POETRY.

The Opening Year.

Your hand, New Year, since we must comrades be Through the strange circles of the seasons four!
Flooding in lonely paths 'mid drifting snow
When days are dark, and whirling tempests roar, Will your strong guiding arm be 'round me pressed!
And when the ice-bars melt, and warm blue streams Laugh in the sun, and leap toward the sea,
Will you, then, share my happy springtime dreams—
The waking songs that birds and poets know!
And when red roses burn on bended sprays,
And lovers roam through shadowy woodland ways,
Will you keep kindly pace? and last when brown Tie the sweet fields, and faded leaves come down,
And we are tired, both, and faint to rest—Will you be friends with me, still true and near?
Then take my hand and heart, dear comrade year.

SELECT STORY.

Pretty Miss Smith.

BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

CHAPTER XII.

With one disgusted glance from Hilary and his companion to Tom, I turned abruptly away and walked back through the garden towards the entrance-gates as fast as I could. But Tom was not to be shaken off. He followed, and was of course able easily to keep pace with me.

"Where are you off to in such a hurry?" he asked.

"I'm going up to town to see Mr. Marshall, and I don't wish for your escort, thank you," I replied.

"You're going to have that advantage thrown in though," he said coolly.

"And you ought to be grateful; for the governor's very busy this morning, and perhaps you'll have to come away without seeing him, and he dependent on me for your lunch. And if I have any more tautisms it shall not go beyond the bumble bun, 'penny,' not 'Bath.' So be a good girl, and don't give me any more trouble."

I stopped short in dismay.

"Not be able to see him!" I exclaimed. "Oh, but I must, I must. It's his life and death almost," I went on, threatening to become hysterical.

It had occurred to me already that Tom's light manner was partly assumed that morning, that there was some real care underneath. Now I felt sure of it, for instead of taking my tragic outburst lightly, as at another time I felt sure he would have done, he grew quite white, and looked at me with a curious expression in his eyes.

"What have you got to tell him?" he asked very shortly, after a moment's pause.

"Never mind."

"Don't see the use of making all this mystery," he said with some acerbity.
"I am in my father's confidence, and whatever you tell him I shall hear."

I made no answer to this, and we walked the rest of the way to the station in silence. For my part, I think I should have been stoical enough to have travelled the whole distance to the city in dignified silence, if Tom had not presently exerted himself to break it.
Assuming a coaxing manner which to me, in my weakness for him, was quite irresistible, he sidled along the seat of the railway-carriage until he was close beside me, and half whispered:

"You've grown very hard, Georgie." Now, I am not one of those silly girls who burst into tears on the slightest provocation; but I was miserable and mystified, stupid after a bad night's rest, angry with myself for still caring for this heartless fellow, yet weak enough to be moved by his reproach.
So I began to cry; and Tom, in his affected sympathy, put his hand with mine into my pocket in search of a handkerchief to dry my eyes. What he drew out, however, was a piece of cream-colored ribbon which I was taking to town to match. Without seeing to notice the difference, he applied it to my eyes, and of course my horror as no tenderness could have done.

"Look what you're doing," I sobbed.
"It's spoilt now, and it was quite a new!"

"It was my emotion—it got the better of me," murmured Tom. "Don't you believe I'm fond of you Georgie?"

I shook my head.

"No, indeed I don't," I said decidedly.
"For one thing, I don't believe in after the heartless way in which you spoke about poor Mary, that you are capable of feeling much for any woman; and in the second place, I know you're not capable of feeling much for me!"

I ended with a little tremor of the lips.

"And yet you care for me a little bit still?" whispered Tom.

"That doesn't prove you to be worth caring for. It only proves that I'm an idiot."

"Will you give me a kiss, Georgie?" he said insinuatingly putting his great ginger moustache close to my face.

"But I intended to let him see that an idiot once is not necessarily an idiot always."

"No!" I said, shooting the word out like a bullet, and drawing myself up very straight. "I will never kiss you again, until you have left off being friends with the man who is breaking Mary's heart."

These words gave Tom a shock.
He told me that it was hard and unjust, and that it was Mary on the contrary, whose caprice and coldness had made Hilary miserable. But of course I was too loyal to my friend to listen to him, and when we arrived at the door of Mr.
Marshall's office I was as unconvinced as ever.

Rather afraid that Tom, in his jealousy at my want of confidence, should try to prevent my seeing his father, I took the daring step of running right through into the private office without knocking or any sort of announcement.
Mr. Marshall was alone, writing at his desk. When I suddenly threw myself on my knees beside him and looked up into his face, he looked as if a cannon-ball had landed at his feet.

"Forgive me," I panted out. "Tom said you were busy and perhaps would n't see me, and I had something so important to say to you that I had to come. I have been staying with Mary Smith and last night I caught a man trying to frighten her to death, and he's been doing it for ever so long.

"Now this is incoherent statement took the lawyer's breath away. He examined my face with peculiar interest, trying to ascertain whether I was really sane.

"A man?" he echoed at last slowly.
Then, after another long scrutiny of my features, he asked: "What man?"

"I drew a deep sigh and shook my head.

"I don't know. I have never seen him before. The watchman said he was a detective, but I can't believe it.
It is all a mystery. I could do nothing but come to you."

I was relieved to see that Mr. Marshall was by no means inclined to make light of my adventure, which I then recounted to him at length. Tom, who had followed me into the room, heard it all, but stood very quietly in the background making no comment. When I had finished, Mr. Marshall spoke, very decidedly.

"This is a very serious matter," he said. "Some one has evidently been tampering with the poor girl's wits.
You must tell all you have told me to Mr. Ibbetson, Mary's other guardian.
He's a hard-headed man, and his advice may help us."

I was sitting by the table, playing nervously with the torn bit of evidence which I had not yet shown him.

"Tom," and Mr. Marshall turned to his son, "just run round to his office, will you? and ask him if he can come round for five minutes."

But Tom evidently wished to have no more to do with the matter.

"Send Follington," he said shortly.
"I've got to drive young Bailey down to Rochampton, and I ought to be with him by this time. The dog-cart's round now."

As he spoke, he opened the door, and returning, crossed the room to the window and looked out. He was fumbling in his pockets, and the next moment he pulled out two pair of gloves, one a pair of light, thin kid that he had worn that morning, he threw carelessly on the table. The other pair he proceeded to draw on his hands.

I watched him, horror-struck. As he proceeded to draw on the second, I noticed that the end was torn off.

With a gasp, scarcely knowing what I did, I snatched it from his hand and produced the strip of dogskin I had been carrying.

It fitted exactly into the torn place.

CHAPTER XIII.

At the very first of discovering that the torn glove was Tom's, both father and son stood for a moment as if transfixed, the former, I think, scarcely understanding what had happened until I explained where I had found the incriminating scrap of dogskin.
But Tom understood even before, with incoherent words broken by sobs, I owned I had found it close by the ventilator over Mary's room. When, overcome by misery and shame, I hung my head and cried without restraint.

Father and son, meanwhile stood facing each other silently, it seemed for quite a long time. At last I looked up, still scarcely able to repress my sobs.

"Oh, Tom," I whispered, "how could you?"

"Tom, whose face was a curious grey color, laughed hoarsely.

"Well, you thought me capable of any villainy, and so I am, you see."

"But it was not you; you were not the man I saw!" I cried in an eager whisper.

"No, but I know all about him," said Tom shortly. "I may as well make a clean breast of it now," he continued in a strange, constrained tone, looking at his father. "And we needn't pretend it's very shocking in me, as it would be in a person who'd borne a high character. Everybody knows me and my opinions!"

Even at that moment, with a young man's vanity, Tom seemed to feel a little pride in his reputation for cynicism.
But I could not refrain from a wail of disappointment.

"Oh Tom, but I had always believed in my heart that you were better than your opinions."

He looked around at me quickly, and I thought he seemed touched.

"Well, I've undecided you now," he said in a much less resolute tone than before. "Instead of wavering between trust and distrust you can have the satisfaction of knowing I'm a real out-and-out-er."

But for all his levity, he was ashamed, I could see that; and I own to the disgraceful fact that my heart went out to him in his humiliation, guilty though it was, even more than it had done in the days when his airs of easy superiority had been something rather hard to bear. A sudden stab of jealousy went through me, however, as I remembered another feature of the case.

"The woman!" I cried. "Oh, Tom, then you knew who the woman was!"

"Upon my honor—if you think I have enough left to swear by—I never saw her before this morning."

If this was only true I felt, weak that I was, that I could forgive him all the rest—in time. I could not repress a sigh of relief. At that moment a clerk came in and announced "Mr. Ibbetson!"

"You'll keep my counsel—just for this morning?" said Tom abruptly leaving me and speaking in a low voice.

I did not answer him except by a re-proachful look. He might have known he need not ask me that!

"Of course she will," broke in Mr.
Marshall's voice, "Georgie would never utter a word to get an old friend into trouble, if they tied her to the stake; isn't that true, Georgie?"

"I hope so, Mr. Marshall," said I.

The sound of his voice had startled me.
In truth I had been so much absorbed in my feelings about Tom that I had almost forgotten that anyone else was in the room. But now I noticed in the father's face the effects of the son's confession of guilt. I had never seen Mr. Marshall, even when most hardworked, look so pale and so disturbed. He, like me, had always, I knew, had a secret belief in Tom, I had just time to cross over to his challenger, and to whisper, with my hand placed affectionately on his shoulder, "Don't be hard upon Tom, will you?" when Mr. Ibbetson walked slowly into the room.

His entrance cast a fresh gloom upon all of us.

Mayr's second guardian was a man of about sixty five years of age, who possessed the peculiar faculty of making you feel, in his presence, how bad human nature could be. This arose from no failing in Mr. Ibbetson himself, who had always borne as high a character for integrity as for shrewdness; it was a consequence of his life-long habit of looking out for and finding the worst traits of the men and women with whom he had to deal. One always, therefore, appeared before him in one's worst colors: I, for one, felt that I was never so hasty, so foolish, or so frivolous as when he was in the room. However silent he might be, I knew that he repaid my dislike very heartily; and I thought he showed his displeasure my presence by a slight contraction of his thin, bristly grey eyebrows as he entered, walking as usual in a stooping attitude, as if to hide his face as much as possible.

He nodded without smiling first to Mr. Marshall, and then to Tom, and without extending the courtesy to me, sat down and began to rub the gold eyeglasses he scarcely ever used.

"You sent for me, Marshall?" he said.

"Yes," answered poor Mr. Marshall, who was not very successful in concealing the fact that he had had a great shock. "I have had some very unsatisfactory news about our unfortunate ward, Mary Smith. There is some sort of mystery about it, and I hoped that you might help us to clear it up."

Poor Mr. Marshall! He may have hoped this when sent for his co-guardian a few minutes before, but he certainly could not be in the same mind now that he had discovered the culprit to be his own son. I felt so sorry both for him and for Tom that I looked steadfastly out of the window, for fear those cold, shrewd eyes should read any part of the truth in mine. Mr. Ibbetson gave me a long, steady gaze at all round, and then went on rubbing his eyeglasses as if his whole attention was given to that occupation.

"Let's hear it," he said briefly.

"I am afraid neither you nor I can entirely acquit ourselves of blame in the matter; for it seems that since she has been living down at the distillery she has been quietly losing her wits.
Now we ought to have gone down there from time to time to see how she was getting on. I have been so busy that it would have been difficult for me to spare the time; but you, Ibbetson, a comparatively idle man, might have given the girl a look in."

Mr. Ibbetson shook his head without looking up.

"Not much use for me to go," he said dryly. "Never knew Mary Smith had any wits; shouldn't have noticed the loss of them."

I, in my seat at the window, moved impatiently. Mr. Ibbetson noticed this, as he noticed everything; but he did not look up.

"You mustn't say that before Georgie Oliver," said Mr. Marshall, taring round kindly towards me. "It is she who found out poor Mary's case, and it is from her that you must hear all about it. You know Georgie, I think?"

"Yes," said Mr. Ibbetson, in a tone which plain said that the acquaintance gave him no pleasure. He wheeled his chair round so as to face me. "Is it you who are to tell the story? Begin then."

I obeyed, feeling more nervous and miserable than I had ever done in my life before. However I may try to tone down my narrative, I felt sure that he would pierce to the truth. It was in vain that I made the recital as bare as possible; by adroit and unexpected questions he ferreted out every incident, excepting, of course, that of the glove.
When I had finished he remained quite silent, making no comment, until Mr.
Marshall spoke to him.

"Well, what do you think of it all?"

"It doesn't much matter what I think until I think I know what sounded it at the bottom of this, answered Mr. Ibbetson quietly.

Then he got up as if to go. Mr.
Marshall rose too, evidently excited.

"Do you mean to take any steps?"

"Yes. One of us must go down and stay at the house; that will put a stop to this hanky-panky. And as you are so busy, I suppose it must be I."

Mr. Marshall looked disturbed and glanced at Tom. I thought he felt his son's misdemeanors would stand a poor chance of concealment under that cynical pair of eyes.

"You had better let me go down," he said, in a desperate sort of tone.
"There's a woman to be faced and questioned, and you'd come off badly in that part of the business."

"Perhaps I should," returned the other with a grimace of distaste. "But can you go at once? The girl's a fool, but that's no reason why we should let a knave profit by her folly. The matter must be looked into immediately."

"I will go down to-night," said Mr.
Marshall, to my great relief. "It's an awful sacrifice of my time to get away just now, but I feel so guilty at my share in neglecting her, that I shall go, whatever it costs."

I jumped up from my chair with an exclamation of joy.

"You'll come to-night, really tonight?" I asked eagerly.

"Really to-night," said Mr. Marshall decidedly. "And now, my dear, you must be off; for I have a lot of work to do before I can get away."

"August Flower"

I had been troubled five months with Dyspepsia. The doctors told me it was chronic. I had a fullness after eating and a heavy load in the pit of my stomach. I suffered frequently from a Water Brash of clear matter. Sometimes a deadly Sickness at the Stomach would overtake me. Then again I would have the terrible pains of Wind Colic. At such times I would try to belch and could not. I was working then for Thomas McHenry, Druggist, Corner Irwin and Western Ave., Allegheny City, Pa., in whose employ I had been for seven years. Finally I used August Flower, and after using just one bottle for two weeks, was entirely relieved of all the trouble. I can now eat things I dared not touch before. I would like to refer you to

THE ACADIAN

WOLFVILLE, N. S., JAN. 8, 1892.

The Fruit Growers' Association.

The twenty-eighth annual session of this useful organization has been held in Wolfville this week.

Street Lighting.

In some unincorporated towns where the electric light is being introduced we notice that a committee of the citizens is appointed to try and make arrangements to have the streets lighted.

The Next in order.

The advantages of having a steam-boat wharf at the mouth of the creek have been too often set forth by the ACADIAN and are too well understood by the people of Wolfville to require being further emphasized.

Lord Salisbury has created three new peers, each typical of British success and distinction in widely different walks of life.

In the bye election held on Thursday of last week in North Lunenburg, Ontario, Rosmond the Conservative candidate was elected by a majority of over 400.

Trained Teachers.

It has been reported through some of the papers that there will be but one more examination of candidates for license to teach under the present system; and then all will be required to attend a training school before they will be allowed to teach.

Against this change it is urged:—(1) That some of the best teachers have never attended a Normal School, but have made themselves what they are by teaching and private study.

In favor of this change it is claimed:—(1) That the best ability is needed to understand the child, and the greatest skill required to instruct him, so as to develop the mind in a natural way.

The special function of the teacher is to care for the intellect, or that faculty of the child's mental nature which has to do with knowledge.

The teacher must also be well acquainted with the laws of health and should teach their observance in his school. He should see that the child suffers no bodily harm from want of proper ventilation, light, physical exercise, proper position in sitting or standing, frequent changes of position, and variation of study.

2. The fact that some become good teachers without training, does not preclude the idea that they might become better teachers, and in a much shorter time, if they studied the best methods and were required to put these in practice in presence of, and under the criticism of professors of the art.

3. While a few might be prevented from learning to teach by teaching, for want of means to secure the requisite training, a much larger number would be screened from injury to mind and body, by not being experimented upon by this class of would be teachers.

4. It is probable that the low salaries complained of, are the result of the competition between the beginners without training, and those who have endeavored to prepare themselves to do valuable work in the school-room.

services, and too many Boards of Trustees, regarding solely the dollar side of the question, will advance very little upon that to the experienced and well trained teacher.

To bring about this state of things the Provincial Normal School, which now expends its main strength in preparing candidates for non-professional certificates, must drop this kind of work and employ its energies in giving teachers a knowledge of the true objects and aims of education.

The work of preparing candidates for non-professional licenses will then devolve upon the Academies and other High Schools. The examination may be conducted as now and serve the double purpose of a grading examination for those not wishing to teach, or for a license to those who are willing to take the professional training required.

Those who now hold licenses and have had some experience will be needed to keep the schools running; for at best, it will require four or five years for the Normal School to give to the Province a supply of trained teachers.

CATARRH CURED, health and sweet breath secured by Shiloh's Catarrh Remedy. Price 50 cents. Nasal Injector free. Sold by Geo. V. Rand, druggist.

DEAR ACADIAN,—I have been watching with much pleasure and pride the progress of our town. Wolfville is evidently on the eve of a prosperous era. It must be a source of great gratification to all interested in her welfare. What with a splendid water supply, an efficient fire company and, what will shortly become a valued acquisition to our town, an electric light service, our town is going ahead. It seems a pity, however, that any of these advancements should be marred at the expense of deterioration of the place. I have noticed with much regret that several of our ornamental trees have been badly mutilated to make room for the wires of the electric light service. I should to ask if this is a prerogative that electric light companies have or if the Wolfville company are setting thus at their own responsibility. No doubt the company can give the necessary information.
