up for the month, and kill as many bears, and open up as many Indian mounds, as you like; only come, and that at your expense." And now I had come, and I had come five hundred miles out of my way to see him. He knew that it was approaching, but how or when I should arrive he knew not.

I made my way to the village, carrying with me the bear's ears in token of ownership, and was caring about for some sign of an inn, when my eyes caught sight of a large, painted in large white letters on a black ground, "Donald Plinster's Grocery and Dry Goods." So my friend, it seemed, was a grocer and dry-goodsman, with sugars on one side of the store and calicoes on the other, in true Western style. I think I felt a bit sorry that it was so; but I called to mind the image of the man, and told myself that it did not matter to me a red cent what his business was. Just as I reached the store a young man came out and deposited a roll of carpet on the wooden sidewalk.

"Mr. Plinster, what is this?" I enquired.
The young man stuck a thumbstick in his mouth, and took a long, steady look at me and my horse, before he said, "Guess you don't belong to these parts, stranger; from the look of you." I assented.
"Rightly, sir, you're a stranger." Again I assented. "Come on home, once more I assented. "What may yer line be—dry goods?" "No, wet." "Wet?" "Yes, wet. They are having a boom just now on the Eastern markets. Dry goods are nowhere-better than I answer gravely.
"Should I get any calico, or City silk up, stranger; never heard of the articles before." "All right; I don't object, my friend. But, say, is Mr. Plinster within?" "No, he ain't. I guess the boss is at home." "And where is that, pray?"

The young man turned and pointing down the short street towards the lake said, "Day-on see that young lady there in white, going towards the water?" "With a crimson sunshade?" "Yes, that's her.
Just follow after her, and she'll take you right to Donald Plinster's. Bot, mister, I ain't all clear yet about them Eastern goods." I heard him say, as I centered off under the lady in white. She was lost to view almost as soon as I started, and when I reached the end of the street, I was just in time to see her give her first stitch, as she was seated in a small light canoe on the lake. I galloped after her waving my hand, when she saw me, she turned her boat round and came back.

"I was told that if I followed you, you would lead me to Mr. Donald Plinster's store. But I don't question but that you are on horseback." I said, as she came gliding up to the pretty little landing-stage. "No, sir, I guess it's too far to swim." Are you the 'toulon'?" she asked, with just the faintest of blushes over-spreading her pure, colorless face. She was a pretty girl, and had a ladylike air. "Yes, I am," said Mr. Plinster.
"Any calls me such though, of course, I have no right to any such title." "Oh, that doesn't matter. I am so glad you have come, and won't you be glad if I have, Robert McKenna, take this woman's horse to the stable, and look after it well," she called out, with an air of pretty command. A sandy-haired young Scotsman came forward from a group of onlookers, and took my horse.

"Have you any beads, sir?" she enquired. "Yes, lots of it, but it is in St. Louis." "Ah, then it can't come across to-day, as it is a good thousand miles off." "You see, I have been in the woods nearly a week, and I had to reduce my traps to the smallest compass.
They are all there," I said, pointing to one or two ingeniously packed bundles back and front of the saddle. "Bring everything across at once, Rob. You had better take the gentleman's rifle, too." I forgot to say that I left some of my baggage about a mile from here, on a hillcock yonder. It is in the form of a dead bear, which I wish you would look after for me," I observed to Rob, as I handed him my rifle. "On Hickory Mount! Yo dimmis say ye've gone and shot the big beaver, sir!" exclaimed Rob, in a tone, as I thought, of some disgust. "I'm afraid I have. Was he one of the pets round here?" I asked. "You bet, sir. He was worth three hundred dollars of any man's money. He's been one too many for all of us. No end of money has been won and lost on that ramin' dooring 't' last five year. I'd've well like to hear how you did it, sir." "Rob, get about your business, and don't keep the gentleman standing here all day," came in a voice of authority from the boat. "Some-other time," I said to comfort him, as I turned away and entered the canoe. Of course I volunteered to do the pulling, but my lady of the lake only smiled and looked her head. When I offered to shore, she shook her head again, and laughed right out. At another time I should have thought her laughter was melodious.
"You row first-rate, but that is no reason why you should tire yourself,—I really shouldn't expect you," I answered for her cherry laugh was equal to a good many words. "I guess you would, sir, in two minutes. This is a very curious piece of water, and dangerous for strangers. It is very deep in most places, and full of treacherous rocks. Look here," I bent over to the left, and there, a few inches from the surface, was a long, sharp blade of rock. The girl gave two or three swift strokes, then she said, "Now look here."

I bent over to the right, and under my eye was a series of six or seven teeth of cutty rock. "It is so half the way across," she remarked, as she settled to work, and sent the skiff rushing through the water in grand style. After that I was thinking, holding my breath, wondering at her skill and nerve. The old Indian pilot at the Le Chêne Rapids was a duffer compared with her. Presently my attention was drawn to the waving of what looked like a small flag, by some one on the top of a lofty, low-lying structure on the island. "Ah, that's odd," exclaimed the girl. "He is signalling to me from the observatory." Thereupon she ceased rowing, and pulling from her pocket a couple of handkerchiefs, one red and the other white, she began to flag-signal in a rapid manner. In a little while she said, with a pretty laugh, "There, he knows all about you now. I am to tell you that you are as welcome as a king. I guess he has set the telephones at work by this."

The words were scarcely off her tongue, when suddenly the quiet air was rent with the loud booming of three cannon, that seemed to me from the moment that they were discharged in quick succession. "They have been loaded a week, awaiting your arrival," laughed the girl, enjoying my astonishment, which was not unshared by alarm. "It's very kind of your uncle, but—" I went the lady's finger, and, at the same moment, there came a crash of melodious sound that almost brought the tears to my eyes. It was nothing less than the peal of sweet-toned bells that might, for all the world, have been swinging in the old tower of some English village church.

Ding, dong, dell! Ding, dong, dell! Ah me, how the dear, familiar sound did creep into the secret parts of my soul, and shake it! I said the girl softly, "That was my idea. I thought that a silly bell would remind you of home, sir." Ten minutes later, I stepped ashore, and the grey man, Donald Plinster, grocer and dry-goodsman, had my hand in both of his. "Ay, but ye are welcome, colonel, ye are welcome to my heart and home, and God bless ye!" And the bells, the heart-shaking bells, were still pealing!
Somewhat, the memory of my coming to Log o' Mutton Island has to this day subtle elements of pathos, pity, friendship, and romance, such as lend to the peculiar distinction of rarity and richness.
