Minister of Agriculture—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speller: Well, Mr. Speaker, there are three or four of them.

I remind the minister of his words in the House in November. He said:

> —the position of the federal government taken by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister for International Trade at the MTN negotiations is to strengthen—Article 11—

Why then did the Minister for International Trade say last night that Canada might have to give in on supply management? Will the minister give a commitment in the House today that while in Geneva he will not sign any GATT agreement that weakens supply management and further puts Canadian farmers on the unemployment lines?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Government of Canada has been clearly stated with respect to the strengthening and clarification of Article 11 and we stand by that.

REFUGEES

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, in Ontario alone there is presently a backlog of 44,220 English-speaking refugees waiting to be processed. The Toronto office alone is facing 22,000 such cases.

Under this minister's direction the Ontario offices are dealing with only English-speaking cases, and I quote: "The non-English cases are put on the back burner."

Why has the Minister engaged in this unfair and discriminatory practice?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, it is an insult to this House to think our system is racist. Agreed, we have a lot of catching up to do as far as the actual processing is concerned. The Minister responsible for Immigration is in touch and is working with all parties concerned. I cannot agree that racist attitudes and approaches are at work here. Our approach is humanitarian. It is a case-by-case approach, and it is professional. We are trying to do the best we can.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, the Toronto office will be able to handle only 7,000 hearings over the next year. The Minister's officials are overworked. Many are forced to work overtime, weekends, and holidays.

What does the government intend to do to solve this inhumane and unacceptable situation?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I have taken note of the hon. member's question, and if it is appropriate to give the hon. member additional information, I will ask my colleague who is responsible for immigration for this information.

CANADA POST

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, this week we heard through the media of disturbing goings-on at Canada Post.

First, we heard that customers' signatures had most probably been forged in order to keep up with the claims of fast delivery despite massive contracting out and downsizing.

Then we heard through the media that the independent audit puts Canada Post in a most favourable light and shows only part of the picture, because Canada Post can withhold what can make it look bad.

I can substantiate that with documents. My question very clearly and very simply is this. Will the minister responsible for Canada Post ensure that he will launch a special inquiry and ensure the immunity of reprisals to any person who would want to testify? Will he also ensure that all of the audit reports are made public so that Canadians can get a real picture of what is going on at Canada Post?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure why the hon. member would cast aspersions on this national and, indeed, international auditing firm.

The Auditor General is also an auditor of the Canada Post Corporation. If he has any complaints, he should take them to the Auditor General.

Mr. Speaker: I have a point of order from the hon. leader of the government. There is also a question of privilege. I wonder if the member for Calgary West would stand down for just a moment while we deal with the point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to designate next Monday as an allotted day, and indicate that discussions are going on with the opposition parties with respect to Motion No. 16 having to do with the Iraq situation to see if appropriate accommodations could be made to pursue that motion at the earliest opportunity, hopefully on Tuesday.

PRIVILEGE

HOUSE LEADER OF THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of sadness really more than anything else that I rise in the House today.

Mr. Milliken: Crocodile tears.

Mr. Hawkes: Somebody said crocodile tears. They are not crocodile tears.

I spent close to 11 years of my life in intense activity related to this Chamber. I respect the Chamber, and I think all Canadians should respect the Chamber. They should respect the nature of what it is that we do in this Chamber, in committees and in the other proceedings of this Chamber.

Today I rise, and I have given you notice, because I feel compelled on the basis of information available and given to me this morning for the most part as to what the House leader of the New Democratic Party as a special officer of this House is saying within his riding and to the national press about the operations and conclusions of a committee of this House which has been struggling with a very difficult problem for some time.

I find the behaviour of the NDP House leader on this occasion to be consistent with two or three other occasions in recent history, which I found very disturbing for the continued effectiveness of this place.

Mr. Marchi: Touchy, aren't we?

Mr. Hawkes: Let's see.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the member of whom the government Whip is talking clearly is not in the House today.

I think the member speaking knew that. It is not appropriate to cast those sorts of aspersions when the member who is being criticized is not here.

In any case, I think the member for Kamloops was well within his rights to inform Canadians about what was taking place. I know it is a difficult issue, but we are quite clear on our position on it. We do not think MPs should be treated—

Mr. Speaker: We are not into argument yet.

The hon. member has risen on behalf of the New Democratic Party, pointing out that the hon. member for Kamloops is not here today. I have to hear enough of this to find out the basis of the complaint. The hon. member for Calgary West might assist the Chair.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I will, and I will try to be as brief as I can.

This is the first time in 11 years that I rose to complain or to suggest that a question of privilege was involved in the relationship to the behaviour of another member where I have not notified the member and where I have not asked the Speaker to delay until the member was present. I think that is the nature of the place.

For this particular member, no notice was given to the rest of us on any of the occasions which bother me. What the member has been doing the last 48 hours is talking to the media in his riding and other places about a committee report which has not yet been presented to the House, which has not yet been reprinted and for which the transcripts are not yet available. He says things that are simply not true.

There is a reference in one article and I have it in front of me. It is an article that came out of the paper yesterday about the government having a majority on the committee. The government does not.

An hon. member: Shocking news.

Mr. Hawkes: Shocking news says the NDP. People who are not supporters of the government represent four votes on the committee and supporters of the government represent three.

In terms of the voting pattern which was evident in the committee on Wednesday, there are a great many things I would like to be in a position to tell the House, and I suggest people might want to read the transcript about the difficulty the committee has been having over a period of time.

In his riding, the New Democratic House leader said he was not surprised that the Bloc Quebecois voted with the Tories, noting most of the MPs currently under investigation by the RCMP—

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt. The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway on a point of order.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is clearly entering into debate on this question of a particular decision that was made by a committee. It is a matter which is very much on the public record.

I would ask that the Speaker urge the hon. member to come to his alleged point of order very quickly or engage in debate and try to defend this indefensible policy which he in his party, and one independent, a former Conservative member of Parliament, are attempting to foist on the Canadian people.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, surely it must be a principle on all members in this House but in particular, people who hold special responsibilities in this House, that they cannot say outside the Chamber things that they would not be allowed to say inside the Chamber. That is point number one. The member is shaking his head. He thinks outside the Chamber one should be able to cast aspersions on the conduct—

Mr. Speaker: It may well be that it is going to be necessary for me to hear considerable debate on this. It probably will be necessary to hear further debate when the hon. member for Kamloops returns.

I wonder if the hon. member could put succinctly the point of privilege.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, in this particular article today from The Kamloops Daily News, the member says things about the motivation of members who cast a ballot in committee of this House on Wednesday. It says: "Riis said he wasn't surprised that the Bloc Quebecois voted with the Tories, noting most of the MPs currently under investigation by the RCMP are from Quebec."

In terms of the Tory votes, he said: "Now the Tories want one law for MPs—"

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. This is a point of privilege.

The hon. member, who is a very experienced member, feels very strongly about this, and I can understand that. Nonetheless, I need some assistance from the hon. member as to what the point of privilege is. He may or may not have said all kinds of things. Where has the hon. member's ability to carry on his duties as a member of the House of Commons been infringed by anything that somebody else has done? That is what I need to know.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I direct you to Maingot, page 192. He says: "Any action by anybody" is the implication, "which obstructs or impedes either House in the performance of its functions or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of the House and the discharge of his duty may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent."

• (1210)

The member for Kamloops is talking about a committee report. It is a special committee of this House formed to look at the Parliament of Canada Act to see whether or not the institution would be well served by a set of amendments. That committee reported in May of this year to this House with a unanimous report, New Democratic members included, with proposed amendments to the act.

In subsequent discussions, some of those were watered down and the bill was brought forward to the House for second reading and referred to committee. It was a decision of the Board of Internal Economy, subsequently approved by the House leaders, that the committee be formed. It was a decision to use officers of the House, the Whips of the three parties as members of that committee.

For the member for Kamloops to be out and about inpugning the motivation of the members of this committee, the officers of the House, is a dastardly deed. When you give an interview that leads to a headline "Riis outraged by despicable bill," that "it is outrageous, it is disgusting, it is despicable," when in fact that is a committee report of the House, Mr. Speaker, the conduct that is outrageous, despicable and disgusting is the conduct of the House leader of the New Democratic Party. It is not the seven members of the committee.

I am quite prepared to read other pieces of this member's press into the public record from the CFJC–CIFM news in Kamloops. He says: "This bill would set them apart from regular citizens, would require the RCMP to seek permission before an investigation of an MP could occur". That is absolute bloody nonsense. That is not what the piece of legislation is intended to do or does do. It does not restrict the RCMP in any way, shape or form from—

Mr. Speaker: I am having difficulty with this. If the hon. member for Kamloops said these things or did not say them, how does it affect the hon. member's ability to carry on his duties as a member of Parliament? I accept the quote that the hon. member has given to me on the question of privilege. I accept it. I think it is good law. But I am having some difficulty in determining how what the hon. member has said is necessarily a contempt of the House or infringes on the privileges of the hon. member.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to participate at a variety of levels in arranging the affairs of this House. One of the new responsibilities that came to me as a Whip, and has come successively to two different members of the Official Opposition during my time, is to sit on the Board of Internal Economy. I was asked, because of my role as a Whip, to serve this House on this special committee.

A fellow officer who sits on similar bodies is out there in public making comments like this about the motivation of the members, of the other officers of the House. I have watched the member for Kamloops. I have been present when we reached a collective decision about protests on Parliament Hill and that member immediately with the press abandoned the decision he was a part of—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Windsor—Lake St. Clair on a point of order.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, it must be clear that the member has not responded to your request for a clear statement of what his question of privilege is, nor is there any indication that he intends to respond to you, Sir. In order to continue the business of this House, I plead that this be brought to an end right now.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Right from the beginning, Mr. Speaker, I have been an assiduous member of that special committee of the House. I would ask the Chair to defer the debate so as to allow the hon. member for Kamloops to return to the House and provide an explanation. Mr. Speaker, I too am a little mad at him because I was the one who first suggested that clause 52.8 be removed or eliminated from the bill. There were no comments made after that. I took that initiative aimed at doing away with clause 52.8 which the member for Kamloops does not like. Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to debate the issue in the House in a democratic manner, but I would want the hon. member for Kamloops to be present when we do that.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I am having difficulty with this. The hon. member for Calgary West has raised a matter and has considerable argument to give. He has already made some argument. It may or may not be, on the basis of what he has revealed to the House or what he has stated to the House and what he may state, that there is a question of privilege. I do not see it yet, but it may very well be there.

However, I am wondering if the hon. member for Calgary West would agree to adjourn this matter to Monday, when the hon. member for Kamloops returns. At that point I would be very pleased to let the hon. member for Calgary West continue with his point.

There is a very firm tradition in this House along that line. A question of privilege of course belongs to the member and I would have to ask his indulgence in this. I point out that on a number of occasions when similar situations have arisen, certainly when members of the opposition have been raising a question of privilege with respect to one of the ministers, I have always suggested that it be put over, after perhaps some introductory remarks, until the minister could be in the Chamber, and that has always met with the approval of the House. It is not a rule of the House, but it is a courtesy. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has expressed that point of view, as has the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing. I would ask the hon. member for Calgary West if it might not be appropriate—the hon. member has put certainly some of the basis of his concern to the House—to adjourn it until Monday, when we could continue.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, you said "Monday" but I would assume you mean until the member returns. That is what would make sense.

Mr. Speaker: I stand corrected. I was assuming something perhaps I do not know.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulty with the notion that the matter cannot be adequately determined until the member is present in the House and has a chance to respond. I think that would have been my preference from the beginning. That is the way the place should operate. But the difficulty for us as House officers charged with very difficult responsibilities from time to time is that when another House officer holds all of us in this kind of contempt, we cannot sit around—

Mr. Speaker: I wish the hon. member would consider the point that I am making. I am trying very hard not to decide, perhaps too early in the game, whether or not there is a question of privilege, but I am being forced rapidly into making that decision.

There is something basically unfair about an attack on one member, no matter how appropriate within the rules that attack is, in this Chamber on a question of privilege when the other member is not here. It may be that the other member has done all kinds of terrible things, but it is fundamental to justice that the accused should be able to face the accuser.

The hon. member has certainly put enough forward so that there is a pretty good idea of what the complaint is. Whether or not it is a question of privilege, I do not want to be forced into deciding at this moment. I ask the hon. member for Calgary West, on the basis of our tradition in this place, would it not be appropriate to put this matter over until the hon. member for Kamloops returns? The hon. member has laid at least a base for his argument, but it does not seem to me fair to continue going after another member when the other member is not in the Chamber.

• (1220)

What the other member did outside the House may or may not be a contempt. The further outside the House it is, the harder it is to fit it within privilege.

I understand perfectly well that the hon. member for Calgary West has a grievance which may turn out to be a breach of privilege or a contempt of the House. It seems to me that, given the issue, it would be proper to put this matter over until the hon. member for Kamloops can return.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, your logic as usual is impeccable. Your grace is impeccable. The principle is that we should be able to face our accuser. The difficulty is the accusations about the Quebec caucus, about myself, about members of the committee—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hawkes: —have been made when we were not present. I go along with you, Mr. Speaker, 100 per cent, but I want the record to show that on behalf of my colleagues on the committee—and I believe even the New Democratic members, but I cannot speak for them—we deny completely the accusations made by the NDP House leader as to our motivation or the consequences of our actions.

We would appreciate it if as a senior officer of this Chamber he has accusations of that kind to make about the Quebec members, members of the Tory government, about officers of the House, about committee members, that he make—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: There is a fundamental issue here. I have not heard all of the interventions in this, and I will not be able to hear them all until the hon. member for Kamloops returns.

Apart from what my concern may eventually be about what the hon. member for Kamloops did or did not do, my concern at the moment is that to have a debate like this going on when the person who is accused is not here just runs contrary to fundamental justice in our system.

I am asking the hon. member for Calgary West who complimented the Speaker on his immaculate logic, if he would agree with the Speaker to adjourn it until the hon. member for Kamloops comes back. The hon. member has certainly made a point, a sufficient point perhaps to last for several days, but it does not seem appropriate to continue in the absence of the person who is the subject matter of the complaint.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, just on a point of information and interest, my office has been trying to get some copies of the articles which the member has been reading from The Kamloops Daily News. The reading room tells us we cannot get those.

I just wondered if he could make them available to some of us during the course of the day.

Mr. Speaker: I hope very much that another issue does not get in the way of the hon. member for Calgary West who I know has a very serious point. I am wondering if at this point the hon. member for Calgary West would agree to put the matter over.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I would be quite happy to do that. To answer my colleague from across the way, I would be happy to give the pages copies of this and ask them to make them available to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to say to the acting House leader of the New Democratic Party that this is a serious matter that has been raised. I know that he will communicate with the hon. member for Kamloops. I would like him to get back to me as soon as possible to give me some indication as to when this matter can be proceeded with.

I want to thank the hon. member for Calgary West. I know he feels very strongly about this, but I want to thank him for his courtesy.

An hon. member: The logic was impeccable but certainly not dependable.

Mr. Speaker: A very great friend of mine over there is being very rude to me.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I say to our distinguished guests that this may seem a little late in the day, but it takes nothing away from our sincerity.

I wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the ladies' gallery of the Heads of Delegation to the Third Meeting of Commonwealth Ministers Responsible for Women's Affairs.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Gerry Weiner (for the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-87, an act to amend the statute law in relation to war veterans.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

AUTOMOTIVE POLLUTION REDUCTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-333, an act to reduce automotive pollution.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides the means to reduce automotive pollution by requiring that automotive gasoline contains at least 3.2 per cent oxygen.

This content will cause a dramatic reduction in carbon monoxide emissions and will also eliminate the use of the additive MMT which is currently replacing lead in gasoline. MMT is itself a pollutant that is not even allowed in the United States but is being used in Canada.

The 3.2 per cent oxygen content can be achieved through the use of 10 per cent ethanol added to the gasoline. This bill is not only environmentally friendly but will also provide a market for millions of tonnes of grain that are currently backed up on farms and elevators across this nation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-334, an act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is an act to amend the Human Rights Act. Incorporated in it is a series of amendments recommended by the Canadian Human Rights Commission in its 1989 annual report to Parliament.

The recommendations for change in the report have been embodied in statutory language as far as possible. There are two recommendations that are not in this bill that may be dealt with later. I thought the House might be interested in dealing expeditiously to incorporate the changes recommended by the Human Rights Commissioner in his report.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-335, an act to amend the Canadian Elections Act and other acts in relation thereto.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a little larger than usual. It is a 164-page bill and is a redraft of Bill C-79 which died on the Order Paper at the end of the last Parliament, with a few changes to try to make it more palatable to all hon. members.

• (1230)

I hope that this bill can be considered by the House on an expeditious basis so that we can effect changes to the Canada Elections Act before the next election comes around. I am aware that there is a royal commission investigating the Canada elections law. Because its report is not expected until September 1991, I am not optimistic that the changes it may recommend will be in effect before the next election.

I believe it is imperative that we change the law and make it effective before that time. Accordingly, I have prepared this bill. It is a substantial bill and I hope it will find favour with all members when it gets to committee where it could be amended to suit the wishes of all members of this House. I commit it to the House.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by 80 Canadians who object to the intent of the government to increase minimum import levels of poultry and poultry products as now being discussed at GATT and any proposals of tarrification of a supply managed product.

These citizens avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will provide a remedy.

Mr. Speaker, these persons are from Brussels, Ontario, Drayton, Trenton, Paris, Middlesex County, Waterloo, and a lot of other communities. It shows the fear and trepidation that is being caused among the producers by government actions in GATT and particularly the statement by the Minister for International Trade yesterday, which was carried in the local newspaper.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a number of petitions involving people from across Canada, including the province of Manitoba, seeking the elimination of the goods and services tax on books and other reading materials.

The petitioners point out that there has never been a tax in this country on books and reading materials. They also accentuate the importance of reading and related activities as a cornerstone of democracy and of our economic, social and cultural development.

The petitioners ask that there be zero tax on books, and that perhaps the tax be eliminated totally.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present these petitions on the proposed goods and services tax.

Your petitioners strongly denounce this new tax on goods and services, for it is tantamount to an unprecedented assault against Canadian taxpayers. Not only will it force them to pay more taxes, but it will also confront them with rising inflation, interest rates and unemployment levels. They urge us to reject this new tax on goods and services.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present petitions on behalf of many Canadians. They object to the proposed goods and services tax on reading material, books and magazines. This has not been done before.

The petitioners feel very strongly that this will be a penalty on those, whether young or old, who wish to increase their knowledge. It will cost them more to do so. We have not done it in the past, and I ask on behalf of these people that the government reconsider if it is still bound and bent to have this unfair tax anyway.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Valcourt that Bill C-74, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in this debate on amendments to the Fisheries Act, Bill C-74, and to join my colleagues from Burin—St. George's and Cape Breton—East Richmond in supporting the broad thrust of this legislation, which is to increase the fines and penalties for violations of the Fisheries Act and related offences.

In addition, we also have mentioned that we have certain reservations concerning the bill and with the policies of the government. Amendments need to be put in place to accompany the bill and I will speak to those a little later. Before I do, I would like to begin with a digression.

It would be remiss of me as the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, a riding that experienced in December of last year the loss of one of its major fish plants. I initiated an emergency debate to address the serious crisis in the Atlantic fishery which was manifested no less dramatically than by the situation facing the people of the town of Canso when their fish plant closed. I wish to acknowledge favourably the work that has been done over the summer by the minister of fisheries and by the department of fisheries in seeking a solution to that very difficult situation facing the people of Canso and the people of Burgeo who are part of the solution worked out by the minister of fisheries in conjunction with participants from industry.

The plan known as the Seafreez deal which creates this new corporation operating out of Burgeo and Canso will involve a rather complicated arrangement of bartering and exchange of fish between Canada and the Soviet Union. The transfer of quota is a complicated and controversial arrangement and there has been some concern within the industry about various aspects of this deal.

I realize that the jury is still out as to whether or not the minister violated certain customary practices in arriving at this arrangement, and also whether or not he consulted widely enough before putting the deal together. We do not know whether in fact the arrangement is going to work. I certainly hope it does.

The promise has been made to secure the employment of some 500 plant workers in Canso for the indefinite future. It is essential that these be year-round jobs to ensure that the trawler fleet of Canso and Burgeo continues to fish. I cannot be blind to that effort and certainly want to support and encourage the successful resolution of that arrangement if it produces the promised results, which I hope it does.

This is an opportunity for me to say in this House that I am certainly supportive of the Seafreez deal, to the extent that it produces employment in a community that is vitally dependent on this industry. I will be participating in and evaluating very closely the broader policy aspects which are associated with the putting together of this deal. I am very familiar with the controversy that surrounds it and expect that the minister of fisheries will be sensitive to the broader industry implications of this deal. However, we will be able to debate that at some further point.

That is by means of a digression but I believe an important one, since I happen to represent the community of Canso which has been such a symbol of the crisis facing the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada over the last year.

I will now return to the debate. As I said earlier, Bill C–74 stiffens the fines to fishing companies, fishermen, and other persons who violate various aspects of the Fisheries Act. It provides for a dramatic increase in fines for general fisheries offences, for overfishing, for discarding of fish at sea, for obstructing fisheries officers in the performance of their duties and for harassing them when they are trying to administer the Fisheries Act, and for other offences that are fisheries related.

We in the Liberal Party cannot but support those fines. The fines that were already in place in the Fisheries Act were laughable. They were no deterrents at all, particularly to the large companies that were really able to pay those fines, as the minister has said, as a cost of doing business. So clearly, the increase in fines was drastically overdue. I guess our main objection to this bill and to the measures which are in it is why has it not been introduced earlier?

We have other problems with the legislation. First of all, as was mentioned very eloquently by my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond this morning, there is more to administering and to enforcing the Fisheries Act and preventing overfishing and pollution in our coastal waters than simply increasing the level of fines that fishing vessels, companies, and other interests, must pay. We have to increase the policing and surveillance of our coastal waters to ensure that those fines can actually be levied.

Unfortunately this has just not accompanied the legislation to a sufficient degree to enable, we believe, those much more realistic penalties to be enforced. And that is essential, if we are going to get under control the kinds of overfishing and discarding at sea which we have heard about over the last years. We have discussed this deepening fishing crisis and it has been reported to us through various task forces as being one of the fundamental problems underlying a severe resource crisis in many parts of Atlantic Canada today.

Mr. Speaker, we can increase the levels of fines, we can increase the protection provided fisheries officers but we have to put into place measures to increase surveillance, enforcement, and policing, so that the penalties will actually stick and so that they will actually be a deterrent to those who would commit fisheries violations. That is the first point, and it has been made by others. I want to add to it by emphasizing that concern.

The other aspect of this legislation which I do not think has been mentioned, at least in the debate on second reading that I have read so far, is with respect to the particular concerns associated with the violations of fish habitat, pollution and destruction of the fish habitat.

The fines that have been imposed in this legislation for violations of fish habitat, and I will quote here from the information package which accompanies the bill, involve raising the fines from initially $5,000 on summary conviction to $300,000 on summary conviction, and from $10,000 for second and subsequent offences, to up to $1 million on indictment. There are court options of up to six months imprisonment or up to three years on indictment.

The same goes for pollution of fisheries habitat, the deposit of deleterious substances by individuals who pollute the fisheries habitat. Again, those fines have been dramatically increased. That, again, is overdue and very much necessary.

However, when the minister was describing this particular aspect of violations he was focusing on the problem of individuals or private companies for example who, in the process of building a bridge over a river or a brook, pollute that river or brook or the harbour near there. Another example would be the companies which build a facility close to a coastline or a river, thereby polluting that body of water and, in the process, destroying the fish resource. That practice has to be stopped. It requires stringent legislation to prevent that from occurring and also it should be backed up by strong enforcement mechanisms. It is also consistent with the new concern that we have for the environment, in particular our coastal waters and coastal environment.

However, there is something missing in this particular aspect of fisheries habitat control and management. It is the point that I would like to bring to this debate on Bill C–74. The Minister of Fisheries, when speaking on second reading in June, referred to the government's Green Plan proposals and told the House that this legislation fitted into the government's proposals with respect to the environment. He said it was a way of strengthening such laws as the coastal waters protection and the environmental protection legislation and a way of increasing the enforcement of our environmental legislation and I agree that that needs to be done.

However, there are other aspects of the pollution of fisheries habitat which have been ignored in this legislation and I suggest are not readily dealt with by simply increasing the fines to polluters. I refer to a problem which is in my constituency and a problem which has lasted for a long time.

• (1250)

In the Bras d'Or Lakes in Cape Breton, which is in my constituency, we have an oyster resource located near the community of Whycocomagh. For many years, Whycocomagh has not had a proper sewer and water system. It has not had the wherewithal to finance that sewer and water system because of the lack of a municipal tax base.

The persistent neglect of providing a mechanism for that community to install a sewer and water system, which would control and treat the sewage that now ends up in the Bras d'Or Lakes and in the bay near Whycocomagh, results in the contamination of the oyster population. Essentially, a local industry that could have employed many people in the surrounding areas at least for part of the year has been destroyed. That industry, in effect, has been decimated around the community of Whycocomagh. It has been one of the casualties of the lack of action, despite repeated requests by myself and others, to assist and support the creation of a municipal sewer and water system in that community.

There are other areas in my own constituency such as coastal waters, small harbours, and river mounts where communities are still polluting those enclosed bodies of water and adding to a pollution problem which they are powerless to control. They would not be able to stop what they are doing if they were fined $1 million or $500,000, short of packing up and leaving the community. That solution requires support and not punishment by the government.

In the months ahead the government is going to be introducing measures and legislation to deal with various problems concerning the environment. I suggest that support for municipal infrastructure is one area in which assistance by the federal government is urgently needed for environmental reasons and for the reasons I have just mentioned. It is something that we in the Liberal Party have advocated for several years and we continue to advocate. We hope the government will see fit to adopt that as a way of dealing with one source of coastal pollution which is not readily addressed by simply imposing stricter fines, notwithstanding the fact that stricter fines are essential given the nominal levels of penalties which had existed in the Fisheries Act before.

I wanted to make that point related to the legislation. I admit that it will not necessarily find its way directly into the Fisheries Act. but the government should not pat itself on the back by saying: "Look, we have increased the fines for people polluting our coastal waters and we have increased the fines for people spoiling our fish habitat. We have done our job." It has not done its job. That is only one part of the solution.

Another part of the solution is to provide support so that municipal governments and local communities can have the wherewithal to clean up their own back yards. This will allow commercial and recreational fishermen to have a resource to exploit that has not been allowed to be contaminated by years of pollution and untreated sewage. That is only one dimension of that particular problem. I submit that it is a serious one. It is one that should not be overlooked. I believe it is related to the measures that are in the Fisheries Act amendments. It is a subject that needs to be given more serious weight by the government.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I probably will focus more on comments than on questions.

I want to address a couple of things that the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond mentioned earlier and was not given an opportunity to respond to, despite his great admonitions that I should.

First, I refer to what my friend from Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso has said. The moving ahead of this legislation has come after considerable consultation with a great number of groups. I will just mention a few groups that DFO officials talked to: all provinces and territories, as well as a variety of advisory groups to the minister, including ARC, PARC and the Atlantic Council of Fisheries Ministers, in particular. They have supported that.

This legislation is being brought forward because of the determination of the current Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, and of his predecessor, both of whom feel very strongly that one of the important ways to address some of the inequities, not only in the legislation, but in the application of the law, is to impose higher fines and to bring in new sources of information.

Both of my colleagues has asked: What is the point of having new legislation if it cannot be enforced? Under the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program, there has been $52 million over five years in addition provided for surveillance and enforcement. Offshore patrols have been increased. Inshore patrols across the Atlantic will be increased. There will be more intensive use of DFO vessels for patrolling and enforcing the law. There is more money for increased armed boarding, a practice that I do not particularly like but sometimes is necessary, and increased funds for prosecution. Of course, I need not mention the agreement that we reached with the Americans that will hopefully ensure that people cannot come and go across borders unprotected.

Another thing that has been protected is the fact that there is no minimum fine. My colleague across the way referred to the level of fines. First, I should point out that the level of penalty is consistent. The Canadian Environmental Protection Act, the Hazardous Products Act, the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act, the National Parks Act, the Railway Safety Act and the Canadian Agricultural Products Act all have no minimum fine. It allows leeway for the courts.

Do not forget, with triple, and in some cases five times, the amount of fine, a clear message is being sent to the judiciary that we are very serious and the the judiciary is forced to respond to that.

In terms of inshore versus offshore, very clearly this act allows penalties to be applied in all ways. There is a perception, and I understand it, that we are applying it purely to the inshore. I should point out, though, that as we increase the observer coverage on the offshore vessels, as we work more and more to avoid discards, culling and highgrading, we will see more and more charges laid in the offshore than ever in the inshore.

Then, the question comes: How is there corporate accountability and responsibility? This act ensures that it is not just the person aboard ship who ends up in court. Licence holders can be held liable for offences. Under the new act, officers and directors of corporations can be held accountable, which is a substantial change and an important change.

There is more to come, but I wanted to take this opportunity to comment on the remarks of both my friends from Cape Breton. I appreciate their support. Sometimes I wonder if that support is consistently there. One member says that the opposition is all for it and that it is gung ho, and another seems to be a little less sure. I hope we can depend on the support of the Liberal Party of Canada for this legislation at this time.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I say to my friend across the way that he can always depend on our support of legislation which we say we will support, just as he can always depend on our opposition to legislation which we oppose, sometimes quite vigorously.

To clarify what we said earlier, I might say that our support for this legislation is qualified. We, of course, advocate higher fines, stiffer penalties for fisheries violations. We have said that they have been long overdue. We are concerned that the means of enforcing those stiffer fines are not in place. We will be looking to see if the government is really committed to prosecuting and enforcing the higher fines and penalties that it has put in place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there any further questions or comments? The hon. member for Cardigan on a question or comment.

Mr. MacAulay: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank and congratulate my colleague for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso. It is certainly obvious that he understands the problem in the fishing industry.

I think my problem with Bill C-74 is what it does not contain. We have problems in Gaspereaux, Georgetown and Savage Harbour. For example, in Savage Harbour we needed a small amount of funding for the black wall or the breakwater in that area and the funding did not come. It has now been two years. With ice and a couple of winters, it is just about destroyed. If we do not get some funding for things like this, the sand will move in and we will need more dredging. Of course, dredging again is a major problem. Dredging needs to be on an ongoing basis. The bill just does not seem to answer the questions for the fishermen in the Cardigan riding.

With regard to lobster, which is one of our main fisheries, fishermen are asked to go out and fish for $1.25 a pound. Well, for a delicacy, it is impossible to survive at $1.25 a pound. The problem that we have is that Bill C–74 does not address the problems for our fishery in Cardigan and Prince Edward Island.

I would like to ask my hon. colleague how he feels the barter and the catches affect plant closures, and were the catches fairly allotted to the plants?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): I thank my hon. colleague for his question. I agree with him that there is much that has been excluded from this piece of legislation. We will be looking from the government for constructive action on small craft harbour improvements. He listed some needed improvements in his area. I have similar improvements that are required in my area as well, including dredging, breakwater and wharf repairs.

As far as the bartering of fish, this is a very complex area in which I would not want to get into with the small amount of time that is available.

With respect to the Seafreez deal, there are a lot of questions which need to be asked from a policy point of view as to the legitimacy of the actions of the government. It will have to be looked at over a period of time as to what are the underlying principles of bartering of fish and probably setting up some rules that are agreeable to everybody about whether or not this practice—whatever it is, because we are not sure exactly what is taking place—can be regulated or allowed to continue in a fair and equitable manner.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, it gives me an honour and a pleasure to speak today on Bill C–74. First of all, I was listening to my colleague for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso and some of the questions and comments that were made at the end of his speech. I was also listening to the comments made by the member for St. John's East. He was sort of questioning whether the Liberal Party would be supporting Bill C–74.

I say to the hon. member that the Liberal Party has always had a habit of supporting bills that are good for Canadians in general, but more so for the common person, such as fishermen. Bill C–74 has my support and will have my support when it comes time for the vote. It does not solve all the problems in the fishery. We know, and you know, Mr. Speaker, that over the last year or so the fisheries have been in a state of crisis. The right hon. Prime Minister did not seem to realize that at one point in time. I think he has come back to reality and has finally realized that there are problems in the fisheries, not only in Atlantic Canada but also on the west coast. I was very surprised that we did not hear any mention today from our colleagues who sit a little farther down from me, but there are problems on the west coast as well, and some very serious problems. I was hoping to hear from them as well.

We know there are problems in Atlantic Canada. We have heard the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso many times in this House try to point out some of the problems that exist in Atlantic Canada. Let me tell you that he is doing a wonderful job for his riding and deserves a lot of credit.

The reason we support Bill C–74 in general is that it increases the penalties and fines for persons who break the Fisheries Act. I should clarify the position of our party, and I am sure the position of everyone in this House. Hon. members here feel that fishermen are basically honest and hard working individuals. There are a few out there with whom there are problems. No doubt about it. Some are foreigners. Some of them are our own. But there are a few, a very few. I would have to say 99.9 per cent of fishermen are honest, hard working people who are there to try and have gainful employment, to support their families, to support ultimately their country. Not being on the social assistance payroll is a benefit in itself to our country.

The bill tabled on June 6, 1990, will bring about higher fines and penalties through the Fisheries Act. There will be higher fines and penalties for general offences, up to $100,000 on summary conviction and up to $500,000 on indictment. That same type of penalty will be for the obstruction of fisheries officers. We know that has been a problem previously.

We will also see increased fines and penalties in relation to the pollution of fish habitat. We know that has been a problem, not only the throwing overboard of excess fish or dying fish, but oil leakage and things of that nature. That will also be included in the act. That is one of the reasons why we support such an act. It will penalize those who are not responsible enough to see what their actions are doing to the fisheries environment. It will also provide penalties and fines to anyone who fails to provide habitat information. It will require fishermen and processors to keep more detailed records.

This is an area where the bill could be improved. It might be a little difficult at this stage to judge the effect of this part of it on fishermen. It may become a little more complicated and a little too bureaucratic. Maybe that is something that should be looked at by the government.

I am glad to see that the government has looked at the Harris report and the Hache report. I am glad to see that those reports, in their wisdom, also suggested increased penalties and fines. In this case, we are glad to see that the government is listening, once and for all, to certain recommendations that will help the fisheries. We are very pleased with that.

No doubt, as an opposition member, there are always a few things that we are not pleased with. We always say the government does not go far enough. We feel that there are not enough resources put in to enforcing these new regulations and fines. I have some doubts as to how we are going to handle the Americans. I know there is a new agreement and it looks promising, but if we look at past actions of our government and foreigners fishing in what we claim to be our waters, we see that we tend to be very tough on foreign vessels, as long as they do not come from the United States. I am sure the government will treat all of these foreigners who are overfishing or breaking some of these regulations adequately and in the same way.

Also, it should be pointed out that many of the provisions and resources are going toward the inshore sector. I think there should be more effort put in the offshore sector as well. I am sure the government is aware of that. I am sure the government realizes it has problems financially. It has a major problem. It has created a Canadian recession, so to speak. We have seen examples of that this week by the experts. It is going to have to get its act together on its economic plan as soon as possible. Once that is in place, hopefully it will see fit to provide more resources to the offshore sector as well and add to the inshore.

The hon. member for St. John's East mentioned the consultations that took place in the fishing industry. I am led to believe that there was not as much consultation with fishermen's associations. Yes, other groups were consulted, and I know some of the fishing associations were, but maybe there should be more consultation in regard to the final form of the legislation. I know it is not always possible, but I think it is important that the fishermen feel that this is their bill as well as the government's and that it will help the fishing industry.

Another aspect of the bill that should be questioned is the bookkeeping. I mentioned that earlier. Are we going to force fishermen to become bookkeepers and are we going to force fishermen to hire other people? As we know, with the situation as it exists in the fishing industry, a lot of them are family operations and it is very difficult for them to keep that type of information in some cases.

It was mentioned earlier that one of the other major problems, and I think it is a problem with Bill C-74, is what the bill does not contain. We have many problems in the fishing industry. One of them is a problem that is going to be addressed with this bill, we hope. We hope it will solve that problem, but there are other problems. The concern of many fishermen at this time is the absence of the government introducing a variable entrance requirement bill. I know when I mention this people get a little upset and some people who are very partisan tend to blame the Senate for holding back Bill C-21.

Yes, Bill C-21 is still in the Senate being analysed. Since 1977, the governments of the day, Conservative and Liberal, introduced a short bill every year for variable entrance requirements and it passed very quickly. That is what should have been done while Bill C-21 was being studied in the Senate, to prevent damage to workers who are unemployed, especially fishermen at this stage of the game. We know that the fishing industry has been hurt quite severely.

In defence of the Senate, I must say that—

[Translation]

To give credit where credit is due, Mr. Speaker, the senators tried to remedy this situation and restore the variable entrance requirement when they sent Bill S-12 to the House of Commons on December 19, 1989. This year in June, Liberal members in this House tried once again to deal with the problems facing Canadian workers by tabling a motion from the Senate and the House of Commons that would restore the variable entrance requirement. The motion was rejected by the government.

[English]

As I was saying, we tried to introduce those motions to lower the entrance requirements, especially in the rural areas. In my area of Restigouche—Chaleur the unemployment rate hovers around 17 per cent. The entrance requirements for unemployment insurance are now at 14 per cent, the same as Toronto, Vancouver, and all over Canada. If the Conservative government had passed the variable entrance requirement law as every other government had done since 1977, the variable entrance requirement to get unemployment insurance in my riding would have been at 10 per cent. It is not necessarily the senators' fault, because every other government has passed that.

There are other problems. This government has many problems. When we look at the government's monetary policy, we find that it has affected the fishing communities in Atlantic Canada and not only the fishing communities because the fishing communities have a spin-off effect. They supply the rest of the economy. The city of Halifax has concern about the fishing problems as well, because where do fishermen buy their supplies, where do they go shopping? Obviously that is going to have an effect.

I spoke the other day about the monetary policy of this government. I talked about the high interest rates, the high dollar, the cuts in regional development, the GST and the effect it will have on Atlantic Canada and on rural Canada. Actually the economy is in a mess. This government has lost credibility because this was the government that was supposed to solve the economic problems of Canada. As we have seen this week, many associations, many groups, and economic think-tanks have suggested that it is out of control. We know who to blame for that.

In conclusion, I would like to come back to the bill at hand. I am sorry that I digressed a bit, but I could not help it. We have to get a little partisan now and then. I could not help it. To come back to the bill at hand, Bill C-74, I must say that the government is moving in the right direction. It remains to be seen, though, whether this is the right solution for the problem. We do not know whether it is going to work. We will see if there are enough resources committed to enforce the regulations. I hope there are.

The hon. member for St. John's East seems to imply that there will be resources there. I am glad to hear that. I would like to say that we are moving in the right direction and hopefully some of these problems will be solved in the very near future.

I am very surprised that this government took so long to react. We have had problems over the last year or so in Atlantic Canada. I am surprised that the government did not react quicker. I am disappointed that there is no plan in place for some of these other problems. I would urge the minister responsible, who happens to be from my home province, to get on with the job. We want action, less talk and more action.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a comment. I take quite well a couple of the suggestions which have been made by my friend, the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, particularly as they involve the information systems and the gathering of information.

There is a recognition that while Dr. Harris has told us that we need more information, particularly information from the inshore—not that we do not from the offshore—it is important that the way we go about it is consistent with fishermen and the needs of fishermen. There is a program that is very effective in New Brunswick which involves the use of information gathered by fishermen, where the fishermen work with fisheries officers to put the information together. It is something that is an honour to participate in and it is something that has worked extremely well.

I think he knows as well as I that there cannot be an efficient program if the co-operation is not there. In my own province, where I think in the past it would be fair to say that there has not been the level of co-operation that has been essential, we are beginning to see that now with fishermen and scientists getting together.

With regard to the lack of resources, I think my friend knows that one of the criticisms of the $584 million Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program as the response to the crisis that we face, is that there is too much money in there for bureaucrats and not enough for programming.

It is like the rock and the hard place. On the one hand we get criticized because we are not putting enough programming in place and, on the other, because we do not have the resources to enforce the laws and the regulations. We are trying to find the balance between the scientists and the enforcement officers. We need money going into programming so that we can develop other species with, test new gear and that sort of thing, but an important point has been made.

As for not being tough enough on Americans, I think my friend recognizes that it is an easier place to run away to than perhaps Portugal or Spain. I think it is fair to say that we have made great progress with colleagues of my friend opposite in reducing the European overfishing which started in 1972. In the last year we have seen less overfishing than we have seen perhaps in the last eight or nine years. I think there is progress because there has been a multi-faceted approach or a multi-targeted approach in dealing with some of the problems.

One will find that more of the efforts are going offshore in terms of implementation and enforcing regulations as we move to more observers, as we change the observers' status, as we do more gear testing, as we collect more information, and as we get more co-operation between the scientists and the large companies.

My hon. friend has a weakness that we all have; he freely admitted that he diverged a bit. I think it important that we put a couple of facts on the floor of this House.

Since 1977 the governments have moved a variable entrance requirement bill year by year. In 1989 this government, in recognition of the critical importance of the variable entrance requirement, instituted variable entrance requirements as part of the law. It did not need temporary implementation every year. It was institutionalized in the law. The majority of the members of this House and I voted for that legislation in November of last year. It has been sitting down the hall since then. In 1981, when the government opposite changed the regulations on unemployment insurance by moving from eight to ten weeks, it did not get stuck down there two seconds.

I do not want to hear any more piety from my friends across the way about variable entrance requirements or anything else. They should tell the people in my constituency who want to get trained about the Senate and the variable entrance requirements. I voted for it and I expect the people down the way who are not elected or accountable to vote for it as well.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, my colleague from St. John's East had a few comments to make. I would like to reply to some of them.

The bill that he is referring to, Bill C-21, has not become law. In the meantime, if he was thinking of the good of his constituents and the rest of Canadians, he would have asked his government to pass the variable entrance requirements. There are some problems with Bill C-21. Maybe the hon. member is becoming too partisan. When $2.7 billion is removed from the unemployment insurance fund by this government, who is it going to hurt? Employers and employees are going to have to pay the shot from here on in.

Let us talk about training. All the training in the world does not necessarily produce jobs. Where are the jobs? Training for what? It is fine and dandy to say there is training money there. We are not going to stoop to passing a bill just for the sake of getting some training money. There is no guarantee that that training money is going to be there long term. There is no guarantee that after that training money comes into place we are going to have jobs.

The unemployment rate in the Atlantic provinces is in the high teens and in some places in the twenties. Training is not going to guarantee that there are jobs. They are cutting back regional development grants. They are cutting back CAP. They are cutting back left and right. That is all they do is cut, cut, cut, and the money that they get is transferred from one to another. They talk about an access centre for youth—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Boyer: Have faith in the people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, for a while I thought we were debating Bill C–21, even though the issue is one that deals with fish and deals with an act to protect the fishing stock.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harb: I hear the parliamentary secretary shouting from the other side. For a while I thought he might have some sort of difficulty breathing. Living in a democracy, however, I think it is only fair that when one member on one side of the House is speaking the other member on the other side of the House sits and listens. When he or she has a question, he or she will have the time to ask it.

First let me congratulate the parliamentary secretary as well as his minister on this wonderful initiative to move forward with legislation that will protect ultimately the fishing stock in Atlantic Canada. The people of Atlantic Canada can become the beneficiaries as a result of that.

Having said this, there are certain aspects of the bill that I think the parliamentary secretary as well as the minister responsible should take note of. One of them is the issue of enforcement. Any law that we put in place will not work unless it is properly enforced. Enforcement has to apply to those who are in big industry and those who are in small industry. It has to apply to the big, small and medium sized industry.

Unfortunately, as it is right now there is fear in the industry that the small fisherman might be fined and, if he has to pay a fine, that it might mean the end of that particular fisherman, whereas a big corporation that is fishing illegally or is intruding in the industry might be in a position to pay the bill and move on and do it again. That is one of the concerns of members of the community in Atlantic Canada vis–à–vis the present bill.

Another concern which I think is fairly important to take note of is the bookkeeping requirement. Unfortunately, according to Bill C–74, section 61(2) states that fishermen and processors may be required to keep records of the number, sex, size, weight, species, product form or other particulars of any fish caught. These requirements might put a tremendous amount of pressure on a small businessman or a small fisherman in the industry. I for one do not know whether a fish is a male or female. I do not know whether any of my colleagues on this side of the House would know how to identify a female fish from a male fish. There are some who have indicated that they probably would know. This kind of requirement might put some pressure on the small businessman. It might increase the cost involved. Other concerns are the resources and personnel needed to enforce the present act, which I have already indicated, and that is yet to be seen.

More important than anything is the minister's own admission that the new act will be a part of the solution to many of the fishery's present problems. He then concedes that more must be done for the conservation of stocks. He clearly indicated that surveillance is a step in the right direction but that it is not the answer to all of the problems in the fishery today. I agree with the minister. I think it is a very sensible statement on his part. I think we have to do more for the fishing industry.

But I think what has to be done in Atlantic Canada is that the economy has to be diversified. We have to start providing alternatives to the fishermen, alternatives to the people of Atlantic Canada. The people of Atlantic Canada are not interested in handouts. The people of Atlantic Canada are interested in jobs, job creation and opportunities. They want to be considered as equals to the rest of Canada.

To that extent, my colleague from New Brunswick a little earlier made a statement about the need of infrastructure in Atlantic Canada. I want to reiterate that there is a definite need for infrastructure in Atlantic Canada. There is no point in talking about preserving the fishing stock because as you know, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing there that will stay forever. If the fishing stocks are not depleted today, tomorrow or the day after, they might be. What needs to be done is to provide alternatives.

Infrastructure is one of those options that is available to the government in order to move in and provide the services required. Then we will stop seeing raw sewage being dumped right in the ocean.

For instance, in Newfoundland there are 40,000 homes that do not even have proper pipelines for water, proper water, proper water treatment facilities and so on. Those are the kinds of things that the government can do today at a time when we are facing a difficult economic situation. It can provide alternatives to the people of Atlantic Canada.

I am shifting away from the main topic a little bit but I just could not help it. I have visited many parts of Atlantic Canada. I came to the conclusion that the only way we can deal with the difficult economic situations in Atlantic Canada is through diversification of the economy, through proper job creation by providing the tools to the people so that they can deal with the issues effectively.

Those tools are the infrastructure. The infrastructre is missing there. Until such time as we deal with the heart of the problem, which is to provide them with the proper infrastructure required, they are going to be handicapped in the area of employment.

I want to conclude on a quick note by saying that those are the kinds of initiatives we would like to see taking place. I would like to commend my colleagues from Atlantic Canada who came in full force to speak in support of the bill. That is what it is all about. When something good is being done by the government, tell the government it is good and give them the credit for it. I was very happy to see my colleagues doing just that. There is much more that needs to be done. This is not the answer to an ongoing problem. This is the beginning of the solution.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make two very quick comments. First of all, I am delighted to see my member of Parliament stand up and speak about the Atlantic fishery.

Mr. MacAulay: You're lucky to have such a good member.

Mr. Reid: You are very right.

Mr. Simmons: You're lucky to have such a good constituent.

Mr. Reid: I am sorry La Pointe is not in his riding, but I am very pleased that our central Canadian members are prepared to stand and speak on this issue.

We all recognize that it is not an Atlantic issue. The fishery is a national issue. If we have been able to accomplish anything over the last couple of years in terms of overfishing or in terms of the crisis we face, is that we have allowed all Canadians to see this Atlantic issue as a national issue. The fact that the member for Ottawa Centre and others stand and speak is important.

I want to comment very briefly on the question of tools. He is right when he talks about the Atlantic future being in the diversification of the economy, partly based on what we have now and what is there.

What Newfoundlanders want are opportunities. They are asking us to provide them with the opportunities and the tools. One of the most important tools we can provide to anyone in the world is an education, training and technical capability because without it there can be nothing. Without something to build on, there can be nothing. If there is anything that Bill C-21 does, it provides Atlantic Canadians with that tool. One of the most adventuresome projects that the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador share is one called the youth strategy. My friend from Burin—St. George's is familiar with it. One of the unusual things the government did was that it did not go into this program with preconceived notions. It had a mass consultation and talked to 600 groups that serve young people. It held consultations with young people across the province.

One of the things that came out of those six meetings, and I participated in one in Goose Bay, was that the young people said: "We know that you can't necessarily provide us with a job. It's not the job we want from you, it is the opportunity and the tools, because we will either find the job or we will create the job". Bill C-21 does exactly that. I thank my friend for mentioning that and giving me the opportunity to point out how important that piece of legislation is for the future of the Newfoundland economy and fishery.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, most of the hon. member's comments are well put, and I see my colleague from Newfoundland pointing across the floor. There is a lot of enthusiasm on both sides of the issue, but there is one point which I think is extremely important.

The parliamentary secretary has stated the need for education, especially in Atlantic Canada. Forty per cent of the youth do not finish high school.

That moves me to the second statement, that there is a need for an overhaul of the education system. I would like to enlist the support of the parliamentary secretary later this fall when I introduce a private members' bill in the House which will ask for a national standard for education so children in Newfoundland will have the same kind of education that children in British Columbia receive. In that way we will have equality in education, so our school system will provide the tools for our youth, and older people who wish to go back to school.

There is no doubt in my mind that the only way we can deal with the issue of full employment is through a proper education system going back to the grass roots level, the source of the problem, and teach the youth from age five and provide them with the proper tools.

I am very happy to see many of my colleagues on all sides of the House speak a little more about the issue of education. I think it is important and timely, especially when we talk about 1990 being the international year of illiteracy. I know the minister of multiculturalism has done quite a bit in that field, and I am sure he will do more next week and the week after.

It is extremely important for us as a nation to be able to compete internationally. As we head into the 21st century, we must prepare our kids and provide them with the tools they need. We must prepare a proper national strategy that deals with education and provide a national standard for education.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for Ottawa Centre for taking an interest in a very valuable Canadian resource such as the fishery.

The variable entrance requirements have been passed in this House since 1977, and if they had been enacted people in Atlantic Canada would not have suffered as much as they have.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Mr. MacAulay: Whatever House it is in, people are suffering.

With this new bill, we will have fishermen keeping books on the size, weight, sex of fish. All of that information will cause the fishermen a lot more problems.

Mr. Karygiannis: Do you think they can tell them apart?

Mr. Simmons: Good question.

Mr. MacAulay: Well, it is questionable if they can tell them apart or not.

We also have a problem in the fishery, as the government indicates, and it will crack down on the fishermen.

Mr. Karygiannis: Are you going to hit them over the head with a hammer?

Mr. MacAulay: When the American scallop draggers come into our waters, we have a destroyer there. All that happens is that the scallop dragger rams our Canadian destroyer and runs back home. Is this what we call taking care of our resource? I would like to ask my hon. colleague if he believes there is enough enforcement in the fishery to take care of our waters and our valuable resource?

• (1340)

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question. He comes from the wonderful island of Prince Edward Island. I do not know about the amount of fish that exists around the island.

One of the concerns I mentioned a little earlier was that the enforcement mechanism had to be put in place. We can talk about all the laws and all the rules we want, but unless we have a proper enforcement mechanism those laws will remain on the books. I totally agree that there is a need for a proper enforcement mechanism. The government should and I am sure will take note of that.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, first of all I congratulate my friend and colleague from Ottawa Centre for his depth of understanding of the fisheries issues which he so clearly demonstrated.

Also, on my own behalf and I believe on behalf of my good friend from St. John's East I want to express tongue in cheek a little horror at his earlier statement about the fact that there will be a national standard for education. Does this mean that we in Newfoundland are going to be delimited by the standards that they have in Ontario on this matter? Is that what he is saying?

Mr. Reid: No, no. Does that mean we have to talk like them?

Mr. Simmons: There are some things that Newfoundlanders will never accept, I say to him.

An hon. member: You are not going to let him get away with that.

Mr. Simmons: I believe the Ontario caucus has awakened.

Mr. Nunziata: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will accept the point of order from the hon. member for York South—Weston since it is Friday afternoon.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite certain whether you have been following what my good friend and colleague has been suggesting, but he has suggested in the last few moments that those members who represent Ontario ridings and who were educated in Ontario somehow are less intelligent than other members in this House, or their level of education might be suspect.

I would ask the hon. member to indicate clearly to Canadians generally that he in no way intended to insult and offend people educated in Ontario.

Mr. Simmons: Could I speak to the point of order, sir?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think it is a point of order, but I will allow the hon. member to finish his comment and question to the hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York South—Weston misunderstood. I was not pointing to a problem. I was offering a solution, that is to adopt the Newfoundland standard as the national standard.

On the matter of variable entrance requirements which continues—

An hon. member: You are giving us a higher standard.

Mr. Simmons: Is it not self-evident that it is a higher standard?

On the matter of variable entrance requirements which seems to be sneaking into every aspect of this debate, I have to say to my friend from St. John's East that he can say as often as he wants to: "I voted for." The record shows that he voted agin. In December 1989 there was an amendment in this House and he stood and voted against it. I sat here and watched him vote against the VER, I say to him eyeball to eyeball. In June 1990, I say to him eyeball to eyeball, he voted against it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member should refer to the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre and not the other member. It was not his debate; it was the debate of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

It is Friday afternoon, but I would hope that hon. members would stick to the rules a little.

Mr. Simmons: It is a challenge, Mr. Speaker, but we will try to be equal to it. I apologize. I should be speaking to the gentleman from Ottawa Centre, who is the member of Parliament for the gentleman from St. John's East.

I want to say to him that his constituent, who also sits in this Chamber, has been misrepresenting unwittingly, I say to him, a situation. He has been alleging that he, the constituent of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, has been going around and saying that he voted for the VER. I can testify and I can get about 84 affidavits to back me up when I say that he actually voted twice against putting an end to the misery of thousands of people in my riding who would like to be able to draw their benefits after 10 weeks.

Finally, Sir, on this mini sentence, his constituent is equally right that we have finally achieved national recognition for an important national issue called the fishery. Only one thing remains, and I wonder if he agrees with this. The only attention we have yet to get is the attention of the Prime Minister on this national fisheries issue.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, it is quite encouraging. I might add I am also the member of Parliament for my colleagues from Newfoundland on this side of the House. As you know, Mr. Speaker, every member of the House actually works in my riding and at times I wonder whether I want some of those members to be working in my riding. Unfortunately, living in a democracy we have to hear all the opinions.

I want to congratulate the hon. member on his hard work on behalf of his constituents. I would also like to congratulate the parliamentary secretary on having a big heart and being able and willing to take the criticism and the question from the hon. member on this side.

I will not be in a position to answer the question, since it was not put to me per se. It was really put through me to the hon. member on the other side of the House. I hope that at the next possible opportunity that hon. member will answer the question so we can straighten up the issue on both sides of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Ottawa Centre has the ability of being a very good speaker. One day, he will become the Speaker of the House of Commons—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): —the way he handled that question.

On that basis questions and comments are now terminated. Debate, the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that your boots will be very difficult to fill, given the immense amount of experience that you have in the House and your ability to be fair to all members on both sides of the House.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill C-74 and note that it is 13 or 14 minutes before two o'clock and unfortunately I will not be able to conclude my remarks today. I look forward to concluding them next time that the government calls Bill C-74.

You are probably wondering, Mr. Speaker, why a member of Parliament from Toronto is standing to speak to Bill C-74, which is entitled an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof. My constituents in the riding of York South—Weston who are watching this afternoon are probably asking themselves what does our member of Parliament know about fish and the fishery.

Mr. Simmons: A lot.

Mr. Nunziata: Well, my friend from Burin—St. George's says a lot, but I would never ever know as much as he does about the fishery and the problems of Atlantic fishermen.

The western boundary of my riding is the Humber River and I know—

An hon. member: It's full of fish.

An hon. member: It's polluted.

Mr. Nunziata: It's polluted. It is polluted because of the actions of a previous Conservative government in the province of Ontario and because of the neglect and incompetence of that particular government. I do not want to see the waters off the coast of our Atlantic provinces end up like the Humber River that bounds the riding of York South—Weston.

The parliamentary secretary did indicate, seriously speaking, that he was pleased that other members are standing to speak to this important piece of legislation because he believes, as I believe, the fishery is a national issue. All too often members in the House defer to members from Atlantic Canada or from British Columbia on issues involving the fishery. Whether they represent urban ridings or rural ridings, or ridings that have a significant number of fishermen as constituents, the time has come for all members to participate and involve themselves in what is happening in the Canadian fishery. It is a significant part of the economy of a number of provinces, the Atlantic provinces, British Columbia, and other provinces of course. The economies of other provinces are affected by the fishery.

The Liberal Party is in general support of this particular bill, Bill C-74. The former member for Beauséjour, Fernand Robichaud, spoke on this bill on June 19, 1990. Mr. Robichaud has since vacated his seat—in order to permit Jean Chrétien to have the opportunity to run, to be elected, and to represent the Liberal Party here in the House of Commons—but he gave an excellent speech. I certainly commend it to all members who are concerned about this particular issue and members who might want to read about the concerns of a former member who has worked extremely hard to deal with the problems associated with the fishery.

The government introduced this bill on June 6, 1990 and it was given first reading on that date. It is now October 12 and second reading is still not complete. One of the concerns expressed by Mr. Robichaud and others in the Liberal Party is in respect of the delay in processing this particular piece of legislation.

After we conclude second reading, this bill will be sent to a legislative committee which will consider the provisions in this piece of proposed legislation. The legislative committee will have the opportunity to call forward witnesses. It will have the opportunity to ask questions of the minister. It will have the opportunity to review this bill clause by clause to ensure that, in fact, it is a perfect piece of legislation. The bill, in its present form, is imperfect in respect of some of its provisions.

Mr. Boyer: How so?

Mr. Nunziata: My friend and colleague, across the way, asks, how so. I simply ask him to be patient. I know that one of the boundaries of his riding is the Humber River—

Mr. Boyer: I'm on the west bank.

Mr. Nunziata: —the west bank of the Humber River and also Lake Ontario, as I understand it. He, too, is much chagrined by the policies of the previous Conservative government in Ontario and how the policies affected the cleanliness of that particular body of water. I know the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore will be speaking to this bill when it is called again, presumably some time next week.

In any event to get back to Bill C-74, the legislative committee will have the opportunity to examine, very closely, this particular bill which we support in principle. I want to make it abundantly clear that the Liberal Party does, in fact, support Bill C-74 in principle. But we would like to see the bill improved.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for significantly stiffer fines and penalties for fisheries violations and damage to fish habitat under the Fisheries Act. The government states that such higher fines and penalties will bring the Fisheries Act in line with the deterrents contained in the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act and the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. The new proposed schedule of fines provide for significant penalties. There is no question about that. We are looking at summary conviction offences that could result in fines of up to $100,000 upon conviction and $500,000 for prosecutions that proceed by way of indictment. The prosecution would have the alternative, under this legislation, to proceed either by way of summary conviction or, the more serious route, by indictment. Presumably, when dealing with individuals, the prosecutors will proceed by way of summary conviction and when dealing with persistent offenders and when dealing with corporations that wilfully, consistently, and persistently breach the provisions of this act, the prosecutors will proceed by way of indictment. That could result, in certain cases, in fines of up to $500,000.

I would very much like to know whether the government considered minimum fines. There are no minimum fines provided for under Bill C-74. There are other offences in the Criminal Code of Canada and other federal legislation that provide for minimum penalties. If the government is serious in terms of the sanctions, and it appears to be serious given that, for example, for the obstruction of a fisheries officer there is the possibility of a maximum fine of $1 million if the prosecutors proceed by way of indictment.

Presumably the government is serious about the sanctions that appear here. These are the maximum penalties that the court can hand out. It can also hand out prison sentences. If the government is serious about telling Canadians and the foreign pirates who have been pirating our fish stocks that we are serious about this particular legislation, then the government will consider and implement minimum fines so that upon conviction, there will be a minimum fine.

Under the bill now, a discharge, whether it be an absolute discharge or a conditional discharge, could be the result of an infraction under the act. That is not acceptable. When we talk about some of the offences that could result under this act, whether it be general fisheries offences, obstruction of a fishery officer, or pollution of fish habitat, we want to ensure that the proper messages are sent out and that this law acts as a deterrent for those who pollute the fish habitat. The Government of Canada will not tolerate the deliberate pollution of the fish habitat. I would ask that the parliamentary secretary consult with his minister and consider minimum fines when this bill is sent to committee.

The Liberal Party has articulated a number of concerns that we have with respect to this bill. The parliamentary secretary is well aware of the four specific concerns that the Liberal opposition has articulated. I have but two minutes to briefly talk about those four points. I will expand on those four points when given the opportunity when the bill is brought forward again.

First, we are concerned about the present surveillance efforts that appear to be concentrated on the inshore sector. In effect, the inshore fishermen, Canadian fishermen, would be targeted under this legislation. We are concerned about those foreign fishermen, as I indicated earlier, who are pirating unlawfully and deliberately depleting our fish stocks.

The second I want to make is with respect to the fishermen's associations. We know that the industry has generally supported tougher legislation. The fishermen's associations were not consulted on the final form of this legislation. I hope the parliamentary secretary takes note. Of course, he will ensure that they are invited to make submissions at the legislative committee. The associations are concerned and agree that tougher penalties are necessary, but they are asking if the proposed legislation will accomplish what it is intended to do.

The third point is with respect to the lack of a comprehensive strategy to apprehend the foreign violators, particularly the American fishermen on the Canadian side of the Georges Bank.

The fourth concern is with respect to the record keeping requirements under Bill C–74. They are extremely onerous. Under section 61.2, fishermen and purchasers will be required to keep records of the number, sex, size, weight, species, product, form and other particulars of any fish caught. Can you imagine, every fish caught in every boat by every fishermen will have to be counted—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When this bill is brought forth again, the hon. member will have seven minutes, plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

CENTENNIAL FLAME RESEARCH AWARD ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, September 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Boyer that Bill C–258, an act respecting the establishment of the Centennial Flame Research Award to publicize the contributions to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to have the opportunity to speak in support of the principle expressed in Bill C–258, an act to establish the Centennial Flame Research Award to publicize the contribution to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities.

As one of the few members, if not the only member of this House, who has had the opportunity to serve as a provincial minister of social services, I have had the opportunity to work with many disabled people in their organizations over a four–year period. Whatever gains were made by my department during those four years were made with the support and assistance of disabled persons, sometimes their very sharp assistance.

Prince Edward Island recognized the work of disabled persons by proclaiming last week, October 1 to 7, Canadian Paraplegic Association Week. The week was set aside to generate a greater awareness of the needs of disabled persons while reflecting upon their achievements. The association has made significant accomplishments in advocating on behalf of individuals with needs for better accessibility, counselling and other services.

As a former minister of social services, I have personal knowledge of the many difficulties that disabled people experience in their efforts to take part fully in the life of their community. I have met with them individually and in groups. What was most striking about that experience was the fact that no matter how great were the discouragements they had to face, they seldom appeared to get discouraged.

I am aware that for almost a decade the disabled people of Canada tried to get the attention of Parliament and were finally successful 10 years ago with the excellent barriers report of the parliamentary committee on the disabled.

The strength of this present proposal is that it once again brings before Parliament the continuing need of disabled persons for encouragement and support and permits this form of debate in the House. However, even as I support the principle of this bill, there are several issues that require more attention. I wish to call them to the attention of the House in case there may be an agreement on the need to amend the present bill.

The amount is only $1,000 per year. It would be unreasonable to expect it to do a whole lot for disabled persons in Canada. For this reason, we should not overload the project by asking for any form of report to Parliament on the issue cited. Any possible competition among disabled persons in organizations in Canada for a $1,000 award could make the cost of the selection process far greater than the eventual benefits. For that reason, I believe that we should eliminate the competitive process.

The bill proposes a stand-alone award and not a supplement for funds available elsewhere for a specific project.

However, I would think that the award could be a supplement to existing scholarships, most of which could stand enrichment. For example, I think that eligibility for the award could be restricted to graduating students from senior high school grades for disabled and who have made a significant contribution to public life during their school years. This contribution could be demonstrated through receiving a scholarship award for such contribution upon high school graduation.

The Disabled Persons Participation Program of the Secretary of State already provides substantial grants to organizations of the disabled which dwarf the small amount to be awarded from the Centennial Flame.

It is important that the House not trivialize issues of concern to disabled Canadians by an inappropriate gesture on our part, no matter how well intended.

I am pleased to endorse the principle that the Flame funds be used for further participation in public life of the disabled persons in Canada. But in recognition of the limited amount of money available, I would urge that the bill be referred to a legislative committee to receive suggestions on improvements.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I, too, am pleased to rise this afternoon to speak briefly on this particular bill. I wanted to point out to my colleagues that the member of Parliament for Hamilton Mountain, who would have liked to have been here to take part in these proceedings, at least observe what was being said, was away at a national aboriginal network conference on disabilities. Consequently, she is on her way back and unable to be here. The hon. member is sorry about that.

She did point out to me, however, some of the concerns that she had that I shall share briefly with the House. My colleague has already mentioned some of them, so I shall do so rapidly.

The first one, of course, is the whole notion of helping those who have some need for special assistance. This is one that we can endorse. It is an important principle and we have no difficulty at all supporting it totally and completely.

We are concerned, however, because the amounts are really quite small—we are talking about roughly $1,000—for what I am told are approximately 3.3 million disabled Canadians. That is perhaps a conservative figure in the sense that it does not include a number of other categories that might be involved. It is simply not a large amount.

What can we get done in terms of research, or what have you, for $1,000 today? Our great fear is that while the principle is a sound one and the intentions are very noble, the amounts of money may be communicating a contradictory message. So, I would ask that we consider that very seriously.

As well, there is a reference to an award being made to a person. We wonder whether or not that should not be expanded to groups of persons because, there again, it limits.

We ask whether or not the committee should be expanded to include the Speaker of the Senate because the fountain is on the precincts of Parliament. While I can understand that there may be some reluctance on the part of some hon. members to include anyone from the Senate nowadays, I would hope that we could keep those two issues separate and consider that as a real possibility.

I want to point out as well that the amount set is part of the bill. There is some concern there. What if the amount set is not met? What if it is lower or higher? Are there ways of circumventing that and responding to it appropriately?

[Translation]

Briefly, we support this bill in principle. There is no problem. It is an important gesture. However, we are afraid the gesture will be symbolic rather than concrete, and since this award will be limited to a maximum of about $1,000—it is said 3.3 million Canadians are in this group—we wonder whether this restriction will be criticized. Are we perhaps sending the wrong message?

As I said before, we also want to consider the option of giving the award to more than one person, so that a team would be able to apply for the award. We also think perhaps the Speaker of the Senate should also be included, since the site is part of Parliament. Finally, I have some questions, and I suppose the hon. member opposite will have some answers. When we are talking about dollars and cents, is there a problem when the amount is not sufficient, if we have less or more than the prescribed amount? Those are my comments, Mr. Speaker. I am willing to join my colleagues in working on this bill so that this proposal can be implemented.

[English]

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I rise for a brief moment to point out that Bill C-258 submitted to the House by the member of Parliament for Etobicoke—Lakeshore is very simple and straightforward. All it is suggesting and requiring is that the coins thrown into the Centennial Flame be concentrated into one point. It now goes to the Secretary of State and is spread out, gosh knows where, but to worthy organizations. The bill seeks to concentrate this to a very worthy cause whereby any disabled person could apply from year to year for the receipts of the coins tossed into the flame.

I resent a little the kind of criticism that seems to be directed at this bill. Maybe my friends from the opposite side are not reading the bill, or maybe they have a copy of the old bill. I would refer them to paragraph 6 which says very clearly that funds for the awards shall consist of all money collected from the Centennial Flame on Parliament Hill in Ottawa during the fiscal year preceding the granting of the award. It is very simple, very straightforward.

To publicize this, a plaque could be put at the Centennial Flame there telling people who visit the Centennial Flame exactly where the money is going to go. The amounts collected have been anywhere from $750 to $3,500. It is very worth while. I think we should get on with it and make sure that it does happen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Are there any more speakers? Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read for second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Do I have unanimous consent to call it three o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

ASSASSINATION OF THE SPEAKER OF THE PARLIAMENT OF EGYPT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, on a point of order.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, last April I was in Egypt with the Canadian delegation of the International Association of French Speaking Parliamentarians, which consisted of four or five members, including the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans. Our delegation met the Speaker of the Parliament of Egypt. Last week, the Speaker of the Parliament of Egypt was assassinated. This is a tragedy. Egypt is on the road to democracy, and the role played by its Parliament in this process is very important. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Point of order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry to have to interrupt the member. I am very much aware of the importance of the question he raised, but I don't think the Standing Orders allow raising a question of this kind at this time. If the hon. member would like to raise this matter later on during this sitting, he could do so under motions or some other item, after Question Period.

Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill S-14, an act respecting the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to move second reading of Bill S-14, an act respecting the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons. A bill like this one was entered for discussion in the 33rd Parliament. It died on the Order Paper.

This present bill is about the third or fourth attempt by this House and by Parliament to make changes to the Marriage Act. Up to this point they have been unsuccessful. It is certainly my hope that the House moves expeditiously on this, agrees to second reading and refers this matter to a legislative committee.

Marriage and divorce are subjects given to the federal Parliament under the British North America Act. It is one of the enumerated heads in that constitutional document. As such it is within the capacity and indeed the responsibility of Parliament to have a look at this particular piece of legislation and, if it deems it necessary, to bring it into conformity with some of our present day thoughts on the subject of marriage.

Turning to a bit of background on this subject, it has always been a part of Judaeo-Christian ethic that there have been and should be some prohibited grounds upon which one person may not marry another based on blood relationships or relationships by marriage. Indeed there are prohibitions in the Old Testament, but the present law we are dealing with had its origins in or about 1563, in the reign of Henry VIII, a man who had more than a passing interest in the subject of marriage. His government tabled a set of prohibitions on whom a person could marry. Basically that table, which found its way into the Anglican Book of Common Prayer, has found its way down to the present time. It was adopted by the common law provinces at the time of Confederation. There were some slight modifications in the province of Quebec, but that is the law that we have today.

I think most people who would have a look at this would agree that changes should be made and that sometimes inequities have resulted because of the fact that this particular act has not been changed.

For instance, if a woman divorced her husband she would not be able to marry her ex-husband's uncle, or indeed she could be prohibited from marrying her ex-husband's uncle by marriage. It does not happen very often, but it does happen in Canada that this creates a hardship on individuals. There are individuals who have got together over the years. There is nothing stopping them from living together; nothing stopping them from having children. There is no law that prohibits that. Yet, sometimes when they have explored their family histories they find this connection.

What do they do about it when they have found it? The process has been to petition the Senate and introduce a Private Member's Bill to correct the problem. Needless to say, this can be time consuming. It is a source of frustration and embarrassment and, because a lawyer is usually employed to get through this process, it can be quite expensive. I think there are good reasons why Parliament should make changes.

I was associated with this bill when it was introduced in the 33rd Parliament. The bill in no way affects or attempts to affect a religion's right to have a prohibited list. It does not in any way compromise a particular religious group's ability to say who can or cannot get married within its fold. This strictly deals with our civil responsibilities. It does not affect the religious responsibilities.

For those who follow this piece of legislation, there is one important change from Bill S-5, which was the legislation introduced in the 33rd Parliament. Bill S-5 did allow marriages between adopted siblings. It prohibited marriages between natural siblings, brothers and sisters, but if a person was related by adoption the old law allowed that. I disagreed with that at the time. I had very serious reservations about it. A number of provinces had problems with that as well, because the whole thrust of provincial legislation in the area of adoption is to put adopted siblings, as much as possible, on an equal footing. This potential step by a federal Parliament was a step in the wrong direction in their minds and in mine as well.

I am very pleased that this particular legislation referred to us from the other place now prohibits marriage between adopted siblings. With that said, I hope we move expeditiously on this matter. There are Canadians who are waiting for this legislation.

The Senate is not proceeding with Private Members' Business. It is not proceeding with anything, one might say, at the present time. It is definitely not proceeding with petitions in this area of marriage, so I hope this House will deal expeditiously with this bill and send it to a legislative committee.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up the remarks of the hon. parliamentary secretary with regard to Bill S-14, to follow the line of thinking he presented to the House, and to offer my support to his position.

I would also like to reiterate that amendments to the Marriage Act are long overdue. For the same reasons as those of the hon. member, Bill S-14 is a better bill than the former Bill S-5. For the same reason that he put forward we now have amendments with regard to adoptive siblings and relationships between adopted children and adopting parents. We have a bill that is more in line with the requirements and the thinking of the provinces and of the population in general.

Now that we have the amendments and the bill in a form acceptable to the House and to the Canadian people, it will solve problems for a great many Canadians who have been waiting a long time for these matters to be straightened out. I think it is in the interest of these people and the country to move ahead quickly with this bill.

The Senate at the present time has 30 Private Members' Bills awaiting it dealing with people who want to get married but who, under the existing act, are prohibited from doing so without the approval of the Senate. The Senate feels very strongly that these changes should be made. It feels that in dealing with Private Members'

Bills it is only dealing with something that should be placed and corrected in the legislation itself, and I agree.

It is an embarrassment for these people to have to go through this ordeal and to present themselves before the Senate to air their particular concerns and situations before that august body in the other place. As the parliamentary secretary has said there is a legal cost to these people. I think we should be moving quickly on this matter.

I agree with the parliamentary secretary that this bill should be sent to a legislative committee. Even though we have it in an amended form, which is preferable to the former bill we were discussing, Bill S-5, I think enough time has transpired since we last heard testimony concerning this bill that we should hear some commentary from interested groups and people who have participated in this debate.

Certainly we welcome any of the senators who wish to come forward. We are not interested in having the whole Senate. I am sure it is busy with other things. Its timetable is quite full, but there are three senators in particular, Senator Neiman, Senator Stanbury and Senator Nurgitz who have done a great deal of work on this bill. We owe them a great deal of thanks. At this point I think we should refer the bill to a legislative committee to deal with expeditiously. Then it can be brought back to the House for third reading as quickly as possible so that we can get this piece of legislation through.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am rising for the New Democratic Party on this bill, an act to amend the Marriage Act, which originates in the Senate.

It comes from the Senate and we consider it here in the House of Commons. It is not normally done, but it is part of our House of Commons procedure.

I too support the bill. I was on the legislative committee last time the bill went through, and actually I would prefer that we just put it through today. Perhaps more out of caution we should put it to a legislative committee, but I ask that we hurry in considering it so that it does not die once again on the Order Paper in case the House is prorogued or something like that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Waddell: There are a lot of groans around the House. Of course, that would never happen.

What does the bill do? The bill reaffirms the law that persons may not marry if they are related lineally or if they are brothers and sisters. It does not change that law. That is a fairly fundamental law that goes back way beyond the times of this Parliament.

However, this law relaxes the law to allow marriage between persons who are related as uncle, niece, aunt and nephew. There are some particular situations where such marriages can come about.

It clarifies the law by providing that a person whose marriage has been dissolved by divorce may marry the brother, sister, nephew or niece, et cetera of the divorced spouse. This is not now permitted under the law.

Where has the bill been? The bill is in its third run through this process, as I have already mentioned. It was passed by the Senate in 1986 but died when the House prorogued in October of that year. It was passed again by the Senate but died in the general election of 1988. In fact, the House debated it at second reading in June of 1987.

All the speakers in the debate supported it. The subject matter was referred to a committee of the House which held hearings. I had the pleasure to be at one or two meetings of that legislative committee. However, the subject matter, that is this bill died on the Order Paper with the 1988 general election. There have been extensive Senate hearings into the issue as well as two House of Commons committee meetings.

Over 19 different religious groups, respected family law experts, geneticists as well as the chief law officers of the provinces have been consulted. It is clear that the legislation has had a substantial hearing.

Why should it be passed quickly? I am told that, at present, there are 30 couples requesting the Senate to pass special bills allowing them to marry. You see, Mr. Speaker, you can go before the Senate and get a special bill. Of course, that costs a lot of money and takes a lot of time. Also, it would be pretty difficult to go before the Senate to get things passed right now.

The alternative to this bill would be 30 individual bills. I do not think that is acceptable, because each couple would have to hire a lawyer and go through a long and expensive process with no guarantee of success. I think this bill is a reasonable and fair alternative. Besides, I think that this matter is really the domain of Parliament itself.

Let me put it another way. Is this really the domain of Parliament? Perhaps Parliament should not be interfering with couples' choices in this matter. As the senators have noted, the Senate was once in the business of granting divorces. Everybody is happy that the hon. senators are now out of that business.

• (1320)

I must say it was through a lot of work by my predecessors here in the NDP—I can think of Arnold Peters and Frank Howard—who actually filibustered and caused all sorts of embarrassment on these divorce matters. Finally, the government said, well, to heck, we'll pass the new divorce act and get divorce into the courts and out of Parliament. The Senate was once in the business of granting divorces and everyone is happy that the hon. senators have finished. I will end there.

I would like to split my time with my friend from Regina—Lumsden, who is much senior and wiser than me. I believe he had a private members' bill on this subject matter. It is a wonderful thing about the House of Commons, if you hang around long enough, eventually the stuff you have done becomes law. He is not bashful, so I am sure he can speak for himself.

I ask that the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden be allowed the floor to complete the time allotted to our party.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for shared speaking time for members of the New Democratic Party?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its consent.

I must admit at the outset that I did not hear about this bill until half an hour ago. When I did I had to recall that in the early or mid-70s I had a private member's public bill passed, starting in the Senate, completed in the House of Commons, that made legal the marriage of an uncle to a niece. They had been living together in sin, as some people would call it, for a number of years. They had two beautiful healthy children, a nice home, he had a good job, they were respected in the community and extremely active in their church.

He wrote to me asking if I could do something for him. I made inquiries of the legal officers of the House and of the Department of Justice. They said the only way it could be done was by an act of Parliament, which would provide for an exception in the current law. On making further inquiries I found out it was going to cost quite a bit of money, especially if you started the bill in the House of Commons. It turned out it would be a lot cheaper to start the bill in the Senate, which is a cheap place to start.

This couple, who emigrated to Canada from the midwest United States, were married in a church twice, but there was no legal recognition of that marriage in the United States. They emigrated to Canada, I think, partly because of that, to try again. They became Canadian citizens and were good citizens. They made a good contribution to society in and around Regina. In fact, he was a leader in the whole business of houses that were environmentally sound and energy efficient.

I mentioned two children and they were beautiful children. But we had to arrange for them to receive several medical examinations. It was declared that they were perfectly normal and fit. Subsequent to that, the aspiring husband obtained a vasectomy.

When the bill came before the House of Commons, we worried about the cost of hiring a lawyer, the air fares for the couple to come to Ottawa, and a lot of other costs. On further inquiry it turned out all one had to do was have a lawyer in Regina draw up the appropriate documents and anyone could appear on behalf of the couple, or they could appear on their own behalf, before the senate committee.

In order to save money the poor couple had me appear on their behalf before the senate committee. I did not ruin the case because the Senate approved it. I might say the committee and the Senate as a whole approved it unanimously.

When the bill appeared before the House of Commons there was a very brief debate and because I made interventions with other members it passed unanimously.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the law is sufficient as it now stands. The only exception that can occur is when it is provided by Parliament and those have to be circumstances which legally protect the children and any estate that may be left to those children. If for no other reason I submit the law should stand as is because there are exceptions to every rule and to every law and in this kind of instance Parliament should rule about the exception.

I invite hon. members to go back and find the record—I did not have time to look it up myself—and all that was said and done on that occasion.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The proceedings are therefore adjourned until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1.28 p.m. the House took recess.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the Soviet Union has come a long way from the dark days of the cold war when Soviet military power and a Communist dictatorship repressed its people and threatened global security abroad.

Today the 1990 Nobel Peace Prize has been awarded to Mikhail Gorbachev for his phenomenal work in bringing an end to the cold war and drastically reducing the threat of nuclear war. While the world looked on with scepticism, intrigue, hope and finally belief that the impossible was happening, Mikhail Gorbachev, by counselling, negotiation and reassurance has led the Soviet Union to a new place in the international community and the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker, 1990 will be noted by historians as the year when east-west friendship has freed the best and brightest minds in the international community to solve the pressing environmental, social and political problems which no longer take a back seat to the cold war. Mr. Gorbachev deserves the credit he has been given today for helping to bring about this new reality.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, for many years the drug Methotrexate has been on the market as a valuable treatment for some forms of cancer.

While on the drug, some people noted that their arthritic problems improved considerably. It was found in further studies that the drug was an effective treatment for arthritis at a much lower dose than used in cancer therapy.

The company involved is now marketing the drug with a new name, Rhematrix, at four times the price of Methotrexate, even though there is no change in the manufacture of the drug. Methotrexate itself is no longer available to the public except through hospital pharmacies.

I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to investigate this situation and make sure that the Canadian public is not being ripped off by this marketing change by a major drug firm.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute today to Lieutenant John van Nostrand from the village of Vandorf who is serving on the HMCS Athabaskan, which is now stationed in the Persian Gulf off Bar Bahrain just 200 miles from Kuwait.

I met with John's mother, Janet, yesterday. She and her husband, Peter, spoke to John by telephone on Sunday, September 30. John was in good spirits, morale is high, and John, who is an engineer, said the HMCS Athabaskan is functioning well. John, who is 29 years old, has been in the Canadian Navy for almost five years. He is a fifth generation van Nostrand from the village of Vandorf where I live.

On behalf of all members of this House, I want to salute all of our Canadian men and women who have joined forces with many other countries to bring peace to this volatile part of the world. We humbly pray for the safe return of all these brave men and women.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the Nobel committee announced today that the 1990 Nobel Peace Prize has been awarded to Soviet President Mikhail Sergeiev Gorbachev for his leading role in the peace process which today characterizes important parts of the international community.

President Gorbachev has demonstrated exceptional leadership in bringing about democratic change in eastern Europe and in the Soviet Union. This fundamental transformation of the region has taken place through a predominantly peaceful process which certainly represents one of his most remarkable accomplishments.

[Translation]

The president is convinced of the need for international security and co-operation. As a result, it was possible to make tangible progress in negotiations on arms control and disarmament between the superpowers.

Mikhail Gorbachev faces many challenges. Today, however, we pay tribute to him for his role in promoting peace and democratic change in Europe.

[English]

Let us join in congratulating President Gorbachev and support fully his work toward glasnost and perestroika.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday noon a group of Canadians, mostly of Palestinian heritage or background, was staging a protest march in the rain protesting the excessive violence to which the Israeli army subjected the Palestinians, and there were 19 deaths.

[Translation]

As in the past, they now appeal to the government of Canada, seeking protection for the human rights of Palestinians under the control of the army of a foreign country.

[English]

I would like to suggest to those Canadians of Palestinian heritage, and to all those who plead for human rights and human treatment, to call upon the Canadian Jewish Congress for its help, for I am sure its influence with the Canadian Government would be much more effective.

These people, more than any other, know about suffering, anxiety and fear. I am sure they are aware that something has gone awry in Israel. They can question, with authority, some of the events that have happened in the past few months.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, educational opportunity is a major contributor to personal growth, social mobility, and a vital ingredient of economic growth and international competitiveness.

Today, however, more and more Canadians have begun to question the success of Canada's educational system.

In 1986-87 our primary and secondary educational system in Canada is said to have cost $23.5 billion. Yet, despite the expenditures, the results are mixed at best. In too many cases graduates still have problems with basic literacy and numeracy skills. We have a national dropout rate of 30 per cent, and we have serious skills shortages in Canada.

The time has come to revisit and re-evaluate our educational results. We need a system more sensitive to the future demands of our economy. Failure to do so risks Canada's future social and economic progress.

Education must become a more positive contributor, and our federal government must be a positive contributor in an improved educational process of the future.

CANADA POST

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, today in Sudbury Canada Post has closed Postal Station A in New Sudbury to public counter service and will now serve only a small number of commercial customers, leaving the vast number of the public to go to some small private operation. They are now offered reduced service at inadequate outlets. Hopefully they will be able to have their needs met, but in this time before Christmas I doubt it very much.

This is yet another example of Canada Post putting profits before people. As the government continues to carry out its secret plan to privatize all postal services, Canadians are suffering from reduced services and higher prices.

I call upon the minister responsible for the post office to restore the service mandate of Canada Post, to put people before profits, and to restore full service to Postal Station A in Sudbury.

EXPORT

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the United States Customs Department has begun a program of nickel and diming Canadian businesses out of the U.S. marketplace by increasing the merchandise processing fee for Canadian businesses exporting into its country.

Effective October 1, 1990, the minimum charge for processing formal entries has risen from $3 to $16.80, an increase of over 500 per cent. Informal entry fees have increased as well. Needless to say, this imposes a severe handicap to our exporters.

The Canadian government must take action immediately to remove this new non-tariff barrier so that Canadian companies presently trading, and those looking to gain access to the U.S. marketplace, will be able to do so free of this restriction.

THE SENATE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Conseil du patronat du Québec is sick and tired of the Liberal senators. President Ghislain Dufour said the Liberal senators had put on a very poor show, in addition to flouting the legitimacy of Parliament and the democratic principles that form the basis for our parliamentary system.

Mr. Dufour went on to say he did not challenge the Liberal senators' right to criticize the GST. They had the right to do so and they even had a duty to improve the legislation if necessary.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal senators argue that according to the polls, the GST is unpopular. However, the obstructionist Senate is well on its way to becoming even more unpopular than the GST. For the other side, Mr. Speaker, GST means "Good Senators' Tax".

ABORIGINAL HONOUR CELEBRATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I had the pleasure of attending the first Annual Aboriginal Honour Celebration banquet sponsored by the Indian-Métis Friendship Centre of Winnipeg, an evening designed to recognize the major role that aboriginal people have played in the development of Manitoba and the particular achievements of those 12 chosen to be honoured by their community.

Unfortunately, four of the awards had to be given posthumously, like the one for Jackson Beardy in the Arts category, or the one for Tommy Prince, Canada's most decorated war veteran. But others like Dorothy Betz and Mary Richard were there to be duly honoured for their work in the justice system and community development respectively. Dave Courchene, Sr., former chief of Sagkeeng or the Fort Alexander Reserve, was honoured for his pioneer work in aboriginal politics.

The list of accomplished and dedicated aboriginal Canadians is long indeed. Many more such banquets will have to be held to honour them all. But at least a start has been made in Manitoba this last week. All those who made it possible are to be commended.

LAC SEUL INDIAN BAND

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, in 1894 the Lac Seul Indian Band in northwestern Ontario entered into an agreement with the federal government and the province of Ontario. The terms of that agreement have never been respected by the governments involved, which has led the band to submit a land claim under the specific land claims policy of the Department of Indian Affairs.

For more than 20 years now the Lac Seul Band has been working on this particular land claim. Finally, in 1985 it submitted a statement of claim. Five years have since gone by and the Department of Indian Affairs has yet to respond to the claim.

This is just one example of how the government's specific land claims policy works or, for that matter, does not work. We have seen how frustrated the aboriginal community is with this particular policy. The Indian leadership is desperately trying to work with the government on these matters, but one very important element is lacking—trust.

I urge the government to move quickly in revamping its specific land claims policy and do so in consultation with the aboriginal people. The government must seek to regain the trust it has lost and it must live up to its fiduciary responsibilities. Anything less is unacceptable. Action, not meaningless words, is in order.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Sunday morning at 7.45, it was a farmer from Portage who phoned me and said: "Felix, Mazankowski is really listening to us". By announcing interest-free advance payments for grain this weekend, our agriculture minister has proven once again that this federal government is on the side of farmers.

Conservatives have acted. Westerners beware that the Reform Party and Preston Manning are against agricultural support when it is needed the most. The Reform Party would throw Canadian farmers to the wolves of the European Community and the United States.

For a good number of western farmers, interest-free cash advances will mean the difference between putting in a crop or leaving the land. Reform Party ideology would abandon the land and starve the very farmers who built the west.

It is time for western farmers to speak up. It is time for Preston Manning to reform his own platform, or it is time for Preston Manning to sit down and learn that words alone do not put bread on the tables of western farmers and their children.

AIDS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the House that my provincial New Democrat colleague, Evelyn Gigantes, the Ontario Minister of Health, today helped launch AIDS Awareness Week.

This week's theme is outliving, outloving and outlasting AIDS. In Canada we have identified more than 4,400 AIDS cases, and there are now more than 2,500 Canadians living with AIDS.

There are continuing signs of the spread of the HIV virus, pointing to the need for increased awareness and education, yet there are serious shortcomings in the national AIDS strategy. An all-party committee on AIDS made useful recommendations which have not been acted upon.

What really is needed in AIDS Awareness Week is an awareness by this federal government that it is not meeting the AIDS challenge. We need more research. We need more education and more supportive and improved treatment if we are to eradicate AIDS.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, the GST statements, are they fact or fiction? While millions of Canadians oppose the tax, the government clings to this proposed fiscal initiative that will fuel inflation and push us deeper into a recession. That is fact.

In the government's zealous multimillion dollar GST campaign, the spoken word differs from the written word. Here is the fiction. Grocery store owners were advised in their Revenue Canada GST guide that basic groceries do not include FST and are therefore not eligible for rebate.

Yet on Friday the Minister of Finance stated that there is FST on food. He said it amounts to one or two percentage points.

To meet the government's own objectives, business has been told one thing and consumers are told something totally opposite. Canadians cannot accept this two-faced approach.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are anxiously and optimistically awaiting the introduction of the government's Green Plan.

This is especially so in the case of the people in my riding of Fraser Valley East. The people of the valley from Abbotsford, Chilliwack, Agassiz, Hope and beyond are particularly concerned with air quality. You see, as beautiful as the valley is, as majestic as the mountains may be, the air we breathe leaves much to be desired.

We in the valley are subjected to the smog and emissions of Vancouver. It is literally an ill wind that blows into the valley from the city. The country living of the valley is tainted by the smog of the city, obviously not the best of both worlds.

It is only natural that we in the Fraser valley are anxious about the Green Plan and active solutions. In fact, we are waiting with bated breath. I trust the Minister of the Environment and his colleagues are addressing this problem.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Last week he and the Prime Minister refused to admit there was a recession, but the Prime Minister did agree that he and his government had induced a slowdown, one planned in the budget of February 1990.

In that budget the Minister of Finance said: "Growth is expected to rebound in the latter half of 1990." We are now in the latter half of 1990, and growth is hardly rebounding. There is less and less growth while there is more and more unemployment.

Does the Minister of Finance still stand by that budget projection on growth? If he does, how is he credible in light of figures showing growing unemployment, growing bankruptcies and the figures today showing a drastic decline in the sale of homes in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I gave a speech on September 17 in Edmonton which gave Canadians the most up-to-date thinking on the part of the government regarding the economy.

In that speech, I said that some of the statements I had made in the budget did not come to pass as quickly as we thought they would. In other words, I expected a weaker economy earlier in the year. The economy was stronger earlier in the year.

The economy is weaker at this time of year, but we expect the recovery to occur as we move into 1991. Economies are vibrant animals. They do not just happen in a static way. We give our best projections at the time.

If my hon. friend would go back to the economic projection record of this government over the last six years, I think he would find that it was enormously better than that of the previous government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance.

I do not think Canadians were surprised to find that Mr. Gorbachev received the Nobel prize for peace today, but I do not think Canadians would expect this Minister of Finance to be even on the short list for the Nobel prize in economics.

An hon. member: That is for sure.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, Doug Peters, chief economist at the Toronto-Dominion Bank, speaking of the Minister of Finance, said today: "The message that does not seem to be getting through is that this is not a minor incident; this is going to be a long, protracted, serious recession and the longer interest rates stay up, the longer the recession is going to be."

When is the message going to get through to the Minister of Finance that we are now in a real and serious recession caused by the policies of his government? Will he today bring forward new policies and a new economic plan, including lower interest rates that will not induce more recession but prevent it from getting even worse?

• (1420)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me remind my hon. friend again that the reason we have high interest rates, and have had high interest rates over the last couple of years is precisely because we are facing a serious inflation problem.

If my colleague would check The Globe and Mail today, he will see that British inflation in the month of September was 10.9 per cent. We are trying to avoid that problem in Canada, and we have been avoiding it by following the set of policies we have been following.

If my hon. friend could just cast his mind back to when he was in the previous government in 1981–82, inflation was at 13 per cent in this country. It was allowed to get out of control. As it got out of control, interest rates had to go far, far higher than today, in the 20 per cent to 25 per cent range, to kill inflation. We want to avoid that, Mr. Speaker, and have been avoiding it. That is precisely why the policies we are following are supported by many people in the country.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance keeps talking about inflation, but he also insists on introducing a GST which according to the minister will have an even worse impact on this country's economy.

How can Canadians be expected to take the minister seriously now, when he was consistently wrong before? Why will he not admit that his policies brought about this recession, and when does he intend to do something to get us out of it, once and for fall?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend likes to quote other organizations. One he was fond of quoting last week was the Economic Council of Canada.

The Economic Council of Canada supports the goods and services tax. It supports it for one very clear reason, because it is good for this country.

Many organizations last week were saying that one of the best things we could do was to get interest rates down. I think my hon. friend would agree with that. But you cannot go to heaven without dying.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: Show us.

An hon. member: Prove it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): You have to go through—well, my hon. friend wants to go to heaven but he does not want to die. He wants to have the world in his hands. He wants to have lower interest rates but he does not understand how we will get those lower interest rates. One of the ways to get lower interest rates is by passing the pieces of legislation that are in the Senate.

Why is it that my hon. friend, in his cynical, partisan way, can say: "I want to get interest rates down but I will not go to the Senate. I will not talk to the senators and ask them to get the legislation through that will address the deficit problem, that will address the problem of higher interest rates, and that will address the problem of improving the economic health of this country".

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance just said: "You cannot go to heaven without dying", in speaking about the economy. Why does this minister and his government want to kill the Canadian economy?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Why does this minister and his government act like that officer in Vietnam who destroyed a village and all the people in it by saying that he had to destroy the people and everything in that village in order to save it. What crazy, misguided policies.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me quote L. C. Wayne, the mayor of Saint John. She said:

> There's been a lot of talk about recession and you talk about preaching doom and gloom every night on The National. But it hasn't hit us that way. In fact right here, our tourism has been stable and in some sectors, it's been up.

That is not the case in every part of the country. But the point I am making is that the exaggerated rhetoric of the Leader of the Opposition and other members opposite is not helping the economy. The position of the Liberal Party of Canada in supporting the minority in the Senate, a minority who will not allow a vote to come to pass on four pieces of essential legislation that are part of the economic program that this government was elected on in 1988. Why is he supporting an unelected minority group of senators who will not allow this legislation to come to a vote? Will he explain to Canadian people why he is taking that undemocratic stand?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Why does this minister want to kill the Canadian economy under the guise of eventually saving it?

Does he not realize that Canadians know that even dying will not help them because this minister intends to tax even funerals with his goods and services tax.

An hon. member: Right on.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I understood the question.

The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood has said in the past: "You can't hang-glide to power these days." The Liberal Party in the 1988 election said if they were elected: "the Liberal government will not proceed with stage two of the Mulroney government's tax reform plan."

The Liberal Party is not the government. The Conservative Party is the government. The Conservative Party was elected to enact its legislative program and its platform. What we have is the cynical hypocrisy of the Leader of the Opposition supporting—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Let's try and move on. The hon. member for Ottawa West.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and concerns the Rafferty–Alameda dam project which is now proceeding without an environmental assessment.

On Friday the minister said that the Government of Saskatchewan could not proceed with the Rafferty–Alameda dam project. News reports in Saskatchewan today are saying that contracts for the Alameda were let last week.

Did the minister know about any such contracts on Friday? What does he know today, and does he still stand by the statement he made Friday?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure my hon. colleague that I certainly stand by the statement I made on Friday.

We are operating under a court order. This government fully expects to continue to respect the court order that requires a full review of the project before it can go any further.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may, through the Whip, want to rise again. But I have to keep track of the number of questions that have been asked. I think I am obliged to go to the hon. member for Yukon.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

On Friday the minister said that there was no deal with the Saskatchewan government on the Rafferty–Alameda dam. We know that the environmental panel studying the Rafferty–Alameda dam has resigned. We know that the court has said that the federal environmental review must take place.

Given that the premier of Saskatchewan has ignored the environmental review, has ignored the courts and seems to be ignoring the minister, will the Minister of the Environment revoke the licence for the Rafferty–Alameda dam?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can only say that we are going to follow the court instructions that we had on this project.

Those were handed down after quite a long delay. We have done everything in our power to respect the order of the court and we will continue to do so.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment.

He says that he is willing to do anything that he is required to do. What is he going to do, given that the Government of Saskatchewan is clearly going against the law of the court, the regulations of this government and has also caused an environmental review panel to quit? Is the minister going to revoke the licence? Is the minister going to get the $8 million back that he has given to Saskatchewan for this project?

• (1430)

[Translation]

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear last week that we were going to suspend all additional payments to the Government of Saskatchewan, and that we were going to try and reach an agreement in line with the court's ruling, and that meanwhile, the $8 million dollars which had already been paid were frozen until we reached an agreement that would respect the Federal Court judgment handed down in 1989.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Clearly the environmental review approach the government has taken is not working and clearly we have seen what has happened with the projected studies on Baie James, Hibernia, and, today, the Alcan project in Kemano, B.C. It seems that under the government's environmental policy there are more exemptions to the environmental guidelines that are handed out than there are Senate seats handed out.

Is the Prime Minister going to be serious about environmental review to show that his government intends to have clear environmental reviews of every large project in Canada, take his responsibility, and, instead of bringing in a weak bill such as Bill C–78, bring in a piece of legislation with real teeth so we can have real environmental reviews in this country?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises questions about Baie James and Hibernia. I can tell her that the Hibernia project went through a full review process with public hearings and it was conducted exactly as was set out in the guidelines order. I can also tell my hon. colleague that with Baie James, or Grande Baleine, the agreement that we have with the province of Quebec is for the project to have a full environmental review before any construction is allowed to go on.

In terms of Bill C–78, it widens the mandate allowed to FEARO at the moment to ensure exactly what she is claiming: that all projects, all policies, and all programs be reviewed, keeping in mind the basic principles of environmental review. Even the Dutch, who have or are perceived to have the most advanced legal system in the world, are saying that Bill C–78 is way ahead of anything else in any industrialized country.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to ask a supplementary question of the minister. Allowing this dam to go ahead flies in the face of three court decisions and every public statement the minister has made on this project or on the environment. Once again the government talks and fails to act when action is needed.

I ask the minister again, what does he know about the contracts for Alameda project, a project which he told this House on Friday could not proceed?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can answer that very quickly. The Alameda project can only proceed if we go through the procedures set out by the court. We will respect the court order. I will not, and this government will not, be held in contempt of court.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the same minister. The issue is not whether the federal government will observe the court order. It is a fact the Government of Saskatchewan refuses to follow the court order, and the federal government is doing nothing to stop the Government of Saskatchewan.

We want to know specifically, is the Government of Canada prepared today to revoke the licence, to take the Government of Saskatchewan to court, and to get an injunction so that construction will stop and the credibility and legitimacy of environmental review will stand firm and strong in this country, rather than quisling out like he is doing right now?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the government is prepared to take all the steps required to make sure that we are following the court order that was issued. That is, I believe, what I have said all along today.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): The minister has just said he is prepared to take all steps necessary. The step that is clearly there—and he has had a whole weekend to consult with his legal advisers—is to revoke the licence.

I want to ask the minister a specific question. The Government of Saskatchewan refuses to acknowledge the responsibility of the court. It claims the minister is party to an agreement on September 5. Will the minister undertake to revoke the licence, stop the construction, put a review panel in place, and get a proper assessment to defend the interests of the country and of the environment?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this minister and this government are willing to stand by the court order. I can assure you that we will make sure that the full assessment of the project is done. We are at the moment looking at the appointment of a new panel. We are in consultation with the Government of Saskatchewan.

There is no way that we will allow this project to go ahead without due process and due respect for the court order.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, during the current GATT negotiations Canada has offered to give up 5 per cent of its dairy production in favour of U.S. and European imports. The dairy farmers of Canada have warned today of disastrous consequences for the industry of any decision which jeopardizes our supply management system.

Would the Minister of Agriculture tell us why have we signalled to the U.S. and Europeans our willingness to start the process of dismantling the marketing system in Canada? What commitments have the Europeans and Americans offered?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member is not well briefed on the situation because we have not offered to give away anything. We have made an offer—

Mr. Benjamin: It's because you have been taken away. You're going to lay down.

Mr. Crosbie: Somebody else replaced me as minister and is answering the question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: A loud applause, I might add.

We have made an offer in Geneva in connection with agriculture. It is a little complicated to deal with in detail right now. It is an initial offer and it is conditional on other countries agreeing to negotiate a substantial agricultural trade reform package with concrete benefits for Canadian agriculture.

That is what it is. We are not offering to give away anything. We have made it very clear, as we have since March, and in fact long before that, that the continuance of the Canadian supply management system is to be assured and we want a strengthened Article 11(2)(a), all of which is set out in our offer. Of course, the offer also requires the United States and other countries to make concessions on their part, for example, doing away with the waiver which they have enjoyed now for many years in connection with agricultural products.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to hear from the Minister of Agriculture, because the Minister for International Trade is the one who bargained away the west coast fisheries, a billion dollar industry, and gave the Americans total control. He is also involved in $3 billion to give the Americans access to oil off Newfoundland. We are talking now about a $7 billion industry, the dairy industry in Canada, and this person is in charge of it. What hope is there, Mr. Speaker?

Is the Minister of Agriculture prepared to assure Canadian farmers that he will not sell them out the way his government sold out the fish processing industry in British Columbia during a different round of trade negotiations?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to make this very clear to the hon. member. I am sure he knows that the position that Canada has adopted has been taken in full consultation with the various sectors of the agriculture community and with the respective provincial governments across the land.

If the hon. member would care to look at the document that was put out by the Dairy Farmers of Canada, which outlines the GATT negotiations, and explains it in a very thorough and objective manner, I am sure he would be interested in noting that it states, and I quote: "Dairy Farmers of Canada supports the thrust of the Canadian proposal for a strengthened Article 11". That is precisely what we have done.

• (1440)

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Agriculture. As was mentioned earlier, today the government tabled its position at GATT, as a result of which imports of dairy products will double and subsidies will be cut by 50 per cent. I want to ask the Minister of Agriculture, specifically, why is he letting his government sacrifice our quota system? Why does he insist on repeating the damage he did in the Free Trade Agreement?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member should know, I am sure he does—and he should state so, if he does—is that the current Article 11, in its present form, is not satisfactory and what the dairy farmers of Canada petitioned the Government of Canada to do was to put forth a proposal that would strengthen and clarify Article 11. That is precisely what we have done and that is why they support us.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. Under the Canadian position tabled at GATT this morning the amount of poultry meat being allowed into the country is the same as provided for under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. There will be 19 different types of "further processed poultry" allowed into the country under this proposal.

Why have these turkeys tabled a position that will effectively wipe out the "further processed poultry" industry and force hundreds of processors and hundreds of farmers out of business in the country?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, why is it that hon. members opposite chicken out whenever GATT negotiations are discussed?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crosbie: Our import controls for poultry products have been implemented on an historical, proportional, basis in conformity with Article 11. Therefore, our offer under a clarified Article 11—and the hon. gentleman needs to have his own thinking clarified, of course—would not require any further increases. Now what is he complaining about?

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): After the next election, Mr. Speaker, it will be his Tory goose that will be cooked.

The minister is taking close to $500 million out of the pockets of Canadian dairy farmers. How does the minister expect Canadian dairy farmers to survive, if he does this? Is the minister not signalling the death of the Canadian supply managed industry?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have some difficulty in answering the question, since I did not quite understand the nature of the hon. gentleman's alarm. That he was alarmed was certainly apparent, but about what, was not.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, Canadian farmers feel betrayed by the government. The minister promised Canadian farmers access to the American market in the free trade agreement; this promise was broken. Now the minister is promising, again, access to the American market.

Will the Minister of Agriculture make a commitment in the House today not to sign any agreement that weakens Article 11 or that does not give equal access for Canadian farmers to the American market?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, on October 1, we had to file at Geneva, together with other countries involved in this negotiation, an estimate of the costs of various programs in effect in Canada to assist agriculture. The total was $8.8 billion. The Minister of Agriculture should be ashamed at the amount of assistance he is giving Canadian farmers. It is a huge amount of assistance.

Some hon. members: Oh. oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

WAR MEASURES ACT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. This week marks the twentieth anniversary of the vote in the House of Commons on the War Measures Act. After consideration, this Parliament and this Government abolished the War Measures Act and replaced it with the Emergency Measures Act, which protects civil liberties and imposes strict parliamentary control. Why didn't the government invoke the Emergency Measures Act this year, when it called in the army once again in Quebec, at Oka and Châteauguay?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): The Government of Quebec invoked a specific provision of legislation that applies to such circumtances, not the Emergency Measures Act. And that is why this government—

An hon. member: It's another act.

Mr. Mulroney: Of course, it's another act altogether.

My hon. friend knows perfectly well that we introduced a number of major amendments in order to completely overhaul the War Measures Act, because we as a government, with a number of opposition members, felt that what happened in 1970 was both disastrous and unjust, and we did not want this to be repeated.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is partly right. But 20 years after the FLQ crisis, the army is once again in Quebec, and this time we do not even have a parliamentary vote. Surely that is a step backward as far as civil liberties are concerned. As a supplementary question, I want to ask the Prime Minister if he will ask the government of Quebec for an early report—as early as possible—on the events at Oka and Châteauguay and will the Prime Minister undertake to table that report in this House of Commons, whose job, we feel, is still at the toughest moments to protect the civil liberties of all Canadians.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend surprises me because the first part of his question in regard to the War Measures Act is extremely valid and is one that I think I responded to on an earlier occasion.

My hon. friend knows that all provinces are entitled under the National Defence Act to call upon the Armed Forces of Canada to come to the aid of the civil power in the provinces in certain objective circumstances.

The government of the province of Quebec, as it happened, asked under the National Defence Act for the assistance of the army of Canada in a particular circumstance this summer. The Armed Forces, having been satisfied that the criteria were fulfilled, went to Quebec to fulfil that mandate, and did so with admirable restraint and commendable success. I know my hon. friend will join with me at this moment in conveying our congratulations to all members of the military for their tremendous job.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Since September 1989, the Algonquins of Barrière Lake in Abitibi have been making representations with a view to joining the Government of Quebec and the Government of Canada in drafting and adopting a conservation strategy for the environment in the La Vérendrye wildlife preserve.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Is the minister prepared to sign a tripartite agreement with the Barrière Lake Algonquins and the Government of Quebec, that would prevent clearcutting in the preserve?

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for Abitibi is extremely concerned that the future of the La Verendrye Wildlife Reserve be secured by way of a strategic conservation plan.

The federal government is certainly willing to sign such a plan to ensure that forest activities in this wildlife reserve are properly integrated with all of the other important environmental values, especially those which have been raised by the Algonquin Indians of the Barrier Lake region.

When that plan is agreed to between the government of Quebec and Canada with the Algonquin people, we certainly intend to sign it.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Statistics released last Tuesday, and again today, proved that there is a housing crisis in this country.

• (1450)

Starts in Canada have plunged to their lowest levels in six years. Sales are down 30 per cent and 128,000 jobs have been lost thus far, with more to come in 1991 because of the high interest rates and the inflationary effects of the GST.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance: Is it this government's policy to decimate the home building industry in this country with its high interest rate policy and a new tax on housing?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer to that question is no.

Over the course of the last six years, we have seen a record level of housing starts. This has been as a result of the policies that have been followed by this government of getting interest rates down and ensuring that there is a strong level of confidence.

As my hon. friend knows full well, what happened in his community of London, as well as in other communities in southern Ontario, is that things got overblown. We got house prices that were out of sight. They were house prices that bore no relationship to reality.

That is what happens when inflationary pressures get out of control. It is precisely for that reason that we have been following the policies of letting inflationary pressure get under control and getting back to a little bit of reality in the housing market.

In all these things, there is a pendulum that goes too far the other way. That is the position that we are in right now. As we get through this period, as we get interest rates down further, I am absolutely convinced that there will be a good rebound in housing starts in London and in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, the minister can try throwing that kind of bunk around here, but it is not working out in the streets in this country.

CREA says today: "High interest rates and the stagnant national economy have forced many would be owners to abandon their purchasing decisions now under present conditions."

I want to ask this minister again: How much more pain and misery is this government prepared to inflict on home buyers and on people who need housing before it does something about it? When and where will this government do something for housing and for people in this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend talks about would be house buyers.

Many would be house buyers were speaking to me a while ago saying: "Prices are out of sight. There is no way I can ever consider buying—"

Ms. Copps: That is in Rosedale.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): That is in Hamilton. It is in London and Kitchener that we are having problems with prices getting too high. That is the natural result of the inflationary pressures that we have been going through in the last three years.

Surely my hon. friend will understand that it is important that we do not let this get out of hand. As I just pointed out, it is getting out of hand in Great Britain with 10.9 per cent inflation. I remind my hon. friend that we had 13 per cent inflation in this country in 1982 after inflationary pressures got out of hand. That is precisely what we are trying to avoid in this country.

In recent months, we have seen where the mortgage rates have gone down from the middle 14 per cent range to the middle 13 per cent range. As we get these pressures further under control, we will be able to see those interest rates come down further.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance in a rather ill advised moment said: "You can't go to heaven without dying."

The Canadian economy is suffering from self-inflicted wounds and not wounds caused by international pressures, as was the case as he knows very well in 1980-81.

My question to the minister is: Why is this government so obsessed with its discredited monetary policy, its high interest rate policy? Why has it chosen to control inflation by stifling demand rather than acting vigorously to promote productivity and Canada's international competitiveness?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have heard some very self-righteous questions from the members opposite. I include the Leader of the Opposition when I say this.

Back on February 7, 1980, I am sure he will recall when he, Morty Shulman and I were sitting in a television studio and on City Television Mr. Shulman said to Mr. Gray: "Would you lower interest rates?" There was a very resounding: "Yes, I would." "Would you be prepared to resign your seat if the government did not carry through on that policy?" "Yes, I would".

That was on February 7 when interest rates were 14 per cent. They hit a peak of 21.24 per cent, and my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, sat there in his seat in the House of Commons, it did not bother him one little bit that he had made this statement and in a self-righteous way he still stands up and says he knows everything.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Minister of Finance regards that as an answer to a question. He spent a whole lot of his time talking about things that happened 10 years ago. People want to know what the government is doing today.

The Prime Minister says he intentionally induces economic slowdown. The Minister for International Trade says that Canada is doing too much for its farmers. The people of Canada want to know how the government intends to get out of this mess in which it has placed Canada, not what happened 10 years ago.

The Economic Council of Canada is perfectly clear on what is wrong. It knows, as all Canadians know, that the problems today have been induced by the government through fighting inflation with only monetary restraint. When will it shift to a policy of growth and productivity and international competitiveness?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member likes to refer to the Economic Council. The Economic Council refers to a scenario that says if we brought rates down to what our February budget had expected them to be, the result would be a combination of economic growth and a wiping out of the deficit by 1995. It points out a dark side would be an inflation rate that would be disruptive, causing a return to monetary restraint in the mid-1990s. In short, this is a flight plan for a roller-coaster ride. It is precisely that flight plan that we are trying to smooth out so that we can have the inflationary pressures kept under control today, so we do not have the boom-bust that we had in 1981-82 and save people the anguish they endured at that time.

That is the policy of this government and, as we see inflationary pressures come down further, we will be able to get interest rates down further and lead to the strong competitive position that both my hon. friend and I want to get. The difference between the two of us is that our way is going to work. His way would not work.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The Federal Court decision of December 1989 stated, and in fact ordered, the federal government to revoke the licence to the province of Saskatchewan for the Rafferty-Alameda project unless there was an agreement reached with the province of Saskatchewan that would stop all construction other than that for safety reasons until there was an environmental review held and reported.

Some hon. members: Order.

Point of Order

Mr. de Jong: The province of Saskatchewan has ignored the conditions of the original licence. It has broken the agreement. The panel has resigned. As things stand now, this government and the Minister of the Environment are in defiance of the court order with every day that passes.

My question to the minister is this.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, if you could calm them down.

Mr. Speaker: It would probably help if the hon. member would put his question.

Mr. de Jong: My question to the minister is this. Why does he not revoke the licence and then attempt to negotiate an agreement with Saskatchewan that would allow a proper environmental review to occur? Why does he not first revoke the licence?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as I have mentioned before, I fully intend and this government fully intends to live by the intent and the wording of the court order. We will do exactly that. We will respect the court. There is no question that could be raised about that issue.

TRADE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade and has to do with the recent increases levied by the United States government on Canadian exports.

The minister will know that as of October first changes to the merchandising processing fees were brought about in the U.S., which has been a great imposition on our exporters to the U.S. In some cases these fees have been increased by 500 per cent. In other instances fees have been levied where there have never been fees in the past.

Are these fees consistent with the GATT? Are they consistent with the FTA? If they are not, what can we as a government do about it?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman asks one of the few rational questions that I have heard in this Question Period.

With respect to his question, we have made protests to the Congress and to the U.S. administration. The hon. gentleman will be glad to know that the free trade agreement provides for the staged elimination of these user fees within five years. The first reduction was implemented on January 1, 1990. While this is unfair and we believe totally unjustified, as a result of our negotiations of the FTA these charges will all disappear over the next four years.

I would like to congratulate the Prime Minister on his foresight in connection with this matter.

POINT OF ORDER

THE LATE RIFAAT MAHGOUB

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, last April, along with other members of this House, I was a member of a delegation, the Association internationale de parlementaire de langue francaise.

We went to Egypt and met with Mr. Rifaat Mahgoub, who was the Speaker of the Egyptian Parliament. He was assassinated last week. I recall at the time with the other members of the Canadian delegation when the Speaker met with us that he alerted us to the dangers of extremism in the Middle East.

I would like to express on my own behalf, and I think speaking for many of the other members of the House, our deepest regrets to the Government of Egypt and to the people and the Parliament of Egypt on this sad occasion.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government, and I am sure on behalf of all of the House, I would want to associate myself with the comment and sympathy raised by hon. friend.

I have had the opportunity to communicate the profound regret of Canada to my colleague, Abdul Mequid, the foreign minister of Egypt.

This is another indication of a cycle of violence in that region which we all hope can be brought to an end. Many of us who had the opportunity of meeting the former Speaker understand personally the shock of that tragedy that has been sent throughout Egypt and that has sobered all of us as to the importance of finding an early solution to the tensions in that region.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the right hon. member. It was an important statement to make on behalf of this Parliament and on behalf of the Canadian people. We would also like to be associated with the remarks sent by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Government of Egypt.

Clearly this is something that every Canadian finds repugnant, as it brings home more clearly that politics is an uncertain business in Canada and is a dangerous business in other parts of the world.

We recognize that for many of the people who take on public office in that region it is a matter of enormous commitment and of some real risk. We hope that some solution can be found to these perilous times in that very difficult region. We hope that this event, if there is anything to come out of it, might provide some reminder of just how important it is that peace be found.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-336, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (tuition credit).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to restrict the availability of the tuition credit in relation to educational institutions providing courses at a post-secondary school level by ensuring that such a tax credit shall only apply where the taxpayers are enrolled in one or more courses at a post-secondary school level.

The effect of this private member's bill will be to close a rather gaping loophole in the Income Tax Act which currently allows people to claim income tax credits for tuition fees at institutions, including private schools, in circumstances which were never intended by the drafters of the act.

I would hope that the Minister of Finance might be prepared to examine this private member's bill and to have the House move forward on it in the very near future.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

BILL C-21

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition, in accordance with Standing Order 36, which has been duly certified by the clerk. It is from 35 of my constituents from the area of Catalina, Bonavista, Port Union, Little Catalina, Melrose, and Elliston.

This petition is concerned about the extra four weeks that people in Newfoundland have to qualify for unemployment insurance. They are very concerned that they will not qualify as the rule stands right now.

I have well over 3,000 in my riding who are concerned about this matter. I was in Catalina and Bonavista this past weekend and the number of people who came to me was well in advance of the 35 who have signed here.

They are concerned that the unemployment rate in Newfoundland is of the highest order in the country. They humbly pray that the variable entrance requirements will be introduced, which would reduce their qualifying time for UIC from 14 weeks to 10 weeks.

CANADA POST

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today, under Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by 1,784 residents of Winnipeg North. The petitioners object to the closure of postal services at the Chapman Pharmacy. They point out that the Chapman Pharmacy is conveniently located at a major intersection in Winnipeg, offers optimally convenient hours for residents of the surrounding areas, and has a surrounding community that consists of many seniors and lower-income Canadians who rely heavily on nearby services including the complete range of services provided by this pharmacy.

• (1510)

Moreover, no adequate consultation with this pharmacy was done, and the shortest possible notice was given. Even the month chosen to give notice was one during which the House of Commons was in recess; hence the concerns of the pharmacists and their customers could not be voiced in Parliament in time. Indeed this postal service outlet has served the community for many decades.

Hence, the petitioners ask Parliament to do all it can in order for the minister responsible for Canada Post Corporation to reconsider the decision taken by this corporation to close postal services at the Chapman Pharmacy, in the interest of fairness to the Chapman Pharmacy and in recognition of the excellent postal services it has rendered to its many customers who stand to suffer should the closure persist. Therefore, the petitioners seek remedy in this House.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour of presenting petitions on behalf of Canadians, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The residents of Canada who signed this petition state that the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child protects children's human rights in such key areas as adoption, survival, development, protection of the child's identity, sexual exploitation, neglect, and drug abuse.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge strongly the federal government to encourage universal adherence to the UN Convention of the Rights of the Child and prompt an effective implementation of its provisions.

The petitioners ask the federal government to review its legislation and policies for consistency with the convention.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On Friday I began a question of privilege on the behaviour of the New Democratic House leader and was asked to come back on Monday to continue that presentation in the expectation that the member would be here.

I see that the member is not here. I would just simply like to confirm with the Chair that I will be allowed to proceed with those arguments when in fact the House leader of the New Democratic Party does arrive in the House and, if that is later this day for some reason, that I would be properly notified by the Table so that I would have an adequate chance to prepare and appear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has taken note of the government Whip's comments.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—THE RECESSION

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst):

That this House condemn this government for planning and implementing the first ever made-in-Canada recession.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to establish from the outset that this governement planned and implemented a recession whose existence is recognized by practically all Canadians.

In the past few weeks, the minister said repeatedly that in his February Budget he projected data that clearly showed we would be Ain a slowdown—to use the minister's words—that the unemployment rate would increase and that the country's economic growth rate would drop or disappear altogether. This means, Mr. Speaker—and this is very a very important point—that, as we said in our motion, the government indeed planned and implemented this recession.

What Canadians deplore, however, is the fact that the Minister of Finance apparently cannot accept that his planning led to the results desired by this government—a recession, in other words.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that in this debate, it would be important to hear the Minister of Finance agree, once and for all, and this would at least be a start towards solving the problem, that Canada is indeed in a full-fledged recession.

We need only listen to the comments of all partners in our economy. We could ask about inflation in Quebec: what inflation? The Minister of Finance steadfastly refuses to accept there is such a thing, although we are aware of it and its existence has been recognized, for instance, by the Conference Board of Canada, the Mouvement Desjardins, the National Bank of Canada and a wide range of representatives from the business community, labour, consumers and by Canadians in general.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, what we believe Canadians are more concerned about than anything else at this point, recognizing that there is very little that individual Canadians and even corporations can do about the recession in which we find ourselves, is the refusal of the minister to recognize the fact that we are, in fact, in a recession and, as our motion states, it is a made-in-Canada recession.

I listened with great interest to the comments of the Minister of Finance during Question Period, when he said such things as "cast your mind back to 1981-82" and commented on the high rates of interest and the high rates of inflation that Canada was experiencing at that time.

The Minister of Finance knows well that it was a phenomenon that was rampant throughout the western world. We had situations in the United States and in western Europe where inflation and interest rates were going through the roof.

The Minister of Finance pointed out to the Leader of the Opposition that there was a discrepancy in the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition, in his capacity then as a member of the government, and what he is saying now. I would like to point out that it is awful dangerous, as I am sure the Minister of Finance is aware, to comment on what was said 10 years ago, when the Minister of Finance was occupying a somewhat different position himself at that point in time.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): But I did not make that type of comment.

Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Let me quote the Minister of Finance in 1984. He said this: "What we remember most about that period", speaking about the early eighties, "is the fact that interest rates were far higher than they should have been. Interest rates skyrocketed during that period to between 22 per cent and 25 per cent. The reason was largely because of what went on in the United States and the very high interest rate policy followed there".

Mr. Speaker, this is what Canadians are getting extremely upset about. It is that we do not seem, as politicians, regardless of which side of the House we sit on, to remember what we said not all that long ago. We are very quick to point out some conflicts perhaps in positions taken by members of the Opposition but very slow to accept what the Minister of Finance and others were saying at that point.

In that same speech in this place, in 1984, the Minister of Finance, speaking then as the financial critic for the Opposition, stated that the 1981 budget raised taxes just at the point when the economy was falling into recession and we should have been reducing taxes.

I wonder what the Minister of Finance thinks about that formula now, as he continues to berate the Senate for being very careful about the implementation of the goods and services tax. Most observers recognize it will take a pretty substantial amount of money out of the Canadian economy at a time when we are going to be in a recession.

The Minister of Finance says we are wrong. I listen to him in this House and in his speeches in Edmonton and other places, when he suggests that the GST bill must come out of the Senate because it is fundamental to his deficit-reduction program and it is fundamental to the government's revenue-generation plan.

Again, relating to the comments made by the Minister of Finance when he was finance critic in 1984, referring to the recession that we had experienced in the early eighties, he said: "We were helpless, as we watched the United States rates climb higher and higher. Canadian rates followed".

Mr. Speaker, that is the point. Canadian rates are not following now, Canadian rates are four and five points above the American base rate. It is an historical situation to see that much of a margin between Canadian and American rates. Yet, the Minister of Finance insists on casting our minds back—he talks about dying before we get to heaven, and so forth—and asks the question as to why the members of the Opposition support the Senate in its fight against the goods and services tax.

I want to point out to the Minister of Finance that the reason Canadians and members of the opposition support the Senate in this fight against the goods and services tax is because they know the senators who are fighting the tax are right. It is not very complicated.

It is one thing to be selective and to suggest that big brother is right and they are always correct, when in fact, if we go back to the budget wherein the minister set out his pattern that could lead into a recession, because he was half right, he said that unemployment would go up and growth would slow or else disappear. But he also said that interest rates were going to come down significantly and would average on the calendar year 11.1 per cent.

We were dead wrong on that. As everybody in the country knows, interest rates over this year will be significantly higher than what was projected in the budget.

One could think that perhaps the opposition is guilty of overstating the case, that after five years—because the Minister of Finance celebrated his anniversary in Edmonton, I understand when he made his speech on September 17, and it was six years—you would think, Mr. Speaker, that after six years, the minister would recognize that even friends of the government, people who were extremely vocal in 1988 with respect to the government's performance to that point and what they had projected for free trade, had come out and stated that they are concerned about the economic mismanagement. This is not the Liberal Party of Canada talking about what is happening to our economy.

I quote from the joint statement on the national economy made October 11 by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Business Council on National Issues. They state, "We wish to underline the growing concern within the Canadian business community that domestic macroeconomic mismanagement, persistent fiscal laxity and a failure to come to grips with the magnitude of the competitiveness challenge confronting Canadian industry are steadily undermining Canadians' economic prospects".

We could go on at length and join the chorus of boos across the country with respect to the government's performance on the economy, but I do not think that that serves any useful purpose because it has all been said. Canadians are aware that when people are confronted with problems in their personal life, in their business life, whatever the case might be, the first step toward trying to correct the difficulty or the problem is to recognize it.

I believe that what Canadians want from the Minister of Finance and from the Prime Minister are not statements that this economic slowdown is healthy or that things are going according to plan. They want to knows specifically first of all, does the government recognize that the kinds of projections that are involved in budget documents, and the kinds of assessments that are made in speeches on the state of the Canadian economy do not reflect the human suffering that is going on in the country, when bankruptcies are at very, very high levels across the country, when unemployment is increasing, when housing starts are down and people generally are discouraged. It is not just the fact that they are faced with that we are in a recession, it is the seeming inability of the government to understand the depth of the problem.

I hope, as we pursue this debate today, that we will have provided the Minister of Finance with an opportunity to discuss the interest policy, to tell us why in 1990 we should be leading the way for Americans in showing them where they can invest their money at extremely high levels of interest, why we are killing our export industry. We talk on the one hand about correcting the difficulty with the manufacturers' sales tax, when in fact the high value of the Canadian dollar is doing more damage to Canadian exports than the FST or the MST has ever done, even taking into account that the government has increased the federal sales tax from 9 to 13.5 per cent in the five and half to six years they have been in power.

I hope we will be able to hear from the Minister of Finance today. What Canadians are looking for is first, does the government and the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance accept the fact that we are in a real recession. It is not a question of technical recession. Looking at the number of jobs that we are losing across the country and the increasing rate of unemployment, can we get a clear, categorical statement from the government, through the Minister of Finance, that yes, we are in a recession. Then can we begin to deal with it in the life of that reality.

The difficulty of trying to deal with any problem in Canada as a politician today is a major challenge. We have heard a great deal of what is going on in the other place. I know that the Minister of Finance and other members of government on a regular basis discuss the bills that are before the members of the other place. They ask Canadians to try and force the issue to make sure the goods and services tax passes.

When we went across the country with the Standing Committee on Finance of the House of Commons, we met many people who, in various ways, were very calm, logical and rational in their presentations. Others were extremely upset and very aggressive in their rejection of the goods and services tax. I am sure the same experience occurred for members of the Senate when they went across the country and met with Canadians in discussing the goods and services tax.

To put things in perspective, when people are facing a made-in-Canada recession—most of the time we like to have little stickers on things saying, made in Canada, we are proud of it, we have put the red flag on it and we have logos to indicate that particular products are made in Canada. I do not think anyone is very proud of the fact that we have a made-in-Canada recession.

People are frustrated as we enter this recession. Many sectors of the economy and parts of the country have been in a recession for some time. It is not something that happened last week when the Conference Board of Canada came out with its report. I see headlines in the press over the weekend saying: "Racket emanates at anti-GST rally" and noisemakers and so on. Although some people have had some reservations about some of the approaches taken by senators at specific times in their fight against the GST, I believe that in the context of what people have to face in the real world, they understand the frustration of the senators.

On the weekend I had the occasion to speak with literally hundreds of people. Not one person said, "Tell the senators to pass the GST." Some people had some comments about some of the goings on in the other place but no one said, "Make sure when you get back to Ottawa that you tell those people in the other place to pass the goods and services tax." One of the things we have to understand is that the members of the Liberal Party who sit in the Senate are very much aware that what they had done in that place will in fact require that Senate reform take place.

People are focusing on the Senate and need for reform in the Senate. I would hope that a lot of Canadians would focus on the need to reform the institutions of Parliament, including the House of Commons. It is nearly unfathomable that we would sit in this place and be going back to our constituencies on the weekends and spending time through the summer and being in contact with our constituents through our offices, that members on the government side, as a block, would support the goods and services tax as we move deeper into a recession.

It seems to me that there has to be new mechanisms put in place to allow for members of Parliament to speak their minds on issues that are important to their constituents. Although there may be frustration with some of the parliamentary procedures, there is far more frustration for people who do not reflect the views of their constituents.

I would hope as we go through this debate that we will hear from the Minister of Finance. One of the things that many people have understood about this government is that it has reacted many times to polling and has made decisions on the basis of how it perceives Canadian public opinion to be responding on a certain issue.

There is no doubt that it has given up the battle on this. There is not question as it relates to the goods and services tax or management of the economy in general, that the government has taken the John Paul Jones approach of damn the torpedoes and full speed ahead, and we are going to do it regardless.

I know the Minister of Finance has held that office almost longer than any finance minister in the history of this country. Whether or not he has decided to go down with the ship is something we are going to learn in the very near future. It is important for Canadians to feel that the Minister of Finance understands their problems. Second, it is important for Canadians to believe that the Minister of Finance and the government will respond to those problems. We believe that the government has to bring in a revised budget, if not a new budget, a mini budget, a new statement. The September 17 statement in Edmonton recognized some of the changes that have occurred in our economy. But the fact is that the projections in the budget the minister brought in in February are completely off base because so much of it is now proven to be erroneous.

It is no longer a question of speculation on interest rates. It is no longer a question of speculation on the amount of the deficit. We are in a different situation and Canadians believe that they have a right to have the finance minister come in. He does not have to say: "Mea culpa," and beat his chest. He just has to say what Canadians already know, that it has not turned out the way we thought it would, and we believe we now have to change. We have to say to the Governor of the Bank of Canada that there has to be a reduction in interest rates and that he is not moving in a long-term way with enough credibility to be able to force the value of the Canadian dollar down to try to protect our export industries.

The other question I want to draw on before I conclude is the argument by the Minister of Finance and government members that there are no alternatives. When the Minister of Finance came before the Canadian people after the 1984 election, he talked about a long-term plan to stabilize the fiscal situation in the country. He talked about tax reform, deficit reduction, and spending restraint.

We are in a far worse situation now than we were in 1984. The minister can say that relatively speaking, and using the right numbers, there have been some improvements. But the fact of the matter is that the debt is far higher, the cost of servicing the debt is far higher, and interest rates are higher than they have ever been in relation to American rates in terms of the separation between the two. What we need to find out today, or very soon, is if the government is prepared to look at alternatives.

When the minister states that there are no alternatives, surely he understands that it is not within the realm of possibility for ordinary Canadians, or even people who have a lot of expertise in the tax field, to come in with a panacea. The minister has been struggling with it for six years.

Neil Brooks of the University of Toronto came out with an alternative suggestion. Dennis Mills of our party has been working at trying to put forward a simple tax proposal. There is another group at the University of Toronto that recently put forward some proposals to deal with the replacement for the goods and services tax. We are not suggesting that any one of these alternatives is the absolute answer.

What we want to continue to impress on the government and the Canadian people is that the Liberal Party believes the only way to have meaningful and credible tax reform is to deal with it on a massive basis through consideration of what the implications are for provincial governments and municipal governments. There is no simple solution of shifting the burden of taxation from one level of government to the other because the taxpayer is always the same.

We believe this is a made-in-Canada recession and that it was planned and put in place by the government. We hope we will have an opportunity to hear from the Minister of Finance who will recognize that we are now in that recession that the government has planned. What we want to hear is how does he intend to get us out of the recession.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the comments of my hon. friend, who probably could have said them all in 30 seconds because there were absolutely no alternatives there. He referred to some alternatives of other organizations but made a specific point of not endorsing any one of these as the senior finance critic of the Liberal Party.

Why is it that the Liberal Party always shies away from proposing alternatives? Why, when he is critical of the policies we have been following, can he not put forward one or two proposals that might be considered as options? I have never said that I have all the answers. I acknowledge that I do not have all the answers, but I do listen to people and get suggestions of alternatives. We do make adjustments, but I have never had an alternative from the Liberal Party of Canada.

As an example, the hon. member was quite critical of our fiscal record in his comments. Yet, every time we have proposed something to get the deficit down and to reduce spending, the Liberal Party has resisted. It has fought us. It has laid across the tracks. Every time we have come up with something, it has resisted. This makes it much more difficult for us to deal with the problem that he is critical of us not doing a better job on.

Let the hon. member say to me what are the options, what are the alternatives, and what are the things that the Liberal Party would put forward as possible things that we can consider.

Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the point that the minister makes with respect to alternatives and his consultative process are worthwhile.

We were very fortunate last year in the Standing Committee on Finance in the House of Commons to have an unanimous recommendation. The Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, the eight Conservative members, the four Liberal members, and the two NDP members all agreed unanimously that interest rates in Canada had to come down. We made that recommendation to the Minister of Finance and to the government.

In addition to that, at the same time, there was a similar recommendation from all the premiers from all the provinces across Canada. Obviously, that recommendation was ignored.

On the question of alternatives, if anyone in the country should be aware of how difficult it is to formulate an alternative, it should be the Minister of Finance. He has been at it for six years. In the opinion of the National Council on Business, the Chamber of Commerce, and, just last week, the CMA, there was mismanagement of the economy by the Minister of Finance and the government with thousands of people at their beck and call to provide some direction and some policy decisions.

What we suggest is that the kind of unilateral non-consultative approach taken by the government is what has got us into this mess. I believe that the recommendation made by the Mayor of Vancouver, when we had our hearings in his city last year, that there has to be widespread consultation dealing with all three levels of government to avoid the kind of thing that has occurred in the last few months. Just transferring the burden of taxation from one level of government to the other is not the way to go.

The last point I would make is that in the minister's speech in Edmonton on September 17, he stated: "I and my departmental officials have been following carefully and closely what Canadians have been saying during a wide range of consultations and public meetings."

Since that time, we have had all the leading business people in the country, the Labour Congress, the labour leadership, and sectorial people in all the areas of the economy come forward and say that the Minister of Finance is completely wrong in the approach he is taking.

My goodness, the bottom line is who in the world believes that the minister would listen to the Liberal Party when he is not listening to anybody else in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to hear the Liberal Party critic comment on the economy. On the other hand, we also get that uncertain feeling because, as you know, his party almost brought this country to the verge of bankruptcy. Remember that $40 billion deficit in 1984! That was six years ago, Mr. Speaker. Quite an achievement! So today, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate our Minister of Finance, who is here all the same this afternoon to listen to what Liberal members have to say. It was quite an experience to hear their comments, after seeing those same members vote against Bill C-23, which imposed a minimum tax on the rich. This is incredible, coming from a party that claims to defend the interests of the needy! I may also point out that the same party, both here in the House and the Senate, rose up against Bill C-22 which guaranteed investments totalling $600 million in Quebec, in the field of research. We know how important that is.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to take this opportunity to ask the hon. member about one particular item, because a few minutes ago, he mentioned transfers to the provinces. I don't mind hearing Liberal members talk about generalities, but I wish he would tell me the rate of increase in federal payments to the provinces since 1984.

• (1540)

And if the hon. member is wrong, I will raise a question of privilege, so my Minister of Finance can inform the House about the rate of increase in transfer payments to the provinces since 1984, and what our new policy is vis-à-vis the provinces.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should not be surprised if his constituents raise a question of privilege with respect to his comments. If he claims to speak for Quebec and for his constituents when he asks what this government's policy is vis-à-vis the provinces, he gives the impression he does not know what is going on.

At this very moment, Mr. Speaker, there are Canadian provinces before the courts who are trying to defend their rights under the Constitution and ensure that transfer levels are maintained.

An hon. member: He did not talk about that!

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, my question is quite straightforward. I always like to keep things short and sweet.

I asked the hon. member about the rate of increase in distribution of federal payments to the provinces since 1984. This ratio exists—the hon. member is an expert, as the Liberal Finance critic—so could he simply tell me what the rate of federal transfers to the provinces has been since 1984?

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, depending on the program, the rate of transfer payments to the provinces is before the courts, because the government, according to some provinces, is not living up to its obligations.

Of course, if the hon. gentleman wants to have the rates on an annual or province-by-province basis, I would be delighted to send him the information if it is not available to him through his minister.

However, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be even more important for the minister to talk to representatives of the Mouvement Desjardins, the National Bank of Canada and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and find out what is happening to the economy and what this recession is all about.

Does the hon. member know—does he himself know—we are in a recession, yes or no? That is the question, Mr. Speaker! He asked for a few figures between 1984 and 1990, but one thing is certain—I want to get back to the hon. member's comment that in 1984, there was a deficit of $40 billion. This year, Mr. Speaker, the deficit will be over $30 billion, after six years under the present Minister of Finance.

The question is still the same: do the Minister of Finance and his colleague, the hon. member for Chicoutimi, realize that Quebec, like the rest of Canada, is in a recession? That is the question we are asking today. Do you, as a government and as elected representatives, realize that the people in your province—entrepreneurs and private citizens—are in a recession?

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my friend from Acadie—Bathurst for an excellent presentation. I want to come back to something that the minister put to him a moment ago, because by inference there is a suggestion that should not be overlooked.

The minister made much of my friend having alternatives—

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): No, not having alternatives.

Mr. Simmons: —made much of the need to have alternatives. I think he will agree that is a fair statement of what he was saying. I am submitting to the House, I say to the minister, that part of his question, part of his comment, was that the member for Acadie—Bathurst ought to have alternatives. Does he agree on that?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Yes.

Mr. Simmons: Yes. I am glad he agrees on that because I want to put a question to my friend from Acadie—Bathurst. He is a man of considerable memory and, although he was not here pre-1984, he was in elected politics and I am sure he has researched the record extremely well.

Can he affirm for the House that the Minister of Finance, who now advocates that he—the member for Acadie—Bathurst—ought to have specific alternatives, espoused the proposed goods and services tax when the minister was in opposition? Can he tell us that that was the case? I am sure it is the case judging by what the minister has said in this Chamber, but can he assure us that it is indeed the case?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The period set aside for questions and comments has now expired, unless the House gives unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Burin—St. George's. On a point of order?

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The question was not put to the minister. Point of order.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Burin—St. George's, on his point of order, but briefly.

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I submit that the member for Acadie—Bathurst ought to have an opportunity to answer my question. I had risen at the same time as the gentleman from the backbench and you, Mr. Speaker, recognized two from the same party in succession, which is not the practice in this House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but the Standing Orders are quite clear: without unanimous consent, the period for questions and comments is limited to ten minutes. Resuming debate. The Minister of Finance.

[English]

Mr. Simmons: You can't answer the question.

An hon. member: He will answer you, don't worry.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there were two questions—

Mr. Simmons: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Burin—St. George's on a point of order.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the tradition in this period of questions and answers is that the member to whom the question was put gets, however brief, enough time to respond, I submit in not allowing him to respond, Mr. Speaker, are not allowing for a fair debate in this Chamber.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has no objection to continuing questions and comments but it must have the unanimous consent of the House. Do I have unanimous consent?

[English]

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. Minister of Finance now has the floor.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I said that I would respond to the two questions. The member for Burin—St. George's asked whether I mentioned the GST in opposition before 1984. No, and I will give the hon. member the reason why. It is because in the previous government, Mr. MacEachen, now Senator MacEachen, authorized a study on sales taxes which came to the government just around the time of the 1984 election.

I would point out to the hon. member that I did talk about it in the 1988 election. It was based on that 1988 election consideration, and all the discussions and consultations that we had beforehand is the justification for the proposal right now.

On the second question my hon. friend in his very cute answers had no alternatives, just vacuous generalities. He was asked about the increase in transfers to the provinces. The answer is 6.1 per cent on average over the last six years and the program spending for the Government of Canada—in other words, its own spending—is 3.7 per cent. So the transfer to the provinces have been considerably greater than what we have spent on all other things in the Government of Canada.

Since 1984, as my hon. friend knows, we have set forward a very clear plan of economic policy for the country. There are three fundamental issues that we have been following here. One is to deal with the nation's finances—the deficit and the debt problem.

My colleague during his comments said that we were backing away from all the major challenges. I do not see how the hon. member for a minute can say that we have backed away from the major challenges of cutting government spending when we have had to deal with difficult issues such as the closing of bases which is close to his part of the country. It has affected places there. VIA Rail has affected his part of the country—very much so. These are decisions that we do not enjoy taking, but we have not backed away from them.

On the one hand, my hon. friend criticizes me for not getting the deficit down, then on the other hand ignores the very difficult and tough decisions that we have taken in getting the deficit down.

The second area of our economic policy is reducing structural barriers, privatization, deregulation, training for people who are out of work, tax reform, both corporate and personal income tax, and now sales tax reform, and finally, getting the problem of inflation under control. We have made some very clear and very tangible progress here.

The cost of running the government today was $100 million less last year in dollars spent—not inflation adjusted dollars but in dollar spent—than in 1984.

I have talked about our record of controlled program spending. In the operating balance, we came from a $16 billion deficit to a $14 billion surplus this year, a $30 billion turnaround.

Our success here has been greater than the United States. We have moved further in a shorter period of time than the United States has in dealing with their deficit problem. So we have seen a made-in-Canada improvement in our control of our fiscal position. We have also seen a made-in-Canada improvement of the economic capacity of the government because of this range of structural policy changes that are equivalent to $30 billion, or equivalent on an ongoing basis annually to the size of the gross provincial product of the province of Manitoba.

• (1550)

We have debated the GST. We have debated it endlessly in this House. That will put our exporters and importers on a level playing field with the international competition, something that will help us generate jobs here in Canada.

The OECD describes a process we have been following in structural reform as substantial and as noteworthy. The Economic Council of Canada review has also commented very positively on what we have been able to do in dealing with these structural issues.

Now, inflation control. Inflation was a problem. It was getting out of control, but we have brought inflation down, for the seventh consecutive month, to 4.1 per cent. We have real challenges here because the pressures are pretty substantial. As I pointed out, in the United Kingdom they were 10.9 per cent last month. That gives some indication of what happens to a country that does not take its inflation problem seriously.

From 1984 to 1989 we had a made-in-Canada growth in this country which was second only to that of Japan. A million and a half new jobs were created by Canadian businesses here. Again, a made-in-Canada boom in this country. The growth that we have seen, the second longest period of continuous growth in the post-war period, has resulted in real benefits to the standard of living of Canadians: from 1983 to the present, a 16 per cent improvement in average per capita income, after inflation, after income taxes. That amounts to an $8,000 improvement in the purchasing power of the average Canadian family.

Credit growth was getting out of hand though, Mr. Speaker. We had credit growth. Consumer credit reached a peak of 15 per cent. In June it was still a 10.2 per cent increase, almost double what it was in the United States.

Business credit growth, again 2 percentage points higher than the United States; mortgage credit growth, 16 per cent in the month of June—that is twice the rate of growth of our economy and about two and a half times the rate of mortgage growth in the United States.

Unit labour costs, one of the best measures of our competitive position, which my hon. friend is concerned about and his colleague from Etobicoke North was concerned about earlier in Question Period. We were seeing an increase in our unit labour costs a good deal higher than the United States and about twice as high as the rate of growth in Germany and Japan. So we needed a firm monetary policy to deal with the problem that we have today.

My hon. friend talked about the problems of 1981-82, saying that they were quite different. In Canada they were the same. The economy was growing more quickly than the capacity of the country to handle. it was for that reason that we had to impose the higher interest rate policy in Canada, to deal with this Canadian problem. I make no apologies for that.

What we have done, Mr. Speaker, is to be sensitive. We listened very carefully to what is happening in the economy. I know there are tough times out there. I talked to businesses that are closing. I talked to people who have lost their jobs. I take no satisfaction whatsoever in that. But I do know that if we had ignored this problem, the problems we would have faced in six months, nine months, a year, two years down the road would have been far more serious, far more disruptive, far more damaging to the prospects of Canadians than is the case right now. We have this problem under control now to a far greater extent than—again, let me remind you—is the case in Great Britain.

We have had made-in-Canada growth. It developed into a made-in-Canada problem so we imposed a made-in-Canada solution so we can have made-in-Canada strong non-inflationary growth into the future. This is what my hon. friend, my hon. colleague from the Liberal Party is asking for, a policy response and a clear sense of direction to Canadians as to the policies that we are following and where this is going to take us as a country.

What I find very difficult to accept, Mr. Speaker, is the continued allegations on the other side that we could have a reduction in interest rates just by snapping our fingers.

These people should listen to what the Economic Council or what the three business groups that my hon. friend referred to just a minute ago said. They said: "The only way you are going to get interest rates down is to control government spending, not just the Government of Canada, but all governments because all governments are part of this problem." That is a clear message that came out from the business groups last week.

My friend is selectively ignoring these words. He is selectively ignoring the proposals, the prescriptions that these organizations have come up with. They say: "You have to get the deficit down." You cannot just snap your fingers and hope for lower interest rates. Interest rates will only come down if the circumstances are right to support lower interest rates.

This is where I have the greatest difficulty with the policies of the Liberal Party. It says: "Your fiscal policy is wrong. You should have a lower deficit. You should have lower interest rates." Then, what do we hear from them? We just heard the best example.

There was a vacuous, totally empty response when I asked what the alternatives were. What are the things that the opposition parties are suggesting we should do to get the deficit down to allow us to get the interest rates down? There was an empty response, and my hon. friend knows it. I think he is embarrassed about it, but that is what his leadership has told him to do.

I referred to this in Question Period I referred to, and I repeat it again. The Economic Council did come up with a scenario that said if rates were brought down to our February budget level, the result would be a combination of economic growth and a wiping out of the deficit by 1995. They also pointed out a dark side: "That would be an inflation rate that would be disruptive, causing a return to monetary restraint in the mid-1990s. In short, this is a flight plan for a roller-coaster ride." That is the point that I wanted to make.

We know that the economy is in tough shape. We know that people are going through a difficult period here. The key that we have to ask ourselves is: If we had taken the roller-coaster ride that the Economic Council has described, where would we be in one, two, three or five years time? We are determined not to get into that same trap that was fallen into not just by the government here in Canada, but by governments in other parts of the world as well. That is why we are following these policies.

This takes me to where we are now in the life of this Parliament. This government has put forward four pieces of legislation. Bill C-21 is the unemployment insurance bill. It includes a number of elements of unemployment insurance reform, designed to broaden the scope of unemployment insurance at the same time as tightening up on unemployment insurance, and also providing some financing to the Government of Canada to allow it to get its deficit down.

Bill C-28 is a number of income tax measures, including the large corporations tax. Bill C-69 is a bill designed to reduce a number of government spending programs so that all of these together can take real action to get the deficit under control.

In addition, Bill C-62 is designed to stabilize the fiscal position of the Government of Canada. All of these are designed to do precisely what the Economic Council and these business groups have suggested we do, get the deficit down.

In December 1987 we had a report from the senators. Senator MacEachen, Senator Buckwold, the current chairman of the finance committee, and Senator Kirby, all of those gentlemen are fighting these four bills, as well as the GST.

I believe I have seven more minutes, Mr. Speaker. I started at 3.45 p.m.

Those three senators are fighting the GST and these other bills. Those three senators came in with a report in a Liberal dominated committee which says that they recommend that the government scrap the federal sales tax and introduce a multi-stage, broad based sales tax, which is precisely what the goods and services tax is.

This is the hypocrisy that I see in this place when, on the one hand, we have people like my friend opposite saying: "You should do this." Then, on the other hand, he takes all the steps possible to make it extremely difficult if not impossible to do the things that he is precisely requesting that we do.

• (1600)

The Liberal Party ran in the last election and number two on the Liberal Party election platform was: "A Liberal government will not proceed with stage two of the Mulroney government's tax reform plan". That is the sales tax proposal, that is the GST proposal. The Liberal Party said it would not. The Liberal Party was not elected to form the government. The Conservative Party, under the Prime Minister, was elected to form the government.

Now we have a position where the elected government passed a bill in the House of Commons that was part of the Liberals' election platform to defeat and our election platform to pass. We have passed it, with a majority government supported by Canadians in the last election, and now we have not just the Liberal senators but a minority of the senators in the Senate saying: "No, we are going to rise up out of the past, we senators who were appointed by Mr. Trudeau when he was Prime Minister, and we are going to ignore what the people decided on November 21, 1988". They are going to do what that party which was defeated in that same election would do. They say that they are going to kill that tax, in spite of the fact that they were beaten on that platform.

I appeal to my hon. friend and to other members opposite because we have an important problem here, not only a fiscal problem. We have to get these bills passed to be able to deal with the fiscal position of the Government of Canada, and we have a fundamental, democratic problem here.

I just read from the editorial support here. One reads: "Shame on you Liberal senators". There are references to the Senate as an undemocratic anachronism. Others read: "Time for the deadlock clause"; "elected House must show the Senate who's boss"; "the Prime Minister had little choice"; "an abuse of Senate power, embarrassing to all Canadians"; "forget the shameful antics, we need the GST"; "surgery needed to save democracy and the GST"; "the games senators play"; "opinion polls no reason for Senate to stall the GST"; "anarchy in the Senate"; "the Liberals should be ashamed of themselves".

I have many, many more of these, but the answer is very clear: It is fundamentally important for the future of parliamentary democracy in this country that we proceed with this legislation that is being blocked in the Senate by the Liberal minority there. It is an important fiscal problem. Those bills are key to the ability of this government to manage the fiscal position of the Government of Canada.

I have not heard members opposite in the House of Commons who sit on the Liberal side saying why they feel in this day and age that we should have an unelected, appointed, unaccountable group of people who are appointed by a previous government. How can they justify that group of people blocking the will of the people as expressed on November 21, 1988 and as expressed in the platform of the Government of Canada?

The Liberals said they would block this if elected, but they were not elected. If we are going to establish a precedent of having a minority of senators blocking this legislation, I ask my colleagues opposite: Where does that leave us as a country? What recourse do the Canadian people have if they want to have a large corporations tax, if they want to have $500 million more in training programs, if they want to have maternity benefits, and if they want to see senior citizens who are earning more than $50,000 contribute toward lowering the deficit by putting back some or all of their Old Age Security? What recourse do Canadians have? They cannot vote out Allan MacEachen. They cannot vote out Michael Kirby. They cannot vote out Sid Buchwold. They have to wait for those gentlemen to reach age 75. That is not the right way.

People have said to me from other countries when I tell them what is going on here: "This is a joke. It is an anachronism. It is 19th century stuff. I thought we got rid of all this. What is going on? What is the GST?" When I explain it to them they say: "That is the same as our value added tax. Why are these unelected Liberal senators saying you should not have a tax we have had it for 20 or 25 years?"

This is the challenge that is facing Canadians and this House today. Are we going to pass this legislation which will help us get the fiscal position of the Government of Canada in a stabilized and normalized position? Are Liberal party members opposite going to continue to be held hostage by their colleagues in the Senate who are not elected?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We are now at the period for questions and comments. I would indicate to the Minister of Finance that the gesture I made five minutes ago was not meant to shorten his time, but simply to draw the attention of the clerks at the table.

[English]

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, first of all, on the question of the goods and services tax that allegedly the government party put forward in the last election, as I recall that proposal, even the minister's own technical documents in August of last year indicated that it would be visible, harmonized, fair, and revenue neutral.

I do not think one Canadian voted for the goods and services tax proposal that the minister has brought forward. We will let Canadians debate that, and I am sure they will whenever they have an opportunity.

I have a simple question for the Minister of Finance. The minister asked about alternatives. I indicated in a reply that I thought that what had been proposed by the Standing Committee on Finance in its report last year was a valid contribution to try to turn things around in this country and avoid the recession we are now in.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if in his widespread consultation he has done the following or, if he has not done so, if he would consider doing it now? Would the minister take the time, along with his officials, to contact the exporters, the manufacturers in Canada, and ask them this question: "Would you rather have the goods and services tax passed or would you rather have a 75–cent to 80–cent Canadian dollar and interest rates at 11 per cent?" I think it would be very interesting to get an answer to that question.

I believe we have the answer because we have been listening to these people. They will have to choose between the two because they will not be able to have both, in that the GST will cause inflation that will not make it possible to drop the interest rate as much as the minister might like. I think it would be very enlightening to ask the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and to ask the pulp and paper industry and the mining industry if they would rather have a 75-cent to 80-cent dollar with interest rates at 11 per cent or the GST.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is another one of the cute little tactics of the senior finance critic of the Liberal Party. It is not an either/or. No one has ever put it and no one should ever put it as an either/or question if they knew what they were talking about.

We are doing the GST for fundamental reasons because the existing tax is broken, and he knows full well it is. He also knows full well that the exporters, manufacturers, and others in this country on whom we depend for a significant number of jobs, need the GST.

The level of the Canadian dollar and our monetary policy are quite separate from whether or not we have the GST. The monetary policy must be there to deal with the inflationary problem that we have been struggling with over the past two and a half to three years.

My hon. friend referred to the finance committee report of about a year ago. At that time mortgage credit was growing at a rate of 17 per cent; consumer credit was growing at a rate of 12 to 14 per cent per annum; and business credit, 11 per cent, for an economy that was growing at a rate of 7 per cent or 8 per cent.

If he is suggesting that it would have been an appropriate, intelligent, prudent policy of the Governor of the Bank of Canada to lower interest rates at the time when credit demand was booming and suggesting that that would not lead to significantly higher inflation, I think that he is dead wrong. That is exactly what would have happened, and that is why we felt it was important.

I remind him that in August 1988 we had a unanimous recommendation from the provincial premiers to reduce interest rates. If we had done that, at this point in time we would be looking at an inflation rate probably closer to what they have in Great Britain at 10.9 per cent than the level of inflation today.

He says that the tax we promised was visible. I do not know how much more visible this tax could be. I wish it were invisible.

Harmonized, I have always said that it was my first preference to have a harmonized tax. We have the province of Quebec harmonizing with us. We have the province of Saskatchewan in discussions. We have other provinces talking about harmonizing.

Is it fair that the GST credit will reduce the amount of taxes paid by families earning less than $30,000? I believe that means a fair tax.

Revenue neutral, we can debate that one until the cows come home. I have stated very clearly what the position of the Government of Canada is and I stand by that.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question for the minister is in reference to his claim that only the Liberal opposition seems to be opposed to this insidious measure.

He will no doubt be aware that one of his colleagues stated recently in the newspaper that he had consider crossing the floor on the issue of the GST. I would like to just read a quote into the record: "Our office has never received as many calls and letters nor have I had as many comments burning my ears off about a whole series of issues. While constituents are unhappy about everything from free trade to the Oka crisis, Meech Lake, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's leadership and recent controversial Senate appointments, the GST remains atop the list".

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: The member for St. John's East yells out "propaganda". If that is propaganda, he should be aware that these were statements made recently in the newspaper by the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth who, the last time I looked, was still a member of the Conservative Party.

I would like to ask the minister what response he has to his colleague who obviously is feeling the heat from his constituents but does not have the guts to take the courage of his convictions and cross the floor to sit as an independent.

An hon. member: He will.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, her colleagues from Acadie—Bathurst says that we do not have the courage to meet these major challenges that we are faced with. If the GST is not a major challenge, I do not know what is, but I remind colleagues that for 50 years now, starting with the Rowell–Sirois report in 1940 and every 10 years since then, there have been recommendations to scrap the existing manufacturers' sales tax and bring in a new type of sales tax.

Jean Chrétien, when he was Minister of Finance in 1977, observed that the existing sales tax should be changed.

Allan MacEachen brought in a budget in 1981 to change the existing sales tax to the wholesale level. It did not work. He asked Wolfe Goodman of Toronto, one of the pre-eminent commodity tax practitioners in the country to bring in a report. Mr. Goodman brought in the report, as I said around the time of the 1984 election, and it was that report which said: "not at the wholesale level. You have to bring in a tax. To be a properly designed commodity tax, it should be brought in at the retail level".

In response to my friend from Hamilton East, sure, we are all feeling the heat. We all know that this tax is not popular, but colleagues on this side of the House are prepared to tough it out because they know it is the right thing for the country. They know that it is one of the most significant things that we can do to improve the economy of the country and also to put our exporters, people who compete against importers, in a solid position to compete and create jobs. Also it will reduce the cost of new investment in Canada, in the case of Quebec which has harmonized with us by 7.5 per cent, equivalent to a 7.5 per cent invest tax credit.

For someone who represents a steel town, why is my friend resisting a type of tax initiative that will have such a positive impact on the steel industry in Canada?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Finance relates to productivity. He is always talking in this House about how the tax system is designed to help our exports along and give some incentive to our manufacturers.

When I talk to the people in my city, which the Minister of Finance shares, the biggest disincentive to productivity is the sense of unfairness that exists on the shop floor and executive offices, which in turn goes all the way through the economy.

Does the minister really believe that he can create an environment of world-class productivity, with an environment in business where, forgetting for a moment the GST and all its complications, but just the entire tax system which people do not perceive to be fair and where they do not understand: there are parts of the tax act which are used for jobs, and there are parts of the tax act which are so old that it is just out of touch and out of date. When will the minister open the shop door and start listening to people who really know what productivity is all about and the current environment that he is creating—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret to interrupt the hon. member. Is there unanimous consent to let the hon. member continue his remarks?

Some hon. members: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Mills: How can the Minister of Finance possibly believe that a complicated system like the GST, his entire economic package right now, can do anything to promote productivity or a spirit in our economy that is going to lift us out of this recession we are in?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend would agree with me that the GST will remove a hidden burden of tax on all our exporters. That is going to help productivity. It puts Canadian companies on a fair and level playing field with the imports that they have to compete with, whereas now the imports pay one-third less tax. That helps our productivity. Moving to the GST will reduce the cost of new investment by 4 per cent for those provinces that have not harmonized and by 7.5 per cent in the case of Quebec that has harmonized. That is productivity.

I think what the hon. member is getting at is attitudes. My hon. friend has written a book on taxation. He is saying there is a sense of unfairness, and I say to him that he is fostering that sense of unfairness by using statistics for 1987 in that book which reflect the position before income tax reform. Things have changed fundamentally since that because of the large number of loopholes that we have removed as a result of sales tax reform, and in other budgets, and the result—

Mr. Mills: Corporate preferences haven't been administered.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Yes, the corporate preferences have been reduced significantly. The result is that the corporate tax rate, the effective tax rate, is higher and the level of profits is lower in this current year. So that tells me one thing, that corporations are paying a higher burden of tax.

The statistics for 1987 show that the chartered banks were paying no tax. This year they will be paying about $1 billion worth of tax. People earning more than $50,000 were paying about 32 per cent of the total tax burden in 1982. This year they will be paying about 38 per cent of the total tax burden.

If my hon. friend is fair to me and honest with the people of Canada he will use the proper figures and not figures that are out of date and provide an inappropriate illustration of what is going on.

• (1620)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the minister, in what was a chance for him to defend his policies, put forward a sunset of hopeful suggestions for this economy and for the future.

He suggested first that we have a fair fiscal and economic system in this country. Second, if I can quote his comments during Question Period today: "Our way is going to work", in short, that his economic strategy will be successful. Third, the tax which he is putting into effect at this point, the goods and services tax, is somehow exactly what this country needs. Let me suggest in all three of these points that the minister has tried to put forward that he is completely and utterly off base, completely and utterly wrong.

Let us look at the question of fairness. The fact is that across this country there are corporations which for the latest years for which we have statistics, not 1987 but 1989, these corporations—and I will give some examples—in fact gave greater donations to the Conservative Party of Canada than they made in terms of taxation contributions to the government of this country.

The donation of Xerox Canada to the Conservatives was small, only $11,500. If you consider their profits were $74.6 million, that might seem rather cheap. The minister might be rather unhappy with Xerox Canada. I suggest that he should be much more unhappy from a policy point of view that this same Xerox Canada, with its $11,500 contribution to his party, paid not a penny of taxes to the revenues of this country.

Confederation Life was not a great contributor to the Conservative Party. Its donation was about $11,200 out of a pre-tax profit of $103 million. Again, not a single penny paid into the revenues of this country.

Domtar is another example. It is a little bit bigger payer. It made a contribution of $45,000 to the Conservative Party out of pre-tax profits of $18 million. Not only did it not pay a penny in tax but received tax credits from the Government of Canada totalling $21 million.

Power Corporation donated to the Conservative Party over $72,000 out of profits of $214.5 million. It paid not a penny to the taxpayers of Canada, not a penny to the Government of Canada, but instead received credits of $2.1 million from this government.

If that can be called fairness, if that can be something that this minister can stand up and say he makes no apology for with respect to his economic policies, then all I can say is this minister has forgotten what this country is about and what the meaning of fairness is.

If we take a broader picture, if we get away from some of the specifics and look at the period 1984–85 up to 1889–90—again, these are periods the latest for which we have statistics—corporate taxes during that period did increase by 38.8 per cent. Personal taxes increased by 77.4 per cent which is in fact more than double the percentage that corporate taxes increased.

The government has increased sales and excise taxes, which it claims are so unfair in terms of the manufacturers' sales tax, more dramatically than any government in the last 20 years in this country. Those sales and excise taxes increased by 105.5 per cent.

So we take the three broad categories of taxation. It is very clear that despite the minister's rhetoric, despite the minister's attempt to tell us that everything is fair and acceptable, in fact corporate taxation has gone up far less in percentage terms than personal income tax. This is half the percentage increase of personal income taxes, and about a third of the percentage increase for sales and excise taxes. So much for the fairness that this minister speaks about.

We have suggested alternatives continually, using direct examples of tax systems which work in other countries. We suggested a minimum corporate tax, which is not some wild radical idea but something used in the United States, as the minister knows well, and which sees to it that there is at least some kind of contribution to the federal treasury on the part of corporations that make money in that country. So much for the question of fairness.

The minister has also suggested that his policies work. He suggested amazingly enough that after all, we do not want to look to Britain which has a 10.9 per cent inflation rate. We do not want that to happen to us in Canada. Margaret Thatcher, who runs the Government of Britain, is following precisely the policies which this minister and his government have pursued in this country; policies of cutbacks, high interest rates, massive increases in the level of interest rates, privatization of corporations and deregulation. Margaret Thatcher wrote the book. This minister is simply reading it out here in Canada. Then he has the gall to stand up in the House and to say that we do not want to do the same as has happened in Britain. We do not want to see these vast increases in inflation, when those vast increases in inflation are precisely the consequence of the kinds of policies that this Minister and this Prime Minister have followed in this country.

• (1630)

Frankly, I have not been able to believe it as, day after day in the House, the minister has got up and noted Margaret Thatcher's government and its terrible rate of inflation as a sign of the major problems which we could get into if we were not careful in Canada. I am not sure if the minister was thinking of a different country or a different prime minister.

It was Margaret Thatcher who stood in this House of Commons and endorsed this minister's policies for free trade, for instance, two years ago.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): A very astute woman.

Mr. Langdon: "A very astute woman," the minister says. That is very interesting. It was a very astute woman who has brought about an inflation rate of 10.9 per cent, which the minister stands up and criticizes without telling us that this very astute—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Is there unanimous consent to let the hon. member for Essex—Windsor continue his remarks?

An hon. member: His time is not over yet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry. Indeed the time for speeches is 20 minutes. I apologize. You have 10 minutes left.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I was just getting going.

The minister suggests that this is something which has worked, that we have had a policy which has worked and will work. To quote the minister: "Our way is going to work."

Let me suggest something to those who might care a little about details and about reality as opposed to myth. I will quote from the minister's budget of February 10, 1988. The minister suggested that the gross domestic product of the country would be increasing from a level of 3 per cent in 1989 to a level of 3.2 per cent in 1990–93. He suggested the unemployment rate would be falling to an average of 7.0 per cent; that inflation would be at 3.4 per cent, and, best of all, that the rate of interest would be at 6.7 per cent. That is exactly the kind of prediction or sense of the future which this minister has given us.

Let me quote what is best described as a slightly more sober view of the economy from the early part of the 1990s, as projected by the Conference Board of Canada last year. It suggested that the Gross Domestic Product is going to be increasing by 0.7 per cent in 1990; 0.4 per cent in 1991; and possibly up to 3.0 per cent in 1992. Every single figure is below the average which the minister suggested would be the case.

As for the unemployment rates, they will be at 7.9 per cent, 8.9 per cent, and 8.5 per cent, again, in every single case, well above the average suggested by the minister's own figures. I could say the same thing with respect to interest and inflation rates.

We have a minister who has had a chance to show that his policies work. In fact, he has had a long chance. The Canadian people have been long suffering with this minister. Yet, what we have seen emerge is the first recession created in this country by the policies of the government of this country. That is not me suggesting it. That is the Conference Board of Canada, a body which is usually very supportive of the minister.

In fact, the Conference Board has made it very clear that this first made-in-Canada recession is taking place at the same time that the United States, our major trading partner, may even avoid a recession. So much for success. So much for things working out.

The minister in February of 1988 said things were going to work out well, but they did not. Can we really expect to believe him in 1990 when he says things are going to work out well in the future? Or can we expect to see what the Liberals gave us in 1981-82 coming back again?

Can we expect to see a recession take place in which the unemployment rate does not stop at the 8.4 per cent at which it presently is, but go up to the 12 per cent that the Liberals gave us in the past?

Can we expect to see interest rates go, not to 14 per cent and 15 per cent, but to the 21 per cent and 22 per cent that the Liberals gave us?

Can we expect to see a recession not just for a year, as this minister is giving us, and that costs us, not just two percentage points of decline, but a 6 per cent decline in real growth as the Liberals gave us?

Are we going to see a conflict take place between the Liberals and the Conservatives to see who can drive the country further into depression? Are we going to see an attempt at outcompeting each other in poor economic mismanagement?

I think it is possible, Mr. Speaker, that this may take place. I hope, however, that there are alternatives that this minister chooses. I hope for instance the minister puts into effect a minimum corporate tax. I hope he cuts interest rates, as clearly could take place in this country. I hope that he establishes some new institutions: a national industrial bank, for instance, to help our industries to start to modernize faster and to get better prepared for world competition. Will he see the establishment of a regional set of development banks that will provide low interest rates in poorer parts of the country? Is it possible that we will see some effective adjustment policies put into effect that really start to train our workforce for the future? That is what we have advocated. Will we see an environmental thrust that gives us, not taxes on the poor, but taxes on products that hurt the environment? Those are the directions we should take.

I urge the minister, first, to recognize that we are in a recession and, second, to start to do something about it instead of just trying to blame the senators or blame the Liberals. Let me tell the minister, and this is my last point, across the country there is not much enthusiasm for the Liberal Party. I can tell him that from the province of Ontario.

Let us give a future to the country that comes from new policies. Let the minister gives these new policies to us or let us, as a party, give these new policies to the country.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I thank the hon. member for Essex—Windsor for his indulgence and understanding. The hon. the Minister of Finance.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me just comment very briefly. The hon. member has said we have not brought in any corporate minimum tax. In fact, that is precisely what the large corporations tax is. It will raise over $1 billion and it is currently being held up in the Senate.

We have brought in a limitation on research and development deductions so that companies such as Xerox, which he referred to as not paying tax, will pay tax. We have also phased in a reduction of capital cost allowances which will result in companies such as Domtar, which he quoted as not paying tax, paying tax as a result of these changes that will be phased in due to tax reform in 1988.

It is important for my hon. friend to realize that we have taken directly the criticism that he and others, including ourselves, have directed toward the corporate income tax system, but there is a limit as to how far this can go without forcing new investment into other countries because the tax system is more attractive there. He will find his friends in Queen's Park will be following that same thinking when they try to raise their level of corporate taxation.

I would like to put two questions, if I could, Mr. Speaker. First, how will he cut interest rates? Second, he wants an industrial bank, as I understand it, that will encourage business to modernize. How will he be encouraging business to modernize? Will there be low cost loans or will there be no cost loans or what? What is the basis? How will that bank do a more effective job than the normal sources of financing such as the insurance companies, the pension funds, or the banks do right now?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, first, with respect to the large corporations tax, I remind the minister that the definition of large leaves a great many firms within the country that are quite sizeable out of his definition of large. It is certainly a step forward to see to it that some kind of tax contribution is made by those companies, but I do not think that it is a sufficient step insofar as it still leaves vast numbers of companies that are not making a contribution, despite the fact that they are making significant profits, to the tax system in this country.

I am sure that both the minister and I went door to door in the Ontario election that took place recently. One of the things that was most strongly felt by people throughout Ontario was the fact that there was this sense of imbalance in the tax system, that there were some people who were getting off scot-free and these are the people to whom, frankly, Premier Bob Rae's promise of a minimum corporate tax made a great deal of sense. There will be, I am certain, a minimum corporate tax put into effect in the province of Ontario. But that is not sufficient either because, of course, if it just takes place in one province, that province takes the risk of seeing corporations move their head offices to other provinces. So it is up to the minister to start to move. It is up to the minister to start to take action and to put a corporate tax into effect. It has not destroyed capitalism in the United States, I say to the minister, and it will not do so in this country either.

With respect to the two questions which were asked, I say to the minister that since my appointment as critic in areas of macroeconomic policy, I have talked with officials from the Bank of Canada. I am quite convinced that they would not have any difficulty using the technical mechanisms which they usually use in terms of the expansion of the money supply within our economy. They would have no problem in bringing the interest rates in this country down. We have a very professional and effective Bank of Canada here and I think the minister should be the first to admit that it would be quite capable of reducing interest rates, if that were its policy.

Finally, with respect to the National Industrial Bank, let me suggest to the minister that such an institution has been at work in the country of The Netherlands for quite a number of years. It is 51 per cent government shareholding, 49 per cent private enterprise shareholding. It operates through a combination of low-interest loans and direct commercial loans which nevertheless take into account the realities of risk which are there in the case of quite a number of industries that are going through adjustment problems.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. Only two minutes for the hon. member for Burin—St. George's, and two minutes for the hon. member for Essex—Windsor to answer.

[English]

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, on that point, I just suggested you were taking orders from Charbonneau. There is nobody on that side suggesting Charbonneau is not being fair, is there? Anybody over there suggesting he is not being fair?

Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attention to my good friend, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. I have the greatest admiration, I say to him, for people who can make—

Mr. Cooper: Terrible, terrible.

Mr. Simmons: I know you are terrible but I am not talking about you now.

The gentleman for Essex—Windsor raises in me nothing but unadorned admiration because I have great admiration, unfettered admiration for people who can make good, 20-minute-long, tongue-in-cheek speeches, without so much as a smile to let on what they are really up to. I heard him talk about being for this and against this on several issues throughout the 20 minutes. It has to be the best tongue-in-cheek speech that I have ever heard or else one of the most inconsistent, entirely inconsistent speeches I have heard, because he was all over the block. So I am going to help him focus in the two minutes we have left in this segment. I am going to put a very direct question to him which can be a yes or no answer.

The question to my friend, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, is simply this: will he now stop the word games and will he give an unequivocal commitment to this House that he will support the Liberal senators in the Senate, unequivocally, in their fight to stop the GST? Will he be dissuaded from playing the word games and concentrate on helping us stop that terrible GST while we have time to do so?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I think you said two minutes. Very briefly I, of course, feel that this government should not be proceeding with the goods and services tax. It is quite clear from what the Conference Board has said, an independent body—

Ms. Copps: Do you support the Senate?

Mr. Langdon: I will come to that if you will stop heckling. Just hang loose, guys. I would not want to be a senator, believe me.

What has to take place is a defeat of the GST, without question. There are at least three key elements to that defeat. The first is the Senate fight which is taking place. I think that that Senate fight is a fight which, although it dismays many people, is nevertheless a fight which has to go forward. Second, I think there need to be court challenges taken forward, as the Ontario New Democratic Party government intends to take forward. I am sorry to see, for instance, that no Liberal provincial government has decided to take such a court challenge forward. Finally, and most important, this fight must be supported by the people of Canada, across this country, because that is the way that we can stop a government from ramming an unfair, unjust, tax down the throats of Canadians.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague, the member for Essex—Windsor, for being as frank as he was about his party's position on the Senate. I welcome his statement and I welcome his position. What troubles me is that, over the last number of weeks, we have had more positions from his party than I care to mention on that particular issue. On the one hand, we have his House leader who stands up in the House, beats his breast for all of western Canada and says: "We want to abolish the Senate, those nasty senators who are carrying out their responsibilities". On the other hand, when it suits their purposes, the same House leader finds himself in the Senate associating himself as closely as possible with the able work of the senators to kill the GST. Could the hon. member for Essex—Windsor let his colleagues know that his clear and unequivocal position is to support the Liberal Party in its fight to kill the GST? If we unite, and this is not just the members of the opposition, not just the members of the fringe parties here in Parliament, but if we as Canadians unite in opposition to the GST, maybe we can force the government to back down.

It is significant that the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth stated in this week's newspapers that he has considered crossing the floor and giving up his seat, that in the 11 or 12 years that he has been in Parliament, that he has never had as many calls, letters, and pleas from Canadians to kill the GST.

I could not believe my ears when the Minister of Finance had the gall to stand in the House and pretend that he was carrying the banner of democracy when, if the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister had been open and honest with the people of Canada in the last federal election, he might have had a democratic leg to stand on.

I knocked on doors in the last federal election. I heard the Minister of Finance say to Canadians that the new tax was not going to raise a single penny of new revenue. We know from the statement of the hon. member for Mississauga South and others that it is going to be a cash cow.

I would like to take a moment and read into the record some of the comments of frustrated ordinary Canadians and to refer very specifically to this resolution, because it does not only speak to the destructive tax policies that are going to kill us, the so-called fiscal policies, but it also speaks to the monetary policies which hearken right back to the work done by the Minister for International Trade to sell this country down the river. I am sorry that the hon. member for St. John's West is no longer in his seat because I think what we have is a resolution which is very clear, concise, direct. It calls for the House to condemn the government for planning and implementing the first ever made-in-Canada recession.

I would like to refer to the speech made by my colleague, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. He claimed and agreed with us that it was the first ever made-in-Canada recession, but on the other hand, he continually wanted to tie back this particular recession to the recession that the world faced in the economic and market conditions of 1981.

The Minister of Finance had the gall a few moments ago to stand in the House and say that the member for Hamilton East, who still happens to have the largest number of steel factories in my riding, should be supporting his government's fiscal and monetary policies. The fact is those of you who were here during the trade debate will know that very early on Clayton Yeutter indicated that his government was not prepared to move with the trade deal until the Canadian dollar moved closer to the American dollar. At that time we posed the question to the Canadian Steel Producers' Association very directly: What would happen if we had an 85 cent dollar? It said it was a hypothetical question it could not answer.

When we reach an agreement on the current strike, which is leaving thousands of workers and their families without a regular pay cheque in my community, and the combination of fiscal and monetary policies of this government which are creating an economic climate, once the Stelco strike is over in my community, I would suspect that many hundreds, if not thousands of workers who are still on the Stelco employment list will no longer have jobs.

I could not believe my ears when the critic for the New Democratic Party said that the Bank of Canada had respect and he complimented them on their work. I do not know whose monetary policy he is supporting but the Bank of Canada's monetary policies, aided and abetted by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, are driving this country into the first made-in-Canada recession. It started with the trade deal and it started with a clear government decision to allow our dollar to move closer to the American dollar. It is continued by fiscal policies which are causing Canadians to lose their jobs by the thousands.

The Minister of Finance beats his breast and talks about how we have to get the finances of the government in order. I have been trying, in my own small way, to find out how many millions of government dollars have gone out by way of pay-outs to Canadian companies that are now moving to the United States: Firestone, Variety Corp., Tridon.

Members of Parliament in the House of Commons do not even have the right to go and ask those companies to open up their books so that we can find out how, when, why, and where the taxpayers' money is being used. Variety Corp.—loans and guarantees in the hundred million dollar range, with the condition that it keeps its head office in Canada. It is picking up and going south of the border. Tridon, with technological dollars taken right out of the pockets of the Canadian taxpayer for its world blades and for its reflectors, is now going to take that technology that is making it money and do that production in the southern United States; exactly the scenario that we predicted at the beginning of this made-in-Canada recession which was perpetrated on us by the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of Finance, and in particular the Prime Minister.

What is frustrating average Canadians, as they hear us talk and they hear the Minister of Minister with all his jargon about how his interest rate policies are fighting inflation, et cetera, is that they know in the last six years of this Tory government their purchasing power has been eroded. They are reaching a level of zero tax tolerance, and they just cannot take it any more.

In fact it was the member for Hamilton—Wentworth who said last week in the newspaper article I quoted earlier that Canadians are sick and tired of the tax level and they just will not pay it any more. We are reaching the point of the tax revolt.

I have a letter from a very ordinary Canadian, Catherine Provo of 17 Lang Street, Hamilton. I would like to hear what she has to say on this issue because I think she speaks for average Canadians who feel extremely frustrated and who feel that their democratic hands have been tied by backbenchers in the Tory government who have been muzzled; people of the likes of the member for Hamilton—Wentworth who goes to his riding and says how awful the GST is but who stands here in the House and supports it. This is what she has to say:

> I am in total opposition to this destructive and unnecessary tax grab.
> As a single parent of four children, my standard of living which has always been to just make ends meet, has seen a steady decline since the Progressive Conservatives took control of this country.
> I find the term "Progressive Conservative" to be a total contradiction in itself. I feel this needs no further explanation. One only needs to try to raise a family in this country.
> My vote in the next election will depend on the defeat of this bill—
> Please do all that you can to stop this regressive tax.

We in the House of Commons have been doing what we can. The people in the other place have been doing what they can. I must say in that respect I find the hypocrisy of the NDP unconscionable because it has not given full support to the over-all parliamentary objective of killing the GST.

We are united with our colleagues in the other place, fighting hard to try to kill the GST. Members of the NDP have forgotten the lesson of the 1988 election. Remember, Mr. Speaker, when they were going to be the great fighters against the free trade agreement until they saw our leader, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, moving ahead in the polls and they forgot all about the trade fight. They totally abandoned their principles. Instead of attacking the trade deal, they attacked the Liberal Party and created a situation where the Tories were elected to another majority government.

That Tory majority in this Parliament is a direct result of the failure of members of the NDP to fight for and defend their principles in opposition to the trade agreement. They are doing the same thing on the GST. If they were truly committed to fighting the tax, we would not see the kind of rhetorical game playing that we are seeing from the House leader of the NDP, that we are seeing from the leader of the NDP, and that we are seeing from all those players. Members of the NDP do not mind coming here and associating themselves as close as possible with the senators, but when they go out to the public they claim that their objective is to see the Senate wiped out and abolished or to move in another direction.

I too fully support Senate reform. I think what we may see as early as possible is a reformed and invigorated Senate that will be able to provide the kind of leadership that unfortunately is sadly lacking in this Chamber. I for one would like to salute the senators in what they are doing. We in the Liberal caucus are going to offer them our 100 per cent, full support; not the kind of equivocation we see from the members of the NDP.

[Translation]

This really bothers me, Mr. Speaker! The New Democratic Party financial critic has just said today that he agrees with the Bank of Canada's professional monetary policy. We know full well that with high interest rates, the GST policy, the current monetary policy which limits our capacity to export to the United States, we cannot go along with the Bank of Canada's policy. I suggest that since the Coyne affair, Canada's monetary policy has never been in such a serious crisis, and the time has come for all political parties to recognize the fact that we cannot afford a monetary policy which provides for interest and loan rates in this country which are five points higher with respect to exports to the United States. This creates a situation wherely our small businesses are unable to compete.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the GST is the last nail in the coffin of a tax and monetary policy which is leading Canada for the first ever into a made-in-Canada recession. What is the Minister of Finance's response? Today, when asked about Canada's position during the negotiations on marketing boards for our major farm industry, how did his colleague the Minister of International Trade react? He just laughed. He said that we were giving our farm producers too much money. I heard him say that with my own ears.

Mr. Charest: Oh, oh!

Ms Copps: The former Minister, the Hon. Member for Sherbrooke, was not here, but I was. I heard Mr. Crosbie, with the support of the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister, tell our farm producers to their faces that the Government was giving them too many subsidies. I only hope he will make a speech in front of the UPA and say the same thing. Those who are sitting on Government benches and who understand our current policy on international trade realize now that the Government is about to kill the family farm in this country. With the Government's decision on dairy products, we know that thousands of jobs will be lost, not only in the province of Quebec, but everywhere in Canada, because of the milk quotas. And what is the Government's proposed remedy? It hits us all with its GST.

Through its monetary policy, it has created a situation where Canada, a country which has always been very dependent on external trade, is no longer able to compete with the United States because its real interest rates are five points higher than those in the United States. When businessmen and women think of making investments, where will they go? Certainly not here in Canada. And the Minister claims that he is doing everything in his power to rectify the Government's spending problem. But let me tell you one thing, Mr. Speaker. I have been trade critic of my party for hardly a few weeks now. I have been trying to get information concerning the billions of dollars paid by Canadian taxpayers to corporations which are now moving to the United States. You will not believe it, Mr. Speaker, but as elected Members of this House, we are not entitled to check the books of the various corporations which have received funds from Canadian taxpayers. We are being asked to dig ever deeper in our own pockets, which the corporations are not asked to do although they have received subsidies from the Federal Government. I suggest there is a certain inconsistency there.

• (1710)

There is a certain inconsistency about the government's position. I could through dozens and dozens of letters—and I am sure most members could—about the potential for human suffering that is being caused by this government's GST policy.

I should like to take just a couple of moments to point out some real flaws in the actual operation. I am sure most of us would believe, for example, that health matters should not be taxed. However, are you aware, Mr. Speaker, that as a result of the current policies of the GST you will be taxed if you take your dog to veterinary clinic to get a rabies shot? Do we really want to create a situation where to protect your children from being bitten by rabid dogs you have to pay a tax?

Some of us will know that the lime disease has recently come into full force in certain parts of southwestern Ontario and certain other parts of the country. We need to have policies that will permit officials and owners of pets, et cetera, to inoculate their pets, to be responsible pet owners. This particular policy basically says that anybody who owns a cat or dog is going to be taxed for simple prevention measures including spaying, vaccinations, et cetera.

We can see that not only are there inconsistencies in the application of the tax as it relates to hospitals which will have to pay tax on the certain goods and services that they purchase, but that will represent a tax upon a tax in the hundreds of millions of dollars in a sector that Canadians have always believed should be free of tax.

I know that the Minister of Finance is unlikely to support this resolution, but I would like to reiterate the plea that I make to his colleagues. This is a simple resolution that condemns a government policy that last week saw lay-off notices delivered to 8,500 employees across this country. Mr. Speaker, if you read the recently published book by Maude Barlow which was just launched on the weekend, there have been over 100,000 jobs in the last year alone eliminated as a result of this government's particular policies.

I ask members on the government side of the House who value their political future, those members who like to feel that they have a little independence, to listen to their constituents when they tell them that they have reached zero tax tolerance.

[Translation]

You had better listen to your constituents, Mr. Della Noce, because if you are here to support the GST, come election time you will realize that you will suffer a tremondous prejudice. And I ask the same question to all Hon. Members.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Trois-Rivières on a point of order.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I am amazed to see the hon. member for Hamilton East call other hon. members by name in the House. After six years in this place, she should know that members are to be referred to by riding.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Hamilton East has 30 seconds left.

Ms Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. He changed ridings. I thought he wanted to stay there. His new riding is Laval-Est. I urge the hon. member for Laval-Est to believe his constituents when they tell him that they have had their fill of taxes. If he wants to get reelected, he should at least listen to his constituents. I heard him say on a Montreal radio station the other day that he was there to fight alongside the Quebec caucus, that he was going to tell the Prime Minister that the GST was too much and that the government policy was— When the time comes to speak on the issue and vote, I urge you to vote with us. That way, the Prime Minister will get the message.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Laval-Est on a point of order.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but respond to my colleague about what she claims I said on the radio. She should quote what I said in the interview I gave on air not far from the office of her colleague the member for Saint-Léonard, where I said that I was the one who would represent my constituents, not the senators because they never attended a social function. I never saw one!

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleagues in this House will allow me to take a moment of our precious time to congratulate you on your appointment to this new role. This is the first opportunity I have to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague from Hamilton-East who referred a few times to the concept of leadership. I could not help noticing because she is just back from a long leadership race within her party which, unfortunately, she did not win. Someone else was elected as leader of the Liberal Party of Canada.

I found it interesting because I feel that, as a matter of fact, a number of issues we have to deal with in this country at the present time, including the proposed GST, relate to leadership. I can tell you forthwith, Mr. Speaker, that I personnally find what is happening in the Senate appalling. It is unacceptable! No democrat can allow such actions on the part of a non-elected Senate dominated by federal Liberals.

Unfortunately, as we speak, Mr. Speaker, the population does not realize how outrageous the present actions of the federal Liberals are and is not aware of their possible consequences on democracy.

Canada is one of the few countries going backwards. While the Eastern Bloc is becoming more democratic in Canada, the federal Liberals are turning back the hands of time. This is incredibly outrageous! I denounce that vigorously, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to direct a question to my very articulate colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton East, concerning her involvement in the leadership race. I would like to know what position she took on the GST during the leadership race, because her new leader, Mr. Chrétien, did make some remarks about it during the leadership race, as reported in an article in the Ottawa Citizen of October 13, 1990. It refers to Mr. Chrétien under the headline 'Who's in charge?', with a question mark, for sure. I recommend that article to people who are interested because it asks who is in charge of the Liberal Party of Canada. I might point out that there is no answer.

Referring to the GST during the leadership campaign, Mr. Chrétien said that cancelling it presented a danger unless there were alternatives available. That is what he said during the leadership race. But in addition to that he said, and I quote— Well, this is from the Ottawa Citizen, it will be up to him to confirm or deny this, but the article quotes Mr. Chrétien as having said:

[English]

"There is no great tradition in Canada for the Senate to block fiscal measures".

[Translation]

Apparently that is what he said.

Later, it seems he changed his mind when he stated:

[English]

"I have my own personal opinions but I am not alone in the Liberal Party".

[Translation]

A great demonstration of leadership!

Later still he said he would let the Senate act as it saw fit. But later again when the Senate announced it would kill the GST he is reported as having said:

[English]

"They will not do anything that I don't want them to do".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude quickly by quoting the member for the Ottawa region who is in the House, the hon. member for Ottawa South, Jim Manley, the junior finance critic who said:

[English]

—says he supports the Senate's efforts but he is worried that in the battle for public opinion kazoo blowing might very well cost the Liberals support. I personally find the antics of obstructionism offensive and I don't believe that most Canadians want that to be the way their public policy is decided".

[Translation]

Apparently, Mr. Speaker, that is what he said.

So I want to ask the hon. member for Hamilton East what was her position during the leadership race, whether or not she agrees with the position of her new leader, Mr. Chrétien, or whether she has maintained the position she had at the time?

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows Mr. Charbonneau, the Speaker of the other place, who decided last week that rules no longer existed.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, if he can stand there and defend the position of his colleagues in the Senate who are willing to throw out the rule book, he and his colleagues in the House of Commons are aiding and abetting the demise of democracy. You can talk about any democratic movement around the world but one of the primary tenets of democracy is to respect the rules of the House and the Senate. If you do not like the rules of the House and the Senate, then you move to change them. In 1986 there was one political party that moved a unanimous motion for an elected Senate and that was the Liberal Party.

• (1720)

This is a hypocritical government, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister stands in his place and beats his breast about the Senate, but he was very quick in appointing his friends there. And who is there now as the president of the Senate? One of the key people who behind the scenes orchestrated Joe Clark's overthrow. You know the story, I know the story. It is as clear as the book written by L. Ian MacDonald, the Prime Minister's official biographer.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, I respect the rule book. I am prepared to change the rule book so we can have an elected Senate. But I wish those phoneys on the government side of the House would be willing to stand up and support the Liberal call dated in 1986 for an elected Senate.

Mr. Charest: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like the record to show very clearly that the MP for Hamilton East refused to answer the questions I put to her.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will try my luck once more with the Hon. Member for Hamilton East and see whether she could reply. Because she dared mention my riding, I will tell her something about it. If its name has been changed it is because we listened to the people. And it is the people who decided that their riding should be called Laval. After 25 years, it was time to grow up and so we did. Although Laval was established 25 years ago, the former name still prevailed. Nobody had thought of that. Today, my constituents find themselves in the Laval East riding instead of this other name which cannot even be found in the dictionary.

Also, the Hon. Member and her colleagues referred to a recession. There is a saying that a recession always begins in the car industry. Mr. Speaker, I visited the various car dealers in my riding. To my surprise, these car dealers responded so well that their statements covered two pages in the October 12 issue of this weekend's Journal de Montréal, the newspaper with the highest circulation in the province of Quebec. To make a long story short, it stated: "The car industry does not yet feel the pinch of the recession". Wait, for I have something even better for my hon. friend, following which I will ask her a question. Sylvie Dagenais, one of the very best car saleswoman in Laval stated and I quoted: "Business has never been so good. A recession? Never heard of it", said Sylvie Dagenais, President of Vimont Lexus Toyota. "I have never sold so many luxury cars. I am short of models just now. A Japanese sedan costing over $65,000, that's fantastic!" Richard Johnson. Mrs. Dagenais, who is in charge of 5 dealerships, stated that she has never felt the effects of recession. "We are doing just fine. It is a question of attitude. We have build everything on customer service satisfaction—"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! I must regretfully interrupt the Hon. Member, for there is only one minute left for the Hon. Member for Hamilton East to respond.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I assume that he does not believe either the National Bank, or the Desjardins Movement, or the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology who acknowledged, here in this House last week, that we were in a recession. But if he does not believe either the minister, or the Desjardins Movement, or the National Bank, will he at least acknowledge what the officials of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology have been saying, that Montreal East now has the highest unemployment rate in Canada? And if that member representing one constituency from the Montreal area thinks that everything is fine, I would advise him to go back home and listen to the residents of Montreal East where the unemployment rate is over 20 per cent, Mr. Speaker. These 20 per cent unemployed workers do not trust a member who is not prepared to fight for the unemployed of his area. It is a disgrace! He should leave that job to someone who cares!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question and comment period is over. Resuming debate. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak the opposition motion. This will give me the opportunity to review the events since 1984. I am convinced that we will hear some yelling and screaming from the opposition side. But, since 1984, we are used to their yelling and screaming.

The record of the Progressive Conservative Party as a government since 1984 is a success story. And I remember when—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Vincent: You see, they start yelling, Mr. Speaker, I warned you. I remember that, in November 1984, the Minister of Finance had tabled his plan for an economic renewal that the government wanted to initiate. I remember the budget of May 1985, the one of February 1986, the ones of February 1987, of 1988, 1989 and 1990. On these seven occasions, the opposition members, both Liberals and New Democrats—I can print out in the Hansard—had forecasted two things: the loss of jobs and a recession. Every time on seven occasions during six years, they said the same thing. They just rehashed what they had said the previous year. In six years, we have had an exemplary economic situation in Canada: 1.6 million jobs created. In six years! We are first in terms of job creation among industrialized countries, and second, after Japan, in terms of economic growth! These are, Mr. Speaker, the results of the Minister of Finance's economic statement of November 1984 and his budgets. These are the results.

Mr. Speaker, you know, as I do, the Quebec motto. It is: "I remember". And in 1981–1982, I did remember—I had a lawyer's office—that interest rates were at 22 per cent. The member for Hamilton East was then a member of Parliament, not a business woman. She did not have to pay 22 per cent. Like most of my colleagues from the province of Quebec, I had to pay an interest rate of 22 per cent because the then liberal government had the indecency, the gall to let inflation flare up to 13 per cent. Not 6 or 7 per cent but 13 per cent. That is what I call a recession! And that was also due to a lack of economic and fiscal policy.

Mr. Pronovost: MacEachen!

Mr. Vincent: I will not deal in detail with the MacEachen budget that my colleague from Saint-Maurice is talking about, a budget which brought about some 90 changes after its introduction. Let's not go into that! Because if talk about MacEachen, I have to talk about the Senate. And if I talk about the Senate, Mr. Speaker, I must read the following as reported in today's La Presse: The present attitude of liberal senators is most unfortunate according to Le Conseil du patronat du Québec which invites the population to protest in order to get the liberal senators to stop their foolishness and get serious.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the motion under consideration this afternoon deals with a recession created and planned by this government. The hon. member is talking about the Senate. There is nothing in this motion about the Senate. I would ask that hon. member confine himself to the motion under consideration and not discuss the Senate. Mr. Speaker, we must also—

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret to interrupt the member for Kingston and the Islands, who is quite experienced and knows the rules, but what he just said is a matter of opinion.

Therefore, I prefer to let other address this question.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your remarks, but I would like to go a little further. To begin with, Mr. Speaker, as I told you at the beginning of my speech, when the truth is spoken, members opposite aren't pleased. But, on the other hand, the present economic conditions are partly due to the non-elected liberal senators who have the nerve—I repeat, the nerve—to hold back bills duly adopted by this House, by members of Parliament elected on November 21, 1988.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Senate issue has something to do with today's motion.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Vincent: I told you, Mr. Speaker, that there would be some whining from the other side!

An hon. member: Respect democracy!

An hon. member: They're whining!

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I find that amusing, but I will nevertheless continue to tell you what the president, Mr. Ghislain Dufour, said in his press release: "Mr. Ghislain Dufour believes the show given by the Liberal senators to be of questionable quality, in that they show no respect for the legitimacy of Parliament and for the democratic principles which form the basis of our parliamentary regime".

That, Mr. Speaker, is the opinion of the people of Trois-Rivières whom I met this weekend. These people told me that the Liberal senators, not too bright to start with, had all gone mad.

Just this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, senator Hébert, whose brother is in favour of the GST, quarrelled with an elected member of Parliament and insulted him—

Mr. Saint-Julien: Hébert the Liberal buffoon.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, indeed, the Senate issue has to do with the motion presented today.

To get back to what I was saying, Mr. Speaker, in 1984, the Minister of Finance said we would have vigorous economic growth followed by a slowdown. He said that in 1984. Do you know why he said that in 1984? Because

Mr. Wilson is the first competent Minister of Finance this country has had in a long time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Saint-Julien: To clean up the Liberal legacy!

Mr. Vincent: As the hon. member for Abitibi said: To try and clean up the Liberal legacy—

Mr. Saint-Julien: It's true!

Mr. Vincent: —and the accompanying abuse, Mr. Speaker! There were companies that didn't pay income tax. There were loopholes. There were scientific research tax credits which cost this country billions of dollars, Mr. Speaker. And this with the knowledge of the Minister of Finance at the time, Marc Lalonde, who admitted as much in an article in L'Actualité. They really let things go. However, Mr. Speaker, as of September 1984, this loophole was closed. Even before the economic statement, even before our first Budget, we said: That's it!

Mr. Saint-Julien: It was highway robbery. It was the Liberal robbery of the century!

Mr. Vincent: Yes, Mr. Speaker. However, Mr. Speaker, we had 1 per cent real growth this year.

From 1984 to 1989, we had an annual growth rate of 4.5 per cent, more than all the world's industrialized nations. As far as employment is concerned, we were better off than every other nation in the world except Japan. What the opposition doesn't say is that from 1984 to 1989, private income increased 16 per cent, after inflation and after taxes. This means that even with inflation and tax increases, and we admit to those, we do—Canadians judged us on our record in 1988—even after tax increases and inflation, private income increased 16 per cent in five years.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Vincent: They don't bring that up very often, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Della Noce: We should send them a memo to remind them!

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, in the same period, the demand for business and services in this country increased faster than production. This means that more Canadians were seeking more goods and services than Canadian companies could manufacture and sell. It is all part of the law of supply and demand, and in this case there was more demand than supply.

What happens, Mr. Speaker, when demand is greater than supply? It leads to what we call inflation. We experienced that in 1981–1982.

There are two ways to resolve the inflation problem. We could let it be and then all of a sudden, wake up to raise the interest rate to 22 per cent. That is what I call the Liberal way.

Mr. Saint-Julien: It's true. That is what they did.

Mr. Vincent: It hurts everybody, it causes bankruptcies, and it creates a recesssion as the dictionnary would have it.

There is another way, Mr. Speaker. When the inflation rate, which should normally be at 3.5 per cent reaches 6 per cent, we must raise interest rates so that the demand for goods and services decreases as regards to supply. That is the right way to do it. And that is the way we did it.

Just to give you an idea, Mr. Speaker, labour costs in 1989 were 6.6 per cent higher in Canada than in most industrialized countries. Consumer mortgage borrowings have increased by 17.1 per cent in 1990 over 1989.

An hon. member: Where is that?

Mr. Vincent: That is what happens, Mr. Speaker, when too many people want goods and services. To answer the hon. member's question, even though he has no right to speak— I let them speak, but I will show more courtesy than they did, I will answer their questions right away. Inflation, Mr. Speaker, is rampant from Newfoundland to British Columbia. And inflation has increased in every province of this country. Now, I hope you will have the courtesy to let me continue.

Mr. Speaker, a too rapid drop in interest rates would rekindle the inflationist outburst that we have experienced and that we are begining to overcome, fairly well I might add. Hence the importance of pursuing the monetary, economic and fiscal policy set out by the Minister of Finance. Thus the importance, Mr. Speaker, of trying our best to make them understand. I know it is difficult. I have been trying for six years to put certain principles, certain figures into their minds to make sure they are able, at last, to explain to their constituents the economic problems of the country.

Mr. Speaker, obviously everybody would like to see interest rates coming down. But I think if we want a normal interest rate in this country, we need a normal rate of inflation. A normal rate of inflation means that Canadians should not ask for more goods and services than the country can produce. This means that everybody should cooperate. Therefore, I urge the opposition today to get aboard the train of economic realism for the country's sake and to tell their constituents and their provinces: "Please, cut your spending". The only government which, since 1984, did not increase its spending is the Canadian government.

Mr. Della Noce: The Conservative government.

Mr. Vincent: Our operating expenditures, Mr. Speaker, have not increased since 1984. How many industries, provinces or individuals have not increased their spending since 1984? Not very many, Mr. Speaker. At the same time, we managed to move 800,000 people above the poverty line. We created 1,600,000 jobs. Those were the results of the 1984 economic statement of the Hon. Minister of Finance, which we continue to implement. Canadians, whether provinces, companies, individuals or the opposition, must realize that.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to tell what happened in my riding over the weekend. I met one of my constituents who had come to Ottawa the week before. She was walking on the sidewalk and she fell down. She was looking at the Parliament building when she fell. Somebody helped her get back on her feet. She turned around and saw it was Mr. Chrétien. She recognized him and said to him: "Mr. Chrétien, what can I do to thank you for helping me get back on my feet?" And Jean Chrétien answered: "Well, madam, you can vote for me in the next election." She said: "Listen, I may have fallen on my buns, but not on my head, Mr. Chrétien!"

Mr. Speaker, since 1984, this government reduced the deficit by 10 billion dollars. Our federal expenditures, Mr. Speaker, were growing at a rate lower, annually, than the inflation rate, even with the growth in all the statutory programs.

• (1740)

We have been doing since 1984 what no Minister of Finance did in twenty years of Liberal government. Not one of them! Old leader, new leader, they all increased expenditures, but they never actually managed the country. What we have now is a realistic monetary and tax strategy which is good for Canada. You know what is wrong with it? It is blocked by a bunch of non-elected senators who think they own the Senate. They do not, Mr. Speaker. They are non-elected members and I challenge all the Liberal senators to come and run in our ridings—I will be kind, in the Quebec ridings only—against Conservative members of Parliament with their policies for a platform. Imagine, their own leader went to New Brunswick to run. But since he is in the middle of an electoral campaign, I will spare him. We were gracious. We have no candidate running against him to make sure he will be elected.

Mr. Speaker, it is inadmissible that people who are not elected attempt to implement a program which was defeated in the 1988 elections by the people who wanted to get elected. The Minister of Finance pointed out again today that the Liberals were taking a stand against the GST in their 1988 electoral platform. The Liberals were not elected. Why? Because the Canadians wanted free trade because it is excellent for Canada, because they wanted a real leader, because they wanted a real Finance Minister and because they wanted tax reform. There is a piece of legislation presently blocked in the Senate which provides for all large Canadian companies to pay their fair share of tax. The non-elected Liberal senators don't even have the decency to pass that bill. And then we are told the Conservative Party is the one that represents large corporations! No, Mr. Speaker, it is not the Conservative Party but Liberal senators, the Liberal Party with MacEachen who is associated with the Bank of Montreal, and so on. Such is the situation in our country.

We must be realistic. My message to those senators, the one Canadians and the people from the riding of Trois-Rivières asks me to deliver, is to sit down, to talk sense, to state their position calmly to the population and then to respect—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I draw the hon. member's attention to Standing Order 11(2). Attention has been drawn to this before. It states:

> The Speaker—after having called the attention of the House, or of the Committee, to the conduct of a Member who persists in irrelevance—

I am standing on a point of order of irrelevance and repetition. The motion clearly states:

> That this House condemn the Government for planning and implementing the first ever made-in-Canada recession.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry— The hon. member for Sherbrooke on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. After listening to my colleague from Parkdale—High Park, I just wanted to bring to your attention the fact that other members of the House were here, including himself, when the member for Hamilton East in her speech brought up the point about the Senate and Senate opposition. I just wanted to bring to your attention that I do not remember the member for Parkdale—High Park getting up at that time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flis: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On the same point of order?

Mr. Flis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member, if he was on his toes he should have raised irrelevancy at that point. I was in committee and not in the House. I could not have raised it at that point. Unfortunately, the hon. member fell asleep.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): So, I want to put an end to this, because we might get bogged down in a debate. I repeat this is a matter of opinion. Only 30 seconds left to the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Charest: Point of order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Sherbrooke on a point of order.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry too, because I do not want to extend the debate unnecessarily.

[English]

The member just alluded to the fact that I was in the House, but asleep. That is totally false. I was here very much awake and awake enough to know that the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park was here. I resent that allusion, Mr. Speaker. I want the record to be corrected.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I will conclude the same way I started, by saying how glad I am to see we awakened them a bit this afternoon. I told you, Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my speech, that they would not like what I was about to say, because the truth always hurts. What I did, Mr. Speaker, is review the events since 1984 with an emphasis on all the stupid things the Liberal senators did. Mr. Speaker, I thank you.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said that the truth hurts, but considering the kind of things he has been mentioning, he doesn't seem to have much to say.

When they make speeches in the House, they make jokes about anything, including the Senate. When will this House realize that Quebecers will no longer be fooled? It just won't work any longer!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Maheu: You are Quebecers, but let me—Mr. Speaker, I want to finish!

An hon. member: That was a big mistake!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would ask hon. members to show some understanding and co-operation.

The Hon. Member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville has the floor.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Obviously, those 15 per cent still seem to bother you quite a bit, and that's the truth, Mr. Speaker.

When they bear down hard on the Senate—all Quebec members do that because they know the Senate isn't particularly popular in Quebec. So why didn't this government abolish the Senate if it hates it so much?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Maheu: I think they should come out and admit, once and for all, that all these government members are trying to do is to distract us from the main issue, which is the GST. The issue is not the Senate. You are just using the Senate to fool the public. They are using the Senate as a crutch, and meanwhile—

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): My father used to say, don't spit in the wind!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member wishes to raise a point of order?

Mrs. Maheu: Yes, Mr. Speaker. May I ask why I was not allowed to finish?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Several members have asked to speak. However, if you wish, you may finish your comments or question, but please be brief.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): I should like the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup to tell us—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Maheu: Is that not you on the other side. I am looking for the name of your riding.

Mr. Vincent: Trois-Rivières.

Mrs. Maheu: Trois-Rivières, good.

How many jobs have been lost in the Greater Montreal region in the past year and a half? Nobody talks about that. Now about job creation, can we talk about the quality of job creation and begin telling the truth to the people of Canada?

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I might repeat what I said about spitting in the wind. That is what my father used to tell me.

First, Mr. Speaker, concerning the abolition of the Senate, I will try to give my colleague from Saint-Laurent—Cartierville a two-minute law course.

• (1750)

First of all, to abolish the Senate, Mr. Speaker, Quebec would have to be part of the Canadian Constitution. In 1981, thanks to the Liberal Government, Quebec was excluded. In 1990, thanks to the Liberal Leader who, during the Convention, embrassed Clyde Wells, the Liberal Premier of Newfoundland, Quebec was again excluded. Under the circumstances, they should not talk to me about the need to abolish the Senate, for it is because of the Liberals if the Senate has not been abolished, because the Prime Minister of Canada had offered it.

Mr. Speaker, they just cannot accept that. The Prime Minister of Canada offered it, but the Provincial Liberals in Newfoundland, and later the Federal Liberals did everything they could to torpedo the Meech Lake Accord and hurt Quebec. That is my reply to your question about the abolition of the Senate. Carry on this way, you are doing fine, it is a brilliant performance!

To reply to the other question raised by my friend the Hon. Member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville concerning job creation, I will say that between 1981 and 1984, nearly 100 000 jobs were created every year, including 75 per cent which were temporary. And you know what "temporary" really means: you are hired for three months to paint fences. You are hired for six months to cut grass, even in Winter. Such was the type of jobs created between 1980 and 1984.

Between 1984 and 1990, 1.6 million jobs were created, 80 per cent of which were high quality permanent jobs. And I challenge the Hon. Member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville to come and see for herself! First of all, if she did not know that I represent the Trois-Rivières riding, now she does. I challenge her here and now to come and visit Trois-Rivières to see that we have indeed lost jobs, but that we have created a great many new ones, so that the net balance is positive.

An hon. member: Canadair is in her riding.

Mr. Vincent: Such, Mr. Speaker, is the economic reality.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before I recognize the Hon. Member for Prince-Albert, I will allow the Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice to comment briefly.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Trois-Rivières, and I tried, on the basis of what he said and what was said by the hon. member opposite, the hon. member for Hamilton East, who said that the Parliament of Canada had to reject the GST because 85 per cent of Canadians were against the tax— that is her reasoning, her way of seeing things. I would like to know whether the hon. member for Trois-Rivières agrees, because if we were to ask Canadian citizens tomorrow morning whether they are for income tax or if we polled Canadians on this issue, they would say no. If we asked Canadians: Are you in favour of provincial sales tax in Quebec, what would they answer? If we asked Canadians: are you in favour of a tax on gas, what would they say? The Liberals put a tax on gas, and they introduced quite a few tax increases.

Canadians didn't agree, but the Liberals had to run the country. They didn't do it the way they should have done, but they did it just the same. If you ask people who smoke whether they agree with the tax on cigarettes, of course people don't agree. So I would like to ask the hon. member for Trois-Rivières how else one can run a country with an annual budget of $147 billion? How can one do that if one listens to the rhetoric of the hon. member for Hamilton East? Do we abolish all taxes and income taxes and leave Canadians without the wherewithal to govern themselves?

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, an excellent question as usual, from the hon. member for Saint-Maurice.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will agree that not a single member in this House, including yourself, with respect, likes income tax and taxes. There is not a single person here who likes taxes, and no one in this country does. However, although we do not like taxes and income tax, we like the services provided by the federal government, which the government, headed by the Conservatives, wants to keep giving to those who are in need in this country. That is why, Mr. Speaker, it is important to have the GST in order to create jobs and put Canada back at the same level internationally as all other countries. As for the hon. member for Hamilton East who said that since 85 per cent of Canadians were against the GST, we had to be against it as well, then, according to her logic, should we abolish beds just because 85 per cent of the population dies in bed?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is one minute left for questions and comments. The hon. member for Prince-Albert—Churchill River will have 30 seconds and the hon. member for Trois-Rivières 30 seconds to answer.

[English]

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is hardly surprising that 85 per cent of Canadians do not believe this government and would not vote for it if there was an election when the member says that Canadians should reduce their expenditures when they are losing their farms, their homes and their businesses.

I would like to ask the member these questions: Does he agree with his Minister of Finance that in fact there is no recession in this country? If he agrees with his Minister of Finance, at what point does he think a recession would be starting, how long does this have to keep on going, and if there is a recession, what kind of policy changes would he like to see?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Trois-Rivières, very briefly.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no, there is no recession. Yes, there is an economic slow down. When is there a recession? When there are stupid policies like those we had in 1981, then, there is a recession. It is only in those circumstances that we have a recession.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments are now over. The hon. member for Ottawa South has the floor.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate.

I must say I have listened to many speeches in this Chamber over the last year and a half or almost two years. Had I been able to be recognized on question and comment with respect to the previous speech, I think it is the first one on which I could truthfully say that it was so partisan, so bombastic and so vacant of meaning that it would not have been worthy of comment.

An hon. member: The Pope has spoken.

Mr. Manley: I can see the hon. members opposite agree with me.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! I will again ask for the cooperation of all the members of the House so that I can hear, and above all that the public can hear the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa South.

[English]

Mr. Manley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know that you are eager to hear what I have to say, if not the members opposite.

I have two real concerns that I would like to express about the situation that we are in today in Canada.

One relates specifically to the resolution that is before us. We are in a period of very significant economic difficulty in Canada. We have a very high rate of unemployment. Many jobs are being lost. Over 1.1 million Canadians are out of work. Even in my area of Ottawa, which is often thought of as being fairly impervious to recession, one of the local workers for the regional municipality social welfare agency told me that his level of case work since last year has gone up with a constant number of workers in his office. It has gone from 90 cases in August 1989 to 130 cases in August 1990. There has been a very significant increase in people seeking the assistance of the social agencies even in the national capital, a fairly affluent area. Consequently, job loss is a very real concern.

The other concern that I have is I think best expressed by the cover story that ran in Maclean's magazine about two weeks ago. It said: "How Much Can Canada Take?" I think that is a good question for us to ask ourselves at the present time; how much can Canada take?

As we watch the implementation of the goods and services tax being debated down the hall from us and as it involves Canadians from everywhere in this contentious issue day after day, I see an erosion of our willingness as a people to voluntarily comply with government measures, particularly government taxation measures. I believe that the real battle over the GST for the government opposite is not what it went through in the House of Commons. It is not what is occurring down the hall in the Senate. The real battle for the compliance with the GST is going to be at the level of whether or not Canadians actually do pay the money they are asking them to pay, if and when this tax is ever implemented.

I have been very vocal and very clear in the reasons for my opposition to the GST. Our system of taxation does require voluntary compliance and, in failing to consult and to consider the views and concerns of the Canadian people in implementing this tax, this government runs a risk of undermining the integrity of our entire system of taxation by provoking in our people a tax revolt such as we have never seen in Canada in the past.

We have to look at the credibility of the minister as part of the problem that underlies the government's situation at the present time. He stood here earlier today and talked about how based on democratic principles he believed that he was entitled to have this tax passed, and I think he relied in saying that on the results of the 1988 election. I find myself listening to that. It is a compelling argument. It is an important argument that a government that is elected has the right to do what it put forward to the people, what it has a mandate to do. It has a mandate to govern, but I fear the minister has pushed his point too far.

There surely have to be some limits on what a democratically elected government can do. We know there are some now under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The charter itself imposes a limit on what governments can do. I am not saying that the charter limits the implementation of this tax, but I am saying that there are limits on the right of a government to pass laws in Canada. That is fundamental. We can surely all agree on that.

Are there other limits? Are there limits imposed either by other law or by convention, or by limitations that are imposed by the very nature of a democratic society? That is the question that I have been struggling with myself. It is the answer to that question which either justifies or fails to justify the action that the Senate of Canada is taking in opposing this government's measures.

I believe that the minister is wrong in saying, essentially as he has said, that by winning the 1988 election he has a four or five year dictatorship, the right to do anything he wants in Canada. I do not agree with that.

I think that there are clear limitations. The government's job is to persuade the people of Canada that the policies they are pursuing are right. Now you cannot always persuade everybody that what you are doing is right. Maybe you cannot even always persuade a majority of the people that what you are doing is right, but where you have, as in this case, a vastly overwhelming majority of the people opposed to a measure that you are proposing, you at least have to stand back and say: "My gosh, have we got it wrong? Have we got it wrong?" I think they have, and I think that the Senate has support from the people of Canada in defending them, the people, against these measures proposed by the Minister of Finance.

The government has got it wrong. It has crossed that line over which governments in a consensual society must not go. They must always remember that they are put there by the people. They are answerable to the people. Their obligation is to bring the people with them on an issue. The senators are the only ones in this whole government system we have here on Parliament Hill who are actually responsive to the people at this point in time.

What about the minister's credibility? He talked about how his mandate flowed from the 1988 election. Right in the middle of the election campaign the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, the member for Mississauga South, put his foot in it as he sometimes does, but he always speaks his mind. He speaks honestly, openly and frankly, something that we would love to have from the Minister of Finance, just that kind of attitude.

He said that if this GST were implemented it would raise about $10 billion more than the government was predicting. The Minister of Finance chopped his head off so fast that it rolled all the way from Mississauga to Lake Ontario.

We now know that the hon. member for Mississauga South was right. He was right. The minister did not want to tell Canadians what this tax was going to cost them. In the campaign, sales tax was there as part of the program, phase two of tax reform. There is no question about that. But he was proposing a national sales tax that would be at once visible, fair, and revenue neutral.

That he has a mandate to do this from the people is in question for a good reason. If the people believe that any time they go to the polls they are electing just a dictatorship and a tin-pot dictator, what is the use of having elections? What is the use? If governments are not going to be responsible and answerable to the people who elect them, what is the use of having elections?

Did he bring forward a GST that met the measure of the test that he put himself in the election campaign?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Manley: No, he did not.

Is it revenue neutral?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Manley: No. It is going to reduce the deficit. He said that today. How can it be revenue neutral and also help the government's fiscal situation. I do not understand that one.

Is it visible?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Manley: No. He has changed it so that only if the retailers are really able to comply with that, will they be visible, but they can find other ways. All they are going to have to do is post a notice stating: "By the way, did you know you paid the GST?" The consumer will not necessarily know how much he or she has paid.

Is it fair?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Manley: No. My colleagues agree with me. It is not fair. Is it fair that northerners in the farthest reaches of Canada, in Peace River for example, have to pay the GST on transportation costs that are included in the cost of the goods they buy in those remote territories?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Manley: The MST is a terrible tax. We all agree with that, but at least we can say this for the MST. If goods are produced in Toronto, the person who buys it in Toronto pays the same amount of MST as the person who buys those same goods in northern Canada. With the goods and services tax, that will not be true.

Is it fair that the credits for low income Canadians are not indexed to inflation?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Manley: No. Is it fair that for families who earn more than $30,000 a year in Canada—not a lot of money at all—that it is regressive for those people, and the minister accepts this? That is not fair.

Have we got a fair tax? No. A visible tax? No. A revenue neutral tax? No.

Did the Minister of Finance ever get up and explain to the Canadian people during the course of the last election campaign, in an open, frank and honest way, what he intended to do with his phase two of tax reform?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Manley: No. Has he got a mandate from the people of Canada to shove this down their throats?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Manley: No. And thank goodness the Senate of Canada is reminding him that we have under our Constitution a bicameral system and that he has to consult with the Senate.

What was the government's mandate? Mr. Speaker, you will remember its mandate. It used it in 1984 and again in 1988: jobs, jobs, jobs. That was its mandate.

What we face in Canada right now is not only 8.4 per cent unemployment and not only the fact that the Conference Board has indicated a potential of a 9 per cent unemployment rate by early next year, but that we have over 1.1 million Canadians out of work.

I support the policy of jobs, jobs, jobs. When a government is elected, its first fundamental priority should be to address the need of its people to work. If there is a trade off, and some of the economists can debate this, between inflation and unemployment, we should go for jobs every time. The tragedy of the high interest rate and high dollar policy this minister has followed is that it will only work if it creates unemployment. It is working because it is creating unemployment.

The government is looking for suggestions. I would like to give it some suggestions. I suggest that it bring in a new budget. I think it is clear that the numbers presented in the February budget were inadequate. The minister himself has admitted that, not in the House. He chose to address the Canadian Chamber of Commerce to say that. He did not tell the House that he was wrong. I say the numbers are wrong and we need a new budget.

A key part of that new budget should be the announcement that pending further discussion and consideration, the goods and services tax will not be implemented. If this was a bad tax before, this is a terrible tax at a time when the country is sliding into a recession. It is a terrible tax at a time when consumer confidence is very low, businesses are closing and people are out of work. To add that 7 per cent burden at that point in time is totally and absolutely wrong. This is the time to stand back and say that we need to look at this again. Is this the time to implement a new consumer tax in Canada?

We also need to look at the process of tax reform and the burden distributed between corporations, the cost of doing business, and consumers in Canada. The consumers have been paying their income tax. The real consequence of this shift from the manufacturers' sales tax to a new value added tax is that about $5 billion to $6 billion in existing tax paid at the corporate level as part of the cost of doing business is being shifted downstream to individual Canadian consumers. That is a very large tax increase to put on the backs of Canadian consumers at the point in time when 1.1 million are unemployed, their confidence is down, retail sales are down, housing starts are down, car sales are down, every indicator you can think of is down. What a time to do that. That should be the government's program.

What about its longer term program? It takes a great deal of pride in the things it cuts. I think it is time it start to think about where it needs to invest.

The real problem we face in this country from the point of view of employment is pretty well set out in the recent report of the Economic Council of Canada. It talks about the changing job pattern in Canada. What we face in Canada—and it has nothing to do with parties—is reality. We face the deindustrialization of Canada. We see that Canada is increasingly unable to hold those lower paying or even some of the higher paying manufacturing jobs.

If we are to succeed in the future, we have to pursue policies which promote science and technology and scientific research and development. We need to invest in education, in forward-looking jobs that add value and creativity in Canada. We can no longer expect to survive on our base of industry that is old. We can no longer expect to prosper in the world based solely on the sale of our natural resources. I think that the government should bring forward a twofold economic strategy; one addressing the fact that they are creating a recession in this country and have done so by creating very high unemployment, and at the same time to bring forward a plan for building a new class of high paying, useful jobs that will move us forward into the future as a nation that is committed to the welfare of its people and a clean environment.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks of the member for Ottawa South since he was quoted in The Ottawa Citizen of October 13. I thought his comments were fairly reasonable. I will get to them later.

I must admit that I am very disappointed in his speech. During questions and comments he may want to make some comments about that because I know he is one of the members of the Liberal Party of Canada who is promised, apparently according to people in his own party, a good future, a brilliant future. I think I even heard somebody say that he may be a leadership candidate. That could be a compliment in certain circles, except that in the Liberal Party of Canada at least half of the caucus consider themselves to be leadership material.

I would have expected a speech that was a little more consistent in the area of democracy. I do not think that the speech by the member for Ottawa South will be remembered as one of the most brilliant moments of his career in so far as describing what democracy is about. Now is the time when all members of this House who are concerned in any way at all with the basic precepts and principles of democracy must denounce with all their energy what is going on in the Senate of Canada today. To speak of dictatorship at this time, Mr. Speaker, you would have to speak of the dictatorship of unelected federal Liberals who refuse on a money matter to accede to the democratically elected will of the House of Commons of Canada. That is revolting, it is unacceptable. The member for Ottawa South should take the first opportunity to get up in his place and denounce that as being unacceptable.

I have a simple question for the member for Ottawa South. What is the position of the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada concerning this. I will tell you why I am asking this question, Mr. Speaker. Because we do not know.

What we know is from the same article in The Ottawa Citizen of October 13, 1990, entitled, "Who is in charge?". I will not cite the article verbatim, but it states, "The leader of the Liberal Party, Mr. Chrétien, today said during the Liberal leadership race that it would be irresponsible to axe the GST if we did not have an alternative". I have yet to hear today from the Liberals what that alternative would be.

But then later on he seemed to change his mind. He said, "I have my own personal opinions but I am not alone in the Liberal Party of Canada". I have news for him. He is really not alone in the Liberal Party of Canada.

He then went on to say that he did not know what the Senate was going to do. Then he said, "Well, they will not do anything that I don't want them to do", and today we still do not know where the leader of the Liberal Party stands on this.

I want to finish by citing the member for Ottawa South who said that he supports the Senate's efforts. That is what he said, and it is consistent with his speech today, but he is worried that in the battle for public opinion kazoo blowing might very well cost the Liberals support.

It seems the applause has stopped on the other side.

He went on to say, "I personally find the antics of obstructionism offensive and I don't believe that most Canadians want that to be the way their public policy is decided". He is obviously talking about the way the federal Liberals are behaving. Could he tell us today whether he still stands by that quote in The Ottawa Citizen of October 13?

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I hope you will give me adequate time to respond to a very long statement by the former minister. I am a little disappointed in him as well. I have high regard for him, perhaps as a potential future leader of his party. I thought by and large he had comported himself in his very significant responsibilities quite well. I do not think that this is necessarily the best time to be extremely partisan. I did not mean my comments in an extremely partisan way.

• (1820)

I do not think that what I said today is inconsistent in any way with what I was quoted as saying in the paper—which is an accurate quote. Any thoughtful Canadian would probably feel the same way.

I have regard for the situation that we are in. I think the remarks that he refers to Mr. Chrétien making should be regarded in the same way as well. This is an unusual situation where the Senate is opposing a government bill. That is clear. I do not think that is a surprise or mystery to anybody. It is a very significant departure from practice in Canada that that is happening. Very significant.

The question really is, is the Senate justified in the circumstances to do what it is doing? That is really what I was trying to address, not in a partisan way but really in a philosophical way as someone who is very concerned about the situation we have in Canada—the status of our institutions, the respect that our people have for the institutions and what is happening.

I am sure I do not need to remind my friend of this quote by a Greek philosopher who said 2,000 years ago: "If we are to have freedom, our politicians must do what we want them to do". I acknowledged in my speech the difficulty of establishing that in a pluralistic society, but in this case they have succeeded in persuading only about 15 per cent of the people that what they want to do is right.

Can it be right that a government which was not elected on a mandate of putting in this particular tax, as I think I demonstrated in my speech, as opposed to a government that was elected because of a campaign that was very much focused on another issue and was voted for by about 43 per cent of the population of the country, really claim that they have the legitimate authority to override the will of 85 per cent of the population with a measure?

An hon. member: Absolutely not.

Mr. Manley: I think there is a limit.

An hon. member: That is right. And you reached it.

Mr. Manley: And you have crossed it.

An hon. member: They surpassed it.

Mr. Manley: They crossed it and what they are doing, Mr. Speaker, is wrong.

Now if we have a system where we have a House of Commons and a Senate in this country, which we do, then it is necessary for the leadership in the House of Commons to take into account the views of the Senate.

In six years, what has this government done to significantly reform the Senate? Nothing. Nothing.

Some hon. members: No, no.

An hon. member: They did, they added some 20-odd senators.

Mr. Manley: Even what they proposed in the context of Meech Lake—

An hon. member: They never got it through.

Mr. Manley: —did not reform in one way the powers of the Senate, so I presume since the government advocated those reforms of giving the provinces the right to appoint the senators, that it must have thought that the powers the Senate has under the Constitution were adequate.

An hon. member: Yes. Absolutely.

Mr. Manley: The only reform that they have brought about with respect to the Senate is to increase it by eight members.

I might add in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that at the very least, this government has the obligation to ask the Supreme Court of Canada whether it had the authority to add eight senators to the Senate. If not, then it should not be proceeding in the way it is and it should be taking into account the views of the Senate as the Constitution of Canada requires.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will allow very briefly, because we only have one minute left, 30 seconds of questions to the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill and 30 seconds for a reply from the hon. member for Ottawa South.

[English]

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I admired the somewhat unsuccessful attempt by the previous speaker to be non-partisan, in contrast to his colleague for Hamilton East who suggested that the New Democratic Party had not campaigned vigorously enough against free trade and that is why we had a majority Conservative government.

I would like to remind the members of the Liberal Party that there are 12 more New Democrats in this House than there ever have been before. We more than held our traditional turf and the fact that the Liberal Party was unable to do so is the reason we have a majority government.

Nevertheless I would like to ask the hon. member a simple question. If the Liberal Party has been so absolutely and so consistently opposed to the goods and services tax in both Houses, why did not the senators kill the GST on May 3, 1990 at second reading, when they had the opportunity to vote against it in principle.

Mr. Manley: I think the Senate has proceeded with this legislation in the most responsible way, by considering the views of Canadians before deciding what it should do with it. I am sure the New Democratic Party has no objection to the fact that the Senate committee on banking and finance travelled from coast to coast in this country and heard the views of the Canadian people. And having heard the views of Canadians, they were able to assume the authority which, unfortunately, was thrust upon them by the government, through its irresponsible actions in forcing this down the throats of Canadians.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this motion now before the House.

Taken at face value, this motion appears to be about the government's economic policies and the supposed results of those policies.

What this motion really represents is the opposition's vested political interest in exploiting the gloomiest side of any and every economic issue. That is why the opposition is so desperate to have a recession declared before the full evidence is available. That is why it is so eager to turn the possibility of a mild recession into something far, far worse.

If the members opposite were weather forecasters, they would tell Canadians that if it's cloudy today, it means showers turning to steady rain, and then to torrential downpours, hurricanes, cataclysmic floods, and a huge upsurge in the ark division of the shipbuilding industry. In fact, I can see rain clouds over the hon. members' heads on the opposite side. A little common sense perspective is really what is needed here today, not the opportunistic rantings we have heard about the economy from the opposition.

The fact is that the Minister of Finance made clear in the budget in February that the economy was in for a difficult year after several years of strong economic growth at a rate beyond the capacity of our economy to sustain. As the minister acknowledged in the budget, the possibility of negative real growth for at least one-quarter was very real as the economy and inflationary pressure that had built up were cooled down.

The opposition knows full well that this is the same basic pattern of economic readjustment that has followed every other time in which our economy has exceeded its growth capacity for an extended period. What the opposition does not seem to understand is that by acting firmly today, sooner rather than later, the government is ensuring that we avoid a deep and protracted recession. Have the members opposite already forgotten the devastating experience of the 1981–82 recession? The government has not forgotten its responsibility to see that that does not happen again.

I would like to point out to members opposite that if we had a recession in Canada in 1981–82, we had a depression in Alberta. The National Energy Program, in combination with the economic policies of the Liberal regime at that time, resulted in 45,000 to 60,000 people losing their jobs. People had to forfeit their homes when land prices dropped. Their mortgages were $10,000, $15,000 and $20,000 higher than the value of their houses. At that time, the Liberal government literally pillaged $20 billion a year for five years during the time one of the worst recessions that we have seen in this century. That is why the Liberals ran fourth in my riding. We have not forgotten that. If anyone knows what a recession is, it is the members opposite. It is a veritable depression which was created by them in the province of Alberta.

The motion before the House serves one useful purpose. It provides an opportunity for me to talk about the policies that the government has been planning and implementing since it came to office in 1984.

Our policies have dramatically expanded the economy's potential to grow and create wealth over the last six years. This is the result of consistent, comprehensive action by the government to bring the national deficit under control and to free the private sector from structural barriers and burdens that impeded its efficiency and ability to compete.

The opposition talks about the need to preserve and create jobs. To do this, of course, we must be competitive. One of the prerequisites to ensuring our competitiveness is a stable, healthy, economic environment that encourages productive business investment. That is why the overriding agenda of the government since 1984 has been to create a more favourable economic climate for business by taking action in areas where we have a direct impact on the economy and where we can achieve the greatest long-term benefits.

The first of these areas has been to take action to reduce the deficit. Fiscal soundness is key to our competitiveness because it will free up domestic savings needed to finance the deficit. These savings then can be channelled into more productive investments, creating a more efficient and vibrant economy. That is what it is all about.

We have made significant progress in this regard. We have cut waste and inefficiency in operations of government. The size of the Public Service has been reduced by 12,000 person-years to the level it was in 1973. I hasten to add that our population in Canada has grown 20 per cent in this time. Government is responding to greater problems, greater challenges, and we have done it very, very well. The number of Crown corporation employees has been reduced by 75,000 people, partly through privatization, and partly through greater efficiency. Today the cost of operating the government is virtually the same as it was six years ago.

We have been successful in forcing the federal government to live within its means on the operating side. When we first came to office the federal government was spending $16 billion more than it was taking in. Last year we had a $10 billion surplus—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Thorkelson: —on the program spending side and we expect a $14 billion operating surplus this year.

Mr. Merrithew: They don't know what a surplus is.

Mr. Thorkelson: No, they don't. They have never had one—deficit financing for years and years and years, average increases of 14 per cent for them for about 20 years.

Our control over growth of the national debt takes longer to apply. In 1984 we inherited a $200 billion debt. It was accelerating at a rate of $22 billion a year. Now it is over $300 billion, but I should remind hon. members opposite that 80 per cent of that is compound interest on compound interest on the Liberal debt. In effect, it is a Liberal debt that we are saddled with and which we must take care of.

By 1994-1995, our financial requirements will be in surplus. That means that within five years the government will be able to start buying back its bonds and treasury bills. The country will be on a clear path to reducing its debt substantially.

Consider how far we have come compared with other major industrialized countries. In 1984 Canada's deficit on a national accounts basis was 50 per cent higher than the average of the G-7 leading industrial countries. Now it is down to seven-tenths of a percentage point above the G-7 average. On the expenditure side, our performance in reducing program expenditures is better than that of both the U.S. and Mrs. Thatcher's United Kingdom.

I would like to point out that in his speech the member for Ottawa South was talking about investments.

He laughs now when we talk about reducing program expenditures, but he said he wants to add to the deficit. He wants to invest in the economy. Where is this money going to come from? We would have to borrow. He would borrow and borrow. He would create the debt which slips away from us. We would spend more and more on interest payments every year. It is the biggest component of government expenditures to date: $41 billion. He wants to add to that, rather than having a good program of controlling expenditures and putting money in the right places at the right time.

Our objective is to get the deficit down in order to reduce interest payments on a debt to an ever-dwindling fraction of the total budget. Achieving this will provide more savings for productive investment and will create wealth and jobs for Canadians. In short, it will make the economy more competitive, and that is what our program is all about, making our economy more competitive.

Along with our work to control government spending, we have moved to strengthen the ability of the private sector to compete and create a bigger economic pie for all Canadians.

When the members opposite were in government, all they talked about was redistributing wealth. We want to create wealth, growth, productivity, and greater numbers of jobs.

We began six years ago by transforming a chilly investment barrier into a positive screening and review mechanism. Investment Canada is now fostering a friendly, receptive, and helpful investment plan.

We have also moved to strengthen and improve the climate for free enterprise through new business framework legislation that safeguards fair competition. The new Competition Act is providing long overdue stability to the competitive environment. Similarly, amendments to the Patent Act have strengthened intellectual property rights. What have these three measures done? They have brought new jobs and new investment all across the country. We have seen a tremendous amount of investment in Alberta because of these measures.

In the riding that I represent—a university riding—because of the Patent Act, we have seen new investments in pharmaceutical research and other things. It has been very good for our economy.

We have been overhauling and reforming Canada's regulatory framework. Wherever possible, we are eliminating unnecessary restrictions, and we are discouraging new regulations that are not essential. Every day, the opposition calls for new regulations to damper down the economic forces in our economy. These are wrong measures. Perhaps most dramatic has been the deregulation of the energy and transportation sectors permitting a more market oriented and market driven approach.

Less than three weeks ago, we tabled in the House our policy and proposals for updating financial sector regulation to ensure that Canada continues to have a healthy, competitive financial sector. In doing so, we are building on one of the most sound and reliable financial systems in the world. We have a strong deposit taking system. We have a large capital market, and we have world-scale life insurance companies. We possess the ability to finance our capital requirements in a very effective and efficient way.

Another way in which we are reducing the government's role in the economy is by selling government owned Crown corporations to private interests. Since 1984, we have privatized more than 20 Crown corporations. This has been of tremendous benefit to the economy.

We will continue to privatize Crown corporations and sell investments where government ownership is no longer needed to meet public policy objectives. Exactly two weeks ago, we introduced Bill C-84 which outlines our proposal to privatize Petro-Canada.

At the same time, we have promoted economic growth through a variety of means that encourage business. We have taken steps to stimulate greater private sector research and development. Next to Australia, Canada provides for the most favourable tax treatment for R and D expenditures in the industrial world.

To be competitive in today's information intensive economy requires a skilled and flexible workforce. That is why we have put forward our proposed labour force development strategy. This strategy, which now has been before the Senate for almost a full year, places strong new emphasis on worker retraining and upgrading of skills. The strategy provides for increased federal funding for labour force upgrading, and it seeks ways to encourage the private sector to double its training effort.

• (1840)

I would like to point out that as a member of Parliament, I meet with constituents every week. Many constituents come to me as a last resort looking for a job. What these people want is an opportunity to contribute to society. Many of them would benefit very much from a skill training-program. But this has been denied to them by the Liberal senators who are holding up this legislation.

What I believe is so fundamental to this is that there are people in the workforce who, through no fault of their own, experience discrimination. These include older women and people who have not had an opportunity to complete their schooling. Because of the way the economy is structured, they badly need this retraining. This is one of the most fundamental measures that we should be passing as there is a desperate need in the country for retraining.

I regret informing the people who come to visit me and seek my help that there is not enough money in the jobs retraining program because it is held up by the Senate. I have been to graduation ceremonies from some of these job retraining programs. Virtually 90 per cent of the people who have taken some of these job retraining programs have jobs. They go into the workforce where the private sector has co-operated, and the private sector business people and others are so impressed with what they have been able to contribute that they hire them immediately. This very important program is being denied to them by the Liberal senators.

Another central plank in our policy to create economic growth has been the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Because Canada depends on trade for 30 per cent of our gross domestic product, it was vital that we secure access to our largest and most important trading partner. Gaining broad, secure access to the large American market means additional sales and more jobs.

We can see this in my province of Alberta where we have had a tremendous amount of investment in the petrochemical industry. Last week, for example, the President of Finland was in Alberta, in the county of Strathcona, to place a corner-stone for a new petrochemical plant that will employ hundreds of people. These are the high quality, high value-added jobs that the member for Ottawa South was talking about. The reason they came to Alberta was because of the free trade agreement and our access to markets in the U.S.

In Gibbons, Alberta, there is another petrochemical plant which is under construction right now. We had 17 per cent tariffs on petrochemicals and those are gone, or they are diminishing so quickly that we are experiencing a tremendous amount of growth in the petrochemical sector. These are high paying and highly skilled jobs taking our raw resources and adding value to them. The member for Ottawa South was complaining that we are selling these resources at low prices to the world but we are adding value to them and creating a tremendous benefit for the economy and exporting these products to the U.S. and world markets. These are world-scale facilities.

The free trade agreement has allowed greater economies of scale and specialization. That will mean increased growth, not a made-in-Canada recession, as opposition is talking about.

We have a healthy growing economy and with that we can not have a tax system that distorts economic decisions and penalizes economic efficiency. I would like to tell members opposite that their motion is partisan, wrong and will be defeated.

[Translation]
