I would ask the minister to consider very carefully whether it would not be advisable to provide quick and cheap legal remedies in connection with the realization of securities. In other words, as your bill stands now you have to go through the whole full-dress performance of an action in court for the purpose of getting an order either for sale or of foreclosing the lands and taking them over. Where the Dominion government and the provincial governments are co-operating for the purpose of putting through a scheme of this nature, some provision ought to be made in the bill for cheap and speedy legal machinery for realizing on the security of the loan. I wish before taking my seat to thank hon. gentlemen who apparently thought it was necessary to applaud during the few remarks which I had to make.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not think there is a more important clause in this bill than the present one, and I am surprised at the evident haste there is on the part of hon. gentlemen in some parts of this House to rush this through without due consideration. I want to call the attention of the minister again to the protest made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) in respect to clause 5.

Let me say at the very outset that unless the money can be lent to the farmer at a rate of interest not exceeding 7 per cent, including amortization, the scheme itself is going to be slowed up and few are going to take advantage of it. Indeed its whole future may depend upon the rate of interest. It is true, as has already been stated, that the question of efficient administration also enters into the matter, but efficient administration coupled with a rate of interest too high will defeat the whole purpose of the bill, nullify it and make it of absolutely no advantage to the farmer. Subclause 5 of clause 7 reads:

> The interest rate on loans under this act shall be such a rate in excess of the interest rate yielded at the time of issue by the last series of farm loan bonds issued by the board as shall be sufficient, in the judgment of the board, to provide for the expenses of operation and for the necessary reserves for losses—

And so on. I am opposed to leaving those wide powers in the hands of the board. The board should not have the power to assess its own administration costs. Every hon. member knows from personal experience the temptations, the inclinations of all government appointed bodies to aggrandize themselves and their particular departments or functions, whether they be commissions or departments of the government itself. There is a serious danger that too great an establishment may be set up, too many officials employed, and in a dozen other ways the expenses of the board advanced and the rate of interest increased.

I would like to see inserted in that subclause a maximum of one per cent as a limit for administration costs. I agree of course with all hon. members who have considered this or similar bills for four or five years that we must protect the whole scheme by making provision for proper reserve. We have no objection to, nor are we opposing, proper provision for reserve. But in addition to the wide power that is gven in this clause, if hon. gentlemen will turn to the first subclause of clause 9 they will find provision made for a vast reserve fund amounting to 25 per cent of the total paid up capital of the board, which may be a contingent reserve and called upon for administration purposes. In other words you have already in subclause 1 of clause 9 full provision of any additional outlay that may in the initial stages fall upon the administration in carrying out its business over and above the one per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is merely to see what they can do with earnings when they get them. It does not make an earning.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Certainly it does not necessarily make an earning, but there is a provision for a contingent reserve which may, if secured, be drawn upon by the adminstration. The two coupled together make altogether too wide powers for any board. I strongly support the suggestion of the hon. member for Acadia that we ought to have some limit to the administration costs. Full and proper provision should be made for reserves, but the administration costs must be kept down to a limit.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope my hon. friend did not have me in mind when he spoke of rushing things on this bill. I think I have sat here very patiently this evening.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to exonerate the minister. He has been very patient and has done very well, but I do not wish to exonerate hon. gentlemen who bang their desks when other hon. gentlemen are sincerely criticizing the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to the question of a limited spread for administration I am somewhat embarrassed in discussing this, as I understand that a number of members on both sides have already discussed it with the Minister of Finance and that he is willing to accept the suggestion. I suppose I cannot separate myself from ministerial responsibility long enough to discuss just the difficulties I see in its operation, so that I had better move on behalf of the Minister of Finance to insert after the word "operation" in the fifth line the words "not exceeding one per cent of the amount of the loan." The subclause would then read—and I would ask the hon. member for West York and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre particularly to follow this, because of their interest in this matter from past investigations:

> The interest rate on loans under this act shall be such a rate in excess of the interest rate yielded at the time of issue by the last series of farm loan bonds issued by the board as shall be sufficient, in the judgment of the board, to provide for the expenses of operation not exceeding one per cent of the amount of the loan and for the necessary reserve for losses.

Mr. STEVENS: The idea is quite sound.

Mr. DUNNING: The motive.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but the wording of the addition is in the wrong place.

Mr. DUNNING: I think not.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What will happen if it is found that the act cannot be administered on that amount? Some means surely will have to be found to carry on.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish my hon. friend would not ask me to enter the realm of prophecy to-night. We can at least make an effort to administer the act under the conditions provided. In the United States one per cent is allowed, although included in that amount is provision for losses.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: Those gentlemen who say "hear, hear" must bear in mind of course that it is one thing to provide one per cent as a basis of operations in which a billion dollars is involved, and another thing to start a new scheme lending one million dollars in one year and having as a result only $10,000 to operate with.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister does not wish to prejudice the bill by suggesting a billion dollars as the limit under which the one per cent will not apply?

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Because I have in my hand the last report of the federal farm loan board of the United States in which the statement is frankly made that experience has fully demonstrated that when a bank attains a volume of $100,000,000 in mortgages it can, owing to that volume, pay all expenses of operation, all losses and all other charges on a spread of less than one per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want to prejudice the bill but there is a long piece of difference between even $100,000,000 and the amount that will be involved in a new scheme of this kind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The amendment is in the right direction. But there is no excuse for spending $50,000 as we shall spend if we do a business of $5,000,000. There should be no heavy overhead expenses in this business, as it is not necessary to have wonderful offices with plate glass windows and all that sort of thing. This scheme can and ought to be run cheaply. The only criticism I have to offer is that, if anything, the one per cent is an invitation to spend more money than we should.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the Saskatchewan scheme it was necessary to come to the legislature every year for an amount sufficient to pay the cost of administration, which as I remember stood at $60,000 for several years. And I believe the system there handles something in the neighbourhood of $10,000,000 in the way of loans.

11 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is six-tenths of one per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but as to whether that $60,000 would include all items which in this scheme come under the head of administration I am not sure. There are certain charges to the borrower which vary under different schemes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Subsection 6 provides that every farm loan shall be repayable in equal annual or semi-annual instalments of principal and interest, while subsection 4 of section 9 contemplates repayment by cancellation of stock. Which is right? There cannot be two repayments.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend can visualize the scheme succeeding to the extent of paying dividends at all; if he can visualize further these dividends being held by the board under the section to which he is referring; and if also he can visualize the man keeping up his annual payments, principal and interest, he will see that there will come a time when the board will owe the borrower in the form of accumulated dividends as much as he owes the board. When that is the case the provisions of the last subsection of section 9 will apply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not so drawn, if that is the intention.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my hon. friend will see through it if he will read the section carefully.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I understood from the discussion that the interest rate to be paid for the bonds would be in the neighbourhood of 5 per cent, to which one per cent would be added for operation, while provision would be made for the necessary reserves for losses. I have not heard the minister prophesy tonight what in his opinion will be necessary in the way of reserves. It would probably be a fraction of one per cent, possibly one-half, I do not know. Perhaps the minister would not care to prophesy, but he said in his previous remarks that he was of the opinion that the money could not be given the borrower at a lower rate than 6½ per cent. We had it brought out in this committee by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Boys) that the province of Ontario is placing money in the hands of farmers at the rate of 5½ per cent, and yet it is stated that the Dominion of Canada, a confederation of nine provinces, cannot do the same thing at less than 6½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will read the statutes of Ontario he will find the explanation. I had them here, but they are gone now. The province bears the cost of administration separately.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I am rather of the opinion that that is not the real secret for the cheap money in Ontario. The real secret is that Ontario is taking the savings of the people and paying 4 per cent, I believe.

An hon. MEMBER: Three and one-half per cent.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: That is better still. Then they let that money out on a spread of 2 per cent, charging the farmer 5½ per cent. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) remarked that money should reach the farmer at a maximum interest rate of 6 per cent, and I am heartily in accord with that statement. If the farmer cannot get the money at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent I am afraid our rural credit scheme will prove abortive, but I am of the opinion that the money can be given the farmer at a maximum rate of not more than 6 per cent.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) made a suggestion of which no one has taken cognizance. He said that we have in the Post Office savings accounts $30,000,000, taken from the people on which we are paying 3 per cent interest. I wonder if there is not some way of putting this money into the hands of the farmers at a lower rate than we will get in the New York market. We have post offices all over Canada; it would not be stretching our imagination too much to suppose that we might pay 3½ per cent interest to the people, or even 4 per cent, for their savings. If the government would agree to pay 4 per cent through the Post Office savings department they would get ample funds to carry on this scheme, and they could let the money out at a maximum rate of not more than 6 per cent and possibly 5½ per cent. I know some of our financial wizards will say that this is invading the precincts of the banks, that we are intruding on bank property and taking some working capital away from these institutions. That is just what I would like to do. The banks of this country have been working on the savings of the people, paying them not even 3 per cent interest, as was pointed out a week or so ago, but paying only 1½ per cent or 2 per cent. If the Dominion would take over some of the savings of the people from the banks we would not be doing any great injustice.

I am very much of the opinion, Mr. Chairman, that if we cannot keep this rate of interest down to a maximum of 6 per cent we are going to make the scheme useless at the outset, because even 6½ per cent will not represent the total rate of interest the borrower must pay. He has to subscribe 5 per cent of the amount of his loan, and if you take the interest on that 5 per cent along with the 6½ per cent it will amount to almost 7 per cent. So I believe that it would not be very hard for the mortgage companies to reduce their interest rate from 8 per cent to 7 per cent, and so put this rural credit scheme out of business before it starts.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There are one or two other explanations I would like from the minister. If he will look at subsection 1 of section 7 he will find that provision is made for a maximum sum of $10,000 to be paid to any one person or two or more persons, in the case of joint ownership of a farm. I am not complaining of the amount at all, but I wish to draw his attention to the fact that there is a discrimination against a partnership farm, and as the minister well knows there are a very large number of such farms in western Canada. They represent the very best kind of risks, and they will be deprived of a fair loan under this bill.

While the minister is considering that point my second suggestion is that in subsection 7 of section 7 he will find provision made for interest on defaulted payments at a rate not to exceed 8 per cent per annum. In my opinion that is an altogether excessive rate; it should be not more than 7 per cent at the very most, and should really be in the discretion of the board in cases where extreme hardship has brought about the unfortunate condition of being unable to meet the interest.

Mr. DUNNING: The words "not exceeding" are there.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Eight per cent is too high. If the minister would make it "not exceeding 7 per cent" it would be much better.

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Kindersley I might say that I would much prefer to tell the farmers of Canada, as an expression of my opinion, that the rate would likely be higher than it afterwards turned out to be, than to suggest a rate lower than later proved to be the case. My hon. friend will perhaps remember that I was pressed for a personal opinion, which after all is the opinion of only one man. Inasmuch as it was my opinion, however, for which I must take responsibility, I would much prefer to state as my opinion a rate higher than turns out to be the fact than give a figure lower than that which really results. I hope it may be possible to get the interest rate down to 6 per cent, but I must be honest in stating my opinion that it will be very difficult to get it that low, although there is a tendency towards a lower cost for money which is very encouraging. Hon. members will remember that Saskatchewan farm loan bonds were formerly selling at 5 per cent par and are now selling at 4½ per cent. When enough of them are out at that rate there is no doubt that it will affect the basic rate, but it will be some time before that condition is brought about.

Now we have subsection 5 cleaned up, and with regard to the rate of interest in subsection 7 I am quite willing to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Bow River and reduce the interest from 8 per cent to 7 per cent. I think the rate on arrears should be higher than the original rate. Farmers are like other human beings; they pay first those debts carrying the higher rate of interest and leave the others until the last. But probably 7 per cent would be a sufficient incentive, and I move that the word "eight" in the third line of subsection 7 be struck out, and the word "seven" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BURY: Will the minister say whether he intends to do anything by way of arranging with the provinces to have a simple and cheap method of realizing on securities, and also to prevent prior claims going in front?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend asks two questions, first with reference to cheap methods of foreclosure and so forth. As a lawyer my hon. friend is of course familiar with the differences existing between the various provinces in that regard. We are presuming that the men who are going to administer this act will be men who will be interested in pressing in all directions for measures which will promote the more economic administration of it. It would be useless in our opinion to attempt to say anything in this law having anything to do with that matter, but as a matter of administration undoubtedly the board, and the government back of the board, will be interested in securing as simple processes as possible for dealing with the legal business connected with it.

As to the second question, the question of priorities, my hon. friend will notice from section 12 that that has engaged the attention of the government in giving consideration to the measure, more especially as regards future priorities.

Mr. BURY: Exclusively as regards future priorities.

Mr. DUNNING: But outside the mere written letter of the statute there must be common sense applied in working out its provisions, especially when the act is of a co-operative nature. Negotiations must take place between the provincial governments and the federal government with respect to the provinces coming under this scheme, and all these matters and their relationship to the whole scheme must be discussed. But I would point this out to my hon. friend, that the government is not requesting for this scheme a priority which other creditors of a similar class do not enjoy. The government is not requesting that; it is nowhere written in the law.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that is right too.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend from East Edmonton was advocating that in relation to loans of this character, priority should be enjoyed which other creditors of a similar class, first-mortgage creditors, are not presently enjoying under provincial legislation, and I was saying that in my opinion that should not be contemplated.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 9, 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Legislation prejudicially affecting security.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the minister considered whether it would be advisable to have that read so as not only to cover future but present legislation? It would be strengthening his hands if he wanted to deal with the matter.

Mr. DUNNING: In giving consideration to the matter up to now, the government has considered that the control by the central board of the percentage to be loaned enables it to deal in a measure with the existing condition. That is, we can as a matter of fact say to a provincial board or to a provincial government: Because of certain priorities which exist in your province we do not think the percentage of the total value to be loaned there should be as great as in other places where the priorities are less. We think that negotiations would result in improvement along that line.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend is content with that, why leave the section in at all?

Mr. DUNNING: For the future.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend can deal with the existing evil by simply saying, we will not lend you beyond a certain amount, he can deal just as well with a similar condition in the future by saying, we will not lend you beyond a certain amount. We should have a little bit of consistency one way or the other, if we are serious about it. If the minister is not serious, why then leave it as it is, and let it go. But I can assure him that he is only making it more difficult for himself. It is very easy to say, "present or future legislation". But he may be quite satisfied with all these loans. If he is, he should not put this section in at all. He should be consistent.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not so much concerned about being personally consistent as I am about having this in practical operating shape. If we agree, and I think the members of this committee would generally agree, that the Canadian Farm Loan Board should not enjoy special privileges with regard to these particular mortgage loans as compared with other mortgage loans—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are agreed on that.

Mr. DUNNING: If we are agreed on that, we have to face conditions as they are, and I am arguing that we can best deal with these varying conditions by controlling to an extent the percentage to be loaned in provinces where the conditions are less favourable from the point of view of priorities than they are elsewhere. I think, in addition, the inclusion of section 12 might have a very salutary effect in future in provinces which were considering further priorities. We could call their attention to section 12, and I think its value would be very apparent under the circumstances.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13, 14 and 15 agreed to.

On section 16—Regulations.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if we can get any advice as to what is really the important matter in connection with this act, namely, administration. How is this board to be appointed? How many years of political service are going to be required? This is the sort of thing we should know something about. If we cannot get this thing out of politics and get it down to a business basis in some way or another, we are simply wasting our time on it and spoiling our hopes. What is going to be done?

Mr. DUNNING: Really, Mr. Chairman, we did consider this matter when we were on clause 3. We also dealt with it when we were discussing the provision which has to do with provincial appointees. There is no guarantee, of course, that the provinces of Canada are going to be of one political complexion or another all through. The provinces which enter, regardless of the political complexion of their government at the moment, will make their recommendations as called for by this act. I revert to section 3, which provides:

> There shall be a board, known as the Canadian Farm Loan Board, which shall be a body politic and corporate, and shall consist of four members, one of whom shall be the minister—

That is the Minister of Finance.

> —who shall be chairman thereof, and the other three of whom shall be appointed by the Governor in Council. One of the members so appointed shall be designated the "Canadian Farm Loan Commissioner," and shall be the chief executive officer of the board. The commissioner shall be appointed for such a period of years as the Governor in Council may designate. The other members of the board shall be appointed in the first instance, one for a period of three years and the other for a period of six years; thereafter appointment of members other than the commissioner shall be for a period of six years. Any member of the board shall be eligible for reappointment.

The provinces come in under another section.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not referring to them. If we can get proper appointments from this government, we shall be doing pretty well. Further, I am not referring to the letter of the law, but as to the qualifications the government are going to look for. How many years, for example, in sucessful work in the western provinces dealing with farm loans, farm lands and the like, is to be looked upon as a requisite before appointment? What does the government look upon as the underlying qualification of absolute necessity in connection with these three commissioners? I am not now referring to the Minister of Finance. He is ex officio a member of the board, and he will have very little to do with the work. I am referring to the commissioners to be appointed, and particularly to the chief commissioner. What qualifications are the government going to insist upon, or have they none in mind at all?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think my hon. friend is serious in asking that question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am very serious.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sorry I was not here when clause 3 was being discussed. I may have overlooked it, but I do not see in the bill any reference to the appointment of a representative of the bondholders on the board. I do not wish to delay the passing of the bill tonight, but would the minister consider having an amendment made to that effect? It might be made in the Senate.

Mr. DUNNING: I may say that consideration has been given to the point. Consideration has also been given to the same point in the United States, but there is difficulty in getting such a representative in view of the fact that the bonds are floating around all the time, and are changing hands and so forth. However, the matter is worth consideration; the object my hon. friend has in mind is a good one.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has not yet told us what he conceives to be the qualifications for a man discharging this great trust. Has not the government got down to the initial point yet, the point which is purely a primary point, of making up its mind as to the type of man needed, and the class of experience which he should have? I would have thought my hon. friend would have that information at his finger tips.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, in some respects the kind of experience my hon. friend has had would fit him for the position. In other respects probably my hon. friend would not be qualified. But certainly a man is needed who has had experience in administering this kind of business, a man of good character and good judgment. Good judgment is more needed than any other quality for a position of this kind. Then he should have a fairly stiff back. I mentioned when we were on the clause before that a good stiff back is essential.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I know, but the country has no idea of finding out how the government chooses "stiff backs". I predict that will never get there. It is just one of those things that does not mean anything and is not intended to mean anything. I am asking again if the government has in its mind any man it thinks is qualified to undertake this job. I do not know whether it has or not, but I would have thought it would have looked, before making these appointments, for men who have been engaged in this kind of work for at least a certain number of years and have a real and intimate knowledge of the conditions in western Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: Not in western Canada —in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just at the present time I am dealing with the west, and if we are going to have this scheme carried out properly it must apply to the west. I am not objecting to that, the only thing I am saying is that we should have something like a decent board to administer this bill, and I am suggesting that the people qualified should know the country where the chief operations of this board are to be—that they should have had a certain number of years' experience of this kind of business and have proved themselves successful in it.

Mr. DUNNING: I can assure my hon. friend that the government will take full responsibility for these appointments when they are made. The government is just as anxious as my hon. friend can be to have this system properly administered. I agree absolutely that the men to be appointed to these positions should have had experience in connection with the kind of work they will have to tackle. All these considerations will, of course, be taken into account by the government in dealing with the matter. We will have to take the responsibility involved and we shall be glad to do so.

DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Hon. Ernest Lapointe (for the Minister of the Interior), Bill No. 97, to amend the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Wednesday, June 2, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

PEACE RIVER ELECTION

REPORT OF THE CLERK OF PETITIONS

On the order being called for presenting reports:

Mr. SPEAKER: Yesterday a question came up with regard to the report on a certain petition, and objection was taken to the drafting of the report signed by Mr. Todd, who is the Examiner of Petitions. His report appears in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday.

It was stated by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) that the examiner should not, so to speak, dictate to the House what course it should follow. I have read very carefully the report of Mr. Todd, who, by the way, has been almost fifty years in the service of parliament, and who is one of the most distinguished officials of this House. His report was not inspired by me, I need not say, and in my opinion Mr. Todd in presenting this report has followed what has been the practice of this House ever since my memory serves me.

Hon. members will see that Mr. Todd in his conclusions states:

> The form of this petition and its contents so far as the first part of the prayer is concerned are within the requirements of the 75th rule, and refer only to such matters as are within the right and competency of the House to deal with, should the House desire to do so; should, however, the course suggested in the second part of the prayer be taken by the House it would apparently have the effect of authorizing other persons to exercise a power which the House has already delegated by statute to the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts.
> Apparently the first part of the prayer of this petition is only of a preliminary nature leading up to the main request as contained in the second part, consequently, the prayer, considered as a whole, brings this petition within the ruling of Mr. Speaker Lemieux given on the 6th May last, in a somewhat similar case, which ruling was subsequently sustained by the House on appeal, viz., that a petition which prays for any action to be taken by the House that might involve in any respect an interference with the provisions of the Controverted Elections Act, chapter 7, R.S.C., 1906, cannot be received.
> Under these circumstances I have therefore the honour to report that this petition should not be received.

Mr. Todd does not order the House, he does not even direct the House, not to receive the petition. He simply states that in his opinion, as an officer of fifty years' experience, and having always reported in that way to the House, the petition should not be received. But the House, of course, is at liberty to receive it or not, as it sees fit.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I should like to point out this, and I am not now dealing with the merits of this case at all: Last year on two occasions, on the 17th of June and again on the 27th of June the Clerk of Petitions reported on two different petitions with this postscript: "Irregular. Would involve the expenditure of public money." And in the House, on the 17th of June, and again on the 27th of June, Mr. Speaker decided, following the immemorial usage:

> That as the granting of the prayer of this petition would involve the expenditure of public money, it cannot be received.

The same wording is used this year as last year; therefore there has been no departure in this case from the procedure followed in former days. It is taken as a matter of course that when this official makes his report, provided it is not in excess of his authority and that he keeps within the meaning of his prescribed duties, the House always accepts it. As I said a moment ago, I am not now speaking on the merits of this case. I notice there is a motion to reject the report and to proceed further with this petition.

As the action of this official was called in question yesterday, let me read from the Classification of the Civil Service of Canada, which defines his duties:

> Clerk of Petitions
> Definition of Class:
> Under direction, to receive and handle petitions presented by members of the House of Commons; to read and revise petitions in accordance with the rules; to bring to the attention of the Speaker such petitions as do not comply with the rules and to point out their defects.

I respectfully submit that Mr. Todd only pointed out in his report to the House and to the Speaker the defects contained in this petition.

The standard authority in this House is Bourinot, who for half a century almost was our guide at the Clerk's table. He left before he died to the officials of this House his directions regarding the powers and privileges of the Houses of Parliament as respects their officers, clerks and servants, in which he says:

> The Houses cannot part with any of these privileges, immunities and powers, necessary for the conduct of business, their existence and their dignity, except by statute expressly conveying and delegating their powers, immunities and privileges to others. For instance, in the trial of controverted elections, the Commons parted with their jurisdiction previously exercised by committees of their own, and handed it over to judges in express terms.

I quote this simply to remind the House that Mr. Todd, who for a long period was associated with his immediate chief, Sir John Bourinot, could not ignore the principles and precedents laid down by the late Clerk. Some of those principles are to be found in a concrete form in section 91 of the Controverted Elections Act. But as I said a moment ago, I am not passing on the merits of the case at all. This is a temple of free speech and of free thought in matters affecting parliamentary procedure. There is a motion to reject that report and it is within the right of the House to accept or reject it. I simply wish to present these considerations in justice to Mr. Todd and to point out that he did his duty, and only his duty, by reporting respectfully to the House his candid and honest opinion in regard to the petition.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the petition is not before the House, or at least has not been received by it and will not be until a motion is made to that effect?

Mr. SPEAKER: The petition is not received. The petition is laid on the table. The report was tabled yesterday and is printed to-day. It is now open to the House to take action with respect to it. I understand the Clerk received a motion last night to the effect that the report of the examiner on the petition should be rejected. I do not pretend to cite exactly the contents of that motion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think the motion is that the petition be received notwithstanding the report.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I rise only because of a reference in your judgment, Mr. Speaker, to the probability of my moving to-day the motion of which I gave notice yesterday. That was not my purpose. Indeed, I have no right to do so seeing that forty-eight hours' notice is necessary.

PACIFIC CABLE BOARD

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: I desire to lay on the table of the House a return moved for by Sir George Perley containing all the documents concerning the Pacific Cable Board.

RED LAKE AND NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY

BILL REFERRED BACK TO THE COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a motion dealing with a private railway bill. May I just explain before I make the motion to refer this bill back to the select standing committee on Railways and Canals, that it is Bill No. 95, to incorporate the Red Lake and Northwestern Railway Company. It came before the House some time ago and was sent to the Railway committee. When it came before that committee I was present so that if there appears to be—although there is not meant to be—any criticism in my words of the Railway committee, the criticism is as much of myself as of any other member of the committee. The bill has reference to a railway in northwestern Ontario, the section from which I come. I had never heard of the measure until it came before the committee and—I say this without disrespect to the committee in any way—we dealt with it rather briefly. I should like now, if the House will permit me, to make a motion referring the bill back to the committee. I have taken the matter up with some of the officers of the House and I am told that I am in order in doing so. The only thing I ask is that the bill be sent back to the committee. What becomes of it then is a matter for the committee to deal with; I am in no way concerned except in so far as it deals with a section of the country in which I am naturally interested. I therefore move, second by Mr. Lapierre, the hon. member for Nipissing:

That Bill No. 95, an act to incorporate the Red Lake and Northwestern Railway Company, be referred back to the select standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines for reconsideration.

Speaking for a moment to the resolution, I wish to say that all I ask is that the committee have power to deal with the question again, because I am informed by those who are promoting the measure that they have information to give the committee at the present time which they did not give, or rather were not permitted to give, when the bill was last before the committee. I ask the House to allow the bill to go back to the Railway committee for them to deal with as they see fit. The section to be traversed by this projected line is a newly discovered mining district. It will probably mean great development for northwestern Ontario, and if the promoters of the enterprise can prove to the committee that this is a bona fide application for a charter with the intention of going on with the railway, and that they have the necessary financial support for the purpose of building this railway where no railway exists, it seems to me that the committee might well reconsider it. I am informed that the National Railways have no objection in any shape or form to this charter being given, but that is for the committee finally to deal with. I hope the House will permit this bill to go back to the committee for reconsideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is within the rules in presenting his motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall I say carried? Carried.

Mr. LAPOINTE: On division.

Also a copy of the report sent to the department by Inspector Christensen of Regina in this connection.

Hon. Mr. STEWART: If the words "the suspension of" in the third line are deleted, I am quite willing that the motion should pass. I ask for the omission of the words referred to for the reason that the agent was never suspended.

Motion as amended agreed to.

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, correspondence and other documents passing during the year 1926, between any person or persons addressed to the government, or to the Prime Minister, or Ministers of Public Works and Marine and Fisheries, or other ministers, relating to a federal commission re Toronto harbour improvements, or to the appointment of Mr. L. G. McCarthy, K.C., ex-M.P., or others, as special commissioner, and the replies of the government sent thereto. Also a copy of all correspondence from A. A. Mulholland or A. O. CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AUTHORITY TO ISSUE SUBSTITUTE SECURITIES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting of the House to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide for the extension of the provisions of chapter 11 of the statutes of 1918 (relating to guarantee on renewal or postponement of indebtedness of the Canadian Northern Railway system), to the Canadian National Railway Company and to any company referred to in the Canadian National Railway Act, 1919 (1919, c. 13), and in the act relating to the Grand Trunk Railway system (1920, c. 13), and to enable each one of such companies to issue its notes, obligations or other securities, hereinafter called "substituted securities," for the purpose of acquiring, by application of the proceeds thereof, or by exchange therefor, the notes, obligations or other securities or indebtedness of any other or others of such companies, and to authorize the Governor in Council to guarantee the substituted securities.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the minister making the usual statement as to His Excellency the Governor General recommending the resolution to the favourable consideration of the House?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not necessary, as I understand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. DUNNING: This bill is legally necessary, to enable the Canadian National Railway Company to arrange for the issue of securities and their sale, in order to redeem the securities already outstanding in connection with the various constituent companies. Certain facilities already exist in legislation to enable this to be done, but I am informed that they are not legally sufficient to enable the company to deal with the matter. The bill of course will go very much more fully into detail and into safeguarding than the resolution, but that is the objective.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): In case of borrowings heretofore for the purpose of refunding—that is for the purpose of discharging existing debts—were not those debts in nearly every case the debts of the constituent companies? Therefore was not the power exercised just the same power asked for here?

Mr. DUNNING: Not exactly. If my right hon. friend will refer to the two authorities which now exist he will see that a break existed. We can discuss this matter very much better when we have the sections of the bill before us. Another point I might mention just now is that the original authority only gave us power on maturity of securities, and not prior to maturity of securities.

[Mr. Doucet.]

Motion agreed to.

NATURAL RESOURCES

BILL AUTHORIZING TRANSFER TO ALBERTA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): I desire to draw the attention of the government to an item which appears in to-day's Journal which reads:

Referring to the statement of Hon. Ernest Lapointe in the House of Commons this afternoon, Premier J. E. Brownlee told the Canadian Press that he maintained the same opinion as he had expressed previously.

"The validity of section 17 has nothing to do with the transfer of nautral resources to Alberta," he said. "That was our stand in the House and it is still. If the Dominion government wants to take the matter to the courts they do so at their own responsibility. We do not think that is necessary."

In view of this statement and the fact that the validity of section 17 is a matter entirely for separate consideration, will the government not reconsider its decision and, at an early period during the present session carry out its promise, as embodied in the Speech from the Throne which has been passed by this House, to introduce a bill for the transfer of its natural resources to the province of Alberta?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have nothing to add to the statement which I gave to the House yesterday. The question of the validity of section 17 of the act was the cause of any difficulty that had arisen in this matter.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Would the minister be prepared to say what is to be the policy of the government with respect to the resolution on the subject standing on the order paper in the event of the courts declaring the prior legislation valid, and in the event of the courts declaring it invalid.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have nothing to add to the statement I made yesterday, which I think was complete.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR DISCUSSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): In view of the paragraph which the hon. member (Mr. Lucas) has just read, as to the validity of section 17 may I ask a question—

Mr. SPEAKER: The matter has already come up this afternoon on a question of privilege.

Mr. CHURCH: I intended to refer to Hon. Mr. Brownlee's reported statement. There are questions of policy and of law involved in the matter. The question of law was referred to yesterday in the statement of the Minister of Justice, although it was dealt with and settled by parliament in 1905. The policy was amended in the King's Speech at the opening of parliament, and I would like to ask if an opportunity will be given to discuss this policy, as I desire next week to bring it up on the motion to go into supply.

CORRESPONDENCE TABLED

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I lay on the table of the House a copy of the correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of Alberta with reference to subsection (a) of section 2 of the Alberta Natural Resources bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume this is as promised yesterday—or intended to be?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I asked for the entire correspondence with the government of Alberta with respect to the whole bill, not just as respects one section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understood the right hon. gentleman had reference to that one section—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes I had reference to that, but I think I made it general.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be glad to secure the remainder.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

WESTON-WOODBRIDGE SERVICE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): A few days ago I was asked by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Lennox) regarding the Weston-Woodbridge line of the Canadian National Railways. I am now advised that the line is being lifted on account of a very large loss in operation running as high as $1,500 a mile; that all the proceedings taken have been regular with regard to it; but that in consequence of representations received to the effect that there might be a purchaser, the actual work of dismantling the line has been discontinued for thirty days in order to give prospective purchasers an opportunity if they so desire to put in an offer for the line.

QUEBEC FORTIFICATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec-South): With reference to resolution No. 17 standing in my name on the order paper with regard to the ancient walls and fortifications of the city of Quebec, with the consent of the House I would ask that this resolution be dropped because there is no likelihood of its being reached this session and because I intend to discuss it at some length when the estimates are before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course this can be done only by unanimous leave of the House and I suppose it is granted. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to withdraw the resolution standing in his name?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Just so that I shall not misunderstand for the future, I understood you, Sir, to rule that the hon. member for Quebec South could not withdraw his resolution except by unanimous consent?

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood the rule to be that a motion was entirely within the power of the mover until such time as it was addressed to the House from the Chair when it became the property of the House and that prior to that time he could withdraw it of his own volition.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is that the order under which the motion stands should be called. I forget if I called it, but I took it for granted that nobody would object to an hon. member dropping a motion standing in his name. I asked for the unanimous leave of the House and I understood it to be given. Strictly speaking, I should have called the notice of motion standing in the hon. members's name. I am ready to review my interpretation of the rule.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think the point the leader of the opposition is making is that it is open to any hon. member who has a resolution standing in his name to withdraw it at any time of his own volition without asking the consent of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Until it is addressed to the House from the Chair when it becomes the property of the House.

Mr. POWER: The question is not one of the rule, but of an hon. member being polite to his fellow members.

Motion dropped.

GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I desire to ask the leader of the House whether he will table the files relating to the Georgian Bay Canal Company. I have particular reference to the files containing later correspondence and applications for the approval of plans.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am not sure that I am fully aware of what my hon. friend wants. Undoubtedly the correspondence will be in other departments than those over which I have control and I wish to confer with the ministers first. I will give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The only reason I referred the matter to my right hon. friend was that we learned before that the correspondence was in several departments and I thought we might reach them all through him.

COLD LAKE FOREST FIRE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I wish to draw the attention of the government to question No. 1 on the order paper in relation to a forest fire near Cold Lake, Alberta, in October, 1925. I put this question on the order paper more than four weeks ago and I am at a loss to understand why an answer has not been given. I shall be glad if an answer can be given at an early date.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): The difficulty is that we have to send to the forest rangers in the Cold Lake district for reports. We have not received a report yet from the resident ranger in that territory, but as soon as we receive it I shall be glad to answer my hon. friend's question.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY MR. HEENAN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): On a question of privilege I want to draw the attention of the House to an editorial in the Toronto Star of yesterday's date. This editorial misconstrues my statement made in this House in my speech on the 11th May. It is headed "The Heenan-Robertson dispute" and reads:

> The recent dispute between Peter Heenan, M.P. for Kenora and Rainy River, and Senator Gideon Robertson as to certain features of the general strike in Winnipeg in 1919 shows both parties to have faulty memories, although they were in the Manitoban capital at the time.
> Mr. Heenan was inaccurate in charging that the senator, as Minister of Labour, ordered into Winnipeg troops who fired on a crowd with fatal results. The only volleying that took place was by the North West Mounted Police, forty-nine of whom were regularly stationed in the city.
> Senator Robertson, on the other hand, was wrong in his statement that the only man shot was a foreigner who persisted in throwing a missile after being warned by policemen. The red-coated "mounties", after charging the mob several times, using clubs upon the scattering rioters, took up position in front of the city hall and on the word of command fired a volley with their revolvers. The Canadian Annual Review, in its report of the occurrenc, stated that one rioter was killed and that there were thirty-three other casualities, of which sixteen were mounted policemen.

This is not fair to me because I did not charge that the senator as Minister of Labour ordered troops into Winnipeg. What I said is this and it will be found on page 3286 of Hansard:

> All that was necessary in the Winnipeg trouble was that the Minister of Labour, who was on the job, should have used a little horse sense, and there would have been no blood shed. But instead of that, they chose to have the troops sent in. . . . . I say the government is entirely responsible for that

I want to repeat that statement. I have nothing to retract and I am now ready to prove that my statement is correct in its entirety. I intended to do this some time during the session, but if I have the unanimous consent of the House, I would prefer to do it now.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has stated the question of privilege. Bourinot at page 303 says:

> In the Canadian House, questions of privilege take a wide range, but it may be stated in general terms that they refer to all matters affecting the rights and immunities of the House collectively, or to the position and conduct of members in their representative character. In this category may be placed: motions touching the seat or election of members; reflections or libels in books and newspapers on the House or members thereof—

And so on. The hon. gentleman has stated his case; he has denied the accusation brought against him in another place than this building, and I consider that the incident is closed.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I may add that it will be very unfair to have the hon. member go into the matter, because if he seeks to establish what he said he will be absolutely wrong and I desire on that ground to take issue with him because I know the facts myself.

Mr. HEENAN: In view of the statement just made—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: I am rising to a question of privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: I know it is against the rules to refer to any gentleman in the Senate, but now that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has contradicted my statement, surely it is only fair, both to himself and to his colleague in the other House as well as to myself, that I should be given an opportunity to state my case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At the proper time.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: If there are any hon. gentlemen opposite who have any objections to my proceeding, they do not want to hear the truth.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: I rise to a point of order. There is a proper time for the hon. member to make his statement, and that time is not now. Under the rules of the House he is not in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would advise the hon. member to let the matter stand as it is. He has made his statement on a question of privilege and has given his explanation. Now objection is taken by another hon. member to that statement. The hon. member objecting thinks he is in the right and the other in the wrong, and I do not see what interest the House can have in amplifying the debate.

Mr. HEENAN: Before we get through the House will have to listen to the discussion of this question. It is bound to come up anyhow. Why not therefore thresh it out now?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: I intend to take it up in any case and I will do so. Why not discuss it now?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may avail himself of many opportunities to debate the question, which apparently is controverted, at least in essence. On this occasion he has made his statement on a question of privilege and—

Mr. HEENAN: Now I want to prove it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: —it is not permissible on the orders of the day that a debate should ensue on a question of privilege.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

The House resumed from May 28 consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, to amend the Immigration Act—Hon. Mr. Stewart (Edmonton)—Mr. Duff in the chair.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): When the bill was before the committee some days ago a question was raised as to the propriety of the proceedings in view of a mistake having been made in the single amendment comprising the reprinted bill. I promised to take the matter up with counsel, and I have ascertained from the Clerk of the House that the committee is in order in discussing the bill without reintroducing it inasmuch as the principle remains unchanged. All that has been altered is the wording of the amendment. My hon. friend (Mr. Boys) raised a question regarding the persons who are required to send in the report. We are seeking to amend section 41 of the Immigration Act which provides that upon certain offences being committed by aliens the board appointed by the minister for the hearing of such cases shall have authority, if necessary, to deport without trial before a court. We are now changing that regulation to provide for trial before the court; and upon conviction the immigration authorities shall undertake the deportation of the convicted persons. I think the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) wanted to know whether the offences remained. They do. I think I have answered all the points raised in the discussion.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is there any change made to meet the point raised by the hon. member for Simcoe?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No; we have not altered the provisions as to who shall report. The old practice has been satisfactory and we are letting the same parties report to the immigration authorities for the purpose of deportation.

Mr. BOYS: When the bill was last before the committee I pointed out that under the former section it was not a question of conviction but of complaint, which is a different thing. In the case of a conviction the proper person to send in notification is the magistrate presiding or some other judicial officer, perhaps a county court judge. I do not see why three men should be required to submit the report.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the majority of these cases the municipality is the most interested party, and I see no harm in allowing the clerk of the municipality to report.

Mr. BOYS: Confine it to the clerk of the municipality, then. I do not object to his sending in the report, but the point is that one person and not three should be charged with this duty. I want to impress upon the minister that under the former section there is no question of conviction, whereas here the only occasion for notification arises when there is an actual conviction. Surely the proper person to send in that notification would be either the clerk of the court or the magistrate or other judicial officer convicting.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to make one comment on the wording of the bill. The word "complaint" is hardly appropriate; it should be "report." Why should an officer of the department complain because someone was convicted? He should rather be glad. He has simply to report the facts. The next observation I make has reference to the explanatory note, in which I find the following words under (b):

To remove the discrimination against the British born as it stands in the existing section, by recognizing his Canadian citizenship as in the case of the alien born who has been naturalized in Canada.

I do not know who is responsible for that wording, but it is a most unfair and incorrect description of the law as it stands.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The discrimination was removed two years ago, I think.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It never was there to be removed. There never was any discrimination. I am not objecting to the clause being repealed. If I remember rightly a bill to repeal it was introduced by the late government in its last session—but failed in the Senate—on the ground merely that the circumstances which gave rise to the legislation and justified it no longer existed and that there was no need of keeping people in apprehension and unnecessary worry. But to assert that there was in it discrimination against the British born is pure nonsense; there was nothing of the sort. The act provided that anybody coming to Canada—whether he was British-born or not did not matter—of the type and character described therein was subject to deportation. That is to say, the discrimination in favour of the British-born which theretofore existed was removed as regards this class of people. If, for example, somebody came from France or from Italy of the type described in the act, he was subject to deportation upon inquiry before a board and proof that such was his character; but if a fellow came from somewhere in Scotland or England and was of just the same type, and was just the same menace to the country, there was no way of getting rid of him except by the formality of a trial. Under the circumstances of those times you could not do that. The minister, if he will take his mind back to those days, will recall that there was justification for this act. We did not impose any special discrimination against the British-born immigrant at all; we removed something which was in his favour for the time being. I do not know that such a person would have very much to complain of if that enactment were allowed to stand. I do not know why an anarchist coming from Britain should be better treated than if he came from some other country. We ought to treat them all alike and give them all the same chance. But we do not want to encourage immigrants who believe in overthrowing government by force. For my part I would treat them all alike, whether British-born or natives of any other country. However, I do not think we are likely to get any of this type now, and I am not objecting to the repeal of the act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The section does not discriminate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the explanatory note would make it appear so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Section 41 says that it shall be the duty of any officer:

forthwith to send a written complaint to the minister, giving full particulars.

I presume that after conviction and the receipt of a written report it is optional with the minister to order deportation of the convicted person; or does conviction settle his deportation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think the same system would prevail as, for instance, under the Narcotic Drug Act.

4 p.m. Where an alien is convicted of an offence under that act we are notified and are required to have an officer on hand to deport the convicted person as soon as he has served his term.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is only in connection with certain offences under the Narcotic Drug Act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, but that procedure will apply generally if the conviction specifically provides for deportation of the convicted person.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is just the point. Where an alien is convicted of any of the offences enumerated in the explanatory note, does the fact of his conviction involve his deportation; or is it optional with the minister after receipt of the report to order deportation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not obligatory on the part of the minister in every case, for the reason that under the act as it stands the board passes upon the case, and they may or may not order deportation; but where we think the offence is so serious that the court would register a conviction, we would order deportation. I cannot conceive of any such case where we would not exercise our right of deportation, because the convicted person would certainly be an undesirable citizen. Of course, if it could be proven that he had been wrongfully convicted the case would be different.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the minister is right in not hazarding a statement that the department would have to act. As a matter of fact it would not have to act. All he is doing now is to substitute a conviction for the former initial proceedings which gave the department jurisdiction to order deportation. It seems to be entirely a matter of departmental regulation or ministerial responsibility as to whether there would be deportation. I would not suggest that the bill be delayed now, but I think the government might well have their representative in the Senate suggest that authority be given to judges to deal with deportation. Some high court judges have spoken to me about it, as I have no doubt they have to the Minister of Justice, and suggested that in certain crimes, instead of imposing sentence of imprisonment, they should have the right to order deportation, to be carried out under the rules and regulations of the department. In this way they think that the Canadian standard of citizenship could be very much better maintained and alien criminals more effectively controlled. It seems to me the government have started the movement in making this provision as to conviction. The logical thing to do now is to give the presiding judge the right to order or recommend deportation.

Mr. HEAPS: Have not the judges the right now to recommend deportation?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Only under the Narcotic Drug Act I think, but I confess I am not sure about it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend desires that the judge be given authority to deport rather than convict an alien?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The first step is a conviction. After that if it is a proper case for deportation why should the country be put to the expense of maintaining the criminal here? Why should there not be an immediate deportation, and why should he not direct and find accordingly? The Minister of Justice is now in. He might talk this over with his law officers and see what can be done. There is just one other thing. I think the minister ought to state, and if there is any doubt about it the Minister of Justice himself ought to state, in order that we may have at least a fair criticism of existing laws, that section (b) of the explanatory notes is entirely wrong. There is no discrimination at all, and whoever was responsible for the drafting of that note has drawn something that is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The difficulty is that these explanatory notes are put in after the bill is sent to the House. I think the attention of the law officers has been directed to the matter sufficiently by the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for West York to make any necessary correction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend says he agrees, there is an end to it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have an amendment to make. I move to substitute the word "report" for the word "complaint" which appears in the last line but one of the bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BURY: There is just one matter that has come to my notice which perhaps the minister may be able to settle. On the last occasion this bill was before the committee, I asked whether the offences in section 41 of the act of 1919, which is set out in the explanatory note, were covered by the new and shorter repealing section, and the minister said yes. That is satisfactory, but I notice now that there is a bill coming up, Bill No. 153, to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I just point out to my hon. friend that all the offences mentioned in this section that we are repealing will come up under the Criminal Code amendment, and will be dealt with under the Criminal Code, not under the Immigration Act.

Mr. BURY: That is not the point. I understand that we are here merely substituting a new section for the present section in the Immigration Act of 1919, defining the causes of deportation by references to the offences in part 2 of the Criminal Code. Then I asked, will that make any difference in the offences for which deportation will lie under the new amendment? The minister said no. I would be quite satisfied with his statement, but I want this to be considered: There is a bill coming up to amend the Criminal Code. It deals specifically with part II of the Criminal Code, and according to Hansard, it deals with the section that has to do with unlawful assemblies, and what I should like the minister to be sure of is that while now all the offences under the present section are covered by part II of the Criminal Code, they will be covered by part II of the Criminal Code after the amendment proposed to be made by bill No. 153 has been made. In other words, will the amendment to bill No. 153 cancel any of these offences?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is not my understanding.

Mr. BURY: I do not know whether I have made my point plain. We have the assurance of the minister that today part II of the Criminal Code covers all these offences for which deportation now lies.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Just at that point, my hon. friend is speaking of the Criminal Code as it exists now. I am not sure as to that, but when the amendment is made these offences will be covered.

Mr. BURY: Oh no, that will not do, because when the amendment to the Criminal Code comes up this act will have been passed, I take it. I would like to know before we pass this bill whether the amendment to be made to bill No. 153, which is not yet before the House at all—we have not even seen a copy of it—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I can assure my hon. friend that these two bills were harmonized by the two departments.

Mr. BURY: So long as I have the minister's assurance on that point.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There has been some delay on that account, but the two bills will harmonize so that we shall be able to take action under the amended Criminal Code.

Mr. BURY: Can the minister assure us that bill No. 153, when it is passed, will not cut out some of the offences that are now deportation offences under the Immigration Act?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am informed that they are all covered.

Mr. BURY: Even after the amendment?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BURY: That is all I want.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The explanation given by the minister with regard to the bills referred to by the hon. member for East Edmonton brings up a question that arose early in the session. The minister, when asked the other night as to who was pressing for this legislation, intimated that it originated with his department. Now there is a relationship between the bills referred to by the hon. member for East Edmonton—the Immigration Act, the Criminal Code amendment, and the Naturalization Act. It is also quite apparent that early in the session a good deal of pressure was being brought to bear on the government to exact promises from them with regard to certain legislation. It also happened that these are mentioned in connection with a letter which was placed upon the records of parliament by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), a letter from the Prime Minister, which has been referred to as a supplement to the Address which was presented at the opening of parliament. It was somewhat significant that this letter was demanded by certain members of this House, and the Prime Minister took the unusual course, after having had an interview with those parties, of writing a letter to have it placed on Hansard immediately before the vote was taken in this House on the Address. These amendments that are now coming up are the fulfilment of the promises which were contained in that letter, over the signature of the Prime Minister, addressed to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. These amendments are coming up piecemeal, to one bill after another, and as the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) has pointed out, there is a direct relationship and bearing between these three bills. Reference was made to this early in the session in connection with the alleged bargaining which was going on between the government and certain groups in this House, but that was ruled out of order by the chairman. To-day we are witnessing the attempt to deliver the goods in connection with the promises which were contained in a letter from the Prime Minister, addressed to the leader of a certain group in this House. I think it would be well to have a thorough understanding with regard to the relationship of these three bills, one to the other, before this bill is allowed to pass.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must thank my hon. friend for bringing up this matter. A good deal of discussion, as he says, took place upon it when I was not present in the House and had not an opportunity of being heard. May I just say to him at once that if he makes the statement that any letter of the kind was demanded, he unconsciously or consciously makes a statement which is not correct; it is not true. There was no demand made upon me, there was no demand made upon the government for any letter whatever.

My hon. friend goes on to say that this legislation is part of a bargain between the government and certain members of this House. I want to take direct issue with him, and tell him that it was in no particular a bargain. There was no bargain whatever of any kind, and when he makes that statement he makes a statement that is incorrect and untrue.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. I do not think the Prime Minister has any right to used the word "untrue" in regard to a statement made by any member of this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am saying the statement is untrue. I do not say the hon. member is consciously making an untrue statement but that the statement itself is untrue and in saying that I am well within the rules of the House.

Mr. MANION: I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as to whether the Prime Minister has the right to say that a statement made by any member of this House is untrue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Whether made by any person in this House or outside of it. I am not saying the hon. member has made a statement which he believes and knows to be untrue. What I am saying is that any person in any part of this Dominion who declares that any bargain was made between the government and the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) with respect to legislation now before the House is stating something that is absolutely untrue.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I ask for your ruling in regard to that point. May I speak to the point of order? I know that again and again in this House the ruling has been given by Mr. Speaker that one hon. member cannot say of another hon. member that he made a statement which is false. I know that I have been called down for that myself. I ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on this point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a great difference, as I think my hon. friend recognizes, between saying that a certain statement is untrue and deliberately charging a member with making a false statement. I was very careful to say that the hon. member might, quite unconsciously, be making a statement which was untrue. I do not wish to reflect on the hon. member at all but I will say this: If any person hereafter makes that statement, in view of the denial of it which I am making at the present time he will be stating that which is untrue; I cannot put the case any plainer. The hon. members from Winnipeg are occupying their seats at this moment. They know whether there was any demand made upon me or upon the government for this legislation or for any letter or communication in regard to the same. They know whether this was part of a bargain or not; and I leave it to them to say whether or not I state the truth when I assert that the legislation we are considering now is legislation that has been two or three times before the House in previous sessions and that when I was asked in the early part of the session whether this legislation would be included in any legislation contemplated by the government I made it quite clear that the government did intend to re-introduce certain legislation which had been previously before the House.

Mr. MANION: I should like your ruling on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order raised by the hon. member for Fort William is that the Prime Minister should not say that the statement made by the hon. member—

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Before you give your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I merely ask the Prime Minister if he was speaking on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Fort William. Because I should like to say something before you give your decision, and if permitted I will refer to the letter over the Prime Minister's own signature in Hansard of January 29. Possibly he will deny having written the letter. The statement was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that when they came to this parliament at the opening of the session a letter—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman is not speaking to the point of order by reading a letter of the Prime Minister.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): My contention is, Mr. Chairman, that every statement I have made is borne out by the records of this House.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Fort William raises the point of order that the Prime Minister has declared that the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford is untrue. I rule that the Prime Minister was quite in order in his declaration—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: —as there was in it no personal reflection on the honour of the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I go on to say—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that ruling, in fact I think there has been such a ruling before, but I know the very opposite has been held against us repeatedly this session. I propose to quote your present ruling, Mr. Chairman, if that is ever done again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I may continue with what I was saying.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the Prime Minister proceeds I may say that I am only responsible for my own ruling, I am not responsible for the ruling of any other occupant of the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think we had better have some uniformity of ruling here. On account of the rulings which have been given by Mr. Speaker in this matter, and in order to get that uniformity, I appeal, Mr. Chairman, from your ruling.

The Speaker having resumed the chair the question was put as follows:

In the course of the debate on Bill No. 91, the Prime Minister said that a certain statement made by the member for Oxford South was untrue. A point of order was raised on the ground that the word "untrue" was unparliamentary. The Prime Minister replied that the word applied to the statement made by the member for Oxford South and not to the honourable member himself.

The Chairman ruled that in the circumstance the expression was not unparliamentary.

From this decision the right hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) appealed to the House.

[Mr. D. Sutherland.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I caught the way this matter was put to you, Mr. Speaker, by the Chairman of committees, and I take exception to it. The question is much more simple than that presented to you in the written statement given by the Chairman of committees. The statement made by the Prime Minister—at least the only statement objected to—was that a certain remark of the hon. member for South Oxford was untrue. A point of order was raised by the hon. member for Fort William that the statement of the Prime Minister was out of order. The Chairman of committees ruled that it was in order from which decision, for the sake of uniformity in the application of the rules of this House, I appealed. The question of circumstance was never raised by the chairman in making his ruling, nor could it be raised. It was the mere statement that the statement of the member for South Oxford was untrue. That and that alone is before the Speaker for decision.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In connection with what the right hon. member has just said, I wish to draw attention to this fact: the statement referred to is a statement which relates to myself personally. I am the only one who can say whether or not that statement is true, and I was saying that the statement was untrue. I was in no way seeking to reflect on the hon. member. I took good care to say he might be unware that it was untrue, but I was telling him that it was untrue and that anyone who repeated it would be repeating a statement which was untrue. No one in the House could know whether a statement which relates to a member of this House is true or not, except the member who is directly affected by it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is not debatable and the Speaker is bound to accept the memorandum prepared by the Chairman of the committee. I shall read it again for the information of the House—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The statement was never submitted to the committee before being submitted to the Chair. Surely it is not the rule of this House that whatever the Chairman says is the point of order is really the point of order under review either by the committee or the House. The point of order was as clear as day. The Chairman stated it before the committee clearly, and he puts it in a different way to Mr. Speaker. That was the first I knew of it. He should have put it to the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think I am bound to accept the statement of the Chairman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then appeals are useless.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order is stated by the party who is to report it to the House, or when appeals are taken from the ruling of the chair, the Chairman states his point. The Chairman stated his point in this way:

In the course of the debate on Bill No. 91 the Prime Minister said that a certain statement made by the member for Oxford South was untrue. A point of order was raised on the ground that the word "untrue" was unparliamentary. The Prime Minister replied that the word applied to the statement made by the member for Oxford South and not to the hon. member himself.

The Chairman ruled that in the circumstance the expression was not unparliamentary. From this decision the right hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) appealed to the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I speak with some diffidence, because it is some time since there was a precedent, but, I think it is the duty of the Speaker to decide a point of order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Section 183 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms reads:

In case of an appeal to the House, it is the duty of the Chairman to leave the chair immediately and report in writing the point of order which he has decided. The Speaker must then submit the matter to the determination of the House in the language reported to him and put the question: "That the decision of the chairman be confirmed." No discussion is allowed on the appeal. Should the Speaker be absent, the Chairman takes the chair of the House and another member takes the chair of the committee for the instant and makes the report of appeal to the acting Speaker who will at once submit the question to the House for its decision.

I submit that even my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition should be amenable to the rules of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I respectfully call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to what May says under rule 14.

Note that the appeal from the Chairman's decision is to the House and not to the Speaker.

The question is: Shall the ruling of the Chairman be sustained?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say again that I had no desire in any words of mine to reflect upon any hon. member of the House, but I do wish to make it perfectly clear that, after what I have said this afternoon, if any hon. member, or any person else in this country repeats that statement he is repeating a statement which he knows to be untrue. I am quite within the rules in saying that. The hon. member has referred to a letter which I gave to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The reason I gave that letter to the hon. member was not in any way for the purpose of a bargain or an agreement. I was leaving for Prince Albert, to be absent from this city for several weeks, in connection with a by-election which was then pending. I desired that there should be no misunderstanding, either on the part of the hon. member, or on the part of my colleagues in the government, as to the sessional programme as it had been arranged, and in reference to the matters that were of particular interest to my hon. friend I left that letter in the nature of a memorandum. That was the sole object of having any communication of the character between us. I hope I have made clear the circumstances of that communication, and I leave it to my hon. friend for Winnipeg North Centre to say whether in any way he demanded any communication of me, or whether what I am now stating to the House is not absolutely correct—

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Before getting away from the matter referred to by the Prime Minister, he states that the letter was given solely for the purpose of satisfying the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his colleague, as to where the government stood with regard to those matters. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated in the House that he had an interview with the Prime Minister, the matter had been discussed and these promises had been made. Then why the necessity of a letter of this kind being placed on Hansard just immediately before a vote was taken?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have given the answer. The hon. member knows he may have many conversations and there may thereafter be a question of difference of view and opinion. My desire has been to avoid as much as possible any difference of view or possibility of difference with any hon. member of the House, and as my hon. friend knows I was not in parliament at the time. I was not in a position to stand in my place as I am at the moment and say whether one thing or another was to be done. I had to take some means of protecting myself with respect to my position as leader of the government as to matters to be brought before parliament. I took the means that I have referred to of removing the possibility of doubt as to matters that were to be dealt with at this session. As I was leaving the city I took steps to leave in the form of a record for my colleagues as well as for the members what was from the very beginning the intention of the government in this matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Perhaps the Prime Minister will give some further information with regard to the statement he has just made. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his colleague the hon. member for North Winnipeg addressed a letter to the Prime Minister on the 7th January. Apparently three weeks elapsed and it was only after an interview had been had by those gentlemen with the Prime Minister that he made those promises. That statement had been made in the House by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill).

Notwithstanding this, when we had been for about three weeks debating the Address and it was very doubtful as to how certain members were going to vote, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spread on the records of parliament the letter received from the Prime Minister, boasting about the favourable position they were placed in as a result of the government being without a majority in the House and stating that they had forced these promises from the government. I was referring to the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; I did not make the statement, and when the Prime Minister of this country—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I just rise to say that the statements now being made by the hon. member are not correct. My statements will be found on Hansard.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I presume in view of the denials which have been made, that with the consent of the House I shall be permitted to refer to Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman cannot refer to a previous debate during this session.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I am not at all surprised at your ruling, Sir, in view of the ruling that has been given this afternoon and other rulings that have been given in this House during this session.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I rise to a point of order and I demand that the hon. member withdraw those statements.

The CHAIRMAN: I might say to hon. members that I am quite willing to admit that in the new duties which I have assumed I may not know the rules of the House as well as older members do, but I do not think it is fair, especially for older members, to censure me in the way that the hon. member for South Oxford has just done. I resent it and I demand that he withdraw the statement that my ruling was not right.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Surely a private member in this House has some rights. What I stated was that I was not surprised at the ruling in view of other rulings that had been made in this House on former occasions.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I demand a withdrawal and moreover I will ask the leader of the opposition to take issue with his follower on this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely he is responsible as well as we are for the dignity of the Chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would be quite prepared to do anything to restore a better feeling in this House, but I want to say very frankly that the first step that should be taken to restore a better feeling would be for the Chairman to report correctly the point of order he was last asked to report.

Mr. CANNON: What about the withdrawal?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I should like to know how I have transgressed the rules of the House and what words I am asked to withdraw.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member said that he was not surprised at this ruling owing to previous rulings given by the Chair. If that is not a reflection on the Chair, I do not know what it is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Chairman, if it will please Your Lordship and other members of the House, I will say that I am surprised, very much surprised, at the ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has been asked to withdraw a certain statement he made. I respectfully ask him to withdraw it.

An hon. MEMBER: Withdraw what?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I am at a loss to understand what I am to do. I first stated that I was not surprised; now I have completely reversed my position and I say that I am surprised. I do not see what I am going to do.

The CHAIRMAN: I rule that both statements are out of order. I consider that they are both reflections, not on me personally, but on the Chair.

Mr. BURY: Can you suggest, Sir, anything that will be neither "surprised" nor "not surprised"? Can you suggest any frame of mind that is between the two?

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think there is any necessity for that. As I stated to the committee just a moment ago, my position is an onerous one and I do not think it is fair that an hon. member should take advantage of my inability to know exactly the rules of the House. But I am quite sure that the hon. member for South Oxford is out of order when he says he is not surprised at the ruling I made previously.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): If you can outline something that would be between the two extremes I would be very glad to abide by it.

The CHAIRMAN: I have asked the hon. member to withdraw the statement and I still ask it.

An hon. MEMBER: Which statement?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The statement that I am not surprised and the statement that I am, or which one have I to withdraw?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Withdraw the reflection on the Chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the point of order, if the hon. member is to be asked to make no reflection whatever on a point decided by the Chair, there should be the unfettered right of appeal which by the precedent of this afternoon we know now is worthless. I respectfully submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that your conduct has made it impossible for us to take the constitutional procedure.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I protest against those words of the leader of the opposition. In my experience in this House which extends for over twenty years, this is the first time that the leader of a party has used words to that effect in order to impair the dignity of the Chair or of the Speaker in this House of Commons. It has been my experience in the past that leaders of both parties have upheld the dignity of the Chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am in order and as a member of parliament of long standing I protest against the conduct of the leader of the opposition to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am always anxious to have the good-will of the Minister of Justice. I am also anxious to conduct my functions as leader of a party with dignity just as much as anyone in this House in a similar position would be, but I think my duty is to see that the party which I lead has its constitutional rights in this House. When those rights are denied or impaired by circuitous proceedings as was done this afternoon, it is my duty to protest and I intend to protest no matter what the objections may be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no desire to prolong the discussion but I do not think my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) would wish to leave an entirely false impression from his words with respect to any act of another member of the House. In the course of his remarks he stated that I had received a letter from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre a few days after the opening of the House. It was some three weeks before that letter was answered, and he drew the inference that the delay was due to the fact that during that time a debate had taken place in this House, that the House was about to vote, and that the hon. member for Winnipeg wished before recording his vote, to have some written assurance as to what was to be done with certain legislation in which he was interested. I think I am right in suggesting this as the inference to be drawn from the hon. member's words. In order to disabuse his mind of any suspicion let me tell him exactly the circumstances, and explain why there was no answer for three weeks. When the communication was forwarded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at the opening of the House I had a conference with him, and I was here in the city from then until the time I wrote the letter. At the time I wrote the letter I was leaving the city to be absent for some time. I did not know then whether I should be returned as a member of parliament or not, but I was anxious that the hon. gentleman himself, as well as any one who might stand in my place, if someone else did, should have a record of the programme of the government as I outlined it to him on the occasion of our first interview, which took place not at the end of three weeks, but at the very opening of the session. I state the facts, and all I ask hon. members to do is to judge for themselves whether this was not the course which any one placed in the position of responsibility I was in would have taken under the circumstances.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): As I am prevented from referring to what was actually said, I would direct the attention of the committee to Hansard of January 29 wherein they will find a statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and a letter written by the Prime Minister referring particularly to the three matters in which the hon. member was interested—the Naturalization Act, the Immigration Act, and the Criminal Code amendments—in relation to which legislation had been promised. The statement was also made by the hon. member that they were very grateful that, in view of the peculiar combination of circumstances,—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I rise to a point of order. I ask that the hon. member be directed to withdraw the expression he used with reference to the Chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw what?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): In view of the speech made by the Prime Minister since the point of order was raised I naturally assumed that the matter had dropped. I thought I had made sufficient retraction, if retraction was necessary, in having reversed the statement I had made, and the Prime Minister's speech subsequent to the point of order clearly renders irrelevant the point raised by the Minister of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Justice, having insisted on the hon. member's withdrawal of his remarks reflecting upon the Chair, I must ask that under rule 236 he retract them.

Mr. BOYS: There is no rule 236.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are only 129 rules.

Mr. CANNON: The point comes under rule 13.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CANNON: It is 236 in Beauchesne.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely no member who has had any experience in this House challenges the contention that there must be no reflection upon the Speaker or upon the Chairman of committees.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for South Oxford said he made no reflection on the Chair, and he reversed the statement he had previously made. There cannot therefore be any reflection on the Chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friends appear to lose all sense of fairness on occasions such as this. The Minister of Justice has spoken six or seven times on the question: have I not the right to say a word? I am pointing out, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member declared he had made no reflection on the Chair. He made a certain statement and reversed it. How therefore can there be any reflection? Your judgment will be with the hon. member, I think, Mr. Chairman. Furthermore, I would point out to the Minister of Justice that the Chairman himself in allowing the Prime Minister to go beyond the point of order was apparently personally satisfied, and if the Chairman is satisfied I do not see why anyone should object.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is not satisfied; he has asked that the remarks be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not hear the hon. member for South Oxford say that he was willing to withdraw the remarks, nor did I understand him to contend that he had not cast any reflection on the Chair. The Minister of Justice insists that the words reflecting on the Chair be withdrawn and I must ask the hon. member to withdraw them. May, at page 298, says:

> The House of Commons will insist upon all offensive words being withdrawn, and upon an ample apology being made, which shall satisfy both the House and the member to whom offence has been given.

Mr. HEENAN: I want to say a couple of words.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. HEENAN: Be quiet. I was wondering, Mr. Chairman, why we are so particular in this House, because I know that on the twelfth day of last month a gentleman on the other side of politics in another chamber—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: —said that a member of this House—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: I am all right.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. HEENAN: I don't know, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: What I was going to say—

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member be good enough to resume his seat?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): You had better withdraw now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat disappointed in the treatment meted out to me this afternoon in this House by the Prime Minister and also by the Chair—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): — but in view of your ruling I may say that I am neither surprised nor not surprised.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I absolutely drop the word "surprised."

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman will not be allowed to escape with any such partial denial. He must unreservedly withdraw the reflection on the Chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, there is such a thing as being too sensitive. Is one not to be able to say that he is disappointed in a decision?

The CHAIRMAN: I do not refer to that remark.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what the hon. gentleman says, and he adds that he absolutely withdraws the word "surprised." I think he has gone far enough. Perhaps the Chairman did not hear him say that he withdrew the word "surprised." Surely it is not to be held that a member is not to be allowed to express disappointment? Because I may add to his disappointment my own.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Chairman, I think this incident has lasted long enough, and now that the members have more or less cooled off I am sure both sides will be of the opinion that we should all respect the Chair. If we do not, our proceedings become not only useless but practically impossible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. CANNON: The Chair may make mistakes, but even so it is the duty of every member to support the dignity of the presiding officer and uphold the decorum of our proceedings. I have known the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) for many years. He is a very strong adherent of his party, but he has always to my knowledge respected the rules, and I think that if he considers the matter further he will please both sides by upholding the dignity of the House and continuing this debate as it should be continued. I do not wish to follow the right hon. leader of the opposition on the ground which he has taken, and I am confident that when he reads his remarks in Hansard to-morrow he will regret them. Speaking as the leader of a great party, and as a former prime minister of this country, I think he should use his influence and his prestige to require his own followers—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CANNON: —to set an example of that respect which we all owe to you, Sir—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CANNON: —and I do not think the hon. member for South Oxford should be allowed to take any further part in this debate unless he follows the ruling of the Chair. He should not be permitted to do what no other member has the privilege or the right to do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, I hope you will observe that on discussion of the point of order the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) is permitted to read me a lecture on my deportment in this House. How that affects the point of order is rather difficult for the ordinary mind to grasp. I just draw that to your attention so there will be no need of further disappointment. But I submit there is no reflection in the world and no offence against the rules of the House in expressing disappointment over a decision of the Chair. There may possibly be a reflection read into the word "surprise." I think such an interpretation is a little far-fetched. At all events I asked the hon. member to withdraw the word and he has done so. I submit that if he had used the word "disappointment" in the first place there never would have been the slightest exception taken to it. I think we have gone more than half way to meet the susceptibilities of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I think we should stop there.

5 p.m.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): He should state he did not intend to reflect on the Chair.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, I am greatly disappointed with the proceedings that have taken place in this House this afternoon.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: However it may affect hon. members to my right, I do not feel that this is a subject for amusement.

An hon. MEMBER: Neither do we.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. FORKE: I have not encroached very much upon the time of the House and—

An hon. MEMBER: What is your point of order?

Mr. FORKE: I have only a few words to say and I am going to say them.

An hon. MEMBER: State your point of order.

Mr. FORKE: I have listened to the whole proceedings and I am quite convinced of what the hon. member for South Oxford meant to convey, no matter what words he used.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Perhaps your mentality is at fault.

An hon. MEMBER: Perhaps yours is.

Mr. FORKE: Unless hon. members are going to pay at least some attention to the dignity of the Chair and respect its rulings, we are not going to get very far. I think it is derogatory to our parliamentary life that such proceedings should have taken place in the House this afternoon.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): You have got in the press now on that.

Mr. FORKE: It is all very well for my hon. friend to say that, but I can assure him and other hon. members that if the people of this Dominion understood something about the proceedings that take place in this House none of us would get very much respect, and I think there would be an entirely new House of Commons.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Speak for yourself, John.

Mr. FORKE: I do not know why hon. members to my right are so much worked up over this incident. I am blaming no one section, I am speaking of the whole House and the proceedings generally. I have taken part in a good many debating organizations in my public life and I never saw anything like it in twenty-five years, even in a municipal council.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: I am perfectly convinced, Mr. Chairman, of the meaning that the member for South Oxford meant to convey, and I think it would tend to his own dignity and to the dignity of the House generally that the incident should be brought to an end by an intimation on his part that he would respect the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Chairman, I just want to say one word on the point of order. You objected to the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford and to his reversal of that statement. The point in it all was contained in the word "surprise," which has been withdrawn. If there was any reflection in his statement it was contained in that word, and therefore his withdrawal of it must also remove the supposed reflection.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Why does he not say that he did not intend to reflect on the Chair

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is not for the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) to interpret the hon. member's statement. The hon. member himself can make his own interpretation. I am speaking to the point of order and I—

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): He can say whether or not he intended to reflect on the Chair.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I have the floor at the moment. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for South Oxford has met your demand by withdrawing the word "surprise," and I submit the incident might very well end there.

The CHAIRMAN: I am very glad that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) is as desirous as I am of closing the incident. It is quite true the hon. member for South Oxford used the word "surprise." He also used the words "not surprised," which really meant the same thing. All I ask is that he withdraw both expressions and so close the incident.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Chairman, surely I am not expected to make a similar withdrawal on two or three occasions? I have already withdrawn it.

The CHAIRMAN: Perhaps I should apologize to the hon. member if I did not hear him withdraw the word "surprise" and the words "not surprised." Did the hon. gentleman withdraw those words?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Certainly I did.

The CHAIRMAN: Very well.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not permitted to express my feelings. I should like, however, to refer to what was under discussion when the Prime Minister displayed such heat in what might be termed unparliamentary language, and what has been so termed in the past. The peculiar combination of circumstances in the House on the 27th and the 28th of January, just before the vote was taken, gave rise to the boast on the part of some members with regard to promises of certain legislation, that they had wrung those promises from the Prime Minister—the promises referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). This was the matter that I was referring to, and I would gladly deal with it as it is contained in Hansard, but hon. members I know do not wish to have the exact words placed before them. I merely rose to direct the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the bill which is now before the committee amending the Immigration Act, and to point out the connection there was between the three bills promised, and which are to be dealt with by this House. The minister, when this matter was before the House the other night, and he was asked who was pressing for these changes, stated that they originated with his department. The Prime Minister in his statement this afternoon states that he gave that letter to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre so that the people and parliament would know that the government proposed introducing this legislation at this session, although it was not referred to in the Speech from the Throne at all. It has frequently been referred to since as a supplementary Address brought down during, you might say, an emergency. The vote on the Address was taken on the 1st day of February, and this letter was placed on Hansard on the 29th day of January, and was written by the Prime Minister on the 28th day of January. In view of the relationship between these three bills which have been mentioned by the hon. member for East Edmonton, I think great care should be exercised to see that there is no overlapping, and whether there is really any occasion for the bills being passed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Now that the tempest has calmed down, I may say in reply to my hon. friend from South Oxford that the legislation I am introducing is not new by any means. As a matter of fact, an attempt has been made to amend section 41 of the Immigration Act at three different sessions, and the amendment was passed by this House on three different occasions and went on to the Senate. So there is nothing new about this.

I have nothing to say as to the controversy between my hon. friend from South Oxford and the right hon. the Prime Minister, but in reply to the hon. member for East Edmonton, I want to put myself right. I made the statement to him that the amendments to the Criminal Code would contain all the offences mentioned in section 41 of this act, but I am informed by the Minister of Justice that they will not. I want to make it perfectly clear that my own officials informed me that the statement I made was correct, and on the strength of that information I made that statement. I hasten to correct it, because I am now informed by the Minister of Justice that some of the provisions of section 41 will not be covered by the amendments to the Criminal Code. That is why I was hoping this storm would subside, so that I would have an opportunity of giving that information to my hon. friend.

Mr. BURY: I would not for one moment imagine that the Minister of the Interior was not making a frank statement. I quite believe that he was fully convinced in his own mind that the amendment to the Immigration Act was not going to have the effect of removing from the list of deportable offences any of the offences that are at present deportable under the act; but in fact, the case is quite different. Let me read the offences that are deportable under the act as it now stands. If hon. members will look at the explanatory statement on the blank page of the bill, they will see that the section of the act of 1919 to be repealed reads as follows:

> Every person who by word or act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence the government of or constituted law and authority in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or Canada, or any of the provinces of Canada, or the government of any other of His Majesty's dominions, colonies, possessions or dependencies, or advocates the assassination of any official of any of the said governments or of any foreign government, or who in Canada defends or suggests the unlawful destruction of property or by word or act creates or attempts to create any riot or public disorder in Canada.

and so on. Those are the acts which are deportable under the Immigration Act as it at present stands. They are acts for which deportation lies under part II. of the Criminal Code as it now stands, but when the amendment to the Criminal Code that is proposed to be made by bill No. 153 becomes law, they will no longer be acts for which deportation lies; at least, it is very questionable if they will. Let me read the offences which will be removed from the list of deportable offences under the amendment which the government proposes to make in bill No. 153. They will be found in section 97A (1) of the Criminal Code:

> Any association, organization, society or corporation, whose professed purpose or one of whose purposes is to bring about any governmental, industrial or economic change within Canada by use of force, violence or physical injury to person or property, or by threats of such injury, or which teaches, advocates, advises or defends the use of force, violence, terrorism, or physical injury to person or property, or threats of such injury, in order to accomplish such change, or for any other purpose, or which shall by any means prosecute or pursue such purpose or professed purpose, or shall so teach, advocate, advise or defend, shall be an unlawful association.

That is to be repealed; also section 97A (3) of the Criminal Code, reading as follows:

> Any person who acts or professes to act as an officer of any such unlawful association, and who shall sell, speak, write or publish anything as the representative or professed representative of any such unlawful association, or become and continue to be a member thereof, or wear, carry or cause to be displayed upon or about his person or elsewhere, any badge, insignia, emblem, banner, motto, pennant, card, button or other device whatsoever, indicating or intended to show or suggest that he is a member of or in anywise associated with any such unlawful association, or who shall contribute anything as dues or otherwise, to it or to any one for it, or who shall solicit subscriptions or contributions for it, shall be guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for not more than twenty years.

Also this provision in 97B (1):

> Any person who prints, publishes, edits, issues, sells, or offers for sale or distribution any book, newspaper, periodical, and so on. Those are all going to be repealed, and consequently, while under part II. of the Criminal Code as it stands these are deportable acts, after the amendment has been made to bill No. 153 these acts will no longer be deportable, and what I maintain is that the committee should very carefully consider whether it is in the interests of the country that persons who are now described under section 41 as persons who are members of these unlawful associations, and who are working for and advocating the aims of these unlawful associations are desirable people to have in this country. I suggest that the change is going to have the effect of preventing the deportation of persons who are members of these very undesirable asociations, and who are soliciting and propagating the principles and publishing the literature of these particular associations that are mentioned in sections 97A and 97B of the Criminal Code. Therefore, the amendment is not nearly so innocuous as the Minister of the Interior, perfectly honestly, conceived it to be. The amendment is in reality part of a scheme and purpose and arrangement by which men who would otherwise have been deported under the act will now be able to remain in the country and be not subject to deportation at all. If I am incorrect, I shall be very glad to be corrected.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are a few remarks I should like to make with regard to this legislation. It is not my purpose to go into the matter raised by the hon. member for South Oxford a few minutes ago in which my name was brought up, because my statement in regard to that matter has already been made on the floor of the House, and I have nothing to add to it. I would, however, say that this change in legislation, with changes in the Criminal Code, have been, as everybody who was in the last parliament, knows, matters in which we have been interested for some time. At the very commencement of the present session I approached the Prime Minister with regard to what could be done this year as to legislation of this character. Four years ago I introduced an amendment to the Immigration Act which sought to secure the ends contemplated by this bill, and on several subsequent occasions the government itself introduced amendments along those lines. I would remind the House that in 1919, at the time there was a good deal of panic and hysteria, several pieces of legislation passed this parliament with very little consideration. As a matter of fact they passed not only this House but both Houses and became the law of the country within about forty minutes. This legislation which is to be repealed was one of the acts passed at that time. When we introduced proposed amendments before the idea was to do away entirely with that power which gave to the Minister of Immigration the right to deport people for certain crimes. Those amendments have been very widely misunderstood. It was thought by some gentlemen that we were trying to introduce into this country individuals who might be guilty of the crimes specified in the act. Nothing was further from our thought. Our idea was to get rid of legislation which had the effect of taking away from certain classes of people in this country the right to trial by jury.

The hon. gentleman who has just spoken is quite evidently misinformed with regard to the effect of this legislation. Under the law as it now stands he—born, I think, in the Old Land—might, for an alleged offence, be taken before a committee of the Immigration department and shipped out of this country without trial.

Mr. BURY: May I just interrupt my hon. freind for a moment to correct him? I would not have anybody deported without proper trial and conviction; I am dealing with the people to whom the act refers, not with the way in which they are to be treated.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so, but this particular amendment deals entirely with the matter of procedure.

Mr. BURY: No, it does not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman is not correct as to that. I have some knowledge of this matter. The amendment deals entirely with an act of procedure. That is a point not very clearly understood by a good many members of this House. As I was saying, under the existing law, if it were put in force, my hon. friend (Mr. Bury) might be taken before a committee of the Immigration department simply because he happened to have been born outside of Canada, and he might be shipped out of this country as an undesirable person if the Immigration department felt that he came within that class. My point is that every man in this Dominion—whether he is Canadian born as I happen to be, or whether he comes from Great Britain, as does the hon. member for East Edmonton, or as my colleague here (Mr. Heaps)—has a perfect right to a trial by jury.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? What about the fellow who comes from France or Italy?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not accept the position of the leader of the opposition, but I would say it should apply to the man who comes from France, Italy, or any other country. The point about the present law is that it might be used to deport people without trial.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that the Immigration Act should be changed so that any immigrant from Italy, Austria, or any other country should be allowed to enter Canada—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —and remain here?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I have not suggested it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is just exactly what the hon. member did suggest.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, no; just a moment and I will answer that point. Presumably the Immigration Act ought to keep undesirable people out of this country, whether they come from Great Britain, Italy, France, or elsewhere. We are trying by the Immigration law to exclude undesirables, and with that I have every sympathy.

Mr. HOCKEN: But if they get in?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If they get in, and if they commit a crime in Canada, they should be tried by a jury in this country.

Mr. BURY: Has the hon. gentleman heard me oppose that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but the hon. gentleman has not understood the bearing of this legislation; that is what I suggest. This relates to matter of procedure. I do not want to go into past history, but I may just say very frankly that perhaps the reason some of us feel very strongly about this matter is that my colleague the hon. member for North Winnipeg would himself have been deported from this country without any jury trial if the law had been put into force, simply because he happened to have been born in England. And that was the case with a number of others at that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was he guilty of any such offence as that outlined?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then how could he have been deported?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Simply because of this law. The right hon. gentleman is frank in asking this question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He certainly is.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Surely he has not failed to grasp the significance of the legislation for which I think he was more or less responsible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, he was not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Possibly not, but I have seen more of the correspondence of that day and if it could be brought down I think, my contention would be sustained. Paragraph 2 of section 2 of the Immigration Act as it now stands provides that no person who belongs to the prohibited or undesirable classes within the meaning of section 41 of the act shall be capable of acquiring Canadian domicile. And then the act proceeds to speak of the people who are considered undesirable. In that respect although a man might have been here one year, five years or ten years, if he is accused of belonging to the undesirable classes he may be deported. He cannot possibly acquire Canadian domicile. That is the bearing of the legislation to which we object. There are a great many Britishers to whom this would apply: The hon. member for East Edmonton was born in the Old Country and is not ashamed of it; my own colleague was born in England and I know he is not sahamed of it; the leader of the Progressive party was born in Scotland and I know he is not ashamed of it. These gentlemen might, according to this act, be accused of committing some crime against the state of the character indicated. If they were accused under the act as it now stands, the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization could have them before his committee and the day after to-morrow could ship them back to England, Ireland, or Scotland, as the case may be, without their having had any jury trial. Now, as a Canadian citizen I cannot be deported, but to me as a British subject, brought up in the idea of the liberty of the citizen and the right to trial by jury, that situation—which I venture to say most of the members have not realized—is intolerable. We should insist that if any man comes to this country, whether from Great Britain or from some foreign land, and in this country commits or is alleged to have committed some crime, he ought to have a jury trial. I do not particularly object to his being deported if he is found guilty. Perhaps we made a mistake when this legislation was introduced earlier, because there were some hon. members in this chamber, and I think some in the other chamber, who got the idea that we wanted to retain these people in this country. That was not our thought at all, but we desired to get rid of obnoxious legislation which would permit deportation without trial by jury. I think the minister has fairly well met the situation by retaining the right of deportation, but providing that the deportation can take place only after conviction. I am sure there is not a member in this House who wants to deport anybody without trial. I can hardly conceive that any hon. member is willing to leave to a departmental committee the decision as to whether or not a man is guilty of offences of this kind. So it is quite clear that by the proposed amendment we retain the right to exclude undesirables or to deport people who prove to be of that class, but we do say that they should first have a fair trial. Surely that is fair.

Mr. HOCKEN: Are they described in this clause?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, and it is quite true that amendments to the Criminal Code are being proposed that will modify the legislation of 1919 regarding political crimes. But I would remind the hon. member that that has nothing to do particularly with deportation. The Criminal Code does not provide for deportation. It provides for trial. We say that no one should be deported without trial.

Mr. BURY: That is not the true point.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is no viewpoint in it. If the hon. member objects to the eliminations which are proposed in respect to the Criminal Code, the time to discuss the matter will be when they come up. I am quite willing to discuss them now, but I do not think it is the proper time. We will have an opportunity to discuss whether or not these emendations to the Criminal Code should be made, but that has nothing to do with deportation.

Mr. BURY: It has a very important bearing upon it, because some hon. members of this House might be perfectly willing to take some of these offences out of the Criminal Code and yet not to take them out of the Immigration Act. They might not be prepared to make those offences crimes under the Criminal Code; at the same time they might not want people of that character to be left in Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the hon. member think he himself is in a very enviable position? Would he like his status to remain as it is, namely that he might be shipped out of the country without trial?

Mr. BURY: I am not dealing with that point.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am dealing with it.

Mr. BURY: My hon. friend is dealing with a point I have not rasied. He is drawing a red herring across the trail.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I am trying to keep to the point at issue.

Mr. BURY: I never raised that point.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is a matter of procedure, and in this bill we are making an effort to try to see that everyone who is living in Canada shall have the right to a jury trial. The question of deportation is a secondary matter. I am quite willing to concede that everyone in this country who commits any of these alleged crimes should be deported. I am not worrying about that part of it. Let them be kept out of the country, but after they are in the country let them have a fair trial so that it may be ascertained whether or not they are guilty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has given a great deal of attention to this matter. He has referred to what is going to be done. Would he tell me what acts, hitherto looked upon as offences, are to be taken out of that category?

Mr. BURY: I am not against jury trial or conviction, but section 97B is to be repealed by bill 153. That section says:

Any person who prints, publishes, edits, issues, circulates, sells, or offers for sale or distribution—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is not this bill.

Mr. BURY: I know that, but my hon. friend says it is entirely a question of procedure. Either he has not appreciated what the bill provides for, or else he is not perfectly frank. This is a bill of procedure first, and secondly a bill of description of the particular acts that come within its terms. That element of the bill has been altered. I am not dealing with procedure. Leave that out. It is more than a bill of procedure when it changes the description of the acts which come under the deportable provisions of the law, and it changes those acts when it incorporates the Criminal Code. The Minister of the Interior has been absolutely frank in respect to his answer to my question; he afterwards corrected himself and said, "I admit there are offences under the law as it now stands which will not be offences under the law after bill 153 is passed." For instance after the passing of bill 153 it will not be a deportable offence to print, publish, edit, issue circulate, sell or offer for sale or distribution any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, paper, circular, card, letter writing print, publication or document of any kind, in which is taught, advocated, advised or defended sedition.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Where do you find that?

Mr. BURY: That is section 97B of the Criminal Code, part II, which will no longer be an offence if bill 153 is passed. Therefore a person who by word or act seeks to overthrow constitutional government, or advocates or suggests the unlawful destruction of property, will not be a deplorable subject after the Criminal Code amendment has gone through.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend knows that that offence would come under some other section of the bill.

Mr. BURY: Not in part II. You wish not to discuss this with bill 153, because palpably the object of the government is to get this amendment through first, and having passed this, the other will be adopted also. I do not want this amendment to go through without the committee understanding what it is doing. If this amendment goes through and the Criminal Code amendment goes through the result will be that anybody can write or distribute literature and can work in any way along seditious lines for the overthrow of constitutional government in this country and advocate the destruction of property.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friend is going too far now, although his main argument is correct. My hon. friend is quoting from section 97 of the Criminal Code.

Mr. BURY: I am quoting from section 97B, one of the sections it is intended to repeal. It says:

Any person who prints, publishes, edits, issues, circulates, sells, or offers for sale or distribution any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, paper, circular, card, letter, writing, print, publication or document of any kind, in which is taught, advocated, advised or defended, or who shall in any manner teach, advocate, or advise or defend the use, without authority of law, of force, violence, terrorism, or physical injury to person or property, or threats of such injury, as a means of accomplishing any governmental, industrial or economic change, or otherwise, shall be guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for not more than twenty years.

That is the law as it stands now. Bill No. 153, when it passes, will repeal that section.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But does my hon. friend not forget that both section 41 of the Immigration Act and section 97B of the code were passed in 1919 for special reasons, all of which may have been good in themselves? I think he will find that the code in another section covers the point he is raising.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The man who would do what my hon. friend has read would come under section 132, which refers to seditious words, seditious libel, seditious conspiracy.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All we are attempting to do in the Immigration Act by striking out the provisions of section 41 is to take from the control of the Minister of Immigration the power of deportation for offences of this character without trial. These provisions are not being struck out for the purpose of getting rid of these offences or of making them non-indictable offences. When we come to the amendment to the Criminal Code my hon. friend will be quite in order to raise the objections he is now raising, but I see no good purpose that will be served by delaying the taking away from the Minister of Immigration of the powers contained in section 41. Under section 40 the Minister of Immigration has all the power to deport without trial, but when this amendment goes through as regards the provisions contained in section 41 he will not have power to deport except after proper trial before a proper tribunal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are the powers in section 40?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They have always been in the Immigration Act. Section 40 reads:

> Whenever any person, other than a Canadian citizen or person having Canadian domicile, shall be found an inmate of or connected with the management of a house of prostitution or practising prostitution, or who shall receive, share in, or derive benefit from any part of the earnings of any prostitute or who manages or is employed by, in, or in connection with any house of prostitution or music or dance hall or other place of amusement or resort habitually frequented by prostitutes, or where prostitutes gather, or who in any way assists any prostitute or protects or promises to protect from arrest any prostitute or who shall import or attempt to import any person for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose, or who has been convicted of a criminal offence in Canada or who admits the commission prior to landing or entry to Canada of a crime involving moral turpitude, or has become a professional beggar or a public charge or practises polygamy, or has become an inmate of a penitentiary, gaol, reformatory, prison, asylum or hospital for the insane or the mentally deficient, or an inmate of a public charitable institution, or enters or remains in Canada contrary to any provision of this act, it shall be the duty of any officer cognizant thereof, and the duty of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein such person may be, to forthwith send a written complaint thereof to the minister, giving full particulars.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In those cases the minister will see that there are many things in respect to which the complaint may be made, and among them is conviction of a crime. The others do not include any conviction at all. The minister is capable of deporting in any such case upon evidence satisfactory to himself. Does that apply to anybody from Great Britain, or just to foreigners?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Any person who is not a Canadian.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is just the point on which I want to make a remark. I do not know whether the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) can rest his soul in patience or not while section 40 stays within the act. I cannot understand how he can sleep at night. Think of it! Under that act men, women, by the score, by the hundred, can be deported without trial.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. HEAPS: Why was it necessary to amend this in 1919?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To add another class who could be deported. What I am calling attention to is this: What seems to boil up in the soul of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is the idea of deporting anybody without trial. A jury trial, he says, is the right of a British subject. Still we have section 40 remaining under which in respect of 95 per cent of the cases there is no right to jury trial at all in determining whether the man or woman is deportable. This has been in the act for years. All that was done in 1919 was to add another class to those who were not entitled to jury trial. The class we added were those who came from the Old Country and were anarchists. In a word we added anarchists to prostitutes and beggars. That is all we did. We said: If a man was an anarchist, for the purpose of deportation he should not have any special rights merely because he came from Scotland or England. That was the terrible offence. It was not a case of invading the right to jury trial at all. The right to jury trial is the right of the citizen, whether he be a British subject or an Italian or a Swede or a Pole or a Jap.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This takes away that right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it does not. The hon. member has never understood it. That right is a right that all have, British subject or no British subject, if they are living in Canada, before they can be punished for a crime. That is all that jury trial was ever intended for.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the hon. gentleman deny that the effort was made to deport men without trial?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is in a hurry because I think he now sees the point. Jury trial is not anything that pertains to a British subject, to somebody born in Britain or Canada; it pertains to anybody before he is punished for a criminal offence. Under the code if he is charged with a major offence he has the right to jury trial. It is his right before he is punished for libel. But it is not anything that is especially the property of a British subject; it is just as much the property of a Pole or an African or a Hottentot. It never was the special right of anybody to have a jury trial before deportation. That is what I want to drive home to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. You do not need to establish crime against a man in order to have the right to deport him.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the hon. gentleman think an Englishman who has been resident in this country for twenty years should be incapable of establishing Canadian domicile and be subject to deportation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is getting the red herring again; he is bound he will not follow me. For years he has been preaching before his own audiences that we took away the right of jury trial. We did not take it away at all. There never was the right of jury trial as a condition to deportation. That right exists only as a condition or protection against punishment for crime. I want to try to get that point into the hon. member's head.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Am I not right in arguing that the effect of such legislation would lead to the deprivation of such individuals of the right to trial by jury?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just the same as the legislation that remains.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is entirely satisfied, if some poor woman is found to be a prostitute, to deny her any right to jury trial, and to deport her. But if someone is found guilty of anarchism he immediately springs to his feet and espouses the right of that individual to trial by jury.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Who is to decide whether a person is guilty of anarchy?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same person who decides whether some woman is guilty of prostitution.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I personally have taken the ground that it would be well to have legislation enacted providing that for all offences committed in Canada there should be trial by jury. But with regard to some of these cases the social effect of depriving the accused of that right is considerably greater, as in relation to political matters.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am of the other view myself. I think there is a great deal more potential evil in some anarchists than in some poor girl who lives in a house of ill fame. The sympathies of the hon. gentleman are aroused only in the case of the anarchist, but he will not move a hand to repeal section 40.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As a matter of fact I have already moved in that direction. The hon. gentleman will find that four years ago I introduced legislation to repeal these sections.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 40?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, that is my recollection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not mine. I will not be positive—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is my recollection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —but as I remember, with respect to anarchists, the hon. gentleman's bill corresponded in effect to this legislation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the right hon. gentleman consent to the repeal of section 40?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; I would not. Not at all. And what is more, I do not see any special necessity for this bill. I do not think it is needed. What I am pointing out, however, is that the hon. member has for years misrepresented the legislation in this regard, and has got votes on that misrepresentation. He has never been fair about it; never in the world. This legislation merely put those who came from the Old Land, if they were found to be anarchists, on the same footing as immigrants from other countries who might be suspected of the same offence. It never denied them the right to trial by jury for the purposes for which trial by jury was instituted. Are hon. members going to say that it is tremendously important that merely because someone comes from the Old Land he must stay here, no matter what his character, even though he may be an anarchist, until you can get him convicted? Does any hon. member suggest that this should be the treatment accorded men coming from the Old Land and not men coming from Italy or France? Is it to be different in their case? I do not think that is fair.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Neither do I.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member agrees with me on that point when I mention the anarchist; but what interest does he display in behalf of offenders when I refer to other classes? Here is some fellow begging for a living; cannot find a job; throws himself upon public charity. The minister can deport him without any trial save such as he may himself conduct, and the plight of such an unfortunate does not seem to bother the hon. member at all. But if the minister undertakes to deport some man on the ground of his being an anarchist, then woe betide the government! This, briefly, is the stand the hon. member takes.

Mr. CHURCH: It is difficult to tell just what this debate is all about. One does not know whether it is a discussion of the Winnipeg strike or a consideration of the Immigration Act. But it seems to me that the Winnipeg strike is one cogent reason why section 41 of the act of 1919 should be retained on the statute books. I certainly do not think the repeal of that act can be justified. Every loyal citizen of this Dominion sympathized with the government when it passed section 41 which hon. gentlemen are endeavouring so strenuously to-day to repeal. Do those hon. gentlemen want us to revert to the appalling conditions that prevailed in 1919 and prior to that time?

The responsibility for maintaining law and order is a very serious one, and it is all that our police systems in Canada can do to keep the peace. This is distinctly a retrograde step. It is one which the people in the country will not regard favourably. Australia has refused to loosen up on its law in regard to immigrants who commit offences that make them liable to deportation. Look at the strike that occurred in the Old Country the other day: what was responsible for it? It was the result of propaganda, and the same sentiments that led to that strike are so rampant in this country at the present time that those in authority who are responsible for the maintenance of law and order find their duties exceedingly difficult. I do not care whether the agitator is a British subject or not; if he does not abide by the law he should be deported be he Greek, Jew, or Gentile. The sooner this country wakes up and puts on the statute books a proper law, and one sufficiently stringent, the better it will be for administration generally and for law and order in the country.

I am absolutely opposed to this change, for which there is no demand that I can see. The civil authorities whose business it is to keep order have not asked for it. As a matter of fact, the municipalities are very largely against it, and the police themselves are opposed to it. They discussed the question at a convention in Ottawa some time ago, and while I cannot speak for them I think I am safe in saying that as a unit they took a stand against any interference with the immigration law as it was adopted in 1919. No one who is liable to deportation, whether he be a British subject or not, should be immune from the provisions of the act. And some of the most dangerous agitators in Canada to-day, some of whom I know myself, come from the British Isles. The average foreigner is peaceable and law-abiding, and he tries to obey the laws of the land; but some of these agitators bring with them into Canada views of government which are not shared for a moment by the people here who have built up this country. There should be no special provision for the British subject if he is an agitator or an anarchist. He should be treated just like any other undesirable. These disturbers of the peace advocate policies that are the reverse of good government. With the experience which the government have gained during the past four years, and in the light of the Winnipeg strike, the labour troubles that have prevailed in the Maritime provinces, and the industrial unrest generally, not only in this country but elsewhere as well, notably in the Motherland and in Australia, I fail to see how hon. gentlemen opposite could bring down a bill like this and seriously ask parliament to adopt it. It is not too late to withdraw the bill and I hope the government will see fit to do so.

When agitation was rife in the Australian Commonwealth what did Premier Bruce say? He said: "We will make this a white man's country. It does not matter whether the anarchist came from Europe or from the British Isles, he will be deported. Everyone who comes to this country has got to abide by the law and if he attempts to make any disturbance we will deport him." That is the attitude taken by the premier and the government of Australia, and that is the attitude we should take in this country. The Australian parliament backed up Premier Bruce by an overwhelming majority. I have come across a good many agitators in my time. When I was chairman of the Board of Police Commissioners in Toronto the board had frequently to consider cases of disturbance created by men of this type. I remember on one occasion there was a good deal of trouble, and the foreigners in St. John's ward were by no means to blame.

The government will have to take the responsibility for any violations of the law to which this legislation may give rise. The responsibility is on their shoulders. I know of no reason why agitators who are British by naturalization should not be subject to the same deportation laws when they try to upset constituted government, and cause trouble in Canada. On the government of the day is the responsibility for maintaining law and order. In the British House of Commons the Right Hon. Sir John Simon recently declared himself strongly against the doctrines of communism as subversive of the state, and expressed the opinion that in the last resort the Attorney General should prosecute whoever disseminated such doctrines. I agree with him. Colonel Grassett, a former chief of police of Toronto, on one occasion expressed the opinion that it is better to let agitators hold their meetings in the open rather than have them disseminate their noxious doctrines in secret meetings. The time has come when something should be done to regulate communism in this country. To-day there are Sunday schools in Toronto where communists are teaching their children these continental European doctrines —doctrines which are not British and are alien to the soil of Canada. It is the duty of the government to check such teaching. I believe in proper support for labour, but I venture to say that the real labour leaders of Canada do not approve of communism; they respect British institutions.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is a retrograde step on the part of the government to introduce this bill. Section 41 of the act of 1919 is a very good section, and you might as well abolish the immigration officers altogether if you are not going to strengthen their hands in the larger centres of population. In this matter we should take a leaf out of the book of the United States. When the government of that country found a few years ago that Americans of Anglo-Saxon stock would soon be in a minority, they passed what is popularly known as the quota law, which limits the annual number of immigrants from any country. One thing you must respect the Americans for—they make everyone obey the laws. I repeat it is a retrograde step to repeal section 41 and substitute this section, which means nothing. I contend—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It now being six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the committee rises, will not the minister admit that under the law as it stands the power of deportation applies only to a British immigrant during the first five years of his residence in Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, once they become citizens you cannot deport them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And they become citizens in five years or three?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Five years is the shortest period.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In that connection, is it not true that a man may remain in Canada six, eight or ten years without taking out papers—I know some do—and then be deported?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That does not apply here at all; that man is not a British subject. Once a British subject has been in Canada for five years the act does not apply.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No one, according to the act, who belongs to the prohibited or undesirable classes within the meaning of section 41 shall be capable of acquiring Canadian domicile, and then the act proceeds to enumerate the classes of undesirables. So it does not make any difference whether such an immigrant is here for five years or twenty, he cannot acquire Canadian domicile.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That cannot be the effect, as is shown by the discussion in 1923

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN RED CROSS SOCIETY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 151, to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 1—Disposal of property.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the object of this bill?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): I explained the purpose of this bill on the first reading. Under the act of 1909 incorporating the Red Cross Society, which was consolidated under the legislation of 1922, power was given to the Red Cross Society to hold and acquire property for the purposes of the society, but strangely enough, no power was given to the society to dispose of their property when they should find it necessary or advisable to do so. During the war, I am instructed by Doctor Robertson, who is head of the Red Cross Society, in different parts of the country the society acquired little pieces of property which in their own interests they desire to dispose of from time to time, and this bill simply gives them power to dispose of it as they see fit

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The same power as is enjoyed by other societies?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Yes. There is nothing more involved in the bill than that.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 149, to amend the Railway Act, 1919.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 1—Apportionment of money of railway grade crossing fund.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have had a very full discussion of this measure, but I think there is just one thing the minister was going to look into. It was the point raised by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary). Has my hon. friend looked into that?

Mr. DUNNING: I have made some inquiries regarding the matter, more especially of the Board of Railway Commissioners, because of course their past practice with regard to this matter is important. I am informed that it has been the practice of the board to interpret section 262 liberally, and that following such practice each separation of grade—that is, each particular crossing of a highway by a railway, or vice versa, even though a number of such crossings be included in one work or project ordered by the board—would be treated as a crossing within the definition of the same in the act, and aid therefore could in each case be apportioned to the extent of 25 per cent of the cost thereof not exceeding $15,000, subject to the limitations in the act respecting the number of crossings in each municipality. That is the manner in which the board has administered the old provision, and I think it clears up the point.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1907, AMENDMENT

Hon. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 114, to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907.

[Mr. E. M. Macdonald.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 1—British preferential tariff.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose this relates entirely to the West India treaty, does it not? No, it has to do with our own ports.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, it limits the preference to our own ports.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Schedule A amended.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think this very largely refers to the West India treaty, does it not?

Mr. BOIVIN: Clause 2 contains the general changes. Of course some of these changes refer to the West India treaty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we have an understanding with the Minister of Finance to the effect that these changes in connection with the West India treaty shall not come into force until the treaty is ratified.

Mr. BOIVIN: I believe that understanding is perfectly correct, with the exception of a slight amendment with respect to cocoa beans.

Before section 2 carries I beg to move an amendment to tariff item 626a, namely, that the enumeration of goods and the several rates of duties set opposite that item be struck out. This change was asked for by the maufacturers of men's and boys' hats in Canada who imported the hoods in the rough from foreign countries. It will be remembered that a slight change was made when the resolution was before the committee to meet the requests of certain Canadian manufacturers of the same kind of hoods. After that change was made and the bill was printed the manufacturers of hats who do not manufacture hoods represented to the government that they were being placed in a worse position than before. The striking out of tariff item 626a leaves the customs tariff absolutely as it was before and there is no change whatever in that regard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The item is just dropped.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Schedule B amended.

Mr. BOIVIN: In regard to section 1055 there has been a request made to alter very slightly the wording, and instead of using the words "when used in the manufacture of" in the first line, substitute the words "which enter into the cost of". Certain manufacturers in Canada represent to us that they must procure oils and machinery for the manufacture of these parts; that if they are not placed in the same proportionate relation to the imported parts as they are at the present time they will suffer hardship, and that therefore the machinery, oil and other materials required for the manufacture of these parts should be subject to the same drawback as the part itself, when it is imported by the Canadian manufacturer.

Mr. MORAND: Does that include the dies?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All machines used in the manufacture of automobile parts?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, they will be subject to the 25 per cent drawback upon the present rate of duty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You should make it read, "All machines used in the manufacture of automobiles," because you cannot make automobiles without using parts.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, it would apply to both.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many of these machines are at present made in Canada, dies and the like?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am not in a position to give that information, although I am told that the stamping machines are not manufactured in Canada at all at present, and it is precisely to cover the very expensive stamping machines that we are asked to make this amendment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not limited to stamping machines?

Mr. BOIVIN: No. It is to cover all machinery used in the manufacture of the parts which may be imported into Canada with the 25 per cent drawback. The manufacturers of parts and the manufacturers of automobiles represent that if they are obliged to pay full rate of duty on the machinery which they must import they will be suffering a hardship of 25 per cent, and that they should enjoy the same proportionate advantage as the company manufacturing parts in the United States.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It hardly does that. I think the minister means that he puts them, having regard to the capital account necessary for their machinery and machinery supplies, in the same position as they are having regard to the drawback on the finished article.

Mr. BOIVIN: It has been stated in the department that if we leave in the section the words "when used in the manufacture of," it will mean the actual material which goes into the car itself, and that it would be clearer to substitute the words, "which enter into the cost of".

Mr. CANTLEY: I apprehend from what the minister says, that all machinery used in the manufacture of automobiles is now to go on the free list.

Mr. BOIVIN: Oh, by no means. A great deal of it comes in at 27½ per cent duty and perhaps more. This amendment would give a reduction of 25 per cent on the present rate of duty. In other words, the present rate of duty would be reduced by one-quarter when the machinery is used exclusively in the manufacture of automobiles.

Mr. CANTLEY: How are you going to protect the manufacturer of machinery for that loss of protection? Are you going to put him in the position he was in before?

Mr. BOIVIN: That is one of the difficulties of an intricate protective tariff, but the representations made to the government have been that the drawback clause would cause serious hardship to the manufacturers supplying parts to those car manufacturers who are now making 75 or 85 per cent of their car in Canada. If they could purchase the excess of the 40 or 50 per cent of their car, which must be of Canadian manufacture, in the United States cheaper than they could purchase the same parts here, they would naturally give the preference to the American market. In order to place the Canadian manufacturer of parts in a position to meet as far as possible that reduction of 25 per cent, it is only fair to give him a reduction of 25 per cent of the duty on his machinery. It is true, as the hon. member pointed out, that there may be a slight hardship in this for the manufacturers of machinery, but it must be remembered that they are not manufacturers of machinery for the purposes of the manufacture of automobiles only; that they have a very wide range of factories to which they can sell that machinery, and their loss of protection will only be one-quarter of the present rate of duty on machinery sold to the automobile manufacturers.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am thoroughly aware of that, but it means you are cutting away the duty, first to help one and then to help another; the next thing we will have will be a reduction of duty on iron and steel entering into the cost of the machine to relieve the machine man.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It has gone already.

Mr. CANTLEY: No, not in regard to the makers of machines. The Bertram Company in Hamilton are making machinery of this kind. One-quarter of their protection is cut off; next you will take the duty off pig iron, and so it goes on in that way. Tampering with the tariff is like tampering with the truth, one lie necessitates another. When you thus tamper with the tariff you do injustice after injustice all down the scale.

Mr. BOIVIN: I agree with my hon. friend. The idea is to lower the cost to the consumer as much as possible and do as little injustice to the manufacturers as we can.

Mr. CANTLEY: It is always doing some.

Mr. MORAND: Will you give us a list of the things that enter into the manufacture of automobiles?

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is quite aware that that list would be very long. An enormous number of articles enter into the composition of an automobile, and it was for that reason that no definite attempt was made to make a specific rate of duty on each one of those parts and materials. Instead, it was thought best, in order to encourage as far as possible the manufacture of the car and of the parts in Canada, to give a rebate, and a slightly lower rate of duty to the manufacturers who would devote their entire energy to the manufacturing of all they possibly could in their own country. They are the only ones who will have any advantage from this drawback. Those who do not comply with the provisions of the new item and have their cars at least 40 per cent manufactured in Canada for the first year and 50 per cent after that, will not benefit by the drawback. I would say that I would hold up the legislation until Friday in an endeavour to give my hon. friend the list he has asked for, if that would be possible, but he knows very well that it would take a long time to get that information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course one of the great difficulties is that of knowing where we start and where we stop in all these things. The minister will agree with that. It is extraordinary what a quantity of steel comes into this country for the purpose of making agricultural implements. Practically everybody is in the business and if they are in the business almost everything they turn out is for an agricultural implement. This is something you cannot police when you are looking after rebates on goods for distribution in your own market. Last year we imported something like $11,000,000 worth of steel for agricultural implements and it is safe to say that a good deal of that steel was used for something which was not strictly an agricultural implement. The steel companies have always complained that you cannot police this matter. We are getting more and more into that policy. My hon. friend is right; he cannot help it. The trouble is that the government started by laying down a policy and made some cuts without knowing anything about the matter. In that way they have caused a great deal of trouble and they are now trying to fix up their fences. It is a natural thing to endeavour to correct the harm we do particularly when the inevitable results unless we do that are shown.

My hon. friend ought not to think that the manufacturers of parts have a protective duty of 30 to 35 per cent on automobiles, because he knows that a very large proportion of automobiles are exported and there is a large rebate of duty on exports. The result is that if a manufacturer is exporting 50 per cent of his output, as regards his cost in purchasing parts the duty of 30 per cent on his parts drops down on his total business to 15 per cent. I think my hon. friend will follow me in that. As the matter now stands, that actual duty of 15 per cent, although an apparent duty of 30 per cent, will under this change become a duty of something like 11 per cent, or one-quarter off fifteen.

Mr. BOIVIN: The export is about 47 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take 50 per cent for the sake of ease in calculation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Under this item practically everything that goes into a machine shop, engines, boilers, lathes, drills, shears, shafting, boxes equipment of every description, will be subject to the drawback of 25 per cent in the duty. It means simply that a manufacturer of machinery of every description is going to be penalized to this extent. This is a case of endeavouring to transfer the burden from one man to another. There is not a manufacturer of machinery in this country who is not going to be hurt to that extent under this clause.

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friends seriously object to the amendment I do not want to press it. I proposed to insert it for the purpose of trying to assist Canadian part manufacturers. I am not doing this at all for the purpose of trying to place the responsibility on the other side of the House; I am willing to assume the responsibility. If my hon. friends think the item is too dangerous and we should not give this aid and assistance to the part manufacturers, I am willing to assume the responsibility not making the amendment. I am not asking anyone else to share the responsibility.

Mr. NICHOLSON: To start in this piecemeal business of attacking first one industry and then another and then to try to rectify something that should not have been done is not the way to proceed at all. We have no information before us except the general information that one has with regard to manufacturing business. Under this item the manufacture of machinery of every description will be subject to a reduction of 25 per cent in the duty. We have not the general tariff before us. It is impossible to state just what the effect of this will be; we do not know what effect it will have on the automobile industry, and because the government did wrong in attacking the automobile industry is no reason why we should continue to do wrong by attacking other industries.

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister has been exceedingly frank about the matter. This is going to open a very wide door and I think he would be wise to withdraw the amendment he proposes.

Mr. BOIVIN: I shall not press the amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Section 3 agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a matter that I would draw to my hon. friend's attention. I think he will agree with me that the third reading should stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the House.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915

Hon. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved the second reading of Bill No. 115, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 1—Exception.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is the section we were trying to define.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Excise tax on playing cards.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What will be the increase under this item?

Mr. BOIVIN: About $1,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the present turnover?

Mr. BOIVIN: About 150,000 dozen packs a year.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Tax on sales by operation of law, etc.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The effect of this clause is to provide that in the case of property sold under lien the ordinary tax shall apply.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, or when the lien holder takes over and continues operating the business.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Fifty per cent of tax on canned fish.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the sales tax?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Excise tax on carbonic acid gas removed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is merely one of the nuisance taxes which the minister is getting rid of. It brought in no revenue and he is right in abolishing it.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Refunds of tax paid on ships' stores.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the purpose of this section?

Mr. BOIVIN: The purpose of the section is to encourage vessels to fit out in Canadian ports and to enable dealers to sell ships' stores on the same terms as a manufacturer or wholesaler. There is no sales tax on American goods sold in bond.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The principle here is the same as in the case of a rebate of duty on goods exported.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9, 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—When sections 3, 5, 6 and 7 come into force.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no change here?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, it is merely fixing the time at which these sections shall come into force.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BOIVIN: I shall not ask that the bill be reported out of committee to-night. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is unavoidably absent, and while I do not know that he has in mind any changes, this is one of the matters which it was understood were not to be put through until his return. I have had the bill considered to-night merely to expedite the business of the House and I now move that progress be reported.

The CHAIRMAN: It is understood that all the clauses are carried. There remain for consideration just the preamble and the title?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY—WINNIPEG STRIKE

Hon. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved that the House go into committee of Supply.

Mr. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Before the motion is carried I should like to have from the government a statement of its policy in relation to the despatch of troops into strike areas. In this conection I want to relate some of the circumstances that attended the strike in Winnipeg in 1919. On March 11 I stated on the floor of this House that troops had been sent into Winnipeg at the time of that strike, that shots were fired, and that a person was killed; and I added that had the then Minister of Labour exercised a little horse sense that strike could have been settled without any bloodshed. Now I desire to prove these statements.

I notice that the ex-Minister of Labour, speaking in another place, lamented the fact that he had left the files behind him when he left the department, but I want to assure him that the files are all right. They are intact, and to refresh his memory I shall quote several of his own telegrams and communications as taken from those very files. The strike occurred on May 15, 1919 and I find that on the previous day, May 14, General Kitchen, the commanding officer in Winnipeg, communicated with the secretary of the military council at Ottawa, advising that the mayor of Winnipeg had communicated to him his intention of calling upon the military authorities to take steps to protect property. So that we have evidence there that it was the intention of the mayor to seek the assistance of the military authorities.

On May 19, four days after the strike was declared, General Kitchen wired from Winnipeg to Military Headquarters at Ottawa:

> At the request of the mayor and on his written statement that he anticipated disturbances beyond the powers of civil authorities to deal with, a percentage of the active militia has been called out.

In that comunication he enumerated the different battalions, eleven in number. So that right at the outset we have evidence that the militia had been called out. On the 15th of the month, the day the strike took place, instructions were sent for a squadron of the Northwest Mounted Police returning from overseas, to be demobilized at Winnipeg and handed over to Commissioner Perry. Later this was done. Consequently during their term of duty in Winnipeg they were members of the mounted police and not of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the authorities were camouflaging and pretending that these men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force were members of the mounted police because of the fact that they had been demobilized—and for a purpose.

On May 20 General Kitchen wired for authority as to the source of pay for the militia units that he had called out or of the portion of the units that might be used in the course of the strike. On the same day he was advised that the pay would come from the military authorities.

On May 22 the Adjutant General sent a message to General Kitchen that the Hon. Mr. Meighen and Senator Robertson were convinced by the Citizens Committee of Winnipeg that a certain officer at the head of the militia should be relieved and his place taken by some other officers whose names they suggested. On the same date a message was sent by General Kitchen to the acting prime minister and the military authorities at Ottawa reporting that everything was quiet in Winnipeg, that there were no signs of disturbance, but asking that extra Lewis guns be furnished and forwarded to Winnipeg under guard. It rather looked as if everything was not so quiet.

On May 23 General Hill was ordered to go to Montreal to meet the 27th battalion, explain the situation at Winnipeg, and ascertain whether the whole or a portion of that battalion would consent to remain on duty during the period of emergency in Winnipeg. He was also advised that an officer would report to him at Turcotte yards, near Montreal, at 3.30 a.m. on the 24th instant with eight Lewis machine guns packed in ordinary packing boxes and marked regimental baggage, 27th Battalion." These were to be placed on the first train carrying that unit and delivered to the officer commanding military district No. 10 on arrival. The message continued:

An officer will deliver twelve Lewis guns similarly packed and addressed at Smiths Falls on arrival of the first train. It is desired that these guns reach Winnipeg without anyone being the wiser.

If the then Minister of Labour did not know what was going on he should have known, because his government was doing this.

On May 25 Senator Robertson wired for the information of council that in his judgment:

This is not an opportune time to make a declaration in favour of principle collective bargaining as it would be grasped as an excuse by strikers to claim they have forced the government and thereby proved success of sympathetic strike.

In the same message he added:

I anticipate that the general strike will either be called off very shortly or a last desperate move made to make it successful. If it proves a failure the One Big Union movement intended to be launched at the Calgary convention on June 4—

That is, about ten days ahead.

—will I think also fail. These are my personal views expressed in Mr. Meighen's absence and for the information of council.

I said the other day, Mr. Speaker, that had the then Minister of Labour used a little horse sense the strike could have been settled without bloodshed. The strike was called on May 15, and everyone that had anything to do with it said that it was for the purpose of maintaining the principle of collective bargaining. Yet on May 25—ten days afterwards—it appears that some of his colleagues in council here had been advising him to make a declaration in favour of the principle of collective bargaining, but Senator Robertson at the time apparently put his own views before those of some of his colleagues and said that this was not the proper time to make such a declaration. His only excuse was that he was afraid the strikers would be encouraged to prolong the strike. I submit that right there and then he had the greatest opportunity of his life, either to call the bluff of the strikers if he thought they were bluffing, or to settle the strike; but he failed to do so.

On May 26 General Kitchen reported the arrival of the 27th battalion in Winnipeg, and that he was conferring with General Hill that evening. He added:

The machine gun section was in serviceable condition.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the ex-Minister of Labour in another place stated that on his honour as a minister of the crown there was not one soldier sent into Winnipeg. Well, there we have the acknowledgment of the arrival of the 27th battalion with twenty Lewis machine guns. I do not know how he harmonizes those two conflicting statements.

On May 26 General Kitchen communicated with the Prime Minister and others that after conferring with the ministers who were in Winnipeg—that is, Senator Robertson and Mr. Meighen—the only solution to his mind was to have the agitative leaders arrested for instigation and intimidation. He continued:

If this was possible I consider the bottom would fall out of the movement to tie up the whole country by a sympathetic strike.

On May 27 Senator Robertson again wired council that labour leaders were frantically endeavouring to camouflage the issue by attempting to contend for the recognition of collective bargaining, and that "General Kitchen's arrangements were both adequate and admirable." In the first place, he had refused to make a declaration in favour of the principle of collective bargaining, and two or three days afterwards he pointed out that the strike leaders were camouflaging, yet he did not use enough horse sense to call their bluff. So I repeat my statement that had he used a little horse sense he could have settled the strike without one shot being fired and without any bloodshed.

On May 31 General Kitchen wrote to the Minister of Justice, that Mr. Meighen, and Senator Robertson had arrived in Winnipeg on May 22, and that Mr. Meighen had issued a proclamation to the postal service on strike warning them that all employees would be given until 11 a.m. on the 26th of May to return to duty, that after that date such as did not accept the offer would be dismissed and debarred from further employment in the postal service, and that the vacancies so caused would be immediately filled by the selection of suitable volunteers.. During the last election, Mr. Speaker, the late Minister of Labour, Mr. Murdock, was very properly ridiculed for telling the post office employees at Toronto "They could stay out until hell froze over." This is a similar expression, in effect that if they did not accept the position by a certain date they could also stay out till the same place had frozen over.

Then there was a certain time which was apparently utilized to beat the strikers rather than to settle the strike. On June 5th, Senator Robertson wrote a letter giving permission for 44 porters to be brought in from the United States to take the place of the Canadian Pacific Railway men on strike. On June 7th, Mr. Andrews of Winnipeg, who was acting for the Justice department, wired Senator Robertson giving details of an offer of the metal employers to settle the strike. Here was an opportunity to settle the strike at the instance of the employers themselves.

On June 9th a message was sent by a gentleman who I understand was a member of this House at that time, Mr. Allan, interfering in the matter. He wired to a gentleman by the name of Nanton—I think we all knew Sir Augustus Nanton—as follows:

> Feel strongly company should adhere to refusal mediator's proposal collective bargaining and that sympathetic strike should be called off before negotiations are resumed. Understand citizens' committee and companies agreed sympathy strike cannot be allowed wholly or partially to succeed.

In other words, they were more interested in breaking the strike than in settling the strike. Evidently the interference had some result, because on June 10th Sir Augustus Nanton answered Mr. Allan—and by the way, through the military sources here—to the effect that all sympathetic strikes must be called off as a preliminary to any further negotiations, and Senator Robertson was again called on to use all his influence in the matter.

On June 9th evidently there were some members of the government here at Ottawa who did not desire the strike should be called off, because I find here a message from Mr. Meighen to Mr. Andrews advising that certain legislation was likely to be introduced—we were discussing some of that legislation today—and it seemed to him—Mr. Meighen—that the settlement on the terms proposed would be a triumph for the strike leaders. In other words, members of the government here at Ottawa were not anxious that the strike should be settled or that the plans the employers had submitted should be accepted.

On June 15th, Senator Robertson wired the Prime Minister that owing to the failure of mediation proceedings and the strike extending to the train service men a clear-cut definition and declaration on the question of collective bargaining seemed to be justified, and that such was submitted to the metal trade employers and had been accepted. After he had refused to make this declaration on May 25th, he now considers, on June 15th, that this is the opportune time to make the statement he should have made long before. He advised further in that telegram that further action outlined in the telegram of the 13th was likely to be taken within the next twenty-four hours, "which we anticipate will result in speedy and satisfactory conclusion of the trouble here." In other words, he was advising that there would be arrests of some of the men within the next twenty-four hours, and within the next twenty-four hours ten men were arrested.

On June 17th, Senator Robertson wired the Prime Minister pointing out the importance of providing machinery for the deportation of undesirables, also advising him of ten arrests on the previous night, and that the Labour temple and several Labour halls had been searched for printed literature and records.

On June 17th, the day after the arrests, Mr. Meighen wired from Ottawa to Mr. Andrews in Winnipeg questioning the legality of the arrests, and pointing out that the arrests had been made without proper authorization, but that the proper authorization was being immediately despatched. In other words, the men had been arrested illegally, but once arrested the government was going to make their arrests legal. Mr. Andrews got a slight slap on the wrist there from (Mr. Meighen), and answering the Minister the next day he practically blamed the whole situation on Senator Robertson. He said:

> Everything I have done has been at the suggestion of Senator Robertson, but because it might weaken his position with Labour I have taken the full responsibility for the Justice department.

In other words, Senator Robertson was in politics, and if he had done anything along these lines it might have weakened his position with Labour if it had been found out, so they had in Winnipeg, acting for the Justice department, another gentleman, who was not in politics, and who took full responsibility in order to save Senator Robertson in a political way.

On June 17th Mr. Meighen wired to Mr. Andrews that although he had himself questioned the legality of what had been done, it was all right anyway. He said:

> Notwithstanding any doubt I have as to the technical legality of the arrest and the detention at Stony Mountain, I feel that rapid deportation is the best course now that the arrests are made, and later we can consider ratification.

In other words, legal or not, the arrests had been made and the government were determined to get these men out of the country, and later ratify the action that had been taken. We were discussing a bill here this afternoon, in a camouflaged sort of way which does not go to the kernel of the matter, for the legislation was put there for no other purpose than to break the strike in 1919.

On June 17th Mr. Calder wired to the head of the mounted police in Winnipeg:

> You are hereby authorized under section 42 of the Immigration Act to take into custody and detain for examination for the purposes of deportation the several persons referred to in your telegram of the seventeenth.

In that he was authorizing the arrest and detention of men after they had already been arrested and detained in Stony Mountain.

Again, on the same day Mr. Meighen wired to Senator Robertson advising delay in arrests, in which he said that the provincial government had so advised. "Authorization depends wholly on you." In other words, Senator Robertson was in Winnipeg with full authority in regard to the arrests, but in view of the fact that the provincial government advised against the arrests Mr. Meighen wired to Senator Robertson that authorization depended wholly upon him, the Minister of Labour. On the same date Mr. Calder wired to Judge Robson as follows:

> Message received. If Senator Robertson has not left, please get in touch with him immediately as local representative was directed, to obtain his approval for any action contemplated.

Again putting the whole responsibility on Senator Robertson, the then Minister of Labour. On June 18th Senator Robertson wired the Prime Minister reporting: everything quiet in Winnipeg and that "our action has proved effective and satisfactory to citizens generally and will be wholly justified." He asked in the same message that certain amendments to the Criminal Code be hastened, as Commissioner Perry, of the northwest mounted police, might desire to take general action throughout western Canada at an early date. Having arrested ten men illegally and put them in Stony Mountain penitentiary, having conquered Winnipeg, as it were, he was now prepared to attack the whole of western Canada. He therefore asked for certain legislation to be hastened so that he could get out on the war path again. On June 19 the Prime Minister wired Senator Robertson as follows:

> Thanks for various messages and especially your telegram of yesterday. Pray accept warmest congratulations upon your masterly handling of a very difficult and complicated situation.

So that apparently the whole proceedings had the blessing of the Prime Minister and the government generally. But two days later something serious happened. I have led up to the point where a situation occurred that is deplorable to think of. On June 21st a message was received here in Ottawa to this effect:

> Serious riot started at 2.45 p.m. Mounted police turned out and now engaged with crowd. Mayor read Riot Act and called on militia. Turning out at once.

So it happened that the militia were used. On the same day there was a message from Mr. Andrews to Hon. Mr. Meighen in reference to the strike, in which he stated:

> I think, however, if we had not admitted to bail riots would have been participated in by strike committee who I believe, did all in their power to prevent red soldiers parade which started riot.

I want to draw this to the attention of hon. members: The strike committee were blamed for causing a riot. The ex-Minister of Labour, speaking in another place on the 12th of May, went on to say that the committee of the strikers with whom he had been negotiating at an hotel left the hotel with the statement that they were going out to fight that afternoon, and one of them said, "No, we don't want anything to eat; we can fight better on an empty stomach." Nevertheless we find the general officer commanding in Winnipeg making this statement in a telegram to the Hon. Mr. Meighen: "I believe the strike committee did all in their power to prevent the red soldier parade which started the riot." On the other hand Senator Robertson is found declaring in another place that the strike committee were prepared to fight on empty stomachs.

Mr. MANION: In the riots the hon. member speaks of were any people killed?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. MANION: How many?

Mr. HEENAN: One.

Mr. MANION: Were there any others killed during the strike in addition to that one person?

Mr. HEENAN: Not that I know of. I do not mind any hon. gentleman asking questions. May I say just at this point that I was in Winnipeg. I have been in the labour movement all my life, and have been at the head of every union with which I have been identified locally and I never was on strike one day in my life. I was more interested in an honourable settlement of this strike at that time than I was in anything else. But when it comes down to placing the responsibility for certain occurrences that took place at that time I am going to state the facts no matter who is injured by it.

Senator Robertson in another place made the assertion that I had made a false statement on the floor of this House knowing it to be false, and that I did so for a malicious purpose.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend has invited questions; may I ask him one more? Was it the troops or the mounted police that did the killing?

Mr. HEENAN: If my hon. friend had been following me he would have gathered that a squadron of mounted police arriving from overseas had been demobilized in Winnipeg so that they would not be known as soldiers but as mounted police. They were the men that did the shooting. If my hon. friend will just give me time I will cover all those points as I go along.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): What do you hope to accomplish by rehashing this matter of the Winnipeg strike? You are simply creating bad feeling in this country.

Mr. HEENAN: I hope to vindicate my honour in the face of the charges made against me.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): It was nothing but an attempt at revolution, that is all it was.

Mr. HEENAN: On what do you base that opinion?

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Everybody is of that opinion.

Mr. HEENAN: I will tell you what it was: A straw man was simply put up for the purpose of knocking it down. That is all it was. I never heard anything so ridiculous in my life as the suggestion that there was an attempt at revolution in Winnipeg. The 27th battalion with twenty machine guns were there, and yet the ex-Minister of Labour made the statement in another place that not one soldier was called upon. This is the gentleman who charged an hon. member of this House with making a malicious statement knowing it to be false. Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that I have no honour or self-respect?

The ex-Minister of Labour in another place made a statement to the effect that there were men on the tops of buildings and other very secluded places firing rifle or revolver shots at the mounted police. There is on record a report from one of his own men who states the circumstances under which the shots were fired. I cannot pronounce this man's name, no Irishman in this country could pronounce it. The initial of his Christian name is all right. It is "P". Whether that is "Patrick" or not, I do not know. The surname is spelled in the following manner—G-u-g-e-y-e-z-u-c-k.

Mr. JACOBS: Can you sneeze it?

Mr. HEENAN: The ex-Minister of Labour eulogizes this individual in another document as one who could be depended upon and recommends that he be given extra pay for his work during the trouble. This man had been reporting regularly. Two days after the strike, on the 23rd of May, he states:

> The authorities were well prepared to stop any disturbance. At 2.30 they began to gather around the market square. The Royal Northwest Mounted Police and special police came up to keep order and stop the parade. As soon as they were near the crowd many stones and bricks were thrown at them and yelling "boo-hoo". In reply to this the mounted police started shooting. There was one killed, thirty were injured and about one hundred arrested.

Instead of firing revolver shots from the tops of buildings, as the senator says, somebody shouted "boo-hoo". Then the mounted police started shooting and killed a man.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): They did fire a revolver shot and threw two brickbats. I was there myself at the time.

Mr. HEENAN: What is the government doing in this connection? I ask the government to amend the act so that no soldiers can be sent into any strike area, except on the responsibility of the government. I do not believe we should allow orders to go round this country promiscuously, requiring soldiers to go into any of these areas. I think I have proved conclusively that the Minister of Labour did on a whim of his own, against the advice of some of his own colleagues, prolong the strike by refusing to declare in favour of collective bargaining. I think he says himself it was in the interests of the international unions. Speaking in another place the hon. minister said that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, who was a young member in the House, should confess his indiscretion in making such statements, should admit the truth and thus apologize. In speaking to the House I have left out a lot of quotations from statements from the files because I think it is in the interest of the country not to use them.

In conclusion I have one apology to make, and that is that I was one of the men who was instrumental in recommending to the Prime Minister the appointment of Senator

Robertson to represent Labour in the Senate of Canada. I have now to apologize and say that we appointed a man who became a misfit, and through his indifference actually caused the riots in Winnipeg. I repeat again that he used a little common sense—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that the gentleman of whom he is speaking is a member of the Senate. According to our rules decorum must be observed and no expression imputing discredit on a member of the House of Commons or member of the Senate should be used. The hon. member used the expression "misfit" and applied it to a senator. I do not think the expression is parliamentary, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. HEENAN: I withdraw it; I am sorry I used it if it is against the rules. But I think someone should communicate to the other chamber and inform them of the rule, so that the same order might prevail over there. I do not think a member of the House of Commons, who has to go before the electors, should be spoken about in the way I was spoken about by a member of the Senate who feels a certain amount of security, in that he does not have to face the electors. I do not want to dictate to the Speaker, but I feel that in all fairness he should communicate to the Speaker of the Senate the ruling he has just given. I am perfectly willing to abide by it. The ruling is a proper one.

The strike we have been discussing should have been settled, but the whole negotiation leading up to the riot was carried on in a manner to prevent its being settled. I do not think anyone could rely on the information the commanding officer was receiving from different sources, because I find in the documents that he had secured a man to go amongst the labour unions as one of them, to find out what was going on and report to the officer. He was paid $75 a week on account of the danger of the job. But, hon. members will note that the officer had so little confidence in that man that he had to employ another man at $50 a week to check him up for fear he would be double-crossed. That is the report received from the general officer commanding at Winnipeg. If I had been an officer of the crown receiving the reports here, I would have been afraid there was actually a revolution of some description in progress in Winnipeg. I say there was no sign of a revolution, and when the minister went up there for the purpose of settling the matter, if he had really attempted to settle it or was desirous of settling it, he could have done so without the delay that actually did occur in bringing about a settlement.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): This afternoon, when the hon. member made somewhat lurid threats that he would bring this matter up at some time, I anticipated that he would be referring to it; and inasmuch as at the moment I challenged the correctness of the statement he made I thought he might do me the ordinary courtesy of advising me when he intended to bring the matter before the House. On the contrary, he chose a time when it was almost impossible for me to be here to hear him.

Mr. HEENAN: In explanation I may say that I said I would take it up at the first opportunity.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not know what would be the hon. member's first opportunity, consequently I am in the position of not knowing precisely what the hon. member's words were. As I went to Winnipeg at the time with the Minister of Labour of that day, and had to do with all with which the Minister of Labour had to do, I am tolerably familiar with the circumstances, and in referring to those circumstances, speak only under the handicap of the time which has since elapsed.

I have just had the opportunity of reading what was said in another place by the Minister of Labour at that time. Only now have I had the time to read it, and I hasten to say that what was said by the Minister of Labour in another place was, in every line of it, correct. No troops whatever were ordered into Winnipeg by the government or anybody else at the time of the strike in 1919. Not only were none ordered in, but none went in and none had anything to do with the labour trouble. There were troops in Winnipeg at the time. They were never used. There were some troops who enlisted voluntarily, because the citizens of Winnipeg were not allowed to attend to their own ordinary duties, and they deemed it their first immediate task to try to protect their city. There was nothing else they could do anyway, so that they were all the more ready to protect the city from the danger they felt it was in. As a consequence somewhere in the neighbourhood of from 2,000 to 3,000 enlisted in the unit whose headquarters was in Winnipeg, under the permanent officer of that unit, just as any citizens have a right to enlist.

Mr. MANION: Just as they did in England the other day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, just as they did in England, under circumstances much less crucial than existed in Winnipeg at this time. Those troops who so enlisted, citizens of Winnipeg, were never requistioned and never took any active part. They were merely held in reserve to support the civil authorities should that support be found necessary. I think I have already referred to, and under the circumstances I feel justified in repeating, a report which I received. While I have not the authority of the party making the report to give his name, I feel I could get it; but I say to the House that it was one high in authority. I wrote to him for a report on the matter and I have a copy of it before me. I will ask the House to accept my word that he was one high in the militia of Canada and that he was on the ground. I do not know that the hon. member will accept my word.

Mr. HEENAN: Why not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Possibly he will. If so, he will have to retract a great deal that he said. The writer of the report says:

I have been away for some little time, and so I trust you will please excuse the delay in replying to yours of the 20th October.

In reply to your request, I may say that no troops were either sent in or brought into Winnipeg for use in connection with the labour troubles of 1919 from any outside points.

One battalion of infantry, returning from overseas—the 27th City of Winnipeg Battalion—whilst on its way to Winnipeg for demobilization purposes was authorized to be kept on for duty during the tenure of the strike, but I did not consider this was necessary and it was demobilized the same day it arrived.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the date of the report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Fourteenth November, 1923.

With regard to troops in Winnipeg at the outbreak of the strike, there were only a small number of infantry, mostly conscripts, in the 10th Garrison Battalion, and two troops of the Depot Squadron of the Fort Garry Horse. These were not demobilized for a month or two after the strike was over, as they composed the ordinary local garrison at that time. They did, and would, have carried on this duty irrespective of the strike.

Apart from the above some 3,000 or so local active militia were called up and organized for the protection of property and the upholding of law and order if necessary. These consisted of citizens who joined the local active militia for the period of the strike. No troops were called in from outlying districts. The available troops, as above mentioned, were held in readiness for any emergency which might arise, and were actually turned out on the requisition of the mayor of Winnipeg on the last Saturday in June, 1919, just previous to the break-up of the strike. On that day, two troops of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which were at that time stationed in Winnipeg, and being a civil force, were first used to quell the disturbance, being supported on the streets by the military forces above mentioned. The only actual use of the militia necessary, however, was a demonstration in force, and to be held in close support of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as above mentioned.

This is precisely what I have stated to the House on previous occasions, and it agrees fully with what was said in the other place by the party so bitterly attacked for saying it by the hon. member this afternoon. I do not think it does any good to recall now and seek to become very brave over the Winnipeg strike, seek to point out that all was just a tempest in a teapot, really nothing. I assure the House that any hon. gentleman who had responsibility at that time would not take quite so lightly the circumstances which presented themselves.

Winnipeg was in charge of a strike committee; not a child could have milk to drink except by permission of that strike committee. The regularly constituted authorities were no longer in control in connection with the distribution of necessities. If that is a state of affairs to be sneered at and considered quite the incident of a day, well and good; but I would never care to be a member of a government which so regarded anything of that importance.

I went there with Senator Robertson and because hon. members will recall that in those days the whole atmosphere differs from that which exists now and which indeed existed two years afterwards, we found many employees of the government had joined in the movement of the hour and become strikers too in sympathy, though professing no grievance of their own. I felt—and in this the other members of the government concurred—that it was impossible to tolerate such a situation; that it would never do for the government of Canada to recognize the right of employees of this country to strike in sympathy with any other strikers engaged in ordinary employment, factories or the like, where the employers are engaging them for the sake of making a profit from their labour; that we never could tolerate the principle at least of a sympathetic strike on the part of the civil service of Canada.

I do not think there are any who take their duties very seriously in this House who would for a moment contend that any government could tolerate on the part of the civil service a sympathetic strike. I do not know but what the majority of this House would go further and say that doing our duty to the people of Canada we should not recognize the right to strike on the part of the civil service. The civil service differs from all others that are employed in this country for the sake of profits out of their labour. The element of profit does not come into the civil service at all; it is because of that element of profit and therefore because of the object to be served by unjust wages to the servant that the right of the labour union or of labour outside of a union to strike is recognized by the state. But I do not need to go further into that point. Suffice it to say that we determined we would be truants to our trust, unworthy of our responsibility, if we tolerated for a moment the principle of a sympathetic strike on the part of the civil service of the country. We therefore notified all who engaged therein that they would be given sufficient time to return to work and that if they did not return within that time they would be considered out of the service. By that order we stood and the execution of that order was effective, was a strong and potent factor, in determining the issue of that crucial struggle.

It is all right for hon. members to come back some years afterwards and say: Oh, there was nothing very important concerned; you went into a great stew over it. Suffice it to say this: There were some arrests made. Those arrests were not made for any violation of any recently enacted law. No charge was made for violation of such a law. I do not recall the number, but either seven or eight were arrested at the instance of the federal government. All were convicted save one and he was convicted of being a nuisance. The others were convicted of offences against the Criminal Code, offences that had been standing for years and decades in this country, which had been standing as offences since Canada was a country at all. They were convicted by a jury of farmers after a long and fair trial at the hands of a conscientious judge. Such was the result. I fancy it was the duty of parliament to accept the verdicts of the courts as right unless those verdicts are challenged. The verdict of the court is some evidence of the character and the peril of the situation which prevailed in Winnipeg at that time. Its results penetrated far into the country. Many were seriously affected in carrying out their ordinary occupations by the system of semi-terror which was then instituted. Having performed our duty as we thought right and, as I think the event showed, successfully, we returned. And I hope I shall be forgiven if I observe that, with all the facts before him, knowing just what we had done, especially in relation to the civil service, the first man in the House of Commons who came to see me, for the purpose of thanking me for what had been done in Winnipeg and of expresing appreciation of the manner in which the situation had been handled, was the late Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding.

Now, as to the work of Senator Robertson, there are few with whom I have been associated for whose integrity of purpose, for whose common sense, for whose power to measure circumstances and to apply to them the necessary and no more than the necessary action, have I a more profound regard than I have for these qualities in Senator Robertson. For any step which he took, I make myself just as responsible as he is. The hon. member says that he recommended Senator Robertson for Minister of Labour at the time—or was it for the Senate?—and that he now has a different view. Well, this is not the only subject on which the hon. gentleman has changed his mind. This is not the only occasion on which his colours in other respects have changed, and I can only hope that in the not distant future the position which he chooses to take at this time—for what purpose I do not need to inquire—will be altered as well, and that when he addresses the House on this subject again he will not only present a case stronger in point of the real interests of the nation, but will also express opinions more worthy of a member of parliament than were the opinions he uttered this afternoon.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I had no intention when I came to Ottawa to discuss the subject which has been brought up to-night.

Mr. FOSTER: Don't do it, then.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not disposed to accept the advice of hon. gentlemen opposite. I will follow my own inclinations on this occasion and will continue to do so so long as I am a member of this House. The subject having been brought up without my knowledge or consent, I feel compelled to reply to some of the remarks made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen). I think I know as much about the conditions in Winnipeg at that particular time as does any man in this House.

An hon. MEMBER: You ought to.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. And I hope that hon. gentlemen who say I ought to know will accept my statements as facts.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Not necessarily.

Mr. HEAPS: One of the statements that fell from the lips of the right hon. leader of the opposition was the fact that all of the eight men who were arrested were convicted. That statement is not correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said, at the instance of the federal government—all but one.

Mr. HEAPS: I was arrested at the instance of the federal government and was tried along with the rest of those men, and I was not convicted; I was acquitted. If the right hon. gentleman's other statements are on a par with that—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was not the hon. gentleman tried with Mr. Dixon?

Mr. HEAPS: No, I was tried along with the eight, "the famous eight," as they were called.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Seven out of eight is a pretty good proportion.

Mr. HEAPS: That does not alter the fact that the statement is inaccurate. As I say, I was acquitted, and I have no wish to dispute my having participated in the strike. I did, and I have no regrets to express and no apologies to offer. That strike in Winnipeg was an ordinary, peaceable strike.

Some hon. MEMBERS Oh, oh!

Mr. HEAPS: I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite must have been reading the newspapers in Ontario. They derive their education from that source and I am sorry for them.

Mr. MULLINS: I was in Winnipeg at the time and was not reading any Ontario papers, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that my food supply was cut off. It was no ordinary strike.

Mr. HEAPS: I will discuss that point later. Let me say that the evidence submitted by the crown—and I listened to that evidence, not for weeks, but for months—and the tactics which were adopted to ensure the conviction of the accused persons on that occasion would have done justice to the days of Judge Jeffreys. The trial was not such as one would have expected to find in a court in Canada in 1919. There were 250 jurymen—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know whether I quite caught the remarks of the hon. member, but I may advise him when refering to the crown he should not use any derogatory language.

Mr. HEAPS: If I have unwittingly transgressed the rules of the House, Mr. Speaker, I unequivocally withdraw any statement that may be in any way offensive. I am always willing to abide by the rules and by the decisions of the Chair, and I do not quibble when withdrawing objectionable remarks. I accept the ruling of the Chair unreservedly, and I trust that other hon. members in the House will do likewise.

Now, the leader of the opposition referred to the convictions which were obtained at that trial. I claim the right to reply to the right hon. gentleman on this score. As a general rule, in the province of Manitoba, the jury panel comprises about forty-eight persons, and I would point out that in this particular trial 250 jurors were empanelled. Moreover, before these jurors came into court the Royal Northwest Mounted Police had been around inquiring into all of their antecedents.

An hon. MEMBER: Perfectly right.

Mr. HEAPS: Perfectly right?

Some hon. MEMBERS, Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, if that is the attitude of hon. gentlemen it seems to me it would be absolutely impossible to secure fair trials. What is more, the government of that day paid three-fifths of the costs incurred in connection with that jury—another very unusual proceeding. Again, they paid the costs of the lawyers engaged in the prosecutions. Why? Because they could not get the province to pay them. The provincial government were not in favour of the proceedings taken by the Dominion government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did they not prosecute some of the men, too?

Mr. HEAPS: They may have done so, but I am pointing out who paid the costs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member knows they did, the only difference being that whereas they failed we succeeded.

Mr. HEAPS: Perhaps the right hon. gentleman will be satisfied if I cite some of the costs paid by the federal government on that occasion. The total amount of the costs in connection with the lawyers and others taking part in the trials was $180,259.38. That is what some of the lawyers got out of the strike in return for their patriotic services. The firm represented by one particular lawyer received, according to the statement I have here, $19,374. That man was in receipt of between $150 and $175 per month from the firm for whom he was working.

Mr. FOSTER: Who was it?

Mr. HEAPS: I am willing to let my hon. friend see the statement, but I do not wish to make the gentleman's name public. The fact, however is as I have stated. One lawyer, A. J. Andrews, received $32,623; another,

[Mr. Meighen.]

$3,399; another; $26,990, and still another $21,-587. All this money was paid for just a few months' service.

Mr. MANION: Has the hon. member the figures paid by the present government last year in fees to a lot of Winnipeg lawyers for doing work down here?

Mr. HEAPS: There is no comparison between the work of the lawyers engaged in those prosecutions and the work of legal gentlemen who came from Winnipeg to Ottawa at the request of the Dominion government.

Mr. MANION: They were pretty big figures last year, I remember.

Mr. HEAPS: I think the hon. member for Fort William will readily understand that the two situations were entirely different. One was an invasion of provincial rights—the counsel were there without the authority or sanction of the provincial government of Manitoba; in this case they came down to assist parliament.

For the moment, however Mr. Speaker, while it is fresh in our minds, I should like to compare the action of our government of 1919 with that of the British government recently under somewhat similar conditions. When the sympathetic strike was called off a few weeks ago, what happened in Great Britain? His Majesty the King and Premier Baldwin each made public announcements asking both sides to the disputes to forget the past and look towards the future. But what happened in 1919 in the city of Winnipeg? Forget the past? Oh no. They went at it as hard as they could and did things there which I feel sure hon. members who had a hand in them must now feel somewhat ashamed of. They speak of law and order. Constitutional government has been referred to very often this afternoon. Let us again consider the message read a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) and see who was acting unconstitutionally on that occasion:

Notwithstanding any doubts I have as to technical legality of arrests—

In other words, the sender of this message had legal doubts whether or not those arrests were in order.

—and detention at Stony Mountain—

That is, the sender of this message doubted whether it was legal to place those men in Stony Mountain.

—I feel rapid deportation is best course—

In other words, the right hon. gentleman who sent this message said: Now, whether these men had been arrested legally or illegally in his view the course to pursue was to have them deported. But here is the worst part of the message:

—now that arrests are made and later we can consider ratification.

That is: Arrest the men, keep them in jail, deport them, and if it is illegal, well we will get parliament to ratify our action. In other words, parliament was to be a rubber stamp for the right hon. gentlemen who sent that message to the city of Winnipeg. Who was the author of this message? The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. He sent that message on June 17, 1919 to A. J. Andrews, a lawyer in the city of Winnipeg. I do not think the right hon. leader of the opposition will care to deny the authorship of this telegram. Yet it has been claimed in this House on several occasions that the men who took part in the Winnipeg strike were acting unconstitutionally!

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that no child in Winnipeg so far as I know suffered during the strike for the want of a drink. I heard witnesses give evidence on that occasion, and I heard the manager of one of the largest creameries in the city say: So far as we are concerned there was neither a shortage of milk nor a shortage of water. I claim that if there was no shortage of these liquids in a creamery, there certainly was no shortage anywhere else in the city.

An hon. MEMBER: What about bread?

Mr. HEAPS: Why did the shortage of bread come about? If the bakers ceased operations there was no reason why the people should go without bread; they could have done the same as my wife did—bake their own bread. When a strike takes place there is bound to be a shortage of various commodities. What happened? The men and women in Winnipeg withdrew their labour. Thereupon there was bound to be a shortage of some things, just the same as in Great Britain recently when labour was withdrawn there ensued a shortage of commodities, and trains ceased to run, mines to operate. Those things that function under ordinary circumstances cannot possibly function when a strike is in progress.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Did not the strike committee cut off the delivery of bread and milk?

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, the bakers and the drivers came out on strike, so naturally there was no bread.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am asking, did not the strike committee cut off, by order, the delivery of bread and milk?

Mr. HEAPS: All the bakers and the drivers came out on sympathetic strike. There were thousands of people in Winnipeg who could not be kept at work at that particular time; they came out then by the thousands. But the next day an arrangement was made for bread and milk to be delivered. One of the men who helped to bring about that arrangement was subsequently made prosecuting attorney. Now, who suffers most during a strike. When hon. members opposite speak of bread and milk being cut off, whom do they think suffered most? Is it not the men and women who were out on strike? Are they not just as much a part of the citizenship of this Dominion as any hon. members in this House? Consequently when supplies were cut off, they were cut off from those people just as much as from any of the other citizens of Winnipeg.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): They ought to be pitied.

Mr. HEAPS: No, I do not want any hon. members to have pity for the people of Winnipeg. The people of that city can look after themselves. If the government here in Ottawa had left the people of Winnipeg to settle their own affairs that strike would have been settled pretty quick. It was the interference from Ottawa, the assurance given the employers of Winnipeg that arrests were going to be made, that strong arm methods would be used, that caused the strike to be prolonged.

Now, it might be said that those men who came out on strike, or even those who were arrested, were in no way representative of the people of Winnipeg. Indeed, this has been said so often that perhaps it might be worth while for me to deal briefly with that particular aspect of the question. Eight men were arrested who were said to have been in the forefront of that strike and brought to trial. Three of them at least had very little to do with the strike. One of them came into the city very unexpectedly and was subsequently arrested. He was not even on the strike committee. But it is well to point out that of those eight men several including my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), have since been elected and re-elected to public offices in the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member permit me? By what government or under whose instructions was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre arrested?

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He knows quite well. Why does he not tell the House?

Mr. HEAPS: It was a mystery.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was no mystery at all. He was arrested at the instance of the provincial government.

Mr. HEENAN: I can tell the House if my hon. friend wishes.

Mr. HEAPS: It was a mystery during the whole of that period as to who constituted the crown. We could not find out. We were told there were two authorities representing the crown, one in Manitoba and one in Ottawa. We had municipal elections there. The city council had stood nine to five. Naturally the city council was an important body during the strike, and yet after all the money which was poured into that civic election, and after all the big efforts which were made by our opponents, and in spite of the slender resources which the Labour movement had, after that election that was held in Winnipeg in November, 1919, the city council of Winnipeg stood seven to seven and the mayor who was opposed to Labour during the strike, after his election had to thank the people who came from outside the city of Winnipeg for his election.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. member tell the House who the nine and five represented?

Mr. HEAPS: The nine were anti-Labour, and the other five Labour members of the council, and when the civic elections were over the city council stood at seven to seven. Immediately after that happened, the board of trade in Winnipeg were very anxious to change the method of election in the city of Winnipeg, and they forced on the Labour members of the council the method of proportional representation in order that the city might be divided up on a different basis, and perhaps give Labour a much lesser representation than that to which it was entitled.

In the following year the provincial election came along, and four men were put up in the city of Winnipeg who were in jail at that very time. You would think that a man who was in jail would not have an opportunity of becoming a candidate and would never receive the endorsation of his fellow electors, but in spite of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that these four men were in jail, the man who received three times as many votes as the second highest on the poll was the man who had previously been acquitted, Mr. F. J. Dixon, and the three other men who were serving jail sentences, having been charged with seditions conspiracy, were also elected to the provincial legislature.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): It was not much credit to Winnipeg.

Mr. HEAPS: If any hon. gentleman has anything to say, or any question to ask, I shall be glad to answer it if he will ask it in the usual parliamentary manner. Now what does that show? It clearly shows that the strike had the support of a very large number of the people of the city of Winnipeg.

What happened subsequent to that? My hon. friend who sits next to me (Mr. Woodsworth) was one of those who were arrested, and what was the charge laid against him? He was actually charged with seditious libel for having quoted parts of the Bible, for having quoted certain well known verses from Isaiah, running somewhat to this effect, "Ye shall build houses, and ye shall inhabit them." That was put in as part of the seditious libel uttered by my hon. friend who sits here tonight. Yet in spite of the part he took in the strike he was elected to this House in 1921, and in spite of the action that I took during that period I have since been elected three times to public office, and was elected on two occasions previous to 1919.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that the strike in the city of Winnipeg was an ordinary manifestation of the workers who protested against the conditions of employment that existed at that time in the city of Winnipeg. Let me say this: When men are arrested and thrust into jail because they hold certain ideas, and are going to be deported because of those ideas, then the authorities who think they can imprison these men, and who do so, are merely strengthening those ideas amongst the masses of the people of this country or any other country. There was never a jail or a penitentiary built yet that was strong enough to contain within its walls ideas that were worth while. Ideas that are worth while will continue to live and continue to grow more in favour with the people. Ideas that are not worth while will die without any unnecessary action by any public authority.

At that time we were charged with almost every conceivable crime under the sun. The actions that were taken by the then government were not taken for the purpose of settling the strike; they were taken with the idea of breaking the morale of the men and breaking the strike in the city of Winnipeg.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: Certain hon. gentlemen opposite applaud that statement, thinking that the government of that day were justified in the action they took. I am glad that some hon. gentlemen opposite take that stand. I would far rather that they come out openly and say they stand behind the government of that day in trying to crush the organized labour movement in the city of Winnipeg, than hide their opinions. We will know then where they stand, and what their protestations amount to when they come here pleading on behalf of the workingman, as we so often hear them plead in this House.

As I said a moment ago, the action taken at that time was not taken for the purpose of settling the strike, but for the purpose of breaking it. Now I want to look back in Hansard to a statement made under date of March 22nd, and I want to quote a few words offered on that occasion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman not to refer to past debates.

Mr. HEAPS: I am reading from a certain document, if that will satisfy hon. members. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), one of the gentlemen concerned—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is apparently reading from Hansard.

Mr. HEAPS: I will give it from memory, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre made certain statements in this House during the debate on March 22nd, and the right hon. leader of the opposition denied the accuracy of his statements. He denied the fact that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the rules of the House the hon. member is not allowed to refer to past debates.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, there was an occasion, not very long ago, during a discussion—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, is not this the hon. gentleman who just about ten minutes ago talked about equivocation under the rules? Is he not now trying to equivocate rather clumsily, by no means creditably, but plainly equivocating?

Mr. HEAPS: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I have been trying to learn a few things from the leader of the opposition, trying to learn how to get around the rules of procedure in this House. I do not know that I have succeeded well enough yet but if I am here long enough I may learn and become a little better accomplished in that direction than I am at the present time.

There is one little item Mr. Speaker, to which I wish to refer. My hon. friend to my left made certain statements in connection with men who were threatened with deportation by the right hon. leader of the opposition, and which the right hon. leader of the opposition denied absolutely and in toto—

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member is to be allowed to break the rule, Mr. Speaker, I must ask the chance to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. gentleman not to refer to a past debate.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think it matters very much anyhow.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not afraid of the facts if some hon. gentlemen opposite are. I wish to give the facts, and I am not afraid of any past debates being quoted in regard to anything I may have said.

An hon. MEMBER: You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. SPEAKER: The expression "You ought to be ashamed of yourself" is not parliamentary. Within my own recollection a ruling to that effect was given by the late Mr. Speaker Sproule.

Mr. HEAPS: I now wish to refer to another incident if I may. Early in January last, during the present session, I made a reference to the strike, and my observations at that time probably did not exceed one hundred words. I then referred to troops being sent to Winnipeg, and the right hon. leader of the opposition took exception to my statement. But I maintain that troops were sent in and they received government supplies, government clothing, Lewis guns and government revolvers, and that government armoured cars were shipped in as motor cars. On the occasion of my former remarks I received a rather severe castigation from the right hon. leader of the opposition who declared that I had given utterance to what almost were untruthful statements. I immediately put a motion on the order paper asking for the production of all documents relating to the sending of troops to Winnipeg during the 1919 strike. I wanted to get a complete and accurate statement with respect to the particular incident to which I have alluded, and I also desired that everybody interested should be placed in possession of the entire facts. When that motion was reached on March 15th a certain hon. gentleman opposite—I do not know at whose instigation—had it placed under debatable motions thereby preventing the early production of the documents bearing on the subject, which would have demonstrated the truth or falsity of my statements. Why was that motion placed on the debatable list of resolutions? Was it not the desire of some hon. gentlemen opposite that these documents should not be brought down?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. First of all the hon. gentleman should not question the motive of any hon. member who exercises his right, under the rules of procedure, and asks that a certain resolution under Notices of Motion should be made debatable. That is the right of any hon. gentleman. I have so ruled at the request of hon. members on both sides of the House.

In the next place the hon. member impliedly states that the request was made for the purpose of preventing a disclosure of the truth. I would ask the hon. member not to make any such insinuation against his fellow members.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, if in making that statement I have transgressed the rules of the House, I withdraw it unreservedly. I am a comparatively new member and have yet to familiarize myself with the rules of procedure. I hope if I remain here a little longer to be able to conduct myself with more accuracy.

There is one other matter to which I ought to refer before concluding. There was a rather long discussion this afternoon in the course of which a desire was expressed to learn why certain amendments were being made to the Immigration Act. Some hon. members seem to be talking at random without realizing why the amendments in question were enacted in the year 1919. By looking up Hansard of that period the ostensible purpose of those amendments will be ascertained.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is again out of order.

An hon. MEMBER: You had better give it up.

Mr. HEAPS: Am I to understand, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot go into the motives responsible for the legislation of that date?

Mr. SPEAKER: If my hon. friend is violating the rules I do not think he is doing so intentionally.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, we at this end of the House experience great difficulty in hearing what Your Honour is saying. If Your Honour were to speak a little more loudly, that difficulty would be overcome.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will have recourse to my best baritone voice in order to be heard by hon. gentlemen at the other end of the chamber. I was saying that I did not think the hon. member intentionally trangressed the rules. The hon. member is wrong in the impression that those rules prevent freedom of discussion. They exist for the protection of hon. members generally, and particularly of those who belong to the minority. The rules which are as old as parliamentary government, were framed above all for the protection of the minority. If I call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he must not refer to a past debate there must be a reason for that. The reason is that if such references were permitted the session, instead of lasting six months, would continue for the whole year. When a debate has taken place on a certain question it cannot again be referred to during the same session.

Mr. HEAPS: I thought it was permissible for a member to allude to the debate of a previous session. I was saying that Hansard of 1919 would disclose the reasons for making amendments to the Immigration Act. It was done for the purpose of breaking the strike in the city of Winnipeg. That was most unusual method to pursue. The methods employed by the government of that day are scarcely in line with the methods that a constitutional and democratic government would employ. A bill was introduced in this House which took away from a British subject the right of trial by jury, one of the foundation stones on which the whole system of British jurisprudence has been built up in the course of many a century. Yet it received all its readings and was passed in the course of twenty minutes. The bill was passed in another House in an equally brief period. Its enactment into law therefore took only the short space of forty minutes. Under that act men in Winnipeg were arrested and were to be deported. Now, if there is anything which arouses the resentment of Labour it is the fact that such methods as those are used against men who enjoy the confidence of a very large section of the community. Under that act men were to be deported—yes, men were arrested at three o'clock in the morning—and it was stated that within forty hours those men were to be started on their way across the Atlantic ocean. That is the law that was passed by this House in twenty minutes. Yes, members of the Conservative party, have boasted in this House during the last few months that they had increased their representation in this parliament, from 61 to 116 members. That was felt to be something for which they ought to take a great deal of credit. But why did the Conservative representation in the House of Commons sink down to 61 in 1921? Have hon. gentlemen opposite ever investigated the reasons why they were so overwhelmingly defeated at the polls in 1921? Was it not because of the actions of the then government in 1918, 1919, and subsequently, which reduced the representation of the Conservatives to the second largest group in this House in the year 1921?

An hon. MEMBER: No, the third largest group.

Mr. HEAPS: The third largest group; I beg pardon. Was it not the fact that the workers of Canada had not forgotten the actions of the government at that time, and are not likely to forget it? Why, the gentleman who was Minister of Labour in 1919 could not go and address a public meeting in the city of Winnipeg to-day. If he does go there it will have to be when nobody knows anything about it.

Mr. MANION: In fairness to the Conservative members in this House, is it not true that in respect to that bill which my hon. friend says passed the House in twenty minutes—I was a member of the House at the time—there was not only no protest from the Conservatives, but no protest from the Liberals or the Progressives at that time?

Mr. HEAPS: I believe that statement is absolutely correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the hon. member say that Senator Robertson did not dare speak in Winnipeg?

Mr. HEAPS: I said the then Minister of Labour cannot go into the city of Winnipeg and address a public meeting, if the meeting is properly advertised and the people know anything about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What would happen?

Mr. HEAPS: Let him come and see what would happen. I am not saying anything. During the last election he came to Winnipeg to speak against my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, but nobody knew he was coming. It is quite true, Mr. Speaker, that when the bill went through this House in twenty minutes and received its three readings it got the unanimous vote of the House; otherwise I do not think it would have gone through. But I have spoken to certain members of the Liberal party—not now but in 1920—and I believe I also spoke to the hon. member for Fort William in 1920; I do not think he remembers it. At that time it was stated to me that the whole thing had been totally misrepresented to hon. members in this House.

Mr. MANION: I never said that to my hon. friend.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not say that you did, but the Liberal members I spoke to then and those to whom I have spoken since claim it was put through in such a manner that they did not know anything about it.

Mr. MANION: Would my hon. friend not think there was a little politics in that?

Mr. HEAPS: This is the statement I got in 1920. I claim there was a lot of politics in this thing in 1920. I believe the party who put the act through were helping their friends the manufacturing and financial interests of Winnipeg. Sure it is politics. I do not say anything further on this particular question. In some respects I am sorry the matter came before the House this evening; in other respects I do not regret it in the least. I took part in that strike, and if any hon. member says it was revolution in Winnipeg he does not know what he is talking about, because revolutions are not made; it is only fools that talk about them. It is said that fools talk about revolution but the wise men conform to them. No revolution was ever made or intended in that city. It was a bona fide strike and men and women came out because there was something at stake. They do not strike for the mere sake of striking. No one enters wholeheartedly into a strike. When the millions of people went into the strike in England, it was not done with a light heart. When people know that their families will have to do without the necessities of life, they think more than once before they enter upon a strike. In Winnipeg, owing to the conditions existing there, it was forced upon them; the men and women came out strongly, but they were not all called out in that case. They thought they were justified in striking. Yet when it had been in progress four or five weeks the government of the day magnified it into some kind of revolution, and if the official record of the House could be brought down it would show the true conditions. But all the records do not exist, Mr. Speaker. In some of the departments as early as February, 1922, a few months after the present government came into office, when a notice was given for the production of certain papers from the Department of the Interior, the Department of Justice and one other department, it was stated that there were no documents in existence.

Mr. PETTIT: What connection was there between the strike in Winnipeg and an order known as the Independent Workers of the World or the I.W.W., pointing to the use of armed force in Winnipeg and British Columbia?

Mr. HEAPS: I have never heard the name of that organization.

Mr. PETTIT: It is called the I.W.W.

Mr. HEAPS: I have heard the name; this is the first time I heard of them in that connection. The I.W.W. had no more to do with it than the hon. member who asked the question. The strike was called by the workers in Winnipeg and a sympathetic strike ensued. What is wrong after all in a sympathetic strike? Some hon. members asked me about documents that were not found. I will deal with that in a minute. I have here copies of two sessional papers asked for by the Hon. E. J. McMurray as far back as May 3, 1922. One was an order of the House asking for documents from the Minister of the Interior. I think the hon. member who was then Minister of the Interior is now the right hon. leader of the opposition. The document reads:

> I beg to say that, as far as the Department of the Interior is concerned, there is nothing on record respecting this matter.

That is giving the gist of the answer. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the Department of Labour and in other departments there are all kinds of documents. There must have been a file nine inches thick in the Department of the Interior in 1921, but when it came to 1922 the documents had disappeared. I am not blaming anybody for the disappearance, except that they could not be found. Then we come to the Solicitor General's department. The same thing happened there, according to the admission of the Solicitor General of Canada; they had no documents in that department. Yet on file in another department there is a stack of letters, telegrams and other documents, which show clearly that between 1919 and 1921 there was a large file in these departments which could not be found when the request was made for production in this House. Fortunately there are copies of them in existence elsewhere which some day may be published.

In reference to that organization, the Independent Workers of the World, I did not know there were any independent workers. I do not think I have ever met a member of that organization in my life. I have never had the pleasure of being in Vancouver and do not know anything about the organization there. It is possible they have such an organization there. I wish I could impress upon hon. members of this House that when workers enter into a strike they do not do it lightheartedly. They do not do it for the purpose of having a strike, but they go into it because it is the last resource for them. In 1918 there was a strike in the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. MULLINS: With reference to the statement my hon. friend made in Toronto—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MULLINS: Why did you go to my farm and agitate my men to go off the farm, when I was giving them the very best food, the very best care I could give them, purchased the best mattresses I could obtain for them to sleep on and did the very best possible for them? You or your walking delegates came to my farm and took my men away to engage in a strike in Winnipeg. Why was that done?

Mr. HEAPS: I know nothing of the incident to which my hon. friend refers. I am glad my hon. friend did not make a personal reference to me, because I do not know where his farm is; all I know is that he represents Marquette in this House. I was saying that workers do not go lightly on strike.

An hon. MEMBER: Answer the question.

Mr. HEAPS: A little detail as to what goes on does not matter very much. This clearly indicates, as I have just stated, that some hon. gentlemen who make statements in this House do not really understand what Labour stands for or they would not ask a question of that kind: Why did somebody come on my farm and ask the workers to go off? The question is absurd in regard to a strike of 30,000 workers. Does anyone think that everybody who has anything to do with a strike knows all the little details that happen at such a time?

I was referring to an incident in 1918 when there was a strike in Winnipeg. During that time I did my best to try to settle the strike. I was a member of the city council at that time. What happened to me? I was condemned from both sides. On the one hand the workers and on the other the city council condemned me because I tried to settle it. That is often what happens to the peacemaker during a strike and consequently I am not very anxious to act as a peacemaker when a strike occurs.

When the strike of 1919 took place I saw that the workers were right and I gave them my unflinching support on that occasion. There is no doubt about their being right; no worker goes on strike except as a last resort and when compelled to do so by force of circumstances. But what I protest and will always protest against is when a government, I care not which party it is, attempts to suppress by forcible methods, what should after all be the inalienable right of every Canadian citizen.

On that particular morning of June 17 those eight or ten men were arrested and sent to Stony Mountain penitentiary, the idea being to deport them. Those men were arrested not because of their participation in the strike because some of them had hardly participated in it at all, had no part in calling it, and had come into Winnipeg more or less accidentally. Those men were arrested and were to be deported because they had certain ideas which were distasteful to the powers that be. The men were selected for deportation at the instigation of the then government and the man who did the selection was the then Minister of Labour. The documents will go to prove that if they are ever brought down to the House.

I am sorry if I have detained the House so long as I have; this matter has come up rather unexpectedly to-night. Personally, I do not care to look backward; I prefer to look forward.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: I wish some hon. gentlemen who sit on the other side would also look a little forward and not always look backward. Looking backward is generally a prerogative of the legal profession.

Mr. JACOBS: If the hon. gentleman would keep to his own field, it would perhaps be better all round.

Mr. HEAPS: I once had nine months' experience of law and somebody said that I would have made a pretty good lawyer if I had stayed at it a little longer. I had quite an experience of lawyers and one thing that was taught me was that lawyers knew nothing about law; that the only man who knew law was the judge; that what the judge said was law and what a lawyer said was merely an opinion and nothing more. After seeing lawyers in action for a short period I said that I would have nothing to do with them; that I was going to plead my own case. I did so and I happened to be the only one who was unlucky or lucky enough to be acquitted.

If I may I will pursue the story a little further as it is worth repeating. A few weeks after the trials were over I met the late Judge Metcalfe on Portage Avenue in the city of Winnipeg and after the usual salutations he said: "Heaps, the luckiest thing in the world for you was that you had no lawyer defending you. If you had had a lawyer to defend you, you would have gone to gaol with the rest." Ever since then I have had an idea that when we take notice of lawyers as we sometimes do in this House we always get into all kinds of trouble. If you wish to keep out of trouble in this House or out of it do not take too much notice of what lawyers say. Lawyers as a rule can go back for precedents for thousands of years, but when it comes to looking forward for five or ten minutes they sometimes get hopelessly lost.

I wish however to impress upon hon. members again that when a strike takes place we should bear in mind that as was the case with those men in the city of Winnipeg, the men are as good and loyal Canadians as you have in the Dominion of Canada. In the Winnipeg strike thousands of those men had just come back from overseas. To-day they are in the ranks of the organized labour movement, and they were in the ranks of the organized labour movement in 1919.

Mr. PRICE: Was the hon. member one of them?

Mr. HEAPS: I frankly admit that I did not go overseas. If loyalty, if patriotism is to be determined by a man's desire and inclination for war I am no patriot. If patriotism means love of your people and of your country I am second to nobody in this House or outside of it.

Mr. PRICE: Well, well.

Mr. HEAPS: If the hon. gentleman wants to interrupt me in an orderly way I hope he will get up and do so. The strike in Winnipeg took place; it is gone; it is a thing of the past. I would say to those gentlemen who were in charge of events of that period that if they had only had the same feeling, perhaps even the same amount of understanding as has the Prime Minister of Great Britain at the present time, those events would never have taken place in Winnipeg in 1919. There was a desire at that time to crush organized labour.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. PRICE: Is the hon. gentleman in order at the present time?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know whether the hon. member is a lawyer or not. I was saying that if the members of the House of 1919 had had the same breadth of outlook, the same understanding as the Prime Minister of Great Britain has at the present time those events in Winnipeg in 1919 might have been spared. Nevertheless, in spite of what took place there organized labour can never be crushed. The more attempts that are made to crush organized labour, the stronger it will rise. The organized labour movement is never defeated. It may lose here or it may lose there, but ultimately it will come back stronger than ever.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take many minutes of the time of the House in regard to this matter. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has made certain statements to which I wish to refer. He informed us that he was not afraid of facts, and for that we shall all be devoutly grateful. I couple with that the statement he made a little later that he hoped with some experience to conduct himself with a little more accuracy than he was able to do now. We can put the two together and draw our own conclusions. The hon. gentleman says that in Winnipeg no children had to suffer for want of milk. He did not answer the question I put to him: did the strike committee cut off the delivery of bread and milk? That question he sidestepped; he declined to answer it. I want therefore to read to this hon. gentleman, who is not afraid of facts, what was stated in the bulletin issued by the strike committee, of which I suppose he was a member. He declares that he was deeply involved in the whole thing, and certainly his sympathies were with the undertaking. This is the bulletin issued by the committee on May 17 with reference to their proposal to establish supply depots to give preference to strike families.

Impossible to distinguish between the sick children owing to the fact that it would take days to establish a card system and reports fast coming in of children on verge of death for the want of milk.

So that some of them did have sufficient compassion, when they saw children on the verge of death for the want of the very necessaries of life, to withdraw that order which they had issued and which they had proposed to carry out, giving preference to the families of those who were engaged in the strike and withholding any consideration from those who did not participate in it. That is the situation which the hon. gentleman has described as a quiet, peaceable strike. The fact is that the Winnipeg disturbance was not an ordinary strike, the object of which was to obtain better wages. It was an organized attempt to get control of the city and to induce labour in other centres of population to do likewise, with the end in view of destroying or breaking down national government. I do not think I can do better than quote some of the utterances of the hon. member and others associated with him on that occasion, and in the first place I might read what was said by the hon. member sitting immediately to his left (Mr. Woodsworth). Speaking in Vancouver on February 7 of that year that gentleman said:

> The ultimate object of the Federated Labour Party is the collective ownership and democratic operation of the means of wealth production. This involves a complete revolution in our whole economic and social structure.

That is from one of the leaders in this movement. Let me quote again from the same source:

> The federal authorities control the military and the courts, and labour is not going to get what it wants until it in some way gets control of the military and the courts.

That is the peaceable strike. That is the spirit that moved this very quiet and law abiding demonstration on the part of labour. Now I will quote from another gentleman who was prominent in the movement, a Mr. Russell:

> The blood that is spilled in Canada will depend on the working class. We must establish the same form of government as they have in Russia so that we may have a Russian democracy here.

That is what that prominent participant in the strike declared at that time, and I have heard somewhat similar opinions expressed since then.

The hon. member who resumed his seat a moment ago (Mr. Heaps) criticized the act which was put through this parliament on that occasion for the deportation of undesirable people, and he observed that it had been disposed of in twenty minutes. That act, Mr. Speaker, was adopted unanimously, not a single voice having been raised in dissent. All I have to say to the hon. gentleman is that the people of this country, regardless of their political affiliations, welcome to Canada decent, law abiding men and women, no matter from what country they may come. But I want him to understand—and he can convey this message to those who think and feel as he does in matters of this kind—that the Canadian people, upon whom depends the future stability of this country, will not tolerate foreigners who come to these shores imbued with the determination to stir up trouble. We will not permit such people to come and establish on the soil of Canada conditions of the sort from which they were running away in leaving the country of their origin.

This was a peaceable strike, says the hon. member for North Winnipeg. Let us see what he himself said at the time. Speaking in July of that year he expressed this regret:

> We were having beautiful weather and we were having a beautiful strike when the citizens butted into the game and began to attempt to assert their authority.

A terrible thing for the law abiding citizens of Winnipeg to interfere with that beautiful strike, during such beautiful weather.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. member suggest that I made the statement which he has quoted?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: In the month of July I never made such a statement.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman has told us that he hopes to conduct himself—

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member desire to raise a question of privilege?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. In the month of July, after we had been arrested, I made no such statement, for the reason that we were under bond at that time to make no public statements at all.

Mr. EDWARDS (Fontenac): I accept the hon. gentleman's denial, as I am obliged to do under the rules of the House, and I do so all the more readily in view of his confession a short time ago that he hopes, as he gains experience, to conduct himself with a little more accuracy than he is able to do at present. We will let it go at that.

I will now refer to another statement made by one of the bosom friends of the hon. member and the hon. gentleman who sits immediately to his left. I quote now from the remarks of one Ivens:

> The storm is about to break and this time the lightning is about to strike upward instead of downward. I think the parliament buildings on Kennedy street would make a good labour temple, and the way things are going we will soon move in.

Another evidence of the kindly disposition of the gentlemen associated with the hon. member for North Winnipeg and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I suggest that I have heard people outside the Labour party express a desire to have a place on the treasury benches?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman may suggest what he likes. I have not been so close to the treasury benches as he has been, this session at all events, and I have not been able to dictate any of the terms of the Speech from the Throne. I will give the House another quotation.

Mr. MALONEY: With his permission I would ask the hon. member this question: In view of the past attitude of the hon. member for North Winnipeg and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with regard to labour, why does he classify those hon. gentlemen as belonging to the Labour party?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am not the first man who has found it difficult to answer a question on the spur of the moment. It would be rather hard for me to give a sound reason for classifying these hon. gentlemen as representatives of labour, and I must say I appreciate the point raised by my hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. Maloney). In all earnestness and sincerity, however, I am bound to confess that hon. gentlemen across the way, representing the city of Winnipeg, notwithstanding that they classify themselves as Labour members, are not in my opinion, in any true sense of the word, real representatives of Labour and of labour interests in this country.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, speaking at Calgary on October 29 of that year, said:

> I am not worrying as to whether they keep me in the pen or not—we'll win anyway. I don't think the workers of this country will let us stay in anyway.

The hon. gentleman had at any rate the consolation of believing that, even though the utterances of himself and of his associates did create turmoil and result in his landing behind the doors of a penitentiary, he had a sufficient number of friends outside who would use their influence and endeavour to get him out. He would not stay in very long.

The Winnipeg strike, Mr. Speaker, was not an ordinary strike in any sense of the term. I repeat, after the most careful consideration of the matter, that I have no hesitation in asserting that it was a deliberate attempt on the part of certain persons to get control of the city and to induce labour in other centres of population to follow their lead, with the ultimate object of overthrowing the properly constituted government of this country and establishing in its place something along the lines that one of those strike leaders expressed himself so much in favour of, namely, "what they had in Russia"—the most debased country to-day on the face of the globe.

I repeat what I said a few moments ago, Sir, that we are all sympathetic towards Labour. We recognize that Labour is entitled to demand its rights. We welcome people from all countries of the world to come here and establish their homes, but it is just as well for certain hon. gentlemen who sit opposite to thoroughly understand, and convey that understanding to those with whom they were associated in bringing about the Winnipeg strike, that we Canadians do not propose to allow men to come into this country from Europe or any other part of the world and establish conditions such as drove them out of their native land.

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances it is with some hesitation I rise and admit that I come from the city of Winnipeg, and it is with considerable diffidence that I prolong what seems to me to be an absolutely purposeless and fruitless discussion of something which would be much better forgotten than stirred up in this House at a time when we have real business to transact.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Again I ask a question similar to the question I asked on a somewhat like occasion: To what purpose is the time of this House taken up with the discussion of the strike in the city of Winnipeg some seven years ago? I tell you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members, that it is for one purpose only—propaganda pure and simple.

I go further. I trust too much to the intelligence of this House to suggest that it will be misled by the speech of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) into believing that in speaking as he has to-night he is representing or forwarding in any substantial way the interests of honest, sane labour in the Dominion. He has told you that the late Minister of Labour, now Senator Robertson, dare not come into the city of Winnipeg to address a public meeting, if public announcements thereof were properly made. I now tell him that during the last federal election the same Senator Robertson did come to the city of Winnipeg and did there address public meetings that were publicly advertised with his name at the top of the list in my constituency, and at no meeting that he addressed did he receive to my knowledge one single interruption, but on the contrary he was accorded most attentive and enthusiastic hearings.

As evidence of how labour stands in the constituency of Winnipeg South Centre let me refer to the result of the last general election. I may say, without any lack of modesty, that in my opinion Winnipeg South Centre is a very important constituency and in point of population and of the number of registered electors is in fact the greatest constituency west of the lakes. During the recent election a candidate of his party—the Independent Labour party—contested that constituency and lost his deposit. Senator Robertson addressed several meetings during the course of the contest. I do not give him credit entirely for the result, I take some credit to myself, with the loyal support of the rank and file of that constituency. But I want to tell the hon. member for North Winnipeg that the constituency of Winnipeg South Centre has among its electorate far and above any other class of people the labouring class, and yet the candidate representing the Independent Labour party was out of the running entirely in fifty out of the fifty-two polls, and in the aggregate, as I have said, he lost his deposit. I merely cite that to show to this House that so far as Winnipeg is concerned hon. gentlemen do not need to worry as to what real Labour will do there. If the House has any apprehension as to the status of Labour in that city, I now declare there is no cause for alarm. The 1919 strike was taken care of not by the militia, but by the citizens at large; and I can assure hon. members that in the event of any strikes in the future similar to that of 1919 they will be taken care of again by the same citizens.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg has told us that he prefers to look forward rather than backward. Well, I ask this House: Which way has he been looking to-night? Has he been taking a forward view? Rather has he been stirring up these unpleasant memories of the past. I ask for what purpose. I submit that it is only for the purpose of serving the individual ends of the hon. member himself. His purpose, in season and out of season, of which the House has had a good demonstration to-night, is not to solve the problems of labour in this country but to stir up dissension and discord in order that he may thereby profit.

Now, the hon. gentleman has referred to the conditions in the city of Winnipeg during the strike. I myself have a very distinct recollection of those conditions.

11 p.m. In the early part of June 1919 I returned to Winnipeg with a regiment that is well known to many hon. members of the west—the 46th battalion. That is a battalion of which Saskatchewan has a right to be proud. Because of the strike conditions we were unable to get telegrams to our families advising them of our return. The street car service was suspended. Milk was allowed to be delivered to homes only by those whose dairy wagons bore the card, "Operated by permission of the strike committee." Restaurant keepers were intimidated, and many of them found it to their advantage to post in their windows cards bearing the inscription "Kept open by permission of the strike committee," or an inscription to the like effect. Fire protection in the city of Winnipeg, as an effective protection, was cut off. Police protection was interfered with. Fire protection was demoralized to such an extent that it was necessary for the civilians to go into the fire halls and take the place of the men who were called out in order that the homes of the citizens of Winnipeg might be protected. So far as police protection was concerned, a much similar condition prevailed. Citizens of Winnipeg had to be sworn in as special constables to protect their own homes and their property. The first night that I arrived home and went to my house I was asked by my neighbours to come out and discuss the situation as to the protection of property, and I tell the House this: We went to the end of the street and met on a little lot, and there arranged for patrols in order that the street might be patroled from sunset to sunrise to protect property. Hon. gentlemen may say that our fears were groundless, but I tell you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this House, that that was the condition of mind of the people of the city of Winnipeg at that time. That is what the hon. member (Mr. Heaps) refers to as a peaceful strike.

Let me say this: So far as Labour is concerned, Labour will never find me its enemy in this House or outside of it. I believe in a fair wage. I believe in fair living conditions. I believe in the right of Labour to organize to advance its interests. But when agitators seek to use unionism in labour, not to advance but to prostitute the cause of Labour, I say it is time to call a halt. That was the condition which existed in Winnipeg in 1919 during the strike referred to this evening. That has passed. It was dealt with by the citizens of Winnipeg, and perhaps the less said about it the better.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg has made same references to patriotism. He has told you that it is not necessary to be in favour of war in order to be a patriot; I agree. But there are some things, whether you call it patriotism or not, that are expected of a citizen of a country. I think we cannot place the duties of even the humblest citizen of Canada lower than this, that we have a right to expect of him that he shall uphold the laws for the time being of his country, and that if he seeks to bring about a change, he shall do so only by constitutional means. I submit that the test I have given is not too strong a test. Measuring the hon. member for North Winnipeg by that test, I leave it to this House to judge how high he stands. If there be any doubt, I would like to refer to the House an extract that has been handed to me, and to read it and ask the hon. member whether he is the person referred to in this article. The heading is, "Red Flag Hoisted in Winnipeg City." When I refer to the red flag, surely it is not necessary for me to remind this House that the flag of this country is not the red flag. It goes on, "Union Jack Which Mayor Forced Socialists To Carry Placed Beneath Rostrum," and the despatch follows:

Winnipeg, Man., May 1.—Instructions of chief of police Newton that a Union Jack be placed at the head of the column was the only hitch in to-day's May day parade. The order was complied with, and 2,000 paraders moved off without interruption. Almost every radical organization in the city was represented, including a few members of the international bodies, although the Winnipeg Trades and Labour Council had previously decided not to aprticipate with the O.B.U.

This part of special interest:

After the parade a mass meeting was held, presided over by Ald. A. A. Heaps. The Union Jack was then deposited beneath the rostrum and the red banner hoisted.

Is that the test by which patriotism shall be measured in this country? Judge for yourselves the patriotism of the hon. member.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say this: While this demonstration in the House to-night on the part of the hon. member for North Winnipeg may be something of a novelty here, it is no novelty to us in the city of Winnipeg. We understand it there, and it is so that you may properly appreciate it, that I rise to-night. It is not because I personally have any apprehension as to what will happen in the city of Winnipeg in the future, but to say to this House that sentiments such as have been expressed here to-night by him do not represent Labour in the city of Winnipeg. Let me say further that during the last federal campaign organized Labour in the city of Winnipeg was not behind the Independent Labour party.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the hon. gentleman—

Mr. KENNEDY: Will you kindly keep your seat?

Mr. HEAPS: In view of the gentlemanly remark made by the hon. member, I will.

Mr. KENNEDY: As in the past, so in the future, the citizens of Winnipeg will not call upon nor will they have need for any outside militia to take care of disturbances in that city. We took action ourselves then as civilians. We shall do so again in the future whenever the occasion arises.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): I just wish to ask the House to bear with me for a very few moments, not because I intend to refer particularly to the Winnipeg strike, but because I wish to refer first to what has been said with regard to the ex-Minister of Labour, the Hon. Senator Robertson, and to the relations that organized labour had to the Winnipeg strike, or that the Winnipeg strike had to organized labour.

May I say at the beginning that it has been a matter of astonishment to me that my hon. friend the member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan), who knows, who must know, the position that organized labour took in relation to the Winnipeg strike, should make himself the mouthpiece for the expressions to which he has given utterance in this House to-night in relation to that so-called strike. As a matter of fact, the organization to which my hon. friend belongs, if I know his position correctly, was one of the organizations that took a very definite part in the suppression of that strike, and they did so, why? Because they realized that the strike so-called was an attack on organized labour, and it is in connection with that that I wish particularly to deal.

But referring first to the ex-Minister of Labour, the Hon. Senator Robertson, it has been stated that he could not go into the city of Winnipeg and address a public meeting there. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no man in Canada, there never has been, and there is not now, a man associated with the organized labour movement in this country that possesses the confidence of organized labour to a greater degree than the hon. Senator Robertson has possessed it and does possess it now.

I wish to make reference to two statements of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), one that it was an effort to crush the organized labour movement that induced those who took part to assist in suppressing the so-called strike, and the other the statement that organized labour can never be crushed. I say at once that organized labour cannot be crushed, and that no one in this country has the slightest desire to crush it. Organized labour does exist and the movement of trades unions and international bodies of organized labour is recognized by men in all walks of life as one of the best agencies for regulating the relationship that should properly exist between the working man and his employer that has ever come into existence. That movement is recognized. But what I now refer to in connection with the Winnipeg strike so-called and the relationship it bore to organized labour—my hon. friend the member for Kenora-Rainy River understands organized labour and I think he will agree that I also understand something of the subject—is a situation which prevailed in the western and northwestern parts of the United States, very largely through western Canada, and to some degree through eastern Canada although not to so great an extent. There was a movement beginning in 1914 and extending through 1915, 1916, 1917, and onwards of what was known as the I.W.W., later as it developed in Canada known as O.B.U. or One Big Union. It was a movement of a revolutionary character not designed to improve the conditions of labour, as I will show in a few minutes very definitely and clearly, but designed to seize the government, first of municipalities, then of provinces, or states, and then the entire nation as has been done in Russia. That movement was spreading throughout western Canada. The representatives of organized labour, the representatives of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers—of which my hon. friend is a member—the representatives of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engine Men and Firemen—of which I have been and still am a member—knew what was taking place. The representatives of the Order of Railway Conductors, of the Order of Telegraphers, and the Order of Machinists, knew what was taking place. They knew that their powers were being definitely undermined by the One Big Union, and for what purpose? Was it to improve the conditions of the working man either in this country or any other land? No. To illustrate what their aims were, let me read a statement given to the press by the chief organizer of this movement. This is what he says:

> The true communist and labour leader rejoices more over one unsuccessful strike than over ten strikes that succeed. What the O.B.U. and smaller organizations aim to create is not asking better working conditions for the average man but worse conditions. The workingman, or organization of workingmen, who strikes for higher wages and gets them, or for better working conditions and fewer hours of labour, and gets them, is not the material from which revolutionists are made. He is likely to be contented and take a conservative so-called sane view of a world in which the conditions have been easier and better for him. On the other hand, the striker, or group of strikers, who fails, are likely to be more embittered against the employers, the whole employing class and society generally and after repeated failures of this kind they will come to the conclusion that striking and voting are alike useless to improve the workingmen's lot, and they will listen to the Red who talks intelligently of direct action and the overthrow of society and forms of government as at present constitued. We have already two million workers, members of the O.B.U., and our numbers continue to grow as one unsuccessful strike follows another. Therefore, we, of the new vision, encourage strikes not because we desire to better the workingmen's conditions but in order that they may fail.

Now I draw the attention of the hon. member to this:

> Our first aim must be to destroy organized labour as it has previously existed. It is one of the chief obstacles to a successful revolution in any country where it exists.

That is the statement made by Mr. Fred G. Biedenkapp, General Organizer for the One Big Union, an organization responsible for the so-called Winnipeg strike.

Mr. HEENAN: When was that statement made?

Mr. NICHOLSON: In June, 1919. One thing more in regard to the position taken by organized labour in Canada. The president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Fireman and Engine Men, the chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the president of the Order of Railway Conductors, the heads of the trainmen, telegraphers, and machinists,—what did they do? Let me ask the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River what they did in Winnipeg.

Mr. HEENAN: I will tell you.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will tell my hon. friend if he will just keep quiet for a moment.

Mr. HEENAN: I thought you asked me a question.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What did they do? This is what they did. They ordered their Canadian vice presidents, or the general chairmen of the organizations of the different lines, to go to Winnipeg and tell the members of their organizations to observe not only the law of their own constitutions but the law of the land in which they were living. One of those men who went to Winnipeg at that time was the more recent Minister of Labour, the Hon. James Murdock. Another one, if my memory serves me, was a gentleman named Mr. Kennedy, who was a former resident of the city of Kenora, the vice-president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. Another one was the vice-president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen. Another step they took was to warn their members about having anything to do with this so-called strike—which was nothing more or less than a revolution which began by seizing the civic government of the city of Winnipeg, what did they say? They said: Any single member of these organizations that violates his obligations to his organizations or the law of the land, will be replaced by members of our own organizations. That is the position they took. Let me repeat that the whole plan of the Winnipeg strike was nothing more or less than the outcome of a scheme that had been growing and developing through the western and northwestern states, and through western Canada, the first purpose of which was to destroy organized labour, as the organizer of the movement himself so declared in a statement given to the Chicago Times in June, 1919.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. gentleman asked me a question. Does he want me to answer it now?

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member for East Algoma wish to allow the question?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, Mr. Speaker. I simply put a question which I answered myself and I think I answered it completely.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member proceed with his speech, or has he completed what he desires to say?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am through.

SUPPLY—RED LAKE MINING AREA

Mr. J. R. O'NEILL (North Timiskaming): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few short remarks on a matter of keen interest to mining investors in the north country and to the mining industry throughout Canada—this by way of attracting the attention of the present administration and of the Minister of Mines (Mr. Stewart) in particular. Within the past few weeks the malicious statements of an unscrupulous individual named Braun, have been receiving considerable publicity, and his prevarications are hampering the advent of would-be investors and are proving most irritating to those who have every just faith in our wonderfully gifted north country. There is every reason to conclude that Braun's propaganda is inspired by some selfish and insidious element. I feel justified in using the term "insidious," otherwise they would not have chosen such a mountebank as their mouthpiece. His remarks are ostensibly so stupid, so asinine, so idiotic, as not to merit consideration but, as I say, for the ramifications of the widespread publicity due to this apparent backing, and in the interests of those who might be deceived, we cannot allow the incoherent observations of this gross libeller to pass unchallenged.

Now, just what is this man guilty of? What has he said? What has he done? He is credited by the Associated Press with statements against the possibilities of the Red Lake mining area, and is falsely reputed to be an engineer of standing. For some mysterious reason his libelous utterances have been accorded an unusual amount of publicity. I might quote from several typical articles to demonstrate this man's lack of knowledge and disregard for the truth.

Mr. G. C. Bateman, of the Ontario Mining Association, is one of the many outstanding and reliable professional men who have endeavoured to gather some information regarding Mr. Braun and I should like to quote from a reply to his inquiry from Mr. James O. Handy, Director of Chemical and Metallurgical Investigations at the Pittsburgh Testing Laboratory:

> Replying to your letter of May 14, I have done my best to get for you all of the information I could concerning W. F. Braun, an interview with whom appeared in the Pittsburgh Sun of May 12.
> Mr. Braun is not known to me, nor to any of my friends whom I have asked about him, so far. He is not a member of the Engineers' Society of Western Pennsylvania, which includes nearly all of the mining engineers, and engineers in other lines, in the Pittsburgh district. He is not a member of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers.
> In view of these facts, it can hardly be said that Mr. Braun speaks for Pittsburgh, or for the mining engineering profession at large. Such a wholesale condemnation of a new mining district is certainly not warranted, in view of the action of the Dome and McIntyre companies. Anyone who expected to find gold, on unstaked claims covered by snow, or to acquire staked claims cheaply, would naturally be disappointed.
> I have personally great faith in gold mining in Ontario, and am actively engaged in the development in Davis township, Ontario, about which I spoke to you last fall. The gold showing is very good, and I believe that further work will show that the Wanapitei district is worthy of further and very serious consideration.

Every effort has been made, in vain, to prove him anything other than a nonentity.

He has succeeded however in demonstrating himself a multitudinous ass by the very fatuity of his statements. It is a fact that he is unknown to any governmental mining authority, federal or provincial in any part of Canada, and was never heard of until he permitted his name to be used in the scandalous and libelous utterances which he fathered.

We have the sworn statement from Capt. A. S. Stevens, of Cobalt, Ont., that Mr. Braun stated to him on April 6, 1926, that he had not been in the Red Lake district personally, but had a representative in the district. If this be true, then the falsity of his statements establishes him as an unprofessional, unethical and unreliable charlatan, and whose business card, as follows, further suggests the character of the man:

215 Cole Building
Tulsa, Okla.

P. O. Box 633
Tuscon, Arizona.

W. F. Braun
413 Union Bank Building
Pittsburgh, Pa.

Personal Examinations and Confidential Reports

Made on private or public inspection of mining and oil properties, any part of United States, Canada or Mexico. Thirty-three years actual field experience in above countries. Best of references. Member Tucson Chamber of Mines, American Association of Engineers, Tulsa, Okla. Chapter and other similar organizations.

Chamber of Commerce, Pittsburgh, Pa.

His statements are in direct contradiction to the judgment of engineers, who are professional men representing large financial interests and who are firmly established in their profession as men of character and reliability, which is the result of a thorough training in their profession and a reputation for integrity and character following a long experience in the mining industry.

In view of the fact that the press of America, represented by such journals as the New York Times, the New York World, the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, the Washington Evening Star, and in fact the leading newspapers of the United States, published articles for several weeks setting forth the possibility of the Red Lake district—through their chosen representatives—being another development similar to those which have already established their reputation for the production of great wealth as set forth in the Dominion and provincial reports, it is felt that they will appreciate this defence of the mining industry and the men who have identified themselves with its development in the province of Ontario.

In view of the methods employed by this man in practising his deception upon the section of the press which has published his articles through his arrangement for personal interviews, it is felt that the journals upon whom he has practised his deception will recognize an inspired propaganda of such a character as will suggest to them the necessity for an exhaustive inquiry and examination of any statements which may be submitted to them in the future before permitting themselves to further the ends of the man, or men, who may be responsible for this activity as evidenced by Mr. Braun.

As further evidence of this man's statements as to his having been in Red Lake being false, a telegram received from Mr. Joe Kenneally, at Hudson, dated May 15, 1926, is herewith quoted:

Have consulted all stopping places and transportation companies, including plane service. No one here ever saw or heard of Braun except through paper.

In connection with the disparaging and untruthful statements made by one W. F. Braun, designating himself as a "mine examiner," a number of men who have been in Red Lake district, brand as false in every detail the statements which he is reported to have made, and which have been published in some of the leading journals of the American press, for the following reasons:

1. We believe that Braun never visited the Red Lake district, as he states he did—and further states, that he remained in the district ninety days—basing our belief upon an affidavit made by Capt. A. S. Stevens, of Cobalt, that Braun made declaration to him that he had not been in the district, but had a representative there.

2. No man has driven into the district with eleven dogs as he states he did, and no man could leave the district in the dead of winter via aeroplane without the authorities having knowledge of this fact.

3. None of the undersigned ever heard of him, and there is no record, as evidenced by inquiries made through Mr. Joe Kenneally, that he was ever in the district, and no one ever saw him, or heard of him, until they read the articles above referred to.

There are hardships to be borne by the pioneers who go into a new country, and Red Lake is no exception to this experience, but none of the hardships as portrayed in his articles. There is no shortage of food, and with the breaking up of winter and the opening up of water transportation there will be assured shipments that will meet the demand of the men who are now there and of those who will go into the district this year. The properly constituted authorities have not and will not delegate their responsibilities for the welfare and safety of those who prospect and mine in the north country.

His false and ignorant statements regarding the geological and economic conditions in Red Lake district stamp him as totally unreliable and devoid of character or knowledge, and how the statements of such a man can be accepted and published by responsible journals is beyond the conception of the men who are carrying on the pioneer developments in the new field of Ontario's great mineral wealth. The statement of these men who know the district goes on to say:

> We are basing our activities upon the findings of expert opinion, both official and private, and upon a wide experience in the important work of prospecting a country for economic deposits of ore, which will increase the wealth of the province and the Dominion, and resent keenly the reflection upon the character and integrity of the men who have devoted their lives to this great industry, and more especially through the inference that there is no protection and that there has been no effort upon the part of the proper authorities to safeguard in every way possible the interests of those who are interested in mining in northern Ontario.

I have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, the names of men who have been in this district and who endorse as true the facts appearing in the statement. With the consent of the House I would like to place them on Hansard. The names are as follows:

Geo. McNeely, Haileybury.
H. B. Mullins, Hudson.
M. Williamson, Cobalt.
J. L. Sweet, Cobalt.
Joe McDonough, Ottawa.
D. Ciinas Giniriay, Ottawa.
J. E. McDonough, Ottawa.
Walter J. D. Penly, Cobalt.
Peter McDonough, Cobalt.
R. J. Jowsey, Ottawa.
Digby Grimstom, Timmins.
H. I. Lynell, Winnipeg.
Chas. H. Lynell, Winnipeg.
Finlay MacCallum, Winnipeg.
H. E. Owens, So. Porcupine.
J. A. Davidson, Toronto.
Jno. W. Callinan, Toronto.
G. MacGregor, Toronto.
Alex Gillies, Toronto.

When you try to realize, Mr. Speaker, what a producing mining area, particularly at this location, will mean to our great railway systems, to the country as a whole, and particularly to the vicinity of Winnipeg, which has come in for so much adverse criticism to-night, I feel quite justified in taking advantage of the publicity following a statement in this House. I feel that the men in the north country have every justification in being incensed at any attempt to malign their efforts or to defame this wonderfully promising area. Besides, there are hundreds of intrepid prospectors, the noblest and pluckiest fellows in the world, braving the elements, risking their lives and spending their all, drawn on by some inscrutable and irresistible impulse, year in and year out, in the interests of mining which means so much to mankind, and it is easy to imagine how they resent the lying criticism of a mercenary and misinformed charlatan.

[Mr. O'Neill.]

We need capital to open up our country and to develop our natural resources. Every man in the north country welcomes United States capital. I know all hon. members will agree with me when I say that every effort should be made by the federal and provincial authorities to see that capital will receive just protection and encouragement in Canada. Braun's statements bear the opposite implication and should be refuted from every angle. For the sake of international courtesy and good-will, I trust the press will give similar publicity to this disclaimer as to the meretricious fabrications of this gypsy geologist.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): The hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. O'Neill) asked me as coming from northern Ontario to give him some support in the remarks which he has just made. I am pleased to do so in view of the fact that that great section of northern Ontario has, I think, been slandered by this man Braun. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) who acts as Minister of Mines, is not in his seat, and I should like to draw to his attention the remarks of the hon. member for North Timiskaming. No doubt the Department of Mines has reports upon the Red Lake district which, according to the statement of my hon. friend, has been slandered, and I am sure those reports would show that the statements of this man Braun are gross exaggerations and slanders upon that district. It is in the interest of the Dominion of Canada that statements such as Braun has made should not go unchallenged, and I believe the Minister of Mines would be well advised if he looked or had one of his officials look into them and if possible issue an official statement from the department as to the facts of the case. I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who is leading the House at the moment, will draw to the attention of the Minister of the Interior the statements made by the hon. member for North Timiskaming.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Certainly.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Last week and this week in Toronto I came in touch with the Mines Department of Ontario and they are most encouraged at headquarters by the reports they receive as to the coming development not only in northern Ontario, and Manitoba, but all round that country. My feeling—and I think it is more or less correct—is that from now on we shall see in this country a mining exploration and development almost unequalled in the history of the world. It will not be confined to one province, but it will include Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and right across the continent. While the west has its wealth of farms with grain, cattle and all that sort of thing, a new and greater revival of business is coming to this country based on its mining wealth in the north.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee of Supply, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely the government is not seriously proposing to open up new business now.

Mr. BOIVIN: Just one item to have it said that we went into Supply.

Public Works—chargeable to income—New Brunswick, public buildings, $51,000.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): This is a small item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How are the appropriations not required made up?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The statement is as follows:

APPROPRIATIONS NOT REQUIRED 1926-27

New Brunswick

Moncton—Public building..	$100,000
St. John quarantine station—dwelling for engineer..	5,000
Shediac—public building..	8,000
	$113,000

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps we can let this item pass and go home.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lapointe moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the business for Friday?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Third readings of Bill No. 114, to amend the Customs tariff, 1907, and Bill No. 115, to amend the Special War Revenue Act; second reading of Bill No. 116, to amend the Income War Tax Act, 1917; second reading of Bill No. 150, respecting the Chicoutimi Harbour Commissioners; second reading of Bill No. 152, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act; second reading of Bill No. 153, to amend the Criminal Code; consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, to amend the Immigration Act. If we go into Supply we will take up the estimates of the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Public Works.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m., until Friday, June 4.

Friday, June 4, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Mr. W. F. KAY (Brome-Missisquoi) (for Mr. Parent) presented the fifth report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

GOVERNMENT LOAN

AUTHORITY TO RAISE A SUM NOT EXCEEDING $150,000,000

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the raising, by way of loan, under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, by the issue and sale or pledge of securities of Canada such sum or sums of money as may be required, not to exceed in the whole the sum of one hundred and fifty million dollars, for paying or redeeming or otherwise retiring the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada and for public works and general purposes, the principal and interest to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask my hon. friend to give us a few more particulars as to what is to be done in connection with this money—in short, how much money is required for retirement of loans, what loans will be retired, and how much is needed for public works and general purposes?

Mr. ROBB: I will have that information for my hon. friend on Monday when I move the resolution. I noticed, on receiving a copy of the order paper, that there had been inserted in the resolution "for public works and general purposes," and that was not intended.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That struck me as being a little off.

Motion agreed to.

RURAL CREDITS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): On January 8, I placed a resolution on the order paper having reference to rural credits. The government having taken kindly to the suggestion and having introduced a bill in harmony with the terms of the resolution, and as the resolution occupies a page and a half of the order paper, I ask leave to withdraw the resolution and save a few dollars or a few cents in printing costs.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent of the House.

Resolution withdrawn.

CUSTOMS INQUIRY COMMITTEE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I hear some reports of the government preparing for an early prorogation. I have no information personally as to when the report of the investigation into the Customs department will be brought in, but I express the hope and indeed I assume, that there will be no thought of arrangements for prorogation without providing the most ample time for the receipt of and discussion of that report.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Certainly, that is taken for granted, I think.

SENATE REFORM

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if there is to be any action taken this session with respect to Senate reform? If not, when is the next move to be made in this direction and of what character?

Mr. JACOBS: At the next sitting of the House.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say to my right hon. friend that the government would not like to prolong the session unduly by introducing the subject of Senate reform at this stage. My right hon. friend may be sure it will come up in due course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like to know further, if it is the intention of the government to call a provincial conference on the subject this summer.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not say just when but no doubt a conference will be held.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before another session?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would not say as to that.

NORTH ATLANTIC COMBINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Referring to the subject of the Richmond Hill speech of my right hon. friend, is any action to be taken this session with reference to destroying or otherwise impairing the North Atlantic Combine, or any other monopoly by land or sea?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is for the Montreal meeting. Keep something for the meeting.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No answer.

WATER RIGHTS IN RAILWAY BELT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of the Interior relating to the administration of water in the railway belt in British Columbia, based on the following information:

In 1912 a Railway Belt Water Act was passed—amended in 1913—under which the Dominion practically transferred to the province the administration of water in the railway belt.

The 1913 act provided that all water within the railway belt should, during the pleasure of the Governor in Council, be administered under the water acts of the provinces in force at that time and it was further provided that the Governor in Council might direct that any act or portion thereof passed by British Columbia after March 3, 1913, relating to water in the province should apply to the water in the railway belt as if such act were enacted by the parliament of Canada. However such order in council had to be published for four consecutive weeks in the Canada Gazette and laid before both houses of parliament within the first fifteen days of the session next after the date thereof and such order in council was to remain in force only until the day immediately succeeding the prorogation of that session of parliament, unless during the session it was approved by resolution of both houses of parliament.

Has the procedure outlined in the aforementioned act been complied with to ensure to licensees valid titles to water in the railway belt of British Columbia? If not what is the position of the licensees of water in the railway belt in British Columbia?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I hope on Monday to introduce a bill covering all the questions asked by my hon. friend. The bill is amending legislation which will cover in full all those questions.

IMPERIAL PENSIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I desire to call the attention of the government, and particularly the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, to a return brought down in sessional paper number 155, and bearing reference number 48, relating to the administration of imperial pensions by the Canadian government. This return is clearly incomplete. It contains a copy of a memorandum or letter delivered by the deputy minister in London to the Ministry of Pensions in October, 1925, and the memorandum refers to a letter received from the Minister of Pensions dated July 13, 1925, and to a memorandum accompanying the same. There is no copy of either the letter or memorandum in this return of the date I have mentioned, July 13, 1925. I ask that that be brought down as soon as possible.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): I have no knowledge in connection with the matter but I will be very glad to make inquiry and obtain the information.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE—SHIPMENT OF CATTLE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): In reference to the shipment of 116 head of cattle from the experimental farms, by the Donaldson line steamship Carma, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) why the Canadian Government Merchant Marine was not used for this purpose?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I have no detailed knowledge of the incident to which my hon. friend refers. We did send some cattle overseas but as to the exact number, the boat carrying them and date of sailing I have no details. If my hon. friend will put his question on the order paper full details will be supplied.

APPOINTMENT OF E. J. SEXSMITH

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I promised the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) that I would give him an amended answer to his question regarding E. J. Sexsmith. I observe the hon. member is not in his seat but I will put the answer on Hansard. I find that I cannot file the amended answer, and therefore I will give it verbally:

Question 5.—Was E. J. Sexsmith appointed on his merits after competitive examination?

The answer is: there was no examination.

Question 6.—If not, on whose recommendation was he appointed?

The answer is that the appointment was made by the department and is of a temporary character for the purpose of endeavouring to secure repayment of loans issued to Indian soldier settlers.

Mr. HOCKEN: How many?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who nominated him?

SINGLE TRANSFERABLE VOTE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I think the leader of the opposition has overlooked one great piece of legislation, and I would be interested in knowing what the future of that will be. I refer to the single transferable vote. Will there be legislation this session or at some subsequent session in regard to that?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend that the government would not care to introduce one piece of legislation dealing with elections without taking up the general question of amending the Elections Act. As the government is not contemplating a general election before another session, we thought amendments to the Elections Act might well stand over till next year. If hon. friends really feel concerned about holding an election, we can still arrange to bring in amendments to the law respecting elections.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I take it as an intimation that the single transferable vote will be introduced next session?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Speaking for myself, I may say that I am doing missionary work in favour of the measure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Minister of Justice explain, in view of the previous commitment of the government with regard to the measure, with whom he is doing the missionary work?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, with the other side.

Mr. HOCKEN: How is the hon. member getting along?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Poorly.

WHITE BEAR INDIAN RESERVE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I desire to draw the attention of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs to the contents of a communication I have received from the residents of my constituency concerning conditions in the White Bear Indian reserve, near Arcola. This is written by the secretary of the Arcola presbytery of the United Church of Canada, and with the permission of the House I will read the communication. It is as follows: the House of Commons, Ottawa.

To the Honourable,

We the presbytery of Arcola, in the United Church of Canada, deeply concerned about the physical condition of the Indians, on the White Bear reserve, wish to draw the attention of your honourable House to these conditions, that they may be materially improved. All told there are some 235 persons on the reserve, a large number of these are suffering from physical ailments, such as discharging ears, inflamed eyes, diseased tonsils and adenoids, and especially tuberculosis, and while the medical officer is doing all he can to minister to the bodily needs of the ailing, much more needs to be done.

There is quite a number of Indians on the reserve who are tubercular some of these quite advanced, and there is practically nothing being done for them, or to prevent the spread of that scourge. On a recent visit, by some members of this presbytery it was found, that several persons, advanced in years, werein the last stage of consumption, and they had neither suitable food, or nursing, or dwelling place, and know nothing of the precautions necessary to prevent the spread of the disease.

We are aware that there are four government hospitals in the province for the care of diseased Indians, and four nurses to attend to the physical well being of the people. And while appreciating the occasional visits of Nurse Colvin to the White Bear reserve, we desire to point out, that the tie which binds Indian parents and children together is so strong that the former will not permit the latter to enter a hospital, or sanatarium, and all indian adults have such a dread of chloroform, that they are evidently unwilling to enter a hospital for treatment.

We are strongly of the belief that the Indians on the White Bear reserve need in the worst way, a resident nurse, to see to it, that those suffering from any disease have the treatment which the medical officer prescribes, so that they may have a chance to get well. At the present time, as things are, many of them are doomed to die for lack of a trained nurse, to administer medicine and give necessary nursing.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Of the 64 houses on the reserve, ten have a shingle roof, others have sods or clay, which cannot keep out rain.

He goes on to tell about the tubercular patients sleeping on the floor under these conditions. He then says:

In several of these one-roomed houses, two families or more try to live together. Only two families on the reserve keep pigs or poultry, only one man keeps cows, and the children being raised without milk suffer seriously from malnutrition.

I would ask the minister, first, whether he is aware of the existence of these conditions and if so what explanation he can give. Secondly, if he is not aware of this state of affairs, can I have his assurance that he will properly investigate the subject and, in the event of the conditions being found to be as outlined in this communication, that some steps will be taken immediately to afford the necessary relief?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Superintendent General of Indian Affairs): I have no doubt that the allegations contained in the letter my hon friend has read are correct so far as tuberculosis is concerned. This is a disease which is very prevalent amongst the Indian tribes, and it is one which it is difficult to combat for the very reason outlined in that letter, namely, that the Indians will not leave their homes to go to the hospitals provided for the care of such patients. To establish on each reserve a hospital for this special purpose is out of the question; it would be too expensive. I think I can assure my hon. friend that the commissioner at Regina is fully aware of the conditions on these reserves particularly in Saskatchewan. Recommendation for a nursing staff was made some three years ago, and four nurses are now travelling through the provinces examining Indian children and giving such relief as they can. I am informed that this work has been very beneficial to the Indians, and good progress is being made. It would be idle to deny that there is a great deal of tuberculosis among the Indians, not only in the western provinces but throughout Canada. It is a very serious problem for the department. That, I think, is all I can say in reply to my hon. friend.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have allowed the reading of this lengthy letter, but such permission must not be taken as a precedent.

I realize that there is urgent need for help, the Indians being after all more or less minors and wards of the government. No debate, however, may ensue. The matter is one for the department.

Mr. HOCKEN: Would not this be a suitable case for a special investigation that might prolong the temporary employment of Mr. Sexsmith?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The hon. gentleman must really be joking, because Mr. Sexsmith, however estimable an individual he may be, does not possess any medical knowledge so far as I know.

WAR REPARATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): I want to ask the Secretary of State whether it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation this year to provide for the diverting of money received under the Dawes plan to the civilian population who suffered during the war. Legislation was introduced last year but upon some opposition being shown by the other side it was rather hastily withdrawn. The matter has not been taken up since and unless legislation is introduced this year it will mean that for another year those people who have suffered grievously will not receive any compensation. In the meantime the government will have this money in their possession.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Secretary of State): There is no intention of introducing such legislation. As a matter of fact the work of investigating the claims which have been sent in is not yet completed, and then it will be a question of policy as to the distribution of the money that comes to this country under the Dawes reparation scheme. I remember the legislation introduced last year, mention of which has been made by the hon. gentleman. The object of that legislation was to empower the government to distribute the money among the various claimants, and it it was contested more generally I think than my hon. friend suggests; I believe the criticism came from all sides of the House. It was contended that we ought to consider very carefully the question whether the country itself should not retain at least part of the money for reparation of losses and damage sustained by the nation as well as by private individuals. However, the matter will have to be determined when the investigation is completed.

QUEBEC FORTIFICATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I desire to call the attention of the government and particularly of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald, Antigonish) to a condition in the city of Quebec to which reference has been made in the press. It is alleged that the walls and fortifications of Quebec are in imminent danger of falling and of causing, in such a fall, serious damage to life and property. It is also alleged that the walls under the care of the federal government are in a filthy, disreputable and dangerous condition. I would ask the minister if he has any knowledge of these conditions and if he has any intention of effecting a remedy.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): The situation in regard to the walls of the citadel at Quebec is this. From a military standpoint the citadel has become entirely obselete and the department has no great interest in maintaining it as a matter of defence. The ground, however, is of great historic value and we feel that the city and province of Quebec might well share in whatever the Dominion government might do in the way of preserving the citadel as a spot of historic interest.

Conferences have been held with that end in view and estimates have been obtained as to what the cost would be of restoring the citadel and maintaining it in a proper state of repair. Those estimates show that the cost would run in the vicinity of $425,000 so that a very costly proposal has to be considered. The department at all times has been ready to confer with the city and province of Quebec as to what steps might be taken towards the preservation of this very interesting memorial of the past.

My attention has been called to a statement in the press with reference to the condition of a portion of the ramparts and what is known as Rampart street. I desire to say in answer to my hon. friend that the records of the department show that that particular street and its condition are entirely under the control of the city of Quebec which took the street over in 1922 and assumed the responsibility of looking after it in all respects. If anything is wrong in connection with that street the fault is that of the city of Quebec.

There appears in the estimates of this year an item of $10,000 which was rendered necessary in order to prevent the falling of a portion of the citadel walls which would have imperilled lives and property, and tenders have now been called for the purpose of carrying on this work as quickly as possible.

RAILWAY LEGISLATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): We have had several questions as to legislation. There is one in which I am particularly interested and to which I was looking forward with some hope. It was referred to by my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the course of his remarks. What I have in mind is the legislation to be brought down for the purpose of solving the railway problem. May I ask when that legislation may be expected and what the solution will be?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not sure that I promised legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I made a promise it will be carried out.

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1907, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 114, to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Railways and Canals—Civil government, salaries and contingencies, $260,155.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend was to give us some information on this score.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): My hon. friend wanted to know on the last occasion on which these estimates were before the committee the cost of the comptroller's branch.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The auditing.

Mr. DUNNING: The whole cost of the comptroller's branch was $82,384,59.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What did it cost in 1921 when it was looking after the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the figures for 1921. My hon. friend did not ask for that the other day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is quite true.

Mr. DUNNING: I am informed that the cost is about the same and the work is about the same as it was in 1921.

[Mr. E. M. Macdonald.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have some difficulty in accepting my hon. friend's answer and when I say some difficulty I mean considerable difficulty. In 1921 the department was actively engaged in looking after the National railways. It had its solicitors to look after it; there was this thing and that thing to be done all the time; the officials were checking accounts and the like. To-day all they are doing, as I understand the matter, is looking after the accounts of the canals. My hon. friend says that the work is about the same.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The last time the estimate was before the committee I mentioned the fact that during the time the department directly administered the railways the cost to which my hon. friend has reference was charged to the railways directly. In the old Intercolonial days, as will be remembered, that portion of the staff was very largely at Moncton. The same charges relating to accounting are made to-day with respect to the Department of Railways as were made prior to 1921. The items to which my hon. friend refers were always chargeable to railway accounts, so I am informed. The staff to-day is 103; in 1921, it was 104.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the items that now refer to the department?

Mr. DUNNING: This is a general summary of the work it is doing now which will probably satisfy my hon. friend:

The details of operation of the Canadian Government railways and the field supervision of construction and betterments were never matters dealt with in their detail by the departmental staff.

That was the point I was making.

The placing of the Canadian government railways under the National board of operation and management has occasioned no change in the administration of the Canadian Government Railways Act and the other acts prescribing the administration of similar property. The Canadian government railways continue to be operated under the government railways act, the only difference in relation to the departments being that a board of directors of the Canadian National Railways now perform the duties previously assigned to a general manager.

That is the only difference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not grasped my question. My question is: What railway work has the department now to do? What is left?

Mr. DUNNING: Railway matters dealt with by the department. I have a partial list of them before me. Those matters are: Obtaining authority of the Governor General in Council for entering into contracts for work to be carried out on the Canadian government railways, executing such contracts and recording in connection with them—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Suppose we just stop at the very first one. When the matter is left entirely in the hands of the board of directors, what is the necessity of having them do their work through this department instead of through the organization which is doing so much more?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is well aware of course that although the Canadian National Railways is a system, the different parts of it still maintain their individual entities. The title to the former Canadian government railways is still in the crown. The crown must provide the necessary funds. The same recording is necessary in the department now that the work is being carried on by a board of directors as was necessary when the same work was being performed by a general manager; the relationship of the department to the board of directors is identical with its former relationship to the general manager of the system; and financing, recording and accounting in the department is necessary just as much to-day as it was then in connection with expenditures of that kind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is quite true, Mr. Chairman, that the country still owns the national railways. It is equally true that it owns the Canadian Northern railway, the Grand Trunk railway and the rest of them; it is also equally true that so far as the Grand Trunk is concerned, its identity has to be maintained by reason of certain contractual obligations which are still outstanding. But the minister is not getting sent in particulars of Grand Trunk finance, nor particulars of all the other properties that are kept distinct, and there is no reason in the world why it should be done here. Look at the farce of the thing, Mr. Chairman, in this case the minister has absolutely nothing more to do with the contracts of the Canadian National system, having regard to the Intercolonial railway, than he has with anything else.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is wrong there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Technically so. But is my hon. friend going to say he is interfering in the busines management of the Intercolonial? If he is not so interfering, all this so-called work is unnecessary. The thing is perfectly plain and simple. We have separate identity in connection with this property; granted. We have got it separate in connection with the different component companies, many of them, and we have got it separate in connection with the Intercolonial railway. But there is no more reason why the department should be interfering with the Intercolonial—if it is interfering—than with any other part of the system. And if it is not interefering, wherein has it any more work to do in connection with contracts for the Intercolonial than it has in connection with contracts for what used to be the Grand Trunk?

Mr. DUNNING: I am a little surprised that my hon. friend does not know the situation much more intimately. As a matter of fact, while not interfering in any way with the management of the former Intercolonial railway, the Minister of Railways does have a definite responsibility with regard to that road which he does not have with respect to other parts of the Canadian National system. It still remains the property of the crown. The Minister of Railways is still responsible for its operation, and he discharges that responsibility by turning over matters of operation to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway system. He cannot, however, dissociate himself from responsibility for capital or other expenditures on the property. Under the law they must be made by the Department of Railways and Canals, and the minister is responsible in a different way in connection with that system as compared with other portions of the present National system. I agree with my hon. friend that as soon as we can get refinancing of the whole property, including the old government system, it will be desirable to have the same conditions apply to all of the different entities now comprising the National railways; but until that time comes the Minister of Railways must sign all contracts for work done on the former Intercolonial, on the former Transcontinental and on the former Prince Edward Island railway. His relationship is entirely different to the former government roads from what it is to the companies which were taken over as part of the Canadian National system. I intend, of course, as Minister of Railways, to endeavour to work towards the elimination of those conditions. But so far as the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental are concerned, may I say to my hon. friend that, since he raised the point the other day, I have looked into it, so far as my time would permit, and I find that the work of the department in relation to those roads has not changed by reason of their becoming part of the Canadian National system. The relationship is only changed in the particular to which I referred, that the former general manager is now replaced by the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, the minister is very happily confusing matters of form with matters of substance. In matters of form he is perfectly right—if he wants to go on duplicating work he can do so. He has already turned around and said to the management that they can run this government railway. And he can let them run it; or, on the other hand, he can keep up this unnecessary organization and do just what he is doing. There is no more reason in the world why there cannot be agents for the making of a contract for that purpose than there are agents for running the railway and coming to a hundred and one decisions all the time. Then my hon. friend says that there is responsibility here in the crown for capital account. Of course there is; but there is responsibility for everything in the crown. Is my hon. friend going to tell me that in connection with capital account this government has nothing to do with it, whether it be for the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Northern or any other part of the system? He will not tell me that. If he does, he is making a most extraordinary statement. The government is responsible for every single dollar of capital account. My hon. friend knows it, and he himself has said on other occasions that so far as capital account is concerned that is something this parliament is responsible for. Well, if he was right then, it is responsible for capital account in connection with Grand Trunk extensions and contracts just as much as it is here. My hon friend can say: The department takes contracts in my name. So it does. But he knows he can take contracts in the name of his agents just the same. Just simply for the purpose of keeping on this vote of $81,000 he is treating the board of directors as agents only for certain purposes, and for all other purposes he is carrying on the old machinery.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is unfair —I am sure quite unconsciously so. The $81,000 for the controller's office is for the controller and the work of his office in connection with the whole Department of Railways and Canals. If I might be permitted to say so, the argument my hon. friend last advanced, if sound, is surely an argument for an increase in the staff. If I am responsible as Minister of Railways for all the capital expenditures of the Canadian National, then naturally I require a larger staff than in former Intercolonial days when the minister was responsible only for the Intercolonial and the National Transcontinental. However, that would be a quibble.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Worse than a quibble—nonsense.

Mr. DUNNING: Then the nonsense is his.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No. My hon. friend admits that it is a quibble. I say it is worse.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a statutory duty here, and as long as the Minister of Railways feels the responsibility which he ought to feel in relation to a statute he will feel a more detailed responsibility with respect to contracts for work done on the former government railway system than he will feel with respect to those portions of the present National system which were formerly operated under private companies. I may say to my hon. friend that formerly he operated for two years or more under the system which still obtains, because it was recognized there, as it is recognized to-day, that until we can put this system together financially, these distinctions must be maintained. We must know how that property stands against which there are no mortgages and no securities, and we must know how each of the various constituent companies stands in relation to the whole. I can assure my hon. friend, however, that I will look carefully into the necessity for this in the future; he knows that I have been but a short time in the department. Since he first raised the matter, a few days ago, I have satisfied myself that this is needed for the present at least. I can further assure my hon. friend that if I find it not needed I will undertake not to spend the amount, and to reduce the staff if a reduction is possible. Further than that I cannot go at present.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says my argument was one for a larger staff instead of a smaller staff, and then he was good enough to say that his statement was a quibble. He might have gone still further and said that his statement was pure nonsense as well. The minister says that if he is responsible for the capital accounts of all these different lines he will have to add to the staff.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, the nonsense is admitted, so we will get rid of that. Then the question arises of any responsiblity for capital as to one part of the system or the other; it arises in the minister's own admission. He now shakes his head; he thinks he has it both coming and going, but things do not work that way. With regard to capital expense the government has the responsibility of seeing to it that the public moneys are not pried loose without parliamentary authority. I think my hon. friend will absolutely agree with that; capital expenditures cannot be made except by the vote of the representatives of the people, and new obligations cannot be so taken up. Does my hon. friend agree with that, or is it his view that new capital obligations can be taken on without reference to parliament? The minister has not yet made up his mind; I think we should know before this item passes, because it is a very simple thing. Will the minister tell us what his view is as to whether capital expenditures should be made and responsibilities incurred without leave of the House?

Mr. SMITH: I would like to call to the attention of the minister the railway conditions in the east, referring particularly to the railway service between Maccan and Joggin Mines, in the county of Cumberland. This line is owned by the Maritime Coal and Power Company, and has been described on various occasions as a disgrace to the community and to Canada. The country served is rich in coal, lumber and agricultural production of various kinds. Appeals have been made to me on various occasions to place this matter before the government and ask if they cannot do something to improve this service. It is quite true that this line is not owned by the Canadian National Railways, but it can be secured by them and I am told it has been offered at a very fair and reasonable price. These people have suffered for a number of years because of this inadequate service, and I would respectfully request that the minister take this under consideration in an effort to improve railway conditions in this county.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot undertake that we will purchase any more railroads at present. There are a number of ventures, large and small, in various parts of Canada, which desire to fall into the lap of the Canadian National system, one of which is the road referred to by my hon. friend. I would not like to undertake the purchase of any more railways at present; we want to see a little more of what we already have before we undertake fresh obligations in that connection. But I can assure my hon. friend that I will be very glad to look into the matter in regard to the operation of the road, and see if anything can be done. Is this line operated by the Canadian National system to-day?

Mr. SMITH: No, it is a private line.

Mr. DUNNING: Then I cannot hold out much hope to my hon. friend of any more railroads being purchased at present.

Mr. SMITH: I am informed from most reliable sources that this small line is a paying proposition and has been paying for the past number of years. It serves these mines I have spoken of and also a country rich in other resources. So far as the operation is concerned the Canadian National would not be losing by absorbing this line, which can be secured at a very reasonable figure it is said.

4 p.m.

Mr. DUNNING: There are a number of factors which have to be taken into account in considering whether a privately-owned railroad can be operated as profitably by the Canadian National system. A private road would be able to charge much more for some local rates than would be possible under the National system, and in addition they would be able to pay lower wages, generally speaking. The hon. member and those owning the road have a perfect right to put before the minister a proposal referring to the purchase of the line, and if that is done the matter will be examined from every standpoint. That would be the best course to pursue, but I cannot give my hon. friend much encouragement in the way he desires.

Mr. SMITH: I hope the minister is not insinuating that I am acting for the company in any way.

Mr. DUNNING: No; I am sorry if my hon. friend gathered that impression.

Mr. SMITH: I wish to assure him that I have no connection whatever with the company, nor have I approached the company in this matter. Indignation meetings have been held in this district because of the poor service, and I was asked to bring the matter to the attention of the minister on behalf of those living in that locality.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If the statements of the minister are correct, notwithstanding the creation of the Canadian National Railways board and the transference of the Intercolonial railway to the board for operation, we still require a duplicate organization.

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My hon. friend says not at all, but just look at these items; chief engineer; assistant chief engineer; structural engineer; travelling auditors; senior assistant engineers; draftsmen and right of way agents. Are these not the executive officers who formerly had control of the operations of the Intercolonial railway? In order that we may clear the matter up, is the House to understand that in connection with matters of bridge construction, engineering, the securing of rights of way and all these matters necessarily coming into the operation of the Intercolonial and Transcontinental railways, the Department of Railways and Canals take charge of and supervise the work, apart from the Canadian National Railways? The minister shakes his head and says no; then why this organization?

Mr. DUNNING: I explained that matter fully the other evening when we were in supply on the item; I gave a list of the employees, those exclusively connected with canals, and those who had a little to do with both canals and railways. We need engineers in connection with the canal system of the country. The list which my hon. friend read a minute ago relates to canals. If he refers to the Hansard report of the debate on the other occasion on which this matter was before the committee he will find that I gave complete details mentioning the work of every officer. In the main these officers are doing canal work. The right of way agent is doing, it is true, some railway work as well in connection with the Canadian government railways; but we need a right of way agent in connection with our canal work, especially as long as the Welland canal construction is in progress, because there are expropriation proceedings and acquirements of right of way in connection with that work. Practically all of those to whom my hon. friend has just referred are canal officers, and they are necessary in connection with the canal work, which is a very large work indeed.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Some of us have reached the conclusion, or have been led to the conclusion by statements that have been made, that the Canadian government railways were no longer under the control of the Department of Railways and Canals, but had been transferred to the Canadian railway board and had become non-political institutions. But if the minister's statement is correct, before the board of directors or the officials of the Canadian National Railways can determine any matter in relation to rights of way, the construction of bridges or the construction of branch lines and the direction in which they are to run, and so on, it must come under the direct control and supervision of the Department of Railways and Canals. Consequently we are simply retaining the dual organization. Is there any reason why these railways after they have been under this board for four years, should continue that relation any more than in the case of the Grand Trunk Railway? To say that the one is the property of the Canadian people while the other is not is pure fiction. The Grand Trunk, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific are just as much the property of the Canadian people. In what respect do they differ? Have the Canadian people no responsibility in connection with the so-called Canadian government railways that they have not in connection with the others? If there is a deficit on one, who pays it? If capital expenditure is to be made on either, who pays it? They are all a direct charge on the Canadian people, and it is purely and simply because of the maintenance of this fiction that we are unable to ascertain just what these railways are costing either to operate or to capitalize. Four years have elapsed since the last act considered necessary was passed in order to round out and complete this system, and practically four years since the present board was appointed to consolidate these railways and make them into one system. And yet to-day we are faced with the fact that the Transcontinental and the Intercolonial, with all the branch lines connected therewith, are still under the direct control of the Department of Railways and Canals, and that the Minister of Railways must, in the final analysis, be responsible for their operation. That is the conclusion from the minister's own statement.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no. I must protest at such words being put into my mouth. I have explained at least three times on this occasion, as well as on the former one, and may I say again to my hon. friend, that so far as operation is concerned they are absolutely and completely under the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway. Now is that clear? The minister has nothing to do to-day with operation. We are discussing here staff matters. The relationship of the minister to the road is the same as it formerly was, with this difference—that instead of a general manager of the former government lines there is a board of directors. That is the only difference. The departmental relationship is just the same. As to the difference between the former government lines and the lines taken over from other companies I have already dealt with that, I think, on some three occasions. And may I point out to my hon. friend that my responsibility in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific is entirely different from what it is in connection with the Canadian National Railway. It is with respect to the property in a capital sense and with respect to indebtedness in the hands of a receiver; the Minister of Railways is the receiver operating under direction from the Exchequer Court of Canada. There again the property relationship is an entirely different one. I have documents by the score to sign in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, as receiver, dealing with matters entirely different from those dealt with in any other connection, because the same matters affecting other parts of the system are dealt with by the Canadian National railway board. The same is true with reference to the Canadian government railways. The act with respect to the Canadian government railways remains to-day exactly as it was when the Canadian National Railway System was created, and it is not thought wise to change that relationship until it is possible to put the whole system together into one financial entity. So far as staff matters are concerned I can assure my hon. friend, from what I now know, that it will make very little difference after all in connection with the controlling of the railway system. We are taking now the salaries of 93 employees all told in the Department of Railways and Canals who have to do with the administration of the canal system of the country, and also such supervising of canal work as is necessary between the Canadian National Railway board and this parliament. That is what we are talking about. So far as political control of operation is concerned I object in the strongest possible terms to any such interpretation as the hon. gentleman has placed upon my words. The whole railroad system from the Atlantic to the Pacific, so far as operation is concerned, is under the control of the board of directors, and no interference of any kind occurs so far as the minister is concerned.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Just in relation to this confusion of the relationship of the roads. My hon. friend brings in the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and uses that to support an argument in connection with a similar relationship that is maintained in regard to the Canadian government railways or the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental. He again uses that argument, as was done on a former occasion, to maintain the position that because of these relationships and the act at present in existence in regard to the Intercolonial and Transcontinental it is impossible to consolidate these lines for capital purposes. Surely the minister is not going to take the position—notwithstanding the fact that he has only been in office as Minister of Railways for a comparatively short time—that the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific or the act in relation to the Intercolonial and Canadian National railways prevents action being taken that will bring the whole of these lines into one entity for financing purposes and directly under the control of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway? The fact that the minister is receiver in form —I repeat in form, and in form only—because of the peculiar conditions under which the Grand Trunk Pacific went into bankruptcy, does not entitle him to take the stand that he does. Why was the receivership created? Because the Canadian people were, in reality, those who foreclosed. The government of Canada were the only individuals that could establish a receivership. It was to protect their own investments or guarantees that the road was taken over. But surely my hon. friend does not mean to tell us that now, after a lapse of four or five years, that condition maintains and that the railways must be continued as separate entities and financed in the confusing manner in which they are at present. I take it it is not in order at this time to discuss the capital expenditure in connection with these railways, but when the proper item comes up we shall see the direction in which this leads. With regard to the political operation, the minister says that the only difference at present is that the board of management or board of directors are taking the place of general manager, and that the minister occupies the same position he formerly did. That is exactly the point I make. The minister gave directions to the general manager as to what the policy in relation to the railway should be, and if the same relationship now exists, then the present ministry gives directions to the board of directors as to policy.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is again putting words into my mouth. The whole point arose out of the hon. member for West York endeavouring to show that the Department of Railways and Canals could get along with a smaller staff. So far as the staff relationships are concerned the position is as I have indicated. It is not that the Minister of Railways dictates policies to the management of the railway. I shall say no more about it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I resent the assertion that I twisted anything or put anything in the mouth of the minister. I took the minister's own words, namely, that the only change in relationship was that the board of directors took the place of the general manager. Is that an unfair statement of the minister's position?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Did the minister not say that the only change was that the board of directors took the place of general manager?

Mr. DUNNING: So far as staff relationships and control are concerned.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What other relationships are there? If the board of directors occupy the same position in regard to staff relationship and control as the general manager formerly did, am I twisting it when I say that the minister is now in the same relationship to the board of directors as he was to the general manager?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, you are.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then I cannot understand the English language or the interpretation of the minister's language. His position was perfectly clear.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend knows perfectly well what the position is. He can go on talking, but I do not think I need talk. The committee understands the position perfectly.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I frankly confess that before the minister spoke, and before he stated that it required the same expenditure and the same staff now as it formerly did, because of the same relationship existing, I had been under the impression that the relationship had changed. But it is on the strength of the minister's own statement that I take the position I do. Going back to the question of capital expenditure, while the minister and the government must be responsible, in so far as the expenditure itself is concerned, its authorization and administration, so long as it remains in the hands of the minister and of the government, political interference with the railways will continue and the severance of that relationship cannot be put into complete practice. That is the position.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has not told me yet what his views are as to whether or not we have any parliamentary control of the capital accounts of the railway generally, and whether in his view capital expenditure can be or ought to be entered into without the authority of a vote of this House?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has stated his question in three different forms, or has asked three different questions—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am trying to get an answer.

Mr. DUNNING: —each of which would really demand a separate answer. If my hon. friend asks whether the railways can make any capital expenditures without coming to parliament, my answer would be yes, because if it were necessary to come to parliament for authority with respect to every expenditure on capital account we could not run a railway; my hon. friend knows that as well as I do. But if my hon. friend's question is, can the railroad, without coming to this House or without the authority of the minister or the government, undertake capital expenditures which mean entirely new obligations, then my answer is no. He stated it both ways, and is probably trying to get me to say something I do not mean.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is difficult to get the minister to say anything at all, except to make a speech. We cannot get him to answer a question. We would make better headway if the minister would answer the questions instead of making speeches. But it is his privilege to make a speech. If I put it in three different ways, it was an effort to get an answer. We have got an answer. My hon. friend is very much pleased with the answer, and so am I, and his laughter is very well timed. He has given a proper, sensible and correct answer. He has referred to the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company as one of the difficulties he meets with, and is referring to that in connection with the staff and the vote. My hon. friend is shaking his head. I do not know what he means. I think he referred to it as an argument in connection with his vote. Perhaps he merely referred to it as something nice to talk about. If he referred to it in connection with this vote—and we are on it now—I think we ought to know when the receivership is going to stop. If I remember rightly, we have had a receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific for about six years. Is that job not pretty well wound up by this time? What is the difficulty in winding up the receivership now? Why should he be troubled with all the papers he has to sign? Can we not relieve him of that obligation?

I sympathize with him, but can we not get rid of that receivership now? Receiverships usually are not perpetual, and I think this has run about six years, perhaps not quite that long. Let us get rid of it and save money. What does the minister say as to the receivership?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend complains about my making a speech in answer to his question, and yet he asks a question which could not be answered in a speech of less than half an hour.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not know that, but I am prepared to listen.

Mr. DUNNING: There are some questions which cannot be answered yes or no. For instance, if I asked him when he stopped beating his wife—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Cannot the minister ask something fresher than that old chestnut?

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific receivership, I do not think we would gain anything by discussing the Grand Trunk Pacific situation at this stage. My hon. friend is as fully aware of the difficulties as I am, and I dealt with the matter fully when the railway budget was before the House. With regard to the general question I am just as anxious as anyone else to have a financial structure created in the shortest possible time for the railway system which will enable it to become, if not at once, at least in the course of time, a financial entity. But I want to tell him what he knows, that that is no light task. It is one of the most complex matters possible, and I assure him that I do not want to be badgered into making decisions too hastily in regard to the course which should be taken. It requires very great consideration and study, not only to choose the right course but to get a complete understanding of all the complexities. I endeavoured to outline the situation when I presented the railway budget. I take it he wants an assurance from me that we are going ahead to do the best we can. I give him that assurance with pleasure. Beyond that I do not think we should go at present.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When does the minister think we should discuss the Grand Trunk Pacific matter? Of course he could have told us some of the matters connected with it; for instance he could say, "Such an account is unadjusted; there is a disputed balance in another account, and so on, and we think all these things might be got rid of in time. It is not necessary to make a speech on the question of the Grand Trunk Pacific receivership. I should have thought most matters in dispute outside of the difficulties my hon. friend has in connection with payment of deferred accounts have gone. Unless my hon. friend says so, of course I do not know. When does my hon. friend think he should give us the information as to the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific? Under what item should it come? I shall be glad to postpone the discussion until then.

Mr. DUNNING: When the main estimates, which are now before the special committee on National Railways and Shipping, of which my hon. friend is a member, are before the committee, when we reach the necessary provision for the Grand Trunk Pacific account, that is the proper place to get details in regard to it. I did not expect to reach those estimates to-day and I have not the detailed information in regard to the matter, but it can be inquired into before the special committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want to press my hon. friend further with regard to that. What railway accounts does this staff take cognizance of and take into its books?

Mr. DUNNING: We have five men on the auditing staff of the Department of Railways and Canals. They have of course to do the usual departmental auditing in connection with canal work. A great deal of work is going on in connection with the construction of the Welland ship canal and this requires work of that character. Their relationship to the railways is that they are required to audit the disbursements of all sums paid out by certificate signed by the Department of Railways and drawn on the Minister of Finance, charging them to whichever of the constituent companies payment is to be made. If payment is to be made to the Canadian Northern, the disposition of it along that line must be audited by our officials. If the disposition is to the Canadian government railway account within the Canadian National system, a certification is required to that effect, and so on all along the line. That is not heavy work. The best evidence of that is the fact that in the whole department we have only five men doing that work in addition to auditing the big expenditures on canals.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know exactly what my hon. friend calls heavy. We used to be told that we were very extravagant in our administration. If the hon. gentleman had been here in 1921 he would have thought it was simply terrible the way the finances of the country were being run.

Mr. DUNNING: I did think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That being so, I am glad to draw something to my hon. friend's attention before he completes his smile. This vote in 1921 was only $194,162 at a time when my hon. friend on his own statement thought money was being thrown away. If it was throwing away money to pay out $194,162 for salaries in 1921, what does my hon. friend say now when he wants a vote of $28,000 greater? If my hon. friend is serious—and I assume he is—when he thinks that the votes of 1921 were entirely too great, how does he justify a much greater vote at the present time?

Mr. DUNNING: There is one less of a staff now than there was when my hon. friend was Minister of Finance in 1921. The increase is entirely due to reclassification which my hon. friend well knows is under the control of the Civil Service Commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend must know he is wrong when he says that is entirely under the control of the commission. The minister can always decline; he can always refer back. How much is now being annually paid in connection with this service for pensions and superannuation?

Mr. DUNNING: That is under the Department of Finance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely the department knows. Other departments know. Only the other day we had this up in the Department of Customs and I got my answer without any difficulty. When we talk about comparing costs and when we have people who have been newly appointed at lower salaries than the former ones were receiving, it is also proper to know what it is costing us in getting rid of the former employees. This information is said to be in the Department of Finance. I wonder whether out of the staff of accountants we have in the Department of Railways, costing us $81,000 a year, the truth is that they do not know what is being charged in connection with their department under superannuation and pensions. There are other departments with smaller staffs that know. If my hon. friend wants to draw comparisons, let us get the facts. The expenditures of 1921 that he referred to as being altogether too big—

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. DUNNING: I never said any such thing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very good. Then I am entirely mistaken in my hon. friend. He thinks the expenditures of 1921 are most reasonable. He must of course when he is asking for so much more. It is a belated confession and I will let the item go through.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I ask the minister whether his department has given any attention to the needs of settlers along the line of the Greater Winnipeg water district? When the aqueduct for the supply of water to the city of Winnipeg was constructed some years ago it was found necessary to build about 93 miles of railway all the way from Winnipeg to Shoal lake on the lake of the Woods in order to construct the aqueduct. After the aqueduct was built all that was necessary was to maintain the railroad for patrolling purposes. A large number of settlers, however, had gone in along the line and they practically insisted that the railway should continue to give service. This service is being operated at a slight annual deficit. The Dominion government itself is securing from the timber lands revenues of something like $25,000 a year. The people of Winnipeg and the members of the board of the district feel that the government ought to do something to meet the operating deficit, either by way of subsidy or by way of land grants that would help out. At the present time the Greater Winnipeg water district is supplying the needs of those settlers without getting any return whatever. Has the minister considered the situation and is it possible to accede to the requests of the district that some provision should be made in the circumstances?

Mr. DUNNING: The particular case in question has been brought to my attention by several hon. members from that part of Canada; it is now before the department and I am having it looked into. I must say to my hon. friend what I said to one of the Nova Scotia members across the way a few moments ago; I cannot hold out any hope that we are buying any railways, neither would I say that it would be a good policy to commence agreeing to pay deficits on any road built by a water district or whatever organization secured a charter to build a road. I shall be glad to go into the matter with some care and see if there is any way in which the department can properly be of service in the premises.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure the minister would not care to have the Winnipeg water district pull up their road and leave these hundreds of settlers without any accommodation whatever.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course there are legal aspects to that which are now being looked into. A person who owns a road or secures a charter to build a road in this country is under certain obligations. I am not sure exactly what obligations exist in the particular case to which my hon. friend refers, and that is one of the points now under investigation.

Mr. HEAPS: The road was built for the purposes of the aqueduct and so far as Winnipeg is concerned there is no necessity for its maintenance. But the people who have settled in the area served by the road, and who have done very well at farming, are anxious to have it kept up. Other roads have received assistance from the Dominion government and it is only right that this one should be helped in the same way.

Mr. HAY: I would impress upon the minister the necessity for doing something in this connection in the interests not so much of Winnipeg as of the settlers in that district. Has the matter of a land grant been called to the minister's attention? I understand that the commission operating the railway would be satisfied with such a grant from the Dominion. There are certain lands reserved along the line for the purpose of assisting the railway in the matter of ties and timber, and the commission would be satisfied to obtain a land grant out of that reservation.

Mr. DUNNING: That is a part of the representations that have been made to me in writing and it is under consideration. I do not want to be understood as promising anything in regard to any matter involving the taking over of railways or the meeting of deficits in connection with any line not now operated by the Canadian National system. I can assure the committee that one of the greatest difficulties which the Canadian National Railways have to cope with now is the desire of people all over Canada who own private lines to get rid of them to the National system, not for the benefit of that system but in order that they may get from under obligations of their own. There are far more propositions of that kind than most people have any idea of.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister is right in that regard: these demands are frequently made and generally speaking they are not profitable. The minister touched a matter of considerable importance when he pointed out to the hon. member (Mr. Heaps) that certain obligations were involved in the taking up of rails and the stoppage of service on the one hand, and the continuing of operations on the other. I wonder whether he could arrive at some policy in this regard? Of course, it is exceedingly difficult to make an insolvent firm operate. While our idea in constructing railways is to open up the country for the benefit of the public, the promoter's idea is to make something out of such enterprise. He expects a return from his investment, and in the case of actual loss it is hard to compel operation. But if operation cannot be enforced it is difficult to see why the property should not be salvaged to such an extent as is possible. The Canadian National system itself has gone the length of lifting tracks and so discontinuing particular services. I have in mind the radials around Toronto for the purchase of which the Hydro-Electric at one time made an offer, which was refused. The radial to Woodbridge running up through the county of York has discontinued operating and the rails are about to be lifted. My hon. friend from North Winnipeg will agree that if it is proper for the Canadian National Railway to lift particular rails, simply because some service is not paying, and thus inconvenience the public, it is rather hard to complain if anyone else does the same thing. The minister perhaps will look into that.

Mr. DUNNING: I have already looked into that particular case at the request of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Lennox), although my information on the subject is as yet incomplete. Owing to representations which have been made as to the likelihood of persons desiring to purchase, the taking up of the rails has been stopped for the time being.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Suppose municipalities should offer to purchase roads which are really municipal, the government ought to be only too glad to hand them over the burden of providing the service which at present the National system cannot afford. Where the National system is unable to give service some arrangement ought to be made with the municipality.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall of course give consideration to any suggestion of that kind.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Have the board of directors or the officers of the Canadian National Railways given any real consideration to the question of duplication of lines wherever such duplication now exists? I do not want to go into details and I am not raising the question from any controversial point of view. I know what difficulties have to be encountered. I think however that very material revisions should be made before we can hope to have the Canadian National Railways operating economically. It will be admitted by the officials that there are existing lines that should be abandoned and from which rails, fastenings, and everything else that can be salvaged should be removed. This would tend to a reduction in operating costs. What position do the board of directors and the officials take in relation to that question? As one who has always taken an interest in the Canadian National Railways I have been disappointed in the fact that greater progress has not been made along that line, because we cannot hope to reach a sound economical basis of operation while unnecessary mileage is being retained as part of the Canadian National system.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DUNNING: I presume my hon. friend is going to make the same point?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I will wait until the minister is through.

Mr. DUNNING: It may mean on my part two speeches instead of one—something to which my hon. friend from York objects very much.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Now, Mr. Chairman, a real question has come up. I admit what the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has just said, that there are unnecessary duplications on the Canadian National. But there is the wider question, and this discussion gives me an opportunity to reiterate what I have said so often in this House, namely, that our two great railway systems have an enormous mileage of unnecessary duplication. When that duplication is removed by consolidating the two systems there will follow re-routing, which competent railway engineers say would save an enormous amount of money, improve the service and admit of lower freight rates. What I want to get in the minds of hon. members and of the taxpayers of this country, who have to pay $400,000,000 a year now for this unnecessary duplication, is that the railway problem before Canada to-day is not quite in the limited form in which my hon. friend from East Algoma has stated. Let me put it again before the House and before the country, and I warn hon. members that I am going to continue to do so until action is taken by those in authority. This unnecessary duplication must end, there must be a consolidation, and a new system of re-routing must follow, a system based on using the best grades, the best bridges and the best tunnels of the composite railway. I am advised that this re-routing would improve the service by 40 per cent at least. Out of the economies affected it will be possible to reduce freight rates and pay interest on the whole railway debt of Canada, which I put at $2,000,000,000—or $1,000,000,000 if you like. I do not want the minister to commit himself to my proposal to-day, but he will be unfit for his office if within a short time he does not take up this question, which if dealt with as I have pointed out would give what the farmers were crying for here the other day—lower freight rates. And with this consolidation of the two railway systems you would get a consolidation of ocean and lake services that would also contribute to the lowering of freight rates.

There has been very little courage displayed in this House in criticism of the railway problem in the direction that I have spoken of, but it is the one problem that the people are thinking about all over the country. Where these duplicate services exist you ride in half empty trains and you realize that all the passengers could be carried on one train. We find duplicate services racing up and down from here to Toronto, from here to Winnipeg, from here to Montreal. This is an insane proceeding. There is my friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) over there. He has to foot all the bills. He knows that what I say is true. He knows it is a problem that must be dealt with by this House, but the attitude of most of us is to sidestep it. The Minister of Railways is not responsible for the present condition of affairs, but he will be responsible if he attempts to sidestep the problem now that he is in a position to deal with it. He came down here as the Napoleon from the west. Now is Napoleon's opportunity. Do not let it be his Waterloo; let him think of some of Napoleon's great victories. Here is an opportunity for the new Napoleon from the west to deal with this question. Before the next general election the people will be thoroughly educated and will realize the inaction of hon. members of this House. So I warn my hon. friends and prospective members of this House that when they appeal to the country for support they will have to deal with this question. I am quite sure the Minister of Finance will force the Minister of Railways to give him some encouragement that he is taking steps to cut out this wastage. Having said that, I quit for the moment, but as a friend of mine said here the other day, when a certain gentleman down the way made a speech he was going to make another speech, I say also that it will not be long before I shall repeat what I have said in trying to emphasize the necessity of putting a stop to the present unnecessary duplication of transportation services by consolidating our two great railway systems.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay railway—construction and betterments, $3,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is not taking that up to-day, is he?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, I advised many members who asked me as to the time and date that I would take this vote up to-day. Many are here who are interested in it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Go ahead.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are very few here at present who are interested in the vote, and perhaps that is the reason why my hon. friend wants to go ahead with it. But I venture to suggest to him it is generally poor policy to do that. This supply was put on at the very tail end of a long order. At least I think it is the last. I should like to be right so I will look it up.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Usually the government are supposed to pay some attention to the order in which they announce the business of the House. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will agree with me there also. This is what we were told yesterday we were to do to-day:

Third readings of Bill No. 114 to amend the Customs Tariff 1907,—

I think that bill has been passed.

—and Bill No. 115 to amend the Special War Revenue Act;—

I do not think that has been touched.

—second reading of Bill No. 116 to amend the Income War Tax Act 1917;—

A long measure.

—second reading of Bill No. 150, respecting the Chicoutimi Harbour Commissioners; second reading of Bill No. 152, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act; second reading of Bill No. 153, to amend the Criminal Code; consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, to amend the Immigration Act.

Then merely as a possibility, not as an indication, we were told:

If we go into supply we will take up the estimates of the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Public Works.

Instead of that we are going straight ahead. I did not object to the introduction of the other item because I did not think many gentlemen wanted to speak to it, but I know a great many hon. members will speak on this item, and the notice given was merely an alternative that if this long list of business was finished and supply reached, we might go into the estimates of this department. I do not think the Hudson Bay railway vote should be proceeded with.

Mr. DUNNING: I find nothing inconsistent in our procedure to-day with the statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) on Wednesday evening; there was certainly liberty given to go into supply. My hon. friend reads a meaning which is not in the words:

If we go into supply we will take up the estimates of the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Public Works.

It was in no way contingent upon the other matters referred to going through. I did give an assurance more than a week ago to a number of hon. members on both sides of the House that to-day was arranged on this side for the debate on the Hudson Bay railway, and I am sure that hon. members interested were so advised. I think my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Hay) and others spoke to me, and I am now all prepared to deal with the matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know whether the word "if" is a conditional word or not; I had the idea that it was generally so intended. But I am not standing on anything except the ordinary usage of this House. I do not know what the practice of the hon. member may have been in Saskatchewan, whether when he gave a list he stuck to it or whether he always took the end first and otherwise tried to mislead the oposition.

Mr. DUNNING: I must protest; that is grossly unfair and unwarranted on the part of my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is nothing at all unfair. I read this list as it is printed, and I suggest that if my hon. friend's practice in Saskatchewan was to take the tail and make it the head in order to mislead the opposition, that has not been the practice in this House.

Mr. DUNNING: Again I must protest; it has not been my practice to mislead the opposition at any time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then my hon. friend should withdraw his statement and go on.

Mr. DUNNING: I think it is my hon. friend who should withdraw. Surely when a list is presented it is not obligatory upon the government to follow it in every detail. The question asked is as to the business for the next day; the business is stated in any order, and I venture to say that if I looked up Hansard I could find where my hon. friend has answered such a question in exactly the same way and then, on the succeeding day, taken up the business in whatever order suited him as the minister concerned. To attribute deceit is surely not fair.

5 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The list is exactly as I read it, with the word "if" included.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; "if" we go into supply. We are in supply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understood you were trying to clean up this order paper; the order paper is pretty well set out here, but it may be that I am wrong in my idea. I simply point out what I read before and what I read fairly, as it is printed, without anything in addition, but so far as I am concerned it is a matter for the government to do as they please.

Mr. HAY: With respect to this item, I think the minister gave notice about a week ago in answer to a question from some hon. member deeply interested in the question; the minister said this particular item would be taken up when his estimates were next under discussion. Consequently I cannot see how the House has been led astray. I see no reason why this item should not be taken up, since a good many of those chiefly interested in it are present, and I can see no cause for delay at present.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps we will be able to get some particulars here. In the first instance the country is entitled to have —whether some members and their constituents who are particularly interested in this question think so or not—a full discussion of this item, and there will be a full discussion, regardless of any efforts made to force the item through this House. We are entitled to know exactly what the governmental programme is; we are entitled to know exactly how this money is to be applied. The country is also entitled to know how much money is to be spent in carrying out the project as a whole. We have now before us a vote which, as I understand it, is for the present—I will not say requirements, because I do not know what they are, but this vote will be used during the current year. Then I think we are entitled to know whether it is contemplated to do more than complete the railway, for example, whether in the opinion of the government it will be necessary to supply boats for the service; whether, in case boats are supplied or in any event, it is in the opinion of the government necessary to protect, lighthouse and generally look after these seas in the same way other approaches are protected. We should know what the cost will be, and whether terminals are to be erected at this point. In other words, we are entitled to know the complete particulars of the full commitment.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend had put his request for a postponement of this discussion on the ground of courtesy and having regard to the fact that only some ten members of the Conservative party are present in the House on the occasion of a discussion of such importance, I would have been glad to accede to his request. But he put his request on the ground that deception was being practised, and I again call to his attention the fact that more than a week ago, when I was asked a question by an hon. member opposite, I indicated that on the next occasion we were in supply on railway estimates this matter would be taken up. In addition to that, a number of members on both sides of the House spoke to me privately about the matter, and I indicated that it would come up to-day. I quite appreciate that the empty chairs opposite do not mean that hon. gentlemen are not interested in this project and do not desire information regarding it, but they do mean that a certain meeting in Montreal is probably of more importance to them at this juncture. I am not blaming them at all, but if my hon. friend makes his request in his usual courteous manner for a postponement of this item I will be glad to report progress.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has a way with him, but I thought in the first instance that I made a very quiet request. Then I was told afterwards that I was misinterpreting the English language. I am quite content to throw myself on my hon. friend's mercy and possibly in view of the situation to-day he might adjourn the consideration of this matter.

Mr. DUNNING: We can take another item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite content. You can take another item.

Mr. DUNNING: Any other item but this.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Any other item but this.

Item stands.

Welland ship canal construction (revote, $3,000,000)—$14,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. MURPHY: I fail to understand why an item of $3,000,000 is of such importance that its consideration must be adjourned, and a vote of $14,000,000 is to go through without any discussion whatever. Possibly some hon. members can understand the matter—I cannot. If the Hudson Bay railway vote, in view of its great importance, must be adjourned in order that it may be discussed in detail, surely the House is entitled to a full explanation of a vote of $14,000,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is there anything we may take up?

Mr. DUNNING: Of course it is rather embarrassing to find that the whole proceedings of the House must be held up in order to enable a political meeting to be held in Montreal. The government has some sympathy with the point made by my hon. friend opposite that if a vote of $3,000,000 is important one of $14,000,000 is surely of greater importance. I am quite willing to permit this item also to stand until it suits the convenience of my hon. friends in Montreal.

Item stands.

Chambly, improvements (revote, $7,500)—$55,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This item calls for an explanation.

Mr. DUNNING: The items in this vote consist of the following:

Machinery	$ 2,500
Riley Bridge (Revote)	3,000
Survey (Revote)	2,500
Wharf	45,000

The upper western bank of Chambly canal within the limits of the city of St. John's forms a landing wharf, a portion of which was rebuilt in concrete in 1919. The 800 odd feet of wall piling with sheating, immediately above the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge is now in a very dilapidated condition, old piles and facing having rotted and portions having been carried away. As the foundation is uneven and relatively soft at certain places, it is proposed for the present to sink a stone filled timber crib which, later, after settlement, may have the portion above water renewed in concrete.

Item agreed to.

St. Ours lock, improvements, $50,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We did not object to any of the other votes because they are old and the country is committed to them. But this is a new item and perhaps my hon. friend will explain what is contemplated.

Mr. DUNNING: The amount required here is to rebuild in part the old lock at this place, which was built during 1847-1848, the intention then being to provide for 7-foot navigation. However, during low water periods, this navigation is not available, and at times boats drawing more than 5 feet 6 inches cannot pass the lock. In 1907, the walls and mitre sills of this lock were found to be seriously undermined, and during the three following years the sum of $75,000 was expended in making repairs. At present this lock is in a worse condition than it was at that time and a certain amount of reconstruction is imperative.

Mr. HEAPS: How much navigation is there through this particular lock?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the exact figures but it is used very extensively for the transportation of lumber, coal and hay. It is on the Richelieu river.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister any idea what the revenue from this source was last year?

Mr. DUNNING: We do not have any revenue from our canals; they are free.

Item agreed to.

Baker's dam improvements, $30,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a new item also. What is the vote for?

Mr. DUNNING: To renew with concrete the cribwork facing on the east side of the channel. What is called Baker's dam, in reality guide piers on each side of Baker's channel below Ste. Anne lock, is the only passage for boats of nine feet draft plying between the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa rivers. The inner faces of the cribs, which were built in 1875, are decayed and falling down into the channel, the eastern wall being the worse of the two. It is thought necessary to rebuild immediately this eastern wall.

Item agreed to.

Ontario—St. Lawrence canals, improvements (revote $7,000), $7,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the usual vote?

Mr. DUNNING: This relates to the improvement of the upper entrance to Rapide Plat canal, and is to pay off the contractors.

Item agreed to.

St. Peters canal, improvements, $6,300.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That also is to cover finishing up?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Trent canal, improvements (revote, $155,840), $395,100.

Mr. MURPHY: I think we ought to have a little explanation from the minister in regard to these improvements.

Mr. DUNNING: I may say for the information of hon. members from other parts of the country that the Trent canal extends from Georgian bay to Trenton; it will provide a short cut for navigation. The amount required is $44,400 less than was provided last year, and the following are the items for which the vote is to be used:

Construction lock gates	$20,000
Dredging and drilling	25,000
Extension to lock aprons	5,000
Dam, Elliott's Falls—Gull river	10,000
Cement for dam Hawk river logslide	4,000
Eel's lake dam	11,500
Rebuilding and repairs to reservoir dams	10,000
Miscellaneous (revote, $2,500)	6,500
Severn Division
Staff on construction	55,000
Young's point section (revote, $35,000)	80,000
Dam at lock 23 (revote, $59,340)	68,000
Bridge at Atherley Narrows (revote, $40,000)	40,000
Cement (revote, $19,000)	20,100
Dredging and drilling	35,000
Miscellaneous	5,000
Total	$395,100

I can give details of every one of the items to which I have referred if any member of the House desires it.

Mr. MURPHY: Can you give us any idea of the tonnage?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the past we have had to spend a great deal of money on this project, and I am afraid that in future we will have to spend more. What was endeavoured to be done by the former administration in the same circumstances was to make no expenditure except for the purposes of safety. We had to make necessary expenditures to obviate the danger of a flood breaking out here or a wall going there or a lock breaking. We had a responsibility there which we had to look after.

Mr. DUNNING: We have adopted the same policy exactly. I can on another occasion get the figures regarding the tonnage for all the canals. I am sorry I have not them here, but inasmuch as the expenditure on the Welland canal will come up on future occasions, that will open up a discussion on the tonnage of any of the canals.

Mr. BIRD: What is the principal commerce carried on this canal?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no large traffic on the Trent canal, because it is not finished in a manner capable of carrying through traffic, but there is considerable local traffic, and a very great many steamers plying for hire and pleasure.

Mr. BIRD: I understand the traffic is mostly that of pleasure steamers. Does the minister think it is proper for us to keep up an annual expenditure for pleasure steamers? I understand there are about half a dozen a day for commerce. This seems to be a large expenditure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is referring more to the lower end. I have seen very little mercantile traffic there, but it so happens that at other portions of the system there is some traffic of a business character. I do not think my hon. friend, any more than myself, would to-day go into such a venture. I think he would find himself just as I found myself when I was asked to provide money for works of this kind. The situation is that the works are there. They have been in existence for many years, and there are property rights and that sort of thing. It is an artificial structure for which the country is responsible. My hon. friend's policy apparently is the same as mine was, that is never to spend money except to maintain these public properties in safe condition. There might be loss of life if we did not do that and damage might occur. If the minister follows that course, that is all he can be expected to do.

Mr. DUNNING: That is all. To cut out this expenditure would be to pave the way for a greater expenditure as a result of abandoning the property. I do not think it would be practical to do that.

Mr. BIRD: I was considerably more anxious to ascertain what the hon. member for West York thought about it than to get the minister's views. Is he willing to go to an expenditure of almost half a million a year to maintain a waterway which is used principally for pleasure craft, and yet when it comes to a commercial venture like the Hudson Bay railway, to hold the House up and not permit us to go forward with that vote, which is not greatly out of proportion to this vote, when we consider the object in view.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is wrong. Nothing depends upon the size of a vote one way or the other, but a great deal depends on whether it is right in principle or not. The Hudson Bay railway may be shown to be perfectly right in principle. I myself doubt it. I think I gave a pretty fair offer to the westerners when I was asked what I would do with it, and if the offer had been accepted it would have gone a long way. However, that is a matter of the past. Certain hon. members, before going away, asked me especially to have this item stand. Some of them are very much in favour of the railway, but my hon. friend is not right when he thinks it is held up because it is not taken up to-day. That is not the case. We generally make very much better progress with estimates when members are given an opportunity to state their views. I do not like this item. My hon. friend is hopelessly and entirely wrong. I hope he will not make a habit of that sort of thing. I tried to make it clear that the only reason I was in favour of a vote of this kind was that I could not get out of it, and I ask the minister whether he was holding it down to exactly the same thing, namely, putting in such improvements from time to time, really betterments, as would keep the banks up and prevent flooding of farms and property, and perhaps loss of life, for all of which we would be liable. The structure is there. There is a great deal of difference between that and some other items. The hon. member can see, if he wants to be fair, that there is a great deal of difference in connection with a vote you cannot get out of and one you can get out of.

Mr. BIRD: I do not see any difference in principle at all, because from my point of view and the view of my hon. friend's own leader, the vote on the Hudson Bay railway is one we cannot get out of. I do not want to have any misunderstanding with the hon. gentleman himself. If this request to have this Hudson Bay railway vote held over is merely that it might be the more adequately reviewed, I have no objection whatever, but I must remind him that for the last four years in this House, the subject has been discussed as no other subject has. Every detail has been brought to light as far as I know, and perhaps one is inclined to be a little too provoked when hon. members hold up this very much overdue item. Those of us who are interested feel that the summer is coming on, and, unless the Hudson Bay item is dealt with pretty soon, very much of its effect will be lost. That is all. I am very much in sympathy with hon. members who sit behind my hon. friend, and who, like myself, are interested in the item, and I just raise the point on this item, because on the face of it the position seems contradictory, that the hon. member can sit there passively allowing this item to go through—this item for a work which it seems to me is a white elephant—and yet pertinaciously block the more important item of the Hudson Bay railway.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that I should try to explain to my hon. friend, but I am going to take another shot at it. I think the Minister of Railways understands it, and I shall try to make my hon. friend understand it. Does my hon. friend think there will be any loss of life if the Hudson Bay railway is not built, and if there is danger of very heavy damage claims being made against the country?

Mr. BIRD: The political aspect—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend should be above political considerations. He ought to be, but I am afraid he is becoming a very practical politician, and his politics is the Hudson Bay railway. He is perfectly right in looking after it, but I want to point out that the item which has just gone through, as stated by the Minister of Railways himself, is an absolutely inescapable item. We have had to do the same thing time and again in connection with inescapable items, and the hon. member who is most insistent that the Hudson Bay item should not go on to-day is a gentleman who is going to vote for it—at least he says so.

Mr. MURPHY: In view of the statement of the minister that the vote is merely for improvements or keeping in condition the portion of the canal already completed, and in view of his further remarks, I understand there is no intention of completing the portion necessary to make the canal navigable from Georgian bay over the summit. At the present time there is a marine railway over the summit in order to permit boats to be transported over the portages, as we call them in western Canada. I suppose that is the name used in the east as well. There is no intention of making further capital expenditures looking to the completion of the canal to the continuous water.

Item agreed to.

Welland canal improvements, $395,100.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In view of the other item in regard to the Welland canal standing, I would ask that this one stand also.

Mr. DUNNING: I would be willing to allow this to stand but I might explain to the hon. member that this is in connection with the existing canal. The item in regard to the new Welland canal is already standing.

Item agreed to.

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, maintenance and operation, $250,030.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for the increase? There seem to be continuous increases.

Mr. DUNNING: There is an increase of $4,000.

Mr. MULLINS: What are the details?

Mr. DUNNING: This is altogether for the staff of the board, clerks of various kinds, and the list is a lengthy one. There are ninety in the service of the board as against eighty-six last year. That is, there is provision for four more. There has been quite a little reclassification by the Civil Service Commission during the last year and it is difficult to see where the extra four come in.

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): Is the increase due to increases in salary under the civil service list?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, with the exception of what I have previously mentioned.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think there is a little more than that. I am again looking to the time when my hon. friend would have said in the first instance that we were so frightfully extravagant when as a matter of fact we were so much more economical in 1921.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought the hon. member did.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member must have a guilty conscience.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all. There is nothing like knowing that you were much more economical than the other fellow. In 1921 this vote was $190,000 as against $190,150 the year before.

Mr. DUNNING: Salaries to-day amount to $206,000.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I really thought I had a big enough staff when I was running that organization. I have never been turned down by the government in a single request for expenses. I thought I had enough people working there and it was costing the country quite enough money. The then government never stinted the board in an improper way while I was a commissioner.

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. gentleman take into consideration the superior talents of the gentlemen who now compose the board?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the minister will take the position suggested by my hon. friend apparently the difference in the cost under different chief commissioners is $60,000 a year. Can we seriously take the suggestion of the hon. gentleman and have the whole of this extravagant increase blamed on the new chairman as is suggested by the hon. member?

Mr. DUNNING: The explanation asked for by my hon. friend with respect to the question of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) is precisely the answer required to his own question. There are no less than forty-six statutory increases and increases due to reclassification in this list this year as compared with last, totalling in all over $6,000. Those come about automatically.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the minister has not the number of officials for 1921?

Mr. DUNNING: No, but I shall be glad to get the information for my hon. friend.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Stand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When the minister has been so nice?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the committee will admit that we have been making very good progress. We should continue just in this frame of mind and the item will stand.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my hon. friend will admit I have been more than fair to him this afternoon and unless there is some better reason than merely a desire to secure the number of employees in 1921, I should like to make some progress.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister is making good progress. He has been good but he is good only in spots. He has a way of jumping from one extreme to the other. I think we had better call the next item.

Mr. GARDINER: At this end of the chamber we can hear nothing at all. I would suggest that the Minister of Railways and the hon. member for West York go outside and settle the question and come back again.

Mr. O'NEILL: While we are on this topic there is one branch more or less overlapping in connection with the handling of explosives. I understand we have an Explosives branch in the Department of Mines but the matter of transporting explosives is under the Board of Railway Commissioners. How much does that service cost? It would seem to be a part of the duties of the Department of Mines.

Mr. DUNNING: There are in the department officers in charge of safety and mechanical appliances as well as of fire prevention, but I do not see anything relating to explosives.

Mr. O'NEIL: There must be some staff to see to the proper transportation of explosives, to prevent for example the coupling of a special explosive car with a passenger train. What does it cost the railway to carry out this service?

Mr. DUNNING: The Board of Railway Commissioners lay down certain rules governing the transportation of explosives.

Mr. O'NEIL: But who sees that they are carried out?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no officer known especially as inspector of explosives but I presume that some of the officials I have mentioned would see that these regulations were carried out. There are many orders of the Board of Railway Commissioners which are not enforced directly by the railways as my hon. friend implies. They become a part of the laws of the country and persons disregarding them are prosecuted in the usual way. I cannot say definitely offhand that there is any officer especially deputed to look after the matter of explosives, and I am very doubtful whether this would be practicable.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a highly competent body in the United States known as the Bureau of Explosives which is at work more or less all the time on this very question. This bureau devises means for the transportation of dangerous commodities and we have largely availed ourselves of its work. We have also experts of our own in our Mines' branch. There are rules and regulations drawn up by the Board of Railway Commissioners with regard to the carrying of explosives, and while inspectors are engaged supervising the way in which various articles are carried it would be impossible to say just how much it costs to inspect explosives here and explosives there.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Carried? I am afraid it will be carried on division, and the matter will be opened up again at a time not so convenient to the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: I have sent for the Minister of Finance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will not delay the passing of the item but it will be carried on division if it is carried at all, and it will be opened up again at a time not convenient to the government.

Mr. DUNNING: It will always be convenient. We will allow the item to stand.

Item stands.

Canada Highways Commission: to provide for payment of staff of Canada Highways Commission including A. W. Campbell, C. E., Chief Commissioner of Highways, at $5,000 per annum, $32,000.

Mr. SANDERSON: In what way does the Canada Highways Commission co-operate with the provincial commission in Ontario, let us say? What is the extent of the Dominion commission's jurisdiction over provincial highways?

Mr. DUNNING: The provisions of the Canada Highways Act involve what is known as federal aid to the construction of main highways in the provinces. The work of the commission is gradually drawing to a close. The legislation covered a stated sum of money over a period and as the work is diminishing the staff is being reduced. Next year we expect to complete the work.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the payment of salaries and expenses in connection with the St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigation, including the Canadian National Advisory Committee, and its employees and including E. B. Jost, $2,500, as assistant to Chairman of Engineering board, and G. W. Yates, $1,200, as secretary, $130,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the personnel of the committee?

Mr. DUNNING: The officers at the Cornwall office are: 1 division engineer; 1 assistant engineer; 1 junior engineer; 2 instrument men; 2 rodmen; 2 engineering helpers; 1 stenographer grade 1; 6 gauge readers; 2 labourers. The total including travelling expenses is $27,510. At the head office the officers are: 1 senior office engineer; 1 office engineer; 2 assistant engineers; 1 electrical power house engineer; 1 principal draftsman; 1 stenographer, grade 3; 1 assistant engineer; 1 stenographer, grade 2; 1 senior draftsman; 2 designing engineers; 1 mechanical and electrical draftsman; 2 extra draftsmen from Cornwall. The total including expenses, stationery, and so forth, is $40,360. In charge of the engineering board—I think my hon. friend is interested in this particularly—there are two board members at 15 days per month, 12 months of 360 days at $50 or $18,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the names of these engineers?

Mr. DUNNING: One is General Mitchell; the other is a French-Canadian whose name I do not know at the moment. Mr. McLachlan of the Department of Railways and Canals is the chairman. He comes under the next item. It is estimated he gave 200 days to the work. The balance of the items are travelling expenses.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where does Mr. McLachlan come in?

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. McLachlan gave 17 days per month to this work. That is equivalent to 200 days a year, and at $50 a day it represents $10,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the different committees we now have on the job?

Mr. DUNNING: There is the national committee to which I made reference—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Excuse me, the national committee is composed of Mr. McLachlan, Mr. Mitchell and somebody else.

Mr. DUNNING: Those compose the engineering board.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I thought.

Mr. DUNNING: The national committee consists of—I will get the names for my hon. friend; I cannot think of them all now. The Right Hon. Mr. Graham is chairman of the national committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not now, is he?

Mr. DUNNING: He is still chairman. Then Sir Clifford Sifton, Dr. McDougald, Mr. Ahearn of Ottawa—and there are several others. I will get a complete list for my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then there are some other committees?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: The inter-departmental committee—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who compose the inter-departmental committee?

Mr. DUNNING: A member from each of the following departments: Militia, Railways and Canals, Public Works, Interior, Justice and External Affairs. I am speaking from memory. The purpose of the committee is to iron out the inter-departmental aspects of the St. Lawrence investigation, as it touches so many of the departments of government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can my hon. friend tell us what reports have been made, to whom, and what action, if any, has been taken on them?

Mr. DUNNING: This is some of the work completed:

The survey of the St. Lawrence river from Lachine to Montreal, begun in the former year has been completed.

Additional borings have been made along a proposed route for a canal between Lachine and Nuns island.

Additional borings have been made along the location of a proposed dam across the river at the foot of the Lachine rapids.

A group of 14 borings to rock along the line of the proposed navigation and power channels have been made at the head of lake St. Louis.

Topographical surveys have been extended on both sides of the river between Lachine and Montreal, particularly in the stretch of the country between Highlands an Verdun, on the north side, and between Caughnawaga and La Tortue on the south side of the river.

Ten additional borings have been completed along the route of a proposed canal between Hungry bay and the St. Lawrence river.

A number of borings have also been completed along the south shore of the St. Lawrence river, near Cedars, and in addition a line of 12 borings has been completed along the site of a proposed dam across the river at the head of Cedars rapids.

A number of borings were made along the south side of Coteau rapids.

A number of borings have been made on the site of a proposed power house at the head of lake St. Louis at Cascades point.

The topographical information obtained in the section between lake St. Louis and lake St. Francis was extended on both sides of the river, and also extended so as to include the islands in the river.

Many additional meterings of flow of the St. Lawrence river at Iroquois point have been made, and a number of precise lines of water levels have been run, and also continuous water elevation records have been secured at control points in the river.

In the international section of the St. Lawrence river, the American section has completed a survey of the river from Kingston to Iroquois, and also between Barnhart island and Cornwall. They have also undertaken a very extensive boring programme which is partly completed. In this boring programme is included an extensive investigation into the character of the foundations of the proposed Long Sault dam. Two vertical shafts have been sunk on either shore for a depth of about 100 feet. From these horizontal borings underneath the Long Sault rapids are being made.

There have been two formal meetings with the United States engineers since March 31, 1925, with all members present, and six other informal meetings were convened to adjust details of field and office investigations.

There is a great deal more.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What depth of channel is it proposed to secure to give shipway from Montreal up to lake Ontario?

Mr. DUNNING: A thirty-foot channel.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): When will that be arrived at?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh!

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has given me a list of what has been accomplished. From what he said I suppose a lot more had been done.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, in continuation of the same line of work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are the surveys complete in any section yet?

Mr. DUNNING: Not yet.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And never will be either.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member says they never will be completed.

Mr. DUNNING: I never said so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, the hon. member for Provencher. I wonder why he says so. I hope he is wrong.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I say so because every year we are voting the same amount for all these works.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a sad thing. Can the minister define how much work is yet to be done?

Mr. DUNNING: It is estimated that the board of engineers will be able to make a report to the national committee some time this fall. Of course it will be necessary, as my hon. friend knows, for the national committee to meet with the American national committee with regard to the International features involved. We want to be thoroughly prepared with our side of the case, and I presume the Americans, with their customary efficiency, are also taking care to be thoroughly prepared, so far as the international section of the canal is concerned. All of this work is necessary in order to enable each nation to determine whether or not the project shall be gone on with in the manner in which it has been projected in various quarters.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): But we have a distinct declaration, have we not, that the Welland canal is to be deepened to thirty feet? When are we going to get an assurance that the lower St. Lawrence will be similarly deepened in connection with this international proposal which we are now considering?

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, if these things were just as easy to do as they are to talk about and project, I might be able to answer my hon. friend with some definiteness, but this is an immense project.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I know.

Mr. DUNNING: We have had some experience of its immensity in connection with the section we have ourselves undertaken in enlarging the Welland canal to a thirty-foot channel. That has been under way now for five years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Much longer.

Mr. DUNNING: Some of it was done in war time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was started before the war and stopped during the war.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I think I am safe in saying it will be at least three years before that will be completed. This gives an idea of the magnitude of the whole project, because the Welland is only one of the canals necessary to its completion. All the assurance I am desirous of giving the committee at this time is that if this preliminary work is done properly, it will ensure that no money will be wasted ultimately, should the joint project between the two countries be proceeded with. All this work is necessary, first in order to determine whether we should undertake it, and secondly in order to have a reasonably correct basis upon which to design the necessary works when the proper time comes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is it, then, the determined policy of this government to undertake the joint construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterways?

Mr. DUNNING: No, it is not the determined policy of the government to do anything of the kind. All the work going on now is a necessary preliminary to the determination of any policy.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister mentioned the possibility of the joint construction of this work, although he may not have intended to do so.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry, but I cannot hear my hon. friend. He complains about not being able to hear us, but I cannot hear him.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would welcome the minister if he moved further down this way. In his remarks just now the minister referred to the joint construction of this work. I thought it possibly a slip on his part, and I simply wish to make sure that it is not the settled policy of the government to undertake with the United States the joint construction of this work.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not intend to convey that any commitment had been reached. When I referred to the joint construction I said the investigations now going on were necessary to enable a policy of any kind, including such a policy as the joint construction of this work, to be determined upon intelligently. There has been no commitment of any kind made by the government of Canada to do the work, either jointly with the United States or alone. The investigations now proceeding are in order to enable us to reach intelligent decisions with regard to these very matters.

Mr. HOCKEN: Has the Canadian case been pretty well prepared, and when will it be completed? And can the minister give us any idea as to when the joint meeting of the two national committees will be held, so that we may have some idea as to when it will be possible for us to reach a decision on this very great and, to my mind, very necessary problem.

Mr. DUNNING: I indicated a while ago, possibly while my hon. friend was out of the chamber, that we hoped to have a report from our engineering board to the national board for Canada some time this fall. Then it will be for the similar American board to arrange to meet with our board. I do not think this matter should be hurried; it is one of great national importance and will, undoubtedly, involve tremendous financial commitments. It may be that the committees of the two nations will have sufficient technical information late this fall to be able to meet and discuss the matter, but further than that I cannot at present estimate progress. With regard to the preparation of our case. it is going on now; it can hardly be called the preparation of a case, because it is really the securing of engineering data.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Then the thirty-foot Welland canal stands on its own bottom, and I think can be justified in view of the great improvement which has taken place in the shipping of grain. If you get the grain down to lake Ontario in deep channels it will probably lower the freight rates, and so while there may be some doubt as to the future I think the idea of a deep Welland canal is sound, and I would like to see it finished at the earliest possible date.

Mr. EULER: The new Welland canal is usually regarded, I take it, as a link in the greater scheme of the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterways. If the balance of the scheme should not be proceeded with, either jointly or separately by the Canadian government, would the minister say that the large sum of money now being expended on the new Welland canal is justified, and if so, in what way? I just wonder whether it would pay to bring the grain through the new Welland canal to the other end of lake Ontario. Will we get advantages from the construction of a new Welland canal which will justify the expense if the whole scheme is not proceeded with?

Mr. DUNNING: I would prefer that this discussion should take place on the vote for the Welland canal, which at the request of some hon. members was deferred this afternoon.

Mr. EULER: I simply brought it up because it was right in line with the preceding remarks.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but we were really wandering away from the point. I will probably have to give the explanation two or three times during that discussion, so perhaps we might leave it until then.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DUNNING: Some information was asked for, Mr. Chairman, before adjournment regarding the names of those who compose the national advisory committee. The following is the order of reference with regard to that committee, under order in council of May 7, 1924:

To consider generally whether or not the project would, if completed, be beneficial to Canada, whether the benefits which might accrue and the pecuniary returns, direct or indirect, which may be anticipated from it are such as to counterbalance its disadvantages, if any; whether Your Excellency should indicate a readiness to enter into discussion with the United States of America looking towards the negotiation of a treaty for the carrying out of the necessary works, and what should be the character of the stipulations which any such treaty should contain.

That briefly is the duty of the national advisory committee regarding the St. Lawrence waterway. As to the members of that committee I now have a list which I did not have at hand before. The Right Hon. George P. Graham is at present the chairman. The other members are: Thomas Ahearn, Ottawa; Hon. W. E. Foster, St. John, N.B.; Beaudry Loman, Montreal; Edward D. Martin, Winnipeg; Doctor Wilfrid L. McDougald, Montreal; Hon. Sir Clifford Sifton, Toronto; Major General John W. Stewart, Vancouver; and Hon. Adelard Turgeon, Quebec.

The members of the national committee for the United States have been appointed by the president as follows: Hon. Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, Chairman; William C. Breed, attorney-at-law, New York City, former president, New York Merchants' Association; James E. Davidson, Bay City, Michigan, Vice-President, American Shipbuilding Company, Bay City; James P. Goodrich, Winchester, Indiana, former governor of Indiana; James R. Howard, Chicago, Illinois, formerly president American Farm Bureau Federation; James D. Noonan, American Federation of Labour; Stephen B. Davis, Washington, D.C., counsel; Charles P. Craig, Washington D.C., executive secretary.

Then as to the Joint Engineering Board, the members of the Canadian section are: D. W. McLachlan, chairman, Department of Railways and Canals; Olivier O. Lefebvre, Chief Engineer, Quebec Streams Commission, Montreal; Brigadier General Charles H. Mitchell, Toronto.

The members of the American section of the Joint Engineering Board are: Brigadier General Edgar Jadwin, chairman; Colonel William Kelly and Lieutenant-Colonel George E. Pillsbury.

There was some question as to the other committee which is co-ordinating the various departments of our own government in regard to the several matters touched by this problem. The chairman of that committee is Colonel Biggar, government counsel. The Department of Finance is represented by Mr. Russell, with Mr. Viets as alternate; the Department of National Defence by Brigadier-General A. G. L. McNaughton; the Department of Public Works by Mr. K. M. Cameron, with Mr. Coutlee as alternate; the Department of the Interior by Mr. J. T. Johnston; the Department of Marine and Fisheries by Captain F. Anderson, with Mr. V. W. Forneret as alternate; the Department of Railways and Canals, by Mr. E. B. Jost; the Department of Trade and Commerce by Mr. Gordon Wrong; the Department of External Affairs by Doctor O. D. Skelton.

Mr. HOCKEN: The reason I asked to-day whether we would be likely to come to a joint decision on this matter was the fact that in the United States at the present time there is a very strong agitation to dig an all-American canal, and as far as one can judge from the newspaper reports that project is receiving a great deal of support. If that canal is ever built co-operation between Canada and the United States for the construction of the St. Lawrence canals would of course be ended. For that reason I think it is of the utmost importance that our case should be prepared, and that we should call upon the United States to come into conference with us and reach a decision whether we are going to carry out this work or not. I regard it as one of the most important moves ever made by the Dominion of Canada. It would give to the cities of Montreal and Quebec, I think, supremacy as the grain exporting ports of the world, because this canal would drain not only our own northwest but a very large part of the northwest and central west of the United States; and if there was the necessary depth to accommodate vessels of large draft we would have a volume of commerce going down practically all the Great Lakes and through the St. Lawrence, probably, to Quebec. That would make that route perhaps one of the most important in the entire world. The benefit I anticipate would be this: I do not think very many tramp steamers would come from the ocean to the head of the lakes, although there might be some. I imagine the economical method of handling grain would be to load boats at the head of the lakes with 500,000 bushels, as there are vessels with that capacity. Those vessels would proceed to the city of Quebec or Montreal and break bulk there, filling perhaps three or four tramp steamers that were ready to take the cargoes. There would be some volume—perhaps a considerable volume—of package freight going up the lakes. If you will visualize the possibilities of this route as I have hastily tried to sketch it I think it will be admitted that this is the greatest project Canada ever faced for the development of her own trade and for the draining of trade from our neighbours to their advantage and to our profit. The estimated cost of this work is about $250,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. HOCKEN: What is it?

Mr. DUNNING: Do you mean the whole cost?

Mr. HOCKEN: I understood the estimated cost was $250,000,000. I am not including the Welland canal in that but I am including the other work on the lower St. Lawrence. It has been pointed out by Mr. Gardener, of Chicago, who has given a great deal of study to this question—has the minister got the figures of the total cost?

Mr. DUNNING: When I said, "No" I had in mind that my hon. friend was not including the Welland canal.

Mr. HOCKEN: No, I was not including the Welland canal.

Mr. DUNNING: The preliminary estimate of the cost of the portion from Kingston to Montreal is $252,000,000.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is what I had in mind. Now, Mr. Gardener points this out—I met him here a little more than a year ago and had a long interview with him. The plan he suggested for financing the enterprise is a joint commission of United States and Canada that would construct the work and operate it afterwards without profit. The commissioners would have to be paid, and no doubt there would be a considerable staff to operate the canal and keep track of all the accounts; but if this work can be constructed by the two governments jointly and operated at cost we would have not only an ample waterway but one that could be used under the very best conditions. Looking at it in this way, in the broad view as it affects every province, with perhaps the exception of British Columbia, enabling us, as it would, to draw so much trade and traffic from our neighbours, I say this is the most important project Canada has ever faced in the way of transportation. I would urge the minister therefore to press upon the commissioners the necessity of bringing the other nation into conference and of reaching a conclusion from our standpoint as quickly as possible. I think the conclusion would be in favour of the canal; at any rate I hope so. We ought to know before the agitation for the all-American canal through the state of New York is carried very much further.

Mr. DUNNING: I might repeat what I said this afternoon with reference to the time the Joint Engineering Board will probably report. With regard to the all American project, I am informed the initial estimate of cost for the all American canal is in the neighbourhood of $600,000,000, so that there are a few discouraging factors.

Mr. HOCKEN: A few hundred million does not mean very much over there.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps not. There is no power development possible on the all American route. I do not want to enter into a discussion now of what the possible benefit of the St. Lawrence ship canal might be. The national advisory committee will investigate that point and obtain the information, and I do not want to anticipate by any too-glowing prophecies what the detailed result of the examination will be. I can assure my hon. friend that I will expedite the inquiry so far as is consistent with performing thorough work in connection with the problem. It is very important we should know all that it is possible to find out about it before a decision is reached.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the date of the report of the International Joint Commission? I think the commission made a report some time ago recommending the adoption of the scheme.

Mr. DUNNING: December 19, 1921. I will read an extract from the recommendation which will show that we have given attention to that and followed it up. The quotation reads:

> In a matter of such unusual magnitude, involving engineering factors that are more or less debatable, and affecting the interests of many millions of people, too much care cannot be taken to ensure the adoption of plans that will be beyond reasonable criticism, both as to the general scheme of development and the working out of its details. It is therefore desirable that before any steps are taken to carry out the commission's recommendations, the plans of the engineering board, together with such comments or criticisms or alternative plans as have been filed with the commission by other engineers, should be referred back to the board enlarged by other leading members of the engineering profession, to the end that the whole question be given that further and complete study that its magnitude and importance demand.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): How many years will the consideration be held up?

Mr. DUNNING: I indicated this afternoon that, so far as I could see, the engineering committee should be in a position to report some time next fall. Then it will be a question of the National Committees giving consideration to that report from the point of view of the nation appointing it. International action of course will result.

Mr. STEVENS: In connection with this project, I am not at the moment going to offer any opinion as a private citizen whether or not Canada should adopt the scheme and go ahead.

Mr. DUNNING: Neither am I.

Mr. STEVENS: I should say that this is not the time or the place, in the absence of information, to do it. The time is close at hand, if it has not already arrived, when something of a fairly definite character should be determined. The minister read an extract from the report of the International Joint Commission in 1921 which indicated that a reference of the problem, which had already received very considerable study, should be made back to an enlarged or extended group of the engineering profession. I think that proposition is perfectly sound. I am not going to offer a single criticism of the members of the engineering profession forming that board, but I do wish to offer a criticism as to the wisdom of the appointment of the additional board, superimposed upon the engineering board. There is another board composed of Sir Clifford Sifton, Dr. McDougald, of Montreal, and the other gentlemen named, some of whom I think are very estimable gentlemen and probably highly qualified, and some much less qualified. The impression has been in my mind for some time, and has been emphasized somewhat to-night, that this board is a sort of tactical board, a board of policy—

Mr. DUNNING: Strategy.

Mr. STEVENS: No, that is a sacred term which should not be dragged into these sordid matters. I would say a board of policy, a board of tactics, a board which—if I am doing the minister an injustice he will I am sure hasten to correct me—would meet and consider the problem. It was no doubt felt that when the engineers or technical men got through with their part of the work and passed their report to this superimposed board, there might be, in the study of it, indefinite and interminable delay for years to come. Frankly I think this matter is of such great importance that the complete technical information of the department should be placed before this House as early as possible. I understand the care that is necessary, but the International Joint Commission report was made about four and a half years ago, and the study for that period of four and a half years by this engineering board is almost sufficient to supply us with the necessary technical information. I should like to suggest that parliament should be placed in possession at an early date—I would say at the next session of parliament—with the fullest possible draft of all the engineering problems solved, so that they might judge of the merits of the matter from a national standpoint. I am not prepared to offer any opinion. It would be utterly futile for me to attempt to suggest it, but I think we should have before parliament this information. I agree with my friend from Toronto (Mr. Hocken) that this is perhaps one of the most important matters that has been brought to the attention of, not the House, but the country, for many years. It is going to be difficult to work it out from a constitutional and economic standpoint. The expenditure of this money from year to year is warranted and desirable only if there is a definite objective in mind and I hope the engineers' report or reports, because I apprehend it would not be necessary for them to complete and exhaust every problem before bringing in some report—

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend advocate an interim report from the engineers?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not advocating it; so far as I can recall, I have not spoken to an engineer on this subject except last year to one or two who were not on the board, very eminent men. If the engineers said that it was inadvisable I would not offer my opinion against theirs. But if the engineers are prepared to make an interim report on any branch of the whole problem it is important that parliament be seized of that information. I again wish to place before the minister my suspicion that the national advisory committee is the fifth wheel to the coach. I do not want the minister to give me that betraying smile again, but I think he has suspicions of the same character.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend will let me state my own suspicions and not put them into my mouth.

Mr. STEVENS: It is rather friendly and brotherly assistance I am giving to the minister, because I know it would be awkward on that side of the House to express such a suspicion and I would not expect the hon. gentleman to do so. This fifth wheel to the coach, this advisory board, may be the medium through which this problem will be delayed. There are large interests in Canada opposed to this; there are others very strongly in favour; but parliament should at the earliest possible day have the fullest information so that parliament itself may determine the wise course to pursue.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): In the meantime we have to carry on what we have in hand, namely, a deeper waterway from the upper lakes to the St. Lawrence. That includes what is now under way, the deepening of the Welland canal to a depth of thirty feet—and we have been told this evening that this is to be completed within five years. This is an important work and it must be carried on. There is, so I understand, a proposal under consideration to get deeper water for larger vessels carrying grain as far as Prescott and I would be glad if the minister would say something about that. We ought to continue until we get twenty or twenty-five feet of water right into the port of Montreal. I understand the cost would be greater to get the required depth below Prescott. Having the information that it will take a long time to frame a policy in regard to the St. Lawrence deep waterways; we must go on with and press for an extension and a deepening of the Canadian waterways which can be used in the meantime jointly by the United States and ourselves, the United States to be contributory to the cost of keeping them up.

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to the question of the hon. member for South York, the canal works are being put down to a depth of thirty feet, but the maximum depth of the reaches will be twenty-five feet. As I indicated this afternoon, the work on the Welland canal will be completed in four or five years. I can assure the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that whatever smile I had on my face was not at the advisory board but at the board of strategy on that side of the House to which reference has occasionally been made. I can understand my hon. friend being rather suspicious of boards of strategy after the experience of a little while ago. The national advisory committee has a serious purpose. As regards the suggestion which my hon. friend made that possibly the engineering reports would be sufficient and that we should get no further, he ignores the fact that technical men working on the engineering end of the problem cannot be expected to take into account all the economic factors resulting from the operation of such a waterway. Neither can they be expected to be able to give adequate consideration to the international political questions involved and there are many questions of that nature.

The terms of reference in the order in council which I read just after we resumed at eight o'clock give an idea of the work of the national advisory committee. Further, the whole of Canada will become responsible to this great work if it is undertaken, and therefore the national advisory committee contains representative men from other sections of Canada than the section in which the work is contemplated. For instance the Maritime provinces will have to bear their share of responsibility of this large sum of money and there is a representative from the Maritime provinces. There is a gentleman from Vancouver. The port interests of Montreal, Quebec and Toronto are also represented.

Mr. HOCKEN: Who represents Toronto?

Mr. DUNNING: Sir Clifford Sifton. In the United States there is a similar body whose duty is to deal with this matter. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre appears to doubt the bona fides of a national advisory committee in connection with this matter. Frankly I think it is absolutely necessary that a body of representative men who are willing to devote their attention to this matter and to consider in detail all the reports should advise the government with regard thereto after studying the various phases of the question. The United States have found the same course advisable; the distribution of the members of their national committee is almost similar to the distribution of our own, and the national advisory committee has a serious purpose in view.

Mr. HOCKEN: Another reason why we should speed this up is that at the present time the city of Chicago and some of the states between that city and the Mississippi are agitating for enough water to operate a barge canal. There is great resistance to that from Michigan, Ohio and some of the other states.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They got it yesterday.

Mr. HOCKEN: Chicago got it?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. HOCKEN: If that is settled, of course my point is gone.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The bill passed congress yesterday.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not settled but the bill went through.

Mr. HOCKEN: The bill to give Chicago 10,000 cubic feet of water?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): To give it sufficient water for a barge canal.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think that is exceedingly regrettable, because two or three feet of water will be taken from the Great Lakes in order to operate that canal. If reports that are abroad are correct Sir Clifford Sifton, who is one of the national advisory committee, has secured a charter for the Georgian bay canal, would he be entirely impartial as against his own interests in considering this question? I would think a man who held a charter for a canal by the Georgian bay and French river would not be very much disposed to see another canal constructed on the St. Lawrence. As regards his representing Toronto, he is a resident there; that I think is about the extent of his representation of the city of Toronto. I should not consider it a very proper position for such a man to take. However, I am not the keeper of his conscience, nor have I had anything to do with his appointment. But I would remind the minister that this man has a considerable personal interest in another direction, and he is being called upon to make a decision in this matter.

Mr. DUNNING: I am informed that the vote which went through congress yesterday is for the purposes of investigation only and not for construction.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): It was $35,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: There must be some misunderstanding. I understand that the vote is merely for the purpose of investigating the all-American canal in connection with the St. Lawrence and also the barge canal proposal from Chicago to the Mississippi.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is to be hoped that Chicago will not get that water; it will take two or three feet from the lakes.

Mr. DUNNING: I will do everything reasonable to expedite the work now going on, and of course parliament will have the right next session to get information regarding whatever communications are received by the government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Have the advisory committee done anything yet?

Mr. DUNNING: They have held two meetings and will consider such reports as reach them and to deal in the meantime as far as possible with subsidiary problems.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then reports are reaching them from time to time.

Mr. DUNNING: Not yet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would appear that if we are making progress at all it is exceedingly slow. The minister was not here when this matter was discussed in previous years; otherwise he would recollect that there was a general belief—it was not by any means confined to opposition members—in Ontario, at any rate, that the government had persistently stalled in connection with this matter. That is the belief to-day. The government have appointed different committees to make sure that nothing shall be done at the moment. This matter has been in the hands of the government ever since they came in; the report is dated December, 1921. The House has no information of anything done by the government, nor is there any evidence of any action having been taken. All we do know is that sums of money are being voted every year. The committees are there, but nothing is being done one way or the other, notwithstanding that the application for the Morrisburg development was made long ago. The engineer can tell the minister whether I am right or wrong, but the Ontario Hydro-Electric offered to develop the power at their own cost, and at the same time further navigation without any charge to the government. Notwithstanding this, nothing has been done, although the work can be carried out, without expense to the Canadian taxpayer, wholly by those who require the use of that electricity. The engineer can tell the minister whether I am wrong.

Mr. DUNNING: I am getting the information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Am I wrong?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is not correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is incorrect about the statement?

Mr. DUNNING: Possibly by hon. friend does not know that the construction at Morrisburg is on the international section of the canal and without the co-operation of the United States government development is not possible.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not say it was. The fact of the matter is that everything is being done to prevent co-operation with the state of New York, which is actively interested in this undertaking. These large committees are successfully stalling. That is the plain truth. There is a third party ready to go ahead at its own expense and develop the power for the benefit of the people, and in such a way as not to injure but, on the contrary, to assist navigation. I quite admit that it is necessary for the state of New York and the government of the United States to consent, but I know very well that at the time these plans were prepared New York was just an anxious as is the province of Ontario to get the work done. There are always interests opposed to development in any country.

Vested interests are opposed to development in the United States, just as they are opposed to development in this country. There are corporations whose interests lie in one direction and corporations who are interested in other ways. The minister has made no reference to the matter drawn to his attention by my hon. friend (Mr. Hocken), who pointed out that according to his information Sir Clifford Sifton was in control of the Georgian bay ship canal.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He did not have the charter at the time of his appointment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The appointment is so stale, he has been in the position so long, that the minister is absolutely right. But is that any reason why he should be kept on? If there is a clash of interests, ought not the government to look into the matter? This is nothing new. The newspapers have made the same charge and it has never been denied. There is a direct interest on one side, absolutely opposed to the interest of the people in securing development of power on the St. Lawrence. Sir Clifford Sifton, we understand, controls or is interested in the Georgian bay ship canal project. Why? The Minister of Justice will correct me if I am wrong when I say the company claims that, while it was incorporated originally for the purpose of improving waterways, it has the right to all water powers on the river and particularly to such water powers as are generated in the improvement of any waterway. And that company to-day has before the government plans which, if approved by the government, would according to legal opinion enable the company to levy toll for all time on the users of power generated by the waters of the Ottawa in the province of Ontario and Quebec. There is therefore a direct relation between the delay in this matter and the interest of the company. Doctor McDougald is also interested in the electrical business, as we know, for he was here last year in connection with the Carillon matter. It is common knowledge. I believe that these gentlemen who are interested in the development of sites along the Ottawa are perfectly sincere in thinking that they have a right to charge tolls which can only be increased in value by delays on the St. Lawrence, but they are put in positions of responsibility where they can prevent St. Lawrence development. My hon. friend paid no attention to what was said. Surely he will agree that the last people in the world to be represented upon a project which has as its end the development of electricity, just as much perhaps as navigation itself, ought not to be those who are directly interested in seeing that that development does not take place. We have had no action yet at all.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then what action have we had?

Mr. DUNNING: I will reply when my hon. friend has finished.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very well, I should like to have the information now.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is hardly fair in saying there has been no action yet, because this afternoon I read in detail exactly what has been done by the engineering board.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh yes, that!

Mr. DUNNING: That! That is one of the most important things to be done. With regard to the membership of the national advisory committee, if my hon. friend's information with regard to Sir Clifford Sifton is as correct as that with respect to Doctor McDougald, I am not disposed to discuss it. The fact that Doctor McDougald was interested a year ago in a power application which did not succeed is surely no evidence that for all time to come he would be an unsuitable person on a national advisory committee when he is chairman of the Montreal Harbour Commission. I have no knowledge that Sir Clifford Sifton does control or is interested in the Georgian Bay Canal Company. Personally I do not attach so much importance to it as my hon. friend does. The national advisory committee is a large committee. No one will deny Sir Clifford's business experience and executive ability; no one will deny that in that respect he is a great Canadian; no one will deny that he has rendered distinguished service to his country as a cabinet minister and also in the work of conservation, to which I understand he has given very valuable service. The point of private interest, if it exists, is worth considering, but I am not taking the mere statement as proof that such interest does exist.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know; I saw it in the papers. It is worth inquiring into.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend accepts as true all he reads about me in the papers—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not.

Mr. DUNNING: —and if I accepted as true all I read about him in the papers, we would not think so much of each other as we now do. However, the point is worth considering, and I shall be very glad to have it cleared up.

Item agreed to.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to collection of revenue—staff and repairs, $2,389,390.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the appropriations not required?

Mr. DUNNING: That is part of last year's vote which was not used.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was it for?

Mr. DUNNING: Staff and repairs for all the canals.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I see, it is a general vote, nothing is allocated.

Item agreed to.

Railways and Canals—miscellaneous—surveys and inspections—canals, $20,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was spent on that last year?

Mr. DUNNING: The whole amount.

Item agreed to.

Surveys and inspections—railways, $50,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was spent there last year?

Mr. DUNNING: It was all spent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should just like to know what we are doing in surveys and inspections of railways now to spend $50,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Included in that vote there has always been an item of $15,000 for the operation of the government cars. There are also some staff items here amounting to $11,400.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are they?

Mr. DUNNING: Office engineer; principal clerk, that is, ranking as such and acting as private secretary to the deputy minister; one account clerk; three stenographers and typists. Telegraph, telephone, express and so forth, account for several small items. Parliamentary travelling expenses are also charged to this vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Apparently "surveys and inspections" are not surveys and inspections at all.

Mr. DUNNING: Apparently that is its title. It is an old vote and I will have to look into it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We will not worry about the nomenclature, we will try to find out the facts. Apparently this vote is largely to run government cars.

Mr. DUNNING: No, partly. There is $15,000 for maintenance, and $11,000 for operation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just over $26,000. That would be for the maintenance and operation of private railway cars?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many cars are there?

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly the same as when my hon. friend was in office.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My memory is so short. What is the number?

Mr. DUNNING: Five.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How are they apportioned now?

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Railways, the Minister of National Defence, the Prime Minister.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And the others are free lances?

Mr. DUNNING: Just exactly the same as in my hon. friend's time; we have changed nothing in that regard.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think the government and the opposition will quarrel over this item.

Mr. HOCKEN: Why don't you come in here?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if my hon. friend is serious in the implication of that remark.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not hear the remark; what was it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That the opposition was just as anxious to support this vote as is the government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, what else is it? What is the idea; what is the implication?

Mr. FORKE: You might not be very pleased about it, and yet not quarrel over it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not quarrelling, but if my hon. friend is serious I see a chance here to save a little public money. I think these cars should now be struck off.

Mr. FORKE: I did not think the case was so hopeless.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is very much more serious in making a joke than in looking after his business here or in considering votes. If he thinks this number of private cars should be cut down I certainly agree, and if he is not prepared to go the whole way will he go half way and move that three of the cars be discontinued and that the vote be reduced accordingly? We could very well do without them now.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Let the other two be placed at the disposal of the members of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that that would be wise either; I think they would become greater bones of contention than they ever have been in the past. Of course my hon. friend has looked after himself rather well; he always had the Defence car.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I never used it in my life.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend would not use them; he knows they are nuisances. There he was in the Department of National Defence and he did not use this car at all. He should join with me in trying to get rid of three of these nuisances.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is what I am trying to do.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I have one supporter in my effort to save a little public money, in the person of the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset). Now I wonder if the hon. member for Brandon will not be supporter No. 2 and agree that we should get rid of three of these cars.

Mr. FORKE: I said the hon. member would not quarrel but I must have been mistaken. I do not know exactly what he wants me to do. I made a mistake in thinking he would not quarrel, that is all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was just trying to find out how far my hon. friend would go in his love for economy. Here we have a case where admittedly we can get along with less cars; we have two which are absolutely not apportioned for business purposes. I quite agree that the Minister of Railways requires a private car in his business; I think it is a very nice thing for the Prime Minister to have a car to run around in, but I think we should stop just at the point where we have looked after the Prime Minister and the one other minister who has any real use for a private car. However, if my hon. friend will not support me I think the best thing to do with this item is pass it on division. We will have an opportunity later on of moving to strike it out altogether, when we will have perhaps a little better representation. Perhaps by the time it is passed on division the ideas of economy of the hon. member for Brandon will triumph over his love for the Liberal tag, and he will be able to shoot a rat with a Liberal tag on it.

9 p.m.

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. DUNNING: I may have been guilty of giving wrong information, and I would just like to check up. I did make a mistake; there are four private cars instead of five. The fifth car is owned by the railway.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Only used, not owned.

Mr. DUNNING: The railway carries the maintenance; all we do is provide for the attendant.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The only criticism I have heard is that we, the present ministers, are not using the cars as they were used in former times.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, Mr. Chairman, we are getting on in our Dutch auction. Of course the Minister of Justice will want to cut off the overhead now being used to pay attendants for waiting around offices, while they never have a job. Surely he will join me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I will not.

Mr. HEAPS: I think the government should accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for West York. It is all the easier to cut it down from four to two instead of from five to two, because we only cut off two cars instead of three.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely we can look at this matter seriously and without being sensitive about it. As my hon. friend has stated, it is a perfectly proper thing for the Prime Minister of this country, whoever he may be, to have a private car. It is absolutely necessary, in travelling, because no man who is badgered as much as is the Prime Minister could possibly get along in this country without having some place to which he could retire and do his work. The general consensus of opinion also seems to be that the Minister of Railways requires a car, and then we have two spares.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And a third which can be used.

Mr. DUNNING: The third is a pretty poor car; I think my hon. friend knows which car it is. However, I should say that only yesterday I received a request for some courtesy in the way of a private car for a very prominent official of the British government, an under-secretary, as a matter of fact, which office in England is next to cabinet rank, as my hon. friend knows. This gentleman is coming to this country for the purpose of conference with the officials of the government. Normally one of these spare cars would be used to extend such a courtesy. I hesitate to appear as a defender of what in some quarters is regarded as an extravagance, but I think there are many other places where we could more easily cut down than on an item of this kind. I felt somewhat diffident in saying anything about it until my hon. friend admitted that the Minister of Railways almost had to have this accommodation, and that being the case I though I might say just a word or two.

Mr. HOCKEN: You should always have a spare tire.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister indicate those places where we could better save money? If he will only tell us where those places are we will let this item go and get after bigger fish.

Mr. DUNNING: That work has already been done. If the hon. gentleman belonged to a government which included the present Minister of Finance, he would know what cutting to the bone means.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On division.

Item agreed to.

Railways and Canals—railways employees' provident fund, $50,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Before this item passes, as a matter of information, would the minister explain just what is involved here?

Mr. DUNNING: This is the provident fund of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway. The act creating this fund provides for the payment to retiring employees on these particular lines of a monthly allowance of 1½ per cent, for each year of service, of the average monthly pay received by such employee for the eight years immediately preceding his retirement, such monthly allowance to be not less than $20. Because of the fact that the cost of living has greatly increased since the passing of this act in 1907, such minimum rate of $20 a month was found to be inadequate and great hardship and even privation were being suffered by those who had been retired under the provisions of the act at the minimum rate. Pending the consideration of a general pension scheme for the Canadian National Railways, provision has been made annually since 1921 for the purpose of affording to these former employees of the crown some measure of temporary relief. The number affected as at December 18, 1925, is 456—that is the old pensioned employees, if my hon. friend is following me—divided as follows: 225 employees granted a maximum allowance of $10, bringing the minimum pension to $30 instead of $20; 201 employees have been given an increase from their pension allowance which ranged between $20 and $30 up to $30. The increase allowed the latter class amounted in some cases to only a few cents and in other cases to $9.75. The fund from which such pensions are paid is made up of contributions from the men and from the government. In the early stages the government contributed dollar for dollar with the employees, but when the $100,000 mark was reached the government's contribution became fixed at that amount with the consequence that now by far the greater proportion of the fund is made up of the men's contribution. The vote itself is identical with the vote of last year, and the provision is as I have stated.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister say approximately how many employees there are on that portion of the Intercolonial, or does this include the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways?

Mr. DUNNING: The entire Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways, but my hon. friend should bear in mind that the 456 retired employees affected are only those who were retired at the minimum pension originally of $20 a month, and this provision is used entirely for raising the allowance to a more generous figure consequent on the increase in the cost of living.

Mr. HOCKEN: What is the total number of men on pension on the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry I have not that information at hand, but I will get it for my hon. friend. Of course, those who retire are retired under the provisions of this act to which I have just referred, the act of 1907, and must qualify in accordance with its provisions.

Mr. HOCKEN: I gather from what the minister said that this is only a part of the pensioners, and that there are a great many others who have been pensioned.

Mr. DUNNING: This consists only of those who were retired at the minimum allowance of $20 per month.

Mr. HOCKEN: What I would like to get at, if I can, is the number of men employed on these railways and the number that have been pensioned.

Mr. DUNNING: I will get that information for my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, maintenance and operation of, $250,030.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That item was discussed this afternoon and alowed to stand.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the statutory vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh no, the chairman has gone back to the vote that was allowed to stand.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend wanted information as to the cost year by year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The year 1921 was the year I was speaking of.

Mr. DUNNING: I will go back to 1916-1917. To illustrate the gradual increase. I suppose the increase is attributable to the reasons I mentioned this afternoon. These are the fiscal years with the amount in each case in round numbers:

1916-17	$166,000
1917-18	172,000
1918-19	177,000
1919-20	184,000
1920-21	192,000
1921-22	205,000
1922-23	211,000
1923-24	223,000
1924-25	212,000

There is a gradual upward movement until 1924-25, when there was a reduction of over $11,000 in that year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Go ahead.

Mr. DUNNING: I gave 1925-26. It was $212,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: For 1925-26, it is $244,000.

Mr. DUNNING: No, there is an error somewhere.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is an error in my hon. friend's estimates.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: This is actual expenditure. The amount I gave for 1924-25, was $212,000.

Mr. STEVENS: What about 1925-26?

Mr. DUNNING: I will get that information for my hon. friend. In the meantime perhaps we could take Item No. 108.

Trent Canal construction (revote, $19,000), $19,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a revote.

Mr. DUNNING: Both are revotes.

Item agreed to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we had better get the other matter adjusted.

Mr. STEVENS: While the minister is getting the exact figures I was going to ask if the increase in this vote for the railway commission of $5,671 is for the fixing up of the room of the new commissioner, Mr. Thomas Vien. I know it was very luxuriously fitted up and I was wondering whether the expenditure came under this item.

Mr. DUNNING: The increased expenditure is entirely due to reclassification and statutory increases in salaries.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps the adorning of these chambers came out of the public works vote.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think you are right.

Mr. STEVENS: Probably when the Public Works votes are under consideration we will discuss this item.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is very ordinary.

Mr. STEVENS: Something like the Sultan of Turkey, I am told.

Item agreed to.

Welland ship canal construction: To provide for payment to P. Lyall and Sons, Construction Co. Ltd., of compensation on account of washing rock excavated from Sec. 4. before crushing for concrete and not anticipated at time tenders were called, for 207,500 cu. yds. at 70c., $145,250.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we should give some consideration to that item.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend wants complete information?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. We have done pretty well in getting rid of the small items.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not complaining at all; I appreciate the treatment accorded me in that respect. This vote is for extra compensation to the P. Lyall Company on account of having to wash the rock excavated from section 4 before crushing for concrete. I do not know that I need read the pertinent sections of the specification forming part of the P. Lyall Construction Company's contract.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Usually in a case such as this we ask the minister to produce the file, and I would ask him to do so. It is one of those things which may be all right and may be absolutely wrong.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to produce the file. Could I save time by reading the engineer's report on the matter?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend will produce the file it might be passed at once.

Mr. DUNNING: The engineer's report reads:

> The contractors for sections Nos. 3 and 4 are obligated to supply all crushed stone needed for sections Nos. 1 and 2 under contract with Mr. J. F. Porter, and this supply has precedence over any rock needed for sections Nos. 3 and 4.
> When the contract for sections 3 and 4 was awarded in June 1922, no excavation had been started in section 4, but excavation in section 3 was well under way and the rock excavated therein, containing no clay or other objectionable matter for concrete, was all sent to the crusher. In none of our borings in section 4 did we find rock of a character different to that found in section 3, and it was no doubt on this assumption that the contractors put in their unit tender prices.
> Acting on this assumption we did not force the contractors to reserve all stone excavated from sections 3 and 4 for sections 1 and 2 and we allowed them to use a large portion of it for concrete work.
> Contrary to all anticipation, it is now found that the southern end of section 4, from Stations 360 to 397, has a rock formation intermixed with thick vertical and horizontal seams of brown clay and silt rendering necessary the washing of the greater part of the rock before allowing it to proceed to the crusher.
> A very close tab has been kept of the extra cost to the contractors of this washing, as detailed in division engineer Lazier's report of August 25th, 1925 and engineer in charge Grant's report of September 25th, 1925.
> From these compilations it is found that some 374,500 cubic yards of rock have, or will have to be washed, at an estimated extra cost to the contractors of 70 cents per cubic yard, representing a total extra cost of $262,150.
> I do not know how the claim would stand on legal grounds as, in order to protect the crown against dishonest contractors, the specifications have been made extremely rigid and arbitrary, but in equity at least I believe that the department would be well justified in allowing the contractors the extra cost, as established by us, of two cents per cubic yard for all rock excavated from Section No. 4 which we have ordered them to wash before sending it to the crusher.
> Otherwise, bona fide contractors will in the future have to raise their unit tender prices to provide for even the most improbable contingencies.

That is signed by the chief engineer. The item in connection with that was dealt with by my predecessor prior to my coming down here, and naturally my reaction in connection with it was to make a careful inquiry. The contracts of the department are most rigid; they have been developed over a long period of years from the experience of contractors finding a hole in their contract and that hole being plugged, and other holes being found and plugged in succeeding years, until now the contract is so rigid that there is no possibility of the contractor getting through it at all. It is very doubtful whether the contractor could in any court collect this extra money, in spite of the fact that we ordered him to do something which was certainly not in his contract, but which had to be done if the rock was to be fit for concrete work at all. Most hon. members know that foreign material, such as clay, mixed with rock in concrete work simply destroys the concrete and makes it of no use. I shall be glad to bring down the information and let the item stand to have the file produced, or we can pass the item and bring down the information later; either course will suit me.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to ask two questions in relation to this. It will be noted first that the price is 70 cents a yard for the washing of this rock. That cost may include the handling or part of the handling of the rock in addition to the mere washing. The rock would have to be handled in any case. I point that out to the minister, because the figure of 70 cents a yard seems to me to be an excessive figure for the additional cost that would be necessary in washing this rock. The other point I wish to bring to his attention is that the engineer's report indicates that in number 4 section, contrary to expectation, and also contrary to the results of previous borings, it is now found in actual work that there are in the rock formation certain areas comprising seams of clay and silt, consequently, the excavation in all probability will be cheaper and less difficult than in the case of solid rock formation. That may or may not be the case, but the matter should be carefully considered and if there is a saving in the cost of excavation because of the material being softer and less difficult to excavate, such saving should be deducted from this figure of $145,000 or the total figure which the minister indicated a moment ago of some $250,000.

Mr. DUNNING: The engineer points out to me that it is not a lump sum, but a unit price contract. When earth is excavated the contractor is paid only for excavating earth; when rock is excavated he is paid for excavating rock. A very close tab is kept on the expense. The file will reveal that, and I had better bring down the file. I will agree to let the item stand or have it passed subject to bringing the file down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would be better to bring the file down first.

Mr. DUNNING: We will let the item stand and bring the file down later.

Item stands.

Mr. DUNNING: As regards the railway commission item, which was allowed to stand for further information, I may say that the amount spent last year was $240,388.58.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How did the minister manage to get rid of that?

Mr. DUNNING: I did not manage to get rid of it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How did the board manage to get rid of it? This just shows when you get the facts how completely the minister's idea that this was a gradual increase in salaries is out of place. His own figures show a jump in the department last year from $212,000 to $240,000. The minister was wise in stopping at 1925 when he was giving the figures. Will he say why the expenses of that department should increase $28,000 in a year? Because that is what his figures show. The matter is getting worse instead of better.

Mr. DUNNING: In the previous year, for some unexplained reason, the expenditure declined by $12,000. As between 1924-25 and 1925-26 the expenditures increased, as my hon. friend says, as much as they went down and $12,000 more. My hon. friend stated this afternoon that as chairman he was never refused the necessary appropriation to carry on the work of the Board of Railway Commissioners. This government has not taken the position of refusing what the board considers necessary. I will, however, in view of the increase, give the assurance that during the coming year I will take occasion to consult with the board in regard to the gradually developing expense in connection with their work. It it were possible to bring the board here we would probably find that the investigations they have under way are of a far-reaching and important character, and they might supply us with information beyond that which I have given. The increase from last year to the coming year is accounted for, as I said before, by statutory increases in salaries and civil service reclassification.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why does my hon. friend want to go above the high-water mark of $240,000? It is going up again.

Mr. DUNNING: That was the figure supplied by the board with respect to their needs.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the old rule that members of the board had to give all their time to the work and engage in no other occupation been abrogated?

Mr. DUNNING: Not to my knowledge.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand the deputy chief commissioner went to England on a legal case. I was just wondering whether the rule had been abrogated.

Mr. DUNNING: The case in question is one which the present deputy chief commissioner had in hand at the time he assumed that office, and as a matter of justice to his client he could not very well drop it. He was accordingly permitted to make that trip, but the rule has not been abrogated.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are there any other cases to be wound up?

Mr. DUNNING: Not that I know of.

Mr. STEVENS: At whose expense will he go to England?

Mr. DUNNING: At his own, of course.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 154, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CHICOUTIMI HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 150, respecting the Chicoutimi Harbour Commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When the resolution was under discussion the minister gave two reasons for the incorporation of harbour commissioners: first, request from the people of the locality concerned; and, secondly, request from the member representing that locality. Is there any other ground he can suggest?

Mr. CARDIN: I may add, the importance of the locality and the developments which, as in this case, have already taken place. It is difficult to draw the line between ports that require and ports that do not require harbour commissions. To a great extent it must be a matter of choice on the part of the people affected. I realize of course that there are important ports in Canada which are managed without the assistance of harbour commissions, and I may assure the hon. gentleman that if a request comes from any such port there will be no resistance on the part of the government. In this case the people are satisfied that the business of the port can be carried on to better advantage if a commission is appointed. The committee will understand that no expense devolves on the government. The commission is expected to operate on its own revenues, and if assistance should be required at any time application must be made to parliament. This bill does not provide for any advances, the object being merely the incorporation of the commission. I would remind my hon. friend that even in such ports where there are no commissions the government is very often obliged to make expenditures. There are in Canada certain ports that handle only grain and coal, but the vessels calling at Chicoutimi will carry cargoes of various descriptions. The important point, however, is that the government is not committing itself to any expenditures; as I say, if any assistance is needed later on the commission will have to come to parliament. Where expenditures are made in ports that are not under the control of commission, the money is spent through the Department of Public Works. I do not think I can give any further reasons for the appointment either of this commission or of harbour commissions generally.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was merely trying to find out what the policy was. This may be a good place for a commission; I do not know. These harbour commissions sometimes work well and sometimes they do not. I was anxious to ascertain whether there was any other reason for the bill than public clamour, but apparently there is not.

Mr. CARDIN: It is the desire of the business men of the locality.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If they ask for it they get it.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, just as I would grant the request if it came from any other quarter.

Mr. STEVENS: From a cursory glance at the bill I fancy it is modelled after the acts incorporating the Montreal and Vancouver boards.

Mr. CARDIN: It is practically a copy of the Vancouver act.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the magnitude of the business now handled at this port? What are the customs returns as to tonnage in and out?

Mr. CARDIN: I have no information regarding the customs revenues, but the harbour dues collected last year amounted to $7,192.

Mr. STEVENS: What salaries will be paid?

Mr. CARDIN: No salaries.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Interpretation.

Mr. STEVENS: Are these definitions the same as those in similar bills?

Mr. CARDIN: Absolutely; they have been taken from the others.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Harbour limits defined.

Mr. STEVENS: I have a little experience in matters of this kind, and I should like to know whether the government has carefully ascertained the limits in this case. The section refers to "all tidal waters of the Saguenay."

Mr. CARDIN: From a certain point.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but they are more or less undefined. The tidal waters might over a considerable distance interfere with private properties and interests, creating difficulties to be coped with later on. Has the government checked the boundaries which are so indefinitely fixed in this section?

Mr. CARDIN: The matter has been considered by the officers of the department and I am assured that there will be no interference with private property.

Mr. STEVENS: I would merely add that I think it is in the interest of the government that the upper boundary should be fixed by something more than merely the movement of the tide.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Officers and employees.

Mr. STEVENS: This of course provides for what is the usual equipment of a first-class harbour. The government is going to be faced with the necessity of financing this.

Mr. CARDIN: No, the harbour commission will finance itself through its revenue. Of course if it has to ask the government for anything it will have to come before parliament.

Mr. STEVENS: We hope so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the government considered the desirability of retaining some control over salaries and expenditures in connection with the harbour commissioners?

Mr. CARDIN: The salaries to be paid have to be fixed by by-laws, and those by-laws will have to be approved by the minister.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend quite sure that is right? That is the understanding which I had myself, but I notice that to a question put recently by one of the hon. members for St. John information was refused as to the salaries paid by the commissioners of Quebec harbour. Now, it would be highly improper to refuse that information if it was a matter of government business. I have not the question in my mind exactly, but I think my hon. friend has. Surely the House has a right to take action as a committee of parliament,—a term of which this government is so fond. We cannot do so if the position is taken that it is something we are not concerned with. My hon. friend probably recollects the question and answer?

Mr. CARDIN: I do. I am not quite sure that the harbour commission to which my hon. friend refers is on the same footing as the Vancouver Harbour Commission or this commission. My hon. friend will find that under subsection (d) of section 11 the commissioners may by by-law provide for:

> The compensation or salaries to be paid the officers, assistants, engineers, clerks and servants appointed by the corporation;

[Mr. Cardin.]

And further on he will see that the by-laws will have no force or effect until they are confirmed by the Governor in Council. So the salary by-laws will have to be approved by order in council. I am not sure that there is a similar provision in other cases.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can my hon. friend tell the House just exactly the grounds on which he refused to answer the question. I have referred to in regard to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners? Was not that a matter of public business?

Mr. CARDIN: We took the ground that according to the policy which had been followed by this government, and I believe by the preceding government too, certain information could be withheld, for example, by the officers of the National Railways, which they considered of a confidential nature. We followed the same principle because we contended that the salaries, being paid out of the revenues of the port, were rather of an administrative nature, and therefore the commissioners were entitled to secrecy as to them. I must admit that I am not so strong with respect to that case.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let me hasten to assure my hon. friend that he is quite wrong. I have no doubt representations were made to him as he says, but what was withheld, both by the previous government and by this government—although this government has withheld far more—in connection with the railways was in relation to questions of competition, where if the information had been given out competitors could have taken advantage of it. But even in that case it was confined entirely to current business, never to capital account, although this government extended it to questions of capital account. My hon. friend will see how absurd it would be for him to take the position that there is any analogy between the two cases. The harbour commissioners of Quebec have no competitors. My hon. friend says the salaries were paid out of the revenues of the port. Who is paying those revenues? The taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. CARDIN: Not only the taxpayers of this country, but also the owners of foreign vessels.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But foreign vessels do not come there unless their owners are making some money out of the traffic. The ultimate Canadian consumer is paying every cent of it. But over and above all that, there is a tremendous deficit there every year; we cannot get our interest, and we are carrying that port. I hope my hon. friend will see that that position is reconsidered. I point out to him that it is absolutely at variance with what he himself thinks ought to be done and what he is doing in this very bill. It is information to which the public is entitled, and I am quite sure my hon. friend will see that an answer is given to the question I have referred to.

Mr. CARDIN: Of course the information will be open to the public in this case.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And in the other too.

Mr. CARDIN: I am ready to consider it. I do not know how the law stands with respect to it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is entirely in his own hands. It is not a question of law, it is a question of what is right.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On section 11—By-laws.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We should take this section paragraph by paragraph.

Subsection 1, Paragraph (a) agreed to.

Paragraph (b)—Regulation and control of vessels.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That seems to be a very broad clause.

Mr. CARDIN: It is the ordinary clause. It is included in all the other Harbour Commission Acts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I do not suppose any trouble will come of it, but I think it is rather broad. It covers the regulation and control of each and every matter in connection with vessels navigating the harbour. I should have thought the harbour commissioners could only control matters in connection with the mooring, berthing, discharging or loading of vessels.

Mr. CARDIN: That is the usual clause; you will find it in the Vancouver and other harbour acts.

Paragraph (b) agreed to.

Paragraphs (c) to (k) inclusive agreed to.

Section 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Payment of rates as to seagoing vessels.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the same standard?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, the same thing.

Section agreed to.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—borrowing powers.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It seems to me that this is the important clause of the bill. This measure has to do with a harbour or port from which the total revenue last year amounted to some $7,000. By this bill we are setting up a full fledged harbour commission and making provision for a staff of engineers, clerks, officers, and everything they may need, and by clause 14 we are giving them authority to borrow money, subject to the ratification of the Governor in Council. We are simply inviting this commission to spend money, to put it plainly; we are simply saying, "Here is the opportunity; now go out and issue bonds and debentures for which the Governor in Council will be responsible, with which to put on all the frills in connection with this harbour."

Mr. CARDIN: My hon. friend is mistaken; the government is not responsible unless we decide to take responsibility through a bill which will be brought before parliament. But there is no responsibility under that clause.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Perfectly true, but we are setting up this organization to control that port, and when they come to the government and say, "We must have a loan of $100,000 and if we do not get it we cannot do the work" you will have to give it to them.

Mr. CARDIN: Parliament will have to judge that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The government is authorizing this commission to go ahead and organize that port in their own way. True, it is subject to ratification by the Governor in Council, but in the passage of a bill of this character, I submit that if the minister will just go back and think of what has taken place, past experience will show that in every case where this kind of commission has been set up the usual result follows, and the government of Canada becomes responsible for its expenditures which just accumulate from year to year. That is why the general list of expenditures is increasing.

Mr. CARDIN: Suppose there is no harbour commission at Chicoutimi and that on account of developments which will take place in that neighbourhood within four or five 10 p.m. years the population of the district increases to fifteen or twenty-five thousand or more; if they come to this government or to any other government asking for wharves to be built or dredging to be done in Chicoutimi, who is to refuse them? Probably they will not have to come, because the traffic will be developed by that time. My hon. friend says there is no commission which has not come to parliament to borrow money; the commission of Three Rivers has not yet come before parliament.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister is mistaken.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is very young.

Mr. CARDIN: The harbour commission of Three Rivers was established three or four years ago.

Mr. STEVENS: What about Vancouver?

Mr. CARDIN: I think I may say that Vancouver is going to take care of itself very soon.

Mr. STEVENS: It has always paid its interest.

Mr. CARDIN: So the government has no responsibility at all. When there is sufficient traffic at Chicoutimi to justify it we will have plenty of opportunity to look into this thing and to discuss the needs when these people come before parliament—if they ever come—asking for assistance or asking to have the right to borrow some money, but at present they are not asking for a dollar. They only want to form some kind of corporation to look after the needs of the port, and these people are to administer the harbour according to the revenues they are receiving at present. These moneys for which they are authorized to issue debentures are guaranteed by the revenues receivable or the property controlled by the corporation, so we take no responsibility at present.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister should be able to tell us what this money will be raised on, what property the commissioners have.

Mr. CARDIN: The revenues or property receivable or controlled.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am referring to the property to be charged by these mortgage bonds to be issued. How much money have we now invested in Chicoutimi which we would be handing over to the commission —because we are handing over all our property there?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does it amount to?

Mr. CARDIN: I could not tell at present.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I say that the harbour of Chicoutimi will do the work for not only Chicoutimi but for the adjoining district as well, including Bagotville, St. Alphonse and that new city of Arvida which was created this winter, where there will be a population of thirty thousand within two years and one hundred thousand within ten years, according to the officials of the Aluminum Company. This company is there building a plant the total cost of which I understand will be in the neighbourhood of $100,000,000. It is a stupendous work which is going on in that territory. The Duke-Price Company are building a huge pulp and paper plant, and there is also the surrounding district to be considered. It is understood that it is the most promising section of the province of Quebec and that is a very moderate statement. The Aluminum Company have already given orders for a number of big ships and are going to operate them. These ships will bring the raw material from South America for the operation of their plant in Chicoutimi. Ultimately the Saguenay river will become one of the most important avenues of navigation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think everyone appreciates that, and anything I may say with respect to this matter is not intended in any way to minimize the importance of the harbour. But the point is this: I take it that the port of Chicoutimi has been administered by a harbour master up to now.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It would until a very few years ago.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Exactly. There must have been a harbour master at Chicoutimi the same as there is in the case of hundreds of other ports of a similar character throughout Canada. But it seems to me that when you create a commission of this character you immediately set up a spending body. You appoint a commission of three men. It is all right to say they are not going to get salaries, and that they will have to finance themselves, but I make the prediction that before a year, or perhaps two years, we will find that this body has issued bonds and debentures for which, in the final analysis, this government will become responsible and they will have to pay to the extent of a very large expenditure. I ask hon. gentlemen to watch and see what will take place.

Sections 15 and 16 agreed to.

On section 17—Seizure and detention of vessels.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where is the authority to be found for the limits defined in this section?

Mr. CARDIN: In the shipping act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The right of seizure and detention is given not only in the harbour limits but anywhere in the province of Quebec. We have something very different from that, of course, in Vancouver. What is the limit in Vancouver? The province of British Columbia?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, the province of British Columbia and that part of the ocean over which we exercise jurisdiction.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Seizure and detention of goods.

Mr. CARDIN: These are the customary clauses.

Section agreed to.

Section 19 agreed to.

On section 20—Service of process.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is quite clear that all these sections are modelled after clauses in other bills?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. That is the absolute information given me by the officers of the department.

Mr. STEVENS: As far as I can get the effect of the sections as we go along, they seem to be in harmony.

Section agreed to.

Sections 21 to 24, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 153, to amend the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 1—Unlawful associations, publishing seditious books.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend kindly explain the purpose of the section?

Mr. LAPOINTE: These two sections which we intend to repeal were added to the Criminal Code in 1919. I do not say that they were placed in the act on account of events in Winnipeg, although it was done after those events. But it was explained at the time that owing to the period of unrest through which the world was passing it would be important to place those sections in the act which, if not enlarging the powers already given under the clauses relating to sedition, would at least make them more definite in certain ways. It was further explained that they were intended to replace to a large extent, certain provisions which had been made during the war under the War Measures Act by way of orders in council. Since that time labour in general, but especially organized labour, has continually and strongly complained about these two sections. Every year since I have been a member of the government representatives of the Trades and Labour Congress, when they came annually to present their suggestions to the government, have asked that these two sections might be repealed, leaving the situation as it was prior to 1919. They have always feared that the sections in question would be directed against the activities of labour unions, although those who are responsible for the insertion of the sections in the code always claimed that such was not the intention. At all events we have already in the code sufficient protection as to everything against which we should be protected in the matter of sedition. We have those precautions in section 87 and also provisions concerning unlawful assemblies. We find provisions in section 130 regarding sedition, oaths or engagements in societies; in section 132 against seditious words, seditious libel and seditious conspiracy, in section 135 against any libel on a foreign sovereign, and in section 136 against publishing false news. Sedition under the British law, of course, is an old offence, but there has never been a strict definition of sedition. I think it was in 1880 that the British commissioners who were entrusted with the work of drafting the English code inserted a clause defining seditious intention. That clause read as follows:

An intention to bring into hatred or contempt or to excite disaffection against the person of Her Majesty, or the government and constitution of the United Kingdom or of any part of it as by law established, or either House of Parliament, or the administration of justice; or to excite Her Majesty's subjects to attempt to procure, otherwise than by lawful means, the alteration of any matter in church or state by law established; or to raise discontent or disaffection amongst Her Majesty's subjects; or to promote feelings of illwill and hostility between different classes of such subjects.

This was not made part of the British code; parliament rather preferred to let the tribunals decide as to sedition under the common law as the practice had always been in the past. The same thing happened in Canada. When our Criminal Code was introduced in parliament there was a clause similar to the one which had been drafted by the commissioners of the English code. Here also, after a good deal of discussion and criticism, both in committee and in the House, the clause was not accepted, and we were left with the old British law concerning sedition and governed by the common law of England. This has always worked well in Canada, as well as in Great Britain, and I am firmly convinced that the sections which were added in 1919, on account, as was said at the time, of the unrest which prevailed in the world, are not at all necessary. I asked the officers of the Department of Justice to ascertain whether any prosecutions had ever been made under these sections, and I was told that they could find no record of any.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We were told in the debate the other day, which was provoked on a question of privilege, that people were prosecuted in Winnipeg under this section.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, that is a mistake.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member for North Winnipeg said so. It may be a mistake but the statement was made.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think there was any case before the court under those sections.

Mr. HEAPS: It was under the Immigration Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Winnipeg proceedings were taken under the old law.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think there is any reason why we should not accede to the requests of the Labour unions, in which they are supported by the railway brotherhood. Their representatives have come here every year, and especially this year, and insisted very strongly upon their requests. They have a feeling that these provisions are directed against organized labour. I do not think that such was the intention, but owing to the fact that we are amply protected by the sections of the Criminal Code as they are and as they were, we are asking the repeal of those two sections.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If I understand the hon. minister, his position is not that he has any objection to the law against the use of force, violence, terrorism or physical injury to any person or property, or the provision respecting the overthrow of governments, but what he is doing is to strike out the unnecessary provisions in the act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The first section repealed is a provision against the use of force, violence or physical injury to any person or property. What section of the code covers that case?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Sections 133 and 134.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, the minister is repealing 97A.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the existing section which covers that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Sections 133 and 134. The provisions of the code relating to utterances which have a tendency to produce feelings of hatred or ill-will between different classes of a community have always come under the provision relating to sedition under the common law.

Mr. STEVENS: How does section 133 read?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is rather an exception, to show how far under the general term "sedition" the courts can go. It was necessary to insert an exception. Section 133, which was repealed in 1919, is to be re-enacted as follows:

"No one shall be deemed to have a seditious intention only because he intends in good faith,—

"(a) to show that His Majesty has been misled or mistaken in his measures; or,

"(b) to point out errors or defects in the government or constitution of the United Kingdom, or of any part of it, or of Canada or any province thereof, or in either House of Parliament of the United Kingdom or of Canada, or in any legislature, or in the administration of justice; or to excite His Majesty's subjects to attempt to procure, by lawful means, the alteration of any matter in the state; or,

"(c) to point out, in order to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce feelings of hatred or ill-will between different classes of His Majesty's subjects."

We want to reinsert those exceptions to the general law of sedition.

Mr. HOCKEN: Were any of those trades unions able to explain to the minister's satisfaction how these clauses now in the act could apply to them?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well one of the grounds of their fears was the use of the word "force", coupled with the word "industrial or economic change." They claim that certain courts have expressed the opinion that a strike, for instance, would come within the meaning of the word "force", and that this section might be used against labour unions in an industrial difficulty where resort is had to strikes in order to secure an economic change.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not agree with that. But supposing that is the case, why could that section not be amended by striking out that particular part of it and leaving the section to operate against men who come in here to advocate setting up such a system as they have in Russia?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend may be sure that the Criminal Code as it was and as it will be left will be sufficient to protect the citizens of Canada in that respect. I am far from being sure that these sections have improved our code. I think the British system with regard to this is better than the United States system. These are really copies of the United States law in this matter and I am in favour of the British system.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I may supplement what the minister has said with regard to the objections of organized labour, I should like to quote a paragraph or two from the 1920 report of the proceedings of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. They had taken the advice of Mr. J. G. O'Donoghue of Toronto with regard to the bearing of certain of these sections. He gives his reasons for his objection to these two words "force" and "terrorism" which had been made use of in connection with the Winnipeg trials.

Judge Metcalfe's charge to the jury in the Russell case contained the following:

> Mr. Russell gave us his idea of a sympathetic strike. He said, "When a dispute originates between an employer and his employees, and when the labour organizations see that organization being beat, they come to their assistance by calling a strike to force their employers to bring force to bear upon the original disputants to make settlement." That is Russell's definition given in the box. . . . Force, force, force.

The comment is made:

> A court would be quite justified in interpreting the word in its natural or dictionary sense.
> As for the word "terrorism", some light can be thrown upon the interpretation of it by that given in the Winnipeg case of Rex vs. Russell. There Judge Metcalfe says:
> "To walk around about, for instance, to a place where people are employed in large numbers, and to 'boo', gentlemen of the jury, as much terror may be inspired through that as by two or three fighting chaps coming along with bludgeons. Take it from me, in strikes you can incite terror without hitting a man over the head. You can incite terror of starvation; you can incite terror of thirst. Is not that quite as effective as inciting by bodily violence? Your stomach will bring you quicker than a crack on the head sometimes. If it is possible that picketing can be done in this country, then the lawful method of picketing is so ineffective that it is a reasonable inference that in strikes of this class, unlawful means would be intended to be applied. Sometimes it has a deterring effect upon people's minds by exposing them to have their motions watched, and to encounter black looks."
> The last couple of lines show the possibilities of the word "terrorism."

But apart from the question of altering these two words, I should like to call attention in the sections to be repealed to several phrases which I think any hon. gentleman will come to realize are not such as we would like to leave in the laws of this country. In defining an unlawful association one section speaks of any society that advocates the use of force. Again that word is used, but force may be economic force. What do we mean by force? Further, there is this provision with regard to the property of such unlawful association:

> Any property, real or personal, belonging or suspected to belong to an unlawful association. . . may, without warrant, be seized or taken possession of. . . and may thereupon be forfeited to His Majesty.

Mr. HOCKEN: A trades union is not an unlawful association.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the point. Trades unions are afraid of being classed as unlawful associations because they may at a time of crisis such as a strike urge the use of economic force.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is, a sympathetic strike?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. HOCKEN: Which has been determined in Great Britain to be unlawful.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, it has not.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is the judgment which was given in the late strike.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There has been no decision of the courts on that. I am sure that no one would suggest the desirability of having it in our laws that simple suspicion should be the ground for confiscation. As a matter of fact, although the incident did not come directly under this law, I know of a case in the city of Calgary where an English worker of a superior type had been collecting a library over a period of ten or twenty years and had brought that library with him to this country. Some official ssuspected that there was something dangerous in it. That library was seized without warrant and confiscated, and that man, who happens to be an alderman in the city of Calgary, has been unable from that time on to get it back. If this law were in force that kind of thing could become general.

Mr. STEVENS: That was not done under this law.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No. I said that did not come directly under this law, but if this law were retained and acted upon, that kind of thing could become general.

Mr. HOCKEN: Has anything of that kind been done under this act?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As the minister has said, no action has been taken under this law since it was enacted. The act further provides that anyone associated with an unlawful association is liable to imprisonment. Again you have a beautifully indefinite phrase: "associated with." The janitor of a hall in which was held a meeting of an association which was suspected to be unlawful might be charged with being associated with that organization and liable to imprisonment. Further:

> If it be proved that the person charged has (a) attended meetings of an unlawful association. . . it shall be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary that he is a member of such unlawful association.

That seems to me a most outrageous clause. If an association is holding a street meeting and someone comes along to listen to what has been said, he is then presumed to be a member of such association and the burden of proof lies with him. We used to be taught that a man ought to be regarded as innocent until he was proven guilty. According to this legislation the thing is reversed and the very fact that he attends a meeting is presumptive evidence that he belongs to an association. Further, any owner of any theatre or other building in which a meeting is held, although he may know nothing about the matter, may be dragged in because there has been this meeting of an unlawful association.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. STEVENS: It reads "who knowingly permits", which is contrary to what the hon. member has just said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What I meant to say was that the owner of a hall may know the name of an organization, but it is very difficult for him to determine whether or not that organization is unlawful. He may rent his hall or he may be afraid to rent it for fear of being dragged in. A little further down section 6 reads:

> If. . . . any justice of the peace is satisfied. . . that there is reasonable ground for suspecting that any contravention of this section has been or is about to be committed, he may issue a search warrant—

And so on, to seize and carry away books. That is going still further. How any justice of the peace can be more of a mind reader than anybody else, and can determine beforehand whether a crime is going to be committed, I do not know.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the hon. member read the first two lines of the section?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The section reads:

> If any judge of any superior or county court, police or stipendiary magistrate, or any justice of the peace—

I emphasize the last mentioned because he is an inferior officer.

> —is satisfied by information on oath—

Mr. NICHOLSON: He does not need to be a mind reader in that case.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not all.

> —that there is reasonable ground for suspecting that any contravention of this section has been or is about to be committed,—

Et cetera. How can anyone swear that a crime is about to be committed?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Swears that he suspects.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the minister would go the whole length with the hon. member.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We really do not need these sections in the code.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Suppose that as between different nationals in this country or as between religious bodies prejudice ran high: you can understand how readily some petty police magistrate might get the idea into his head that someone was about to do something dreadful. Would it be reasonable that he should have power immediately to order seizure of property in such a case? In this connection I might quote from a judgment of Lord Camden, who held that search warrants were contrary to the fundamental Anglo-Saxon rights of personal security and property:

> Where is the written law that gives any magistrate such a power? I can safely answer there in none, and therefore it is too much for us without authority to presume a practice legal which would be subversive of all the comforts of society. . . If suspicion at large should be on a ground for search especially in the case of libels, i.e., seditious publications, whose home would be safe?

We may well take the judgment of Lord Camden on such a point. It is provided further in the code that any person who imports into Canada from any other country any such literature shall be liable to twenty years. I remember an instance several years ago in which a friend of mine wrote to me with regard to a book which he had ordered from England and which had been seized in the customs. On inquiry of the customs officer I found that this book was regarded by the postal authorities as seditious, notwithstanding the fact that it was published in England and that copies of it were on the shelves in some of our public libraries. I wrote back to my friend and told him that he might consider himself lucky that he was not serving twenty years in the penitentiary inasmuch as action could have been taken against him under this legislation in the Criminal Code.

To a large extent our policy after the Great war and subsequent to the Russian revolutoin, when people were very much afraid of what might happen throughout the world, was almost as repressive as the legislation which was adopted in Great Britain a hundred years previously after the Napoleonic wars. In this connection I would quote from May's Constitutional History of England touching the legislation of 1792. At page 33 he says:

> The influential classes, more alarmed than the government, eagerly fomented the prevailing spirit of reaction. They had long been jealous of the growing influence of the press and popular opinion. Their own power had been disturbed by the political agitation of the last thirty years, and was further threatened by parliamentary reform. But the time had now come for recovering their ascendency. The democratic spirit of the people was betraying itself, and must be crushed out in the cause of order. The dangers of parliamentary reform were illustrated by clamours for universal suffrage, annual parliaments, and the rights of man; and reformers of all degrees were to be scouted as revolutionary. . . It was a crisis of unexampled difficulty, needing the utmost vigilance and firmness. Ministers, charged with the maintenance of order, could not neglect any security which the peril of the time demanded. They were secure of support in punishing sedition and treason; the guilty few would meet with no sympathy among a loyal people. But, counselled by their new chancellor and convert, Lord Loughborough, and the law officers of the crown, the government gave too ready a credence to the reports of their agent: and invested the doings of a small knot of democrats—chiefly working men—with the dignity of a wide-spread conspiracy to overturn the constitution. Ruling over a free state, they learned to dread the people, in the spirit of tyrants. Instead of relying upon the sober judgment of the country, they appealed to its fears; and in repressing seditious practices, they were prepared to sacrifice liberty of opinion. Their policy, dictated by the circumstances of a time of strange and untried danger, was approved by the prevailing sentiment of their contemporaries: but has not been justified in an age of greater freedom, by the maturer judgment of posterity.

That summary of conditions which prevailed in that time of unrest may well suggest to us that possibly we have been carried away by some such fear and that the time has come for us to follow more nearly the practice that obtains in Great Britain.

Mr. HOCKEN: I should be the last to suggest that there should be any restriction in the operations of properly organized trades unions. The trades union has in the social system a place which is firmly established, and he would be a judge of very tyrannical and questionable judgment who would read into trades union disputes anything of the character suggested in what the hon. gentleman has quoted. He has cited the conditions that prevailed after the Napoleonic wars. But are we not in a somewhat different position to-day? There is at this time a nation of between 130,000,000 and 150,000,000, the purpose of whose government is to upset the government of all other nations. A world revolution is the policy of the Russian government; there can be no doubt of that. This they declare to be their policy, and instead of applying their own resources to the improvement of internal social conditions they send vast sums of money to other countries to stir up strife with the end in view of precipitating revolution. In the strike which has just concluded in England large sums of Russian money were offered, and in one or two instances accepted, and the offer was not made to assist in winning the strike. I do not think anyone would suggest that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was declined.

Mr. HOCKEN: It was from the Russian government. It may not have come through their officials.

Mr. STEVENS: It came through the Third Internationale, which controls the Russian government.

Mr. HEAPS: It came from some of the Russian trade unions.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is no such thing as a trade union in Russia.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into a discussion of Russian affairs, but if the hon. gentleman would read the report of the British trade union delegation that investigated conditions in Russia he would find there are very extensive trade unions in that country at the present day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are running away from the bill.

Mr. HOCKEN: I know we are, but I am coming back to it. I want to show why I think there is necessity for some part of that clause. Whether the money came officially from the Russian government or not, this much must be admitted—Mr. Trotsky and the rest of the Russian dictators are just as tyrannical as Napoleon or the czars of Russia ever were, and it was Russian money that was sent to Great Britain in order to organize a revolution and so overturn the present social system. There cannot be any doubt about that, and my argument is, Sir, that while we have 130,000,000 people controlled by revolutionists, who, not satisfied with that they have accomplished in their own country, are keenly anxious to upset constitutional government in all other countries, we must have some law on our statute books to protect us from their activities. The Soviet emissaries are found not only in Great Britain, but in this country, in the United States, in China, in Japan and in India, in fact they are scattered all over the world, and when this Dominion may be made the special object of their attack nobody can tell. I am one of those who believe we are bound continually to have reform, to advance in our social life; but every proposal to that end should be tried and its merits proven before it is put into operation. This is the very opposite of revolution. There has been evolution in our social and industrial life during my time that is really remarkable. When I contrast the conditions under which we now live with the conditions under which I grew up as a boy, I find they are immensely improved to-day. All this goes to show that the process of evolution is proceeding in industry as well as in all other spheres of human activity. I think that is the proper form of procedure. But when we find men who are determined to bring about world revolution and to establish what they call the "rule of the proletariat" in every country of the world, and using the resources of the national treasury of Russia to bring about that violent change, then I say every country that desires to preserve its institutions is warranted in enacting the necessary protective legislation—not to apply such legislation against its own citizens who may be conducting an industrial strike, but to keep out aliens whose only desire is to create dissatisfaction and stir up discord in an effort to upset the government of the country.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Would not our immigration laws prevent them getting in?

Mr. HOCKEN: No. I am entirely sympathetic towards trade unions and the orderly development of our industrial system, but I am absolutely opposed to anything in the shape of revolution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I tell my hon. friend that this bill is not desired by the extremists to whom he is referring but by the Trades nad Labour Congress, which has been asking for such legislation as that which I am now presenting to the House. As my hon. friend says, we must encourage legitimate labour organizations.

Mr. HOCKEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When speaking on the Winnipeg strike some years ago, I took the opportunity of saying, that the extremists do not like the legitimate labour organizations, because they do not want any agreement with capital. Well, the labour unions which my hon. friend desires to encourage, as I do myself, claim that those two sections are directed against them. I do not say they are altogether right in that contention, but that has been their grievance ever since those sections were enacted, and, as I have said, I firmly believe they are not necessary for the purpose which they were intended to effect. I repeat, since 1919 seven years have elapsed, and not once have those two sections been invoked.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say to my hon. friend who is directing this bill—and I am speaking entirely for myself; I have not consulted by colleagues other than to speak to those immediately adjoining me to-night—that I would be quite agreeable to the repeal of these two clauses, particularly in view of the assurance that he gives, in which I am quite certain he is sincere, that the offences covered by them are fully covered in the general law which has been on the statute books for many years. Now, I address myself more directly to the observations of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the school of thought he represents, because we might as well talk frankly about these things; and I concede he has the right to hold whatever views appeal to him—what alarms me is this: but before expressing my views let me quote subsection (1) of section 97A, which it is intended to repeal:

Any association, organization, society or corporation, whose professed purpose or one of whose purposes is to bring about any governmental, industrial or economic change within Canada, by use of force, violence or physical injury to person or property, or by threats of such injury, or which teaches, advocates, advises or defends the use of force, violence, terrorism, or physical injury to person or property, or threats of such injury, in order to accomplish such change, or for any other purpose, or which shall by any means prosecute or pursue such purpose or professed purpose, or shall so teach, advocate, advise or defend, shall be an unlawful association.

Now, my hon. friend extracts from the old sections a paragraph here and there. Prior to his rising to his feet I had marked certain clauses and I was going to suggest to him that certain portions which I think extreme should be changed. But I direct his attention and the attention of the House to this point: You have got to read that section in its entirety, for what it is intended to deal with is the heart and kernel of the attempt that was made not only in Winnipeg, but also in Vancouver, in Calgary and in other centres of Canada where it did not really come to light. The section was drafted to cover the type of organization actually in existence in the form of corporate bodies, deliberately intending to wreck the governmental institutions of this country by violence. There is no question of that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to register an objection to that. May I say a word here?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think it quite the courteous thing to interrupt.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Very well, I will wait until the hon. gentleman is finished.

Mr. STEVENS: I always give way to anyone who wants to interrupt, but I think one might be allowed to finish one train of thought. At that time organizations—yes, an organization of a nation wide character—physically visible in Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver and known in other sections of the country, was in existence with the deliberate intention of wrecking our constitutional, democratic form of government by violence. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. HEAPS: Would you give proof of that?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not going to be drawn into an argument; I do not think anyone will question it.

Mr. HEAPS: I question it.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will surely not suggest for a moment that he does not know what I have said to be absolutely correct.

Mr. HEAPS: I certainly deny it in toto.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sorry my hon. friend does so, because I had a fairly high regard for him, though differing from his economic views and from his socialistic views. There are a great many persons for whom I have a personal regard but who hold these extreme views, honestly I believe. But that does not prevent me from expressing my absolute abhorrence of the process or processes which they purpose to adopt, and there can be no doubt but that that condition existed in Canada when this law was passed. Fortunately for Canada, for Germany, for Austria and for the Balkan states which change so frequently; fortunately 11 p.m. for old England and for the United States, though to a less degree, and fortunately for many of the principal countries of the world, the time has passed for the moment when this force or association of forces is very serious or menacing. But the time was only a few years ago when it was exceedingly menacing.

Mr. HOCKEN: And it may be again.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and it may be again. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have on our statute books and in the Criminal Code very many sections which I might say are useless and unnecessary so far as the average life of the ordinary citizen is concerned. But why are they there? They are there to meet a possible contingency which may arise; some evil-designed person or group of persons may set out to perpetrate a crime against society, and therefore we protect society by these provisions in the Criminal Code. That leads me to the suggestion that the very language marked here for opprobrium and condemnation will be found in other sections of the Criminal Code. Although I am not a lawyer and may be entirely wrong, I will hazard the guess that one of the expressions used a moment ago—"or is about to be committed"—which was used as a reason why this clause should be wiped out, will be found in other sections of the Criminal Code; it must necessarily be there. I will appeal to my friend the Minister of Justice, and I am sure he will sustain me. If one suspects that the crime of murder or arson or grand larceny or something else is about to be committed—

An hon. MEMBER: Or smuggling.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, or smuggling—there rests upon that person a duty to do whatever may be in his power to prevent it, and he may get a search warrant through the proper processes. I noted in my bill certain words; one of the things I cited was this phrase, "without warrant", in one section. I have always been very strongly opposed to giving wide license—I did not use the word "liberty" —to peace officers to make searches without warrant; I think we cannot be too careful in that regard. But because I support that principle, and have done so during the fifteen years I have been in this House, I do not want to be classified as one who condemns the structure of society as we now have it, and the institutions we have to-day. I do not want to associate myself, for instance, with a wholesale condemnation of the intent of this legislation, which was passed in a time of stress.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I don't want to, either.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sure my hon. friend does not. That is one reason why I find myself in a somewhat difficult position. I know that my good friend (Mr. Heaps) who is extreme in his views in regard to this and kindred matters will, when this is repealed—and I am prepared to support its repeal on the grounds advanced by the Minister of Justice—go through this country and acclaim it as a victory for the school of thought which he represents in this House. That is one of the reasons I find a dislike, if I may use the word, to support it. If my hon. friend and those associated with him would take the stand taken by the Minister of Justice; if he would take the moderate stand he adopted in his language to-night I would gladly associate myself with him in bringing about the repeal of this measure. But I am apprehensive that its very repeal will be used throughout Canada within the ambit of those who follow the Third Internationale, if I might use that name in a broad sense, as a victory and an encouragement to them to carry on their agitations.

I have one other thought before I sit down. The experience since 1918, the year of the second revolution in Russia; the experience which is not limited to Russia but which centres there because Russia was chosen as a plastic and suitable place to bring their schemes into existence; the experience the world has had of that doctrine, warrants us in setting our faces unswervingly against this propaganda and its extension here or wherever an effort may be made to spread it. It should also be borne in mind that the doctrines of the Third Internationale, against which this legislation was directed, are not the doctrines of the masses; they are not the doctrines of democracy or the proletariat. They are the doctrines of a very narrow group of highly educated but wholly unscrupulous individuals who are seeking for power and who exercise in Russia a more rigid and more arbitrary power than has ever been exercised within the last hundred years by any government on the face of the earth.

I am quite aware that in answer to this statement it will be advanced that the government of Russia to-day is moderate, and that it has qualified its former drastic measures. That is true. Why? Because in the face of an overwhelming world-wide antagonism, not in the ranks of a few capitalists or others but among the rank and file of the people of a dozen countries, in the face of an overwhelming influence from that source they were forced to abandon their extreme economic standards and views and come in large measure back to the normal economic views held in other countries. Yet the avowed intention of the Third Internationale, which still stands behind and whose hand still overshadows the Russian government, is still there. I have a great faith in the people of Canada and have often stated that I do not think such a doctrine can ever find root and succeed in this country; but there were times and there were places where it had such a measure of success that it made a great many of us falter in our confidence in its inability to succeed. So while I personally feel inclined to accept the very moderate and, I think, very reasonable view advanced by the Minister of Justice, I do not wish to allow myself to be associated with the suggestion that this legislation was evil or that its intent was evil; and it is only with the assurance that our liberties are safeguarded in other ways that I would consent at all to agree to its removal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not wish to delay the passing of this section by speaking at any length, but as the last speaker has directed his remarks to me rather than to the bill, I cannot allow his statements to pass without adding a few words. I would say distinctly that I am not under trial or on the defensive at all. It always amuses me to find the assurance with which some hon. members of this House undertake to lecture other members. Some of them are apt to get very hysterical about Russia. I do not know why Russia should be introduced into this discussion. While the hon. member for Toronto West Centre was speaking I recalled that I had seen in the Graphic a few days ago a rather interesting illustration showing that in England, they do not get quite so excited about these things. This was an illustration of the unfurling of the Soviet flag at the Shakespeare celebration at Stratford-on-Avon. Evidently the Russian officials, one of whom was the official trade representative of Russia for some time in Montreal, were participating in a tribute from that country to the great British poet. I do not know why in Canada—other than because we are so near to the hysterical United States—we have to become so excited about Russia. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) spent the greater part of his speech in denouncing the Third Internationale which, according to him, is wholly unscrupulous, one of the worst institutions that has ever existed on the face of the earth, and incidentally he tried to associate me with that body. Well, I may say very frankly, without criticizing the Third Internationale or defending it, that I belong to an organization that has no affiliation whatever with the Third Internationale, and if the hon. member would take a little trouble to read the labour papers he would find that the organ of the Third Internationale sometimes criticises very severely the organization which my comrade and I represent because we are so far from being in harmony with their position.

Mr. HOCKEN: What organization do you represent?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Independent Labour Party of Manitoba. We were both elected on its platform, and as my comrade (Mr. Heaps) suggests, we have had the opposition of the communists in the political field. So it is always just a little bit amusing to those of us who have been at all near the inside of the labour movement to hear the perfectly wild statements made by some honourable members—statements which they would be ashamed to make if they had any real knowledge of the situation. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre seeks to associate me with the Third Internationale after he has denounced it in round terms and states that I belong to a certain school of thought, that I am extreme in my views. Well, I have tried to express myself as clearly as possible during the last five years in this House, and I have said here the very self-same things that I have been saying up and down the country.

Mr. STEVENS: No, only a part of them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, the self-same things. I will allow the hon. member for Vancouver Centre to read the very charges made against me a few years ago and I affirm with confidence that he will say that my statements outside are not any more extreme than the statements I have made here. The other night when I suggested a capital levy for the extinction of the war debt, which is a part of our programme, one hon. gentleman stated that it savoured of Moscow. It is the first time in my life I have ever heard that the extinction of the war debt by means of a capital levy was ever advocated in Moscow. As a matter of fact we took the proposal from the programme of the British Labour party.

Mr. HOCKEN: In Russia they took it all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so; there they did not wait for a capital levy.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is, a capital levy from those who became millionaires during the war?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. We took the proposal from the British Labour party, but that is characterized in this House as savouring of Moscow. That is the kind of talk in which some hon. members indulge. Without entering any further into the matter, because I thought we had got through with the Winnipeg strike last night, let me make one or two comments with regard to the assertion—simply the bald assertion—made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. I do not blame the hon. member. I know how widely such statements were circulated by the press at the time. But I should like to suggest to him that I was as closely connected with that strike as most men. I was not officially connected with it, I did not arrive in Winnipeg until the third week of the strike. But I knew the labour situation intimately at the coast; I knew intimately the men in Winnipeg, and I want to say that there was not one scrap of evidence adduced during the six weeks of the trial that showed there had been any preparation whatever to overturn the government by force of arms. Knowing the inside of the movement as I do I will say this: While there may have been a few individuals who made outrageous statements—I do not deny that—there was no such conspiracy as a great many have imagined.

One other word on this subject and I am through. The hon. gentleman would try to make out that I am advocating the use of force. I would say to him and the House very frankly that on principle I am opposed to the use of force. The political organization which I represent is opposed to the use of force. That is one reason why we are criticized some times by the representatives of the Third Internationale. We carry our views in that regard to this extent: We are opposed to military force in settling disputes as between nations just as we are to its use in the settlement of disputes as between classes. And the irony of the whole situation is that some of us who during the years of war were accused of everything under the sun that was bad because we opposed force in settling international disputes, have later been accused of the advocacy of force in the settlement of class disputes. I repeat that personally I am opposed to force and further that in advocating the wiping out of this legislation I am not urging or defending the use of force for the attainment of the objects of labour. I would say to the hon. member opposite that if the labouring people are agitating as some of them do, sooner or later force will have to be used; why are they doing it? Because they have learned the use of force from those who control our government to-day. They say that if force was used in whipping the Germans, force is also justified in securing our rights. I think their logic cannot very well be disputed.

Mr. HOCKEN: You are advocating force.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. HOCKEN: What are you doing then?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think any hon. member who has listened to my speech will say that I have not advocated force. I would say that many of the labour people have learned the use of force from those who employed it during the war.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is the government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, and having learned the lesson, they say that if the only way of defeating the Germans was by means of force, and if the only way of settling other international disputes is by force, then the means of settling class disputes is by force.

Mr. HOCKEN: You believe that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, nor do I believe it is the way to settle international disputes. That is why I am voting for disarmament all along the line.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend dispute the fact that the strike in Seattle, the possession of that city for several days by a certain group, the general strike in Vancouver and the general strike in Winnipeg, were carried on by the application of force, without quibbling as to what form of force? My second question is, was not my hon. friend in favour of and supporting all three strikes?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am afraid we are digressing from the bill before the committee, but with regard to that word "force" there was no armed force—

Mr. STEVENS: That is a different thing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No armed force in the Winnipeg strike.

Mr. STEVENS: There was forced possession.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There was a concerted effort on the part of the labour people in general, or a sympathetic strike.

Mr. STEVENS: And physical possession.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Physical possession and physical control of the management of the community.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Since my hon. friend has asked me the question, I do not believe there was any real connection between the Seattle strike and the strikes in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh yes there was, directly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would admit that at that time there was a good deal of general unrest all over and there was a feeling after the war that we had come to the time when we should settle things on a new basis. The manufacturers and others were talking of reconstruction and the labour people were talking of reconstruction, only—I will admit this—that the word they most commonly used was "social" or "economic" revolution, which is a technical phrase in all socialist literature, and which means that since a hundred years ago we had an industrial revolution which changed production from individual to collective production, it had to be followed by another revolution, economic and social which would give democracy in industry. Does that answer the question?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am very much in the same position as my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre. I am prepared to accept the assurances of the hon. Minister of Justice that there are provisions in the Criminal Code that take care of the situation that this enactment was designed to take care of, and that words and phrases in this enactment which were prepared perhaps hurriedly and which are too strong should be eliminated. For instance, in the very first paragraph the word "force", which is used in two places, could have very well be left out, and the clause would have carried identically the same meaning and served the same purpose. The positions of the labour organizations, and particularly the railway brotherhood, have been referred to, I would like to point out that the movement that this enactment was designed to correct had for its purpose the destruction of these very organizations. I am not going to follow my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre. I read into the record a couple of evenings ago a statement, in which it was clearly set out that the first purpose of that movement was the destruction of organized labour. Those who wanted to bring that about recognized that organized labour stood as the main barrier in their road to the progress they desired to make, and the whole movement, originating as it did in the western and northwestern United States and in western Canada was designed—for what? To seize the railways, to seize industry and municipal government, and eventually to seize the government of this country, following out their purpose. Now it is true the agitation has to some degree quieted down, if I may use that expression, but let us not lose sight of the fact that, although it has quieted down, it nevertheless exists. There are so-called Sunday schools in this country, in many towns in northern Ontario and in our cities. They are taking the boys and girls from these towns, wherever they can get them, into these so-called Sunday schools, to teach them the doctrine of the destruction of the present system of government in this country, and these organizations are being financed to a very considerable degree by the Third Internationale and the Soviets in Russia. My hon. friend has frequently referred to what the labour movement desires, and in that regard I take it he presumes to speak for the labour people in this country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I represent primarily a certain group in Winnipeg; I do not claim to speak for all the labour people.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I represent a certain group in one constituency, but my hon. friend the Minister of Justice referred to the Trades and Labour Congress, for which everyone, I think, who cares for well-ordered relations between all classes of people has the highest regard. Let us see what the president of the Trades and Labour Congress has to say with regard to this so-called labour movement represented by the Labour party. On the 9th of April, Mr. Tom Moore, whom we all know very well, made this statement:

> There is a trades union movement and a labour movement, both of which are distinct. The political movement, because it was the younger of the two, was courted by the communists, but the labour political party is in no way representative of organized labour in Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I call attention to the fact that Mr. Tom Moore was commenting on the Canadian Labour Party, not on the Independent Labour Party of Manitoba?

The CHAIRMAN: At this time of the night I think we should come back to the clause under discussion.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am endeavouring to point out some reasons why we should go a little slow and why I, while accepting the assurance of the Minister of Justice, want to make it clear that although labour organizations to some degree have objected to words and phrases in this act, its purpose was in protect the labour organizations themselves and through their representatives at the time this enactment was being put into the statutes of this country they approved every single action that was taken. That is my point.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They did not.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The official representatives of the labour organizations—

Mr. LAPOINTE: At the time they made representations before a committee of the House that was dealing with this matter that they were opposed to it. Mr. Moore said so at the following meeting of the Trades and Labour Congress.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will accept what my hon. friend has said, but those of us who were in the House of Commons, as the Minister of Justice, was at the time these enactments were being put through, know there was very little time for representations to be made.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I want to say, speaking with knowledge, that associated with those who were responsible for bringing this about were representatives at least of the railway brotherhoods of this country, in order to check not the strike but the incipient revolution that was taking place. I do not wish to oppose the passage of this clause. I am accepting the assurance of the Minister of Justice, nevertheless we require on our statutes now, just as rigidly as we did then, laws that will prevent the dissemination of the kind of agitation that has for its purpose the advocacy of the use of force, that is going on quietly and that will break out the minute the opportunity comes. Let me say just what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has said, that the danger in connection with repealing this legislation is that those people who have had some slight fear of this act will feel that they have now been given an opportunity to continue with the class of propaganda that they were disseminating before, and the same thing may break out again.

Mr. BIRD: Just in a few words I wish to associate myself with the members who have been single-handed in advocating this measure. It would be a pity for us to leave those gentlemen to fight this battle alone, because after all it is the battle of all of us. this measure which is giving us an amount of liberty which is long overdue. I totally dissociate myself from the sentiments as expressed by my hon. friends to the right. The regrettable thing about extremes is that one extreme begets another.

During war time there was a vast upheaval in people's ideas; democracy kicked over the traces, and there was an explosion here and there throughout the civilized world. Most people took it calmly because such things had happened before; but people of a certain timidity of disposition, of a certain conservative cast of mind, immediately became hysterical, went to the other extreme and wanted to divest the people of the liberties which they had. I thought we were so far removed from the disturbing scenes of war time and the aftermath of war as to be able to look at these things calmly, but I am afraid the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and the hon. member for East Algoma are still under the influence of that period. I was struck by the paralled which the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) drew with the period just after the Napoleonic wars. He said: "In those times there was no international organization trying to overthrow governments and constitutions." But he was altogether wrong. At that time minds just like his were putting forward exactly the same plea that he has to-night, that we must curb liberty, the time-honoured liberty of the people, because they have conjured up some imaginary force that is undermining democracy.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

I call to mind an incident which illustrates my point. The government of that time in England actually hired spies to dog the steps of, not communists, not bolsheviks, but respectable and prominent citizens. I remember the story of one spy who had a big nose and who was detailed to watch the movement of no less persons than the poet Woodsworth and the poet Coleridge. One summer day these two innocent gentlemen were engaged in the open air in a discussion of the works of the philosopher Spinoza. The spy crept up close to them and heard them talk about Spinoza. He went right away to the authorities and said that those men were guilty, they were talking about "Spinozy."

You may read the records of that time and you will find that in England there were certain people who displayed the same hysteria, the same extremity of feeling, that has been manifested by our hon. friends to-night. They conjured up the same imaginary forces gnawing away at the foundations of society, and in every forward step of the slow advance of the people's liberties you have had unfortunate people of this extraordinary timidity of mind. Sometimes it is inherent; sometimes it is acquired through enjoying a position of special privilege—because the privileged classes have never taken kindly to revolutionary ideas; they have always tried to isolate them as fast as they have appeared, to wall them around, to put them behind bars. But they have never succeeded, because those ideas are essentially dynamic and sooner or later they burst forth again.

I stood up more particularly to put myself squarely alongside our friends who are advocating this measure of liberty, and I think the government can be congratulated on coming out straightforwardly and espousing it. After all they are doing justice to the principles of Liberalism for which they stand, as I understand its history and its meaning. In the last few days we have witnessed a deluge of contempt aimed at our hon. friends opposite from Winnipeg. I for one resolved that I would take the first opportunity of associating myself with those members of parliament. While they do not represent any well organized political force, they represent, after all, certain political ideas; and although I cannot associate myself with some of those ideas, yet I am a strong admirer of the position taken by these hon. members from Winnipeg. I believe they are the fore-runners of a host of men who will some day sit in this chamber and place the views of labour before parliament as they should be placed. I sometimes feel, when organized labour is being attacked, that in fact some organized effort on the part of democracy is criticized. A good many of us in this group, in pressing the claims of organized farmers, have sometimes been classed as bolsheviks. This word is always dragged in when any sign of advancing liberty in seen. Drag in the word 'bolshevik", try to stigmatize any effort with the name Russian, and the thing is killed. That is the idea. Certain specific ideas aside, there is a strong feeling of affinity between the movement which I represent and this movement of labour as represented on that lone bench opposite; and personally, although I have nothing politically to gain thereby, I do not want any opportunity to pass without putting myself alongside these men who, I believe, in their own way and according to their own light, are fighting the age-long battle of liberty for the people.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Notwithstanding the remarks of the member for Nelson (Mr. Bird), I am not yet persuaded that the bill is entirely vicious. He has done his best to convey that impression to anyone who desires to approach the matter from a proper business and administrative point of view, but I am not yet convinced that it is so completely undesirable. I still have before me the sensible remarks of the Minister of Justice, and I prefer to remember them rather than allow myself to be altogether drawn aside from the proper consideration of the bill, as I should be if I attempted to follow the peregrinations of the hon. member for Nelson. By the way, that hon. gentleman strayed considerably from the bill and was not called to order, although my hon. friend (Mr. Nicholson) was, before he had gone half as far away from the subject.

Mr. BIRD: I was following the bear tracks of the hon. member's colleague (Mr. Stevens).

Mr. STEVENS: That hon. member will probably have something to say before the committee rises.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Because errors may have been made in the past is no reason why the matter should not be adjusted, but the minister will agree with me that the objection urged against the old legislation is to a large extent wholly unfounded. For example, the word "force", so greatly objected to in section 97A, would have to be read in conjunction with the words that follow, "violence or physical injury." It is real force which is condemned. The minister will agree with me further that there is nothing new in trying to prevent crime. Is there any doubt about that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Absolutely not, unless we find it in the mind of the hon. member for Nelson. Unless we accept his views we cannot see anything wrong in attempting to prevent crime. I entirely agree that if anyone thinks the operations of legitimate trades labour unions are imperilled by that section, then the section should be amended. But I must confess I am utterly at a loss to see what danger lurks in the words I have quoted. The other day when discussing a kindred subject, the amendment to the Immigration Act, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) stated that all the provisions that were being deleted were immaterial; it was merely a question of procedure, all the offences being covered in the code. I understand from my hon. friend to-day that all changes which were being made in this bill were, again, changes in relation to procedure and did not affect the crimes involved. In his view, every offence which is covered by the sections we are now striking out is included elsewhere in the law as enacted in the code.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, but the other day when discussing the other bill my hon. friend interrupted the Minister of the Interior to say that not all of the offences would be retained.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I thought at the time he was making a mistake. Part II of the code was mentioned in the bill, and of course these two sections are in that part. That is what I meant. But so far as the offences themselves are concerned I still believe they come under the other sections as well.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it then, that we are not now declaring that force and sedition are not crimes, and that murder is merely a pleasant pastime. We were merely providing in the Immigration bill that as a matter of procedure people might not be sent out of the country without being first convicted.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They must be convicted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that the change made in the code is a mere matter of verbiage; it does not alter the existing law. Is not that true right through?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Absolutely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In other words, no new offence is being created.

Mr. HAY: If we are to discuss the bill for the rest of the night I want to say a word or two, not from the constitutional view but from the point of view at least of a loyal citizen. Like the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), I can see no good reason whatever, and certainly no good reason has been advanced by any hon. members who have spoken, why these sections of the Criminal Code should be repealed. It is not often that I take up the time of the House and I trust that the committee will bear with me while I quote these sections. The matter is more important than many of us realize and we should be careful before altering the code or substituting for the existing sections any others that may be proposed. The first clause quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, 97A, reads:

(1) Any association, organization, society or corporation, whose professed purpose or one of whose purposes is to bring about any governmental, industrial or economic change within Canada, by use of force, violence or physical injury to person or property, or by threats of such injury, or which teaches, advocates, advises or defends the use of force, violence, terrorism, or physical injury to person or property, or threats of such injury, in order to accomplish such change, or for any other purpose, or which shall by any means prosecute or pursue such purpose or professed purpose, or shall so teach, advocate, advise or defend, shall be an unlawful association.

I cannot see why that subsection should be removed from the statutes. I think it is perfectly proper, for it is a safeguard to constituted authority. I would also quote section 97B, and ask the Minister of Justice to give some reason for its repeal:

(1) Any person who prints, publishes, edits, issues, circulates, sells, or offers for sale or distribution any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, paper, circular, card, letter, writing, print, publication or document of any kind, in which is taught, advocated, advised or defended, or who shall in any manner teach, advocate, or advise or defend the use, without authority of law, of force, violence, terrorism, or physical injury to person or property, or threats of such injury, as a means of accomplishing any governmental, industrial or economic change, or otherwise, shall be guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for not more than twenty years.

I cannot imagine why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) should advocate the repeal of that provision. To my mind it is a perfectly reasonable section and should not be repealed. There is no doubt that some changes might be made in the act so long as the sections to which I have referred are not altered.

A minute ago the hon. Minister of Justice said that the repeal of these sections was not advocated by extremists. I must disagree with him, because from my own personal experience I am satisfied that he is mistaken. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) read an article last night, which was published in one of the Winnipeg papers shortly after the strike, stating that the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), who was an alderman at that time, acted as chairman of a meeting in Winnipeg at which the Union Jack was deposited under the rostrum and the red flag hoisted in its stead. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe anyone who could be a party to such a proceeding is an extremist. And the hon. gentleman is one of those advocating the repeal of these sections. Therefore when the Minister of Justice says this amendment is not advocated by extremists, I cannot agree with him. In this connection may I read a report from the Manitoba Free Press of March 1, 1921, of a meeting held in the city of Winnipeg? I am sure that after hearing what was said at that meeting the Minister of Justice will agree with me that the speaker referred to was an extremist. This is the report:

Before W. A. Pritchard had launched upon his address, a group in the audience struck up the strains of the "Red Flag", the rest of the audience rising and joining in the song.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said he was opposed to force, and yet these are the words used by Mr. Pritchard, a gentleman closely associated with him:

"Quite a lot of water has passed under the bridge since the benign old man said 'One year'" was Mr. Pritchard's opening remark. "The scrap of 1919 was of a considerable magnitude, and if I read the signs of to-night, there seem to be more scraps to come. I want to tell you that the real enemies of labour are the traitors within our ranks. Declare war upon these skunks and tell them that it is a war to the knife, and knife to the hilt. When we kill them we will dispose of the finest weapon that the master class has ever employed."

Now, surely the Minister of Justice will agree with me that some at least of those who are advocating the repeal of these two sections are extremists of the very worst kind. My hon. friend from Nelson (Mr. Bird) a short time ago said he was proud to line himself up beside these men who have been fighting "the age-long battle for labour and liberty." What kind of liberty were they asking for? What kind of liberty do these sections curb? Simply the liberty to destroy That is the purpose of the law which it is sought to repeal. As representatives of the Canadian people are we willing to repeal this law which safeguards the loyal citizens of this Dominion? While I would not object to the law being amended in some form, I believe that these two sections should stand on the statute book.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take exception to the contention of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hay) that some of those supporting this bill are extremists; I would simply point out that they are not being tried here to-night. I am in favour of the principle that the fewer restrictive laws the better. I have the assurance of the Minister of Justice —and I have his permission so to state to the House—that the sections of the Criminal Code as well as the common law already contain provisions dealing with just such offences as are provided against by the particular sections which are sought to be repealed by this bill. With that assurance I am personally quite satisfied to support the bill, on the ground that as far as possible we should cut out unnecessarily restrictive laws or regulations, having in mind that proceeding along that line we tend to extend throughout the country greater harmony and good feeling.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Intentions not seditious.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend think we are too sleepy to consider properly section 2?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Speak for yourself.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I remember a very eloquent appeal made not very long ago by the hon. member who has just spoken on the question of late sittings and the like. But if he wants to sit up late to-night he might again speak for himself. In the meantime the usual practice has been to adjourn at about 11.30; if the government say we are going to sit to other hours, all right; we will know.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I really beseech my hon. friend to be lenient. Why not get this bill through? The really contentious clause has been adopted now, I think, and the remainder will be very short.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You know it is sometimes very hard to understand my hon. friend from the remarks of his supporters, with their hear, hears.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I want to be judged on my performance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend's performance is good. Let us finish the bill and go home.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Right of appeal of Attorney General.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This passed the House last year.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Scrip frauds.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why were there no prosecutions under this?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As my hon. friend remembers, we passed that clause last year and it was rejected by the Senate. The right hon. leader of the opposition has agreed to its adoption.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We were anxious that that should go on.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, and I inserted it in my bill to give the hon. member for Peace River a chance.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.58 p.m.

Monday, June 7, 1926.

The House met at two o'clock.

RAILWAY BELT WATER ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 171 to amend the Railway Belt Water Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In 1910 there was a conflict in the province of British Columbia as to who had jurisdiction in the railway belt with respect to water rights. That was settled by an appeal to the Privy Council, and in 1913 legislation was passed by this parliament, bringing the whole matter into conformity and empowering the province of British Columbia to supervise the granting of these rights. Since that time amendments have been made to the British Columbia Water Act. One of the provisions of the Railway Belt Water Act was that water rights in the railway belt could be placed by order in council under provincial administration. That situation prevailed until 1924, when British Columbia passed a consolidating act, and all we are doing now is to bring our legislation into conformity with the legislation of that province and making it retroactive in order to cover some omissions that may have occurred between the passing of the amending legislation and the passing of the order in council by the federal government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no change really in legal status or jurisdiction?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PERMIT SYSTEM ON RAILWAYS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Under what authority do railway companies operate what is known as the "permit system" on all grains routed to the ports of the Pacific coast?

2. Is the government aware that the existing elevator facilities at the port of Vancouver are not being used to anything approaching full capacity?

3. In the opinion of the government, are the reasons advanced for the issuing of "permits" and the restriction of export, sufficiently well established?

4. Has the government received representations from Pacific coast grain dealers and others that the "permit system" militates against the free movement of grain via Pacific coast ports, and also prevents the establishment of a stable cash grain market at the coast?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The powers of the railway company under the Railway Act.

2. The government is aware that they are not being used to full capacity.

3. No information.

4. Answered by No. 3.

VANCOUVER PUBLIC ELEVATORS

Mr. LADNER:

1. Is the government considering the leasing or selling of any of the public elevators at Vancouver to what is commonly known as the wheat pool, or have any representations or applications with respect to the same been made by the said wheat pool or any one on their behalf?

2. If so, what are the terms of said representations or applications?

3. Has the Vancouver harbour board reported to the government in the matter?

4. Was their report unanimous?

5. What are the grounds of the opposition of said Vancouver harbour commissioners?

6. If the government is considering a lease or sale of any of the public elevators at Vancouver, has the government by advertising for tenders or otherwise afforded an opportunity to the public or other firms to submit offers?

7. Was the production of grain in Alberta last year over 110,000,000 bushels and in Saskatchewan, west of Maple Creek, over 75,000,000 all of which can and should be shipped via Vancouver if the train facilities there were sufficient?

8. Did the total elevator service at Vancouver last year handle only 50,000,000 bushels of grain or thereabouts?

9. Is the policy of the government to increase the elevator facilities at Vancouver or decrease them by leasing our public elevators?

10. Is the government aware that the cash grain market (established at Vancouver as a result of demands from Alberta farmers) cannot function properly with less than the existing capacity of "public" storage?

11. Is it a fact that the Spillers elevator hereto operated as a "public" elevator will almost certainly be operated as a "private" elevator under its new ownership?

12. Do public elevators at Vancouver act as a protection for independent exporters, shippers and farmers and would elevator No. 2 be hopelessly inadequate for this purpose?

13. Are the Vancouver harbour commissioners' elevators at Vancouver self-supporting and have all fixed charges been paid by the port?

14. Is it the intention of the government to lease the grain elevators at the port of Quebec and have said elevators been self-suppirting and have all the fixed charges in respect to the same been paid?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Verbal representations on behalf of the wheat pool have been made respecting the leasing of one of the elevators at Vancouver.

2. Generally the terms of the representations or applications were a request for the leasing of elevator No. 1 operated by the Vancouver harbour commission.

3. The chairman has reported on behalf of the board.

4. Answered by Number 3.

5. The view of the board as represented by the chairman is that the interests of the wheat pool will for the present be well served by the present system of operation without in any way impairing the service available to the general public using the harbour facilities.

6. Should the commissioners with the approval of the government, decide at any time to lease any of the public elevators at Vancouver, the matter will receive consideration.

7. The total estimated production of grain in Alberta in 1925 was 195,277,000 bushels. The available statistics for Saskatchewan do not disclose the production of grain in that province west of Maple Creek.

8. The total grain received at elevators during the year 1925, was 33,512,302 bushels.

9. It is not the policy of the government to decrease the elevator facilities at Vancouver.

10. The government is aware that the successful functioning of the cash grain market at Vancouver in relation to the existing elevator capacity depends on the quantity of grain that may be offered for shipment through that port.

11. The government has no information.

12. The elevators at Vancouver were provided to accommodate in so far as their capacity will permit the exporters, shippers and producers of grain. Whether elevator No. 2 would be hopelessly inadequate for that purpose would depend on the quantity of grain that would be offered by exporters, shippers and producers.

13. Since the commencement of operations by the Vancouver harbour commissioners, the elevators have been self-supporting. All fixed charges together with charges for sinking fund have been paid by the commission.

14. The government has not considered the leasing of the grain elevator at the port of Quebec. The said elevator has not been self-supporting, nor have all the fixed charges in respect to the same been paid by the Quebec harbour commissioners.

AUTOMOBILE SEIZURES

Mr. DOUCET:

1. How many automobiles has the Department of Customs under seizure at present?

2. How many automobiles smuggled into Canada have been seized by the Department of Customs and are now in its possession?

3. How many of said automobiles have been claimed by insurance companies under the plea that they had been stolen previous to crossing the border?

4. Why does the Department of Customs refuse to return said automobiles to the owners after their claims have been clearly proven?

5. Is there any agreement between the Canadian government and the United States for the recovery of said automobiles?

6. If so, what is this agreement and when was it concluded?

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN:

1. 289.

2. 161.

3. 25.

4. Department does not refuse to return said automobiles to the owners after their claims have been clearly proven. When said automobiles have been forfeited to the crown release is offered pending decision and conditional on exportation to the United States on payment of expenses of seizure and keep. Where automobiles have not been forfeited by decision the claimants are obliged in addition to file relinquishment of claim of person in whose possession the car was found at time of seizure.

5. Yes.

6. Article III of treaty for the suppression of smuggling operations along the international boundary between the Dominion of Canada and the United States and assisting in the arrest and prosecution of persons violating the narcotic laws of either government and for kindred purposes, ratified 17th July, 1925.

INTERNATIONAL PARLIAMENTARY COMMERCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Why is it that Canada alone among all the overseas dominions, or countries of the world, is unrepresented at the International Parliamentary Commercial Conference now going on in England?

2. Is the government aware that Australia and New Zealand have three representatives, Africa one, and India three, and Canada, none, and that some thirty-two other countries are represented with a view to drawing world's trade?

3. What is, or will be, done in the matter?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. This conference is an unofficial gathering in which members of parliament of any country take part in their personal capacity and at their own expense. It is not a conference of government and the Canadian government has not therefore required to consider representation.

2. The government has no official knowledge as to the number of members of parliament of various countries who have taken part in the conference, which is held not for the purpose of drawing world's trade but to discuss various phases of commercial legislation of general interest.

3. Answered by No. 1 and 2.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I rise to ask the Prime Minister again in regard to the civil service and that important matter, the Superannuation Act. There are many civil servants who do not now come under the Superannuation Act although the time for making election expires in July of this year, and they are exceedingly anxious that the time limit should be extended for another year to give them an opportunity to elect to come under the provisions of the Act; or, in the event of the Civil Service Act itself being amended, as a result of the report now under consideration, they might not have to elect. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the one or the other, that is, the Civil Service Act and the whole problem of the civil service should be settled, which I apprehend may be too large an order at this late date of the session, or that the Superannuation Act should be extended. I have a resolution from the amalgamated civil servants, signed by Mr. Baker, one of the first national vice-presidents. I might read it in support of this. The resolution reads:

> That we demand of the government the immediate completion of the personnel of the Civil Service Commission, and that a satisfactory revision of the salaries of civil servants be made before the end of the present session of parliament with increases made retroactive to April 1, 1924.

I realize that the situation is complex, but I can assure the government that I am bringing this matter up in good faith on behalf of several groups of civil servants who are affected by the present superannuation provisions. I urge the desirability of extending the time under the act to 1927 and, if possible, that the important question of a permanent salary revision be disposed of.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to have an opportunity of conferring with my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) before committing the government on the question. I would point out however that the time has already been extended by a year, at least once, so that civil servants have had two years within which to decide whether or not they wish to avail themselves of the provisions of the act. It seems strange that they should be unable to reach a decision in the matter. However, I will undertake to see that the representations which the hon. member has made are carefully looked into.

Mr. STEVENS: I am aware that in rising to speak again I am trespassing somewhat on the rules, but I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the importance of the matter the House will bear with me. Without going into details I may observe that there are certain groups of civil servants who do not come under the act at all, and who have asked to be given that privilege. One of these groups includes, for instance, Income Tax employees, and there are the employees mentioned by my hon. friend (Mr. Manion)—the weighers. This is a very important question which vitally affects some who cannot come under the act. I really think the wisest course would be to extend until 1927 the privilege of election and in the meantime properly amend the Civil Service Act. I am neither criticizing nor blaming the government, for I realize that this is a large and intricate question and one that must be carefully considered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Finance has just handed me a report on the matter submitted to him by the Superintendent of Insurance. I might read for the information of my hon. friend one paragraph which bears upon the point he has raised:

> I think the recommendation to the government should be that the time be not further extended, or if at all, for a period not exceeding three months, that the act be amended as heretofore suggested in order to cover causes of obvious omissions in the original act, and that no further enlargement or increase in benefits be considered until after the period for election has expired and the full effect of the transfers and appointments up to that date has been ascertained.

I think it well to put that expression of view on record.

Mr. STEVENS: I would call the attention of the Prime Minister to the point in that letter which suggests that the act be amended. If the government is prepared to deal with the whole question, the recommendation of the superintendent is sound.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Can the Prime Minister give the House an assurance that the appointments to the Civil Service Commission will be made before prorogation this session?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government is anxious, in whatever appointment it makes to the Civil Service Commission, to secure persons whose suitability for the post will commend itself to the people of the country. It is not easy to secure such a person to fill a position on the Civil Service Commission, and I may frankly admit to my

hon. friend that it may be necessary for the government to ask parliament to amend the Civil Service Act in order to facilitate the appointment of the type of man who will be regarded as well qualified to fill this position of great responsibility. The original act provided that the commissioners should be appointed for life, but subsequent appointments were limited to ten years, and there is no provision for a pension at the end of that time. The position carries with it a salary of $6,000 per annum. It is difficult to induce an individual of the standing and personality the government is seeking, to assume the position at a salary of $6,000 for ten years in the absence of any provision for a pension subsequently. The government is considering the advisability of asking parliament to provide for a larger salary and to arrange, if possible, for a pension in the event of the position not being made permanent. I emphasize the desire of the government to appoint as commissioners only such persons as will readily commend themselves to the judgment of the country, and naturally it will require some time to secure the right individual or individuals. My colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) reminds me that at the moment the service is not being embarrassed inasmuch as the Department of Justice has given a ruling that the chairman of the Civil Service Commission has full power to act for the commission as a whole. It has been suggested that the commission might be confined to one individual. We shall be giving that phase of the matter a trial while we are endeavouring to secure the other two officials.

LANDS SOLD TO SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I would call the attention of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) to question No. 2 which has been on the order paper for some time, the answer to which I have reason to believe is available.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): I have on my desk a note from the chairman of the Soldier Settlement Board to the effect that the information must be obtained from the Winnipeg office and that he is pressing for it. We hope to have it at an early date.

FRUIT JOBBER-BROKER COMBINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Labour): In answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) regarding jobber broker combines, I promised to make a statement not later than to-day. With the permission of the House I submit the following statement:

Following a formal complaint under the Combines Investigation Act, a commissioner was appointed in July 1924 to investigate an alleged combine in the distribution of fruits and vegetables in western Canada. The commissioner reported on the 18th February, 1925, to the effect that a combine—called for convenient reference a jobber-broker combine—was operating in western Canada, and that its operations were against the interest of the public.

It appears that the supplies of Canadian grown fruit and vegetables consumed in the four western provinces come principally from the province of British Columbia. The grower, living in British Columbia and disposing of his products all the way from Calgary to Winnipeg, must have agents at the various centres to receive the fruit and vegetables, inspect them for quality and condition, and sell them to the jobbers, as the wholesale fruit houses are called in those provinces.

In 1906 and for some few years thereafter the system of distribution in Canada was from the grower, through his broker, to the different jobbers who sold to the retail trade, which in turn distributed to the consuming public. The jobbing houses, of which there were two or more in each town of any size, were for the most part independent of each other and in more or less friendly competition. Speaking generally and surveying western Canada as a whole, distribution was made through many independent and competing jobbers. There was a free and uncontrolled outlet for supply.

The Nash organization of Minneapolis, which first entered Canada in 1906, and now operates a chain of jobbing houses throughout the west, introduced the principle of the jobber-owned broker about 1913. The Canadian jobbers, who have admitted the harmful nature of the principle, say that in self-defence they had to follow suit.

By reason of the introduction of the jobber-broker principle, the whole aspect of the distribution of fruit and vegetables in western Canada changed. Instead of distribution being through many unallied houses, it is now principally through two chains of jobbing houses, namely the Nash organization, and the remaining Canadian jobbers. Each of these has its chain of brokerage offices, that of the Nash being known as the Mutual Brokers Limited and that of the independents, as the Canadian houses are called, being known as the Growers Sales Agency, Limited.

The commissioner reported against the principle of the jobber-owned broker on the ground that it was an attempt to join in the one organization two opposing interests—the broker, whose interest should be solely that of the grower and to sell at the best price obtainable, and the jobber whose interest was to purchase at the lowest price and so make the largest profit and therefore was opposed to that of the grower; and he set out in his report instances in which the combine had operated detrimentally to the interest of the grower and others. Certain of these instances, which are set out on pp. 22 et seq. of the Report may be summarized under the following heads:

(b) Attempts to keep the growers in the dark—(1) as to the prices at which their goods were sold; (2) the persons to whom they were sold; and (3) the allowances made to the jobbers on account of the alleged condition of the fruit on arrival.

(c) False returns.

(e) Special rebates to Nash Jobbing houses which were not given to Canadian Jobbing houses.

Following the report of the commissioner, indictments were laid against certain persons and individuals, charging inter alia (a) conspiracy to defraud; (b) offences against the Secret Commissions Act; (c) offences against Section 498 (The Combines Section) of the Criminal Code; (d) offences against the Combines Investigation Act. The trial of the accused took place under counts (a) and (b), the counts under (c) being traversed to the next assizes, and those under (d) being withdrawn.

The trial resulted in the conviction of four individuals and four companies. The individuals were sentenced to one day each in jail and to a fine of $25,000 a piece. The corporations were sentenced to fines of $25,000 each. Both individuals and corporations appealed from their conviction and the crown appealed from the sentences, suggesting that they should be more severe. Before the appeals were argued the defendants withdrew their appeals and the crown accordingly withdrew the appeal.

Numerous representations have been made to the government from time to time by growers' organizations and others, to the effect that the jobber-broker combine operates injuriously not only to the grower but also to the Canadian jobbing trade and to the consuming public; and that it should be done away with.

Following the verdict in the recent trial, the so-called Independent Jobbers, that is to say those Canadian firms which are not in what is known as the Nash organization, decided to cease the operation of the brokerage houses which they have been operating in conjunction with their jobbing business. These firms were not among those indicted. As the result of this action of the Independents, the jobber-broker connection is now operated only by what is known as the Nash organization. Since the trial counsel for the Nash interests has made representations to the government that they would like the view of the government on this question.

The matter is of considerable public importance, and in view of the fruit season having commenced before the appeals were disposed of and of the desire of all parties for an expression of the attitude of the government on this question, this statement is made.

It is not the duty of the government to advise corporations, as to how they should conduct their business, nor is it the intention of the government to do so. But the government has found that the question of the jobber-broker combine method of doing business is of such public importance that all parties concerned are entitled to know the government's attitude toward its continuance.

The jobber-broker combine is an attempt to join in the one organization and under the same control, the broker, whose interests should be solely that of the grower, and the jobber, whose interest is opposed to that of the grower. This puts the broker in a position in which his interest conflicts with his duty. Where there is such a conflict of interest and duty it is impossible to guarantee by any external supervision that the thousands of annual shipments of the growers will be handled honestly. Such a relationship is against the established principles of our law, and it is difficult to see how the grower could hope to obtain proper returns for his goods under such a system.

The government has taken steps to ascertain the opinion of those who have a practical knowledge of the operations of the jobber-broker combine. While some growers defend them they have found pretty general condemnation. Responsible officials in government employ condemn it; growers' organizations controlling the vast majority of the crop of British Columbia condemn it; and there is testimony from Canadian jobbers to the same effect.

In view of all these considerations, the government has decided that it must treat the jobber-broker connection as against public policy; and this announcement is made so that all parties may be aware of these views. If the law as it stands is sufficient to deal with this question, resort will be had to it should there be any disregard of its provisions. If the law as it stands is not sufficient, such appropriate legislation within the legislative competence of the Dominion will be introduced as may be necessary to give effect to this decision.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Have all the fines which were imposed been paid, or have any of them been remitted by the government?

Mr. ELLIOTT: All the fines imposed, aggregating $200,000, have been paid.

Mr. BENNETT: Did I understand the minister to say that the fines have been remitted?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, certainly not.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

PURCHASE OF SCREENINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (South Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) kindly inform me when I may expect the return with respect to orders in council relative to the purchase of screenings?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the other day I received from my deputy a memorandum to the effect that it would require several thousand pages of foolscap and some four additional stenographers to provide the return, and that there was not much prospect of getting it completed by the end of the session, assuming that parliament prorogues towards the end of this month. I may say, however, that I shall be very pleased at any time between now and the end of the session to supply my hon. friend with such part of the information as we have prepared.

Mr. ROGERS: Could my hon. friend bring down that part right away?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

[Mr. Elliott.]

GENERAL ELECTION

PAYMENT FOR SERVICES BY SCHOOL JANITORS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a request to make of the minister in charge of election proceedings. I do not know who that minister may be.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Secretary of State.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to direct to his attention a letter which I have received from Mr. John R. Sloan, janitor of one of the schools in Vancouver, who writes on behalf of the janitors of a number of other schools in that city which were used as polling stations during the last general election. He points out that their services have not yet been paid for, although they have repeatedly requested payment from the returning officer, who always replies that the money will come through in time. It does seem to me that this small matter should be attended to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This more properly should go to the Chief Electoral Officer.

Mr. STEVENS: I think so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He has charge of these matters. The Auditor General makes payment. I understand there have been delays of the character mentioned by my hon. friend, due entirely to the difficulty which the Auditor General has had in getting the accounts properly audited.

NOVA SCOTIA STEEL INDUSTRY

TARIFF RELIEF

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. T. MacNUTT (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, in view of a statement recently made by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that certain industries could not await investigation by the tariff board, may I ask if it is the intention of the government to grant relief at this session of parliament to the Nova Scotia steel industry, which is today in a perilous position and confronted with collapse unless early relief is extended?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I followed my hon. friend aright. Did he say I had made the statement that certain industries could not await the decision of the tariff board?

Mr. MacNUTT: As I understood, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance, in explaining to the House his reasons for reducing the duty on automobiles, said that the country could not wait for the tariff commission to report.

Mr. ROBB: That is different; I was talking about the country.

Mr. MacNUTT: Mr. Speaker, may I ask for a reply to my question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

GOVERNMENT LOAN

AUTHORITY TO RAISE A SUM NOT EXCEEDING $150,000,000

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the raising, by way of loan, under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, by the issue and sale or pledge of securities of Canada, such sum or sums of money as may be required, not to exceed in the whole the sum of one hundred and fifty million dollars, for paying or redeeming or otherwise retiring the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada and for public works and general purposes, the principal and interest to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend will have to give us some information on this resolution, but perhaps we can get it just as well in committee so long as we understand that we are not adopting the principle of the bill.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend indicate the object and purpose of this amount of money?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. We have maturing during the present year and during the year 1927 a total of $143,505,650. In October next we have maturing $35,000,000 in Canada and New York, and in November $8,000,000 in Canada and New York. The other maturities are in the following year, and this is to make provision to meet them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What time next year?

Mr. ROBB: November 1 and 15 and December 1.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend will tell the House why next year should not look after next year's commitments. Apparently we have commitments amounting to $43,000,000 for this year; why not provide for what we have to look after? If I understand my hon. friend correctly he said there were two retirements to be made, one of $35,000,000 and one of $8,000,000 payable in the autumn of this year, and that there were no other retirements to be made until December of next year. We will have another meeting of parliament between now and December of 1927, so why not just look after our present business? The minister has given us a total of $43,000,000 for this year; he may have a little more, but that is all he has given us.

Mr. COOTE: Might I ask the hon. members to speak a little louder.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have particulars, as I put them down, of $43,000,000 of retirements which have to be looked after during the course of the current year, in connection with which I am offering absolutely no objection. But that is only a small part of $150,000,000, and as I understood my hon. friend the balance over and above the $43,000,000 is to be paid in December of 1927. My suggestion to the House is that we will have another meeting of parliament between now and December, 1927, and it would be just as well if we merely dealt with the business for the present year.

Mr. ROBB: At first blush that would look quite reasonable, but my hon. friend who has been in the department and has had charge of refinancing knows that there are certain periods during the year when money is cheaper than at other times; in the month of January, for instance, money is rather plentiful. Now we have in mind that possibly the maturities of this fall may be taken care of by our own current cash, that is, if the market is unfavourable at the time of maturity. Then in January, when the market is in better shape, we can make a better deal for Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is quite right; I agree with him absolutely, but I do not agree with his conclusion. There is no doubt that money is sometimes dearer and sometimes cheaper, and there is no doubt that my hon. friend will be guided by his advisers just as we used to be guided. The same advisers are still there and these things are done in the same way despite what we are told to the contrary. As I said, my hon. friend will very properly be guided by his advisers as to when to make his permanent commitments, but simply because he raises the money temporarily out of his own cash is no reason for putting in more money.

Mr. ROBB: Not unless the market looked good in January so that we could provide for these maturities coming later in the year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend means, I take it, that if he sees a very favourable interest market in January his idea would be to take advantage of it to look after the December retirements.

Mr. ROBB: We want to have the funds available if necessary; we might use them or we might not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the amount available next December?

Mr. ROBB: About $37,000,000 due in November and about $63,000,000 odd due December 1. I think this is quite regular.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if the minister would be good enough to put on Hansard a statement of the loans maturing this year. It was impossible to hear what he said.

Mr. ROBB: I will repeat it; the loans maturing this year are $35,000,000 on October 1 and $8,000,000 on November 15, both payable in Canada and New York. Those maturing next year amount to $100,505,650. This is all due in Canada with the exception of $8,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER: I would like to ask the minister if it is intended to float a considerable portion or all of the loans necessary for refunding in the United States, or all in Canada, or part in both countries.

Mr. ROBB: It has always been the government policy to float loans wherever money is cheapest. Sometimes they are floated in England, sometimes in New York and sometimes in Canada. We will be guided by the international market.

Mr. HEAPS: I would like to ask the minister if any of the bonds maturing either this year or next year are tax-exempt bonds.

Mr. ROBB: I do not think so; I am not sure.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 172, to authorize the raising by way of loan of certain sums of money for the public service.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

On section 2—Loan authorized.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In the resolution preceding this bill it was intimated that the money raised hereby could be used for public works and other general purposes. I would ask the minister what public works he has in mind, and whether this is the usual form for this kind of bill.

Mr. ROBB: This is the usual form. The reason for putting it in this way is that if the market is not quite favourable at the time the maturities come due in the early part of the year, the government may use the funds they have then available in the treasury, funds that are in there for other purposes, retire the loan coming due, and later on in the year borrow to replace those funds.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is strictly understood that the money secured under this authorization will not itself be used for the building of public works, but simply to replace other funds that may have been taken.

Mr. ROBB: There is no intention whatever of using any part of this for public works.

Mr. COOTE: We have not a copy of the bill, Mr. Chairman, and I do not know whether I am asking this question on the proper section or not. I wanted to ask the minister what was the rate of interest on the loans which are maturing this year and which have to be taken up.

Mr. ROBB: I have not that information before me, but I will get it for my hon friend. If he will turn, however, to the public accounts that he has before him he will find that the rates of interest are all listed there.

Mr. COOTE: Will tenders be invited for the sale of these new bonds?

Mr. ROBB: We shall follow the usual procedure. The procedure generally is to write inviting tenders from different houses, and if they are not satisfactory to us we try and provide other means of financing until the market gets more satisfactory.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The minister said he might want to anticipate the loans due say a year from now, by offering a loan say next January if the market happened to be favourable then. If he did anything of the sort, would he not lose a considerable amount of interest? He would be paying 4½ per cent or thereabouts for the money, and would only be getting 3 per cent for it while it was on deposit in the bank in the meantime. So would he not lose 1½ per cent by so doing?

Mr. ROBB: Unless it so worked out that we would not lose, we would not do that financing, but sometimes we can save something by retiring a loan or getting a better rate of interest. The officers of the department have to keep an eye on other countries to see when they are coming in the market so that we can get in ahead of them.

3 p.m.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If the minister had a lot of money on hand for a time for repaying these loans, he must be out the interest, must he not?

Mr. ROBB: We always watch out for that.

Mr. SPENCER: A year ago when this matter was being discussed, I suggested that it would be in the interest of the country if say one-half or one per cent more was offered on savings in the government post offices. The Minister of Finance then was kind enough to say that he would give the matter consideration, that it was worth while considering. I would ask him if he has given it consideration, and if he has thought it worth while to increase the rate of interest on deposits in the post office savings offices, for the purpose of raising funds to take the place of such loans as we are now discussing.

Mr. ROBB: I have not reached any decision as to increasing the rate of interest on the post office savings. Of course, anyone who wants a higher rate of interest than the post office gives can buy Dominion government bonds, which are sold in small denominations as well as large.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not wish to raise a discussion at this stage, but I would like to point out that a good many financial authorities believe that there is no reason why the government could not be its own banker, and that by raising money on bonds in this way we are simply saddling a mortgage upon the future of this country. It seems to me that the Finance department might at least give careful consideration to the question whether there is not some better way of financing the country than by means of the issuance of bonds.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AUTHORITY TO ISSUE SUBSTITUTED SECURITIES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for the extension of the provisions of chapter 11 of the statutes of 1918 (relating to guarantee on removal or postponement of indebtedness of the Canadian Northern Railway system), to the Canadian National Railway Company and to any company referred to in the Canadian National Railway Act, 1919 (1919, c. 13), and in the act relating to the Grand Trunk Railway system (1920, c. 13), and to enable each one of such companies to issue its notes, obligations or other securities, hereinafter called "substituted securities," for the purpose of acquiring, by application of the proceeds thereof, or by exchange therefor, the notes, obligations or other securities or indebtedness of any other or others of such companies, and to authorize the Governor in Council to guarantee the substituted securities.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In adopting the motion, it is understood that we are not adopting the principle at all?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the minister will have a request from the company in connection with this matter. He probably will have a report from the financial department showing where this is wanted. If he would read that report it will help.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the report at hand. I have the substance of what is required. It is very easily available. The act which is being amended by this proposed legislation applies to the Canadian Northern Railway system, and did not apply to the old Grand Trunk system, nor to the Grand Trunk Pacific. The purpose of the present amendment is to add two sections, enabling an adjustment to be made of the indebtedness of the three systems, the Canadian Northern, the Canadian National, formerly the Grand Trunk, and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The wording is broadened to enable compromises or adjustments to be made of existing indebtedness, and also to enable one of the companies, such for instance as the Canadian National, to issue its notes or obligations, instead of the obligations of the subsidiary company which is being substituted.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Without increasing the obligation?

Mr. DUNNING: Without increasing the obligation. That is one of the provisions to be made. That point will be covered when the bill is presented. Briefly if the obligation of the Grand Trunk, for instance, matured, it is desirable, in order to bring the system into one, that that maturing obligation be met by the issue of Canadian National securities, rather than to continue from time to time issuing more of the securities of the separated corporations, and this amendment will give liberty to do that. I propose when the bill is in committee to introduce an amendment, giving assurance that such action will not be taken without the authority of an order in council, so that there will be safeguards concerning it.

Mr. BENNETT: What effect will it have on the interest on the Grand Trunk Pacific debentures?

Mr. DUNNING: It will have no effect on the Grand Trunk Pacific debentures at all. It has no relation to them.

Mr. BENNETT: In regard to the question of earnings; the segregation of earnings on the Grand Trunk and the amount of money that might be available to meet obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific is important. If the earnings were no longer segregated, might not a claim be made that the interest should be paid?

Mr. DUNNING: I see my hon. friend's point. I thought he had another point in view. That was considered, but in order to make it broad enough to deal with the very complicated situation, it had to be broad enough to involve the possibility of that; but of course very naturally it would be foolish to do anything which would precipitate a situation such as my hon. friend has spoken of. The power of the Governor in Council with respect to the matter is, I think, sufficient protection in that connection. I can assure my hon. friend that it is a very necessary power to have in order to approach the problem of bringing these various entities really into a financial unit.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will it be possible, before the bill goes into committee, for us to get a clear, concise statement of the moneys that have been advanced to each portion of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Northern Railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk Railway, and the Canadian government railways, and a statement showing what has been done with that money. In the statements issued by the Canadian National Railways themselves, as such, and in the statements issued by the component parts before the amalgamation, the amounts shown as received by each of the groups, or at least the amount shown as advanced by the government, including the issue of bonds does not correspond with the amounts of which we have been given any record, as having been expended. As I pointed out previously, there is a difference of $250,000,000. In the case of the Canadian Northern Railway, which is the subject of the resolution now before the House, the advances which are presumed to have been made according to the reports of the Department of Railways and Canals, and the reports of the Canadian National Railways, total $329,000,000, while we can only find in the reports of the Canadian National Railways an account for $205,000,000 that has been expended including deficits on those lines, and all money that has gone into capital expenditure. I feel that parliament should know, and know during this session, where this money has gone. There is either a misstatement on the part of the Department of Railways and Canals as to the amount that has been advanced, or there has been a failure on the part of the Canadian National to show clearly what has been done with the money.

Mr. DUNNING: I would be very glad to try to facilitate my hon. friend's efforts to find that hundred odd million—

Mr. NICHOLSON: Two hundred and fifty million.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, $250,000,000, but I might suggest that a better and easier course would be for my hon. friend to go before the special committee—and as a member of the House my hon. friend has that privilege—and before that special committee the actual officers of the road who are engaged in making up the account can be examined regarding the matter in detail and at any length. That suggestion does not mean that I am unwilling to have such a statement prepared as my hon. friend suggests and brought down to this House, but I am suggesting the other course as possible, and a course which would reduce the volume of argument in regard to the matter in the House, after it is produced. I suggest that my hon. friend should do that, and at the same time I will undertake that a statement will be brought down to this House at a later date, when I ask the House to consider the estimates which are now before the special committee.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My feeling in regard to the minister's suggestion is simply this: If the session of parliament is going to conclude within the time that a good many people seem to think it may conclude, I do not feel that there will be any opportunity of getting information by the detailed process of obtaining it from the officers of the Canadian National Railways, particularly where a member of the House, who is not a member of that committee, goes before the committee himself and waits for an opportune time to bring up a particular matter of this kind. A certain routine is being followed in the committee, according to my experience. The minister seems to think we can take up some of the subjects that are not being discussed. It seems to me this is not a light matter and should not be passed over. Statements have been issued, not only to parliament, but to the public, showing that $803,000,000 of new money has been advanced to those lines, and the statements that the railways themselves have issued account for $550,000,000 of that amount. I submit parliament should get a complete statement from the Department of Railways showing exactly what has been put into these lines and what has been done with the money.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not objecting to the production of such a statement as that, but I merely suggest, by way of additional facility, that my hon. friend should take advantage of the opportunity which is his, and I think I can undertake, on behalf of the committee, having regard to what they have done with reference to questions of this kind, that if the hon. member will appear before the committee he will be afforded an opportunity of asking questions in regard to any matter on which he may desire information. Manifestly, there is an explanation. The $250,000,000 has not vanished into thin air. It must be purely an accounting matter, and it will be discovered. I can assure my hon. friend that at a later stage I will be glad to bring down such a statement from the Department of Railways and Canals, but in addition I suggest, in order to facilitate the proceedings of this House, that he should go before that special committee and there examine the officials responsible for the accounts. It must be remembered that these accounts are audited not only by the railway's own auditors, but by an independent firm of auditors, an outside concern altogether. It is surely not possible to assume that $250,000,000 has vanished into thin air. That is not the explanation My hon. friend knows that and I know it. I cannot tell him offhand where this amount of $250,000,000 advanced to the railways in many cases many years ago has been distributed in the railway accounts, but I am sure it is discoverable and I shall be glad to give my hon. friend every facility to discover it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are on the market a number of securities of the Canadian Northern Electric Railways. The Canadian Northern electric system consisted of three roads, one known as the Toronto and Eastern, one as the Toronto Suburban, and the other is a road running around Niagara Falls. These three roads are all mentioned in the schedule in the Canadian National Railway Act of 1919. Unfortunately some of my constituents are holders of some of these securities. I made application to the department recently and I received information that these bonds had never been guaranteed by the government, but on the other hand the government has taken possession of these three electric roads and is paying interest on the bonds as it matures. In the legislation which is contemplated as a result of this resolution, will these bonds be taken care of by the issue of Canadian National Railway bonds?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot answer my hon. friend's question in that regard. I cannot say that these bonds will be taken care of, but it would be possible for the Canadian National to retire such an obligation as this by the issue of further securities not exceeding the amount outstanding which is being refunded. I cannot say that any particular issue will be dealt with either in this or another way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is going further than that. As I understand his motion it is to secure the right to guarantee by the government.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a different thing from having the holding company change obligations in connection with existing securities.

Mr. DUNNING: I know. I do not want to be misunderstood.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would suggest that at the same time my hon. friend should give us the report of the financiers who have recommended this.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no such report.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The question was put to my hon. friend by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). It is perfectly clear that under this enabling legislation the government could if it so chose turn round and endorse or guarantee new securities for the purpose of retiring any kind of obligations of any of these companies for which obligations the government to-day is not in the slightest degree responsible. Unless some definite reason is shown I would think the last thing this House ought to do would be to place in the hands of the government the right to make good at the whim of the government what to-day are worthless securities.

As regards the lines that the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) was speaking about, two of them have been torn up and sold and one was never built. They were undertakings only partially carried on, some of them undertakings which simply fell into the hands of the government because the Canadian Northern owned most of the stock, because they were Canadian Northern enterprises. But they were enterprises which were of no value to the government, to the country, as owners of the transcontinental system. Under this they might be made valuable; under this we might have all kinds of obligations cast upon us because all these are obligations of subsidiary companies.

The hon. member for South Wellington has made it perfectly clear that these are companies which are covered in the schedule of companies referred to in the legislation of 1919. In short, the effect of what my hon. friend proposes is this, that the government can make itself liable for securities for which it is under no liability at the present time because if it is there is no object in the legislation. The class and the character of the liability which may thus be extended is bound only by the number of companies referred to. We have more than a page in the list in one act besides the numberless companies we have in the Grand Trunk which was taken over only in 1920. I am now referring only to the legislation of 1919. If I am wrong my hon. friend will indicate where and in what way.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot say that my hon. friend is completely wrong, but no one knows better than he that many of these companies have obligations standing in the form of mortgage securities which are not guaranteed by the government but on which interest is being paid. The case mentioned by the hon. member for South Wellington is a case in point. Each one of the complex financial arrangements of these former companies requires to be studied on its merits because there are many cases where, if the government or the company, the company being secondary to the government of course, do not pay the interest, the power which the bondholders themselves have under the mortgage trust deed in relation to our property, means that the property itself would be seriously impaired if the bondholders exercised the power which they have under the terms of the bond. That is true with reference to many of these companies. I am speaking offhand subject to correction, but I think I am correct when I say that the Grand Trunk class of unguaranteed securities is one security on which no interest is being paid and Canadian Northern Fours is another.

It is very hard to please hon. gentlemen opposite on this question. On a former occasion when I spoke on the railway budget the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) took the view—and I had some sympathy with it— that although the written bond of this country was not behind these bonds, we nevertheless had the property and therefore I should consider and he suggested to me that I should give consideration to some plan whereby the interest would be paid because he said—and he used almost these words—the people of Canada really owe the money.

I am not indicating at all that we should go so far as sweepingly to say that all the obligations of these various constituent companies, whether guaranteed by the government or not, should be met by the government. But as a practical man after having spent only a little time up to now studying this complex financial structure, I say that it is essential to have some power in order to be able to deal with the matter intelligently. There is no intention to use the power in any drastic manner and of course the House must be informed from time to time as to what is done with regard to it. My hon. friend spoke of a statement from financiers. I have no such statement. I have the legal opinion with respect to the necessity.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does that say?

Mr. DUNNING: I will read the whole of the opinion of Mr. Ruel, legal vice president of the National Railways with regard to the matter. Perhaps it would be a good thing to put it on Hansard. This memorandum is called forth by a question from myself as minister to the legal counsel as to whether the power asked for in this legislation was not in fact already in the hands of the government. The hon. member for South Wellington will understand the point of my question to the legal counsel. This is the answer which tends to elucidate the whole question:

> It is suggested that the Canadian National Railways already have the powers contemplated by this bill and that the legislation is, therefore, unnecessary.
> We are satisfied that this is not the case.
> The first legislation of the kind was contained in section 19 of chapter 20 of the statutes of 1914, as follows:—
> "19. Any company now or hereafter comprised in the Canadian Northern system which is now or may hereafter be, subject to the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada may acquire shares in the capital stock of, or securities issued by, or make advances to or receive advances from any other company comprised in said system, and may take or give security for such advances."

This act only applied to the Canadian Northern system. The Canadian National Railway Company was not incorporated and both the Canadian Northern system and the Grand Trunk system were then private enterprises.

The second legislative enactment of the kind was chapter 11 of the statutes of 1918 which is quoted in the explanatory notes to the present bill and which is amended by the addition of two sections by the present bill. This act of 1918 dealt only with the Canadian Northern system and only covered the renewing and postponing of the then existing indebtedness of that system.

Which, as my hon. friend knows perfectly well, has been done from time to time. As a matter of fact, securities which were not originally government obligations have been taken care of as they have matured by the issue of securities which were government obligations. This was inevitable in order to hold the system together.

By chapter 13 of the statutes of 1919, the Canadian National Railway Company was incorporated and given power in section 26 to issue securities to the extent of $75,000 per mile of its lines. By chapter 37 of the statutes of 1923 the right to issue securities was restricted (as to any company included in either the Canadian Northern system or the Grand Trunk system or the Grand Trunk Pacific system or the Canadian National Railway Company) to securities approved of as to form, terms and amount by the Governor in Council. Approved securities could be guaranteed by the crown provided authority to issue had previously been given by parliament.

This was purely a restrictive act apart from the general authority to guarantee issues authorized specifically by parliament.

Specific authority to issue and guarantee securities to the extent of $56,000,000 was given by the Appropriation Act of 1924 (1924, chapter 75, item 137) to raise money to meet indebtedness incurred by, or on behalf of, the combined railway systems. It was, however, claimed on behalf of the underwriters of guaranteed securities that this enactment did not give power to any one company to issue securities on behalf of any other company nor to expend the proceeds of its own issue except on its own behalf. The contention was arguable but was waived, and in the 1925 Appropriation Act (1925, chapter 56, item 377) the power was specifically given to each company to aid and assist any other by the issue of its securities and the application of the proceeds, when guaranteed, to meet the requirements of any or all such other companies. This authority was not general; it applied only to securities issued and guaranteed "under the provisions of this enactment". No securities were issued or guaranteed under the 1925 Appropriation Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: 1923.

Mr. DUNNING: 1925 is the figure here.

This is all of the existing legislation dealing with or relating to the issue and guarantee of securities and the assisting by one company of another. This existing legislation does not cover the purpose of the present bill which is to enable securities to be issued and guaranteed to an amount not in excess of outstanding principal indebtedness to postpone, renew, compromise or adjust existing indebtedness of any company even though not matured.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That covers very well the question I asked. If this measure becomes law the government has it in its power to guarantee the Canadian Northern electrical bonds.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Canadian Northern Electric Railway bonds; the three companies are enumerated in the schedule. The answer given me now is that they never guaranteed these bonds. They are paying the interest and they have possession of the roads, which they are operating.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is right.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then the government will have power, if this enactment passes, to guarantee those bonds?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of what took place in connection with the Rouyn railway I am strongly of opinion that legislation of this character should not be left in the hands of the Governor in Council but of parliament. My profound conviction, from what study I have given the matter, is that legislation of this character should be passed by parliament. Every bill should be dealt with on its merits. In days gone by I gave considerable attention to this question, although in recent years I have not studied it so carefully. But of one thing I am certain, and that is, that to place power of this kind in the hands of the Governor in Council is to issue an invitation to have the government importuned, as occurred in olden times, to give its guarantee to securities which in my opinion this country should not endorse. I do suggest that the minister would be well advised to leave these matters in such a shape that they may be dealt with every year by parliament. True, some little delay might be entailed, but the question is so important that parliament should pass upon the merits of every such piece of legislation. Take the Rouyn railway, for example, the papers in connection with which I have asked for. What happened in that instance? It was contended that, in virtue of an agreement made between that company and the crown, the government was operating certain railways independently of the Canadian National Railway system. In the capacity of owner and operator of a railway the crown, as represented by the Minister of Railways, undertook to guarantee by way of lease the securities of that particular road. That is a matter that should be dealt with by parliament in the first instance, and the minister would be acting wisely, before coming to any agreement or asking parliament to place in the hands of the Governor in Council any such power as is suggested, and to provide that no measure of this nature should become effective until ratified by parliament. I wholly agree with what he says as to the desirability of rounding out the financial structure of the system in order to obtain one class of security with respect to all the varying lines of railway. That we will concede. But to ask the Governor in Council to guarantee, compromise and agree to make good certain securities which at present have no value is something which I submit, in the case of a private concern, only the shareholders could pass upon. And the shareholders of the Canadian National Railway system comprise not only the government, but parliament as representing the people.

The difficulty I have always experienced in connection with the government system is the one to which I alluded the other evening, that is to say, the difficulty of having the shareholders of the company—the Canadian National Railway system—give their approval to the necessary measures which in the case of a private enterprise would in due course be submitted by the directors to the shareholders either at an annual or at a special meeting. I have looked into this bill with some care and I urge upon the government not to lay itself open to importunity on the part of interests connected with these various enterprises, sometimes remotely and occasionally quite closely, but to provide that the people through their representatives in parliament shall pass upon every measure of this kind, and that upon the completion of any arrangement it be submitted to the House. That would be the proper course to follow and I submit it for the consideration of the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend makes a case which of course in principle, as applied to any ordinary transaction, is very difficult to answer. May I point out, however, that in the case mentioned by my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie)—I do not recall the name of the electric lines in question—

Mr. GUTHRIE: The three companies enumerated in the schedule.

Mr. DUNNING: Enumerated in the schedule to the Canadian Northern Act? With respect to those three companies, the power of the Canadian Northern system to issue other securities in place of those guaranteed by the government has existed since the act was passed in 1918.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was never exercised.

Mr. DUNNING: It was never exercised. But this government is asking for no more power with reference to the Canadian National system as a whole than was conveyed by that legislation with respect to the original Canadian Northern system and its constituent companies. But I do want to be absolutely clear: there is one difference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There certainly is.

Mr. DUNNING: The difference is with respect to securities not yet matured.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the difference And I want to ask my hon. friends, as men who know something about finance, whether they think it is possible to make the best fiancial arrangement for the liquidation of that class of security by coming to parliament with a bill asking for authority to deal with it before you attempt to deal with the market situation.

Mr. BENNETT: No; deal with it first, and then come and get the approval of parliament as is always done by railway companies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid the minister does not quite grasp the point made by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). He has not answered it at all. He says practically: It is more convenient for me to do it this way. My hon. friend is not quite right when he thinks the powers are as open as they were. The reading of Mr. Ruel's opinion makes it perfectly clear that both points I made are right. The whole question here is that the government's liability may be increased to the extent of all existing securities of any of these companies just as the government and the company agree. That was all I said. My hon. friend said I was wrong, Mr. Ruel says I am right. There is no question that that is the plain intent of the statute.

Mr. DUNNING: But my hon. friend knows that that was the plain intent of the 1918 statute.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, no.

Mr. DUNNING: With the exception I referred to regarding the unmatured securities.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Since 1918 we have learned how statutes can be evaded, we have learned how parliament can be flouted, we have learned how original capital obligations can be created entirely apart from parliament, we have learned how you can have a rule for one part of the country and another rule for another part of the country. The act of 1918 is a broad act. It is, however, a little more limited than the present act. But the state of the law as we had it in 1923 was too broad, too generous and too liberal, and the railway solicitor points out, perfectly properly, that the act of 1923 was an act of limitation. Now in this proposal, Mr. Chairman, we are asked to go entirely in the opposite direction. In 1923 this government brought in a bill, defined by the railway solicitor as an act which instead of enlarging restricted the then right of creating these obligations against the government. Instead of going along that line of parliamentary responsibility we are now going further away from it than we were doing previous to 1923. I admit the government did it rather reluctantly in 1923, but it is queer that the government which thought something should be done to limit this right of issuing securities should be the government which now wants a blank cheque written.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat impressed by the suggestion made by my hon. friend from West Calgary, and am rather disposed to examine its practicability. Did I understand him correctly to say that one might proceed with an arrangement subject to the approval of parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: Not only that; for instance, when the Canadian Pacific Railway enters into certain negotiations with respect to properties, it puts at the end a very short provision making the agreement "subject to the approval of the shareholders of the company called together in special general meeting." That is done. I might name another instance. When the government entered into an agreement with respect to the construction of a railway in the Yukon, it provided that the agreement was subject to the approval of parliament, as some of my friends will remember. Very frequently when railway companies enter into negotiations with respect to financial matters it is provided that shareholders' meetings shall be held to approve the arrangements made. I have in mind that the New York Central at the time of the consolidation of lines took that course, as did also another American line. I see no reason why in a case of this kind in which the directors of the Canadian National deal with a question, and it is satisfactory to the government, the government does not provide that the arrangement will be submitted to parliament for approval at its next session. That at all events will not involve a longer delay than six or eight months, because that is the maximum time which elapses between the prorogation of one session and the calling of another. That would make it clear there was no disposition on the part of the government to substitute itself for the body of shareholders of the company, parliament being the nearest approach to such a body.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend intend that in the meantime the securities in question would be marketed?

Mr. BENNETT: Obviously not; they should not be marketed.

Mr. DUNNING: Or substituted?

Mr. BENNETT: No. The whole matter should be subject to the approval of this parliament, in the same way as a private corporation makes a bargain subject to the approval of its shareholders. That is the regular practice.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, we have had a very good example of that in connection with the return of Alberta's resources. The government made an agreement with the provincial authorities subject to ratification by this parliament. Why cannot a similar course be taken in regard to railway matters?

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I believe we are all approaching this thing, not from the point of view of party but from the point of view of being jointly and severally responsible for a very great business enterprise.

Mr. BENNETT: And a very difficult one.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. We must get its financial affairs straightened up, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to believe me that I have approached it from that point of view. I could never see how it was possible to make any kind of arrangement with respect to stocks which are not guaranteed by the government, but which have certain securities back of them of a very complex character, it being difficult to ascertain just what the bearing on the property would be of realization by the bondholders of their security, the bondholders themselves being just as uncertain from the legal point of view as the railway, and that uncertainty on both sides being reflected in the market price of the securities at this moment. I do not want anybody here to think I have reference to the Grand Trunk, because I have not. There is not any legal doubt with regard to the Grand Trunk securities. I am referring to a number of other securities. The uncertainty regarding the position of the securities held by the bondholders in relation to the property, the fact that in some cases interest is not being paid because the government is not responsible for the particular issue, and because the road itself, or the piece of the road representing the security, is not earning interest in accordance with the terms of the bond, and therefore cannot meet that interest,—all of those conditions are reflected in the market price of that particular security. I have been trying to find a way of dealing with this matter which would ensure that whatever those bonds really were worth intrinsically, the government would not be compelled, in order to rehabilitate the finances of this system, to pay a price for them beyond their real worth. That is really what I am aiming at; I think the hon. member for West Calgary sees it, as well as the hon. member for West York, and if there is any way, by co-operation between the members of this House who have studied this problem and know something about it, to evolve such a method and at the same time have all the publicity which attends a submission to parliament, I would be very glad indeed to take such a course. Frankly, I have not been able to find that way, having regard to the very great complexity of the different securities involved. Hon. members will judge that I hesitated somewhat before introducing a measure extending the powers in question to securities not yet matured. That is really the point, the extension of that power in order to make it apply to securities not yet matured, and yet if we do not have that power we cannot deal with the most difficult of the questions involved. It is in connection with that phase of the matter that the greatest difficulties of financial rehabilitation occur.

I do not think anyone who has studied the matter will deny that statement, and unless and until there is some method of dealing with such securities before maturity we can never make one financial entity of the Canadian National system. I only need refer to one fact in order to prove that statement. The Grand Trunk Pacific securities, about which so much talk has occurred in the Old Country, are perpetual securities and never mature. It is true that we have the right to redeem them in 1936 at a price of 105, but apart from that right there is a perpetual security. Under our existing legislation it never could be dealt with, but under this legislation it is possible to negotiate. The government of the day would, of course, have to take responsibility for these negotiations, but I have found it very difficult to devise any scheme which would not involve procedure somewhat along the line indicated in this bill. I am prepared to give consideration to suggestions and will be very glad to receive them.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I recall the circumstances under which the Canadian Pacific Railway acquired the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company's properties; they certainly went to their shareholders with a completed bargain. The Calgary and Edmonton securities were 6 per cent securities, and a bargain was made whereby, if my memory serves me right—and I speak now subject to correction—Canadian Pacific 4 per cent perpetual debenture stock was substituted therefor, or possibly the rate of interest on the bonds was reduced to 4 per cent. I am not quite sure which was the case, but I recall the circumstances and remember that the shareholders approved of the arrangement.

All the consolidated perpetual debenture stock of the Canadian Northern system is having its interest paid from year to year; at the moment I do not know whether or not it is earned, but up to a certain time it was not earned. Yet we paid it, because we had acquired the stock of the enterprise, rather than let it default. That, I think, should have been done; the railway and property should have been placed in the hands of a receiver as the only way in which the matter could be dealt with, but we have seen fit to pay the interest upon that perpetual debenture security. I look at chapter 20 of the statutes of Canada for 1914 and find there a list of all the securities acquired at the time we gave assistance to the Canadian Northern enterprise, as well as all the mortgaged properties which were taken over by us subject to the claim of the perpetual consolidated debenture stock of 1903. The more I look at it the more satisfied I am that this House, representing the shareholders of the system, should not confer upon a government the right to deal with these matters. I think it in the interests of the government themselves; I can conceive of nothing worse for the government than the financial interests, who have been buying securities of various kinds in order to make a deal, for instance, coming along to the government and saying, "We can do so and so." A better deal can be made for this country if the minister is in a position to say, "Yes, we will deal, but we can only deal with the approval of parliament." I am as sure of that as I can be sure of anything, because of my observations with respect to matters of this kind. If a board of directors has to deal with its shareholders before approving a bargain I have always observed that they can make a much better bargain than if they took the matter up themselves. In other words, the publicity incident to explaining the circumstances of a transaction to a shareholders' meeting involves consideration by the directors, which ensures the very best possible bargain.

Now, speaking to the particular matter to which the minister refers, it is apparent that he desires to acquire securities which have not as yet matured. That is usually done through a bondholders' committee or in some similar way, or through a large financial house which specializes upon these matters. For instance, the Canadian Northern has maturing at a not distant date $25,000,000 of income bonds the interest upon which has not been paid because, in the terms of the bond itself, the income has not been earned. It is probable that this country will have to pay that $25,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: If I may correct my hon. friend, the interest was earned for some time and was paid.

Mr. BENNETT: I mean since the amalgamation. Prior to the acquisition of the system by the country it is true that in order to maintain a market the interest was paid whether it was earned or not; it was said to have been earned, to put it correctly. No one who has analayzed the figures believes that it was earned, but it was said to have been earned, and I remember when these income bonds sold at a premium. They were exchangeable for common shares in the system, and in view of the revelations, shall I say—because I can use no other word—disclosed by the prospectus, people thought it might be a valuable investment. We have passed that by; the fact is that these bonds mature at a not distant day; they are a 5 per cent security, and it might be desirable for the country to acquire them. But who for a moment would suggest that, if it became known that the government was authorized to deal with a transaction of this kind, the market price would not immediately advance? There would be pressure, unfortunate pressure, exerted against the government on all sides by their friends and by people who would become their friends for the moment, or at least until the transaction was ended. It is apparent in matters of this kind that once you get it into the House of Commons with its 245 members, the government would say, "We submit this for your approval." It does not involve the life of the administration at all; they simply say, "We recommend this to parliament; we have made this bargain which we believe to be best and we ask you, as business men, to consider it," and I have no doubt that parliament will give it that consideration which its importance demands.

The more I look at the statute of 1914 under which we acquired these securities, and in view of the circumstances which I think the minister has in mind but which he has not mentioned and which I will not discuss as to the acquisition of securities, I think he will be in a position to deal more favourably, more economically, more free from the pressure of individuals and much more to the advantage of the railway system as a whole, with less possible appeal being made to what I will fairly describe as the avarice of man, if he is not placed in that position.

Take the Grand Trunk situation. What happened with respect to that? Who was it that cornered the market in Grand Trunk securities in London? Look what Mr. Fielding said in his budget speech. The man's name he does not mention, but he is known to every Canadian, and he took advantage of certain information that he had, went to London, and was reported to have pledged practically his whole fortune for the purpose of enabling him to corner those securities, which went I believe, to par. If it became known that the government was dealing with this matter in that way, the advance in the price of the securities would be immediate, whereas if the bargain were subject to the approval of parliament—

Mr. DUNNING: The bargain to which my hon. friend is referring was subject to the approval of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: But the terms of it were known in advance of being submitted to parliament. The other was a matter of an entirely different character. I could analyse it, but the hon. member for West York did so on one occasion, and I am not going into that now. If every bargain of this kind is made subject to the approval of the House of Commons and of the Senate, I am so satisfied that it would be in the interests of this country by millions of dollars that I venture to press it on the minister's attention, believing that the citizens of this country look to us as the representatives of the shareholders of that system to protect it from the greed and avarice, on the one hand, of contending claimants at the hands of the government, and from the government itself when pressure is being made upon it. I think we should strengthen their hands to resist that pressure, and it can only be done, in my judgment, by leaving the matter to parliament and not to the governor in council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to talk this over with the minister on the line he suggests. There are different ways in which the matter can be handled. My own idea is that the less publicity we have in these things, in some instances, the better, but at the same time I entirely agree with what the hon. member for West Calgary has said as to the unforutnate experiences we have had in the past as regards what happens in the stock market when it is even believed that the government are going to interest themselves in any particular property. If this legislation were passed in the form proposed, I am afraid the minister's position in life would indeed be an unhappy one. The first thing he would know a whole lot of people who ought not to have the information would have it just as sure as we are sitting here, and before the system got the stock there would be, just as certain as anything, a considerable appreciation in price, and such a demand upon the country and the government that, notwithstanding the appreciation, the deal would go through. I am perfectly willing to discuss the matter with my hon. friend and help him in any way with my advice, such as it may be, but I cannot see my way to support this present proposition.

Mr. BENNETT: May I put it this way, in one sentence? This is a matter that in an ordinary private corporation would be submitted to the shareholders.

Mr. DUNNING: Not necessarily.

Mr. BENNETT: It could not possibly be carried into effect otherwise. The minister says no. Let him show me any statute or authority to show that a matter of this kind would not be dealt with by the shareholders. It would be submitted antecedently or subsequently, and antecedently it has never been done by any corporation carrying on a public service business that I know of, because the directors would be put out of business who undertook to do it. Then, if it should be submitted to the shareholders, who are the shareholders of this company? The members of this House and the Senate.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to following the common procedure of great corporations in this regard, it is, in fact, a very frequent practice for the directors to go to the shareholders with a proposal enabling the board of directors to purchase securities in connection with deals of this kind where it is in the interest of the company so to do. It is not unusual at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister name one?

Mr. DUNNING: Offhand, I cannot.

Mr. BENNETT: I have studied these things rather carefully.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and I defer to my hon. friend's corporation knowledge, which is much wider than my own. It is not that this government desires to get into its own hands powers which could be used improperly.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not sugested that.

Mr. DUNNING: But we do desire to get into a position where the re-financing of this great system can proceed. The very instance my hon. friend quoted by way of illustration regarding what happened in London in connection with the Grand Trunk matter is an evidence that the very thing which he argues would happen, did in fact happen, when the system he advocates was in practice, and when the matter had to be brought to parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: In that instance the bargain was not concluded. My point is, conclude the bargain and ask parliament to approve. In that other case it was the knowledge that parliament was going to be asked to do something—not the completion of the bargain—that brought about the condition to which I have referred, and that is what will happen here unless you do it in the way I have suggested, namely, come to parliament with a completed bargain and ask for its approval.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend appreciates that in a great many cases the method of procedure would not be by negotiating with anybody, but by simply buying the securities.

Mr. BENNETT: On the open market?

Mr. DUNNING: In some cases, yes, unquestionably. I am of the opinion that a great deal of our troubles in the Old Country with regard to this Grand Trunk matter could have been adjusted if there had been some such power. My hon. friend agrees with me.

Mr. BENNETT: Not the power to buy.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course, there will always be a certain number of people who desire to take advantage of advance information of what is proposed to be done. I have no doubt at all that if it were known that a certain arrangement with certain creditors of a certain part of the system was under consideration by the government, with a view to its being placed before parliament, precisely the same effect would follow as my hon. friend outlines. It followed in connection with the Grand Trunk case. However, I do want to settle a matter of this kind in a manner which will not cause it to become the subject of political controversy. On the other hand, I do not want to settle it in a manner that will ensure that the Dominion of Canada will be forced to pay one hundred cents for something which is intrinsically worth only fifty cents, and that is the position I am afraid of getting into as a result of following the suggestions made to me.

I make this suggestion to the committee. Let us pass the resolution and get the bill before the House. I will leave it in such a stage as to permit of its consideration by those interested on both sides of the House, and if there is a better way, a safer way, I shall be glad to consider it, subject to this condition, that if the suggestions made involve as a certainty that this country is going to pay 100 cents for something that is worth only 50 cents, I am against that, and that is the tendency of the suggestions that have been made. I believe that the shareholders of a corporation in the position that this corporation is in would give to their trusted directors the power to deal with the matter. Of course, I understand that the government is never exactly in the position of being the trusted directors of all the shareholders; it is never trusted by everybody on all sides of the House. Many of my friends who argue for more business in government, if they had to be subjected in their own private business to what members of the government are subjected in conducting the business of the country, would not stay in business very long.

4 p.m.

Mr. POWER: That is what the opposition wants.

Mr. DUNNING: Probably so. I make that suggestion in good faith, recognizing that other members of this House are just as desirous as I am that this matter should be handled in a businesslike way, I suggest that we let the resolution pass and the bill be introduced, and then we can leave it in committee, or better still, let it stand for second reading.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend I think is wrong when he thinks, for example, that he is standing like Horatius at the bridgehead saying: We will never pay one dollar for what is worth only fifty cents. He talks as if he were Horatuis—I am going back further than some of the other similes. He is wrong when he thinks he is either like Horatius or the crown prince in that regard.

Mr. DUNNING: Do not talk politics now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says, do not talk politics. Is he only a politician when he is the crown prince or when he is Horatius? How does that come in? My hon. friend is entirely wrong when he speaks in that way. In the first instance there is a great deal of difference between the Grand Trunk case and this. We did not like the Grand Trunk case. There is no question about that. But the fact that people went out, bought on the market, ran up the price and got control of the stock did not add five cents to the obligation of the government. But in this particular case, if we have any advertising—and this particular discussion is an advertisement, because it is advertising to everybody that particular securities are good ones to get hold of—that is the way to run up the price and the only way you can run it up successfully. That is going to be done if we adopt this proposal. I think the minister should withdraw the proposition or have a conference. I do not think we should countenance such a proposition at any time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It seems to come down to the question of the subsequent approval of parliament. Would my hon. friend be willing to let the resolution pass, with the distinct understanding that we are not committed to anything more than that the government should get certain powers that are suggested here, either with the approval of parliament or without the approval; but that that matter should be settled before any bill is passed? I have a great deal of sympathy with the point of view that the approval of parliament should be obtained. If it is possible to do what is here suggested with the approval of parliament, I would be entirely in favour of the proposal for the approval of parliament. But listening to the discussion this afternoon, I confess, not having the knowledge of finance which my hon. friend opposite has, I am not sure that the object aimed at by the minister could be attained with the provision for the approval of parliament.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would agree with my hon. friend's suggestion except for this reason: If the approval of parliament is necessary there is no object in the legislation at all. We might just as well make up our minds one way or the other. If the approval of parliament is to be required, we gain nothing by passing the legislation now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend made a remark which I think has a bearing on this question, namely, that in the public interests it is advisable that there should not be too much publicity at this stage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is why I wanted to hold a conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If that is true, and my hon. friend agrees to it, would it not further the situation if the resolution were allowed to pass, it being understood by both sides that the bill will not be proceeded with unless we have some agreement and understanding between the two parties in regard to it?

Mr. ROGERS: Let us agree to have the conference first.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the resolution is passed and the bill is introduced, before the second reading is proceeded with we could have a conference.

Mr. ROGERS: I think it would be more satisfactory to have the conference first.

Mr. DUNNING: As my hon. friend has so little confidence in our good faith, I am prepared to move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Progress reported.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

The House resumed from June 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, to amend the Immigration Act—Hon. Mr. Stewart—Mr. Duff in the chair.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): When this bill was in committee last week, there was some question as to whether the Criminal Code would cover section 41 of the Immigration Act. I think we were all in agreement in regard to the provision of the amendment, namely, that it was taking out of the hands of the Department of Immigration the right to bring before a board of inquiry and deport aliens under section 41. That is all that was involved; the offences contained in section 41 are dealt with under the Criminal Code.

Mr. BURY: I understood when the bill was before the committee on a previous occasion that the Minister of the Interior admitted that all the clauses in the present section 41 would not be covered by the amendment, and that some of the acts for which deportation lay under the present section 41 of the Immigration Act would not lie under the new section as amended. If so, I would like to know which acts they are.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was led into error by the fact that I was not aware that sections 97 and 97 (b) of the Criminal Code had been repealed. That matter was taken up on Friday when the amendments to the Criminal Code were passed. I understand that sections 132 and 141 of the Criminal Code do cover, or can cover, practically all that is provided for in section 41. Section 41 is merely removing from the Department of Immigration the right to bring before a board of inquiry and to try individuals suspected of certain offences. What we are doing in effect is simply to provide that a trial should be had before a judge and jury, and then we step in and enforce deportation afterwards.

Mr. BENNETT: This gives the minister the right to determine whether or not the man should be deported.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. BENNET: Section 41 says that the officer of the municipality shall report the case to the minister.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And what does the minister do?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The officer reports to the minister only in case of conviction. The provisions in section 41 were that if those offences were proven before a board of inquiry deportation followed as a matter of course. Now it cannot follow, unless it is reported that a conviction has been registered.

Mr. BENNETT: What does the minister do?

Mr. CANNON: The minister sees that the man is deported if he receives a report from the judge that the man has been convicted.

Mr. BENNETT: Under what authority is he deported?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Under section 40. The minister still retains power to deport under section 41. As a matter of fact, I would very much rather the Immigration department was relieved of the deportation proceedings altogether, and that officers of the crown who are charged with other duties might perform that duty, but we are retaining it under section 41, I presume for offences of this character, and to offences under the Narcotic Drug Act the same procedure applies. Where convictions are made we register deportation. Apparently that is our business. We are police officers to that extent.

Mr. BURY: As I explained when we were last considering this amendment I was not concerned then nor am I so much concerned now with anything except the question whether the amendment will cut out from what I may call deportable offences, any offences for which deportation now lies. The Minister of the Interior first told us that the offences would be the same under the present act and under the amendment. On further advice he altered his statement and said: No, there would be some offences for which deportation lies under the present act for which deportation will not lie under the new legislation.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) was speaking in committee on this matter on the last occasion he admitted that there would be certain acts for which deportation now lies for which deportation would not lie under the amendment. I would like to know what these are. The minister now states that he thinks that notwithstanding the repeal of sections 97A and 97B of the Criminal Code, notwithstanding those amendments that were made the other day, there will be no change. I want to call attention to this. Section 41 of the act as it now reads states:

> Every person who by word or act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence the government of or constituted law and authority in . . . . Canada.

Perhaps that is covered by the offences that are mentioned in section 134 of the code where it is an indictable offence to speak seditious words or to publish seditious libel or to be a party to a seditious conspiracy. But further down there is this offence:

> Or advocates the assassination of any official of any of the said governments or of any foreign government, or who in Canada defends or suggests the unlawful destruction of property or by word or act creates or attempts to create any riot or public disorder in Canada.

I very much fear if those cases for which deportation now lies are covered by the code with 97A and 97B repealed. If there is any doubt about the matter we should not leave those offences as acts which can be committed without liability to deportation. The man in Canada who defends or suggest the unlawful destruction of property—where is that offence covered by part II of the code? I cannot find it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sure my hon. friend cannot find the exact words in the Criminal Code, but those matters all come under some sections of the code relating to sedition, seditious intention, seditious words and seditious libel. The only difference will be that those people will have to be convicted first before being deported.

Mr. BURY: I am not talking of that at all. The only section that could possibly refer to this is section 134 where it is made an indictable offence to speak seditious words or to publish a seditious libel or to be a party to a seditious conspiracy. I suggest to the Minister of Justice that those words are not sufficient to cover the offence described in the present section 41 of the act, namely, the offence of defending or suggesting the unlawful destruction of property.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is sedition under the common law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Have there been any complaints against the department in connection with the deportation of people who have come under the provisions of this section which is being repealed?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot say directly under those particular provisions but we have difficulties in connection with almost every deportation. In very many cases there are people who object to the deportation and who try to fight us on the ground that it is illegal and to hold up the deportation if they can.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Under the proposed legislation those advocating sedition or anarchy or a state of affairs of that kind are to be given the dignity of a public trial before a judge and jury whereas under the old act the minister and his officials had the authority to take such people in hand and bundle them out of the country in a hurry.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a fair interpretation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Under present conditions, with a situation such as exists throughout the world, I do not think it is advisable to make the change in our law unless there is some pressing need for it and a demand on the part of people who are not in sympathy with those subject to this section of the act. I protested the other day against it and I do so again because I am satisfied that the change is being made largely through the influence of undesirable people in this country.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I hardly think that is a fair statement because three different attempts have been made to amend section 41 of the Immigration Act, not for a moment in order to wipe out the offences but to take out of the hands of the Department of Immigration and the minister the right to seize and deport people without trial except trial by his own officials who constitute a board. That is all that we are attempting to do. My hon. friend says that if these people are anarchists they have no right to any consideration. After all the common law provides that a court is the judicial body which decides matters of this kind.

This amendment was inserted at a time when affairs were somewhat strenuous in the country but frankly I would much prefer that the court should deal with this matter than that responsibility should be upon the minister. It has been stated that this is too much power to put into the hands of the minister and I have agreed with that on every occasion when the question has been brought up in the House. I know the objection taken is that individuals guilty of some of these offences are not worthy of trial. All I say is: Do not ask the minister to decide upon the worthiness or unworthiness of the person concerned; let the court decide that, and afterwards we will perform the duty of getting him out of the country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Under section 40 are there not certain offences the determination of which still remains in the hands of the minister and as regards which he still retains the power of deportation without trial?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The minister is now proposing to make a distinction between those mentioned in section 40 and those guilty of sedition or anarchy.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not necessarily anarchy, but sedition is one of the offences. A very wide interpretation can be put upon the word "sedition." My hon. friend will agree that it may be difficult to prove prostitution, but at the same time it is an offence for which the minister has power to deport.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I can see no good reason why this legislation should be amended. From what direction is the pressure coming for it? By whom has it been recommended?

[Mr. D. Sutherland.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Trades and Labour Council, which is a very respectable body in this country, has repeatedly requested the government to amend this legislation and it did so again this year. Tom Moore is president of the organization which I think truly represents labour in this country.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is the Trades and Labour Council pressing for an amendment which would prevent deportation of those who advocate anarchy?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Trades and Labour Council does not advocate that at all. There is no request for stay of deportation. What is asked for is trial.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The effect of this legislation will be undoubtedly that many guilty men will escape. We all know how difficult it is to secure conviction in the trial of offences of this kind, and if the minister and the board of inquiry which is already provided, are thoroughly convinced that a citizen is undesirable, even though he may not be convicted in any criminal court, surely there should be reserved to the department the right to deport such a man without going to the expense of securing conviction criminally, with the uncertainty that must attend any such trial. There might not be evidence enough to bring about a conviction, and yet there might be sufficient evidence to warrant the minister in considering an individual an undesirable. He might be stirring up trouble and should be deported. But it will be impossible to secure his deportation under the legislation now proposed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Hon. gentlemen to the left are laughing. I do not see anything to laugh at, especially when we recall the experience we have had in Canada with some of this class of people. It costs thousands of dollars to secure a conviction and the result is that many of them escape.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Who is better qualified than the courts to decide whether or not a man is undesirable?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The court's business is to ascertain merely whether a crime has been or has not been committed. A man might be a very undesirable citizen and yet not be guilty of any particular crime.

Mr. POWER: Undesirable in what sense?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In every sense.

Mr. POWER: In what sense specifically —because he eats peas with his knife?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): When we are selecting immigrants in the Old Country we do not act on the principle that merely because a man has not been guilty of any crime he is therefore admissible.

Mr. POWER: No, we have regulations governing his entry.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Exactly. Why not therefore follow that principle right through?

Mr. POWER: And abolish the courts altogether?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, I do not suggest that.

Mr. POWER: To whom would the hon. gentleman leave the discretion of deciding whether anyone was desirable or undesirable? Would he leave that discretion to members of parliament?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Leave it to the board of inquiry as in the past. Surely it is safe to leave the matter in the hands of the board. And, besides, it is cheaper.

Mr. POWER: Who would make accusation against the undesirable?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The same person who would make it in a court. Someone must start the machinery, whether in the court or before the board.

Mr. POWER: Did the hon gentleman ever read section 41 of the part which is being repealed?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. POWER: Does he know that under that section the board of inquiry could have excluded from this country almost every man who has even been of any benefit to the human race in the fight for liberty in foreign countries? It could have excluded nearly all the great patriots during the last century. Anyone who had opposed organized government in his own country could have been kept out under the legislation as it has existed heretofore. For example, as my friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) suggests, Lord Carson could have been refused entrance into the country.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): You would not want him anyway.

Mr. POWER: Neither I would. But the law would have excluded him at any rate, just as it would have excluded Michael Collins, Mazzini, Garibaldi, Kossuth and practically all those who fought against organized government in one country or another of Europe. Does the hon. member want that state of affairs to continue, or does he want this to be a fairly free country?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Have those people or any of them ever come here to reside?

Mr. POWER: No, but they could have been excluded if they had come.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): You cannot deport a man until he is here, and has made himself a nuisance in Canada.

Mr. POWER: There would have been any number of people who would have concluded at once that some of these men I have mentioned were nuisances. Would my hon. friend suggest that a court would not be competent to inquire into the conduct of such persons?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A board of inquiry set up by the minister and under his control and responsibility would be just as capable of determining a matter of that kind as a court of justice ,and perhaps more so.

Mr. POWER: It is a question of taste, as I suggested in regard to the peas.

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister will hardly suggest that any injustice has been done in the past. I do not accuse him of cowardice nor do I think he is a coward, but the only reason he has given so far for wanting to repeal the law is the fact that he does not want to assume the responsibility under the act. Considerable numbers of undesirable people have been coming into this country, and we should have been better off if we had deported them. If we are to abide by the result of a trial there are sections in Canada where, as we know from past experience, the legal proceedings would be so protracted as to make it highly improbable that any undesirable person should be deported. We want to give these people short shrift. We have too many of the type who in the last ten years should have been deported on their arrival.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not at all a question of cowardice or of courage. Hon. gentlemen opposite are forever arguing that the courts are the proper authorities to settle disputes, and I am rather surprised that my hon. friends should take this attitude to-day. They seem to have more confidence in me than in the courts. I appreciate the compliment, of course, and I may assure the committee that I have never at any time stayed deportation upon report from the board that any individual was undesirable. There are however under section 41 a number of offences which in my opinion could better be dealt with by the courts. This provision was enacted at a time when the country was in a state of serious disorder.

Mr. CANTLEY: It is not much better now.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, I still have authority to reject people at the boundary. I sympathize with the desire with which the provision was enacted, to prevent men from agitating the minds of others even though, in their view, legitimately. But on three different occasions attempts have been made to amend this section simply because it was felt to be unnecessary. It is considered advisable to put these particular crimes in the same category as others and let them go before the courts for decision.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Has the department acted upon any cases submitted to the authorities in the last few months?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not since I have been in the department.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 41 as it was passed in 1919 and as it now stands creates certain offences which are not offences within part II of the Criminal Code.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would not say so.

Mr. BENNETT: If my hon. friend will analyse the provisions of part II of the code, in the light of the provisions in section 41, he will have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that there are, in that section, offences which are not contained in part II of the Criminal Code. I do not want to take up the time of the committee, for my absence should not be a reason for prolonging this discussion, but I do ask the minister to look at that carefully. My hon. friend from East Edmonton (Mr. Bury), who sits beside me, has gone over in detail all the sections of the Criminal Code, and I have looked over his memorandum. I certainly think section 41 does create offences that are not created by part II of the Criminal Code. Now, this proposed legislation repeals section 41. The new section provides that a man must have committed an offence against some section in part II of the Criminal Code before he can be dealt with by the minister. If, therefore, there are offences in section 41 that are not covered in part II of the code, it follows that to that extent this legislation relaxes the supervision that we have been able to exercise over undesirables up to the present moment. I think it goes without saying that there has been in times past an organized effort in this country against the Dominion government and the governments of the provinces. As I came along on the train yesterday I read the daily papers from Winnipeg, and I observed that the mayor of that city has asked the citizens to unite for the purpose of putting down this communistic effort, and he names, for instance, an office building in the city of Toronto from which the objectionable literature is being sent out to various parts of Canada. The other day the members of the legal profession of Manitoba were invited by a gentleman from the United States who came to address them at Winnipeg to use their strongest efforts to prevent subversive propaganda that was now being circulated in his country and to a lesser extent in Canada.

I am wholly in sympathy with the idea that in this age it is perhaps a large power to leave with a board of inquiry to determine whether or not men are guilty of the offences in question. But once you have committed the matter to the courts—and as to that I am raising no objection—I submit to the minister that it is a lessening of the number of offences for which deportation is now possible, and to that extent this proposed legislation should not be passed. This is not the day to relax the arm of the law, this is not the day to lessen the authority of our officials to bring to account men who are deliberately endeavouring to destroy our institutions. I am wholly in accord with what my friend from Quebec said, that for the moment we are concerned about Canada alone, and not about any other portion of the British Empire. At the moment I am concerned with men who are circulating seditious literature and who are carrying on an active propaganda against organized government in the provinces and in this Dominion, and my regret is that in part II of the code there is no section that meets the cases mentioned in section 41.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would my hon. friend enumerate those?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to be too lengthy. I will go over briefly the memorandum prepared by my hon. friend from East Edmonton. Section 41 provides that:

> Every person who by word or act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence the government of or constituted law and authority in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or Canada—

I can readily understand the observation of hon. members that the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland can more or less take care of itself, and that for the moment we are concerned with Canada. Suppose all the words after the word "authority" were stricken out, leaving this part of the section:

—or who in Canada defends or suggests the unlawful destruction of property or by word or act creates or attempts to create any riot or public disorder in Canada.

Now, riot is dealt with in the Criminal Code in part II, but threats of destruction of property by word are not dealt with in the part of the code as I read it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: Will my hon. friend give me the section?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Section 132 deals with seditious words and so on, and if my hon. friend refers to Crankshaw's edition of the Criminal Code he will find there a number of cases in England, where the law is exactly the same as it is here. Everything that is referred to as coming under the offence of sedition, for instance, distributing or sending literature from Toronto, would be covered by the common law, and everything that has the effect of creating dissatisfaction as between different classes of the community has also been found to be sedition under the common law.

Mr. BENNETT: But the difficulty is that this is part II of the Criminal Code that the section deals with.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Section 132 is part II of the Criminal Code.

Mr. BENNETT: It reads as follows:

(1) Seditious words are words expressive of a seditious intention.

(2) A seditious libel is a libel expressive of a seditious intention.

(3) A seditious conspiracy is an agreement between two or more persons to carry into execution a seditious intention.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty is that the section, as it now reads, places a limitation upon the provisions of section 41, because it provides that it must be for violation of the provisions of part II of the Criminal Code.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 41 has terms in in that are not in the Criminal Code, as I have pointed out, and the very language used by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice shows that the common law excludes the operation of section 41.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. It is the common law that interprets section 132.

Mr. BENNETT: Then why do we not say any criminal offences not provided for in the code and the common law.

Mr. CANNON: The Criminal Code provides for that.

Mr. BENNETT: The criminal law is that body of criminal law which comes to us both by statute and by common law, and the provisions of the criminal law that come to us under the common law are not in the code. Section 41 this House is now asked to pass is the section that deals with part II of the Criminal Code. Unfortunately there is a series of offences that are offences against the common law, and we have not provided for them in section 41.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The Criminal Code means just what it says, and criminal offences at common law, such as sedition, treason, conspiracy, and so on, are dealt with by the code; but it has been held that the old principles of common law with respect to the criminality of certain acts still prevail in this country. But all I suggest is that under this bill we are taking away the operation of the law against a number of offences because by repealing section 119 we are substituting the common law. Therefore if we propose to make the whole body of criminal law of Canada apply, that is, including the body of criminal law which is not part of the enactments of this parliament, contained in chapter 146—the Criminal Code of Canada—we should provide by common law, or by part II of the Criminal Code, for such offences.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend suggest the insertion of the words, "common law" in part II of the Criminal Code?

Mr. BENNETT: If my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is correct in his statement.

Mr. CANNON: It would be laughed at.

Mr. BENNETT: The Solicitor General says it would be laughed at. I say to him that within the four corners of the statute there is no provision for dealing with sedition at common law. If sedition at common law is an offence, the indictment will be drawn up against the peace of our said lord the king. Then will follow the description of the offence, not in violation of any section of this code but in violation of the common criminal law of this country, and unless you can name the section under which you frame an indictment and which will come within the sense of the common law, it is then an offence covered by section 41.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I still maintain that all offences coming under sedition are covered by part II of the Criminal Code, sections 132, 133 and 134. My hon. friend says the code does not refer to common law; certainly it does not, because it has always been found better to give the offence of sedition a wider meaning than its strict interpretation, and this applies in England as well as in Canada. I remember hearing the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) make a speech in connection with this matter in a very effective way.

In England, when they drafted the Criminal Code, the commissioners inserted a definition covering in part what is mentioned in section 41 of the Immigration Act, but the English parliament refused to accept that draft, preferring to leave the offence of sedition to be interpreted under the common law as has always been the practice. As I have said, it covers any offence which might create conflict between the subjects of His Majesty, between the classes of the community, or offences against the crown. The same thing happened in Canada; when our Criminal Code was drafted an effort was made to define sedition by inserting such words as these, but the parliament of Canada also declined to accept the draft, preferring to follow the British way of interpreting sedition, which has been the law in Canada up to the present time. Every one of the things my hon. friend has mentioned would come under the offence of sedition, and a man guilty of them would be convicted by a judge and jury.

Mr. BENNETT: But not under this section.

Mr. LAPOINTE. If my hon. friend will permit me to finish. I do not think there is anything to complain of in this legislation. I am quite free to agree that under the circumstances which existed in 1919 when the law was enacted there was justification for the law, but apparently it has created a grievance; it has been offensive to various classes of labour—

An hon. MEMBER: What class?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Trades and Labour Council, for instance, and there is no better class of people in Canada than the labour unions. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) says no, but I know better. I have been a member of the committee of the government which has received delegations from the Trades and Labour Council every year coming to make their recommendations, and this has been a thorn in the flesh of labour since 1919. They may be mistaken but they are afraid that it may work against them in some way, and have asked that an amendment be made making it clear that a man should be convicted before being deported. I really do not think there should be so much opposition to this piece of legislation.

Mr. CANTLEY: May I ask the minister if he knows any case of hardship which has occurred under the provisions of the act during the last three or four years?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not.

Mr. CANTLEY: Then why are we dealing with something under which no hardship has occurred? The act has been in force for some time and no hardship has been done. There are men in this country who should have been deported but who have been allowed to remain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member for Pictou may be right; I do not know of any hardship being done. But on the other hand if the law were not used, if the circumstances did not necessitate application of the law, why keep it when it is abhorrent to an important part of our population?

Mr. CANTLEY: The hon. gentleman says he knows of no case of hardship, and that the act was justified a few years ago. I would suggest to him that it might be well to ask those people who request a change to show that hardship has been done under the act before we remove a piece of legislation which safeguards the interests of this country. In my judgment there never was a time in the history of Canada, including the period directly after the war, when legislation of this kind was more necessary that it is to-day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are at peace to-day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I inquired of the minister a few days ago, when this matter first came up, as to who were making the demands for this legislation. Since that time I noticed in the Toronto Saturday Night of June 5, 1926, a full page article in connection with the activities of the communists in North America and also in Europe. Reference is also made to the Department of Labour in Canada in connection with this matter, and great pains are taken to show that the Federation of Labour in the United States and in Canada is absolutely opposed to the principles advocated by communists. So I want it distinctly understood that in referring to these matters I am not casting any reflection on our labour unions. The minister says that in 1919 this legislation might have been necessary, and so far as I have been able to observe no fault has been found with the minister or his department in connection with those cases which have come before the officials in charge of this matter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is misquoting me. I said that in almost every case of deportation we received representations against that action. No one likes to be deported, and the friends of the person so treated are particularly opposed to it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): In this article reference is made to a case which took place in Winnipeg on May Day, as follows:

For making a derogatory reference to the Union Jack at the May Day celebration in Winnipeg, Jack Gregg, who spoke on behalf of the Young Communist League, was deported, as were his parents and family.

Naturally these people would be very much put out about it, but apparently the officials of the department regarded this as a serious offence and thought this man and his family were not desirable citizens. Rather than give these people the dignity of a trial before a jury, with all the delay and costs which might be entailed thereby, I think some confidence should be placed in the officials who are on the ground and in touch with these people and their activities. I would further like to quote a statement made in this article to this effect:

The aims of communists the world over, and the close connection with Russia of Canadian communists, are clearly shown in the fifteenth annual report by the Department of Labour on "Labour Organization in Canada." On another page of this section there is a review of that publication. The section dealing with revolutionary labour organizations is especially pertinent to the subject of this article as it traces the direct connection between Canadian communists and the Red International of Labour Unions, which was founded in July 1921 through the efforts of a revolutionary body known as the Third (Communist) International, itself only organized at Moscow in 1919.

In the year that this legislation was enacted, this organization was formed in Moscow. It goes on:

The objective of the Third International, says the Department of Labour report, is to organize the working class for the overthrow of capitalism, the destruction of the bourgeois state and the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat. According to the theses of the Communist International, the trade unions represent the most important form of mass organization of the proletariat, and in order to propagate the communist doctrine in these bodies the Red International was established. The Canadian representative of the Communist International is the Communist party of Canada, which was formed on February 17, 1922.

Three years after this legislation was put on the statute book, this organization was organized in Canada, and the minister states that it is only by reason of the influence exercised by some of the friends of these people that complaints have reached the department. I wish the minister would pay some attention to the next paragraph.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have read it all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): It goes on:

Among the immediate demands of the Communist party, as adopted at the 1925 convention—

That is the convention held here in Canada:

—is the repeal of all anti-labour legislation, sedition laws, deportation clauses, and so forth.

In other words, it is this very clause that these classes of people who are organized in this country are making demands upon the government to have repealed. This was the matter I referred to the other day when the Prime Minister became so indignant when I spoke of two members of this House having waited upon him on the 28th of January, and having obtained a letter from him which was placed on the records of this House, and in connection with which they afterwards boasted of the favourable conditions which prevailed in this House making it possible to secure legislation of this character. I ask hon. members to be very careful with regard to repealing legislation at the behest of people who are actuated by views of this kind. The situation throughout the Dominion of Canada, and indeed throughout the world to-day, is not such that we should give these people a free hand to do as they like. I think the safeguard which we have is the competent officials of the department who are in touch with these people, and who will see that they are deported from this country rather than take the chance of securing their release after the long delay and expense of a trial before a judge and jury.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thought we had settled the Winnipeg strike the other night. However, as hon. gentlemen have brought it up again, I would like to add a word or two in this connection. I cannot agree with the Minister of Justice when he says that this legislation was necessary in 1919.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I said it may have been justified.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I quite understand the minister's position, but I do not want such a statement to go abroad unchallenged because some of these days we hope that all the facts in connection with the Winnipeg trouble will come to light, and when they do, it will be clear that there was then what might almost be described as a conspiracy against labour.

The CHAIRMAN: I trust the hon. member is not going to enter into a discussion of the Winnipeg strike.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, Mr. Chairman, but statements have been made here this afternoon regarding it, and those of us who are attempting in any sense to represent labour have a right to answer general statements of this character.

I would just say that at that time the press reports were of such a character that they absolutely misled the general public as to what took place, and I do not much wonder that hon. gentlemen here, going upon the press reports, rather incline to take an altogether false view of what actually took place at that time. The hon. member for South Oxford, who has just spoken, used this phrase, and I think I should not have spoken again this afternoon had this phrase not been used: He spoke of giving these people "the dignity of a trial before a jury." Mr. Chairman, that is the reason a great many of us have been urging this legislation for some years. We believe that every man in this country ought to have the right of a trial by jury. We believe that it is the inherent right of people living in British lands that they should be given a fair trial. The design of the Immigration Act is to keep undesirable people out of this country, and with that I have every sympathy, but this act, on the contrary, permits the deportation of people from this country, not because they are undesirable in the Old Country, but because they have done something in this country that is said to be wrong. In this act we say, "Every person who by word or act in Canada—." Our position is that for crimes alleged to be committed in Canada there ought to be a fair jury trial, and that we ought not simply to allow departmental action with regard to the case. It is said that there has been no hardship with regard to this matter. I would point out again that in 1919, when the law was put on the statute books, a distinct effort was made to deport a number of Canadians to the Old Country without jury trial, and it was only because the common sense of the great masses of the people of Canada raised a protest against that kind of thing, that we did not have the deportation of a number of men. I should like to repeat what I said the other day, that among these men who were to be deported without trial was my colleague from North Winnipeg. Had this law been acted upon at that time, Mr. Heaps would have been returned to England without any trial by jury.

5 p.m.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hon. gentlemen applaud. That shows the views they have upon such a proceeding. Mr. Heaps came before a jury and was acquitted. Now I ask, do you applaud? Those who talk about British institutions would have a man deported that a jury in this country had declared to be innocent! Talk about British loyalty—flag waving! It was not merely the labour people, but the British-born people all over this country, those who had something of the spirit of British traditions, that protested against that kind of thing, and these men were not deported, but received jury trial.

Having that case before us, we feel very strongly that this kind of legislation ought to be wiped off the statute book. It is quite true that there are communist organizations in this country that are asking for the removal of this legislation, but it is also true that there are trades and labour unions, even of the most conservative character, that are asking for the removal of this legislation simply on the ground that we believe that this has the effect of depriving certain groups of people, for certain alleged crimes, of that right to trial by jury which we were all taught in our school days was the right of every British subject. If it were simply a matter of keeping out people who were undesirable, I would have nothing to say, but I do urge that when people are permitted to come into this country and to reside here for a number of years, and subsequently do something in this country that is against our laws, let them be deported, but first let them be fairly tried before they are deported. That is the plea we make, and I think if the hon. gentlemen who have objected could really understand what is involved in legislation of this character they could hardly ask that it be retained on the statute books of Canada.

Mr. HAY: I would like to ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre a question. He referred to a man by the name of Heaps who would have been deported from Winnipeg but for the fact that he claimed trial by jury. I would ask if that is the same man who was guilty of putting the Union Jack under the platform at a meeting in Winnipeg and hoisting in its stead the red flag.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I believe that statement was made with regard to the hon. gentleman from North Winnipeg. I asked my hon. friend in regard to that the other day, and he said that what occurred was that both flags were deposited in a corner of the hall until the meeting was over. I think that is the actual fact.

Mr. CANTLEY: What was the red flag needed for in this country?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have seen a great many flags other than British flags in this country.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I have not the Immigration Act before me, but is the minister satisfied in his own mind that he is going to have authority to deport any person after section 41 is passed?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh, yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Provided that the person is convicted.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Assuming a person is convicted of one of the offences set forth in section 41, where is the authority to deport him?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the same way where a man is convicted under the Narcotic Drug act—we go to the gaol, take possession of him and deport him.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): But the section you are repealing contains the express authority to deport. It says: "shall be liable to deportation."

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Look at section 41 and you will find the same thing.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): We are dealing with section 41, and I am assuming that you are attempting to deport him. He takes proceedings under habeas corpus and comes into court, and you have to justify your deportation. Where do you get your authority to deport that man? Section 40 does not apply to this case at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend should undertake to look into that. We have had a whole lot of heat in the discussion of this section which I think is entirely out of place. This is confirming the government's position, I understand. That position is that there is no change whatever in the law as to the offences. And all we are saying is that before people can be deported from this country for doing certain things they must be convicted of the offence. I raise no issue there at all. As I said the other day, we are merely changing procedure and we are not now making legal things which otherwise would be a crime. My hon. friend from Calgary has made a point which has a great deal of merit, I think, having regard to the elimination of crimes for which people may be deported. If hon. gentlemen will look at the bill they will find that the only crimes for which people may be deported are offences as defined in part II of the Criminal Code. It is perfectly true, as has been pointed out, that we have crimes which are only crimes under the old common law, indictable crimes and crimes against society. I do not think anyone here wants to keep a convicted criminal. I think my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre will agree with that, and I would suggest, so that there may be no question as to what we are doing, that we simply say that no one except a convicted criminal shall be deported. We might make it read:

Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen has been convicted of a criminal offence, it shall be the duty—

And so forth. That would mean striking out the limiting words.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was just waiting to make that proposal—with the addition after the word "offence" of the words, "as defined in part II of the Criminal Code."

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): And would you add the words "shall be liable to deportation"?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, deportation is already provided. There is no question that we have authority to deport any person who is convicted by the courts of any crime in Canada, and who is not a citizen of Canada.

Mr. CANTLEY: I hope the hon. member will withdraw that amendment. I hold that no injustice has been done to anybody in the past. No honest workingman has anything to fear from legislation as it exists. In some sections of this country murders have been committed and nobody has been brought to justice for them. Nobody has been convicted, and I doubt very much whether, under those circumstances, you could convict in those localities under the bill as you propose to make it. It has been thought to be a necessary measure of protection. Why not leave it as it is?

Mr BENNETT: If section 41 is referable to section 40, then obviously it is not necessary, because section 40 says that whenever any person, other than a Canadian citizen or person having Canadian domicile, shall be convicted of an offence of any kind, it shall be the duty, and so on.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree with that.

Mr. BENNETT: Then section 41 is of no value at all, or it should be linked up in some way with section 40.

Mr. CANNON: Section 40 covers the case.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree that section 40 would cover the case, and the only purpose of the bill would be to repeal section 41.

Mr. BENNETT: The new section is of no value at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a repetition of section 40. There can be no conflict there, because any person who is not a citizen of Canada can be deported.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is there any limited time in reference to that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No. The only thing I would suggest is that in case of conviction they be deported before serving the term of punishment, but that is not usually done.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Any limit of the term of citizenship?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Five years.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Can he be deported after he has been here five years?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Absolutely.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): After he has been here five years you cannot deport him. Your department gave me that information.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The minister has admitted that the section is quite unnecessary.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He did not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): But section 40 covers the case.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not admit anything of the kind.

[Mr. Cantley.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): If my hon. friend would please keep his seat I might say a word. It has been admitted that this section is not necessary, or that this bill is not necessary, and that section 40 of the Immigration Act covers the case referred to. The object of the bill is to make a distinction between certain classes of offenders mentioned in section 40 of the original act. There are half a dozen offences for which a man may be deported, but those guilty of sedition are to be permitted the dignity of a trial before a judge and jury. This is the matter to which I was referring, and if the statement that section 40 covers that is not correct, the bill might very well receive further consideration at the hands of the government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have no objection to any observation which my hon. friend may wish to make, but every time he rises he takes the opportunity of putting into the minister's mouth statements which the minister never made.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The present minister will remember that there are other ministers.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is all very well, but if my hon. friend will withdraw the statement about the minister I shall be quite satisfied. On three different occasions the hon. member has taken the opportunity of making such statements, purely, in my opinion, for the purpose of getting them on Hansard. I take exception to that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I am sure the Acting Minister of Immigration will realize there was a minister speaking immediately before he spoke.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend did not say "minister." He said "the minister."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Yes. I said "the minister." He said: Section 40 covers the case.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But we must keep the bill in order to repeal section 41. I am quite willing to agree with the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) to allow the bill to read:

Section 41 of the Immigration Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1910, as enacted by chapter 26 of the statutes of 1919, is repealed.

The rest is certainly covered by section 40.

Mr. BENNETT: That is my view.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am agreeable if the Minister of Immigration is willing to do that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am always willing to take the word of the Minister of Justice.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 152 to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1923.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 1—Persons to whom drugs may be sold.

Sir Henry DRAYTON: Will the minister shortly explain?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The effect of clause 1 is to make it impossible for a retail druggist to give narcotics or opium to any person without a written order.

Mr. MANION: I notice one of the side notes states:

> Unlawful to refill narcotic prescription except where preparation lawful in the first instance.

According to this bill is a druggist permitted to fill a prescription for a narcotic drug without the written order of a physician?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think not.

Mr. MANION: By the note I would draw that conclusion. I have not had time to read the clause.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are not altering that in any way. The whole change effected in section 5 is that that a druggist may not give any of the drugs referred to in this act without an order in writing. It is thought by those in charge of the administration of the act that this will assist in checking up and in attaching responsibility for violations. It is only to tighten up the act.

Mr. MANION: The note on the side is not well worded; it does not explain the point well. The clause itself is all right.

Mr. MURPHY: Under the act as it stands it is not lawful for a superintendent of a hospital to order any narcotic drugs or to have them in his or her possession. The act is very clear on that point; you can sell only to a doctor, a veterinary surgeon or a dentist. In this country there are many hospitals in which the superintendent is not a doctor, a veterinary surgeon, or a dentist; therefore, as I read the act, such a superintendent has no right to buy these drugs or to have them in his possession. In fact if a hospital has any narcotic drugs in its possession or in the possession of the superintendent, they are guilty of a criminal offence under paragraph (d) of section 4 of the act, which reads:

> Every person who has in his possession any drug without lawful authority, or manufactures, sells, gives away or distributes any drug to any person without first obtaining a license from the minister. . . shall be guilty of a criminal offence.

Section 16 of the act reads:

> Without limiting the generality of paragraph (d) of section 4 of this act, any person who occupies, controls or is in possession of any building, room, vessel, vehicle, enclosure or place, in or upon which any drug is found, shall, if charged with having such drug in possession without lawful authority, be deemed to have been so in possession unless he prove that the drug was there without his authority, knowledge or consent, or that he was lawfully entitled to the possession thereof.

The superintendent of a local hospital who has opium or narcotic drugs in his possession within the meaning of this act is guilty of a criminal offence. It is unlawful for him to purchase the drugs. I do not know how the superintendent of a hospital can either purchase or be in possession of drugs lawfully under this act.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The bill which is now under consideration does not affect the superintendent of a hospital. The superintendent is in exactly the same position after this bill is passed as he was before. He will probably come under section 3 of the act, which describes the persons to whom and the manner in which licenses are given for the handling and keeping of drugs. The whole object of the section now under consideration is to oblige the retail druggist—it applies only to the retail druggist—if he dispenses narcotics even to a veterinary surgeon, or a physician, or a dentist, to have a written authority properly verified.

Mr. MURPHY: How will the retail druggist under these provisions be able to sell drugs to a hospital?

Mr. ELLIOTT: He can sell only upon a prescription signed and verified.

Mr. MURPHY: He may sell to a doctor or a veterinary surgeon or a dentist, but why should he not have authority to sell to a hospital?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The doctor will probably prescribe for the hospital.

Mr. MURPHY: Not necessarily; and in any case a doctor can prescribe only for the individual patient.

Mr. MANION: The point is well taken, unless there is some other clause in the act to enable hospitals to obtain supplies. There is no doubt that in most hospitals the doctors prescribe for their patients, but the drugs are obtained from the hospital's supply. All hospitals have supplies of various drugs in their own pharmacies, and there should be some provision, if it is not already in the act, whereby they may obtain their requirements.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hon. member does not suggest that they should get their drugs without the prescription of a physician?

Mr. MANION: The hospitals get their supplies now without any such prescription. The prescription covers, not quantities, but merely sufficient for the individual patient.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hon. member will agree with me that the section has no reference to hospitals.

Mr. MANION: That is right.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Whatever rights the hospitals had before remain unaffected.

Mr. MacLAREN: This amendment applies only to the retail druggist?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: I believe the hospitals obtain their supplies from the wholesalers.

Mr. MANION: Not always.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hospitals are covered under a regulation and I do not think there has been any difficulty about their getting whatever supplies they require.

Mr. BENNETT: This section might, however, apply to hospitals. The hospital is not one of the "persons" to whom drugs may legally be given or sold.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The first part of section 5 is not affected, but we are amending the rest. Let me quote:

> Any druggist who gives, sells or furnishes any drug to any person—

This is the part which is affected.

> —other than any such physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist.

These are the only persons who can be affected by the amendment; it cannot possibly refer to the superintendent of any hospital.

[Mr. Murphy.]

The effect is that the physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist must give a written order, the object being that a check may be kept upon the sale of drugs.

Mr. BENNETT: But the effect is to prevent the hospital from getting narcotic drugs from the persons licensed under the act. It is a prohibition against the hospital.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Let me read the section:

> Every person licensed under this act to deal in any drug, who gives, sells or furnishes any drug to any person, other than a duly authorized and practising physician. . . . shall be guilty.

The right to give, sell or furnish drugs is limited to the persons mentioned in the section, and the superintendent of the hospital is not among those persons. It follows therefore that drugs may not be sold to him. The point is well taken.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend has not clearly grasped what is being affected by the amendment.

Mr. MURPHY: I contend that the hospital has not the right to purchase drugs, either under the old act or under the amendment now proposed.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are simply legislating with regard to the terms upon which physicians, veterinary surgeons, dentists and druggists may obtain drugs from the retailer.

Mr. BENNETT: Every person licensed under this act who gives or sells drugs to a hospital superintendent is liable.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are not affecting the present status of hospitals.

Mr. BURY: The point is that neither the act as it stands nor this amendment makes provision for the hospital.

Mr. MURPHY: I have no objection to this section going through, but the point I make is that the hospital is not in a position to obtain narcotics from the retail druggist.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Probably the hon. member is right, but the hospital is in the same position now as before.

Mr. MURPHY: I admit that, and that is the defect I want to have remedied.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the section can pass and if necessary we can come back to it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is another point in regard to which there is some difference of opinion among medical men in the House. I refer to section 4, which I will ask to drop for the present. There is an idea that possibly medical men's rights are being curtailed unduly. Having given the matter careful consideration I do not agree with this view, but it is advanced by a number of medical men, and the departmental officials submit that as no hardship could be experienced in the meantime the section might stand until another session. It is the intention to have the whole act gone over between now and next session with a view to meeting, if possible, the difficulties that have arisen in connection with prescribing.

Mr. MANION: Is the department having any difficulty with regard to retail druggists dispensing narcotic drugs without prescription? No retail druggist in Ontario would think of doing so.

Mr. ELLIOTT: To-day a retail druggist can do so without written order if he is dealing with a physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist. This section provides against the practice.

Mr. MANION: That part is all right, but in view of the very good objection taken to the clause, I would suggest that the bill be held over so that the minister may ascertain from Dr. Amyot if hospitals are provided for under this act. If that is the case, there will be no further difficulty. We do not want to get legislation on the statute books which will have to be repealed next session.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Dr. Amyot is at present attending the convention at Paris.

Mr. MANION: Well, his assistant.

Mr. ELLIOTT: His assistants advise me they have heard no complaints from the hospitals. The clause we are considering will have the effect of enacting what my hon. friend from Fort William thought had been the law right along—that a druggist should have an order in writing before dispensing these particular drugs.

Mr. MANION: I think that is done in Ontario to-day.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think it is in most cases, but one or two cases have arisen where the druggist has said, "I do not need a written order if I am dealing with a dentist, a veterinary surgeon or a physician."

Mr. MURPHY: The minister has stated that he has heard of no complaints from the hospitals. That may be. But under the act the superintendent of a country hospital cannot legally purchase narcotic drugs unless this is provided for in the regulations, as suggested by the minister. At many country points the hospital superintendent is not a physician or a surgeon, but it is necessary that he have these narcotic drugs in his possession to treat emergency cases, where there would not be time to wait for a physician's prescription. In such cases hospital superintendents should have the legal right to purchase narcotic drugs, of course under proper safeguards. Nor should they be regarded as violators of the law when they have such drugs in their possession, as they apparently are under the present act as I read it. The minister has not explained that point at all. It should be made clear now we are amending the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances I think the minister would be well advised to move that the committee rise and report progress. He will no doubt have the required information this evening.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps we might get through with the other clauses, which are purely formal. I will undertake to look into the conditions under which hospitals are now permitted to obtain narcotic drugs and inform the committee when the bill is again under consideration.

Section 1 stands.

Mr. KAISER: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the suggestion of the hon. member for Fort William. I should like to see this clause left over for a little further consideration. Medical men of the highest standing say it is utterly wrong to abruptly cut off drugs from the addict; they are of opinion that the better course is to wean him off gradually. In fact this is the only method of effecting a cure. I believe the medical men of the House should have a conference before this clause is passed.

Mr. BENNETT: May I suggest that the minister give careful consideration to Bill No. 22 introduced by my hon. friend from Vancouver North (Mr. Donaghy), providing whipping for those who violate the provisions of the act The observations made by my hon. friend from Oshawa (Mr. Kaiser) entirely support the purpose of that bill. There seems to be no form of punishment too severe for men who distribute narcotic drugs, especially when they seduce the youth of the country. I think that bill might well be incorporated by the government as part of this measure. Such a course I believe would meet with public approval because when my hon. friend's bill was introduced it was spoken of in very high terms by the press of the country generally.

Mr. ELLIOTT: On looking over the act I find that whipping was provided for by an amendment passed in 1925, but it applies only—

Mr. BENNETT: To a limited number of cases.

Mr. ELLIOTT: —to the distribution of drugs to minors. I see no reason why the penalty of whipping should not be made applicable to all offences of drug distribution.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Burden of proof and defence.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I ask that this section be withdrawn, Mr. Chairman.

Section 4 withdrawn.

Sections 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915

The House resumed from June 2 consideration in committee of Bill No. 115, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915.—Hon. Mr. Robb—Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 9.

Mr. ROBB: I understand that this bill was practically all passed in committee, a few days ago, with the exception of the preamble, and I desire now to move a slight amendment. During the conversations and debates on the automobile question it was represented to us that the automobile trade in Canada, in meeting competition in other countries, was somewhat at a disadvantage because of the higher selling price in Canada. Other countries have ruled that for customs purposes the duty should be on the basis of the fair market price in the country of origin. The automobile people said to us that they were unable to reduce the price because of the excise tax we impose, and I asked them, "Well, if I remove this excise tax to a degree will you give me a guarantee that you will pass that entire reduction on to the consumer?" I have under my hand a letter from the Automotive Industries of Canada dated June 5, 1926, which I desire to place on Hansard:

Hon. JAMES A. ROBB,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

I have discussed with the Canadian manufacturers of motor cars the effect of the proposal to eliminate the 5 per cent excise tax on cars which are 50 per cent produced in Canada (or 40 per cent produced in Canada until April 1, 1927).

I am authorized to state on behalf of the following firms—

Ford Motor Company of Canada, Limited,
General Motors of Canada, Limited,
Dodge Bros., (Canada) Limited,
Willys-Overland Limited,
Durant Motor Company of Canada, Limited,
Studebaker Corporation of Canada, Limited, Chrysler Motor Company,

that immediately such removal of excise tax is announced, the delivered price to the public, on the cars which qualify for this exemption, will be reduced by the amount of the excise tax applying to such cars. This includes all the important manufacturers of passenger motor cars in Canada.

Yours very truly,
Automotive Industries of Canada,
T. A. RUSSELL,
President.

It will be recalled that when the Prime Minister spoke, one month after the budget was delivered, the books had been closed and we were able to show a surplus of three and one-half million dollars more than when the budget was presented on April 15. We will lose some revenue by this amendment which I am proposing, but what the government loses the consumer will gain, so I propose to remove the excise tax on cars costing $1,200 and under.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Robb moves in amendment to section 9:

9. Paragraph (a) of subsection one of section nineteen B of the said Act, as enacted by section fourteen of chaper forty-seven of the Statutes of 1922, is amended by adding thereto the following proviso:—

"Provided that the said excise tax shall not be imposed, levied or collected on automobiles specified in item (a) of said schedule I adapted or adaptable for passenger use valued at not more than twelve hundred dollars each;

"(ia) when such automobiles are imported into Canada before the first day of April, 1927, from any British country the goods of which are admitted to the benefit of the British preferential tariff, when at least forty per cent of the cost of producing the finished automobile has been incurred in such British country; or

This section shall be deemed to have come into force on the eighth day of June, 1926, and to have applied to all automobiles described in this section imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to ask the minister, before I make one or two remarks, whether I correctly understand the meaning of the amendment on hearing it read. I take it that the luxury taxes are wiped out in regard to those automobiles of which a certain percentage is manufactured in this country.

Mr. ROBB: And other countries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In countries enjoying preferences, as for example Great Britain and our sister dominions.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, and other countries with which we have conventions. This is for automobiles costing under $1,200 only.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, we have now another link in what has been found necessary in building up the fences which were destroyed. We had the spectacle the other night of the Minister of Customs, after referring to the privileges already given to the automobile manufacturers and dealers, particularly as regards parts, admitting that this sort of thing had to be done. The damage had been done and, of course, they wanted to make the damage good as much as they could. We are just now coming to that point where it is perfectly clear that what has been done must be undone, that something must be done in order to keep the Canadian workman working, and the way to do it is to have protection, not under the name of protection, but to have the remission of excise tax which will apply merely to machines made here, to machines made in the Mother Country and in the sister dominions, and in other countries that enjoy the most favoured nation clause. But so far as the one place from which we have competition is concerned, namely the United States, the excise tax will continue. Well, I have no doubt that the government have found it absolutely necessary to do this. I have no doubt in the world that they take this step regretfully, but it always goes the same way—it always must go the same way. When any government take a step absolutely in the dark affecting a large Canadian industry, sooner or later they realize that there is one claim that one section of the country has upon this Dominion, and that is the workingman. He must be looked after. Why, we had the same thing in connection with the agricultural industry. We had changes there, drawbacks, free duties, exemptions from the sales tax, and all that sort of thing, to keep the industry going. Now we are seeing the same thing in connection with the automobile industry, just exactly as was pointed out. I am not blaming my hon. friend for now discovering what he ought to have known so much sooner. I am not blaming him for this tardy recognition of what ought to be the first duty of government, namely, the question of a job for the Canadian workingman. That is all it was. It never had anything to do with the question of the manufacturer per se. The manufacturer per se, whether he be Ford, Canada, or Ford United States, has the market. The manufacturer, General Motors, whether it be General Motors, Oshawa, or General Motors, Detroit, or anywhere else, has the market. The difference was this: In the one instance the Canadian worker got the job; in the other, he did not. Therefore I do not blame my hon. friend for this belated recognition of what ought to be the very first consideration in any one of these fiscal questions.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister tell me what amount of revenue the country will lose by this amendment?

Mr. ROBB: That of course will depend upon the business that is done. On the basis of the business of 1925 we will lose $1,752,354 for the year; on the basis of the 1926 business we will lose $2,995,471 for the year. But my hon. friend will recall that the automobile men argued that the peak of the trade is over before the 1st of July, so that if they are right most of that business has already been put through. My opinion is that the loss we will sustain in excise will be more than compensated for by the increased business. The more business we do the more sales tax we will collect. We will have additional business on whatever material they have to buy, and they have to import some parts upon which they pay duty.

Mr. BENNETT: Very few.

Mr. ROBB: Yes. Therefore I do not anticipate that there will be a very great loss of revenue.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When the committee took recess at six o'clock I was pointing out what had happened, and we all know it. The government tried again their apprentice hand, without waiting for their newly-constituted tariff board to tell them what to do. They jump in and make just as big a mess of this as they did of the agricultural implement business. Just as they fixed up the agricultural implements, they are fixing up this matter. At the time the budget was brought down the opposition said that no proper care was being taken of the activities and the like of the Canadian worker. We were laughed at in certain quarters of the House. To-day, in order to keep the Canadian workman functioning, we have got to make a present of over a million dollars, a million and three quarters perhaps, or a million and a half, to the automobile business. We would not have had to make that present to keep them going if this matter had been approached as we thought it should have been approached, temperately and properly, and not with a view to making a slash without knowing what was being done, just like so many elephants running amuck. Hon. members realize the justice of the simile. They heard about the elephant that went amuck and the damage he did and the cost of repairing it.

Mr. POWER: I was thinking of the crocodile.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A crocodile can do considerable damage as well. My hon. friend may have had an intimate experience with crocodiles. I leave that interesting question with him. But the fact is that we are to-day making contributions from the public treasury to keep going—what? To keep the factories going and to give employment to the automobile workers, and the government are convinced that they had to do it. They are not doing this for fun. They are not turning round and saying in effect, "Everything that has been said about this is true; we did not know what we were doing; we were making cuts that the business could not possibly stand." They are not doing that for fun. They have not turned round and put automobile parts and that sort of thing in some instances on the free list for nothing. They are not giving a discount of 25 per cent of the duty on automobile parts for nothing; they are not cancelling the luxury taxes on automobiles for nothing. They are doing it simply and solely because they find that they have made a mistake in connection with their budget announcement, and you know, Mr. Chairman, they are doing it in the light of very, very recent information. I wonder how often the government have said during this session that there were to be no more amendments to the budget. I wonder how often my hon. friend has said that there will be no changes. This question of the luxury tax was brought to his attention and to the attention of the Minister of Customs, but absolutely nothing was to be done. They are not doing this lightly. They are doing it because they have either got to do it, or there will be to a large extent a removal of automobile activities from this country.

Now what have we been doing? Let us see what sort of tangled web we weave when we mix with something we do not know anything about. What have we done? We made a cut in the smaller automobile duties from 35 to 20 per cent, and made a cut in the more expensive automobiles from 35 to 27½ per cent. I never said anything for or anything against the cut of 27½ per cent in the more expensive cars. It is some time since I have gone into the cost of manufacture and some time since I knew what proportion was represented by Canadian labour of every dollar in that business, profits and the like, or how much is taken from the business for the purpose of looking after the country and the country's revenue. My recollection was, and my opinion would be, that 27½ per cent was a sufficient duty on the more expensive automobile. The more expensive automobile has been helped by the refund of duties on the parts and by the free admission of materials not made in this country. But in the case of the other car, after all these weeks of uncertainty, all this talk and all this turning upside down of the business of the country, where are we? We had a duty of 35 per cent on the small automobile. Hon. gentlemen to my left who are particularly interested in the Ford car received startling information as to how small a reduction could be secured for that car as a result of the tariff changes and how much prices depend not upon tariffs, but upon business arrangements, patents and the like. They also learned how when shooting at the manufacturer through the tariff, they were looking up the wrong end of the gun and the kick they got from that end more than offset any slight advantage they got out of the right end of it.

We have had all these weeks of uncertainty, for what? In the first instance there was a duty of 35 per cent upon the cheaper cars. To-day we are first taking off the luxury tax on the car imported into this country from countries whose production does not enter into competition with that of the Canadian manufacturer, taking off where it does not hurt, taking off where it is not needed for protection. Second, we have taken the luxury tax off the product of the Canadian manufacturer but we have left it on where the real competition comes in. When we practise protection, would it not be much better if we practise it honestly? When we speak about protection we should refer to our tariff. It would be ever so much better to keep Canada and the homes of our Canadian workmen functioning instead of shutting them up. We might as well be honest with ourselves and find out what we are doing. We take off that luxury tax from the Canadian car; we maintain it as against the United States car, and by so doing we raise the tariff of 20 per cent which we have to-day to 26 per cent and even more. That is calculated upon the wholesale value of the car in this country, so that really we are raising the tariff to 27 per cent in connection with the luxury tax. In that way we now have an additional protection of 7 per cent, not under the name of course, of protection, not a protection which can be read upon the pages of our tariff, but a devious protection through excise, a method of taxation which in the past has been a tax not for protection but merely for revenue. Over and above that we have further losses in our revenues made by 25 per cent rebates on raw material in some instances and in others free importation of raw material. To-day we have a result that will give a protection as I figure it out of about 30 per cent in connection with the smaller car. I admit it is very difficult to figure it out properly, but it is not far short of 30 per cent. When I talk about protection I mean the 27 per cent in connection with our tariff of 20 per cent and the luxury tax of 7 per cent. An equalizing of values of cost of production looks after the balance.

Mr. COOTE: I did not understand what the hon. member said about a 7 per cent tax. Would he explain that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are two sides to this question. Protection may be either direct and honest or indirect. We have a direct tariff of 20 per cent and we have an indirect tariff which on the full value of the $1,200 car will mean another 7 per cent in connection with the luxury tax which will be paid by the United States car coming in and which will not be paid by the Canadian manufacturer. That makes 27 per cent. As regards the difference between 27 and 30 per cent, that is not a question of protection one way or the other; it is a question of reducing the cost to the manufacturer, but of doing so at the expense of somebody else's protection when we have a rebate of 25 per cent upon some parts and free importation of others that are required in the manufacture of automobiles. I may be slightly out in my calculation as to the 3 per cent, but I think it will be found to be a very reasonable percentage. On the other hand I admit at once that we shall get cheaper automobiles; we shall have a further large percentage of people of this country who will be able to buy automobiles. We shall have further traffic congestion and the like, but we shall get dearer other things. Something has to pay the tax; if you take it from the shoulder of one, you put it on the shoulder of another.

Mr. GARDINER: Economize.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman says "economize." We have not had very much help from him in attacking the estimates this year. I hope he will suffer a change of heart and we shall be able to get a good deal of help from him later on. Be that as it may, we shall have cheaper automobiles, and to the people of the country who are interested in cheaper automobiles that will be a source of satisfaction. But we pay for this; we are paying for it from the country's revenues; we are paying for it by giving up revenues which we now have. We have before us an extraordinary spectacle. We have the government with its budget proposals, with its answers not week after week but at one time practically day after day that there would be no changes; that the government had stated its proposals and it was going to stand by them. On the other hand we have these changes. If this teaches us one thing it may be of some help to us. If it teaches us how little the House and the country can depend upon the word of this government, perhaps all this fuss and turmoil have not been in vain. Can hon. gentlemen suggest anything that would be more instructive?

Again—but I despair of this thought—if the experience of the past two months plus the experience of the government in connection with what they did with regard to agricultural duties will really open their eyes and show them that they are entering on a difficult field when they make a snip here and a snip there, and that they should first know what they are doing before they try to do it, all the fuss and trouble of the past few weeks will not have been in vain.

Mr. GARDINER: Before the committee rose at six o'clock the minister proposed an amendment to this bill. He also read a letter from an officer of the automotive industries organization, stating that if this tax were remitted the price would be decreased to the consumer. I have no reason to question the good faith of the automobile manufacturers' association, but I would ask the minister what steps he intends taking to remedy the situation in case the tax is not remitted as promised in that communication. The hon. member for West York said a moment ago that the remission of this tax would make a difference of 7 per cent altogether. I take it that the tax is applied to the wholesale price and if the manufacturers carry out what they propose in their communication, instead of the industry benefiting to the extent of 7 per cent, that advantage will be with the consumer. I do not think that the hon. member's criticism is altogether correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The basis on which the luxury tax is assessed is the wholesale value of the automobiles manufactured in Canada, and comparing this with the American basis of cost the 7 per cent I have suggested will be found to be correct. There is a great difference in the basis of valuation.

Mr. GARDINER: If the excise tax applies to the wholesale price naturally this increases the price to the retailer, who must make a profit on the amount of his investment, including the tax, so that by the time the consumer is reached he has to pay the 7 per cent extra. In the case of cars of $1,200 and under the consumer ought to benefit to the extent of the 7 per cent in the event of the tax being removed. In the case of cars of $1,200 and under, imported from the United States, and bearing the excise tax, the consumer naturally pays the 7 per cent, but so far as Canadian-made cars are concerned they save that extra cost.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I quite agree.

Mr. GARDINER: It is all right so long as we understand each other.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a saving to the consumer of that 7 per cent so far as cars from the United States are concerned. The consumer saves the 7 per cent at the expense not of the Canadian manufacturer but of the treasury.

Mr. BENNETT: The other evening, in the course of his speech in regard to the duties on automobiles, the Prime Minister declared that in reply to the gentlemen who had come from the city of Oshawa to wait upon the government he had referred them to chapter 19 of the Acts of the Apostles. And when I heard the Minister of Finance this evening intimate to the House that he had changed his mind, that notwithstanding his violent protestations that there would be no amendments in the budget—oh, no! he stood by his guns—I could not help thinking of the incident related in the Scriptures of the traveller who journeyed from Jerusalem to Damascus bearing letters from the high priest. It will perhaps be in the memory of my hon. friend that on his way that traveller beheld a shining light, from which moment, dated his conversion. There was a cry, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Now, the automobile industry cries aloud to the Minister of Finance in somewhat similar language, "Why persecutest thou me?" And, having caught the vision, this Saul of Tarsus has now become Paul the Apostle—Saul of Tarsus who threw stones at the martyrs and denounced protection and all its works. But a short time ago he saw nothing but evil in all the activities of this persecuted industry, and now, with his sudden conversion into the apostolic Paul, he is preaching the great truth that the Canadian workman must be employed. An hon. member suggests the name Paul the Protectionist. Well, our newly converted apostle realizes that Canadian industry must be protected, and this is his gospel to-night.

I congratulate the Minister of Finance upon his assumption of this new role. Saul of Tarsus, as I say, is now Paul the Apostle. But what after all must be his excuses, not only to the House but to himself? I sent to the library just now for the Book to which the Prime Minister referred the representatives of the persecuted industry that cried aloud to him and to the Minister of Finance and I cannot find very much in the passage he cited to suggest a solution to the problem which we must consider. It says that the Jews blasphemed his doctrine, which was confirmed by miracles. It occurred to me that possibly this was what the Prime Minister had in mind; no doubt he was conscious of a miracle in the government's conversion. I congratulate the Prime Minister and his colleague. But, Sir, this country is more to be congratulated. There were those amongst us on this side of the House who believed that the very fabric of our industrial structure was likely to be destroyed by the tariff measures introduced into this House by the government—measures which, according to the Minister of Finance, were a concession to widespread sentiment in the country. That widespread sentiment, we contended, should not be given effect to unless it were found to be based upon sound economic reasons. Yet day after day and night after night, as the budget debate proceeded, the Minister of Finance asserted in his place that there certainly would be no changes in the tariff resolutions. The conclusion to which he had come was so sound that nothing could induce him to change it. Has the hon. gentleman suddenly beheld a great light? As the days have passed has some bright star illumined his path? It must be this. One of two things has happened: he was either wrong when he made the revision in the tariff which he did in his budget, thereby threatening the livelihood of Canadian workmen, or he was right in taking that course. If he was right, then he should yield to no pressure that may be brought against him, especially after his emphatic protestations that he would never give way. We on this side of the House ventured to believe that the Minister of Finance would yield.

I am sorry the right hon. gentleman who leads this party is not in his seat to-night: he would do justice to this occasion. It will be within the memory of everyone sitting here tonight that day after day as the House assembled, while the budget was being discussed, the leader of the opposition asked the Minister of Finance whether any changes were contemplated. While my hon. friend from West York was speaking a few minutes ago I turned over the pages of Hansard wherein I saw that my right hon. leader was quite insistent in putting this question to the Minister of Finance. Time and time again the same query was put: Are there to be any changes? And what was the reply? There was a stout assurance on the part of the Minister of Finance that there would be no changes except with respect to procedure. There might be some trivial alterations in minor matters, but there would be no change at all in principle. Now, what about hon. gentlemen to my left? What about hon. gentlemen from the province of Saskatchewan who pounded the tops of their desks so lustily a few days ago? Where now are those hon. gentlemen? Where is the youthful member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) who, in this reduction in the duties on automobiles, saw a new light in the fiscal firmament? Where is the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee), whose vociferation found expression not only in a noisy pounding of his desk but in vehement speech as well? Has he forgotten his most vociferous observations about the atrocious crime of being a young man? Where are all these gentlemen now? And then when I look down towards the leader of the Progressive party and see his calm benignant smile, I realize that he has once more accepted, for the sake of the party, the measure that is now being introduced. But it has its pleasing side I recognize. The other evening the Minister of Customs tried to save the face of the Minister of Finance when he introduced his little measure looking towards the amelioration of the manufacturers, but when he found the House not disposed to take very kindly to it he withdrew the measure. It remained for the iron to enter into the soul of the Minister of Finance. He had to make the great choice. I am happy to say he chose what will benefit the Canadian workmen rather than accept the worn-out policies and shibboleths of hon. gentlemen to my left. I think to that extent his choice must be a matter of pride to all Canadians. Why, it is pleasing even to the heart of the gentleman from Maple Creek (Mr. Spence), who was so disturbed with respect to the steel duties as to send an advocate to appear before the tariff board. He too cheers as he realizes that the cause of the Canadian workmen has not fallen upon deaf ears. It is pleasing to think that the Minister of Finance has heard the voice; and, having heard it, we all welcome his conversion. You remember, it was not only his own countrymen who welcomed the conversion of Paul, it was also the Gentiles; and he rejoiced that he was sent to teach the Gospel not only to the Jews but to the Gentiles. So we on this side manifest our joy at the conversion of the Minister of Finance. It is a pleasing spectacle not alone to the Conservative party, but also to the Canadian people generally.

In days gone by almost every member who sits to the left of the Speaker ventured to point out in the best way he could what the effect of the reduction of the tariff on automobiles would be. The other evening I ventured to point out, for instance, the effect of the tariff reductions on the agricultural implement industry. Some of my figures were questioned. I find now by looking at the Canada Year Book and the bulletin of the Bureau of Statistics that while in 1919 we had 88 establishments, in 1923 they had fallen to 67 and in 1924 to 63. In 1919 the number of employees was 11,036, in 1923 this figure had dropped to 7,792, and in 1924 there was a further reduction to 6,700. The value of products was $37,000,000 odd in 1919, in 1923 had fallen to $36,000,000, and in 1924 it was practically the same. Some objection was made to my figures with respect to imported goods, yet I find that for the eleven months ending February 1925-26 we imported duty-free $1,786,703 worth of rolled iron and rolled steel for the manufacture of agricultural implements and machinery which previously had been made in Canada by Canadian workmen. It is just that state of affairs which makes business in this country so uncertain. It is just the condition we have been undergoing during the last six weeks that makes business men hesitate to put their money in new ventures. They wonder which industry is to be struck next, and when, after being struck, is the Minister of Finance again to be converted. This conversion cannot go on forever, you cannot have new conversions day after day. There are of course those who believe there is always a chance for the backslider to be reached and converted. But it is better not for us to undergo this uncertainty as to the tariff.

I put this to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance: What did he mean when he answered the right hon. leader of this party that there would be no substantial changes in his budget announcement? Did he mean it or did he not? If he meant it does he now say he was wrong; or was he right and has since yielded to pressure? If he was wrong, he should be prepared to say: We undertook to reduce the tariff to the point that meant unemployment to Canadian workmen, that meant ruin to Canadian industry, and now having found that to be the case we come back to this House and admit we were wrong. That is the right method for him to pursue. But what is the method pursued here to-night? I say first of all that every member of this House should have an opportunity to study the amendment. It should be printed and in the hands of every member so he may understand what it means. Not until to-morrow will he have a chance to study it in Hansard.

What does this amendment mean? If I understand it correctly, it means that an automobile brought in from the United States will be assessed upon the duty, as well as the cost, a tax of 5 per cent. That is, if you buy an automobile for $700 in Detroit—about which my friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) used to talk so long and learnedly—you will pay a duty which will now be 20 per cent, as I understand it; that is, $140, making a total of $840; then upon that you will pay a tax of 5 per cent, or $42, making a total of $882 for this $700 car purchased in Detroit. That is the wrong against which my friend from Macleod used to inveigh. I, like others in this House, felt the duty was too high, but what the amount of the reduction should be I was not, neither was any member in this House, in a position to say. Why? Because the principle of protection is so far-reaching that if you touch it at one point you may disturb other industries in the most remote sections of the country, as happened in the case of the reduction of the duty on agricultural implements. How is that to be met? By taking off the car manufactured in Canada the sales tax so that a Canadian car costing $900 which would have cost with the duty $945, is now to cost $900. That is the position. In other words, there is to be a duty of 5 per cent upon the car, and an extra duty of 5 per cent upon the car and the duty. Now the duty is 20 per cent. Five per cent on 20 is one. So instead of having a reduction of 15 per cent in duty, there is a reduction of 9 per cent, and 9 only. That is what happens. Do not let us have any misunderstanding about that. There is a 6 per cent duty, because the sales tax of 5 per cent remains upon the American car, and the 5 per cent is charged against the duty as well as against the price of the car. The duty being 20 per cent, 5 per cent upon 20 is one, and 5 and 1 make 6, so that the duty which this resolution places upon American cars is 6 per cent. Therefore the reduction of 15 per cent that was heralded from one end of the country to the other is now reduced to 9 per cent. I should like my hon. friend from Macleod to realize that—the duty is 9 per cent, not 15 per cent. These are facts.

For my part I am very glad that the Minister of Finance has done what he has done in the light of the knowledge he has obtained since he introduced this budget. Knowing as we did he must be convinced, he is now convinced that 15 per cent reduction in the duty on small cars would wreck the automobile industry of this country. That is one of our most important industries. I was amazed on looking at the figures at the volume of business transacted and the number of people employed in it. During the last few years it has increased by leaps and bounds. I will not go over the amazing story because it has been recited so often in this House. But let it be remembered—and this is borne out by the investigations of the minister himself—that the tariff proposals made by this government have been injurious to Canadian industry and to Canadian workmen, and in nine cases out of ten the government has had to modify them before they became law. To-day there is no man in this House and there is no man in the country who will not rejoice that the hon. minister has changed his mind. We told him he would have to. The right hon. leader of this party pointed that out to him. He said: Before this debate finishes you will be bound to do it, because you dare not destroy that industry. I do not believe the Minister of Finance would dare destroy it; I do not believe any responsible minister or any government would dare to destroy that industry in this country, and it is because they dare not destroy it that this industry is saved to-night. But for this new 6 per cent duty the manufacturers could not compete one single hour in the production of cars brought in here of a value up to $1,200. Without this legislation it is cheaper to-day to import cars into Canada than to manufacture them here. The manufacturers have told that to my hon. friend; it has been published in their journals broadcast throughout Canada; it is known everywhere now, and this government has at least had the courage to show signs meet unto repentance, to quote the Scripture as the right hon. Prime Minister desired. And the fruits meet unto repentance are these, that the 15 per cent reduction in duty which has been announced from one end of Canada to the other has resolved itself into 9 per cent; instead of being 35 per cent the duty is now 26 per cent, 20 per cent of the customs tariff and this additional 6 per cent, exclusive of drawbacks. Why not be frank about it; why not tell the people of Canada that you started in to reduce the duty on automobiles by 15 per cent, and then discovered that you were all wrong and that it is now reduced to 9 per cent?

But that is not all; in addition to that there are the rebates, and what are the rebates? I have not the skill or the complete information which would enable me to work them out, but reading Hansard and applying my best knowledge, so far as I can ascertain it is fair to say that these rebates run all the way from 1½ per cent to 3 per cent, 2 per cent at any rate as a minimum. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) who has given these matters consideration, says 3 per cent. Then, Sir, what have we? All that is left of this 15 per cent reduction which was broadcast from one end of Canada to the other, after the 6 per cent and the 3 per cent have been taken away, is 6 per cent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not let us have any misapprehension about it; let us look it over carefully again. The day the budget was delivered the duty was 35 per cent. It was reduced by 15 per cent, leaving 20 per cent. Last week you added a rebate, which is another 3 per cent; to-night we add another 6 per cent, and when these two are subtracted we find that the reduction of 15 per cent amounts in fact to a reduction of 6 per cent. That is the story. Now let us go out and tell that frankly to the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, you members from Saskatchewan! How you will go out and make the welkin ring; how you reduced the duty on automobiles 6 per cent! And you are not sure about that, for peradventure, if the rebates operate as they may, instead of 6 per cent it will be only 5 per cent. And then, as has been pointed out, how much will be lost in revenue? The figures given a moment ago were $2,900,000; the year before the amount was $1,750,000, so we have nearly a $3,000,000 loss in revenue. Perhaps this will be the peak of the reduction, and that being so it may be that this year the loss will not be as much. But money has to be found; it was the present Minister of Finance who said last year that the money had to be found, and mark you; every application of $5,000,000 to rural credits; every application of $5,000,000 for old age pensions and every application of $3,000,000 for the Hudson Bay railway means a corresponding load upon the taxpayer of this country, whether he pays it in automobile tax or in some other tax; it must be paid. That is the thing to remember.

Then, arguing as I do and appreciating the position of my hon. friend, why would it not be better to tell our people, "We promised you we would reduce the duty on automobiles by 15 per cent, but when we found sentiment a poor master in economic matters and that facts are a more powerful guide we changed our minds and instead of reducing the duty 15 per cent we have just reduced it 6 per cent, and we are not quite sure of that; it may be 5 per cent, depending on the drawbacks." Why not tell them so frankly? Why, Sir, on every single tariff item touched by this government for sentimental reasons the experience has been exactly the same as that of to-night. My hon. friend suggests that it was done for votes, and not for sentiment. Well, a deluded people will in the end wake up.

Take milk bottles; you will remember what the government were going to do in 1922. The duty was then 20 per cent, 30 per cent and 32½ per cent; they reduced it to 15 per cent, 25 per cent and 27½ per cent. In 1922 we imported $12,658 worth of milk bottles, but last year we imported $36,904 worth, in eleven months. What does that mean? It means less employment for Canadian glass factories; less work for Canadian workmen, and more taxes to pay by those people left in this country because of the others who went to find work elsewhere. Take dairy tin hollow-ware and kitchen tin hollow-ware. The duty was reduced in 1922 from 15 per cent, 22½per cent and 25 per cent to 12½ per cent, 17½ per cent and 20 per cent. In 1922 we imported these goods into Canada to the value of $11,135, while in the eleven months of last year our imports amounted to $60,517: In other words, we imported $50,000 worth of new goods which workmen in other countries fabricated while Canadian workmen were idle. Then take the next item, stamped and coated products. The duty was changed in 1922, with what effect? In 1922 we imported $868,286 worth of these goods, while in eleven months of 1925-26 our imports amounted to $1,634,876. Take unbleached cotton fabrics; in 1921-22 the duty was reduced from 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent to 12½ per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent. In 1921-22 our imports amounted to 6,908,551 yards, but in eleven months of last year we imported 18,744,723 yards of these materials. That was the effect of the change in duty. Then take flax fabrics, unbleached. The duty was reduced on May 24, 1922 from 15 per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent to 12½ per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent. In 1921-22 we imported 1,545,050 yards, while in eleven months of 1925-26 we imported 2,087,658 yards, and in the preceding year 2,524,701. Then there is harness and saddlery. On May 24, 1922 the duty was reduced from 20 per cent, 27½ per cent and 30 per cent to 17½ per cent, 25½ per cent and 30 per cent. In 1921-22 our imports amounted to $89,395, while in the eleven months of 1925-26 their total value was $286,112.

What does all this mean? It means that that much less leather was fabricated in Canada; that much less tanning was done in this country; that much less work was done in our saddlery factories and so much less employment was to be found; it meant that that work had to be done in other countries, giving work to foreign people. That is the history of tariff legislation of hon. gentlemen opposite. Then we come to collars of cotton, linen and so on, and to incubators and brooders for fowl, about which we have heard so much. This tariff was changed in 1924 from 20 per cent, 27½ per cent and 30 per cent to 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 15 per cent. In 1922-23 we imported $93,549 worth of incubators and brooders, while for the eleven months of 1925-26 our imports amounted to $156,868. These are the facts.

A great writer has said that the history of Liberalism is the history of experimentation, and I observe this: Whatever else may be said, nature at least is Tory—she works by evolution and not by revolution. We who sit on this side of the House realize that the experiments that have been made with the customs duties of this country, the experiments that have been made with incubators, with glass, with cotton fabrics, with woollen goods, all these experiments have resulted in one thing and one thing only—increased unemployment at home, increased employment abroad; increased imports, lessening production. That is what it means. The population of this country is barely steady. What has happened is just as I have indicated, and so to-night every thoughtful Canadian, every man in this country who reads this in the morning will realize that the government at last, after weeks of uncertainty, after weeks of denials, after weeks of stern repression of their own convictions, and despite the efforts that were made from well informed sources to convince them, have at last been convinced. At last they have realized that Canadian industry is better for Canada than American industry. At last they have realized that it is better to have thousands of men and women working in the factories of this country, in Toronto, Oshawa, Windsor and Ford, than have them working at Detroit, Chicago and Cleveland. Realizing that fact, I ask them to apply it not only to this particular industry, but to other industries that they have wrecked. The idle shops that are in Ontario, bring them back into activity, and renounce this fetish to which you have so long paid tribute because you have been compelled to do it by my friends to the left. The time has come when you should no longer be compelled to worship strange gods, and we all know they are strange gods to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. His god, of course, is the god of protection for Canadian industry, but the strange god he has been compelled to worship within the last few weeks is the god of sentiment as expressed by the gentlemen sitting to my left who control this House. That is the position, and the time has come when I for one, like others, rejoice that Saul of Tarsus has become Paul the Apostle. I am sure that in reading the scriptures referred to by the Prime Minister we all alike have profited, but none so much as his own colleague the Minister of Finance, who reading the story with which I began my observations, of the journey of that great man from Jerusalem who saw a light and a great conversion on the way to Damascus, has himself during the last six weeks of tortuous walking, and incessant toil, with his face towards the light, blinded sometimes by the shibboleths of the faith of the gentlemen who sit to my left, but ever keeping his face towards the sun, at last seen the light, and that great conversion has come by which we welcome him now as Paul the Apostle of protection and of the Canadian workingman.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the information my hon. friend has just given of the same character that he gave some time ago when he stated that the Massey-Harris Company was employing more men in the United States than in Canada, whereas at Batavia in the United States they are actually employing 800 as against 4,000 in Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say any such thing. I did not say that they employed more men in the United States; I said that the property in Canada was becoming more and more an assembling plant. I suggest that the hon. member for Acadia will stick to the truth in directing attention to any observations made by the hon. member for West Calgary.

Mr. ROBB: Answering the last speaker first, it occurred to me that had my hon. friend from West Calgary been as well versed in the Bible as he is in constitutional practice and the procedure of Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli, he would not have had to send to the library for the Bible. I have no fault to find with his quotation, except as to its application, and his application is all wrong, because from the evidence that has been produced in this House in the previous session and again this session the Canadian people have been crying out to the automobile manufacturers, "How long, how long wilt thou persecute us?"

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: I had better hand the Bible to the minister. Perhaps he would read the first verses about Paul breathing out threatenings and slaughterings.

Mr. ROBB: For some years it has been contended that the automobile princes of Canada have been persecuting the Canadian people by charging them more for cars in Canada than they were selling them at in the United States. I stand by the statement I presented in the budget that the reduction in duty is 15 per cent on cars of $1,200 and under, and 7½ per cent on the others. That statement is just as true to-day as it was on the 15th of April when the budget was brought down. If a United States car comes into Canada and is met by a Canadian customs officer, that car will come in at 15 per cent less duty than it paid before; it will pay 20 per cent, instead of 35 per cent duty, as before.

Mr. MANION: They will pay the difference afterwards on this side.

Mr. ROBB: It does not make any difference where they pay it. My hon. friend from West Calgary and my hon. friend from West York have forgotten that I hold in my hand a letter from the automobile manufacturers of Canada guaranteeing that they will pass this on to the Canadian people, and that the purchaser of a Canadian car will have all this reduction in the excise tax. My hon. friend from West York has said that we are making the same mess of the automobile industry that we made of the agricultural implement industry. That is really a compliment, because the manufacturers of agricultural implements in Canada are to-day, upon their own statements presented to their shareholders, in a better position than before we touched the tariff. I repeat that we have the promise of the associated automobile manufacturers of Canada, of all the manufacturers of automobiles in Canada—it will be found on Hansard to-morrow morning—that they will pass this excise reduction on to the Canadian purchaser, and I serve notice on them now, in the presence of my friends, that if they do not live up to that agreement we will find means of placing them in a position where they will have to do so, or meet competition of the world. I do not know that I have anything more to say upon that subject. It would look as though everybody was satisfied with these reductions, in view of the fact that they are going to be passed on to the consumer.

While I do not wish to enter upon another budget speech or upon a general discussion of the tariff—it is not the customs tariff that is under consideration now; that has been disposed of—I would not like to sit down without answering the observations of the hon. member for West Calgary regarding the reductions this government has made in the duties on milk bottles, glass, cotton fabrics and other products. The Dominion Glass Company, manufacturers of milk bottles, are to-day in a better position than they were prior to this government coming into office. They are making better dividends and employing more labour. Some of the cotton mills of this country are running night and day, and all of them are running on full time. If my hon. friend from West Calgary will look at the Financial Post of last week, he will find that Penman's are already preparing the way to hand out another melon to take care of their increased earnings. As to the Dominion Textile Company, my hon. friend will answer that they pay only five per cent, but they cut a melon three years ago; they split it into three; instead of five per cent, they are paying 15 per cent, and they have surpluses bigger than the year before. That is the condition of the industry generally throughout Canada.

9 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely my hon. friend does not seriously argue that charging this tax against American manufacturers and forgiving the tax to the Canadian manufacturers does not operate in the protection of Canadian industry. Surely he fully realizes, as everybody else does, that you can so tax as to give a benefit to your home producer without and apart from the customs tariff. He knows it. Will he say that a bonus is no help to your manufacturer? Will he say it is not a form of protection to your manufacturer and one of the most effective kinds of protection he can get? Surely it is idle to say that the protection of the Canadian manufacturer has not been increased by this very resolution. My hon. friend knows that that, and that only is the reason why it was introduced. He says it is a compliment to say the same thing that has happened here took place in connection with agricultural implements. Why is it a compliment? We were getting revenues which we have lost. We had to bedevil other taxes in connection with the agricultural industry. We had to cut them off the sales tax. We make concessions amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars in order to do what has been done in connection with the automobile industry, and to-day we are making concessions again of hundreds of thousands, yes millions, in order to put back the automobile industry where it was. And you put it back just the same whether you give free material, whether you give rebates, whether you give it in the form of exemption from luxury tax, or the like; the effect is just the same as if you were to restore the duty. My hon. friend must know it.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend again forgets that I have placed on Hansard a letter in which the automobile manufacturers agree to pass this on to the Canadian purchaser of automobiles. I said in introducing the measure that, looking into it carefully, we had discovered the automobile men were at a disadvantage in the export business. Forty per cent of their business is export. They were at a disadvantage in other countries because they were charged upon the fair market value in the country of origin. It is in their interest to reduce the price in Canada, because if 40 per cent of their product goes into other countries it will be better able to compete in those markets. I do not want to chide my hon. friend from West York with this, but why should he find any fault with my making certain amendments to my budget? I hold in my hand a record which shows that he himself on one occasion made some twenty-five changes in his budget. If he turns to the estimates of this year, page 60, he will find that we are providing $1,690,000 to correct some—well I would not say errors, but some of the grievances Canadian industry had against his government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am very glad my hon. friend referred to that matter. I was not in the House when the matter was up. My hon. friend is speaking now in connection with refunds of luxury taxes in connection with the time the luxury tax was taken off. All I can say is that that matter was taken up when his predecessor, Mr. Fielding, was in power. He said he had gone over what had been done by the previous Minister of Finance, when he was asked to do the same thing, and he refused. It was brought up again next year, and the same thing was done. It was brought up again when my hon. friend was in office, and he took the same position as his predecessor. Does he deny it? He cannot. He takes exactly the same position, that the right thing had been done. Last year again the same thing occurred, I said, "I do not object to what you propose to do in connection with it" and I produced a memorandum in connection with what had taken place, and he said nothing was done. I supported it this year in the first instance, because prior to the last election and during the campaign the dealers who were interested in that rebate had a promise, not from my hon. friend but from other members of the government, that that tax would be refunded to them. After the election it was refused; it was said that there was no vote for it, and that certain recommendations would have to be made. They came to me and I said, "If you have been misled by the belief that you could place full confidence in the statements of governments, I would support your claim. If it be now said that the action was simply doing something I ought to have done, I say that my action had the endorsement of my hon. friend and Mr. Fielding. What was done this year was simply to make good the pre-election promises of the government made for the purposes of election."

My hon. friend says I am not paying any attention to the 7 per cent mentioned in the letter. Of course I am. Everybody knows the full sum of that tax has always been added to the cost of the machine. It is always done—factory prices plus cost. I would like to know what would be done if the tax were not now taken off. Of course it will be taken off; but on the other hand, does anyone pretend that to the extent that that 6 or 7 per cent—I do not care which it is—the cost which the American manufacturer or the American competitor is put to, the cost which is held as against him and forgiven as against the other is anyone fatuous enough to think that is not protection? It is protection of a type that works very well. As a matter of fact, it is better for the trade. The position of the trade to-day is better in my view, safer and more secure, than it was before these resolutions were brought down.

Mr. COOTE: I suggest to the Minister of Finance that it is rather unfair to the committee to ask us to pass a long amendment such as is presented to-night without members of the House having a chance to read it. While the hon. member for West Calgary was relating the story of Saul of Tarsus becoming Paul the Apostle, I thought it would be appropriate if he would tell that story related by Christ in the New Testament about the judge and the importunate widow. Members who are familiar with the New Testament will remember that the judge gave in to this woman, not because he thought her cause was just, but because by her continual coming she wearied him, and to get rid of her he gave her what she wanted. I think the judge in this case would be represented by the Minister of Finance and the importunate widow—I am not sure, but I think she is represented by some official of the automobile industries, backed up by the Conservative party, in this House.

A great deal of noise has been made here to-night about the unfortunate condition of the workmen and about destroying the automobile industry in Canada. I find that the reductions made in the published prices of Ford cars as a result of the recent reduction in the duty are as follows:

Touring car	$25
Runabout	15
Sport roadster	30
Coupe	40
Tudor	45
Fordor	45
Light delivery car	20
Chassis	30
Truck	40

Mr. CAHAN: Are these in the retail or wholesale prices?

Mr. COOTE: The retail prices, freight and government taxes extra. The greatest reduction is $45 and the smallest, $15. The reduction on the touring car, which is the popular car, is $25 so that I think it would be fair to assume that the reduction in the prices of these cars will not average more than $30. I do not know the exact number of cars sold in Canada by the Ford company last year, but I understand it was less than 50,000 cars. If this company suffered a reduction of $30 in price of each one of those 50,000 cars the net result would be a decreased earning of $1,500,000. According to the Financial Post the net profit of the Ford company for their last financial year amounted to $6,131,352. If I deduct from that the $1,500,000 they still have a net profit of $4,631,000 after these reduced prices have gone into effect.

Mr. ROBINSON: The hon. member must remember that in the beginning of the year the Ford company made very heavy reductions in all their lines of cars. They cut the price down as low as possible. The hon. member ought to refer to that.

Mr. COOTE: I am sorry I have not the old prices. I could still show that the Ford company would have sufficient profits to pay handsome dividends on a capital of $7,000,000 all but $125,000 of which was made out of earnings of the company. In the face of these figures why should hon. gentlemen raise such a wail about what has been done to Canadian industry and why, I ask the Minister of Finance, should it be necessary to grant to these men this additional protection which the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) figures at 6 per cent? Personally I am not able to understand it. Of course I am glad to see the people of Canada getting cheaper cars but I do not like to see the treasury of this country depleted by $1,500,000 or $2,000,000. As I said when I first rose, this is a long amendment; the members have not had an opportunity of looking at it, and I do not see why we should not be given that opportunity.

Just a word in regard to the excise tax question. At the present time I am told that the manufacturers pay this excise tax on the wholesale value of the car, but they collect it from the consumers on the retail value. According to the statement given on page 15 of the Ford company's booklet they are paying excise tax on only 75 per cent of the retail value of the car. This is the question that I would like to ask definitely of the Minister of Finance. Will the Canadian automobile manufacturers sell these cars to the consumers less 5 per cent excise tax on the retail price or will they sell them to us less only 5 per cent on the wholesale price? There is a difference of 1¼ per cent between those two methods of paying the tax. The two questions I would like to submit to the minister again before I sit down are these: Why should the committee not have an opportunity to study this amendment before we pass it, and on what basis will the automobile manufacturers save us this excise tax—on the wholesale value or the retail value of the car?

Mr. ROBB: They pay the excise tax on the wholesale value.

Mr. COOTE: Does the minister mean that they are still going to collect from us the 1¼ per cent which is the difference between 5 per cent on the wholesale price and 5 per cent on the retail price? At the present time I understand they have been making that and putting it in their pockets.

Mr. ROBB: My colleague the Minister of Customs, who is administering the tax, says that it is the tax paid by the dealer to the manufacturer.

Mr. EVANS: If we are going to pass this amendment to-night I would like to know if it contains a provision that if at any time it is proved to the satisfaction of the government that this rebate of excise tax is not passed on to the consumer, the tax will at once again be imposed

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. ROBB: To do that it would be necessary to give the Governor in Council the right to increase taxation, and that is not good legislation. We have, however, the right to reduce taxation, and if they do not live up fairly to this agreement we have the right to reduce the excise tax to all the trade of the world.

Mr. EVANS: Will that be inserted in the bill?

Mr. ROBB: It is not necessary.

Mr. COOTE: I would really like to get this definitely if I can from the Minister of Finance. At the present time the Ford touring car is advertised at $415 at the factory, freight and government taxes extra. Am I to understand from the minister that the automobile manufacturers will sell this car at $415 still and no excise tax? I understand, of course, they will collect freight and sales tax. Are we to understand that they will sell at this price without adding any excise tax?

Mr. ROBB: The tax the dealer now pays to the manufacturer will be reduced.

Mr. COOTE: That is very indefinite. If the minister is going to see that these men live up to this agreement, is the agreement that they will not charge the Canadian consumer any excise tax? At the present time they have been charging the Canadian consumer 5 per cent on the retail price while they have been paying the government 5 per cent on the wholesale price, so that really they have been putting into their pockets 1¼ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: My understanding is that there will be no excise tax on cars of $1,200 or under.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would like to support the position of the hon. member for Macleod. We have heard this question debated for weeks and apparently a decision was reached. So far as I can judge from what we have heard to-night this decision is being decidedly modified.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Our friends across the way admit that; in fact they charge that. If that is so, we ought to have some time at least to consider the bearings of the modification and I would join in asking that the matter be stood over until we have time to study it.

Mr. COOTE: I again protest. We discussed the budget for five weeks and sat up until four o'clock in the morning in order to get it passed. An important change in the budget is brought in at ten minutes to six and at half past nine we must put it through without having a chance to read it.

Mr. ROBB: I frankly say that if there is any opposition to this measure I am prepared to withdraw it. I am not anxious to lose $1,500,000, although I contend again that owing to increased business in sales tax the loss will be practically nil and we may be better off. I think, however, the request of hon. members is reasonable and I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT AMENDMENT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 152, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1923.—Hon. Mr. Elliott—Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 1—Persons to whom drugs may be sold.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am informed by the officials of the department that section 5 of the act has always been held to cover both prescriptions and orders given for hospital supplies.

Mr. BENNETT: The section is broad enough to embrace hospitals?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. BARBER: Many of the hospitals in small towns call for tenders for supplies. Included in these supplies are certain narcotic drugs, contained possibly in the tinctures or some preparations, and it is impossible to expect an order from a medical man in such a place for any considerable quantity of drugs. Under the act as it stands the druggists have no authority to supply these goods. That is the point. The act should provide that upon receipt of an order from the superintendent or the matron of a hospital drugs might be supplied just as on a doctor's prescription, and such order could go into the record.

Mr. MANION: Section 5, to which the minister refers, does not cover hospitals, except as regards purchases by them from wholesale houses. In small towns, and even in cities, hospitals buy a good deal of their supplies from the retail druggists, and if a hospital, say in Fort William, should run out of supplies it would be impossible to wait until an order could be filled in Winnipeg or Toronto. They would necessarily have to renew their stock from the retailer. The point is absolutely well taken. The superintendent or the matron, who frequently is not a doctor, should be allowed to give an order for supplies in the same way as a doctor gives a prescription for the individual patient. The minister would have the same means of checking such orders as he now has in respect of prescriptions.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am surprised to hear the hon. member suggest that the door should be opened any wider. Most of the medical men in the House with whom I have discussed this matter agree with the officials of the Department of Health that, far from this being done, the regulations should be made still more strict. It is not considered desirable that the matron or anyone else other than a doctor should have charge of a matter of this kind.

Mr. MANION: The minister is speaking of something of which he knows little when he says that I am suggesting that the door be opened wider. I do not suggest anything of the sort. I am not suggesting that the patients should get narcotic drugs from anyone but a doctor. The hospital usually gets its supplies by order of the superintendent, but the superintendent has no right to dispense drugs to anybody. Drugs are handed out by the drug clerk of the hospital only on the prescription of a doctor and the check can be kept just as easily on any orders issuing from the superintendent as in the case of individual prescriptions. I did not suggest that the superintendent should have the right to give drugs to anyone, and I resent such an imputation. I resent the suggestion that I am advocating any opening of the door. So far as I am concerned the door may be closed tight. I am pointing out that the hospitals of Ontario do not get their narcotic drugs from the doctor and if the law is as the minister indicates, then those hospitals are breaking it, because they get their supplies on the order of the superintendent. If this practice is illegal we might as well make it legal. The fact is that drugs are kept in stock in the hospital, although, as I have pointed out, they are not allowed to be given to patients except on the prescription of a doctor.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hon. gentleman misunderstood the interpretation I put upon his words. I know he would be one of the very last to wish to open the door any wider. But that is the effect of the suggestion that either the matron or the superintendent of the hospital should have the right to order narcotics from the retail druggist.

Mr. MANION: Does the minister suggest that the matron bootlegs in drugs?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, no.

Mr. MANION: That would be the only way in which the door could be opened any wider.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Every hospital has attached to it a medical man and there is no reason why he should not give the order. There has been no difficulty in the past and no complaints have been made to the department on the ground of hospitals not being able to obtain supplies.

Mr. MANION: Because they have been breaking the law, if this is the law.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are quite within the law if the doctor gives them a written order. It does not need to be a prescription. If any practising physician gives to the hospital an order in writing, then they can obtain narcotics.

Mr. MANION: I understand that. But in many cities the superintendent of the hospital is not a doctor at all. In my own city we have a fine standardized hospital whose superintendent is a lady. She is not a doctor, and if the law is as the minister states she would have to come either to myself or to some other attending physician and get a blank order for any quantity of narcotics which the hospital might require.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I do not think the minister's department or the medical officers he has consulted have given him a fair idea of what the member for Fort William is trying to impress upon him. The practice now is that medical men should not be in charge of hospitals, and the larger ones are passing into the control of business hands. It is through the superintendent that all orders must come. Each hospital keeps a dispensary, the same as a drug store, and no drug can be taken from that dispensary without a doctor's order.

Mr. MANION: That is the point.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The drug is as safely guarded in the hospital dispensary as in the drug store—more so. The hospital must have medical supplies, and there is only one person who has the right to give orders for those supplies. Those supplies are issued from the dispensary on a doctor's orders. If it is the law that drugs cannot be obtained except under a doctor's order, I agree with the member for Fort William that there is hardly a hospital I know of but what is breaking the law. The person in charge at Kingston is a layman—in other large hospitals it is the same—and he is the one who gives the orders for supplies. But once any drug is taken into the hospital stores not one dram can be issued without a doctor's order, according to the law.

Mr. GERVAIS: Mr. Chairman, there is danger in allowing laymen to prescribe narcotics.

Mr. MANION: They do not prescribe, they order supplies.

Mr. GERVAIS: It is the same thing. Take a private hospital, the superintendent might be interested in some way in the narcotic trade. I think the regulation contained in the bill very wise. Some amendment may be introduced, but in this case any hospital duly incorporated must designate by resolution of the board of directors who is to sign orders instead of a medical man. Everybody knows the drug habit is a great evil, and no one knows this better than medical men. Therefore the law should restrict in every possible way any illicit traffic in drugs.

Mr. MURPHY: The member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Gervais) has said that a superintendent of a hospital might be interested in the sale of narcotics. The minister has told us that if the matron or superintendent of a hospital orders drugs, that order must be signed by some physician connected with the hospital where it can be legally filled. Supposing a physician attending the hospital signs an order; and then it is taken out of his charge and delivered to the hospital. Who is responsible? Not the physician because he is not there. The person responsible is the superintendent of the hospital. In that case requiring the physician to sign the order is merely a subterfuge to get around the responsiblity resting upon the person in whose possession the drug actually is. I should like to point out to the minister further that this amendment reads thus:

> And any druggist who gives, sells or furnishes any drug to any person, except upon a written order or prescription signed and dated by a duly authorized practising physician—

If you stop there it might not be so bad. But let us go a little further:

> —veterinary surgeon or dentist.

Now if the interpretation of the minister is correct that these drugs can be legally furnished by a retail druggist to a hospital only upon a written order, that order has to be signed by whom?

> a duly authorized practising physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist.

If that is the interpretation, what is to prevent a veterinary surgeon or dentist signing an order for a large quantity of drugs, which may then pass out of his possession into that of someone else who is responsible for their disposal?

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Fort William is not only correct, but that he should have gone a great deal further. If supplies are purchased, they are purchased by the hospital and not by the physician, and there is no provision in this bill whereby a hospital may purchase drugs upon the order of a physician. I quite agree with what the hon. member for Fort William has said. I know something about the management of hospitals in the city of Montreal, and all their supplies are ordered by the superintendent or manager. If the government wish to go further than that and say that the superintendent or manager is not a suitable person to order supplies of this character, but that they must be obtained on the order of a physician, well and good; but I defy the hon. gentleman to show me how there can be sold to a hospital any drug by an authorized vendor, even on the approval of a physician or veterinary surgeon—they come within the same category—without incurring the penalty prescribed.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I appreciate the suggestion of hon. gentlemen, but I think they fail to recognize that this bill does not interfere in any way with the right of a hospital to obtain drugs. The amendment simply cuts out the words, in section 5 of the act, which reads:

And any druggist who gives, sells or furnishes any drug to any person other than any such physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist, except upon a written order or prescription.

The amendment now before the House has nothing to do with the obtaining of drugs by hospitals; that remains exactly as it has been for years. All that is done by this amendment is to say that where the druggist is furnishing drugs to any person it must be upon a written order, even though the person seeking to obtain the drug be a physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist.

Mr. HANNESSON: Is there any provision now in the act giving hospitals the power to keep drugs on hand?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will understand that this act provides penalties for improperly obtaining or having drugs. I do not agree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), even if the question brought up by him arose out of this bill, which it does not.

Mr. HANNESSON: Under what act or under what provision of the act can a hospital get a supply of drugs except for a specific patient?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Just let me read this particular section:

Any druggist who gives, sells, or furnishes any drug to any person,—

I am told that that has always been held to include the superintendent of a hospital, or anyone else.

—except upon a written order or prescription signed and dated by a duly authorized and practising physician,—

The matron of a hospital only needs to go to a physician and get a written and signed order on a druggist for the hospital receiving the drug.

Mr. MURPHY: If I understand the minister correctly—and he might correct me if I am wrong—under this act the matron or superintendent of a hospital has the right to obtain narcotic drugs for that institution on the signed order of a physician. Is that correct?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Then, that order having been filled, who is responsible for these drugs, the physician signing the order or the matron or superintendent of the hospital into whose possession the drugs go?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Everyone who improperly hands out any of these drugs is liable under the act. This act, as hon. gentlemen will bear in mind, is prohibitory; it is not permissive except by implication. It describes the offences which are created under it, and tells the way in which a person obtaining or having a drug unlawfully may be punished. By implication it is quite clear that the person who gets a written order for a drug has that drug lawfully in his possession. I might just read the memorandum given me by the acting deputy minister of the department. He says:

With reference to the purchase of narcotics by hospitals there has never been any specific provision in the statutes. Narcotics required by such institutions are purchased through the medium of a physician's order. In most cases there is a medical superintendent in charge of the institution, who signs such orders. In the case of smaller hospitals there is, as a rule, a physician in attendance in such institutions, and such physician signs narcotic orders, the object of the law being to place the responsibilty upon the physician interested in the hospital or connected therewith, to prevent unscrupulous individuals obtaining narcotics who should not receive them, or to prevent the purchasing of drugs for purposes other than required as a medicine in the hospital. The officials charged with the administration of the act think it would be highly dangerous to give any hospital without a superintendent or doctor advising the right to obtain narcotics on their own responsibility.

He calls attention further to the fact that in the United States the regulations are more strict than these; there the ordinary physician has to have an annual license and the same also applies to veterinary surgeons and dentists. But I want to call attention to the fact that we are not making any change whatever in regard to the hospital regulations relating to narcotic drugs; the act remains as it has been for years. If an amendment is necessary, with which I do not agree, we are not attempting it in this way. This amendment simply says that in every case where a physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist obtains drugs from a retail druggist he must sign a written order, and that is all we intend.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to prolong the debate, nor do I wish to delay this measure. I had made up my mind to say nothing further, but the minister now gives the opinion of the deputy minister, and the matter is not cleared up at all. As a matter of fact the deputy minister is wrong when he states that most hospitals have a medical superintendent. Most hospitals in the smaller cities have nothing of the sort; they have either a lady superintendent or matron or a man superintendent who takes the part of a business man as well as superintendent of the hospital. I take it that under this act, according to the deputy minister, the superintendent of a hospital who was not a medical man would have to go to one of the staff of the hospital and ask him to give an order for the drug required. That doctor gives an order, we will suppose, for a certain amount of opium or morphine; he takes the responsibility of the order and has no check-up whatever on the dispensing of the drug; while he is responsible the superintendent unloads it in whatever way he likes.

Let me suggest to the minister what could be done under such an act, and why what we on this side suggest would be much more reasonable. The minister stated earlier in his remarks, by the way, that the medical men of the House had been consulted. Perhaps some were consulted but I do not know of any on this side of the House who were approached at all. We have many smaller hospitals, some of them private institutions —and there are many such—with a lady or a man in charge. Suppose such a hospital has a superintendent who is not of a very high moral character. Suppose that in the same city there is a medical man of the same type —and there are some such. They could easily make a frame-up under this law whereby the physician would give an order to the superintendent of this small hospital to get in a fairly large amount of narcotic drugs. The superintendent who, as I say, is not of a very high moral character, could then sell them out as he or she chose, and there would be no check-up whatever. I suggest that the dispensaries of these private hospitals, as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) says, should be checked up exactly as the druggist is checked. They should buy their supplies as druggists buy theirs, and the outgo should be checked up in exactly the same way.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend will agree that if it is dangerous to trust both a doctor and a medical superintendent who might want to do something illegal it would be much more dangerous to leave it in the power of the medical superintendent alone.

Mr. MANION: Not at all; my hon. friend does not seem to get the point. The superintendent would simply buy his supplies exactly as the druggist buys his supplies; he would have to keep a record of every outgoing narcotic drug and another record of the physician giving the order for that drug. In other words, the minister and his department would have exactly the same check upon that private dispensary as they have upon a public dispensary, or in other words a druggist.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They have it now.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): If the wish of the minister and his deputy is to check this, it is much safer to leave it to the superintendent or matron. What doctor is going to take the responsibility? You are getting down to the same level as the Ontario Temperance Act, where the doctor does not care; he has no responsibility at all. The matron or the superintendent of the hospital has to go and seek out some doctor, because the house surgeon will be an under-graduate and not legally licensed in the province in which he is serving in the hospital. The superintendent has therefore to go to one of the doctors in the city and say: Will you sign this order? What responsibility has the doctor in that case? None whatever. I was just going to take the same ground as the hon. member for Fort William.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does either the hon. member for Fort William or the hon. member for Kingston suggest that the bill that is now before the House affects in any way the position of the hospital or of the matron or the medical superintendent? We have not attempted to deal with that.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): We are drawing up a failure in this bill. I admit at once that I cannot understand it; I do not know what it means. But the point has been raised here that you are making it difficult or impossible for a hospital to get its supplies. The hospital should stand in the same position as the druggist—should account for all the drugs it gets and see that they are issued only on a doctor's prescription. That is the point. You are making it difficult, if not impossible, for a hospital to get its supplies. I pointed out that once the hospital has its supplies it should be able to make a statement to the department accounting for every bit of it, just the same as the druggist. But do not ask the superintendent of the hospital to get a doctor's order, for it is impossible for him to do so. The doctor signs that prescription in a slipshod way. That is the whole point. The deputy minister's memorandum is quite wrong. Hospitals now are passing out of the old status where they had a medical man in charge, and it is difficult for them to get a doctor's prescription to-day.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I again call my hon. friend's attention to the fact, because I know he wants to deal with the bill that is before the committee, that all we are doing by this amendment is striking out after the word "person" in section 5 the words "other than any such physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist." As I said before, all that means is that now the physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist has to sign a written order to the retail druggist before he can get the drug. The position of the hospital and of the superintendent and of the matron and of everybody else is left exactly as it was except that we strike out the words "other than any such physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist." The whole aim of this amendment is to insist that when a physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist comes to the retail druggist for these narcotic drugs he must sign a written order.

10 p.m.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Then what was the intention of this memorandum?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That memorandum was given to me after the question was raised.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May I read it? It says:

> With reference to purchase of narcotics by hospitals, there has never been any specific provision in the statutes. Narcotics required by such institutions are purchased through the medium of a physician's order.

That is knocked out. It goes on:

> In most cases there is a medical superintendent in charge of the institution who signs such orders.

That is not correct.

> In the case of smaller hospitals there is as a rule a physician in attendance at such institution, and such physician signs narcotic orders—

Now listen to this:

> —the object of the law being to place the responsibility upon the physician interested in the hospital or connected therewith, to prevent unscrupulous individuals who might be employed in the hospital using the institution as a medium of purchasing drugs for other purposes than required as a medicine in the hospital.

Now the doctor who would sign that order has no responsibility or charge over those who handle the drugs in the hospital. That is the point I make. The doctor who would sign that order, if it was required, has no responsibility or charge over the house surgeons and those who dispense the medicine inside the hospital. No one would sign the order under such circumstances, with that responsibility placed upon him.

Mr. MacLAREN: This section safeguards, as far as possible, the sale of narcotics to physicians, veterinary surgeons and dentists, but it does not provide for the sale of narcotics to hospitals, nor is that provided for in any other section of any other act. It has been pointed out a number of times this evening that it is important that regulations should exist regarding the sale of narcotics to hospitals. The sale is not even regularized at the present time. I suggest therefore that the minister might consider adding a further section to deal with the sale of narcotics to hospitals.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I appreciate the suggestion of my hon. friend, but I again call attention to the fact that this legislation has not for its object the dealing with the right of hospitals in any way, shape or form. It does not apply to them at all. The section under consideration only makes it necessary for the physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist who is obtaining narcotics from the retail druggist to give an order in writing. We are not affecting the hospital one way or the other. Certain other amendments were suggested this afternoon with regard to the word "prescribed", as to whether or not it should be a violation of the act for a physician to prescribe narcotics in certain cases. As the act will probably be gone over fully before another year—it is now contained in three or four different amendments—I would suggest that these proposed amendments could be borne in mind then. But it is not intended to change the regulations in regard to hospitals under the present act at all. The only object is to tighten it up a little, so as to make it necessary for a physician to sign a written order in every case.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): According to this bill and the statement of the minister, the retail druggist will not be allowed to sell narcotics to a hospital. It does not allow the hospital to buy narcotics. I think if we added in the thirteenth line after the word "druggist" the words "or hospital authorities" it would cover the hospital. The minister, being a layman, perhaps does not exactly understand how this affects the retail trade. What the hon. member for Kingston says is absolutely true. There are several hospitals, not only in the rural sections but right here in the city of Ottawa, that have not a medical man in charge. Suppose that hospital telephones to a retail druggist for a small quantity of drugs in an emergency; why cannot that order be sent to the hospital and the authorities from the narcotics branch trace it and see that it is properly dispensed in the hospital? In that way you will be giving the retail druggist a square deal, which you are not doing at present. The law is being broken all the time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are passing this measure in anticipation of making new regulations or altering the regulations now in existence in regard to the matter of supplying narcotic drugs. This section enables the authorities to go to a physician and get an order. However, we are not dealing with hospitals.

Mr. BURY: You are not dealing with hospitals except to this extent, that the act expressly prohibits the sale of narcotics to a hospital except on a physician's written order. It refers to the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act and says:

> Every person licensed under this act to deal in any drug, who gives, sells or furnishes any drug to any person other than—a duly authorized and practising physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist, or to a bona fide wholesale druggist, or to a druggist carrying on a business in a bona fide drug store,—

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend would not suggest that it applies to the retail druggist. He has not read the section throughout. That applies to the wholesale druggist and this gives the form of license. It struck me in the same way as it struck my hon. friend when I first read it, but the first portion does not apply to the retail druggist.

Mr. BURY: It means then that you are prohibiting the hospital from applying to the wholesale druggist. Is there anything in the act which precludes the retail druggist from applying to a wholesale druggist without a doctor's prescription?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. BURY: I think an amendment is required to enable the hospitals, in a regular legal manner, to buy their goods without going to a doctor for an order, so that they might get their drugs under a block order You are prepared to allow the retail druggist to get his drugs without a doctor's order, and the hospital after all is nothing but an institution with a drug store virtually attached to it as an annex to its business. The same difficulties and the same dangers attach to allowing druggists to buy as attach to allowing the hospitals to buy. If you will only consider the drug department of a hospital in the same light as you consider an ordinary retail drug store, your difficulty has disappeared. You can make the same regulations regarding the drug department in the hospital as you do regarding the retail drug store. The only difference is that the one sells across the counter to anyone coming in with a doctor's prescription, and the other only dispenses narcotic drugs to patients in the hospital, and on a doctor's prescription.

Then there is another feature in connection with it. There are a large number of hospitals throughout the country districts, small municipal hospitals, which have not a resident medical superintendent. It may be that they have to telephone to a drug store three or four miles away. It may be absolutely impossible for them to get a doctor's prescription in time for pressing requirements if they run short of drugs. The whole difficulty would be solved if the minister would consider the drug department of a hospital as exactly in the same position as a retail drug store in the city, and hold it responsible in the same way.

Sir EUGENE FISET: This amendment is proposed on account of the practice that has prevailed for the last few years, namely, that doctors renew by phone prescriptions on their local druggist when needed. As far as hospitals are concerned, I think in every large hospital there is always a qualified druggist.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): Not always.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): My hon. friend (Sir Eugene Fiset) cannot speak for Ontario.

Sir EUGENE FISET: It is the practice to have a qualified druggist in the hospital.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I think my hon. friend is getting the minister in wrong.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If a doctor was suspected of making an improper use of narcotic drugs, the law as I understand it, is such that that doctor could be obliged to show what he had done with the drugs so purchased. This is a perfectly proper restriction. It seems to me that you cannot make the restrictions on the handling of narcotics too severe. I may be wrong in my understanding of it, but I think that the superintendent of a hospital, no matter how that superintendent requires the narcotics, whether on the order of the physician or any other way, should be obliged on occasion, or if required, to show exactly what has been done with the narcotic drugs supplied to that hospital. I do not understand that that is the law at present, but I do say that if it is not the law, the same restrictions that apply to the doctor in obliging him to tell what he has done with every ounce of narcotic drugs he has obtained ought to apply to the superintendent of a hospital. The penalties imposed upon those infamous characters—the most infamous that it is possible to find in any country—who peddle narcotic drugs round for the sake of gain, struck me as being too light. In the case of a person who is not a physician, who has acquired a drug in some underhand method and sells it to whoever will buy, I would, if I had the matter in my hands, sentence the offender to eight or ten years and a fine which would take from him every cent he had in the world. If after serving the first sentence he was found guilty a second time, I think he ought to be sentenced to hang by the neck until he is dead, because he is just as much a murderer as a man who stabs or shoots another. He is worse, because he is murdering by slow degrees; he is entitled to no consideration. When I read about how these infamous creatures have been handled by the courts, I say they have been dealt with altogether too leniently. The point is not so much as to how the superintendent of the hospital obtains the drug. You provide for that; it must be done through a doctor's prescription or order. But the main point is that the superintendent of a hospital should be placed under the same restrictions as a doctor, so that you could call on him at any time to show just what had been done with every ounce of narcotic drugs in his possession.

Mr. HOWDEN: For many years it was possible for a doctor to go to a drug store and obtain morphine without giving a written order. Morphine was sometimes distributed rather freely. I understand the chief object of the bill is to make it impossible for even a medical man to obtain morphine without giving a written order. With regard to hospitals not having medical superintendents, I might say that so far as I am acquainted with hospitals—and I have some knowledge—even if the superintendent of a hospital is not actually a medical man there is always a nominal medical head for every hospital.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Who would that nominal medical head be?

Mr. HOWDEN: I know a hospital of 250 beds in the city of Winnipeg which has no resident medical superintendent, but a recognized medical man practising in that city is its ostensible medical superintendent.

Mr. HAMILTON: After that medical man has given a certificate for drugs for the hospital, what guarantee has he that they will be used properly in that institution?

Mr. HOWDEN: What guarantee has anybody that a drug is going to be used properly in any case? All hospitals and all medical men in Manitoba are put on an allowance of morphine.

Mr. HANNESSON: Under what act?

Mr. HOWDEN: I am not able to say, but I know it is so. If they want to use more than they are allowed they are without morphine. The same thing precisely holds good for the hospitals. The superintendent or the matron of a hospital now is accountable to the narcotic department in precisely the same way as if the drug were obtained through a medical man. I do not think there is any trouble about this amendment at all. It seems to me it is to control medical men and no one else. It is a very good move and one that is necessary.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member for St. Boniface has missed some of the point. My object in raising this discussion this afternoon was not to make the provisions of the act wider, but rather to tighten them up. Under the act as it now stands a retail druggist must give a written order to the wholesaler or manufacturer for a narcotic drug. He must keep a record of the quantity of the drug when it comes into his drug store and a record of sales, and the department have a complete check of the narcotics which he has in stock and his purchases. He must make a report to the department and the police come in and inspect his books. Under the act as it now stands the minister says that a hospital can purchase a drug by means of an order from a physician. After the physician gives that order nobody is responsible for the drug. The physician is not responsible because he is not in the hospital all the time and other physicians are there prescribing. The hospital is not required to keep any record of its purchases and the quantities nor to keep any record of the quantities dispensed. Thus under the act there is a large loophole through which narcotic drugs can be used illegally. That is the point which I have brought up and which I wish to emphasize.

If the superintendent of a hospital has to give a written order for a narcotic drug and keep a record of the quantities purchased and the quantities dispensed, you have a complete check-up just as you have in regard to a retail druggist. At the present time you have no check at all. As regards the statement that a physician is nominally the head of a hospital, that may apply to a hospital of 250 beds in Winnipeg, but it certainly does not apply to hospitals of ten beds at country points. Somebody should be responsible for those drugs, but under the act as it stands and as it is proposed to be amended no one is responsible.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does the hon. member say that in a small hospital there is not one particular medical man who has charge of the building?

Mr. MURPHY: In many of the smaller hospitals the medical men are all on an equal footing. The matron or the superintendent is the person now responsible, not any practising physician.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has the minister any reason not so far disclosed for taking the position he has?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would be glad to give any information I could. The discussion has disclosed, so far as I am able to sense it, that everybody who has spoken is in favour of having the doctor who goes to a retail druggist for a narcotic drug give an order in writing. That is all that this amendment provides. If it is necessary to have some further legislation with regard to hospital superintendents or matrons that is a matter for consideration. It is not being dealt with or intended to be dealt with at the present time. The present amendment is simply to provide that the physician who hitherto has been able to go to a retail druggist and get a narcotic drug without a written order must now give an order in writing for it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister must see that it is the sense of the committee that some provision must be made in respect of hospitals. Surely the easiest way to settle this matter would be to have a short clause inserted in the bill in regard to narcotic drugs in hospitals.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Section 6 provides that the hospital superintendent or matron who requires a drug can get it for the hospital on a doctor's order.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The point objected to is that the doctor does not or should not assume responsibility for the disposal of that drug over which he has no control. I think the opinion of this committee is that some restriction should be placed upon the use of narcotics by hospitals and that there should be some precise method by which the hospitals can obtain the supply.

Mr. HAMILTON: Why could the minister not insert in the bill a provision whereby a superintendent of a regularly qualified hospital should be permitted to give an order, and that a record of that prescription be kept in the hospital to be inspected by the government inspector as is done in the case of druggists? Hon. members would imagine from the discussion that heretofore you could get drugs without a prescription. That is not the case. A doctor cannot get it for himself without giving a prescription and having it registered in the book before he leaves the drug store. I know that personally. You cannot prescribe a little cocaine for an eye-drop without giving a prescription and signing your name and the date, and that has to be registered. You cannot get paregoric that mothers used to give to their children many years ago to stop their stomachache without giving a prescription. When children eat too many pies and cakes at Christmas time; in fact, every time people get into trouble the first man they run to is the doctor and he has to carry the load in all cases. An amendment should be inserted so that the superintendent of a proper hospital should have authority to get a reasonable quantity of drugs and have them recorded and the books inspected the same as is done in the case of a druggist.

Mr. CAHAN: My objection to this bill is not that it purports to amend the act as the minister suggests. Everyone is quite in favour of the amendment that he proposes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Let us pass it, then.

Mr. CAHAN: The drafting of section 5 is so carelessly done that we are bound to see whether the proposed amendment is sensible and adequate. Under section 3 of chapter 22 of the statutes of 1923 it is provided that the minister may issue licenses, making regulations and prescribing fees, in connection therewith, for the exportation and importation of drugs. There is another license for a manufacturer or dealer other than a retail druggist, and still another license for the retail druggist who manufactures any drug. And so on. Every one of different classes dealing with the importation and exportation, the manufacture, wholesale and retail, of drugs, must have a special license from the minister. Then section 5 begins:

Every person licensed under this act to deal in any drug,—

And only a person licensed under the act can deal lawfully in any drug.

—who gives, sells or furnishes any drug to any person, other than a duly authorized and practising physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist, or to a bona fide wholesale druggist, or to a druggist carrying on a business in a bona fide drug store—

Let us leave out for the moment the intervening words.

—shall be guilty of a criminal offence, and shall be liable upon summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars.

And so forth. Dealing with the first provision, I hold that it is impossible under the law for a druggist, wholesale or retail, to sell to a hospital even on the prescription or on the order of a physician. Under that part of the section dealing with the sale, drugs may be sold only to a practising physician, or to a veterinary surgeon, or to a dentist, or to a bona fide wholesale druggist, or to a druggist carrying on a busines in a bona fide drug store. Under that provision you cannot camouflage as a sale an order given by some consulting or superintending physician at a hospital for a large quantity of drugs, for the reason that the sale must be made, if it is made at all, to some one of the persons specified, namely, a physician, a veterinary surgeon, a dentist, a bona fide wholesale druggist, or a druggist carrying on a business. Then, to show the folly of this wording, it goes on to say:

Or who gives, sells or furnishes any drug to any such physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist without a written order therefor, signed and dated;

This part of the section does not say that this written order must be signed by such physician, or signed by such veterinary surgeon, or signed by such dentist, or signed by such druggist. You never could convict any person under that provision. Anyone could give an order and if it were acted upon there would be no offence even though the person giving it were not a physician or one of the other persons mentioned.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is my hon. friend reading from the second part of section 5?

Mr. CAHAN: I am reading from the first part of the section.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hon. member has got down as far as the words:

And any druggist who gives, sells or furnishes any drug to any person, except upon a written order or prescription signed and dated by a duty authorized and practising physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist.

Surely it is clear from that who shall sign the prescription.

Mr. CAHAN: There are two parts in this section. The "and" in line 14 ought properly to be an "or", because the penalty which is imposed from lines 25 to 30 applies to the acts prohibited from lines 6 to 12. There is no doubt about that. I am dealing for the moment with the language contained between lines 6 and 12 of the bill. Therein it is provided that every person licensed under this bill—that is to say, every class of persons who can possibly deal with these drugs—

—who gives, sells or furnishes any drug to any person, other than a duly authorized and practising physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist, or to a bona fide wholesale druggist, or to a druggist carrying on a business in a bona fide drug store.

That is one provision to which the penalty applies. The next is that every person licensed under this act:

Who gives, sells or furnishes any drug to any such physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist, without a written order therefor signed and dated.

And there that part of the section ends. That written order under the provision of the clause from line 11 to line 14 may be given to a wholesale dealer or to an importer, or it may be given to a retail dealer or to a druggist, and it may be signed by any person in the world. There is no restriction whatever. I am not surprised, therefore, that as the act now stands any person can go and give an order to the wholesaler or to the manufacturer, and for that reason I suppose the superintendent of a hospital can now go and give the order to the wholesaler or the manufacturer. From line 14 down to line 24 it is provided that:

Any druggist who gives, sells or furnishes any drug to any person, except upon a written order or prescription signed and dated by a duly authorized and practising physician—

And so forth. That refers only to a written order given to a retail druggist, while with respect to the orders above mentioned given by the manufacturer or the wholesale dealer the signature may be anybody's at all. Anyone in the wide world may sign those orders. The clause as at present drawn is both doubtful and inconclusive. Some second or third rate clerk who drafted that section in 1923 had it amended again in 1925, and the wording is a disgrace to a third class clerk in any law office in this country. The minister is not responsible for that. But when he comes to the House with this amendment, I think he should take our suggestion and have it drafted clearly so there can be no doubt about it. His amendment, so far as he makes it by leaving out certain words, is properly applied and is within the approval I think of the whole committee; but when we come to read it we find these other objections which certainly demand the minister's attention.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think it is abundantly evident that the amendment as drafted should be withdrawn. As has been pointed out by my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Cahan) anybody can sign the order. have signed it a dozen times. Here is what is done in local hospitals. I have been on the board of a local hospital for thirty years. We have there 75 or 100 patients; we have a resident superintendent; we have a medical board; we have a board of management. Every month the superintendent presents a list of supplies that ought to be bought for the ensuing month and in some cases for two or three months. This list includes drugs of all kinds. The list is submitted to the board and passed on, and as president, which I have been for twenty years, I sign that order and it goes out to a wholesale drug firm in Montreal, Toronto or some other city. There is nothing to prevent me doing it. Is there any other way of doing it? If the local doctor signed the order, would it make it any better? Does the wholesale drug house in Montreal, Toronto or any other city know any more about that medical man than it does about me, John Smith, Tom Jones or anybody else? The fact of the matter is it does not. I have very little use for legislation of this kind. This bill, as I read it, is simply an inducement to the drug bootlegger and peddler. All the restrictions and all the penalties imaginable will not stop this traffic. The moment we began to tinker with prohibition we opened the door to other things that are infinitely worse. As I said before, I have little sympathy with legislation of this kind, and I think the minister ought to redraft the amendment in a way that would make it at least less harmful than it is in its present form.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Mr. Chairman, I understand that generally speaking hon. members are in favour of the amendment that physicians or others who are entitled to prescribe narcotics should give a written order. We know that in hospitals the attending physician writes his prescription, just as he does in the home, for the narcotic or other drug required, and I think that the interjection of the hospital situation is absolutely foreign to the amendment. In my opinion the amendment is quite proper. If a narcotic drug is required there should be a written order signed by the physician or those entitled to prescribe, and I think that is the generally accepted practice. That is as far as the amendment goes. Following that through, in hospital practice a written order will be furnished.

Mr. BURY: What the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) has said is not quite correct. The Minister of Health asks us to pass an amendment on these lines.

> Section 5 of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act 1923, as amended by chapter twenty of the statutes of 1925 is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:—

We are asked not merely to make the few amendments in this bill, but we are also asked to substitute the section in this wording. It is immaterial that it is practically the old section. He is asking us to pass the old section again. He is not only introducing an amendment; he is asking this House to pass a new section—to re-enact the section, if you like to call it so, which is villainously drafted, and which it has been shown to the House may mean anything or nothing. It certainly does not mean what the minister intends it to mean. Therefore I take exception to the statement of the Minister of Public Works that the criticism has not been relevant. It has been relevant because it is criticism directed to the new section as the minister wishes us to pass it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does not the hon. gentleman see that the amendment is exactly the same as the old section, except that where a physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist is obtaining a drug from a retail druggist he must give the order in writing? All that is done is to strike out from the old section these words:

> And any druggist who gives, sells or furnishes any drug—

I will read the old section.

Mr. BURY: I understand my friend's point.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It continues:

—to any person other than any such physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist, except upon a written order or prescription.

All we do is strike out the words:

Other than any such physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist of druggist.

That is, they must give a writen order.

Mr. BURY: I invite the minister to deny what I state, that he is asking this House to re-enact by way of amendment a section which we have discovered to be without form, and void. Here is the way the bill reads:

Section 5 of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act 1923 as amended by chapter twenty of the statutes of 1925, is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:—

He asks us to re-enact this section after discovering all its absurdities. No matter how the minister argues, that is what he is asking us to do. When I asked the minister as to hospitals, he assured me very strenuously and very dogmatically that the first few lines:

Every person licensed under this act to deal in any drug,— referred only to wholesalers.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. Persons who are licensed.

Mr. BURY: He said it referred to wholesalers, not to retailers. Now it is perfectly plain from the language that legally it includes not merely the wholesaler but the retailer, because the retailer has to be lecensed under the act too.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will see that the first part of the act refers to those who have to be licensed, and then where it speaks of "any druggist" it refers to the retail druggist.

Mr. BURY: The hon. minister does not see the point. The section reads:

Every person licensed under this act to deal in any drug,—

The member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has shown that those words are the legal and proper description of the retailer as of the wholesaler. The minister has no right to take words which are legally a quite proper and adequate description of a retailer and tell me that, because of something in his mind, they do not refer to a retailer at all, but only to a wholesaler. They refer to every person who has to get a license to deal in drugs under the act, whether he is a wholesaler or a retailer, and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George showed that very plainly.

Mr. HOWDEN: The bone of contention seems to be that hospitals should be obliged to procure a prescription from a medical man before they are able to obtain a supply of narcotic drugs. The hon. member for Pictou, (Mr. Cantley) speaking a few moments ago pointed out that it was possible for hospitals in his part of the world to get unlimited amounts of narcotic drugs with no prescription at all, just on the endorsation of the director of the hospital. It must appeal to the serious thinking members of this House that it is rather a disastrous state of affairs when hospitals or any other institutions can obtain large supplies of morphine on the order of a layman; surely it is time that sort of thing was checked. I believe there is a hardship in that hospitals always have to obtain a prescription from a medical man in order to procure a supply of morphine or cocaine or whatever it may be, but why not license the drug departments of hospitals, as retail druggists are licensed? Then their supply of narcotics would be checked up and they could obtain their supplies as a retail druggist obtains his.

Mr. BURY: That is exactly what we ask.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): There has been a good deal of discussion on this matter and I am free to say that I cannot see eye to eye with everything said from this side of the House. It is news to me that narcotics can be obtained anywhere without a written certificate from either a dentist, doctor or veterinary surgeon; I do not believe it has been possible in Ontario to do that. If that has been the case in Pictou, and drugs are obtainable in that way, the minister is well advised in bringing in this amendment to check that practice. With regard to the hospitals, I think that question does not enter so much into this discussion. There is a doctor connected in some way with every hospital; in the smaller hospitals a doctor is in attendance for a week or a month, whatever it may be, and he could take it as part of his duties as a matter of course. If the superintendent told him these drugs were needed he could give an order in the proper way, and if that has not been the case in the past I think it should be so now. I cannot see that there is anything in this amendment but what is quite in order and quite proper.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member who just took his seat said he could see nothing wrong in the amendment. Possibly he is right, but I would like to point out that there is absolutely no check on the hospitals having a supply of drugs on hand. The retailer has to keep a check on all his narcotic drugs; would the hon. member tell me why the hospitals should not keep a record of the drugs they have on hand? There is no provision in the act covering that, which is one of the reasons why I considered that there should be a proper way for a hospital to secure drug supplies, and why there should be a proper record kept of those supplies while in the possession of the hospital.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): If this amendment goes through a proper record will be kept of the supplies going into the hospital. Any nurse who has sufficient ability to become superintendent of a hospital should certainly be worthy of confidence, I should think. In a hospital drugs go out in little tablets by ones and twos; they cannot keep a book showing where each quarter grain of morphine goes. You must believe in the superintendent, and I never heard of a hospital where this point came up at all.

Section agreed to.

Mr. CAHAN: I would like to put myself on record before the bill is read the third time; the minister, by passing it in its present form, must take responsibility because it is passed in a way which allows unlimited bootlegging in drugs without penalty. I am sorry he did not take the suggestion made from this side of the House and withdraw the bill for re-drafting.

Bill reported.

CANADA—WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, an act respecting trade relations with British West Indies, Bermuda, British Guiana and British Honduras.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before we go into committee and before making any objections to the motion I take it that this will be the last order of business called to-night?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: I understood the Minister of Finance to agree that before the bill would be finally dealt with we were to have some further information. He was to give us a complete statement of the probable cost of the subsidies for the ships on this service, the capital cost necessary to build the ships to carry out the agreement if it is ratified, and the probable annual cost of maintaining them.

Mr. SPEAKER: I might suggest that this information could be better given in committee.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee thereon. Mr. Duff in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Agreement approved.

Mr. CAHAN: I think, Mr. Chairman, before the agreement is approved is an opportune time for the minister to give us the information which he promised when the resolution was before the House, as to what is the capital cost of carrying out this agreement and what is the probable annual cost by way of subsidies and otherwise.

Mr. ROBB: That is quite a proper question. When the measure was before us a few weeks ago I told the House that we had advertised for tenders and that the tenders were to be opened on a certain date. We received in answer to our invitations submissions from two parties. Neither of these tenders was accepted. We concluded that it was not in the public interest to accept them; they were too high. Since that time we have been advised that the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, which for some years has carried on a service to part of the islands, was now prepared to carry on a monthly service without a subsidy, and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are giving alternate services on dates that will not conflict with the sailings of the Royal Mail Company, so that the service generally agreed upon in 1920, while not actually coming up to the 1920 requirements, will be as good as we have had heretofore.

I have been approached by people who were largely interested in the trade between Canada and the West India islands wanting to know how soon this agreement would be brought into force. My hon. friend knows that this agreement comes into force by proclamation. The West India islands has passed the necessary legislation, and when Canada passes the legislation the Governor in Council will have a time within which to issue the proclamation if they so desire.

Bermuda adopted the necessary legislation on August 7, 1925; British Honduras, August 20, 1925; British Guiana, September 25, 1925; Trinidad, October 16, 1925; Jamaica, October 22, 1925; the Windward Islands, Grenada, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, February 20, 1926, approximately; the Leeward Islands, Antigua, Montserrat, St. Kitts, Nevis, March 3, 1926; Barbados, April 6, 1926. The Bahamas is the only colony that has not yet ratified the treaty.

I said that I had been approached to know how soon this agreement would come into force, and I asked the gentleman why he desired that information. "Well," he said, "I would not like you to make it public just now, but we are interested in the trade between Canada and certain West India islands, and we propose to put on a line of steamers between Canada and certain of the West India islands, the only condition being that we do not wish to be bound down by any subsidy."

11 p.m.

We are also advised by a gentleman from Vancouver that he is putting on a line of steamers between the Canadian Pacific coast and the West India islands. My hon. friends will observe from this that we may possibly get a better service than we had at first anticipated, and at very much less cost. That is the position to-day. After parliament has approved of this agreement the government, I submit, will probably be able to provide the necessary service without very much additional cost to the Canadian people. My hon. friend will recall that for some years past we were paying to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company $340,000 a year. The service required under this agreement is practically the same as was required under the 1920 agreement, but Canada has never lived up to those requirements. We have never been able to provide the service, for the reason that it cost more than we thought was justified. Now it would appear that under the new agreement letting down the bars and enabling trade to flow more freely between Canada and the West India islands, the West India islands reducing their tariff against Canadian products and Canada reducing her tariff against West India products, the trade will be such as to encourage shippers to put vessels on that service. That is the position as it is to-night.

Mr. CAHAN: I am grateful, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. minister for the summary which he has given of our previous discussion, but the committee should have information as to the cost of carrying out article IX of part II of the agreement. I suggest to the hon. minister that the fact that the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company has announced that it intends to carry on a service without any subsidy whatever from this government, but a service which does not comply with the terms of this contract, renders it still more difficult for the government to obtain a service in competition with the Royal Mail which will comply with the terms of this contract. It means more competition. It means that the company which supplies the service to carry out this contract with the British West Indies will have greater competition than any West India service ever had before and will require a heavier subsidy in order to comply with the terms contained in article IX of part II of this agreement.

Again, the minister says that other parties are speaking of putting on an additional freight service. It is quite possible that they may. One service may have two or three competing steamship lines, but the fact that these competing lines are now being inaugurated by independent companies, instead of enabling the government to perform its contract with the British West Indies, places a heavier burden still upon the minister, as it means a still greater subsidy from the federal treasury in any event, in order that the government may procure suitable steamship service to carry out the terms of this agreement.

Further, I think the minister will admit that none of these other independent lines to which he refers will give the service of the quality called for in this agreement. When in another bill reductions were made in the tariff to correspond to a reduction made in every item under this agreement with the British West Indies, I thought the minister was granting them as a solatium to the West Indies without having any real intention of carrying out the other part of the bargain with regard to the steamship service. It was a most extraordinary proceeding. I think I am right in saying that every single reduction in the proposed tariff under this agreement in favour of the West Indies has already been made in the bill which has passed this House dealing with tariff reductions. By section 3 of Bill No. 15 these reductions are only to come into force when this agreement is ratified. Section 3 reads:

> After the said agreement is brought into force, and so long as it remains in force, goods mentioned in the said agreement, the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies parties to the said agreement, which are conveyed without transhipment, except transhipment at a port of any of the said colonies, by ship direct into a sea or river port of Canada shall be admitted to Canada at the rates of duties provided in the said agreement.

I do not know whether the tariff bill has already passed the Senate and been approved By His Excellency the Governor General, but when it is so approved there will be no further need for section 3, because every reduction contemplated by this agreement has already been made by special enactment. Bearing that in mind, and proceeding to article IX of the contract, I find the following:

Subject to the ratification of the present agreement as hereinafter stated in Article XII, the government of Canada will arrange for a mail, passenger and freight steamship or motor ship service to come into effect as soon as possible, and in any case within fifteen months after the date of the ratification of this agreement, between Canada, Bermuda, the Leeward islands, the Windward islands, Barbados, Trinidad and British Guiana, on the following lines:

1. A fortnightly freight, passenger and mail service from Canadian ocean ports all the year round, calling each way at Bermuda, St. Kitts, Nevis, Antigua, Montserrat, Dominica, St. Lucia, Barbados, St. Vincent, Grenada, Tobago, Trinidad and Demerara.

2. The vessels shall be of from 5,000 to 6,000 tons gross, capable of maintaniing an ocean speed of not less than 12 knots, and providing accommodation for 100 first-class, 30 second-class, and 100 steerage or deck passengers, and shall be provided with 'tween decks, and cold storage accommodation as required, but not less than 10,000 cubic feet.

Now dealing with that question of that competitive route, I ask the minister to tell us frankly whether there is any probability of any of these independent companies to which we have alluded giving a service which will be adequate to the demands of these sections of the contract with the West Indies? I think not. In view of the additional competition which we now know there will be on that route, it will require a still larger subsidy from the treasury of the country in order to secure a new competing line under government direction to meet the demands of clauses 1 and 2 of article IX. Clause 3 of that article reads:

In addition to the foregoing the government of Canada will provide a fortnightly freight service with vessels of 4,300 tons or thereabouts dead weight, and a speed of about 10 knots, from Canadian river ports in summer and from Canadian ocean ports in winter calling at St. Kitts, Antigua, Barbados, Trinidad and Demerara.

It is possible that that particular freight service may be obtained in some way. I am so ignorant of it that I cannot speak decidedly, but I do not think there are in the government merchant marine at the present time boats that would adequately supply the freight service called for by clause 3. By making arrangements with some other freight line however, that service may be provided. But what is it going to cost? What is the estimate of the government as to the subsidy necessary to provide the service? If new steamships have to be built, as they may have to be, what will be the capital cost of their construction? The minister should not expect us to go it blind. We are all willing to make concessions to the British West Indies, but we should know what the cost of these concessions will be. We have already made, and parliament has voted, concessions in the past, but we should have some estimate of the probable cost of these services.

Then there are some provisions in article X with regard to the reservation of freight space and passenger accommodation. Then article XIII has to do with another service which is likely to prove the more costly of the two. Article XIII reads:

The government of Canada undertakes to provide as soon as possible, and in any case within fifteen months after the ratification of this agreement as provided in article XVI, a fortnightly mail, passenger and freight service between St. Lawrence ports in summer and such Canadian ocean ports in winter as may be designated by the Canadian government, and calling both ways at Bermuda, the Bahamas, and Kingston, Jamaica, alternating with a fortnightly freight service between the said Canadian ports and Kingston, Jamaica, direct.

1. Passenger steamers to be similar in size to those proposed for the eastern route, that is to say, from 5,000 to 6,000 gross tons, ocean speed 14 knots, accommodation for 100 first-class passengers, with 'tween decks, and refrigeration for about 70,000 stems of bananas, and also cold storage for Canadian meats, fish, butter, cheese and other dairy products from Canada to the colonies and for fruit, green vegetables, etc., from the colonies to Canada.

2. Each of the freight steamers shall also have a speed of about 10 knots and refrigeration for about 50,000 stems of bananas.

3. A steamer operating on a fortnightly schedule connecting with the steamers specified in Article XIII-1 shall be supplied by the government of Canada between British Honduras and Kingston, Jamaica, of about 1,000 tons, speed 10 knots, with accommodation for at least 20 first-class passengers, and cold storage.

I do not think the minister can suggest that any steamship company in Christendom proposes to perform this service under article XIII without a very large subsidy. In fact I would suggest to the minister that no subsidy parliament would offer would be sufficient to procure that service at the present time, and the contract if ratified may necessitate the construction of steamers at the government's expense for the purpose of carrying it out.

With regard to the subsidiary service between Kingston, Jamaica, and British Honduras, it is only a ship of 1,000 tons with a speed of ten knots and accommodation for twenty first-class passengers, but I do not think any sane man would suggest that that service could be supplied without a subsidy, I know something of conditions in that country and I do not believe any sane steamship man is going to tender for that service, even though it is only a small service of 1,000 tons, without a considerable subsidy. Therefore we are in this position: we are asked to pass a bill ratifying an agreement, and under clause 6 of the bill the Governor in Council may make such orders and regulations as are deemed necessary to carry out the provisions and intent of the agreement. Am I right in inferring that clause 6 empowers the Governor in Council, without any further enactment by parliament, to subsidize these steamships or, if a subsidy will not procure the service, to build ships at an expense of, say $5,000,000, a reasonable amount for one service, or $10,000,000 for two services? Does that mean that the Governor in Council is now taking authority to make all the financial arrangements for carrying out the provisions of this legislation and the said agreement? The legislation is broad enough, and I suggest that it should not be passed by the committee until we have some clear idea of the capital cost and also of the annual expenditure. I would ask the minister, having had the information which is available to him: what is the capital cost of constructing ships with an adequate capacity and giving a quality of service such as is demanded under this agreement for the two main services and the subsidiary service to British Honduras?

Mr. ROBB: As I have already intimated, the promised increased trade is such that we hope the subsidy required will be much less than we at first anticipated. I do not want to repeat, because I imagine my hon. friend was following me. I have already told him that the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company are carrying on a monthly service without any subsidy; that another company are prepared to put on a line of steamers plying direct to Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Which service is that?

Mr. ROBB: That will be on the western service. A line of steamers is already plying between the British West Indies and the Pacific coast of Canada. We think the better way is to ratify the agreement in the hope that the promised increase trade will encourage shippers to go on that route with very little subsidy. I admit at once that it may be necessary, in order to meet the wishes of the different smaller islands, to subsidize a certain service to connect with some of these trunk lines for trans-shipment in the islands, but we are not going to ask parliament at this session to vote any more money than we have been voting for a number of years. Under this agreement, if it goes through, as regards subsidy and the promised steamship service Canada will be in no worse position than we were in under the arrangement of 1920. We shall be in this much better position, that owing to the reduction of Canadian tariffs and the tariffs of the West Indies, there will be a larger flow of trade to and from the West India islands.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister has not been entirely frank with me. He has not met the clear objection that those services which are entirely independent of the government, which refuse any subsidy from the government, which refuse to come under the control or direction of the government, will be directly competing with the service which he is engaging to subsidize.

Mr. ROBB: If we get the transportation between Canada and the West India islands without subsidy, does the hon. member imagine that the West India islands, who are a party to this agreement and who under it will be compelled to pay for certain services, will subsidize another line? All they want is transportation to get the business.

Mr. CAHAN: But the minister knows that neither of the services projected are of the character, class and quality demanded by this agreement. He knows full well that this agreement will not be complied with by any of the services projected by any of these independent parties. He knows that this very competition necessitates a larger subsidy from the federal treasury in order to induce another competing line under the direction of and subsidized by the government to supply a service of the character, class and quality demanded by this agreement. The governments of the West India islands are not to be put off simply because some independent company comes in and supplies a second or third-rate service which does not comply with the terms of the agreement and does not fulfil the obligations that the government and parliament of Canada are undertaking in this legislation.

We are already making reductions in the tariff in favour of the West Indies, but the minister is very optimistic when he assumes that the increase of trade under those reductions is going to be so enormous as to supply two or three competing services. I know we had the figures in regard to the trade supplied by the minister, but anyone who knows the British West India islands knows that there is only so much trade and that even under these reductions that trade is not going to increase very largely in volume. I would ask the minister again: Will he give us some estimate of the cost to the government of building the ships necessary to carry out these two main services and the subsidiary one to British Honduras in case it becomes necessary for the government to build ships and to put them into those services? It is utterly useless to say that we are no worse off than under the 1920 agreement. The minister knows that we could not carry out that agreement; he knows that both the former government and his own found it impossible to do so. It was impossible to supply ships of the quality, character and class demanded by that agreement. Why therefore put our necks in the noose again before we find out whether we are now in a position to live up to the agreement, and what the capital cost will be if we build ships of our own—ships which in any case will undoubtedly run at a heavy loss—or in the event of our having to subsidize other steamship companies to assume the service. We ought to have clear information on these points.

Mr. MacLAREN: An important part of the West India agreement is the provision that there shall be a steamship service of certain specifications. The ships shall be of a stated size and speed, with a specified amount of cold storage facilities. That is an important condition in the treaty. I understand from the minister that it is proposed to supply the service in part through the old steamship company which previously operated.

Mr. ROBB: Not necessarily. I said they were carrying on the service now.

Mr. MacLAREN: That part of the service will be performed by the old line, and in addition to that the Canadian merchant marine will operate between this country and the West Indies. Now it has always been considered of high importance that the steamship service shall consist of larger and speedier boats, properly equipped with cold storage. Is that true of the Canadian merchant marine? I understand that these boats are not up to the requirements in speed, size or accommodation. If this service is to be performed in part by the Canadian merchant marine will these boats meet the requirements called for in the treaty? The minister might inform us on that point.

This question occurs to me: Will the West Indies be satisfied with the service which the minister has suggested to be carried out by the Canadian merchant marine? The committee would like to hear what the minister has to say in this regard. But whether the West Indies are satisfied or not, I am afraid that we shall not get the improved service which we counted upon and which is essential if we are to develop a proper trade. I have been looking through the bill, but I have not been able to find the section in reference to the option of calling at United States ports. I understand there is a section making it optional for ships to call at United States ports either coming or going. While this may not affect the general principle of a preference being given to freight coming to Canada, it is nevertheless very objectionable, in that it interferes with the policy, which is supposed to have been kept in view, of furthering the development of trade through Canadian ports. There is a possibility that in view of this option, United States ports may be made use of. I know that representations have been made to the minister from different boards of trade protesting against this clause, and we shall be glad to hear what he has to say, if he still adheres to the provision making the use of American ports permissive.

Mr. ROBB: When we invited tenders we put in this provision:

> In addition to the calls specified above, tenders may be submitted for either or both services or any part thereof including calls at one port in the United States in either or both directions.

That was inserted with the idea that possibly we might secure a somewhat lower bid, while steamers would be able to stop at one of the United States ports and pick up passengers. The tenders received were not accepted by the government, and there is no provision in this bill for calls at United States ports.

Mr. MacLAREN: The tenders are based on this bill.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but in the bill itself there is no reference to United States ports. My hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) has stressed the importance of submitting to parliament an estimate of what the service is going to cost. The tenders to which I have referred were called for in order that the government might know approximately what the service would cost, and I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that it is not in the public interest to advertise what those tenders were which the government deemed too high. We shall have fifteen months in which to determine what service can be provided and whether or not it will be mutually satisfactory to Canada and the West Indies. If any vote is needed for the subsidy we shall be obliged to come to parliament, and parliament will have the power either to reject or to accept any such vote. My hon. friend (Mr. MacLaren) points out that boards of trade have protested against any calling at United States ports. As I have already indicated, we are not pressing that provision. It was included in the tenders only for the sake of obtaining information. Certain boards of trade protested against some aspects of the agreement, but there are other boards of trade that have strongly urged us to put the matter through. Before I sit down let me quote a couple of communications under my hand. The first is from the Toronto Board of Trade and is dated March 20, 1926:

At a meeting of the executive of this board held yesterday the new trade agreement between Canada and the West Indies was discussed. It was the unanimous opinion of the committee that it was of the utmost importance that as all of the islands interested had approved of the agreement, it should be ratified by the parliament of Canada with the least possible delay. It was particularly gratifying to learn from the press last evening that you had brought the matter forward in the House yesterday, and that the recommendation of the government, through the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, that the parliamen ratify the agreement, was so favourably received by both sides of the House. This action is most commendable and we sincerely trust that no time will be lost in completing whatever further procedure is necessary to ratify the agreement and advise the various West India islands accordingly, so they may be assured of the sincere desire of the Dominion of Canada to co-operate with them in getting the best possible results in our mutual interests from the operation of the agreement.

The communication is signed by Mr. Wilson, the president. I have also a letter from the Montreal Board of Trade directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on June 16, 1925:

Steamship communication. Satisfactory and successful steamship services are dependent on favourable tariff arrangements and resultant increased business; our recommendations therefore in regard to the steamship communication should be consideraed accordingly.

Now we have by reduction of our tariff encouraged more business with the West Indies, and the West Indies have encouraged more business from Canada. That is why to-day the steamship companies are coming to the government and saying, We are prepared to put on this service as soon as the agreement is ratified. I think the government might well be trusted to find out how far these steamship companies will go in providing a service to the extent that will meet with the approval of the different West India islands. I repeat, before going into the additional expenditure the government must come to parliament, and we have fifteen months to do it.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it not a fact that by ratifying this agreement not only are the government and parliament bound, but the honour of the country is irrevocably bound to carry out its terms.

Mr. ROBB: No more than we were bound in 1920.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not talking of the breach of faith in 1920, which was complained of so much and gave rise to a great deal of discussion. We do not want another breach of faith. If parliament is bound by this agreement, it will not be bound any more than when that breach was made; but now, knowing that the government of Canada declared it was impossible to carry out the terms of that agreement, knowing that that is what caused the breach of faith on the part of the Canadian government and the Canadian people, we should know exactly what we are doing now. We are pledging the honour of parliament to carry out the terms of this agreement to the full. The government cannot complain that they entered into the agreement with lack of knowledge; they have had ample opportunity and had their eyes opened by the previous breach of faith on the part of this country—a breach of faith for which I am not blaming the hon. gentleman. Therefore we should consider that fact now when we are pledging ourselves to carry out this agreement. What good is it to say that within twelve months, that is, within another session, the government will come down to the House, and parliament may then be called upon to vote the necessary supplies to carry out the agreement, say $10,000,000 on capital account and $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 to provide for the annual deficit? Parliament next session is in honour bound to ratify whatever sum the hon. gentleman may ask for to carry out the agreement, because to-day we have pledged our faith to carry it out to the full. The hon. gentleman says, But let us wait for a year or fifteen months; we have not to put on the new steamers before that time. Well and good. Will he suggest that the Royal Mail Company or the other independent steamship company have announced that without any subsidy from the government they are entering upon the freight and passenger business for one service or the two and a half services—because it is a sort of two main services and one subsidiary? He knows that neither the Royal Mail nor the other company to which he referred has the slightest intention of placing in the service steamships of the character, class and quality required under this agreement, and he knows just as well as he sits in his seat to-night that the British West Indies, after having been fooled once and having received formal encouragement as to the class and character of this service, will not be satisfied with the inferior service which these independent companies propose.

The hon. gentleman says he has received two tenders both of which he has rejected. Did he receive tenders for the two main services and for the subsidiary service? I do not know; he knows, but he has never told us. The general impression of the public is that no tenders were received whatever for one of the main services, or if it was received that the cost was so appalling there was no prospect of the government accepting it. Now the hon. gentleman can tell us at once if he received any tenders for the two main services. Did he receive a tender for the subsidiary service from Jamaica to Honduras? If so, now that those tenders have been rejected, why should we not know in round figures what was the aggregate of the tenders received? That will give parliament some idea of the financial obligations which we are undertaking and of the amount we will be called upon to vote at the next session of parliament in order to implement this statutory pledge and demonstrate the good faith of Canada towards the British West India governments.

Mr. MALCOLM: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to answer for the minister as to the cost of the service, but it seems to me that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is simply putting up a bogey man to be knocked down. As a member of the committee which negotiated with the representatives of the West Indies, I found no feeling of such a terrible breach of faith as he speaks of on the part of the Canadian government in not supplying the full service under the 1920 agreement. Hon. gentlemen who came from the West Indies deplored of course that the service was not quite what had been hoped for, but they did not charge the Canadian government at all with any breach of faith. They pointed out that by the negotiations of past governments trade had been increased. Our imports from the West Indies have grown from $9,000,000 in 1913 to $24,000,000 in 1921, and our exports have increased from $5,000,000 to $18,000,000 under the service that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George claims was so inadequate. They did point out to us that they wanted a somewhat better service. We all realized that it is difficult to obtain boats of a suitable class for that particular service. Only boats of eighteen-foot draft can be used on account of the bar that has to be crossed at Demarara, and such boats are not easy to secure. But I think the House should view the matter in a very broad sense. Practically every business man who has seen our trade increase with the West Indies between 1913 and 1921, and realizes that the total trade of the West Indies with other countries is $90,000,000, feels that is will be easy to develop our trade to the $30,000,000 mark. It is easy to imagine 100 per cent increase. Supposing by a diversion of the trade bananas are brought in through Canadian ports, supposing we do double our trade with the West Indies, I think the minister is perfectly justified in asking parliament to trust him. He has knowledge which he has not revealed to me, and which I think it would be unfair to ask him to reveal to the House, and although I cannot speak authoritatively for him, I believe from what I know of the negotiations there is every reason to expect that the increased volume of business with the West Indies will decrease the cost of the subsidies.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George speaks of national honour. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, there is going to be any loss of national honour whatsoever under this agreement. I believe it is going to be possible to provide the service required, for the reason that the trade will be there to justify it. We have been endeavouring for some years to divert Canadian money to the British West Indies as a winter resort. A good deal of Canadian money goes to Florida and California, but the West Indies contain delightful spots in which to spend the winter months, as we all know. If anything like a reasonably good passenger service is provided there is every reason to hope that there will be many more Canadians travel to the West Indies than go at present. Speaking calmly, as a member of the committee, I have every reason to assure the House that, from my knowledge of the negotiations, the members of the West India delegation hold no grievance against either the late government or this government because of the service of 1920. We did the best we could; the service was not what it should have been but, Mr. Chairman, I think every member of the House will admit that the trade did increase enormously even with the service we gave. With the advantages of trade which have been given by both sides it is surely reasonable to suppose the trade will increase, and that because of the increase the Minister of Finance will have no difficulty whatever in supplying the service provided for under this contract.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I wish to say a few words in support of the position taken by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), whose remarks were referred to by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) as a bogey. If the hon. member will carefully read this agreement into which we are now asked to enter he can come to no other conclusion than that it is a most serious and vital question with which to deal. If he will read clause 9 referred to by the hon. member for St.

Lawrence-St. George he will see why members of this House should take great care as to the way in which this treaty is accepted.

This treaty demands that we establish a fortnightly passenger and mail service from Canadian ocean ports all year, calling at certain ports in the West Indies. Then paragraph 2 says the vessels shall be of from 5,000 to 6,000 gross tons, capable of maintaining a speed of not less than twelve knots per hour and providing accommodation for one hundred first class, thirty second class, and one hundred steerage or deck passengers. Does the hon. member for North Bruce think that is an easy thing to agree to? Does he think this government would be wise to undertake to build such vessels?

Mr. MALCOLM: We do not have to build them.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): This is the agreement.

Mr. MALCOLM: We have to provide them.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): That is true, but if we enter into a definite agreement with the West Indies we must carry it out.

Mr. MALCOLM: We will carry it out.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): In addition to all that in paragraph 3 it says:

> In addition to the foregoing the government of Canada will provide a fortnightly freight service with vessels of 4,300 tons or thereabouts dead weight, and a speed of about ten knots, from Canadian river ports in summer and from Canadian ocean ports in winter—

Calling at a number of places. Then article XIII goes on in the same way. There is apparently no end to the promises made by this government in this connection. If we are going to carry out these promises we must expect to spend an enormous sum of money, and the member for St. Lawrence-St. George has merely asked the Finance minister to give us a reasonable estimate of the amount of money which will be expended. If he does not care to do so surely it is a wise thing to ask him to place on record the amount of money asked by those who have tendered for this service? I certainly support the hon. member in his request.

Mr. MALCOLM: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? If he were Minister of Finance and received some tenders would he like to give in advance to those tendering an idea of what he expected to pay?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The minister has asked for and received certain tenders. Is it unfair or unreasonable to ask that the members of this House as well as the Minister of Finance should have access to those tenders?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is very unfair.

Mr. CAHAN: Should we not know the amount, without knowing who the tenderers are?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): We should know the amount, and we would then have some idea of the cost of this treaty.

Mr. STEVENS: There seems to be a fair approach to unanimity of opinion as to the desirability of developing this trade. Speaking for myself I heartily approve of any reasonable effort to stimulate trade between Canada and the West Indies. This particular treaty is one of the things I have urged in the House for many years as a desirable step in our trade development. The minister will also recall that I often pleaded with him for the development of trade with other sections of the empire, and I hope he will find it possible to take those matters up now. There is, of course, some apprehension in the minds of some who have spoken with regard to the cost, and I have no hesitancy in saying that so far as it is reasonable the minister should, and I am sure will, be desirous of satisfying that anxiety or curiosity. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has asked the minister to uncover the tenders he received, and I confess that I see some difficulty facing the minister in so doing. I think we should assist the minister as much as we can in this regard, and if the minister were to uncover these tenders here—which would mean to everyone—

Mr. CAHAN: Will you allow me to interrupt? I did not ask that; I asked for a general statement of the aggregate cost, based upon these tenders.

Mr. STEVENS: I think what my hon. friend asks is not unreasonable, but I am now arguing rather from the minister's point of view. I can see a difficulty, and I think perhaps there is a way out. It would be unfair to ask the minister to uncover these tenders, because the ultimate result would be to prejudice his efforts to bargain for better terms from other sources, or even from the same sources. If it were possible to satisfy the demand of my hon. friend as to the round figures without uncovering these tenders, that I think might be conceded. I was sitting here thinking the matter over pretty carefully, not only to-day, but I have thought this agreement over pretty carefully for some months, and I was going to suggest to the minister that he might as the Minister of Finance and on his responsibility as a minister give to the House some general assurance in the matter. I realize that it is difficult for him to pledge himself definitely to any maximum figure. It is very hard to ask a government to tie its hands to any fixed amount; that may be difficult. On the other hand, I think the House is entitled to some assurance from the government to which parliament could hold the government afterwards. In other words, the government ought to take some responsibility, and the minister, I know from his past record and from my acquaintance with him, has never hesitated to take responsibilty where he felt he could properly do so. I gather from his words that he might be able to give to the House an assurance that would meet fairly all the demands and still leave himself free to carry on negotiations with these various interests that he must approach and deal with in order to give full effect to the treaty.

I would like to say this, Mr. Chairman, for my own part. This treaty is of very, very great interest to the western section of Canada. To the eastern section we know that it is important. We have developed in the last six years a trade running from about $5,000,000 to $17,000,000, and in one year it ran to $22,000,000, which is quite an important factor. But there has been very little development of trade from the Pacific coast largely because during all the years of the war there was no traffic through the canal at all through lack of tonnage, and subsequent to the war, up to three or four years ago, the value of tonnage was so high as to make it unprofitable. But if I am not mistaken, from correspondence I have had recently, the minister is assured of some service from the Pacific coast. If we get that service I can say this from my knowledge of the trade, that it will open up an opportunity for a great expansion of trade from the western section of Canada which I hope in time will parallel the development from the eastern section. All of this is of value, something that I think we ought to strive to secure.

So my general feeling towards the treaty is one of encouragement and support, and I would again suggest to the minister—I do not do it in any spirit of criticism or obstruction—that perhaps he could give to us some measure of assurance as to the limitation—shall I say?

[Mr. Stevens.]

—of the cost of these services. I think if we could receive that, there might be fair unanimity of opinion regarding the advisability of the passage of the agreement.

Mr. ROBB: That looks like a fair compromise.

Mr. CANTLEY: If I did not misunderstand the minister when this matter was up before, he made some objection then to giving to the House the figures as to the cost of the service until the tenders were opened, and until he had reached some decision in regard to the matter. I take it that he has reached a decision, and I do not quite see how his hands are going to be tied or he is going to be hurt very much if, having made up his mind that the tenders were too high and that he is not going to accept them, he should tell the House the figure that he will not accept. Giving the figure would only intimate to the people who are likely to tender for the service that the service cannot be entertained at that price.

In regard to another point, I understood the minister to say that he had fifteen months in which to negotiate and make up his mind. I do not so understand it. As I read the contract, the government have fifteen months after ratification in which to provide the steamship service. I assume that we will ratify the agreement now. But the boats have to be provided, and if we are going to keep faith with the West Indies, the boats must be in active service within fifteen months. The minister and everybody else in the House knows that you cannot take eight or ten boats of this character down off a shelf. It is going to take months, the large portion of a year, to build those ships. The ships are of a character not to be picked up. They are of shallow draft, of a certain size and a certain speed. Contracts have to be made with shipowners who are prepared to go into the market and contract for the ships, and then they must have them built and in service within fifteen months to comply with the terms of the agreement.

I am rather surprised that the hon. member for North Bruce should inform the committee that there was no great feeling in the West Indies in regard to the character of the service we have had in the last few years. My information, and from what I have seen of the West Indies and of West India people up in the Maritime provinces, is quite the contrary. We ourselves, as a matter of fact, were ashamed of the service. That is the real fact, and any Canadian who has travelled on those boats should have been ashamed of the service. They were four old discarded boats that the Royal Mail Company was running down to South America fifteen years ago. They were dirty. We shall never get any great volume of West India tourist traffic with boats of that character. Are we going to break faith with the people of the West Indies again?

I take it that it is not honourable on the part of this country to enter into a contract such as this, and with our tongue in our cheeks say: We have fifteen months to decide, and then we will see whether we will put on this service or not. If we are going to ratify the treaty, let us do it in good faith; let us carry out our obligations. If we do not intend to face the cost, let us say so now; let us tell our cousins in the West Indies that we are not prepared to meet the cost. But for the Lord's sake do not now sign another contract with no intention of carrying it out. I was hopeful that we would have a large tourist trade from this country to the West Indies. The senior member for Halifax is not at all sanguine in regard to the outcome of the treaty. He ought to know better than I do, but I know this, that without first-class boats it is impossible, and to keep on the route boats of the character we have had is simply impossible, a disgrace to this country, and an insult to the people with whom we have made the contract.

Mr. ROBB: As I was proceeding to say in answer to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, there might be a possibility of compromise if we were to make a commitment on behalf of the government that we would enter into no additional subsidy without the approval of parliament, that any contract we make will be subject to the approval of parliament. We will ask parliament this year for the usual vote of $340,000, but we may vary the wording of the vote—I have not looked at it lately—so that we shall not be confined to one company.

Answering further my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre, I had a letter from a firm in Vancouver advising me that they were putting on this service, but unfortunately the letter has been mislaid and I have not got it here to-night, but as I recall the letter, the following statement which appeared in a western newspaper is correct:

> Bright trade prospects in the Caribbean, resulting from the consummation of a treaty between Canada and the West Indies, have induced the Canadian Transport Co. Ltd., to establish a direct steamship service, between Vancouver and other Pacific coast ports to Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, and other ports in the islands, as inducement offers.
> The service, to be known as the Vancouver-West Indies Line, was inaugurated on April 23 with the departure of the S.S. August from Vancouver, the next sailing to be in June, the company announces. Present plans call for a sailing every six weeks or as often as the volume of cargo offering demands.
> Agents for this company at Port-of-Spain will be Messrs. Furness, Withy and Co. Ltd.

I repeat that we will not enter into any obligation or any commitment. It will be made subject to the approval of parliament. I agree with all my hon. friend from Pictou has said, and I know that the service was not satisfactory. That is why we did not accept the tender at one time to increase the cost of this service from these people. But it is fair to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company to say that they have carried on that service for some time at the request of the Dominion government. They were ready to quit. They were not satisfied with the service. But as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Bruce a moment ago, the increased trade has induced other companies to come along, and the government believe we will be able to obtain service at a lower cost than previously estimated. But my hon. friend is wrong in one thing. I hope I did not say that we have fifteen months to decide; I said that we had fifteen months to provide the service. The hon. member from Vancouver Centre has taken proper ground: if we give the figures now it is an invitation to other tenderers to come up nearer to them. I think it is better in the interest of Canada that these figures should be left in the department. If necessary we will invite other tenders and consult our friends of the West India islands, who were a party to this agreement and who must provide a percentage of the subsidy. If the increased trade will encourage the shipping firms to put on a service that will be satisfactory to Canada and the West India islands, why should we pay a large subsidy to others to compete with them?

Mr. CANTLEY: I certainly understood the minister to say—and I think he did say it, but I accept his explanation—that the House had fifteen months to decide. I understand he thinks differently now. The point so far as the Royal Mail is concerned is that the boats will not meet the expectations of our people or the people in the West Indies.

Mr. ROBB: We admit that.

Mr. CANTLEY: So that the talk about those boats is to my mind out of the question. Now to provide a service of boats of the class asked for, 5,000 to 6,000 tons, with a speed of 12 to 14 knots, is going to run into a lot of money. It will have to be a special class of boat.

Mr. ROBB: How much will the cost be?

Mr. CANTLEY: Eight or ten millions. I hope we will get them. I would like to see the service inaugurated, but it will not be inaugurated except at a much greater cost than the minister has in mind.

Mr. CAHAN: A capital expenditure of ten million dollars at the least.

Mr. MALCOLM: The hon. member for Pictou misunderstood me. I did not say the people of the West Indies were not complaining about the West India service. I said the delegation which came here did not consider the lack of service as a breach of honour. They realized that the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company were doing the best they could. They were willing to keep on the service year by year at the request of the government, and they realized that something had to be done to justify a better service. But after negotiations were over they left with the feeling that the volume of trade between the West Indies and Canada, with the concessions offered to Canada by the West Indies and the concessions offered to the West Indies by Canada, would justify the establishment of a better service. I was pointing out that the stand taken by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, that we were being accused of a breach of faith, was hardly justified. It was admitted that while the boats were not good they were as good as could be expected for the volume of trade offered.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not say the commissioners who were here in their negotiations with the government openly stated that there had been a breach of faith with regard to the 1920 agreement. They were here to negotiate; they were met by commissioners who told them it was practically impossible for the government to carry out the 1920 agreement, and they accepted that statement. They then sat down and negotiated this arrangement, the assumption being—and I think the hon. member who has just spoken will admit it—that this was an agreement that would and could be carried out by the government in good faith, if approved by the Canadian parliament. I was referring to the West Indian people. I know the West Indies; I have been there time and again. I see their journals, and I know that throughout the West Indies, in the public press, the suggestion has been made that there had been a breach of faith on the part of the Canadian government in respect to the 1920 agreement. I was not referring to the officials who were negotiating. Here we are ratifying the agreement, and its ratification, we undertake to provide, either by subsidy, by purchase or by construction, the ships required to perform this service. When we do that we are bound in honour to carry it out, because we have entered into it with our eyes open. It is not a proper reply to the House to say that the capital expenditure of $10,000,000 required to build those ships or to purchase them will be provided for in a measure which may be accepted or rejected by the House. If the minister comes down next year with a provision for a capital expenditure of $10,000,000 for that purpose and tells us that that is the only practical way in which we can carry out the agreement, we cannot refuse him the money. We have already voted, or we are bound in honour to vote at a subsequent session of parliament, the entire amount required; if the minister says it is necessary to construct these ships at a cost of $10,000,000 we are bound to vote that amount. We may criticize him a bit, but, so far as parliament and the public and the government of the West Indies are concerned, we are bound to vote the money. We should not commit ourselves without having a reasonable idea as to what the cost is going to be.

With reference to making tariff concessions to the West Indies and receiving certain concessions in return therefor, this treaty agreement has general approval, but the whole country is looking to ascertain what the cost will be, the ancillary cost, the additional cost of providing this steamship service. The Minister of Finance read some resolutions passed by the Montreal Board of Trade last year. I think there have been some subsequent communications from the Montreal Board of Trade dealing with the matter, in which they said they are anxious to trade with the West Indies, that they were hoping for an increase of trade with them, but that they wanted to know what the capital and the annual cost of securing that trade was going to be. In the Maritime provinces we have a number of men who are not Liberals nor Conservatives, not confined to one party or the other, who are engaged in the West India trade. They understand that trade, and if you talk to any one of them he will tell you that this proposition should be accepted or rejected according to the cost of this steamship service which the government is bound to carry out. The whole issue before parliament and the country as to whether the treaty should be ratified or not depends upon the cost of carrying out the treaty after it is ratified. I fully realize, as every hon. member must, that once the treaty is ratified we are committed to the entire cost.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend seems to be well posted in discussing costs. How does he arrive at this figure of $10,000,000 that he is repeatedly quoting?

Mr. CAHAN: I have asked different competent men as to what the cost would be of providing a steamship service. In Montreal there are a dozen men who can look at the specification of the service and tell you within a few dollars at least the cost per tonnage of the ships to supply that service. If you ask any of them they will tell you that if you cannot get the ships by a reasonable subsidy, it will cost about $10,000,000 in capital expenditure.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is to build a completely new fleet?

Mr. CAHAN: To build ships to carry passengers to perform the service in addition to supplying by other means a large part of the freight service. There are many men who understand the shipping business who doubt very much whether you can get ships for both of those services by means of a subsidy.

Mr. ROBB: How much subsidy?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know; I am not in a position to say. The hon. gentleman knows, and that is the information I am asking him to give the committee. My information is—and he has not told me whether it is correct or not—that he could not get a tender for one of the services for any subsidy whatever. Is that right or not?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is right as regards one company. I am satisfied now that he is fairly well posted.

Mr. CAHAN: All I can say is that I have not been in communication directly or indirectly with any company that has tendered, but there are a large number of people interested who know generally the facts. If it is true that no company of British steamship men could be found to make a tender to carry out the more expensive service—

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): My hon. friend is misinterpreting the remarks of my colleague. The minister said that one company would not tender for both services, but there was a tender for both services.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not understand him so. I would like to have that statement from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ROBB: There was a tender for both services.

Mr. CAHAN: I will take back the statement. I know now, and the committee knows, but was it not really the government subsidiary company, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, that tendered for both services? Was it a private and independent company that tendered? Let us be fair to the committee in this matter. My information from competent shipping men is that no independent company—that was the term I used or intended to use—tendered for one of those services. It is true the government has a tender from the Canadian merchant marine, but that tender implied that at the cost of the government the ships would be built or purchased to carry out that service. Let us have the facts fairly. If one of those tenders was from the government's own service, a branch of the government—because the Canadian government merchant marine is simply a branch and under the control of the government in every way—they must have before them the actual facts of the cost of building the ships to carry out that service. Why not tell us? The government are not making a breach of faith with some independent concern.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Why does the hon. member want to know?

Mr. CAHAN: Because to-day we are being asked to commit ourselves to the entire expense necessary to provide the ships; we are being asked to-day to pledge parliament to provide subsidies necessary to carry out the other service if it is carried out by subsidy. We are now undertaking, without any adequate knowledge of the cost, to provide the money when the money bills are brought down to provide for these services over a term of years. What is the position of hon. members? It is a matter of utter indifference to hon. members from the west; it does not mean one dollar to Saskatchewan.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Saskatchewan is a part of the Dominion of Canada as much as any other province.

Mr. CAHAN: It does not mean a dollar to the trade of Saskatchewan.

Mr. McPHEE: Does the hon. member want to get into a quarrel with us?

Mr. CAHAN: No.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Let us express our own opinions and the hon. member can express his.

Mr. CAHAN: I am saying that this service does not mean one dollar of additional value to any of the products of Saskatchewan at the present time.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): We believe Saskatchewan is a part of Canada and anything that helps any part of Canada indirectly helps Saskatchewan. We have never taken any narrow, selfish view and we do not like to have a narrow, selfish view placed in our mouths by the hon. member.

Mr. CAHAN: I commend the spirit of the hon. member. The position is this, that this is a service which is voted particularly for the benefit of the eastern provinces.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Not at all.

Mr. MALCOLM: Does the hon. member realize that the preference on butter and flour is vital to Saskatchewan?

Mr. CAHAN: I venture to say that not one hundred pounds of Saskatchewan butter will go over those lines to the West Indies.

Mr. MALCOLM: Why should so much Saskatchewan butter be exported to Great Britain?

Mr. CAHAN: I am prepared to discuss the matter of butter with my hon. friend, because I know something about it. This is being promoted for the advantage of the trade of the eastern provinces, and if it is going to cost as large an amount as may be reasonably anticipated for one of those services, there is a great deal of hesitation on the part of members from the eastern section of Canada to give it support.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Suppose it cost $8,000,000 to provide the service and a subsidy was required commensurate with that investment, would it be too much to pay for the service?

Mr. CAHAN: I would think it would be the most ridiculous thing in the world to vote it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am speaking not of the investment itself, but of the subsidy that would be required. We are paying now $340,000. It would not entail a very much greater expenditure if we went even to the extent of paying one-half the interest on the cost.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. CAHAN: There are two alternatives. If you provide capital expenditure necessary for these services you have an investment of $10,000,000 which will not return one dollar in income.

Mr. MALCOLM: Why?

Mr. CAHAN: Because it cannot earn one-half of the amount required as interest upon capital.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): How do you know?

Mr. CAHAN: I know from conversations I have had with people who do know, and I am putting it forward as an intelligent opinion. I am asking the hon. gentleman as a member of the government to give us facts to the contrary. We want to know. We are not going to vote in support of this blindly, without knowing just what the facts are. We are not going to vote in favour of a capital expenditure of $10,000,000 and an annual deficit of a million and a half. The government comes to the House to-night and asks parliament to sanction an annual loss of a million and a half, and it has not the facts to furnish in support of its position. The minister cannot produce one fact in contradiction of what I say. But he hopes to bluff the House into committing itself now to this huge capital expenditure and this considerable annual deficit. We are entitled to have some definite assurance that this capital expenditure to which we are now asked to pledge ourselves will be fairly compensated by a prospective increase in the trade.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): My hon. friend is either in favour of the treaty or he is not; and notwithstanding all his casuistry in discussing the subject I gather that he is not in favour of it. If he is not, then why does he not say so frankly, instead of evading the issue and suggesting all sorts of difficulties that do not occur to the mind of any other hon. gentleman? What is the situation? Here is a considerable portion of the British Empire which has been trading with the United States, and which now desires to do business with this country. Both the Mother Country and other parts of the empire are anxious to have all British tropical products sold here, marketed in Canada directly instead of through the United States as at prseent. The hon. gentleman comes forward now and declares that while a great number of people are in favour of the treaty he and other hon. gentlemen opposite want to know what were the tenders that were submitted to the government in connection with the steamship service. He has had conversations with a lot of imaginary people who have told him what the construction of these vessels would cost. Now the government called for tenders and in the case of one service the subsidy was so surprisingly low that I am satisfied the House would accept it without question. In regard to the other service there was only one tender and for an amount which the country need not be afraid of for a moment. My hon. friend pictures a situation in which the government will spend $10,000,000 to provide the necessary service to carry this inter-empire trade, wherein we shall be able to supply from our products such things as the West Indies require and which at the present time they secure from the United States, giving them in return certain favoured treatment. Does any hon. gentleman think that any sound business man would consider it wise for the government to disclose the details of the tenders which have been received? Surely the government would be ill-advised if they did anything of the kind. All these fears which the hon. gentleman has expressed to-night are conjured up purely in his own fancy. The proposition before the House is quite simple: either we want to trade with this portion of the empire, or we do not. If hon. gentlemen are not in favour of the treaty, let them say so. We have no desire to impose any onerous burden on the country for the purpose of providing proper steamships, and there is no ground for the fears of hon. gentlemen. We believe that we can secure tenders from people who are prepared to furnish steamers of the right type for a reasonable subsidy and we ask the House to confirm the treaty.

Mr. CANTLEY: The government has already asked for tenders and has received some which are deemed unsatisfactory. The minister asks what the cost of the fleet will be. May I ask him in turn how many steamers he thinks it will require to maintain the service? Will it be eight or ten?

Mr. ROBB: You will find that in the agreement.

Mr. CANTLEY: I do not find the number of boats mentioned in the agreement; I find merely a reference to a fortnightly service. How many boats will maintain the service adequately? That, I submit, is a fair question.

Mr. ROBB: Three or four on the eastern service and two passenger and four freight boats on the western.

Mr. CANTLEY: The two small 1,000 ton boats can be picked up easily, but the others are not in existence to-day and they will have to be provided. Whether the government themselves will provide these boats or whether they will be built by private capital is not very material to the case except that in one case the country will be committed to a further expenditure in connection with steamship property. And that I do not believe any of us want. There are three items that must be met; (1) insurance; (2) depreciation, and (3) interest on cost. Taking the second first: depreciation on such a fleet would be at least 5 per cent, which would write off the cost of the vessels in twenty years. Less than this would not suffice. Then insurance would run to between 5 and 10 per cent. Suppose we put it at 5 per cent—and it certainly will cost more than that. It may be observed in passing that one of the boats which the company had while in the service became a total loss, so that the insurance is low and is bound to be a considerable item. The least that you could expect shipping people to look for on their investment would be 5 per cent by way of interest. Here, therefore, you have three items of 5 per cent each—all low estimates—or a total of 15 per cent. The minister wants to know what the fleet will cost. I do not know, but I am certain it will cost $6,500,000 and probably $10,000,000. But assuming the capital cost to be $6,500,000—

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): The cost varies according to where the ships are built.

Mr. CANTLEY: Not a great deal.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Yes.

Mr. CANTLEY: I do not care where you build them. They may be built a trifle cheaper in Germany, but there would not be very much difference in the cost. I am satisfied there would not be a difference of 10 per cent. Now, the mercantile marine have no boats of their own to put on this service, and if that organization is to take up the service they must therefore go into the market and acquire boats either by purchase or by long term time charter. If therefore we put the cost at $6,500,000 it means that in respect of the three items I have mentioned, insurance, depreciation and interest at 5 per cent each, we shall have an annual charge of something like $1,000,000. And, as I say, these items are all too low. You could not, for example, induce capital to invest in that class of shipping on 5 per cent, nor would you be able to get insurance at that rate. These items will therefore exceed a million annually. I do not believe the freight and other revenue, in the first few years at all events, would be sufficient to meet the cost of operation. It is difficult to see how the minister is going to get tenders for a service of this kind at a yearly cost of less than $1,000,000. If he does, he is to be congratulated.

The Minister of National Defence wants to know if we on this side of the House are in favour of the treaty or against it. I am in favour of it, but before committing himself every reasonable and intelligent man wants to know what it will cost. That is all we ask of the government.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend appears to be a shipping man who is well posted. I suppose he would be willing to admit that the subsidy paid should be in proportion to that trade we are doing with the West Indies? Would that be a fair proposition?

Mr. CANTLEY: I presume you will have to pay a subsidy to provide the ships for the service.

Mr. ROBB: But suppose we pay a subsidy in proportion to the amount of trade, would that be a fair way of measuring it?

Mr. CANTLEY: I suppose it would. You may pay too much.

Mr. ROBB: In 1900 we paid a subsidy to the firm of Pickford & Black—I suppose my hon. friend knows that firm?

Mr. CANTLEY: It is a very good firm.

Mr. ROBB: For one service we paid that firm £27,000, or in round figures not quite $135,000. At that time the total business with the West India islands was less than two and a half million dollars. In 1925 our total business with them was $25,000,000. Now if $135,000 was cheap in 1900 with a trade of two and a half million dollars, my hon. friend's estimate of a million dollars is not too far out. It will not cost that.

Mr. CANTLEY: It is not the same kind of service, and conditions are not similar to what they were in 1900. I am not saying a million dollars is too great; all I want to find out is what the service is going to cost. I have made an estimate; the minister makes none. He comes back at me and asks what the ships will cost. I ask him how many will be required for the service. He says he does not know, at least he would not care to decide. I say the cost of the vessels to meet that service will be between $6,500,000 and $10,000,000, and he cannot run them for less than 15 per cent.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Mr. Chairman, I have been more or less associated with the West Indian trade for a long number of years. As a matter of fact, I think my firm inaugurated not only the steamer service from Halifax to Jamaica, but also from Halifax and St. John to what is called in the contract the eastern group of islands. At its inception the sledding was hard, it was very difficult to obtain cargoes and to operate the boats at a profit—in fact they were not operated at a profit. The cargoes were largely of fish, lumber and some other products, which were shipped to the West Indies on consignment, and payment was made by the shipment back of the products of the West Indies, chiefly molasses and sugar. It was a sort of barter trade. The introduction of steamers developed that trade, and later on tariff concessions were made in what might be termed a trade treaty between Canada and the West Indies. That led to a very considerable increase of business, and at the present time Canada is supplying the West Indies with the bulk of the staple commodities used there, such as flour, lumber and fish. The fish were always supplied from the Maritime provinces, I think chiefly from Halifax and from Lunenburg, Yarmouth and other southern shore ports of Nova Scotia. Recently the West Indies gave the same tariff advantage to Newfoundland as to Canada, and at the present time our market in the West Indies for fish is absolutely destroyed so far as the Maritime provinces are concerned, for the reason that Newfoundland ships its higher grade fish to the markets of the Mediterranean and the cullage to the West Indies in large quantities.

I take no objection to the treaty except in one or two points, which I shall refer to later. Anything that will tend to increase the trade of Canada with other countries on a fair and equitable basis I heartily endorse. But I may say that the eastern group of islands is supplied to-day by Canada with 99 per cent of the flour which they consume. That being the case, what possibility is there of an increase in that business, which is one of the our most valuable lines? All the lumber they require of the kind produced in Canada is now supplied by us. As regards manufactured articles, Great Britain stands in the same tariff relation as Canada, and to my mind the possibility of increasing our export of manufactured goods to the West Indies is limited.

So far as imports from the West Indies are concerned, my information is that to-day and for some considerable time past Canada has been receiving all the sugar that our refiners require of that grade. Therefore the reduction in the duty on sugar I believe was quite unnecessary. It was made at a cost of from $300,000 to $400,000 a year to the treasury of this country. I repeat that we are to-day receiving all the West India sugar we can consume; the same thing applies to molasses, and a reduction in the tariff will not add to our importations from that country. What eles we can get from there I know not, and I think anyone will find it difficult to mention any product which can be brought from the West Indies to Canada in large quantities and which we are not already getting. So I do not look for the increase in trade because of this treaty and this steamship service which the Minister of Finance thinks will come.

So much for the treaty, and I might here say that had the government stopped with the treaty no one would have found fault or criticized. But they went further and undertook to provide, with a small assistance in the way of a subsidy from the West Indies, a steamship service. The government did that in the dark, so to speak; a busines man would have first estimated the cost of such a service and carried on negotiations intelligently with some idea of the cost of subsidy if it were to be done that way, or if not, with some idea of the cost of construction and the cost of operation. If that had been done parliament would know exactly what we were being asked to contribute to this service. I view that part of the treaty as on a par with the absurd, unbusinesslike proposition which was before this House last year, the so-called Petersen contract. I know that proposition was regarded by many hon. gentlemen opposite as an unbusinesslike proposition, and I believe the same thing applies to this part of this treaty. It has already been said here to-night that parliament is asked to ratify an agreement the cost of which no one knows, and at which we cannot arrive.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend argue that because of the cost we should not enter into the treaty? There seems to be the utmost assurance in the minds of two or three hon. gentlemen opposite that the cost is prohibitive and that therefore we should not have a treaty at all. We cannot have the treaty unless we have the ships, and it must therefore naturally follow, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, that it is a very bad piece of business to go into the treaty.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Does my hon. friend think it necesary to have all these ships?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Is it customary in making treaties of this kind to couple up steamship services, and to commit the country to large expenditures for such services? I do not think you can find anywhere a treaty which binds the parties to provide steamship service, and that is what I take exception to. Besides all that, this proposed service is extreme to a degree. The service to the eastern group, that is to Jamaica, is such that no one would tender on it, notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance has told us. He says they have had an offer for this service, but I am informed that the suggestion is that the merchant marine might do it, and that the cost would be so and so. There was no tender at all for that service, which goes to show that steamship owners are not prepared to make themselves rediculous by offering that service at a price which they know would be almost laughed at. The ships for either group are not afloat; they have yet to be built. The merchant marine ships are unsuitable; I challenge contradiction when I say there is not one of those ships qualified to perform the service required.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend say there is too much service provided in the treaty?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): There is too much service provided in the treaty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have not heard that argument before.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): That is my judgment, and I think if you will take the record of exports and imports and go minutely into the traffic you will find far too much service provided. Especially is that the case with regard to the Jamaica service.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are there not five vessels operating at the moment, three on one service and two of the merchant marine?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): At present there are six vessels operating on the eastern route, two government vessels and four privately-owned. There is another point; you propose putting on a government service which will probably drive off the private services being operated to-day.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then there are eight vessels operating at the moment?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): They are operating at the moment and have been operating for years. Now government competition comes in and interferes with the private interests. We all know that the government can operate at a heavy loss and drive private interests to the wall. That is the situation with regard to the Jamaica service, and I submit that if this proposed service is to be maintained it will cost Canada millions annually; the traffic is not there. It is all very well to say what we should have; the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley), condemns the Royal Mail Steam Packet ships, saying they are dirty and finding other faults with them. I can tell this House that the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company have been ashamed of that service for years; they have come repeatedly to this government asking that they be allowed to improve that service, which is not creditable to them and is a disgrace to the country. I take issue with the hon. member when he says those ships are dirty and badly run. Only the other day a friend of mine went with his wife from Ottawa to the West Indies in one of these ships; they were perfectly satisfied, had a very delightful trip and enjoyed it very much. The ships are well run and well kept, but they are slow and their passenger accommodation is antiquated. We all admit that and no one knows it better than does the company.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it not a fact that there are no ships in existence to-day which can fulfil the terms required by the treaty in respect of the Jamaica service?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): That is absolutely a fact. I think there are a good many things which the government have to learn in connection with these ships, and which they will learn to their cost. I think the hon. member for North Bruce referred earlier in the evening to the fact that they could not be over eighteen feet in draught to get over the Demerara bar with a cargo. When you get these boats drawing 18 feet of water loaded, you have a very difficult proposition, and a very costly one.

The Jamaica service is the one that I most severely criticise, because it is a very, very extreme proposal. The Jamaica people would be delighted to get such a service as is proposed, and to pay the paltry sum of £12,000 a year for it, what for? To get some of their bananas up here. I do not believe what the contract calls for will be realized for a very long time. During say three months of the year, if the steamers land a large number of tourists and passengers down there, they would spend some money and to that extent benefit the island, but three months of the year is the limit of the passenger trade, and during the rest of the time you will have these steamers running back and forth, with a large investment of capital earning nothing, and not only earning nothing, but stewards and expenditures of different kinds will be required to keep that passenger accommodation in order. That in itself will mean a very considerable amount of money. The Jamaica service alone as proposed in this treaty will mean to Canada a loss, I will undertake to say, to say nothing of capital expenditure, of from one and a half to two million dollars a year. The earnings of the ships will not pay the operating expenses, or not more than pay the operating expenses on both routes, and there will be an annual loss of from fifteen to twenty per cent to be borne by this country, That applies to the eastern route, and I think it is a very conservative estimate, but on the western route the loss will be very heavy indeed. None of our Canadian people are going to go to the West Indies in the summer time. December they will want to spend at home, and there will only be January, February and March, three months, for the tourist traffic.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Then Americans do not go there in the summer?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): No, that is what I say. There is another point. Our friends to the south, with their West India trade extending over years and years, have never considered it worth their while to put on passenger ships, such as are called for here, between New York and the West Indies, and they have 120,000,000 people and all the nearby large cities like New York and Boston to get traffic from. Then to what extent can Canada expect to support such a line of steamers? I do not know that it is of any great advantage to Canada to carry a few hundred or a few thousand people to the West Indies. They simply spend their money there and then come back home broke, and I do not see any great advantage to us in doing that. So that as far as the passenger part of the steamship service is concerned, I do not look upon it as of any great value.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Is there any reason why freight should not be carried both to and from the West Indies during every month of the year?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): There are times when the ships will come up with clean holds, with not 100 tons of cargo in them. That is occurring now, and always has occurred.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): It would not occur if the treaty was in effect.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): It occurs under the present treaty. These ships will come north trip after trip during the off season with not 100 tons of cargo. There is no question about that at all; that is the experience. Take the cargo returns of your own merchant marine, and you will see that that is the case with them. It is the case with all the services that have been operating down there all these years.

As I said before, I have no objection to the treaty, but I do seriously object to the government considering for one moment the operating of steamers of their own down to the West Indies. The experience of the merchant marine is sad indeed, and to add to that grief and sadness is something that should not be. Not one of the merchant marine boats is fit to put on that route, and other boats from outside will have to be provided. I have heard it suggested that these boats can be altered, that cold storage can be installed, and the engines and this, that and the other thing be changed. My answer to that suggestion is simply this: From Land's End to the north of Scotland and from east to west across Great Britain you will not find a single steamship owner who would consider such a suggestion as that. They would never for one moment think of adding expenditure to ships of that age and of that speed. It is money thrown away. Here we are with the ships of the merchant marine; they will have to go through their No. 2 survey presently, and what will they be then? Eight or nine or ten year old ships, worth not any more than the government has sold its other ships for during the past year, about $10 per dead ton. In my judgment the sooner they are sold the less expense they will be to the country. Those ships are not fit to put on the West India service. They will not fill the requirements, and therefore the whole eight or ten ships, or whatever may be required if the government takes up this service, will have to be procured from outside. The experience of the merchant marine, it seems to me, does not justify the investment by this country of any more capital in steamers.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): I do not understand the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite. They have all been protesting that they are in favour of the treaty, and yet they have all been arguing about the one thing necessary to the treaty, namely, the maintaining of steamship communication to the West India islands. You cannot have trade with islands situated as the West Indies are in relation to Canada unless steamship accommodation is provided, and arrangements have been made by which all parties will contribute to that end. The committee will agree that it would not be in the interests of this country to make public the tenders that have been received. I am free, however, to say this, that the tenders that have been received for both services, which we have declined believing that we can get lower tenders, are for amounts well under $1,000,000.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Is it not a fact that one of the tenders received was from the Canadian merchant marine?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): My hon. friend need not ask that question of me, because if we are going to state to the House who tendered and all that kind of thing, there will be no use asking for new tenders. Everybody who has to do with business agrees to that. Hon. members are either in favour of the treaty or they are not. That is the crux of the situation. I want to reiterate the remark I made earlier, that I regard the connection of the Mother Country and the situation of the West Indies to-day in relation to the empire as very important, on account of the increasing trade of the United States, and our endeavour here to provide communicatons on lines closer to us and to the empire is of the greatest possible interest to us. I would ask hon. members who say they are in favour of the treaty and do not want to give the steamship communication with the West Indies to realize where they stand. This government do not propose to spend one dollar more than they have to in order to provide the necessary communication. What interest have we in increasing that amount? Tenders have been called for, and in a general way we have indicated what the total expenditure in the way of subsidy would be. We believe we can get it for a less subsidy, and if hon. gentlemen are in favour of the treaty we as a government ask them to trust us to see that this service is provided at the lowest possible cost to Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think my hon. friend's attitude, so far as the opposition is concerned, is quite fair. I would like to point out the position he is putting us in to-day, which is the result of the government's inaction and delay. Here is an agreement entered into last summer; we are dealing with it nearly a year later; the government do not know what it means, and yet we are told that unless we immediately fall over to the government, and accept everything they say and do, we are against this treaty. It is not fair. With the situation as it stands at present it may well be that the government cannot very fairly give out the tenders which have been received, particularly when they think they are too high, and when they are going to try to run one against another. But that is the situation the government is creating. It is not the opposition. The government held these things back all these months. They entered into an agreement last summer, and they have done nothing towards furthering it until the House has been in session for months. Now they expect the House to deal with it. What the opposition say is perfectly true. They are in favour of the closest trade arrangements that can be made with the West Indies. We are keenly alive to what the Minister of National Defence has said, to the fact that there has been altogether too much American penetration there; we have idly sat by and allowed them to get in. I do not think it is too late for us to get our share. But there is a little more in it than that. What has been said by hon. members on this side as to the attitude of the West India islanders is perfectly correct. I have been down to the West Indies since the former agreement was entered into, and I know what they think about it. They consider that Canada fell down on the contract of 1920, and so she did. There is no question about it, and that contract still stands. The West India islands are in a position to-day to practically ask for the service, whether this agreement is put through or not. The contract is there. They are still in a position to enforce it.

It has been pointed out that to-day we are doing a great deal in connection with the flour trade in the West Indies. Well, we are. We practically have that trade. One of the things necessary in connection with this agreement is to hang on to that trade, to give us some service which will make sure that the troubles which occurred there and the dissatisfaction which existed, is not going to become such as to compel us to lose that trade. At the present time we have a very favourable trade showing in connection with flour, and we are very deeply interested in that commodity. We are all in favour of the treaty, but we would like to be in a better position to know what we are doing. One thing said by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black) gave me some concern; he said we were calling for a much better service under this treaty than New York, with its enormous business, required. If that be correct, I should think it was very extravagant to say the least. When I was in Jamaica, as I recollect it, we had a weekly service with a boat of 5,000 tons, and a weekly service also during the passenger season of boats almost as large again. They were very excellent boats; we had both kinds. My idea of the service which was required was one which would enable us to do business with the islands. We have not got it to-day. I would like a service which would provide cold storage, but not necessarily a palatial passenger service. Some of the boats going down to Jamaica are very expensive boats. I should think they would be at least 7,500 tons. But we do not want that palatial steam service. We want a service with proper cold storage which would look after our banana business, which would enable us to increase that business and which would release our fruit trade from the grip of the present trust in connection with citrous fruits. We think that is all that is necessary, and I hope that is all that is being done. I hope we are not putting on a service which will give a better passenger service than is given to New York. Much as I am in favour of the trade, I never look for large earnings in connection with the passenger service. What we are interested in is the biggest volume we can get of the traffic of the West Indies going through our own ports and not through the United States. We want to get our freight and commodities at first cost, and we want to increase the trade of our ports. On the other hand we want to see to it that they get just as much of our freight as possible in return. That is what we are after, and not the passenger business.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Macdonald) cannot confound me with his casuistry as to whether or not I am in favour of the treaty. My position is clear. I am anxious to do everything possible to preserve the most friendly relations with the West Indies. I do it, not because Great Britain regards it as our duty to do it, but because we are associated with the West Indies as a part of the empire. But I am not prepared to pay too high a price for trading with the West Indies, and I want to know what price I am called upon to pay before voting in favour of the bill.

I have a suggestion to make, and I say it is a fair one. Every tariff concession which Canada proposes to make under the agreement with the British West Indies, and which purports to be made under the clauses of this bill, have already been made by a previous tariff bill which has passed this chamber and which undoubtedly will be ratified by the Senate and approved by His Excellency. Therefore every concession which we are called upon to make in the way of tariff reductions has been made in such a way as to open our market to the West Indies to the fullest extent demanded by them. We have still fifteen months in which to provide a steamship service. I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that the fair way to deal with the House and the country would be to withdraw this measure and to hold it over until another session. In six or seven months more the House will necessarily meet again and by that time he will be able to ascertain definitely the cost by way of steamship subsidy and the capital expense for steamships to carry out the agreement. In the meantime the British West Indies cannot complain; they have access to our markets under the other measure to the fullest extent possible, and they have certain new services proposed by way of competition for their freight. Why not hold this measure over until parliament meets again and then tell us the cost? If it is at all reasonable I think we on this side of the House will be prepared to vote ratification of the agreement. If it runs up into a capital expenditure of ten or even eight million dollars with an annual deficit of one to one and one-half or even one and three-quarter million dollars, I for one am going to oppose it.

Mr. ROBB: The proposition submitted by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George I do not regard as fair. I do not think Canada should go back on her word to the British West Indies. As I have already said, certain propositions have been made to provide a service between Canada and the West India Islands with but little cost to Canada. My colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) a few minutes ago said that the tenders we had received for the two services were well within a million dollars. He having said that compels me to go a little further and say that they were $400,000 less than a million dollars and less than that. Of that the West India Islands provide $230,000 so that the tenders we have before us now are not very much more than we have been paying. We did not accept those tenders because we believed the increased business and the representations which we had from other companies that would put on a service did not justify the government in accepting them. I observe that hon. members opposite generally are in favour of this agreement, but that certain opposition comes from sections of the country which in 1900 thought it was a pretty good bargain to pay £27,000 for services to that country at a time when we were doing only $2,500,000 worth of business. To-day we are doing ten times that business and it is not costing much more.

Mr. CAHAN: The statement made by the Minister of Finance dealing with the Jamaica service is, as we now know, from an estimate made not by any independent shipping company but by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is not going to put any words into my mouth. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the only fair inference from what has been said to-night. From my seat in the House and knowing full well what certain of the facts are, I say that the hon. gentleman dare not rise in his seat and deny the statement I have made.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Who told the hon gentleman?

Mr. CAHAN: It is not necessary that I should say who told me. The hon. member need not attempt to draw a red herring across the trail. Neither the Minister of Finance nor the Minister of National Defence dare say that a tender was made for that service by any independent company.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): The gentleman who is trying to draw a red herring across the trail is the hon. member who thinks he can get information from the government as to who the tenderers are, which information we do not propose to give.

Mr. CAHAN: There is not a single ship in the Canadian merchant marine that can fulfil the terms of that contract. The ships are not in existence on the high seas to-day in Great Britain or the United States or Germany that can fulfil those services.

Mr. POWER: Has the hon. member before him Lloyd's Register to give him that information?

Mr. CAHAN: That is not necessary. Everyone knows it. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black) has so stated and no one can deny his statement. That being the fact I appeal to the Minister of Finance, who has charge of the bill, that his statement is not based on an intelligent investigation of the facts or on such information as the government may rely upon in giving assurances to the House as to what the ultimate cost will be. I suggest in all fairness to the committee that the bill should be held over until the next session of parliament when we should have full information about the matter, because passing this to-night and binding parliament to all future appropriations will not put the project ahead for one hour of what it would be if it were passed in March or April of next year.

On the preamble.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): This is rather unseemly procedure. The minister who has the matter in charge sits in his seat and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has been trying to extract information which the minister has been refusing for hours to give to the committee. I think the country and the House may well be alarmed by any trade treaty that this government may make, in view of the treaties which they have made since 1921, I can mention three: the first with France, one with Italy and another with Australia. As a result of these three treaties there has been a loss of upwards of $20,000,000 in trade balances. I think this treaty should stand over for a little further consideration in view of the refusal of the government to give reasonable information to hon. members who have been asking for it to-night and who have discussed the question intelligently in a manner indicating that they know exactly what they are talking about. The minister sits in his place and asks questions trying to obtain information, without giving any to the committee. This is absolutely unfair and a most unusual attitude for any government to take. This matter might well stand over at least until to-morrow for further consideration. It is now half past one o'clock in the morning, and the government has sat here for hours, refusing to give reasonable information repeatedly asked for by those who understand the question better than members of the government do. I refer to these other treaties for the reason that while the government profess to be on the lookout for wider markets for Canadian producers they have been in fact losing trade for the people of this country through every treaty they have entered into since coming into power.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Has the minister further considered the effect the treaty will have on the sugar beet growers of Canada? This question is of interest to my constituents.

Mr. ROBB: That question was fully discussed in the budget and I tried to satisfy my hon. friend, with what success I do not know, that the sugar beet growers would not be in any worse position than they were before. As a matter of fact they will be better off inasmuch as the market is now stabilized for the period of the agreement.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I do not agree with the minister; on the contrary, their market has been undermined. However, will the minister promise to allow the sugar beet growers to appear before the tariff board and present their claim for reasonable protection against the raw sugar producers of the West Indies?

Mr. ROBB: If the sugar beet growers of Canada want to appear before the tariff board there will certainly be no objection.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Do I understand that if the board recommend an increase in the duty this will be agreeable to the minister?

Mr. ROBB: Surely my hon. friend does not expect me to commit myself to any finding the board may make.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 1.25 a.m. (Tuesday).

Tuesday, June 8, 1926.

The House met at two o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Mr. W. F. KAY (Brome-Missisquoi) presented the third report of the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

REPORT PRESENTED

Annual report of the Department of Health, in French, for the year ended March 31, 1925. —Hon. Mr. Elliott.

THE GOVERNOR GENERALSHIP

OFFICIAL ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE APPOINTMENT OF LORD WILLINGDON

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the rumour is correct that Lord Willingdon has been appointed our next Governor General.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I have received an official communication stating that His Majesty has been graciously pleased to approve of the appointment of Viscount Willingdon, G.C.S.I., G.G.I.E., G.B.E., to be Governor General in Canada in succession to General Lord Byng of Vimy, G.C.B., M.V.O., whose term of office will shortly expire.

OFFICIAL REPRESENTATION IN WASHINGTON

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Is the statement to the effect that the Hon. Vincent Massey has been appointed our representative at Washington correct?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have not seen any statement to that effect. If such a statement has appeared it is premature to say the least.

PENSION ACT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I would like to ask the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment if it is the intention of the government to bring down any amendments to the Pension Act. The minister stated at one time that amendments were to be brought down and there are suggestions now that perhaps there are not. I would like to have the statement of the government on that because a number of organizations are very much interested in the matter.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): My hon. friend is under a misapprehension if he thinks I stated there were amendments to be brought down.

Mr. LADNER: I asked the question.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes; and I told my hon. friend at the time, as I recollect, that there would be no substantial amendments this session. It is not the intention to introduce any amendments this session.

Mr. LADNER: The minister says that there will be no substantial amendments.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I say that it is not the intention to introduce any amendments this session.

IMPORTATION OF SECOND HAND PIANOS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): I am sorry the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Boivin) is not in his seat. I have in my hand a list of second-hand pianos offered for sale in Canada at prices varying from fifty dollars down to ten dollars. I am informed that for some time these pianos have been dumped into Canada at a very special rate. On more than one occasion I have brought this matter to the attention of the Customs department. Is the government taking any action to stop this dumping of second-hand pianos into Canada?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): That is a question I shall have to ask my colleague the Minister of Customs and Excise to reply to, but I will direct his attention to it.

STRAWBERRY IMPORTATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo): Has the Minister of Agriculture received any request from the strawberry growers of Vancouver island for relief? I have a telegram which reads:

> American strawberries from Missouri absolutely flooding prairie market. If situation continues British Columbia growers ruined. Have wired Ottawa stating immediate action necessary if strawberry interests are to be protected.

It seems that they have had a wonderful crop of strawberries in Missouri and they are simply sending their surplus into British Columbia and the prairie country as well. This means ruination to a large community of fruit growers and I am sure our friends from the west, for the sake of a cent or two a pound will not—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman, I understand, has asked his question. Now it is for the government to reply.

Mr. DICKIE: I will put the question definitely to the minister: Has he had any request from the fruit growers and particularly the strawberry growers, and, if so, is it his intention to take steps to put the dumping clause into force or to adopt such other means as will save these people from ruin?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I had a telegram yesterday or the day before, I forget which, from the strawberry growers of my hon. friend's riding to the effect that the fruit growers of Missouri and other southern states were shipping large quantities of strawberries into Canada and flooding the prairie markets with fresh fruit. I have taken the matter up with the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) and requested him to look into it to ascertain whether there is any abuse in the direction of selling in this country, either on the prairies or elsewhere, fruit at lower prices than obtain in the country of origin. I have not yet had any report from him but I understand he is investigating the matter.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Health) moved the third reading of Bill No. 152, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1923.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA-WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 15, respecting trade relations with British West Indies, Bermuda, British Guiana, and British Honduras.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Before the bill is given its third reading, I again wish to place before the House, and especially before the Minister of Finance, my suggestion that there should be some undertaking on behalf of the government, respecting the carrying out of the provisions of this agreement with the British West Indies, that the cost to this country should not exceed a limited amount, say, $500,000 per annum. It is most important that we should have a complete and definite assurance from the government regarding the anticipated cost of the proposed steamship service.

Members on both sides of the House are, I am aware, anxious to make concessions to the West Indies, but many hon. gentlemen on either side are under an entire misapprehension as to the conditions that obtain in those islands. In conversation with gentlemen on the other side of the House as well as on this side I gather that there is an impression among them that the residents of the West Indies are in very poor circumstances, the majority of them being half-clad coloured men, whose plight is such that out of mere commiseration and pity Canada, as a part of the British Empire, should make some concession to this struggling and poverty stricken section of the empire. As a matter of fact, on the contrary, every island in the British West Indies contains to my knowledge a group of highly educated and well trained business men who control the commerce of the colony, and who are as keen, efficient and modern in every way as the average Canadian merchant, with a keener vision than the ordinary merchant in Canada with respect to the commercial necessities of those islands. It is entirely safe to say that on the average the financial and economic condition as well as the education of the white population in the British West Indies is higher than those of the average Canadian citizen. They are therefore well able to look after themselves, and in making this present agreement they have shown an intelligent appreciation of the facts such as is entirely wanting on the part of those who represented this government in negotiating the treaty. The agreement with the British West Indies was negotiated, so far as this Dominion was concerned, by a body of gentlemen who, though highly respectable, have not had, any one of them, any practical experience of the trade, either existing or prospective, between this country and the West Indies.

The boards of trade of Halifax and of St. John, composed of trained business men who have been engaged in the West Indian business for years, sought to have their views presented to the gentlemen who were representing Canada on that commission. Representative Liberals in addition to well-known Conservatives of Halifax, endeavoured to secure a hearing. There were for example, such men as Mr. A. Hanfield Whitman, Mr. A. E. Jones, and Mr. G. McGregor Mitchell, well known Liberals of Halifax and supporters of this government. They were not allowed to present their case to the gentlemen who were negotiating the agreement on behalf of Canada. On the other hand, there was available one gentleman who, representing the Royal Mail Steam Packet service, was possessed of a knowledge of the trade with the West Indies superior to that of almost any other person who might have placed himself at the disposal of the government's representatives. But he, too, was given no opportunity of discussing the matter. I therefore, take this occasion to put myself on record as being of the opinion that the treaty with the British West Indies was negotiated on behalf of the Dominion by gentlemen who, however intelligent and estimable they may be did not understand either the nature or the necessities of the trade.

Further, in making the agreement, especially with relation to Jamaica, the Canadian commissioners, if I may use that term, provided for a service which is larger and more expensive than the trade of that colony with us can possibly require for many years to come. With regard to that service I am informed that no reputable independent British company could be found who would tender for the fulfilment of it on any terms whatever in the way of subsidies. I am informed further, and I do not think it will be denied, that the only tender for that service was made by the Canadian merchant marine, and it is suggested that they asked only for a subsidy of a few hundred thousand dollars a year. But the Canadian Government Merchant Marine cannot carry out that service without coming before parliament and asking for an appropriation of at least $5,000,000 for the construction of ships for the Jamaica service. As to the actual capital expenditure for that service, we have been denied all information. It is publicly known, and I believe it is no doubt true, that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine did request from Vickers an estimate of the cost of constructing the ships necessary for that service. As to what the estimate was I do not know. I do know of course that Vickers have had some experience in constructing ships for the West India service equipped with cold storage and other suitable accommodation. But the fact is uncontroverted that at the present time there are no ships sailing the sea that can be purchased which would satisfy the demand of the contract with the West Indies with respect to the Jamaica service. It is obvious and is well known, and cannot be contradicted, that the ships for the service in order to carry out the terms of this contract must be especially built. Therefore as that information is before the government, and as they know the terms of the negotiations between the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and Vickers with regard to the cost of constructing those ships, I say it is not frank and fair to this House that we should be called upon to pledge ourselves by giving a vote entirely in the dark, without any knowledge as to the cost, because the suggestion made by the hon. Minister of Finance that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, or whoever was this tenderer—which I know to the the Canadian Government Merchant Marine—could carry out the service with a subsidy of a few hundred thousand dollars per year is, I contend, far below the actual cost, and it leaves entirely out of account a capital expenditure of $5,000,000 or thereabouts necessary to provide ships for the Jamaica service alone.

We are willing to make concessions to the West Indies, but—and I am speaking for myself—I think the concessions should be placed upon an entirely different basis. A reduction in the duty on sugar was made, whereas in order to give the preference to the British West Indies the general duty on sugar, in my opinion, should have been increased and a reduction made in favour of the West Indies in such a way as to preserve under the British West India preference the present rate of duty on imported sugar. By making the reduction there has been a loss of $300,000 or $400,000 at least in our sugar revenue, which will be extended to a loss of at least $700,000 or $800,000 in a few years as our consumption of sugar under this arrangement increases—a loss in revenue which should not have been incurred except under stress of circumstances that do not exist here. For instance, if the government had increased the general tariff to $1.45 per 100 pounds, and kept the preference tariff at, say, 45 cents per 100 pounds, as it was previously, the preference of $1 promised in the new agreement could have been put into effect and the duty on the British West Indies sugar would have been unchanged. But now by reducing the duty to 28.712 cents per 100 pounds, the government are losing something over 16 cents per 100 pounds, which on the imports of 1925 would amount to over $300,000, and which will correspondingly increase as the sugar imports from those islands increase. On the other hand, in my opinion increasing the general duty would not have cost the Canadian consumer anything, because the fraction is too small to be figured in the cost as between the retailer and the consumer. Further, as a matter of fact, the greater part of the sugar imported is refined in Canada and exported to other countries, and the rebate protects the refiner entirely with respect to the sugar re-exported and does not affect the price to the Canadian consumer.

It is well known that the brands of flour which this country produces control the West India market. As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black) stated, so far as the fish trade is concerned, Canada controls the market now to as full an extent as is possible under this treaty—indeed that control will now be diminished because the proceedings show that the commissioners representing Canada agreed that every concession made in favour of Canadian fish products would be given also to the fish products of Newfoundland, and, as the hon. member stated, and as we all know, Newfoundland is in a peculiarly fortunate situation in this respect, being able to send her best fish direct to the Mediterranean and her cheap cullage into the West Indies to compete with and supplant Canadian fish in that market. With regard to lumber, we know that every kind we produce available for that market now entirely controls it, and therefore there is no advantage for Canadian lumber under this treaty. As to manufactured goods of every description and kind which are placed on the lower tariff basis by this treaty, the manufactured products of Great Britain enter upon exactly the same low tariff. Everyone knows that in hats and caps, boots and shoes, and a great number of other articles of personal adornment and personal use, we cannot compete with the British products going in on exactly the same basis. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we have in certain respects gained a little freer access to that market, but to increase the market for our manufactured products we must drive out the British manufacturer and capture the market which he at present holds in the West Indies; we are not likely to be able to do it.

Therefore, while we are all willing to enter into a trade arrangement with these very clever and experienced men who control the trade of the British West Indies, I say this government has not made an adequate presentation of the cost of the services necessary to carry it out, and at the last moment I enter my protest against this contract being ratified without the House being informed definitely as to the cost, so that we may know how much approximately in dollars and cents we have to pay for the minor tariff concessions which are made in our favour by the British West Indies under this agreement. I simply wish to register my protest on the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed

[Mr. Cahan.]

SUPPLY—EGG GRADING

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee of Supply.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I understood, Mr. Speaker, that I was to have precedence to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) intends moving an amendment. When this matter is disposed of the hon. member will have the floor.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): As an amendment to the motion to go into Supply I beg to move the following:

That all the words after "that" in the main motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In the opinion of this House the system of egg-grading instituted by the government pursuant to an order in council published in the Canada Gazette on the 26th day of April 1924 imposes a grave injustice upon the farmers and other persons in Canada engaged in the production of eggs for sale by retail, and the action of the government in this regard has resulted in unnecessary expense, great inconvenience and serious delay to the farmers and other producers, and that such system, in so far as it applies to sale by retail in local markets, should be discontinued.

The question I have embodied in this amendment had its inception in the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, which was passed by this House in 1923. The House passed an act under the same title in 1917, which act applied, only to cattle, sheep and swine. Under that act regulations were made by the Department of Agriculture to govern the sale of articles enumerated therein. In 1923 the present Minister of Agriculture introduced and passed through the House an act of far wider scope than the original act of 1917. It was passed as an amendment to the original act but is practically a new act and goes far beyond anything included in the act of 1917.

When the act of 1923 was introduced into the House very little discussion or debate took place; I fancy it was assumed by the House that it was only an act by way of amendment, and that no new or important principle was introduced. I submit it was the duty of the minister in bringing such an important measure into this House to point out exactly what was the application of the proposal which he made, because I am satisfied that when the act of 1923 was passed no one in the House had the remotest idea that under that act it would be possible to compel farmers to have their eggs graded for the local market.

The act of 1923 included not only cattle, sheep and swine, but also enumerated poultry, eggs and wool, and in looking over the debate which took place in the House when this act was passed I find that not a single question was asked and not a word of discussion took place on the question of egg grading. In fact, in regard to the particular section of the act to which I will refer in a moment, hardly a sentence was uttered in the House. No explanation was given by the minister or by any member of the government; there was only a question by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), who seemed to suggest that wool should not be included as one of the articles to be graded, on account of certain difficulties which would be presented. With such a slight discussion as that, with no word of explanation or warning from the minister, a new act was placed upon the statute books under which the minister has been able to issue a set of regulations, in the shape of an order in council having the full force of an act of parliament which have, I believe, caused more annoyance, more inconvenience and more trouble to the farmers and farmers' wives in Canada who are accustomed to sell eggs than any single measure ever passed by this House. Had the matter been explained when the act was introduced; had the minister informed the House that he proposed to pass regulations under this statute to compel farmers to grade their eggs in the local market, I am satisfied that the measure would never have passed the House as we now find it.

Section 9 is the important section of this act. It provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing, among other things, the manner in which live stock meat intended for export, poultry, eggs and wool shall be inspected, graded, branded or marked and the manner in which such live stock, poultry, eggs and wool graded in accordance with the regulations under this act shall be sold. It is a long section, but this is the important clause. From any discussion which took place in this House, or from a casual reading of the whole act, one would infer that this referred only to the export or import trade or at most to the wholesale trade in these commodities. No one had the remotest idea that it applied to the basket of eggs which the farmer's wife brings on Saturday to the local market; no one had any idea that the act went so far. It was passed in 1923; then on April 26, 1924 it was proclaimed through the Canada Gazette and regulations were issued under which all eggs should be graded and sold.

I am going to refer for a moment to these regulations. They must have been drawn up by an artist; they are certainly all-embracing and are prepared with the greatest particularity, more so in fact than is the ordinary act passed by this House. In the first instance, wholesalers and retailers are defined. Under these regulations a retailer means any person or partnership offering or selling direct to a consumer. That practically embraces everybody who has eggs to sell, every person who sells directly to the consumer. Then they go on to specify the grades and it would take an expert, and a real expert, to make anything of this classification. In the markets of this country people have been buying and selling eggs quite openly for the last half century, or perhaps the last full century, and no great difficulty has ensued from the open manner of buying and selling eggs on the local market. But the result of the operation of these regulations is that a buyer does not know what he is getting, and a seller does not know what he is selling. Just listen to the classification of these eggs for grading purposes.

There is a class known as class 1, and it is headed, "Fresh eggs." Now fresh eggs are fresh eggs. We know what they are; the buyer knows and the seller knows what they are. But that is not enough for these departmental regulations. They go further and say that fresh eggs shall be classified as follows:

Grade (a) Specials.
Grade (b) Extras.
Sub-Grade (1) Pullet Extras.
Grade (c) Firsts.
Grade (d) Seconds.

There are five grades of fresh eggs, without going into the question of storage eggs at all. Now what does the ordinary purchaser find as a result of purchasing eggs under these gradings? I have the actual experience of a man who went to market and bought a basket of No. 1 eggs. He got "firsts," and he was proud of it. But that man did not bring home "firsts" at all; he brought home third-class eggs. The "specials" are the "firsts," the "extras" are the "seconds," the "firsts" are the "thirds," and the "seconds" are the "fourth." That is the grading which has been placed on the farmers product in the local markets of this country under these regulations.

Then when you come to another class of eggs, storage eggs, which is class 2, you find there another lot of grades, as follows:

Class (2a) Preserved.
Grade (a) Extras.
Grade (b) Firsts.
Grade (c) Seconds.
Grade (d) Cracked and dirty.

These regulations, I think, were prepared for the purpose of mixing up both the producer and the vendor of eggs on the local market. I realize this, that for the purposes of the wholesale trade this grading is necessary, and is proper. I realize that for the purposes of the export and import of eggs, this grading system is a proper system; but I think it is going entirely too far when you ask the farmer on his local market to have his eggs graded under these regulations, and to pay two cents a dozen for the privilege of having it done. Now what is the actual experience? On Saturday after Saturday on the markets of western Ontario you will find a long line of farmers—it is not so bad in summer, but in cold weather it is very annoying, very troublesome, and inconvenient —standing in line for half or three-quarters of an hour, and it has been reported to me, in some cases, for over an hour, waiting for the privilege of passing a basket of eggs through to a grader, and paying two cents a dozen to have those eggs graded, and graded by a man who in the majority of cases knows nothing or little about the grading of eggs. Why, in the Guelph market they have tested these graders out. The wives of farmers, reputable women, have come to me and said that they have put the same basket through before three different graders, and in each instance they have obtained different grades. I have made inquiries of the ordinary consumers, citizens in my city, and I have failed to find one who is in favour of this system. It was reported to me that the local merchants were in favour of the system. I called up six of them on the telephone and inquired, and the whole six said: No, abolish the system. I have seen many, many farmers and many, many farmers' wives, and I find they are all agreed; they are all opposed to this system of egg grading on the local markets.

Why was the system ever put on, one may ask? It was as a result of the demand of the wholesale dealers. It helps them, I will grant you. They get a certain amount of immunity from it, but for the purchaser in the open market it is no protection, and for the farmer it is an inconvenience, an injustice, and an expense. That two cents a dozen that the farmer has to pay he never gets back. They say he adds it to the price, but the price of eggs to-day is lower than when the grading system was introduced. The farmer has not gained. I do not object to the man who goes through a township buying eggs and bringing them into some kind of a central warehouse, being compelled to grade his eggs but I do object, and the farmers object, to farmers' wives being obliged to submit to this imposition on the local market, with the cost that it entails.

Why maintain such a system? I have had a good many communications on the subject from a good many places in the province of Ontario. I am sorry my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) is not in his place, because I know he is interested in this matter. He took it up with the Department of Agriculture and announced in a paper with which he is connected that the egg grading system did not apply to the local farmer on the local market. We thought for a while that we were going to be relieved, but it turned out that it does apply, and I am sorry to say that in the constituency I have the honour to represent there have been two prosecutions and two fines imposed on farmers who did not stand in line and have their little basket graded, paid for, and labelled by an inefficient egg grader.

Who appoints the egg graders, I do not know. I wonder if they are appointed by the Civil Service Commission? The reason I ask the question is this: I received a notice the other day that the Civil Service Commission was going to appoint a wool grader. Therefore, I assume that the egg graders are appointed in the same way. Well, in that case, all I can do is to ask the Civil Service Commission to go through western Ontario and take a good look over their egg graders there, because I am not satisfied that they are competent men for the work entrusted to them.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the whole system is wrong. Surely we can continue the open market system. If you are going to grade eggs, why not grade other produce? Why not grade butter, fruit, potatoes and other vegetables that are brought on the market? Why compel the farmers to undergo this grading system only in regard to their eggs? I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is an imposition upon the farmers of this country, and more particularly it is an imposition on the wives of the farmers. No injustice has been done in the past under the old system. Both purchaser and vendor have been satisfied with the old open market system, where the good old doctrine of "Caveat emptor"—let the buyer beware—prevailed. Under that system the purchaser got the eggs he bargained for, and the vendor was satisfied with the manner in which his eggs were sold. But these regulations are carrying this paternal idea in government to an excess.

I have brought this matter up in the way I have, and under the resolution which has been read to the House, in order that the responsibility for this outrageous system may be placed upon the proper shoulders. We never had this system until the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) occupied his present position. The government must take the full responsibility for this system. I have stated in the motion which I have moved that the action of the government has resulted in this loss, this injustice, and this inconvenience, and I ask by this motion that these regulations or this act be amended. It is the simplest thing in the world to change these regulations. In order to effect a change and relieve the agriculturists of the country from this burden and this oppression only a few words need be added to the definition of "retailers" excluding the farmer from that definition. We have excluded him in the case of other acts passed by this House. We specifically excluded him, I remember, in the case of the Bankruptcy Act and other acts which I could name. Just add a few words to your definition of "retailer" providing that this shall not include a farmer who sells eggs, the product of his own farm, direct to the consumer upon the open market, and you have achieved all he asks.

I am going to put on record a formal resolution which has been sent to me by the Women's Institute of South Wellington. It is signed by all the officers. In looking over the names I regret to say that some of them are not supporters of mine, but the resolution is brief and pointed and I am going to read it. It was passed by the Women's Institute of South Wellington on 13th of February last, and reads as follows:

> Resolved that we the representatives of the South Wellington Women's Institute protest against the present egg grading system and wish to have it abolished.

I believe that resolution expresses the real wish of the whole agricultural population of this country engaged in the production of eggs. Even those men in our smaller cities, and in our towns and villages who have a small egg production for their own home consumption and who may at the end of the week have two or three dozen to sell or trade to their grocer, if they do not have those two or three dozen eggs graded, are subject to a horrible penalty, for the penalty under this act for infraction of the law includes a maximum fine of $500 and imprisonment up to three months, simply because the farmer who has for generations enjoyed a free open market now has to go before a government grader and pay two cents a dozen for the privilege of having his eggs graded or degraded as the case may be. I ask the House to consider this as a question strictly in the interests of the agricultural population of Canada, and particularly in the interest of the wives of Canadian farmers who, in the majority of circumstances, are the people who suffer the most, who suffer all the inconvenience, and let me tell you that in cold weather the inconvenience is not slight.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I am interested in eggs and am therefore concerned with their grading. I do not expect, in anything I may say, to voice the opinion of all farm women. I know nothing about the conditions prevailing upon the open market, but after all most of the farmers of Canada do not sell their eggs in the open market—they ship them.

I want to tell hon. members what my experience has been and what I think about the grading of eggs. I think that 'specials" could quite well be stricken from commercial grades. There are almost no "specials," but there are "extras," "pullet extras" and so on, and these grades can soon be recognized by people who are accustomed to handling eggs. "Pullet extras" is a grade that all farmers are glad has been established, because pullets' eggs are smaller than the eggs of hens a year or two old; and these eggs that would be "extras" under any other form of grading would not be "extras" of there were not a grade provided for smaller eggs, which are called "pullet extras." I went to the Minister of Agriculture some time ago and protested against these designations, "extras," "pullet extras," and "Nos. 1 and 2" and wondered why they did not grade them as "1, 2, 3 and 4"; for that really represents the grades. I began then to see the point of view of the minister. People do not buy seconds, thirds and fourths, and I found that if these eggs are to be sold they must be sold in such a way as to indicate clearly to the buyers what they are buying.

I think this is the effect of grading eggs: In the first place, it raises the standard. The consumer is guaranteed that if he buys under the act he will get just the quality he wants.

anybody who goes into a store and purchases "extras" or "pullet extras" will know exactly what he is getting. The standard has been raised and on account of the guarantee of quality the consumption of eggs has been increased. There has been an increased production of eggs in Ontario and I suppose that is true also of the rest of Canada. Since the grading of eggs came in we ship our eggs through the pool. The eggs are taken from the nest twice a day, not once a day, and the nests are kept perfectly clean. Eggs having the slightest crack are not shipped, that is if it is possible to detect the crack with the naked eye. While there may occasionally be a cracked egg still the shippers try not to put in eggs of that character but only eggs that will be acceptable to the pool, because it is only strictly fresh eggs, "extras" and "pullet extras" that can be pooled. Those who pool eggs in Ontario, and the number is increasing all the time, are very much in favour of the grading of eggs. Personally, I am in favour of the grading of products. The graders, of course, should know their work and possibly it is true that sometimes they do not. I remember the time when hog grading was introduced. There was a great outcry in regard to it and people did not want their hogs graded. That hostile sentiment is gradually disappearing. It may be possible that on the open market, where the eggs are absolutely fresh and where the buyer is only concerned about their freshness. it is not likely he will care whether the eggs are "extras," "pullet extras," or "firsts" or "seconds." There is a good deal in what the hon. member has said, but I want to repeat that many farmers in Ontario do not sell their eggs in the open market. The only market for the county from which I come is in Owen Sound. In that connection I remember a little experience I had last year. I was going through Owen Sound and I had a large case of eggs. I thought I would take them to Owen Sound to see what price could be realized for them. I took the eggs along and found that I could have sold them to better advantage at home in Flesherton than in Owen Sound. That illustrates what may happen in connection with an open market. I would advise the farmers to sell their eggs through the pool.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I can readily understand and appreciate the reason for grading eggs for export, or obliging the wholesalers to grade eggs; but the imposition of the grading system upon those who take a basket of eggs to the market at Kingston, London, Guelph, or any other centre in the province, or in Canada, is nothing short of an absolute nuisance. I think the people of this country have sufficient intelligence to pick out a dozen of eggs. I do not think it is necessary for the government to place a guard over them, or send some person along to tell them what they should buy, or oblige the farmers to place a label in the basket and subject them to a fine if they do not conform to the grades which are specified in the regulations.

[Miss MacPhail.]

There are a number of grades mentioned in class 1. For example, grade (a) "specials" is thus defined:

> Eggs of uniform size, weighing 25 ounces to the dozen and over, or 47 pounds net to the 30-dozen case; clean and free from stain, strong—
> Not in smell.
> —and sound in shell; air cell small, not over one-eighth of an inch in depth; white of egg to be firm and clear and yolk dimly visible.

What machinery does the farmer, or his wife, have to have in order to be perfectly sure that he or she shall not come under the penalty of the law? Well, the farmer's wife will have to have weight scales duly tested by government inspectors, I presume, in order to be sure that a dozen of eggs weigh 25 ounces. She may think that she is perfectly clear of any penalty under the law in that regard, but not so because the inspectors appointed by the government, desiring to show their authority and earn their salaries, come along and subject a few eggs out of the basket to candling. One of them takes a little rule out of his pocket and says: "Ah, you have these graded 'specials'. I want to point out to you that you have violated the law." "Why is that?" asks the woman. "Why, under that grade the air cell must not be more than one-eighth of an inch in depth. You can see for yourself if you look at this rule that the air cell in these eggs is three-sixteenths or nine-thirtyseconds of an inch." If that is so, she has violated the law. She is liable to a fine and imprisonment because, while the eggs may be all right in size and weight, the air cell is too deep. Her eyes may not be as good as his and she may make a mistake in estimating the one-eighth of an inch or thereabouts of the air cell, and so she comes within the law.

Supposing she is clear on that, then he points out to her again with the aid of a microscope or some other instrument he has at his disposal that while the eggs are correct as to weight and air cell, the white of the egg must be firm and clear and the yolk dimly visible. He says to the woman: "You can see for yourself that these eggs do not comply with the law; the yolk is not dimly visible; the line of demarcation between the yolk and the white is very clear and you have violated the law in that respect." So I might go through with the other different grades.

The whole thing is an absolute nuisance, a great inconvenience and an unnecessary expenditure on the part of the government. People who go to market might be trusted to select a basket of good eggs. Supposing some of them are smaller than others, what difference does that make? The farmer knows that in doing business with the general public on the open market he cannot expect to retain his customers unless he gives them what he says he gives them. He sells the eggs as fresh eggs and that is all there is to the matter. Supposing there are two farmers' wagons side by side each with a basket of eggs and the eggs of one farmer are a little smaller than those of the other while the price is the same. The customer uses his judgment, makes his own selection and buys accordingly. To oblige the farmer's wife who takes a few dozen eggs to market to candle them, weigh them and subject them to measurement as to depth of air cell and all that sort of thing, is a decided nuisance and inconvenience which does not protect the public because the public does not need any protection along that line.

Apply the system of grading if you will to eggs for export or sold to the wholesaler; but to put a person who goes on the open market offering for sale a basket of two, three, four or five dozen eggs to the inconvenience and trouble of candling every egg, and measuring as to air cell, visibility of yolk and all that sort of thing is utter nonsense. From conversations I have had week after week with people on the market at Kingston I know this is regarded by them as an unnecessary inconvenience and nuisance and I see no object to be gained by subjecting those who sell in small quantities to this inconvenience. Remove it as regards the sale by the farmer on the open market in the cities and towns throughout the country and you will not do any harm to the trade, but on the contrary you will do away with what is regarded as a great nuisance and inconvenience. Numbers of farmers and farm women have spoken to me in regard to this matter, and they feel when they offer a basket of eggs on the market that it is up to them to guarantee that those eggs are fresh, but they regard the requirement to grade them into firsts, seconds, specials and extras as entirely unnecessary and I regard it in that light also.

There is a little too much of a tendency on the part of legislative bodies including this House of Commons to exercise paternal care over and to regard the general public as possessed of no common sense at all. Let the general public exercise the common sense which they have exercised all through the past years until this grading was put into force. I have not heard any great demand on the part of the people for this and I do not believe there is any great demand.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I presume that this resolution, introduced as it is, is a vote of want of confidence in the government. In consequence of the neglect and failure of a certain department of this government to accord what I thought was the very barest and most common measure of justice to some constituents of mine, I had sworn by such political gods as I adhere to to vote against the government until that grievance was remedied. My action in this connection was much along the line referred to a few weeks ago by an hon. gentleman on the opposite side in regard to the man who would not stop talking until he got compensation for the widow's cow. I think there are occasions when that is undignified, but that was the only possible remedy. This is the opportunity for me to do that, but I cannot stultify my convictions in this particular instance and the interest of my constituents by voting against the government in this matter although I would like to do so.

According to the wording of the resolution the mover wants the egg grading regulation not to apply to sale by retail in the local markets. He modified that in his speech by saying that he did not want the system to apply to farmers selling eggs to a consumer. Do not all poultry farmers produce eggs for the retail trade? In that way the resolution would mean the vitiation of the whole system of egg grading. If you allow one portion of the trade to be exempt you might as well throw up your hands and withdraw the whole egg grading system, because it would be impossible to enforce it properly.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said: Why pick on eggs? This is one of the products of agriculture and almost all agricultural products are graded. The hon. member mentioned butter. Does he not know that butter is graded? What about wheat? What about hogs? In New Zealand you are not allowed to ship a carcass of mutton to the Old Country unless it is graded.

Mr. SENN: When a farmer exposes a pound of butter on the market for sale has it to be graded?

Mr. NEILL: I do not know, but if it is not necessary that it be graded that is perhaps the reason why the quality of Canadian butter is not as high as it should be. It is for export at least. In New Zealand they are so jealous of their reputation in regard to certain classes of mutton that they will not allow any of this product to be shipped out without inspection. The whole history of agriculture is leading the farmers more and more to the conviction, notwithstanding their objections in the initial stages, that co-operation is the only means by which they will be able to attain their greatest success. The fact that one uniform standardized product should be put upon the market is realized now to be the secret of their success.

The hon. member who introduces this amendment alluded to the fact that some of his constituents had to pay two cents a dozen for the grading of their eggs. Apparently the hon. gentleman's constituents have fallen upon rugged places, because it is done much cheaper out west although the cost of living is higher there. In the town of Courtenay, which is in the district I represent, there is an admirable system of co-operation which has worked out quite satisfactorily. It is true that originally the conditions indicated by the hon. member did obtain. A man brought his eggs to market and was unable to grade them himself, It was not convenient for him to do so, and it was equally inconvenient for the small grocer, to whom he sold his product, to do the grading. The result was that a haphazard system developed. To-day, on the other hand, all local eggs are taken to the creamery where they are graded by an expert. And it does not require any great amount of study, nor does it take very long for a man of ordinary intelligence to become expert in the grading of eggs. The eggs are graded and put into cartons or into other containers according to destination, this being done at the expense of the creamery; and if my memory does not serve me falsely—I do not think it does—the charge is half a cent a dozen. Under this system the public are sure of getting one standard grade of eggs. There is no trouble with dirty and inferior eggs to-day. The creamery after supplying the local demand ships out the surplus to the large markets in Vancouver and elsewhere. The same thing is done in the district represented by my hon. friend from Nanamio (Mr. Dickie). The result is a vast improvement upon the old-fashioned method of marketing eggs. I have personally seen eggs pour into the country grocer who ,although he did not want them, could not refuse to take them. He would cut down the price, but that did not help matters. The consequence was that there was left on his hands a miscellaneous assortment of odds and ends of hen's produce, from first class samples to dirty eggs. The grocer made a feeble attempt, with his meagre knowledge, to classify and ship out the better ones, but in the long run there was nothing but dissatisfaction both to himself and to the farmers.

[Mr. Neill.]

Eggs, I may observe, are now allowed to be shipped by the farmer ungraded if they are going to some wholesaler at a distance at whose warehouse they will be subject to inspection. There is always some objection to compulsory co-operation when it is first mooted. There will always be found persons who are ready to complain of any suggestion of restriction in any direction whatever. Men will say, "We want the right to do as we please. We want to have the freedom to sell our own produce as we see fit." Why, I have heard the argument for freedom of speech and freedom of action carried to absurd lengths, it is rather played out nowadays. I have even heard of the right to get drunk. On one occasion I came across an immigrant from some of the southern European countries who had a very serious grievance. It appeared that he had been arrested and put in jail because he had been discovered beating his wife, and he did not seem to see any reason for such a course. He explained to me that wife-beating was quite a common, and indeed almost an essential, part of the social system over there. Could a man not beat his own wife, he wanted to know. It is of course all in the point of view.

To-day the farmers are coming to see that no one should have the right to dispose of inferior produce in such a way as to injure the market for others. No producer should ship dirty eggs to the market and so spoil the chances of success of his brother farmers. It is in recognition of this principle that the regulations governing the shipment of eggs have been drawn up.

Some suggestion has been made that this was playing into the hands of the wholesalers. The reverse is the case. In 1922 I was present at a meeting held in the Chateau Laurier of representatives of the various egg dealers and producers in Canada. The wholesalers and other dealers outnumbered the producers, whose representatives were comparatively few. The object of the meeting was to study the situation with a view to adopting if possible some means of improving the quality of the product. The wholesalers opposed any suggestion looking to the grading of eggs. They declared that it would be disastrous to their business; they would have to go out of business if any system of egg grading were undertaken. Now, it happened that we had a Dominion act providing for inspection of eggs, but it applied only interprovincially. If a cargo of eggs left Vancouver for Victoria, no inspection was required; but in the case of a shipment from any point in British Columbia to Montreal, say federal inspection was enforced. I know of a car which was about to leave the province, but as the eggs did not come up to the grade required, the shipment was turned down with a resulting loss to the producers. That same dealer in Montreal went to the United States and bought a carload of eggs on which he made a good deal of money for the reason that he did not have to have them graded. He sold them as just eggs, and, as I say, he made money on the transaction and he did not come back to British Columbia. At the time of which I speak there was no compulsory grading so far as trade within the province was concerned, nor was there any restriction on eggs coming into the country. An effort was made to secure legislation controlling the situation, but it was impossible to get the wholesalers and the producers to agree. At the meeting to which I have referred the wholesalers were more numerous and influential than the producers, so that no recommendation was made. The government, however, afterwards took the matter up and decided to provide grading regulations to apply to all eggs coming into Canada. This provision resulted in the immediate exclusion of all eggs coming from the orient as well as in a marked reduction in imports from the United States. The opposition of the wholesalers was based on the assumption that inasmuch as the Americans did not grade their eggs the Canadian business man would be at a disadvantage. But did it result in any loss to the farmers or in a restriction of the sale of eggs? Not at all. It resulted, as the records of the Department of Agriculture will show, in an enormous increase in the consumption of eggs per capita.

I am surprised that the hon. gentleman who has introduced this amendment should take this attitude in regard to the question now being considered, for if the grading of eggs means anything at all it means protection in a definite form and of a most desirable kind. It is the kind of protection we can all agree upon. It protects the producer without adding any expense to the consumer. I am sorry that the debate has come on so unexpectedly, because I should have liked to have got all the data available to discuss the subject fully. I am safe in saying however that, as things have worked out, the consumption of eggs per capita in Canada since egg grading regulations have gone into effect has increased very materially. And this is readily understood. People in comfortable circumstances will buy eggs so long as they are assured of getting a sound article; but if they come across a bad egg now and then, they are apt to turn against the commodity for a while. They are, however, prepared to pay the highest price for the finest article. So that the grading of eggs, assuring as it does a uniform and high standard, has resulted in a large increase in sales. The poultry dealer as well as the farmer, is therefore satisfied, and the consumer is pleased because he knows just what he is getting. If anyone likes to buy an inferior egg at a lower price he is at liberty to do so, but the important point is that the eggs are not all mixed together now as they were formerly.

I am sorry I cannot produce the resolutions to-day, but when speaking a few months ago on another subject I read to the House two if not three resolutions passed by egg producing associations in British Columbia. They all emphasized this one demand: Please ask the Dominion government not to monkey with the grading regulations. One resolution was to this effect: It has been called to our attention that an effort has been made, or is being made, or is going to be made by the wholesalers and egg dealers of Canada to modify these regulations. We hope and we beg the government not to give heed to them. I read two, if not three, of those resolutions, and they will be found on Hansard. Therefore I think this amendment is not justified. While I admit it would make it a little easier for the farmer to retail his eggs directly, any inconvenience he is now subjected to is a small matter in comparison with the greater benefit that will accrue to him and all of his class in having a better demand for eggs as a result of these regulations.

As regards British Columbia and Ontario, while Ontario probably produces more eggs on account of its greater size and population, I think per capita British Columbia is a far larger producer of eggs, because the poultry men there engage in specialized egg farming. It is not uncommon for a poultry farmer to have from 4,000 up to as high as 10,000 birds. In their associations the poultrymen express their views, and I am quite free to state that not one of those associations, which are composed of the most advanced poultry farmers, has ever expressed a desire to go back on the egg regulations now in force.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Would my hon. friend favour the application of this principle of grading to butter, so that farmers would be obliged to grade the butter that they offer on the local market?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, I think I would go that length in the interest of the farmer himself, because every man who sells a bad egg or a pound of bad butter thereby depreciates the value of the whole product and lessens the demand.

Mr. M. R. DUNCAN (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) did not come to Owen Sound with her eggs on a market day, for then I am sure she would have got more money for them. I am surprised to hear that the farmers of her constituency regard the egg-grading law as a good law, because in my constituency when the regulations came into force the farmers were very much annoyed and expressed their disapproval in strong terms. We have a market in Owen Sound on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays, and private citizens go there to buy their butter and eggs. But those eggs are not graded at all, there being no inspector present for the purpose. Therefore I do not think the law is any good at any time.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should not like to be found among those who are opposed to the proper protection of the people's interests so far as food is concerned. I think, though, that in an effort to make a good law it is just possible occasionally to go a little too far, and I am inclined to suspect that that is the case with the present egg-grading law. I am familiar with only one point with respect to this law, which happened to come specially to my notice in the city of Kitchener and the town of Waterloo. In those two centres eggs are offered on the market very freely by the farmers of the surrounding country, and I suppose we have there two of the largest farm produce markets in Ontario outside of the larger cities. Those markets open very early, that in Kitchener at seven o'clock in the morning, which necessitates the farmers starting off from their homes at five o'clock. Under the present grading regulations they are obliged to stand in line until such time as their eggs can be inspected by the inspector, and they are required to pay 2 cents a dozen for the inspection. This delay has caused a good deal of dissatisfaction and inconvenience. My hon. friend from British Columbia (Mr. Neill) says the inconvenience is not very great, and the corresponding benefits outweigh it. I am not quite so sure about that. Certainly it is a very great inconvenience to the farmers I have referred to. There is also the inconsistency mentioned by an hon. member that there is no grading of eggs required when the farmer sells them from house to house or delivers them to his customers. I do not see why the farmer should not have the same freedom on the market.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): A block or two away.

Mr. EULER: Yes. I think in most cases those who buy their eggs on the market or at the door purchase them mostly from the same farmer; there is an established trade. When this matter came up with us about two months ago, the question was raised whether eggs had to be graded on the market. I took the opportunity of asking the Minister of Agriculture in regard to this, and he expressed the view that in quantities of less than fifteen dozen it was not necessary to grade eggs either on the market or when they were sold from house to house. I thought that was a pretty fair interpretation. However, it was found that the minister was mistaken and that under the law it was necessary to grade all eggs offered for sale on the market. I am not opposed out and out to the egg-grading law. I have my doubts about it, because, as I said at the outset, I think we are prone to make too many laws. At the time the law was enacted I thought it was quite fair because it would protect the farmer trying to sell by retail as against the dealer.

I would suggest to the minister as strongly as I can that he might very well vary the law and allow farmers to sell on the public markets in the same way as they sell from house to house. I know it has been urged that people would very much sooner pay a little more for their eggs even on the market, provided they are assured of getting absolutely good eggs. That may be true. Probably every member of the House, myself included, would prefer to buy eggs of undoubted quality. I think the provision might still be retained of having eggs graded where farmers desired the inspector to do so, but not to make this compulsory on the market. Then if we desire to have graded eggs we will go to those farmers who are taking the precaution to have their eggs inspected and graded. Possibly it would result that after a time those selling ungraded eggs would find it to their interest to have their eggs graded. I hope the minister will make some provision whereby this nuisance of grading at the market may be abolished.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Does the hon. gentleman think there should be grading with No. 1 first and then three grades superior to No. 1?

Mr. EULER: I am quite prepared to admit that we have too many grades. I rather think there is room for improvement there, although that was not the point I rose to discuss.

Mr. S. G. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I am strongly in favour of the standardizing and grading of all our products. We are a producing country, and therefore we must standardize the grades of the products we have to sell. Very much good has come to the live stock and other industries by grading. At one time it was thought not to pay or be worth while to try to sell a good thing because it was said it would be submerged by something of inferior quality and probably lower priced; but now with a proper system of grading we know the quality of the goods we are buying. I am already on record in this matter, for in the local legislature of Alberta I moved a resolution in March, 1925, asking that this act be amended in some respects. I am still of that opinion. I would like to read part of the resolution:

> That this legislature urges upon the Dominion government the necessity of amending the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act so as to permit producers of eggs to sell to country stores in limited quantities without candling or grading, such eggs not to be for domestic consumption or for export until after they are candled or graded—

And so on. I was led to believe from certain circulars that these regulations were afterwards suspended; I think the retail associations sent out pamphlets stating that these regulations were suspended, and that was my understanding. I wish to say further that if the resolution before the House had been brought in under different circumstances and in a different way, I would have been inclined to support it. It could have been put on the order paper and brought up in the regular way, but instead we find it introduced as a want of confidence motion to prevent the government from going into supply, and I think the continuance of the government is much more important than this single matter. The government has a large programme of important legislation to put through, and I think it should be permitted to do so. But I do hope and believe that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) will make some amendments to these egg-grading regulations; I think the details are a little too many and too hard to understand. Away out in the country the farmers wish to sell a few eggs to the country store. The store itself is only a small place, possibly combined with a post office and the business would amount to only a few hundred dollars yearly. Under these conditions that man could not have a grader, or if he had one the grader would not know his business.

As I have already said I understood and still understand that these regulations were suspended, but I merely want to put myself properly on record in this connection, because I am already on record as being opposed to some of the provisions of this act. I want it understood that I cannot support this amendment, introduced as it is; it is a motion of want of confidence in the government which I am supporting, and as such I must vote against it.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I must admit that I do not know very much about the grading of eggs, but I do know that many people are greatly disappointed when they buy an egg and find that they have a chicken. That happened so often in the past that I have no doubt it was responsible for the desire on the part of the Department of Agriculture to institute some grading system for eggs. I regret that the rules of this House are so out of date that we must spend our time discussing this small matter while we have a committee on Agriculture which could deal very much better with this matter than can the full House. I am going to suggest to the Minister of Agriculture and to the mover of this amendment that they might agree to have this question referred to the committee on Agriculture, when the head of the Poultry division of this department might be called before the committee. In that way we might improve the regulations for the grading of eggs.

I sent to the library for the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, but now that I have it I find very little information about the grading of eggs; it is all covered by regulations made by the department. I am at a disadvantage in speaking on this subject, because I have not a copy of the regulations, and all I know about the different grades of eggs is what has been said to-day. From my limited knowledge of the subject I am inclined to believe, however, that our present grades are very misleading to the public. If that is the case it should be corrected, but I think the majority of the hon. members are in the same position; they are not very familiar with all the different grades of eggs enumerated in the regulations.

As I understand it the complaint to-day is that a farmer cannot take a few eggs to the market without having them graded; that at least is the complaint of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I have felt that there should be another grade of eggs included in the regulations, namely ungraded eggs. If anyone wants to sell his eggs on the local market or from house to house without grading them, and if the customers at the market or the people of the town want to buy them that way, I do not see why that should not be permitted. This would not in any way interfere with the egg-grading system, because the buyer and seller both know the eggs are not graded and no harm would be done. I think we must have some grading system, but I believe that if my suggestion were adopted it would meet most of the objections raised today.

I do hope this matter will be sent to the committee on Agriculture where we will have a better opportunity to discuss the question fully. Possibly the regulations could be amended in such a way as to meet the wishes of honourable members who have raised this question and still safeguard the system of egg-grading in Canada.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I have to thank those who have contributed to this debate, Mr. Speaker. This is by no means a new theme; it has engaged the attention of the farmers, consumers and middlemen not only of Canada but of the United States, Great Britain, Ireland, and practically every other country where eggs are produced for export for many years. I would like to correct as gently as possible some of the erroneous views held by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) before starting to discuss this matter. He seems to want to throw the responsibility for this act, so far as eggs are concerned, on this government; he has brought it up on a motion to go into supply so that the responsibility will be placed squarely on the shoulders of the government. In other words we may have to bear the yoke, so to speak. Surely this is not a sufficiently serious question on which to defeat a government which has come safely through the trials and tribulations we have during the last four or five months. We deserve to live a while longer, and should not succumb to an attack of this nature. I assume that my hon. friend is not desirous of upsetting the government on this momentous question, but at the same time if he were more desirous of improving the situation I think he would have waited until my estimates came up, because the very first item has to do with live stock and this whole question could have been threshed out.

However, that is all by the way. The responsibility of introducing the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, as my hon. friend said, dates back to 1917; the original act was assented to on September 20 of that year. The moment 1917 is mentioned one's mind immediately goes back to the Union government, but do not place this at the door of the Union government, because I believe that government did not come into existence until later on. The elections were not held until December; perhaps the Union government existed before that, but at all events it was before our time. I would like to know what article my hon. friend was reading when he said the act prior to 1923 contained no reference to eggs or wool.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the statute.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will have to get that reconciled in some way, perhaps before the agricultural committee, in regard to which the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) made a very good suggestion. Here is chapter 32, an act respecting Live Stock, assented to September 20, 1917. I am not wanting to repudiate responsibility in any way; I merely want to show that I am correct. The definition clause of this act of 1917 provides:

"Live stock products" means meat, poultry, eggs and wool.

I will pass this over to my hon. friend when I am through, if he will pass me over his authority. Then section 9 provides:

The Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing,—

(a) the manner in which stock yards are to be constructed, equipped, maintained and operated.

(b) the manner in which complaints against commission merchants and the operation, maintenance or management of stock yards shall be made and investigated;

(c) the manner in which live stock, meat, poultry, eggs and wool shall be graded and branded or marked, and what shall be the size of packages containing meat, eggs and poultry, the kind of package that may be used, and how such packages shall be branded, marked or labelled.

I am not wanting to put my hon. friend in a corner or anything like that, although I am afraid he was trying to put me in one, and he did not give all the information correctly. Were we in power in 1917? I remember that we had an election at that time, and that we did not get in. Here is the act of 1923, and it provides:

"Live stock products" means meats, poultry, eggs and wool, the word "eggs" where used to include frozen eggs, liquid eggs, desiccated eggs and eggs in the shell.

That is the only difference. I am not wanting to squirm out of anything at all, but my hon. friend has left the impression on the House that the consolidated act of 1923 was sort of smuggled through the House. Maybe the word "smuggled" is rather suggestive to him in view of what has been happening this session, and he thinks I am going into smuggling too. One of the reasons why there was very little discussion when this act was before the House was that there had been a very long discussion of it in the committee on Agriculture. I recall it well as this was the first act of any account that I had charge of, and it was so decimated, so mauled around in the committee of Agriculture, that we had to reprint the bill; it was given a thorough going over, not only on one day, but on several days. I remember the produce dealers from many parts of Canada were present; in fact, the room was as full as it has been in the last few days, when the Campbell bill was before the committee on Agriculture, and it was quite as interesting. The railways were represented there to look after their interests, as well as the produce dealers, and we had at least four or five sittings of the committee. Under those circumstances one would not expect any very extended remarks when the bill came back into the House. The House usually accepts, not without question, but in the main it generally accepts the reports of the committee on Agriculture on questions that are essentially agricultural, so that it is not to be wondered at that there was not much discussion in the House. I think my hon. friend understands the reason now. So much for that.

My hon. friend also complained that the grading was so badly done at the grading station at Guelph, or somewhere in the vicinity, that a basket of eggs that was passed through the station three times got as many different grades. Our egg inspectors report that tricks like that are sometimes put up on them, but can you imagine a basket of eggs going through a station three times without some of them being cracked, even with the most careful handling? Then, of course, they will be in a different condition at the third handling, and will have to be graded down, and a great ado is made if it is but one grade different. These stations are not put up by the government, but by the farmers or by the trade itself. The farmers can use them or not; it is optional with them. We will supply the farmers with the candling equipment without cost to them, and we are doing it when it is requested, and sometimes without a request, where we think it is required. We will send them the candling equipment, at no cost to themselves, everything except the light. So the question of the cost of the grading can be eliminated. It is optional with the farmers whether they use the grading station or not, and as I said before, the grading station is put up frequently by the trade itself for the convenience of the farmers.

My hon. friend also referred to the egg graders being appointed by the Civil Service Commission. I wish someone would tell me how to get an inspector appointed without having to go to the commission. I would try it, I think; as a matter of fact, I did try it at first, and I failed. I have not got very much fault to find with the Civil Service Commission as such, but they are governed by an abominable act which I never had any use for and never will have, and if there is anything wrong with the egg inspectors you can lay it right at the door, not so much of the commission, as of this act. We have nothing whatever to do with the selection of the egg inspectors. We have to accept the commission's appointments; that is the trouble.

My good friend indicates that the farmers' wives particularly are imposed upon by these regulations. I have taken particular interest in the attitude of the Ontario farm women in regard to this matter. As every member of the House knows the revenue from the eggs and poultry goes to the farm women.

Miss MACPHAIL: And that is all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I remember attending a meeting at Chatham the year after these regulations were framed and there was great excitement there. There was a great crowd of women on hand, and I saw a number of them in the drawing room of the hotel. I could not help wondering which side they were on, because I thought they were going to win; they looked as if they meant business. After we had sat around a while and began to make inquiries from the complainants—and incidentally, nearly all these agitations are started by someone who has had his fingers burned by a prosecution for violating the regulations; we have had a few such cases in Guelph—I asked two gentlemen what was the trouble. They said that the whole business was wrong, and they wanted the grading done by weight, and weight alone. That was the proper way to grade, they said. That is I may say the system in some countries. But inasmuch as an egg is only useful in proportion to its fitness for use, the size of an egg is of no advantage if, when you knock the top off, the egg does not suit; the more there is of it, the worse it is. They admitted then that weight should be only one of the factors in grading, and under the regulations it is a factor. Then one of the leaders of the ladies' party arose, and soon showed that she was on our side, fortunately. I do not remember her name, I am glad to say, because I might be tempted to use it. She said:

> I do not see why these middlemen cannot play their part without interfering with one of the little good things the government ever has done for us. It is rarely that a government ever does anything that is worth much to the producer, but here is one act on the part of the government that is really to the advantage of the producer of eggs, and here these middlemen have to step in and try to muddle up the thing and not have the system accepted.

I felt like pluming myself when I heard that, because I was partially responsible for the act. I am not wholly responsible, because my predecessors were responsible for introducing the act first as applied to the wholesale and interprovincial trade. It was not until 1923 that it was extended to the retail trade.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will come to that. Of course we all have to recognize that my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) is a profound authority on these markets. There are some other matters he may know more about, but we admit that on this particular subject he is quite an authority. We have also to admit that his statement has been rational and reasonable to the extent of his knowledge of the question under discussion.

I was sorry to have had a misunderstanding with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I think nobody would quarrel with the hon. member unless such person were suffering from a delusion. However, we had a little misunderstanding. I never dreamt that he was asking me with respect to the grading of eggs on the local market. I told him that under section 10 of the regulations, the farmers were exempt from grading eggs that were put on the market in the usual way and were not retailed. I also indicated that if a farmer had a number of customers, and there are a great many such, in the cities and towns, and delivered eggs to them, no grading was required there. The hon. member for North Waterloo may say that the farmers are required to grade their eggs when they go on to the market and become retailers. We do not use the word "retailers," but that is what the farmers become when they go on the market and retail their own eggs. That is what my hon. friend was alluding to, I suppose, in his remarks to me—the case of the farmer who sells eggs by retail, in other words the farmer who is a producer in the first instance and a retailer in the second instance. If what is asked can be permitted without upsetting the whole applecart I will be glad to consider it. But the conditions under which eggs are sold not on the market but on the market-place—I think that is what my hon. friend for South Wellington had in mind—should be remembered. Go down to the market-place in Ottawa and you will find others than farmers there selling eggs. You will find hucksters and peddlers, and dear only knows where these men get their eggs. They do not produce eggs—they are rarely egg producers but they get them in any old place where they can gather them up. There are really several classes of people that dispose of eggs on the local market-place. Now the request is made that we make an exception of farmers. I am willing to consider the request but it must be borne in mind that adequate safeguards must be provided in the interests of the consumer. Because eggs that were formerly sold on the market-place were not labelled at all. They may have been hen eggs, they may have been duck eggs, they may have been pigeon eggs, they even may have been nest-eggs. They were not graded, and you could not tell the quality until it was too late. I do not think I am exaggerating at all in making that statement. Now the proposition is to take a retrograde step and revert to the condition of affairs that prevailed ten or fifteen years ago when we are trying, in this progressive age, to build up a good market for the farmer and to insure that the eggs sold to the public shall be eggs of good quality.

Mr. EULER: Does the minister see any objection to accepting the suggestion of the hon. member for Macleod—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Delighted.

Mr. EULER—that provision be made for the grading of eggs but that it be not compulsory and that eggs may be sold as ungraded?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I thought my hon. friend was in favour of referring the whole matter again to the agricultural committee—

Mr. EULER: That is right.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —where everybody would have a chance to give evidence on this very important question, including the hon. member for South Wellington, because in this important matter we should not take a sudden plunge. Every precaution was taken, in devising these regulations, not to worry the producer unduly. It was recognized that he had trouble enough without having to worry too much over the marketing of his eggs, and the idea was to make regulations with which he could comply without being unduly harassed, and at the same time try to raise the standard of the trade in the interest of the consumer and everybody else. Now section 10 of the regulation reads as follows:

4 p.m.

All persons who receive eggs on consignment or buy eggs for resale, in making payment for same, shall apportion the returns on the basis of at least two of the grades specified in these regulations—

There are no five grades such as were represented, and the dealers have to make a return of the eggs purchased which simplifies the matter very much. The section goes on to say:

—accompanied by a statement on the forms as required in schedule "A" to these regulations, provided that this regulation shall not apply where producers market their eggs in less than fifteen dozen lots in any one day.

That is to say the farmers can market fifteen dozen in any one day without having the eggs graded. The question is asked, why cannot the farmers sell their eggs on the local market-place without being subject to grading? That is a matter for consideration. How are we going to do so and at the same time exclude the hucksters, the peddlers, and those who do not produce eggs but get them in any old way? Even if the concession were made what kind of market would be built up? Remember that only a very small proportion of the eggs produced by the farmers goes on the local market. The great bulk of them is disposed of through co-operative activities, or in other words the egg pools of the country In my own province of Saskatchewan recently the egg pool had over fifteen thousand signed contracts. There are some seven or eight egg stations and over two hundred receiving stations in the province, and eggs are going through by the carload under these regulations with perfect satisfaction to the farmer. Ever since 1911 we have been endeavouring to improve the quality of the eggs sold in Canada wholesale and for export. The trade, after discussing the matter in 1911, 1912, and 1913 came to an agreement as to the grades that should be constituted. The great trouble was that in many cases the regulations did not conform with each other, but in 1918 the federal authority consolidated the regulations and crystallized them into national regulations looking to the betterment of this important project. In a matter of this kind, as in all other human affairs, it is necessary that there should be a process of evolution.

Mr. NEILL: Has the minister had any representations made by the poultry dealers' associations of British Columbia?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, I have a whole sheave of them here. I have the advantage of my hon. friend; I should have passed some of them over to him, there are more here than I can read. But they do not want any change. They do not ask for any modification such as that asked for by my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie). Rather they want the regulations tried out for one year longer.

Now here is the section with regard to the local market, but as I said before I think the hon. gentleman means the local market-place. Yes, I find I am right. Well, that is an old-fashioned institution to which all classes of people like to go,—the rich, the middle classes and the poor. The kind of eggs my hon. friend wishes is the catch-as-catch-can kind; you never know what is in them until you knock the top off. He thinks it is lots of fun going onto the market and dickering for produce. If you want to see real fun, you should go into a local market in some towns in the Old Country, especially in Ireland, where you will see people haggling over maybe an old rooster or an old hen they have in their hand and scrapping until you would think they were going to fight over it. People like to trade and dicker. I do not know how they will keep that up if my hon. friend has his way and hucksters, peddlers and anybody else are allowed in the market without grading. Is that a step in advance or a backward step or is it an intermediate step? I want the best. It has been my privilege to build on the foundation laid in some cases by my predecessor the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie). With respect to dairy matters he had the act passed through this House and left it to be brought into force by proclamation. In the meantime an educative campaign was going on preparing the public mind for the day when cheese, butter and eggs would be graded for export. We extended that grading but the measure was introduced by my predecessor and I wish to give him every credit for that initial step.

It has been my lot and privilege to introduce many reforms in the matter of grading, and out of them all, whether it be butter, eggs, cheese, hogs, apples, or vegetables of any kind, apparently exception can be had by our good friends on the other side just as regards the fractional part of one product —eggs—and only in the very smallest fractional part. Grading for export is all right and so is grading for import under which we have excluded practically all oriental eggs. By the strictness of our grading we are doing more to keep out that kind of rubbish than the duty of three per cent does. Our grading for export and import is sound; to our grading for the big markets like Montreal and Toronto my hon. friend has taken no exception. Just as on former occasions his heart is at present weeping for the farmer and he wants to do something for him in a strange sort of way. He wants to turn back the wheel of progress ten or fifteen years and again institute a market of this kind. I wonder how much my hon. friend would patronize it. He might go in and get a dozen of ducks' eggs. Ducks' eggs are recognized as very good for cooking, but nobody wants a straight duck's egg for breakfast. Somebody might offer a bunch of pigeons' eggs about the size of your nail. On the other hand a number of people might like big double-yolkers. Perhaps out on the farm the children will be running around hunting behind wood piles and in other places and find maybe fifty or sixty eggs clawed over for several days or weeks by each hen using the nest and with finger prints on them. Back they come with their arms full of these eggs, delighted at their find. Is that the kind of eggs my hon. friend wants on the local market? Every man to his taste!

Section 5 reads:

Every case or container of eggs that is exposed, displayed or offered for sale by any person selling or delivering eggs direct to consumers in a public place or manner shall be marked, labelled, tagged or accompanied in conspiciaus letters with the name of the class and grade of eggs according to the Canadian standards.

That is the regulation requiring that all who go on the market and sell eggs as retailers must be figured alike. As I said before I am ready to refer this bill at a moment's notice to the Agricultural committee and see if it cannot be improved upon in any way. I would think it would be not a kindness but an unkindness to make the change, but perhaps my views are biased in the matter so that I will defer to what others think of it. This is a telegram received recently by Mr. Brown, Chief of the Poultry Division, from Mr. Clemens. Apparently he must have heard of this. The echoes of these things have reached Toronto from Guelph. This is the telegram:

Chief of Poultry division, Live Stock branch, Ottawa, Ont. In the interests of producers and consumers it would be disastrous to discontinue the grading of eggs on public markets and dealers' warehouses. Egg grading has most certainly increased home consumption, established confidence between producer and consumer and with our increasing production the farmer cannot afford to return to old slipshod way of selling eggs.

That is from the general manager of the United Farmers' Co-operative Company. Many hon. members must know Mr. Clemens who was in Ottawa about a month ago working out a proposal to construct a co-operative cold storage plant in Toronto for the purpose of storing eggs when the storage season would commence. That gentleman's testimony is worth something and I understand he represents at least 30,000 farmers. I have another telegram the substance of which indicates that on the Toronto market itself they are highly in favour of egg-grading and would be sorry to depart from it even on the local market.

[Mr Motherwell.]

I think if there was a grievance down by the sea they would discover it. I want to pay this tribute to the Maritimes; they have made more advance in the matter of production of eggs on a quality basis than any other part of Canada, even than British Columbia, and that is saying a great deal. This is particularly true of Prince Edward Island. They are great advocates of grading eggs and selling according to our standard, and they insist on that. Part of our recreation is to stand these gentlemen off in their protestations that we are not going forward more quickly than we are in completing this system. This is a resolution passed by the New Brunswick Poultry Exchange at their annual meeting in January, 1926, before it was ever whispered abroad that my hon. friend contemplated this momentous motion:

Whereas the Canadian egg regulations as at present existing have provided a common basis of trading, and created confidence in egg trading.

And whereas consumption of eggs in Canada has gradually increased since the regulations went into effect so that our average per capita consumption is now 25 dozen annually.

That is correct. Fourteen years ago it was only sixteen dozen annually. In other words, we have made a market. Since the egg regulations came into force Canada consumes at home over 80,000,000 dozen eggs more than she did previously. We export only 3,000,000 dozen. What will you do with the 77,000,000 dozen and what will you get for them if you have to sell them as storage eggs abroad? The resolution continues:

And whereas under the present regulations Canadian eggs have found ready sale in British markets,

Resolved, that the New Brunswick Poultry Exchange in annual convention assembled do hereby place themselves on record as entirely in accord with the principle of egg grading as required by the regulations and urge the department to rigidly enforce same both as regards class and grade.

Since it is only the minor detail of an infinitesimal fractional part of one article that the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) differs from me on, we are not so far apart as regards the principle and soundness of grading generally. How the hon. gentleman can drag this question into the limelight and propose a vote of want of confidence in the government, and at the same time have a desire to secure a reform, is really past my understanding. Possibly he will enlighten us at some future time. Let me read the following in reference to a meeting held at Waterloo:

At a meeting of the Waterloo retail grocers held in the council chambers, last night, (April 9th, 1926) the following resolution was passed, unanimously:

"That this meeting of the Waterloo grocers and egg dealers, wishing to strengthan the hands of the Minister of Agriculture, places itself on record, that they appreciate the value and benefit of the egg regulations and earnestly desire a stricter and more rigid enforcement of the regulations. They also wish to express their approval of the manner in which the Waterloo egg grading station has been operated."

In the city of Guelph, where the grading system is carried out, they are getting from three to seven cents more for their eggs than the producers obtain in Waterloo, where only 50 per cent of the eggs are graded. This shows that the more strictly they adhere to the grading system, the higher the prices the producers receive for their eggs. There is a larger sale at Guelph and the return to the producer is enhanced, and this is due to the enforcement of the regulations. Here is what comes from New Westminster, to which a reference has been made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill):

Herewith please find list of names signed by our producers and vendors who are very much against altering the Dominion Egg Grading Act.

Your Mr. Thornfield has been very good and we have both spent a lot of time getting our producers and vendors broken in—

That is a good term.

—to grade and candle their eggs. Mr. Thornfield has gone out of his way many many times to show our producers how to grade their eggs and there is never a market day passes but what he is here inspecting the eggs and giving advice how to grade.

I feel it would be bad both for the producer and our market to alter the act just when it is working so well for both parties.

Trusting that you will do all in your power to keep the act in force, I am,

In November there was a perfect epidemic of resolutions of this kind started in British Columbia on the far-away Pacific coast. The people there no doubt heard the reverberations and the after-claps from the election campaign in Wellington county, where apparently this question was made an important issue. And if the hon. gentleman had succeeded in getting on this side of the House he would evidently have abolished these regulations. This, at any rate, is the inference to be drawn from the reports of his campaign speeches. What he said at that time was no doubt magnified in the transmission from his county to the Pacific coast, with the result that there was a large crop of resolutions all imploring the government not to touch the regulations at all. Here is another letter signed by a considerable number of persons interested in the business:

We, the producers and vendors of the Fraser valley market understand that there is a movement on foot to alter the Dominion Egg Grading Act.

You see how far afield the hon. gentleman's fame spread.

We wish to state that in our opinion the Egg Grading Act has been a great benefit to us in increased returns, and do not wish it altered.

There is no reservation there. A long list of names follows but I shall not read it. I do not know any of the persons enumerated nor do I think hon. gentlemen would recognize many of them. I come now to a communication from the Cowichan Creamery Association:

Re grading of eggs.

We notice a news item in a provincial paper to the effect that eastern produce dealers are asking for changes to be made in the regulations governing the grading of eggs. Under date of 17th inst., we sent a letter to your inspector in Victoria supporting the regulations, as in our opinion we consider the present system of grading to be of benefit alike to producer, merchant and consumer. When writing to your inspector we were not aware of this agitation against the regulations.—

They call it an agitation.

—in eastern Canada, and we would esteem it a favour if you can give us any information on the point, whether our information is reliable or not, and if it is so, just what do the produce dealers have in mind.

We think we state but the simple truth when we assert producers and dealers in British Columbia are in favour of the regulations. No doubt minor alterations may be made from time to time as experience shows where adjustment is necessary, but as the governing standard in the egg business of the country we are strongly of the opinion they ought to stand.

That is almost word for word in agreement with what I have already said. This matter of egg grading, like so many other improvements, is one of evolution. The hon. gentleman would have us take a retrograde step, and while I am sure there is nothing to be said that is not favourable to the system as it is now in force, I am willing to have the subject investigated thoroughly in the place where such an investigation can best be held, namely, before the committee on Agriculture. If you like, I will stay away altogether.

Mr. NEILL: In view of the statement made by the minister in the House some months ago, that it was his determined policy to make no change in the regulations this year, is it fair now for him to refer the matter to that committee at this late stage of the session?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: So much importance has been attached to the question by some hon. gentlemen opposite that I am willing to allow it to be discussed in that committee, and we can afford to run the risk of any changes being made in the regulations. This has been made a public question and we should, in my opinion, court the fullest publicity. All these documents can be submitted in evidence, to show the strong feeling that prevails against any change at this time.

In any event it would not be worth while making any change for another year. Some considerable time ago, both the wholesale dealers and the retail trade met in this city, and the government was requested to remodel the regulations. We had no intention of making any alterations in the regulations, the idea being that we would merely simplify them. One gentleman from Winnipeg remained over to give what assistance he could to the departmental officials in working out possible improvements, and while this process of simplification was going on there came the insistent demand that the regulations be not touched. That is why I made the statement some time ago, to which my hon. friend has referred, that in view of the differences of opinion which apparently existed we would allow the regulations to be enforced for another year. The following resolution comes from Harmsworth District Farmers' Association, British Columbia:

That this meeting, being representative of the poultry industry of this district of the municipality of Langley, British Columbia, appreciates the value of the Egg Grading Act inasmuch as its enforcement has the effect of giving the producer fair value for the eggs marketed by him, and the consumer a guarantee of quality and weight, and

Be it resolved,

That this meeting would view with great apprehension any move to repeal or modify the said Egg Grading Act which would have the effect of relaxing the regulations to allow the purchase or sale of eggs other than by the present standard grades.

There would be no system of grading at all if eggs were sorted in the market place. In olden times people instead of going to Hyde park to engage in arguments went to the market place, and I presume that the grading of eggs there would be a means of popularizing these open air debates. If people wanted to get rid of some undesirable speaker they would have the proper missiles handy with which to assail him.

So that I have read reports of public feeling in New Brunswick, on the Pacific coast, in Toronto and in Guelph, on the question of these regulations and the desirability or otherwise of amending them. There is another resolution addressed to me by a gentleman named Mufford, secretary of the Milner Poultry Association:

Whereas it has been learned that attempts are being made in certain provinces to change the present regulations respecting the grading and marking of eggs,

And whereas the present regulations as far as the payment for eggs on a graded basis is concerned have proven to be the only fair method of returning payment to the producer,

And whereas the present method of payment on a graded basis has benefited the producer by giving him better returns for his eggs,

Be it therefore resolved that this meeting of poultry producers in the Milner district go on record as being in favour of the continued application of the regulations as far as payment to the producer on a graded basis is concerned.

By this time my hon. friend must have come to the conclusion that there are at least two sides to this question, and that not everything is on his side. These people who are the producers, and upon whose behalf he is pleading, as I am, because after all they are the most important people to be considered, are strongly in favour of egg-grading. Next to them I presume come the consumers, although they are not in the habit of asserting themselves very much, but they also are in favour of the regulations because they know what they are buying when they buy graded eggs. As a result the people of this country are eating more eggs. Last year every man, woman and child in the Dominion ate 120 eggs more than four years ago. My hon. friend belongs to a party that never misses an opportunity of extolling the benefits of the home market. Well, I have produced a home market for 85,000,000 dozen of eggs more than our farmers had before, but I get not one word of approval from my hon. friends opposite. What is the use of playing their game if you are to get the cold shoulder in this way? And from an old political friend at one time! He should not be as bad as the hard-boiled ones. But unfortunately the latter stage of these backsliders is worse than their first. Here is a statement from Guelph. It is got up by the director of publicity for the live stock branch as a press despatch. We are not using it as propaganda or it would have been out before.

The grading of eggs has been applied rigidly on the Guelph market for over a year, the farmers' eggs being graded at a booth on the market. At Waterloo, although grading has been in effect for a much shorter time than at Guelph, fully ninety-eight per cent of the eggs sold on the market are classified and graded. At Kitchener, on the other hand, not alone has grading been in effect for only a short time, but the graded eggs have never constituted more than fifty per cent of the total quantity of eggs on the market.

Because of this difference to which my hon. friend and I have been referring.

In view of these conditions the price comparisons on the different markets are extremely interesting.

Guelph farmers, with their market strengthened by a full year of thorough grading, received an average of three cents a dozen more for their eggs than the Waterloo farmers and seven cents a dozen more than the farmers in the vicinity of Kitchener. Similarly, farmers on the Waterloo market, who have been practising grading for but a few months, received an average of four cents per dozen more for their eggs than did the producers at Kitchener, where only fifty per cent of the eggs were graded.

That is an authentic statement, and I think we may accept it as such.

Mr. EULER: May we take it, then, that the minister will allow the question to go to the agricultural committee?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The House is master, and I feel that the hon. member for South Wellington has raised an issue that we should try to get to the bottom of as far as possible. I would be in favour of its going there.

Mr. DUNNING: Not on this motion.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. This motion, if it passes, defeats the government. I should like to draw attention to the fact that, as I indicated before, this is a matter of more than ordinary importance. As our urban centres grow they consume a larger percentage of egg product as against meat product, the former being found to be more wholesome and healthful. I have in my hand a report on egg marketing in England and Wales issued by the British Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries. It contains 148 pages, but I am not going to quote it. The report refers approvingly to the progress Canada has made, and it is pointed out that we are the only country grading eggs on an interior quality basis. If any hon. gentlemen think our system is complex, I would remind them that it is simple compared with even the rudimentary efforts in egg grading that are being made in Great Britain and in the United States. Whether the names of our grades are right or not; the United States have copied ours almost in toto. We have often been criticized for not having the grades numerically or alphabetically. Well, there is a habit all over the world of attaching the word special or fancy to something of particular excellence, and the best eggs for hospitals are called "specials." They are not looked upon as a commercial grade, for it is only men like my friend Goddard who can sell their eggs every other day and get very many specials fresh off the bat. My hon. friends can see this large sheet of United States standards and grades for eggs. It would make one dizzy to go through the complications in connection with grading in that country. They are where my hon. friends opposite were back in 1918 when they were laying the foundation for this work. It was optional for a while. It is optional in the United States now. Our grading for cheese and butter for a year after I had charge of this work was voluntary. That is the sensible way. In the United States they are preparing for the day when they will catch up to Canada and have their egg grading compulsory. The United States standards of quality for individual eggs are: U.S. Special; U.S. Extra; U.S. Standard; U.S. Trade; U.S. Standard Dirty; U.S. Trade Dirty; U.S. Check. There is nothing suggestive of the relative standing of these grades except possibly the first two. This important question is engaging the attention of United States authorities, and they are following in our footsteps—instead of being a tailender we are leading the way. Egg grading is in force in the north of Ireland. Here is the regulation:

> If any such eggs are exposed for sale by retail there shall be attached to or exhibited with,— and so forth, and so forth. They are searching out in the same direction. Why? Because a great many of their eggs are sold in the British market, and they know the taste of their customers is for eggs of the best quality, and they also know that if their customers want quality they must pay on the basis of quality. With all these authorities it is not surprising that the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and myself, as well as others, might differ in the matter of details.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would the minister consent to refer to the committee on Agriculture the specific question in the last line of this resolution:

> —that such system, in so far as it applies to sale by retail in local markets, should be discontinued.

Would the minister refer that particular question to the committee without going into the whole egg trade?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will do so if my hon. friend will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am satisfied.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then I have finished, Mr. Speaker.

Amendment withdrawn.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee of Supply, Mr. Duff in the chair.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

Railways and Canals—Hudson Bay railway—construction and betterments, $3,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): In order to explain I should say that the steel on the Hudson Bay railway is laid from mile 0 at Le Pas, Manitoba, to mile 332 at Kettle Rapids, and the $3,000,000 asked for is designed to put that 332 miles in shape for operation. It is not intended to bring the road to main line standard, but to the ordinary standard of branch line construction. I had better give the committee the details of how the estimate of $3,000,000 is arrived at, and I may say here that the estimate was made by the engineering staff of the Canadian National Railways. It is estimated that 950 tons of 80 pound rails will be required to replace those kinked; the amount involved is $39,900; there will be required 650,000 ties at $1.10, a total of $715,000, and the placing of those ties at 35 cents each will amount to $227,500. Cutting brush on the right of way, $25,000; widening cuts, 50,000 cubic yards at 80 cents, $40,000; cleaning ditches, $10,000; widening banks and raising sags, 500,000 cubic yards at 90 cents, $450,000; ballasting at the rate of 500 cubic yards per mile, a total of 180,000 cubic yards at $1.10 per yard, a total of $198,000. One bridge is required at Cormorant lake narrows, mile 42, the estimated cost of which is $49,500; repairs to trestles and culverts, estimated cost $50,000; repairs to telegraph line, $10,000. It should be understood that the existing Hudson Bay railway simply consists of a pair of rails with none of the necessary operating equipment such as water stations, engine terminals at divisional points and so on. So we are estimating that twelve water stations will be required at a total cost of $132,000. We will need thirty section men's dwellings costing a total of $57,000, thirty bunk houses costing $33,000, and thirty tool houses costing $9,000. We are only allowing for four stations at present in the 332 miles in addition to the present station at Le Pas, and these stations will cost $26,400. Only twenty miles of wire fencing is estimated, to cost $9,000. We will require six pumpmen's dwellings costing $12,000, and with regard to the necessary operating facilities we will require an engine terminal at Le Pas costing $200,000; another at mile 136 costing $250,000 and another at mile 296 costing the same amount. The total of the figures I have read is $2,793,300, and the balance of the $3,000,000 is allowed for engineering and contingencies.

Mr. HAY: Are you not building an engine house at the terminal?

Mr. DUNNING: Where?

Mr. HAY: At the bay.

Mr. DUNNING: I explained at the outset that the $3,000,000 in this estimate is for the purpose of putting into condition the 332 miles which at present has steel.

Mr. HAY: I mean just an engine house.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not now dealing with any expenditure at Nelson, but with the expenditure necessary to put into condition the existing 332 miles of steel. The engine terminals to which I refer are those terminals necessary for the operation of that mileage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much farther is it to Nelson?

Mr. DUNNING: Nelson is 92 miles from the end of steel at mile 332. The grade is built from the end of steel to Nelson but there is no steel beyond mile 332.

Mr. HANNESSON: Has the minister an estimate of how much it will cost to complete that 92 miles?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and perhaps this is the proper place to give that information. It is quite clear, then, that the $3,000,000 now before the House is estimated in accordance with the detail which I have placed on Hansard and will be devoted to conditioning and putting into operating shape the 332 miles which already has steel. That is this year's work. The information I am now giving in response to the hon. member for Selkirk is with regard to the cost of completing the 92 miles, which is graded, from the present end of steel into Port Nelson. The estimated cost from Kettle Rapids, mile 332, to Port Nelson, mile 424, is $3,153,000. I presume my hon. friend would like the details in this connection as in the other. They are as follows:

With regard to the estimate for rails, it is based upon 80 pound relay rails, not new rails, but rails of the weight used on the road up to mile 332. Instead of using new rails, relay rails from other parts of the system will be used and we have on hand 1,342 tons.

Mr. HANNESSON: Is there nothing for engine terminals?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, that is included in the item for railway terminal facilities at Port Nelson.

Mr. HANNESSON: That includes everything?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. GEARY: What percentage is allowed for engineering items?

Mr. DUNNING: About 10 per cent. It will thus be seen that it will cost $3,000,000 to put the existing track in operating shape up to branch line standard. It will cost a further $3,153,000 on some future occasion of course, to finish the line to Port Nelson, to put it in complete operating shape as a railroad, including terminals for railway purposes only, or a total of $6,153,000 to complete and put into shape the Hudson Bay railway from The Pas to Port Nelson.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend used the phrase, "on some future occasion." What does he mean by that?

Mr. DUNNING: By that I mean that the vote which is now before the committee, for $3,000,000, is for the purpose which I mentioned. Naturally we will have to come back to parliament for another vote to finish the line, as we are only asking on this occasion for this year, $3,000,000. Frankly I may tell my hon. friend that if I had thought it possible as Minister of Railways to do more than to put the existing line into shape this year, more would have been asked for, because it is the policy of the government to complete this railway.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister also add to the figures he has given, the estimated cost in connection with the channels and various aids to navigation, wharfage, and such elevator facilities as may be contemplated at Port Nelson?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want to complicate this particular vote, because there will be a discussion of that later, but I think probably it would be as well to have all the information on Hansard. It is estimated that it will cost $6,153,000 to complete the railway. It is estimated that the harbour works at Port

Nelson, including elevator accommodation to the extent of 4,000,000 bushels—I would ask my hon. friend to bear in mind that that is not yet decided upon, but the estimate does include provision for it—with accommodation in the harbour for ten ships at the same time, will cost $20,200,000. The details of that are as follows:

Statement showing estimated cost of Harbour Works at Port Nelson for Ten 7,000-Ton Ships all in Port at the same time

I would point out that the unit prices are based upon a 50 per cent greater unit price than the same engineers are using in connection with the St. Lawrence project estimates, so that surely they can be regarded as fairly accurate. The engineer in question is Mr. D. W. McLachlan, who was engineer at Port Nelson for many years, and who is now chairman of the joint engineering board in regard to the St. Lawrence. The engineer estimates for a 4,000,000 bushel elevator, but I am not prepared to concede that that capacity of storage is necessary. It is rather handling than storage that will be required at a port of this kind.

Mr. STEVENS: If it is to handle any considerable quantity of grain it would not be anything like sufficient.

Mr. DUNNING: I take issue with my hon. friend right there. The bushel capacity of an elevator has nothing to do with its handling capacity.

Mr. STEVENS: But if at this particular port there will only be seven or eight weeks time for shipment it renders a much larger equipment necessary.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to take issue with my hon. friend on that question at a later stage of the debate. Now, in connection with these figures I want it distinctly understood that I am not committing the government to this expenditure. I anticipated being asked a question as to what the engineering estimates were with respect to the completion of the terminal at Port Nelson. I want, in this connection, to revert to my previous statement: It is the policy of the government to complete this route as economically as possible in order to enable a fair trial of it to be made. While I have carefully gone over the figures with respect to the vote which is now before the committee, and have carefully gone over the figures with respect to the cost of completing the 92 miles of railway, I cannot say that it has been possible to do the same thing with reference to the estimated cost of the work at Nelson. Not that I am in any way casting doubt upon the engineer's figures as to the work which he proposes, but I am not satisfied that it is necessary to do all the work with which his estimate deals in order to obtain the object sought by the government. I brought down the information exactly as I have it with respect to a port capable of taking at one time ten ships, but without committing the government necessarily to an expenditure as large as that in order to attain the object we have in view.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are we to take it that the purpose of this expenditure is merely to test the route, and if that is the case, is it the feasibility of a railway to Port Nelson or the feasibility of the development of the port which is to be tested?

Mr. DUNNING: No. There are a number of related questions of course. The feasibility of the railway is beyond question. Its utility in other directions than that of transporting the products of the west to the markets of the world can be demonstrated, and will, I have no doubt be demonstrated by hon. members on both sides who have more intimate knowledge of the situation, acquired on the ground, than I have. The line without question runs through the mineral belt as to which we have heard a great deal recently in connection with new discoveries. Generally that belt with its mineral possibilities extend across the territory. There are also certain possibilities from the point of view of pulpwood development, undoubtedly very great possibilities from the point of view of power, and great possibilities also from the point of view of wheat and other products. That is so far as the railroad, as such is concerned. When I spoke of a fair trial being made I meant a fair trial of the sea route to Europe from a Hudson bay port. I need not make an extended speech upon the subject; it has been before parliament for the last forty years. I feel sure the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) will remember a certain famous political meeting which was being addressed by one of his political friends just before an election out there forty years ago, when a boy came up the aisle with a telegram and handed it to the speaker and the latter said "Thank God the rails are shipped for the Hudson Bay railway".

Mr. ROGERS: That was a Liberal candidate.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the story as I heard it.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): That was Hugh Sutherland, the Liberal candidate.

Mr. DUNNING: I never heard of Hugh Sutherland as a Liberal.

Mr. ROGERS: He was certainly the Liberal candidate.

Mr. DUNNING: On that occasion?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): He reached years of discretion afterwards.

Mr. DUNNING: If the gentleman in question was a Liberal candidate on that occasion he has certainly changed his political faith since. But forty years is a long time, and I merely used the illustration to show what one of my hon. friend's political friends thought of the matter forty years ago.

5 p.m.

Mr. ROGERS: Quite right.

Mr. DUNNING: Now we understand each other. My point is that so far as the testing of the route is concerned it is something which has been a matter of repeated discussion and repeated investigation from a theoretical point of view, for the last forty years.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): Is it necessary to spend $20,000,000 to test that?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not admit that it is necessary to spend $20,000,000 in order to make the test. I wish to make that clear. I was asked, as I anticipated I would be asked, for the cost as laid down by the engineers of a certain standard development of the port. Hon. gentlemen must clearly understand that this does not commit the government to this particular port development, or commit the government, for instance, to the erection of a 4,000,000 bushel elevator, not by any means. Furthermore, I may call the attention of hon. members to the fact that in giving $3,600,000 as the estimated cost of a 4,000,000 bushel elevator I was giving the only engineering information available with respect to this particular size of port.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend spoke of "this particular port." Has he in mind any other port?

Mr. DUNNING: I may as well settle that question right now.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Trouble maker.

Mr. DUNNING: The government has no intention of changing to another port at the present time.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The Minister of Railways has no doubt made an estimate of the passenger and freight traffic which will be carried over that road on which he is going to spend $6,153,000. Would he be good enough to give to the committee some account of the estimate that he has made in that regard?

Mr. DUNNING: Some things are very difficult to estimate. My hon. friend knows for instance that when the Canadian Pacific railway was built out into new country any estimate that might be made as to passenger or freight traffic would be futile indeed. This is a railway reaching out from the Pas to tidewater at an entirely new port. It would be the wildest guess to attempt to estimate what will develop along it. I can only say in general terms what I said a moment ago, namely, that there are certain possibilities of development along the road; there are possibilities in connection with arctic trade upon which some hon. members are, I believe, particularly well informed, and there are, of course, the other possibilities of its use in connection with an overseas route to Europe. I cannot pretend to have made any estimate of revenue along the line requested by my hon. friend, but I can give him some detailed information in connection with one particular product being transported over that route if he will just give me time to look it up.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister, while we are at this interesting point, give some indication of what is in his mind as necessary to test the route? While asking that question I will ask him to deal with two or three phases, for instance, the equipment which he considers necessary to make this test, where and at what cost he expects to secure vessels capable of travelling that route, and also the aids to navigation which it will undoubtedly be necessary to put in for the direction of a commercial route, for example, certain lighthouses, lightships, buoys and so forth, the usual aids to navigation such as exist and must exist on every commercial route. If the minister could give us some idea of the cost of these, it might give us some better estimate of the ultimate cost of this route.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot do that at this time. It must be quite apparent to my hon. friend that investigation is required before one can determine precisely the aids to navigation which are needed. Previous information on the subject does not lead me to believe that any considerable expenditure will be necessary in connection with lighthouses and things of that sort through the strait, and the bay is open sea. Provision is made in the estimates which I have just dealt with for a lighthous at the entrance to Nelson channel There are related questions upon which I could give general information in a little time. I thought there would be a more or less general discussion which would give me an opportunity of feeding the information more gradually than I have been able to do so far. I think I have under my hand most of the information which is available in the department.

As regards the question asked by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) as to traffic, I have a memorandum dealing with this point. I think it is recognized by the committee that Mr. R. A. C. Henry of the Canadian National Railway Bureau of Economics is a capable student of these matters, and I do not think I can do better than indicate some facts as gathered by him. The total yield of wheat in Canada last year is now estimated at 411,375,700 bushels, the second largest on record for Canada. To this total grain yield, the three prairie provinces contributed 382,959,000 bushels. In addition these provinces produced 322,254,000 bushels of oats, 94,141,000 bushels of barley, 11,545,000 bushels of rye and 9,138,000 bushels of flax seed.

Wheat commences to flow towards the elevators in the west about the 1st of September. It is agreed that navigation of Hudson bay and strait is at its best during September and October, and there is very little doubt but that with ordinary aids the period of navigation could be extended until November or a little later in some seasons. Mr. Henry uses two months as the basis of his calculations. I am giving the figures based conservatively by a student of economics on the basis of two months without in any way admitting that navigation is in fact limited to two months. Mr. Henry deals with the seasonal movement aspect of the bay route in a report to the chief engineer of the Department of Railways, in 1918, in the course of which he says:

> It has been suggested that the season of navigation on the Hudson bay route is so short that the cost of doing every item of work in the handling and transporting of merchandise is going to be so great that the route is not going to be able to compete with the lake route to Georgian bay and rail to Montreal, and that the necessity of creating an organization for such a short period is a serious factor.
> That the season of navigation from Hudson bay is limited to two and one-half months there does not now appear to be much doubt. It is and must be frankly admitted that such a condition would be expected to involve a larger expenditure per unit of traffic than would be the case if navigation were possible during the whole year and the load factor favourable and constant. Unfortunately, however, the load factor in Canadian internal freight traffic is neither favourable nor reasonably constant. For example, an examination of the shipping records on the Great Lakes will disclose the fact that on the average since 1909, over 40 per cent of total quantity of wheat, in fact of all grain, passing through Fort William and Port Arthur eastbound goes forward in two months, namely, in October and November immediately following the harvesting of the crop. The peak load in the grain traffic east is from two or three times the average load, so that during this period from two to three times the average number of cars, train employees, elevator employees, and lake vessels, which would be required to handle this traffic if it flowed uniformly throughout the season of navigation, must be diverted from other channels or called into action from idleness. Conditions on the Hudson bay route would vary from those obtaining on the lake route only in degree and probably not to as great an extent as might at first thought be supposed, especially now that the government controls the Canadian Northern system with its many branches into the heart of the grain belt. The difficulty of bringing a separate organization into existence for the short period of navigation on the Hudson bay will not be any more serious than doubling or trebling the handling equipment normally in use on the prairie; in fact, the labour equipment, et cetera, could probably be utilized for an extra month in relieving the pressure of traffic to the head of the lakes after the close of navigation on Hudson bay.

The amount of traffic to be handled is another factor. It would be absolutely foolish to consider shipments limited to a million bushels or even two million bushels by this route, and the elevator should handle its capacity five times instead of twice as has been suggested.

He then goes on to figure on the basis of a total cost of $29,000,000, $16,000,000 for the railway and $13,000,000 for the terminal, and he concludes that at least 5,000,000 bushels would require to be handled annually to clear operating expenses and at least 10,000,000 bushels to meet both operating expenses and fixed charges at 3 per cent on the money invested. Is there any man who doubts for a moment, if grain can be transported over this route, that at least 10,000,000 of the many hundreds of millions of bushels of western grain will go that way? And this gentleman's estimate is that 10,000,000 bushels would clear operating expenses and fixed charges at 3 per cent, on a basis of a $29,000,000 investment. His conclusion was that the first of the new crop would not reach Port Nelson until between September 10 and 15, and that shipments made prior to that date would have to be made from the previous year's crop. During the fiscal year 1923-24, 61.7 per cent of Canada's wheat crop was exported, and 38.3 per cent utilized in the domestic field. During the fiscal year 1924-25, 56.1 per cent of Canada's wheat was exported and 43.9 per cent utilized within the country. The application of the 60 per cent ratio to last year's wheat crop would mean a wheat export trade of 246,825,000 bushels. The bulk of this wheat is grown in the prairie provinces, and if, on the Hudson Bay railway and harbour development being brought to the stage where the practicability of the route could be commercially demonstrated, the grain growers of western Canada were to earmark a moderate percentage of their grain crop for export via this route, a long step could be taken toward establishing the feasibility of the project.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The minister has not answered my question. He has dealt with the export end of the subject, but a few minutes ago he made a definite statement to the effect that the government would not attempt to build elevators or do any dredging or assume the responsibility for the performance of these things for the export trade this year.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): That is to say, under present conditions.

Mr. DUNNING: You misunderstood me completely.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): What position does the minister take?

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say we would not do any dredging, and this and that for the export trade. Manifestly such a test as is contemplated could not be made without adequate facilities to permit of the ships coming in and going out, to say the least. And dredging would be necessary before that could take place.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Did not the minister say that he would not commit the government to any expenditure for that sort of work?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I had better repeat what I said to avoid any misapprehension elsewhere. What I did say was that I could not commit the government to the scale of development—the scale of development, I repeat—upon which the engineer's estimates are based; that is to say, a ten-vessel port development and a 4,000,000 bushel terminal elevator. It is simply a question of scale, that is all. We have yet to find out what it will be necessary to do at the port and in the Nelson channel to carry out the government's intention of trying out the route.

Mr. ROGERS: Does the minister not commit the government to any scale?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, a sufficient scale to permit of a fair trial being made.

Mr. ROGERS: What does the minister mean by a sufficient scale?

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend will say what he means?

Mr. BENNETT: What is the date of that memorandum the minister has read?

Mr. DUNNING: 1918.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not take into account the movement of wheat which has since arisen through Vancouver and the Panama canal. That would make a serious difference.

Mr. DUNNING: As Mr. Henry's figures regarding operating costs and overhead would be met by a 10,000,000 bushel movement, I thought it was not important to elaborate the significance of competitive movements.

Mr. MARCIL: In order to have a complete record, will the minister inform the committee how much has been spent so far on the road and on the port respectively?

Mr. DUNNING: The total already spent on both the road and the port is $21,189,000. That is what the country has invested in the project up to the present time. Of that amount $14,944,000 has gone into the railway, and $6,244,000 into the port. That does not include this year's estimate.

Mr. CAMPBELL: How much of the $3,000,000 to be voted will be spent this year in the fixing of lines and so on?

Mr. DUNNING: I am informed by the engineers that reconditioning is a class of work in which progress is difficult. From the commencement of the line at Le Pas to Mile 214, it is possible for a train to travel over the track, but that does not mean that the line is in operating condition, for any number of trains. As a matter of fact a train is now running over the track to Mile 214 twice a month. From Mile 214 to Mile 332, which is 118 miles, no train has run over the track in years. The track is in very bad shape and it is quite difficult accurately to estimate the length of time it would be necessary to straighten out twisted rails, kinks, and all that sort of thing. I can only say that every effort will be made to put on the fullest organization possible to complete before it is too late what I have outlined as this year's programme. The work will be expedited as much as possible. I am hoping to be able to get the whole of the existing track into shape this year, but this is only a hope; I do not state it as a certainty.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is all the work this year being concentrated on the roadbed, or is anything being done in the way of building stations, putting up tanks, roundhouses, and so on?

Mr. DUNNING: In the $3,000,000 which I am asking parliament to vote there is included the cost of engines, terminals, and other buildings necessary. The work in connection with these properties will go forward as far as possible simultaneously with the conditioning of the track.

Mr. KAISER: The minister speaks of trying out the route. That suggests that there are some doubts. What are they?

Mr. GEARY: When the minister speaks of a test I assume he means a test that will reach out into Hudson bay. Does not the test imply a reconditioning of the 332 miles, the laying of the 92 miles further, and other works in connection with terminal, port, dredging and aids to navigation as well as some elevator capacity and general equipment necessary on both land and sea? If that be the case, could he give some estimate of what this test will cost in capital expenditure?

Mr. DUNNING: I regret I cannot. I gave the committee an absolutely outside figure respecting a ten-vessel port development and all that goes with it, including a four million bushel terminal elevator. With regard to the other features that my hon. friend mentions, what does he mean by equipment?

Mr. GEARY: Rolling stock and whatever else is necessary to operate the road.

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to rolling stock, the road will be operated as it is at present by the Canadian National system.

Mr. BENNETT: That will require additional rolling stock.

Mr. DUNNING: There might be some little argument as to whether any additional rolling stock will be required in order to operate this particular road, because to the extent to which goods travel over it they would not go over some other route. I do not think we need worry very much about rolling stock at this point.

Mr. GEARY: Can I get some sort of estimate of what in the minister's opinion a test will cost in capital expenditure? He has given an outside estimate, by which he does not want the situation to be governed. There must be some estimate in his own mind, or which he can get, of a lower figure than this outside figure which will represent the capital expenditure on the test that he says the government desires to make.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I think I have gone as far as is reasonably possible along that line; I do not intend to enter the realm of pure speculation. The cost of the capital developments of an outside character I have already indicated. Beyond that it would be pure speculation on my part to go. In fact I do not believe the capital expenditure estimated by the engineer at Nelson will be all necessary to enable a trial to be made. But my hon. friend will surely allow me to make a little closer examination of that during the coming year. I am asking the committee now to put the existing track into shape, and later on I intend to ask the committee for a further sum of money to complete the railroad and the terminals. By that time I hope to be in a position to say exactly what should be done regarding work on the port.

Mr. BENNETT: I observed in the press three days ago that the Hudson's Bay Company was sending out a new ship of some 4,000 tons, equipped as no other ship of that size has ever been equipped by the company. Might it not be well to secure from the company any special observations they may make this year that would be of benefit to us in making a test?

Mr. DUNNING: I may tell my hon. friend that they have been asked. I was not aware of the particular ship to which my hon. friend refers, but the co-operation of the Hudson's Bay Company we have secured up to now from the point of view of information, and I think we have all their ship records.

Mr. BENNETT: But this is a new type of vessel.

Mr. DUNNING: I am glad of the suggestion, and I will make sure that it is followed up.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, a moment ago when the minister gave figures with regard to the necessary expenditure on the railway, I asked him just what he had in mind when he spoke of a sufficient expenditure to make a test that would be reliable, or words to that effect. I also asked the minister whether it was the feasibility of the railway he desired to test—

Mr. DUNNING: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —or whether it was the feasibilty of the entire route. In answering that question the minister discussed the traffic that might be developed along that route without regard to the navigation of the Hudson bay or straits, but he did not touch upon the question of navigation. I should like to ask him now: Does he consider it necessary to spend $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 on putting the railway into shape so that traffic can be carried over it—that is, a skeleton railway, not a railway capable of handling wheat traffic—and provide terminals and elevator equipment in order to determine the navigability of Hudson bay and straits? Surely he is not going to attempt to run locomotives through the bay and straits. It is ships that are required, not railways at all. If it is a question of the navigation of Hudson bay and straits, is it necessary to spend this money on the railroad to make that test so definitely that all doubt as to whether the straits are navigable will be settled? After you have completed the railway and provided the terminals the question must still be dealt with whether the straits are navigable. Will your railway assist in any way to determine that doubt?—an honest doubt that exists in the minds of a great many people.

Mr. HAY: Mr. Chairman, the navigability of the straits was demonstrated over 200 years ago.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Hay) says that the navigability of the straits has been proven for over 200 years. I do not want to get into any quibbles on the question of what a test means. Manifestly these straits are navigable: They have been navigated continuously for over 200 years. They were being navigated continuously during the period my hon. friends opposite were in office and taking in the necessary materials and supplies for the harbour development at Nelson. When I spoke of a test I spoke of a commercial test of the route as a route.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Exactly.

Mr. DUNNING: Not as to whether the straits are navigable. We know the straits are navigable; there is not any doubt about that. There is some difference of opinion respecting the period each year during which they are navigable, and the evidence on that varies very widely, but I think all will agree that the Senate committee which investigated the matter a few years ago put the minimum at two and a half months.

An hon. MEMBER: Four months,

Mr. DUNNING: Did the Senate committee say that?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Our estimates are based upon a minimum of two and a half months. Surely we are reasonably conservative in that regard. I think I have made the point clear: It is a commercial test which is required, a test which cannot be undertaken until you have the railway completed to the bay and can get to tidewater.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, the hon. minister suggested I was quibbling in connection with this.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am in the judgment of the committee as to that. The minister says that the navigability of the straits has been demonstrated for 200 years.

Mr. HAY: Yes, more.

Mr. NICHOLSON: So has the navigation of Coronation gulf been demonstrated in the same way; but would anyone suggest we should ship our wheat out through the Mackenzie river? The minister came to the point when he said it is a commercial test that is required. The test is: How many trips can a vessel constructed for carrying grain or freight make through the straits in any one season. Do you require to complete the railway to make that test? I say to the minister now that for the expenditure of one-half the money that is now being asked he could make a complete definite test—not something that is based on the experience of a man who worked his way through the icefields one year in July, another year in August. Last July a Hudson's Bay Company ship was crushed to pieces in the straits.

Mr. DUNNING: Is my hon. friend sure of that?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, I am sure of it; I had a personal friend who was on board, and who with his wife was taken off across the ice. I realize that that is no argument, but the point is that you are building a railway there and spending a lot of money. In connection with that part of the railway which taps the country from which local freight may be secured, that is an entirely different question. But when you speak of building a railway to Port Nelson, and building at Port Nelson grain elevators and terminals for ships in order to test the commercial navigability of Hudson straits, you are simply throwing that much money away. The straits must be tested with ships, not with railways; you can put your ships back and forth through these straits and in that way find out whether or not the route is navigable.

Mr. ROGERS: The Hudson Bay railway and its proper construction have been matters of great moment to the people of the prairie provinces for many years. The hopes of those people are centred upon that route as being an outlet through which they may get their wheat and grain to the markets of the world at a very much lower rate than exists to-day. I must say, however, that I am sure the statement of the minister will be read with very great regret by the people of the west. They had their hopes raised even by the minister himself. A short time ago he made several speeches in regard to this matter, and in a speech delivered in Saskatchewan he is reported in the Regina Leader of March 9, 1926, as follows:

Saskatchewan's political importance has become great says Hon. Charles A. Dunning. Tells Liberal women he is no ambassador of sectionalism and goes to the east to assist in developing a real Canadianism.

That was a very splendid declaration, and I congratulate the minister upon it. Later he dealt with the Hudson Bay railway, and this is what he said:

"As for the Hudson Bay railway," Mr. Dunning said, "we've been looking with longing eyes to our nearest sea coast, and in doing so are but following the national trend of thought; from time immemorial people have done that." He went on to say that forty years ago statesmen were promising to build the way to the Bay.

Probably this is what my hon. friend had in mind when he spoke a few moments ago.

Much of the road that has been built needed renovation, and ninety miles of steel were still unlaid. He did not believe the people should spend more money on it than was needed to give it a fair trial, but the fair trial could not be given while the steel was ninety miles from the Bay.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend brings in an estimate of $3,000,000 which he claims will be all required to renovate the 332 miles already constructed, and apparently no provision has been made for the extension of the railway to the bay. This is where the disappointment will arise, because my hon. friend gave his pledge to the people of Saskatchewan that this ninety miles of railway would be constructed. The people of the west are tired of being put off with promises in this regard.

As my hon. friend has said, for forty years and more these people have had to live upon promises. The Liberal party was in power for fifteen years; they were promising the railway before they came into office; they were promising it when they went out of office, but they did not construct one mile. In 1911 the Conservative party came into office pledged to the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, and we immediately started to work, building the 332 miles spoken of and grading the line to Nelson. We also did a large amount of work at the terminal. This work would have been completed had it not been for war conditions which prevented.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is surely aware that work continued until October, 1918.

Mr. ROGERS: Of course; that is what I said.

Mr. DUNNING: And then the war stopped it?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, the war conditions got worse and stopped it. However, the Conservative party was not in office then; it was the party of my hon. friend. I am not responsible for conditions under the Union government. These conditions were such, however, that there was some excuse for a delay in the completion of the railway but now, after all the promises that have been made by the Liberals, surely the time has come when they should endeavour to fulfil honestly and honourably some of their pledges. I think even my hon. and smiling friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will agree that seldom if ever have the Liberal party fulfilled any pledge in regard to the construction of railways in this country. I think it would be very difficult for any hon. member to mention one such pledge properly kept.

However, that is aside from the question and I am not going to introduce anything of that kind into this discussion. As I have already said, the people of the prairie provinces will undoubtedly be very much disappointed, primarily because they look to that route as their natural outlet. The interference with freight rates in the west, which has added to the cost of their transportation, has disappointed them very much. These increases were effected by hon. gentlemen opposite; they have been complained of strongly, and have been the means of urging the claim of the west for the completion of this route. As a representative of the province of Manitoba and western Canada it is my duty to urge in this House by every means within my power such assistance as will tend towards the completion of that undertaking in order that these conditions may be relieved.

I have found since I came to this House that there is a very wrong impression existing in the minds of many members of this parliament in respect to western Canada. First of all, some members think that we are a spoon-fed lot out in western Canada. I would say to my friends in this House that the people of western Canada have been a long-suffering people in the matter of freight rates and transportation costs, which have borne very heavily upon them. We have in the prairie provinces more miles of railway than there are in all the rest of Canada. Further, the net earnings of those miles of railway in western Canada represent greater net earnings by $1,000 per mile than do the railways in eastern Canada. I have some figures here, Mr. Chairman, that go to show the correctness of that statement, and it is not to be wondered at, in view of this fact, that we in western Canada claim that we have a condition in that portion of the country which requires some consideration at the hands of this parliament and at the hands of eastern Canada. We can never hope to grow and prosper save and except as we get better transportation costs. I should like to give a few figures to the committee to make clear how we are discriminated against in western Canada in respect to freight rates.

Take the article of lumber, for instance, which is an item of great interest to the people. Let us compare the freight rate on a shipment of lumber between two points in western Canada and the rate for a similar distance between two points in eastern Canada—and I give these figures only for the purpose of bringing home to your minds the conditions as they exist in western Canada in this connection. Suppose a farmer or any other person wishes to ship a car of lumber from Megantic, Quebec, to Toronto, a distance of 503 miles. He has to pay a rate of 20½ cents per 100 pounds. Now supposing a man in Golden, British Columbia is shipping a car load of lumber to Waldeck in Saskatchewan, a distance of 506 miles. He has to pay a rate of 35½ cents per 100 pounds, or 73 per cent more than the rate the man in Toronto has to pay for a similar distance. The same thing applies if you take a shipment from Megantic, Quebec, to Ingersoll, Ontario, a distance of 596 miles, and compare the rate on that shipment with the rate from Golden, British Columbia to Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, a distance of 606 miles, or 10 miles more. The farmer in Saskatchewan has to pay 80 per cent more in freight rates on the shipment of that car of lumber than does the farmer at Ingersoll for a shipment over a slightly less distance. Take a shipment from St. John, New Brunswick, to Hamilton, Ontario, a distance of 850 miles, and compare the rate paid there with a shipment from Vancouver to Walsh, Alberta, a distance also of 850 miles. The farmer in Alberta has to pay 83 per cent more freight rates on that shipment than does the man living in Hamilton.

I place these figures before the committee in order that hon. members who do not understand conditions in western Canada as well as they should be expected to understand them will be careful before they make statements in regard to the conditions under which the people of western Canada have been suffering in the matter of transportation costs for a very long time.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is there a difference in the operating expenses of the railways in the different parts of Canada mentioned, and if there is a difference, can it be justified?

Mr. ROGERS: I think the expense of transportation in western Canada is no higher to the railways than in eastern Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Therefore the railways are not acting fairly by western Canada?

Mr. ROGERS: I would not want to say that. I am only giving the rates. The whole difficulty, Mr. Chairman, is that the farmer when he takes his grain to market is unable to get a price which will enable him to conserve the fertility of the soil and properly help him in conducting his work upon the land. He gets a price that not only does not give him a fair living wage, but gives him no return on his investment. Why should the farmers of our prairie provinces be expected to grow grain and exhaust the virgin soil by having to sell their products at a price that will neither enable them to conserve the fertility of the soil nor give them a living wage for themselves and their families. That is the reason why there is this demand upon the part of the people of western Canada for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway.

If we had been treated fairly by the Transcontinental railway or in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway, we would not probably have to make the same claim we are making to-day in connection with the building of the Hudson Bay railway. In the case of the Transcontinental railway, as you all know, parliament pledged this country to build the line for $13,000,000, but here we have been this session grappling with liabilities incidental to that great undertaking which, with interest added, amount to probably $2,500,000,000. That is an enormous figure; we are paying interest on it from year to year, and we are getting no relief whatever from that source. My friends opposite were not satisfied with the building of the Transcontinental line; they wanted to add another transcontinental, and so they extended the Canadian Northern railway from Port Arthur down to Montreal in order to connect with the ports of Montreal and Quebec and provide an outlet for the products of the farm. We looked forward with some hope for years for some good to come out of the arrangements made for the construction of these railways. In fact, when the Canadian Northern in 1911 was given the necessary aid by hon. gentlemen opposite to extend the line to Montreal and so establish another Transcontinental railway, it was on the condition that we would develop our own Canadian ports. But I would ask hon. members of this House to tell me what good the Transcontinental railway or the Canadian Northern Railway have been in the matter of the development of our Canadian ports in the Maritime provinces or in the cities of Quebec or Montreal? The fact is that these difficulties arise by reason of the great cost incident to their construction. In 1911 when the farmers and the people of Saskatchewan went before the railway commission at the city of Regina to protest in the matter of freight rates they were there met by the legal representatives of the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Pacific and the National Transcontinental lines. Mr. C. P. Wilson appeared for the Transcontinental Railway at that time, and what was his defence on that occasion? It was in effect that in view of the heavy cost of the construction of their line it would be impossible for them to make any reduction in the freight rates and meet the fixed charges on the road. This, no doubt, is the true state of affairs. That is why we have this continual agitation for another outlet such as the Minister of Railways has described to Hudson bay.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Rogers.]

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DIVORCE LEGISLATION

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I rise to protest against the time of this House, when we are engaged in an important debate near the close of the session, being taken up with these divorce bills. There ought to be some court in this country to try these cases. This parliament is not the place to try them, and it is an insult to parliament to have them tried here. I think it only needs someone to make a protest to have this nuisance stopped, and I appeal to the Prime Minister. The premiers of the different provinces are meeting here to-day, and he might get into consultation with them to try and put an end to this nuisance. But if we have got to stand it, surely we could simplify the process of treating these cases. If they have to be dealt with here, why should not the Senate make one report to the Commons covering all the divorce cases heard in the upper house, so that only one motion would be necessary here? I make that suggestion. I notice that forty-eight divorce bills have gone through to-night, twenty for the relief of women and twenty-eight for the relief of men. It seems they are pretty equally divided, and while I am going to draw no inference from that, I do say that it is high time, Mr. Speaker, that this nuisance should end. There are men in this House who, for religious reasons, do not wish to vote on these motions, but they have to do it. I close simply by saying to the Prime Minister, to the government and to hon. members that it is high time that the trying of divorce cases in the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada should stop.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course, according to the rules of procedure I have to put the motions for the different stages of these bills. I cannot avoid doing that. I cannot divorce my own personal views from the rules of procedure.

SUPPLY

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Hudson Bay Railway: Construction and betterment, $3,000,000.

Mr. ROGERS: When the House rose at six o'clock I had just quoted a statement made by Mr. Wilson, representing the Nacional Railways, then the Transcontinental railway, before the railway commission sitting in the city of Regina, in which he pointed out that it was impossible for that company to reduce freight rates owing to the cost of construction of that railway. I want now to quote from Mr. Phippen, who represented the Canadian Northern Railway, as to why it was necessary to have such low rates in western Canada. Mr. Phippen said:

> We have the fact that owing to special circumstances created by the action of the government of the province of Manitoba, the rates from the head of the Lakes to Winnipeg are lowered to a standard which we would not expect to find if these rates were governed by normal conditions, in so far as they affected that district.

Then Sir J. A. M. Aikins, representing the Canadian Pacific Railway, pointed out then position in the following language:

> So far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned, the company takes this position, that by virtue of the reductions that were forced upon the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway, and subsequently upon the Canadian Northern Railway, the conditions in Manitoba were such as to make it highly competitive for the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway was not a party to that agreement, but by virtue of the reduction of tolls through these statutory agreements the conditions were such that they became highly competitive and the Canadian Pacific Railway was compelled to meet these competitive conditions.

That accounts for the rate reduction which we had in Manitoba, in Saskatchewan, and in Alberta, at that particular time, because, as hon. members from the west at all events will know, by reason of an agreement reached with the Canadian Pacific Railway the reduction was extended in 1903, under the Manitoba contract, to the then Northwest Territories. that reduction being two cents per one hundred pounds on grain from all stations in that great territory. That reduction continued in force and effect for over eighteen years until it was interfered with by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1922. So that when certain hon. members of this House undertake to tell this parliament that the rate charged to the farmers of western Canada from 1903 to 1922 was the Crowsnest pass rate, they make a statement that is not in accordance with the facts, because during that long period of time not one pound of freight was carried in all the provinces of western Canada at the Crowsnest rate. It was all carried on rates fixed by contract made with the government of Manitoba.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, I do not desire to be guilty of discourtesy towards him, but I do wish to point out in regard to the discussion from this point on, that if we are to enter into a general discussion of freight rates, it will scarcely be in order on the motion which is now before the committee. There is a certain relationship, of course, between the prospective cost of moving freight via the Hudson Bay railway and the existing cost. While I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, I think it would be very unfortunate if the debate on the Hudson Bay railway vote developed into a general discussion in relation to rates on existing lines. I merely make that suggestion without raising the point of order, but in the interest of keeping to the point.

Mr. ROGERS: The rates in western Canada are all related to the proposals in respect to the Hudson Bay railway. I quite realize that I may not be privileged to go into the details of rates outside, but the committee is really considering the railway estimates in general, with particular reference to the Hudson Bay railway vote. If my hon. friend objects, however, I shall have to submit. In that event I promise my hon. friend I will take advantage of another opportunity to deal with this matter and may then occupy a great deal more time than if I were allowed to finish my statement to-night, which I would do in a comparatively short time.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no intention of stopping my hon. friend.

Mr. ROGERS: If the minister persists in these technical objections I will have to submit, but I promise him that I will devote some attention to the matter at a later date

Mr. DUNNING: May I say that I did not raise the point of order? We have listened to such speeches already this session have we not?

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend has not listened to any speech of mine. That is a very unfair statement on his part, much more so than anything I should expect from him. The minister will find that he will have lots to do to take care of himself without endeavouring to speak for anybody else. If I am to be confined strictly to the rule I wish to say this: The present proposal in regard to the Hudson Bay railway is not of the character that was pledged by my hon. friend, by the Prime Minister and by the government, not only in the Speech from the Throne but in ministerial speeches made elsewhere. All that is proposed here is a vote of $3,000,000 in respect of that line. Now what was the position of the Minister of Railways when he spoke on this project in Regina on March 17th? This is what he said on that occasion:

Mr. Dunning said that "Bob" Rogers had been flapping his wings and was somewhat concerned as to what his, Mr. Dunning's, attitude was.

That is in respect to the Hudson Bay railway.

"Mr. Rogers had said that the opposition in the Saskatchewan legislature had moved an amendment to the Hudson Bay resolution and lost out and that man Dunning would bear watching." Mr. Dunning then told the story of the attempts of the opposition in Saskatchewan a few months ago in connection with this resolution.

Then he goes on to say:

My attitude on the Hudson Bay railway is very simple. It is my job from now on to build it and I am going to do it. The job has got to be done.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROGERS: And yet the hon. gentleman comes down to-night with a proposition that does not provide for the building of one mile of that railway. That is how he intends to fulfil his pledge. Still that is in harmony with the record of the Liberal party throughout the whole history of this Dominion. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to name any occasion when they have honourably and honestly fulfilled any railway contract they have ever made. If they had done so we would not be discussing the Hudson bay project to-night, and we would not be suffering, as we are suffering in western Canada, on account of the lack of fair treatment in the matter of railway legislation on the part of the Liberal government. We are forced to look for relief in some quarter, but we shall not get it from the legislation which hon. gentlemen opposite are proposing in connection with the Hudson Bay railway.

Now let me make one more point and I shall have done. In the Speech from the Throne, placed in the hands of His Excellency by the government, I find the following:

My government propose to submit provisions for the completion forthwith of the Hudson Bay railway.

What provision do they submit to-night? They submit a proposal to repair a portion of the line that is already built. In my opinion that line could do all the 9 p.m. business it was required to do without very much repair. I take it the present vote of $3,000,000 is only an attempt to fulfil a promise made to a certain group in this parliament and to the people of western Canada. It is not proposed to build a single mile of railway in fulfilment of the pledge contained in the Speech from the Throne. Yet the people of this country, and of western Canada in particular, are expected to believe the statements being made by the Minister of Railways in this matter. Is it any wonder that we are excited in western Canada when we view the disappearance of the last hope we had of getting relief in the matter of railway freight rates? Is it any wonder that we feel this way in view of what has occurred in this House to-night? I fancy that some people in the west will not be surprised at what has occurred, but a great many of them will be when they find out that once again their hopes have been dashed to the ground, that once again the Liberal party have failed them. The Liberal party were very strong in their pledge when parliament opened to construct this railway forthwith. That was when they were appealing to certain quarters of the House for support, support which they expected to receive and which they have enjoyed throughout the session. Now when the session is about to close they simply bring in a vote to repair the Hudson Bay line and they state that the work is going to cost $3,000,000 when it could be done for two hundred thousand or three or four hundred thousand dollars at the most. That is the situation with which we are faced to-night. I appeal to the sense of honour of every member of this House no matter where he sits. I ask every member from the west to consider what position he will place himself in and what his constituents will think of him when such a proposition is made in view of the pledge broadcast through the country that the Hudson Bay railway would be completed forthwith? I ask every hon. member from western Canada what they think of the deception which has been practised on parliament and the country by the government of the day in regard to the construction of this line? That is all I have to say for the present but I promise you, Mr. Chairman, that I will take an early opportunity of dealing with the general record of the Liberal party to the satisfaction, I hope, of the House and the people seeing that I am denied the privilege of doing so to-night.

Mr. DUNNING: I have just a few remarks to make with reference to the speech of the hon. member for South Winnipeg. I do not intend to say much on the political aspect of the matter. Apparently we on this side of the House are to be placed in this position: We are to be attacked by hon. members along the line just adopted by the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) for not putting enough money into the estimates for the Hudson Bay railway and we are at the same time to be attacked by other hon. gentlemen opposite, some of whom have already given an indication of their sentiments in that regard, for putting anything at all into the estimates for the Hudson Bay railway. The hon. member for South Winnipeg assured us this afternoon that a wave of great regret would go over western Canada at the news that there was $3,000,000 to be used on the Hudson Bay railway. I think I am as intimately acquainted with the people of western Canada as is my hon. friend. They are people of plain common sense and they know that you cannot build 92 miles of new railway on the end of an old one if you cannot get over the old one to the place where you want to start construction.

My hon. friend well knows that the present bi-monthly operation is only from Le Pas to mile 214; that the travel even for those 214 miles is not very safe and certainly would not be safe if the traffic were heavier. He knows perfectly well also that from mile 214 to mile 333 there has not been a train over the road for a number of years and that a train cannot pass over it. I have sufficient regard for the common sense of the people of western Canada to know that they will realize that until at least that stretch of 118 miles is put into shape it would be impossible to proceed to lay rails on the balance of the 92 miles.

During the period when the Conservative government and the Union government were building the Hudson Bay Railway there never was a year when they spent more than $3,250,000 on that railroad; they found it impossible even at full blast to expend more than $3.250,000 in one year. I am asking parliament for authority to spend $3,000,000 this year, and the work is already proceeding on the basis of the interim supply that is granted. A large part of this $3,000,000, as I indicated this afternoon, is required for the purpose of providing engine terminal facilities at the various divisional points along the existing road. My hon. friends opposite, when they built the railroad, made no provision for engine terminal facilities, for stations, for water tanks, for the necessary paraphernalia of operating a road. We intend to supply that deficiency. We do not think it is practical to try to operate 500 miles of railroad without the necessary railway engine terminal facilities and other things of that kind. The money is required for that purpose. What my hon. friend virtually proposes is this, that by some means unknown to mechanical science we should start at the end of the present steel and rush the work into Nelson regardless of the fact that trains could not travel over the existing steel in order to reach the new work. I would personally have been willing to put into the estimates a larger sum, a sum sufficient to complete the 92 miles, were it not for the fact that it would be deceiving the people of Canada to say to them that it would be possible in one year to put the existing track into shape and at the same time to construct the additional 92 miles required. My hon. friend knows that just as well as I do.

I want to put on Hansard a little history in connection with this question in order that we may all be clear in regard to it. In 1886 the Dominion Lands Act provided for a grant of 6,400 acres for every mile of such railway in Manitoba and 12,800 acres for every mile of the railway beyond the boundary of Manitoba to the bay. In 1906 the construction of the branch from Hudson Bay junction to the Saskatchewan river was commenced by Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. In 1907 the sale of pre-emptions was authorized by an amendment of the Dominion Lands Act to provide funds for the construction of a publicly-owned railroad to the bay. In 1908 the Canadian Northern was completed to Le Pas. Le Pas being the starting point of the Hudson Bay railway. The provisions for land grants to private railway companies were repealed in that year. The restriction of the pre-emption area was provided by legislation, together with a definite announcement that the sale of pre-emptions and purchased homesteads in the restricted area was to provide funds to enable the country to construct, or to pledge the credit of the country to construct, a railroad to Hudson bay. On the 6th September, 1910, the first sod of the substructure of the bridge across the Saskatchewan river at Le Pas was turned by the Minister of Railways, the Hon. Mr. Graham. In August, 1911, the contract for the first section of the Hudson Bay railway was let by the Laurier government.

Mr. ROGERS: That was a month before the election.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): When was the contract signed?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the information with me—

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Two days after the defeat of the Liberal government they signed the contract.

Mr. DUNNING: The contract for the first section was signed by the Hon. Mr. Graham immediately after the election and before the Laurier government went out of power.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): After they were defeated.

Mr. DUNNING: The contract for the second section was let by the Borden government in 1912.

Mr. MANION: How much was the first section?

Mr. CAHAN: A contract of 185 miles.

Mr. DUNNING: I think that is right. In August, 1912, Port Nelson and Fort Churchill were visited by the then Minister of Railways, the late Hon. Frank Cochrane, and Port Nelson was selected as the terminus of the Hudson Bay railway. In December, 1912, the contract was let for the final section of the railway. In 1913 work was actively in progress on the terminals at Nelson. In the autumn of 1917 the work on the harbour terminals was closed down. In March, 1918, the pre-emption and homestead provisions of the Dominion Lands Act were suspended by order in council and subsequently deleted from the act by the amendment of 1918, chapter 19, section 28. In October, 1918, work on the railway was suspended with tracks laid to mile 332 including the bridge over the Nelson river, and the road was then turned over to the Canadian Northern board for operation. I mentioned that the most that was ever expended on railway construction in any one year during the whole period of construction was $3,256,000.

Some questions were raised this afternoon by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) regarding the practicability of the route. I offer as evidence in that connection the report of the Senate committee of 1920. I do not think it can be said that the committee in question was geographically packed in favour of the west. It consisted of six Conservatives and five Liberals, the names of the gentlemen being as follows: Senator Fowler, New Brunskick, Chairman; Senator Daniel, New Brunswick; Senator Lougheed, Alberta; Senator Michener, Alberta; Senator Schaffner, Manitoba; Senator Willoughby, Saskatchewan; Senator Bostock, British Columbia; Senator Casgrain, Quebec; Senator Dandurand, Quebec; Senator De Veber, Alberta and Senator Watson, Manitoba. There was only one member from Saskatchewan, and there were two from Manitoba, three from Alberta, one from British Columbia, two from Quebec and two from New Brunswick. Neither British Columbia nor Quebec nor New Brunswick could be regarded as partial to the Hudson Bay project and I believe the attitude of Alberta even at that date might be described as strictly judicial. The committee made a unanimous report to which I would refer the hon. gentleman for an answer. This was one of its findings:

> Your committee makes the following findings:
> (1) That the Hudson Bay route is feasible and will probably in time be profitable.

A committee such as this and appointed by such a body surely could not be accused of being wildly visionary or radical; surely it would weigh carefully all the evidence submitted, extracts from which may be found in the pages of the report. It is of course impossible to estimate the cost of such a project as this as accurately as one could in planning a branch line in known territory. There are many unknown or little known factors in this case, but it is worthy of note that a committee appointed by the Senate of Canada as recently as 1920 should reach unanimously, on a question of this nature, such a report as has been submitted.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister read the third finding.

Mr. DUNNING: I will read them all.

Mr. CAHAN: Read the whole report.

Mr. DUNNING: The report itself covers three or four pages and most of it would not be to the liking of my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan).

Mr. CAHAN: I have read it.

Mr. DUNNING: These are the findings of the committee:

> Your committee makes the following findings upon the evidence adduced before them:
> (1) That the Hudson Bay route is feasible and will probably in time be profitable.
> (2) That the season of navigation under present conditions is at least four months in length and may by reason of improvements in aids to navigation be considerably increased.

I here call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that this afternoon I presented figures based only on two and a half months of navigation.

> (3) That in the opinion of this committee sufficient care was not taken in the selection of Nelson as the terminus of the railway, and that the government should not make further important expenditures upon this port without first making a new and thorough examination into the relative merits of Churchill and Nelson as a terminus for the railroad.
> (4) That the waters of the strait and rivers tributary to the bay teem with fish and valuable marine animals, and we believe that the bay is equally well stocked but there has not yet been sufficient data collected as to the extent of the fisheries of the bay to enable an authoritative statement to be made as to their value.
> (5) That the mines already discovered in the Hudson Bay district are of sufficient number and richness to indicate the existence of great potential mineral wealth.
> (6) Your committee feel that they cannot too strongly endorse the valuable suggestion of Mr.

Stefansson as to the cultivation of reindeer and musk-ox, and would urge upon the government that the Department of the Interior be empowered to take hold of this matter, earnestly taking advantage of what has been done in this regard by the United States government.

Then they go on to make a reference to the explorations of Mr. Stefansson which of course is a matter that is not vital to the subject we are now discussing.

The province of Ontario has always displayed an interest in development in that part of the country and has been most anxious to secure rail communication with Hudson bay. When Nelson was selected as the terminus of the railway, arrangements were made to provide access to that point for the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway. Several years ago Ontario commenced the extension of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway northerly from Cochrane in the direction of Moose Foctory on James Bay, and I am informed that about one-third of this extension has been completed and is in operation. It is interesting to study the experience of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway inasmuch as it has provided a spectacular instance of the benefits which sometimes result from the construction of railways having for their object the development of latent natural resources—resources of the type to which I made reference this afternoon when discussing the possibilities of local traffic on the Hudson bay line. The Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway was originally projected to open to settlement the agricultural clay belt of the Temiskaming district. Before the good land was reached the construction of the railway revealed the rich silver deposits at Cobalt, while the more northerly construction made possible the development of the gold areas of the Porcupine; and several branch lines were found necessary to tap the considerable mining fields which were discovered. I have here a great deal of information which I may sum up in this statement: Including nickel and copper from the Sudbury area as a result of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, there has been produced in the area served by the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway, and in the Sudbury area as well, a total mineral wealth of more than $800,000,000 up to the end of 1925. And these figures do not take into consideration the development since the construction of the railway of the forest products taken out of that territory nor of agricultural development. The same general mineral formation in which valuable deposits have been found along the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway extends northwestwardly through the new Red lake mineral field about which we have heard much in the House recently, and on up to Herb lake and the Flin Flon area on the Hudson bay road. We have reason to hope that considerable and very valuable mineral traffic may develop on the Hudson Bay railway. As I shall probably have to make a number of speeches on different phases of the subject as various members advance their ideas, I do not think I need say anything further at the moment.

Mr. HANNESSON: Is this $3,000,000 estimate based upon any report available to the House, showing the present condition of the railway?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no such report available. The officers of the Canadian National Railway, who submitted this estimate, are at present in charge of the road, and consequently have had an opportunity of studying in detail such reports as are submitted by the men on the ground. I have consulted with these men. I may tell my hon. friend frankly that I desired, quite naturally, that if possible money should be spent beyond the end of the present steel; that was my wish. But the engineers and the operating officers of the Canadian National Railways convinced me that we should be proceeding much more wisely if we decided to put the existing road into shape rather than run the risk of subjecting it to more traffic than now passes over the road, with resultant wrecks. The cost of one wreck as a result of a faulty track would provide for quite a little work in the way of reconditioning the road.

Mr. HANNESSON: There is no report available?

Mr. DUNNING: No. I have read, of course, from the reports of the officers.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Chairman, this is a question I have been vitally interested in for a great many years, and I have given it much thought and study. I happen to be one of those now in the House who was present at a political meeting thirty-eight years ago when this question was brought before the electors of Winnipeg. We were then told we were going to have this railway. We had a telegram dangled before us that the steel was on the way. It has been on the way ever since. I want to see this railway finished. The hon. Minister of Railways has placed in the estimates a certain sum to repair the Hudson Bay railway. From my seat in this House I want to say that the railway does require repairs. I have travelled over it to mile 184, and I know its condition. But in my opinion he has allowed not only sufficient money to repair that piece of road but to continue the steel a long way towards Port Nelson.

A great deal is being said, Mr. Chairman, about which port we should go to; the question is raised whether we should go to Port Nelson or Fort Churchill. For my part, I say let us finish the road to Port Nelson, and finish it quickly. The Minister of Railways has covered the points that I had intended to deal with in that he has quoted from the report of the Senate committee on the Hudson Bay route, and therefore I shall not deal with the matter at any length. But I want to ask the minister, does the Hudson Bay railway get credit for the ties and the rails that were removed and used on the Canadian National?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, for every dollar.

Mr. MULLINS: And for the supplies that were sold to the Hudson's Bay Company's factor?

Mr. DUNNING: That is all credited.

Mr. MULLINS: I thank you. I received a letter from The Pas stating that small ties were being placed upon the main line. In that regard I want to make an apology to the Minister of Railways, for I find those ties were being used for sidings and not for the main line, although some of them were spread along the main line. Those little six-inch ties were not suitable for the main line.

I am sorry a number of my Conservative friends seem to have doubts as to the feasibility of this route. I have no doubts whatever; I have confidence in the navigability of the straits. The completion of that road will give us in central Canada a port within easy reach. Geographically situated as we are in the west, it will be a relief to us to get this means of transportation. That is what we are clamouring for, and the tariff and other issues that we have been talking about sink into insignificance alongside the transportation question for the man who is on the land in western Canada. So I appeal to my fellow-members to be fair to western Canada. Don't be too drastic in your ideas. You got $153,000,000 for canals in eastern Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: For the west.

Mr. MULLINS: I have the estimates here, and I notice the total at the bottom is $153,167,000. You sold a quantity of land of ours and have the money on hand, and we ask you to complete the railway, for even if the straits were never navigable—of course, I contend that they are navigable—this railway will pay for itself out of the local freight. I know that country from personal experience. It is rich in minerals, it is rich in agriculture right through to Nelson, and the bay is rich in fish. It is a wonderful piece of country, and I ask doubting Thomases to change their minds and let the road be completed instead of throwing barriers in the way.

I want to make an explanation, Mr. Chairman. I am speaking not from my seat to-night because I want the Manitoba Free Press to know that I was here when this question came up. For some reason or other they stated I was not present on the former occasion—Friday—when this question was discussed. The hon. Minister of Railways knows I was here.

Mr. DUNNING: You were here.

Mr. MULLINS: The hon. Deputy Speaker knows I was present; but it was published in western Canada that I was absent. I have travelled since eight o'clock this morning over several branch lines of railway in order to be present for fear that the question would come up to-night. I do not want to talk cattle any more, but I want to say, Mr. Chairman, there is no route so well adapted for getting the live stock of western Canada overseas as the Hudson Bay route. It is a cool route. The ships will be nice and cool.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: Not too cool, because up at Hudson bay the season is further advanced at the present time than it is here. While we had snowbanks in front of these buildings piled mountain high, there was balmy weather at Hudson bay. I have Hansard here away back for the last thirty years, and I find during that time every party that came into power promised to build a piece of that railway. The project has been dangling in front of us ever since. I am tired of these delays. Let us build the road, and build it quickly. Give us a chance to demonstrate to you that what was said at the time the Canadian Pacific railway was projected, that all the land west of lake Superior was only a frozen, barren wilderness, is just as misleading when applied to the country which this railway will serve. Whenever in the pursuit of my business I have crossed the Atlantic I have met old sailors and asked them where they have been, they have told me they were up in the Hudson bay, and they have always added that they would rather navigate the Hudson Bay straits than the straits of Belle Isle. There are more icebergs in the straits of Belle Isle than in the Hudson Bay straits. If anything like the Titanic disaster had happened there the Hudson Bay route would be condemned. The island of Anticosti is dotted so thickly with wrecks that you can hardly stick a pin in the map without touching the scene of one. I have had cattle ships wrecked on that island. I know the Hudson Bay route is not anything like that. I feel absolutely satisfied that the completion of the Hudson Bay railway and the opening up of this route will give western Canada redress in the way of transportation. It is hard on live stock to rail them all the way from western Canada to Montreal or the Atlantic seaboard. That is what takes it out of them; the ship does not. By the opening of this route we will be close to a port and will be able to get our live stock abroad ship without a long rail haul, and the animals will reach the other side in much better condition. Once more, Mr. Chairman, I ask hon. members to let us have this road put into shape as quickly as possible.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Railways, in answering a question that I addressed to him before adjournment at six o'clock, read some extracts from the report of the Senate committee in 1920 in regard to the feasibility of the Hudson Bay route. I think he knew quite well that in my question I was not discussing the feasibility of the route at all. The minister himself in making his preliminary statement said that his purpose was to spend a sufficient amount of money to test the route thoroughly. If the minister and the government are satisfied, on the basis of the Senate report of 1920, that the route is commercially feasible why is it necessary to make any further tests? Why not start now and tell parliament and the Canadian people exactly what they intend to do to make this route feasible for the transportation of the grain crops and freight traffic of the west; why is it necessary to spend money in testing a route which the minister now says, basing his conclusions on the report of the Senate committee of 1920, has already been disclosed as commercially feasible?

In 1925 the Department of the Interior issued a bulletin in relation to this very route. May I at this point, Mr. Chairman, say that I am not opposing the Hudson Bay route at all. I am not taking the position that this is not a commercial possibility as a freight route, but I do say that no attempt has ever been made to test the Hudson bay as a freight route for commercial ships. All that has been done is to take the reports of captains who have made one trip a year in and out, and sometimes they have not been able to make that trip. These records of ice conditions have been taken and conclusions based thereon. But there is a way by which this route can be effectively tested. If the minister would spend one-half this amount of money in getting one or two ships of about 8,000 tons, properly reinforced as the engineers have recommended and in ballast if you will, in service between a St. Lawrence or Newfoundland port and Port Nelson, to see how many times they can navigate Hudson straits in one, two or three seasons, the possibility of the route would be definitely determined. Then there would be some justification for this plan by which Canada is going to be put an expenditure which will amount to $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 if the whole scheme is carried out.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Fitzgerald of the Hudson's Bay Company demonstrated 250 years ago that the route was navigable. There is no use going to an expense of that kind at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My hon. friend states what Mr. Fitzgerald did 250 years ago. I did not know Mr. Fitzgerald, so I cannot say whether or not he navigated the straits then. But the Department of the Interior of this government prepared and circulated a report last year with regard to the Hudson Bay route, and in that report they published the statement of Engineer McLachlan, who spent five years on that work. Surely if anyone knows the conditions obtaining there this man, who is recognized as one of our greatest engineers, should have that knowledge.

Mr. HANNESSON: Is it not a fact that Mr. McLachlan only made one trip by water?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do not know how many trips Mr. McLachlan made by water; he was the engineer in charge and lived right at the works, and I have here his report dated September 17, 1917, addressed to Chief Engineer Bowden:

> Many a time during the past four years I have been on the verge of coming out in absolute condemnation of the undertaking on which I am engaged, but so long as I thought there was a chance of the Hudson Bay railway ever proving of value for any national purpose, I thought that I had better not do so, especially as I know that you have always been one of its staunchest supporters. In the light of the ice conditions of this year, which I observed carefully on August 13, 29 and September 6, in the entrance to Port Nelson and the operation of our ships to and from Port Nelson for the past five seasons, I have come to the conclusion that the season for tramp steamships on this route is going to be so short that the cost of doing every item of work in the handling and transporting of merchandise is going to be so great that the route is not going to be able to compete with the lake route to Georgian bay and rail to Montreal.

Port Nelson was this year blocked with ice on August 29, and there was still ice around the harbour entrance on September 6, proof of which I enclose.

Later Mr. McLachlan goes on to say:

The extreme season will count in a commercial route. I also feel that we cannot extend the latter end of the season beyond the date on which our ships have been leaving in recent years.

Then referring to the possibilities of the Hudson Bay railway in colonization or in developing the country, and leaving aside for the moment the question of the navigability of the Hudson bay and straits as a commercial route to Europe, Mr. McLachlan has this to say:

There is nothing for the Hudson bay north of the Huronian rock outcrops south of Split lake.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the hon. member quoting from a report prepared by Engineer McLachlan?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, I have just read extracts from the report of this gentleman.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this the Mr. McLachlan who bought a million dollar sand-sucking dredge for the purpose of removing hardpan?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do not know anything about the dredges Mr. McLachlan bought, but I do know that just a day or so ago the Minister of Railways, in reporting to this House that a board of engineers had been employed by this government to make surveys of the St. Lawrence route, told us that Mr. McLachlan,—this very same Mr. McLachlan—as one of the most outstanding engineers on this continent, had been made chairman of that board. I do not know Mr. McLachlan; I am simply submitting his report, but I do know he was in that country for five years.

Mr. DUNNING: May I ask a question? Why does the hon. member quote that one report of Mr. McLachlan's, and why does he make no reference at all to the evidence given by this gentleman in 1920 before the Senate committee? Why is no reference made to Mr. McLachlan's further report of 1922? He had had four years more experience then.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Let me answer that question with another. Was Mr. McLachlan in there between 1920 and 1925?

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. McLachlan came out in 1920.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In 1917 Mr. McLachlan makes this statement based on four years' experience at Port Nelson. I have read every single word of the contradictory evidence included in that Senate report; I have read everything I could get dealing with this question, but there is no consistent evidence anywhere to show that the Hudson straits can be navigated commercially. I am not going to say they cannot be navigated because I do not know, but before this country is committed to an expenditure of this character we should take the only means possible to find out; we should put these ships on that route and let them navigate the straits themselves. Spending money on a railway to Port Nelson and spending money on terminals and elevators will not prove anything in relation to that route. If the Hudson straits are navigable and if that route can be made available commercially there is no man in Canada who will not hold up both hands for the completion of that route and its development as a link between western Canada and Europe.

Coming to the appeal that is being made to members of this House to deal generously with western Canada because of their freight rate condition, because of what it costs to get the products of the west to the markets of the world, what is it that has intensified that condition? What it is more than anything else that has created the transportation difficulties that we have in this country? It is just because parliament has allowed itself in times past to be stampeded into projects of this character—a transcontinental, then a second transcontinental, and all that kind of thing—without adequate information as to what any one of these projects really means, with the result that we have a capital charge that our transportation business must take care of, and which is bearing it down, and will continue to bear it down. So long as we continue to throw millions and tens of millions of dollars into projects of this character without knowing before we start what the ultimate result is going to be, just so long will our difficulties continue.

Mr. MILLAR: Would the hon. member put the Welland canal in that class?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, I would put the Welland canal or any other project involving the expenditure of large amounts of capital in that class, when proper estimates are not given, in the first instance, as to what these things are going to cost, and in the second instance, as to the results we are going to get from them. I am not in the slightest degree embarrassed by what hon. members may say in regard to the Welland canal or any other project that Canada has entered into and that has proved a failure, or a partial failure, or that has proved too costly for the Canadian people. I say that the great difficulty in transportation that we must face and solve is due to allowing ourselves to be stampeded into capital projects of a character such as this without adequate information as to what is really involved.

Mr. MULLINS: Would the hon. member say that we are being stampeded into this project after it has been discussed for thirty-eight years? Does it take more than thirty-eight years to find out whether it is right or not?

Mr. NICHOLSON: It makes no difference whether it is thirty-eight or one hundred and thirty-eight years. It makes no difference to me how many mistakes have been made in the past. I say we should try to reach a point when we will bring these mistakes to an end, and look at these things from the standpoint of plain common sense. The minister in his statement of probable cost, if I understood him correctly, gave figures approximating $26,000,000 as the amount to which we are committing this country to-night by passing this vote. Of that amount $6,000,000 is required to put the railway into the condition of a branch line, and $20,000,000 for a ten-ship port in order that the route may be properly tested out.

Mr. DUNNING: I must protest against these words being put into my mouth. I specifically did not commit the government to a $20,000,000 port development.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I recognize that the minister said he did not know, but he gave us figures showing a necessary expenditure of $20,000,000. I appreciate at once that he immediately said I am not going to vouch for these figures. That is one of our difficulties, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is deliberately misinterpreting me.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, I must protest. I am not deliberately misquoting anybody.

Mr. DUNNING: I take back the word "deliberately". The hon. member is unintentionally misrepresenting my meaning. I will read the statement again, for the fourth time. In speaking of the port I said that while the figures had the backing of the engineer Mr. McLachlan, for a port development of that size and scale, I was not committing the government to a development on that scale. That is what I said.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is exactly what I said. Perhaps the minister will be good enough to tell us what he is committing the government and the Canadian people to as a means of testing out this route. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we have a right to know that. This business of coming before parliament and saying: Here is the report of an engineer to the effect that this thing is going to cost $20,000,000 to put this port into a condition so that we can properly test out this route—

Mr. DUNNING: The engineer did not say that; neither did I, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then what does the engineer say the $20,000,000 is to be spent for? Why was the $20,000,000 mentioned?

Mr. DUNNING: In response to a question as to what information I had. Perhaps I had better read it again, although it is already on Hansard. It shows an estimated cost of harbour works at Port Nelson, for ten ships, of 7,000 tons each, all in port at the same time, and allows for a 4,000,000 bushel terminal elevator, which would cost $3,600,000, out of the $20,000,000, and to which I specifically refused to commit myself or the government at this stage.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Frankly I can see no purpose in putting these figures on the record at all.

Mr. DUNNING: Then why did the hon. member ask the question?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has parliament no right to know to what this country is being committed when it passes this estimate?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is quite right. Then why does he find fault with me for giving the information?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not finding fault. I accept the statement of the minister as to the figure he gave, and because I do so, he says I am deliberately misquoting him.

Mr. DUNNING: I withdrew that word.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then he said I was unintentionally misquoting him. The minister volunteers the information that it will cost $20,000,000. Now if the engineer has overestimated what the cost is going to be, I submit that this is the first time an engineer has ever overestimated what a work of this character is going to cost the country.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister read in detail the engineer's figures. It was unnecessary, because as a matter of fact we have the engineer's figures. He gave ten ships of 7,000 tons each, and an elevator of 4,000,000 bushels capacity. Surely if Port Nelson is going to become the great wheat emporium of western Canada, a ten ship harbour and a 4,000,000 bushel elevator is not too great. That accounts for $20,000,000. The minister has given the figure of $6,000,000 to put the road in the condition of a branch line railway.

Mr. DUNNING: Including engine and railway terminal facilities.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am going to take the risk of putting into the record what it will cost to put the railway in the condition of a main line railway, for if you are going to transport wheat to Port Nelson, it is not a branch line you want at all, but a main line railway. It is not bent 80-pound relay rails that have been used before on a main line and taken up, and had the ends taken off and rebored, that you want. Without giving the details, although I have them here, to put the railway into the condition of a reasonable main line for carrying reasonably heavy traffic—200 carloads of wheat per day, for example—with a single track line, with necessary passing track, water service, round houses, machine and car shops, will cost, not $6,000,000, but $14,000,000, without a single item of rolling stock to take care of the traffic.

Mr. DUNNING: I have an estimate from Sir Henry Thornton and his organization on the basis of raising the whole line to main line standard, and it is $8,100,000, not $14,000,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We have received estimates of that character before. It is because of statements at that time submitted to parliament, based on estimates of such a character, that we find ourselves just where we are. As to this very line 21 miles of side tracks will be required.

Mr. DUNNING: They are there now.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What kind of side tracks? Would they permit of wheat trains passing each other?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have reports of a different character that contradict that statement. I submit that the necessary switches are not there and that whatever tracks are there will have to be replaced. The figures that I am giving are based on the necessary equipment in the shape of ties, rails, ballasting, ditching, clearing the right of way, water services, roundhouses, and so on right through to Port Nelson.

Mr. DUNNING: I gave the authority for my figures; will my hon. friend be good enough to say who supplied him with this information?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, I will not say who supplied me with this information but I will put it on Hansard. May I say in this connection that I have already put on Hansard figures with respect to other lines of railway, and if my hon. friend wants to look up Hansard he will find that these estimates have been absolutely borne out in every case. They were received from the same source and have been checked up by the same source as in the present case.

Mr. DUNNING: I gave also details of every item required. It would be of great assistance to me if my hon. friend would follow my example in that regard and would place every detail required on Hansard.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The following is a statement of the estimated cost of completing the railway to mile 333:

Mr. DUNNING: I hope the hon. member for South Winnipeg is listening to this.

Mr. ROGERS: You are not going to spend any money for railway building. You do not intend to build a mile of railway.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The remaining portion of the road could be simply taken on a mileage basis. To build the line and put it in condition for operating as a main line railway would cost $65,000 a mile. Am I putting the figure at an excessive amount when I say that it would cost $4,000,000 to complete the remaining 92 miles of railway and provide the railway terminal facilities necessary to take care of the traffic? And that does not provide one single dollar for rolling stock.

Now my time is limited, and I do not wish to detain the House unduly. The minister, speaking this afternoon with regard to the question of rolling stock, quoted the director of economics of the Canadian National Railways as to whether it would cost more to put a complete organization on to the Hudson Bay railway, a distance of 420 odd miles in length to handle the grain traffic for two months, than it would to add the additional train crews and engine crews necessary to operate the part of the line they are already operating. I venture to suggest that if the director of economics placed his opinion against that of the vice president and general manager of the Canadian National Railways they would say to him that it would cost 75 per cent more to create that organization and place it on the Hudson Bay railway to handle the same traffic that they would handle with additional train crews and engine crews—and that is practically all they require on a wheat route—on the lines they are already operating east of the point where they would branch off to go to Hudson bay.

10 p.m.

Then as to rolling stock. Surely the minister or the director of economics of the Canadian National Railways does not ask the House or the Canadian people to take their word at par. They say they can operate these 420 miles of railway and thirty or forty million bushels of wheat in a couple of months without any additional rolling stock. How are they going to do it?

Mr. MILLAR: Does any railway deliver all the grain to any terminal in two months and is not the wheat drawn all the year round?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am simply taking the word of the minister himself when he used the period of two months and said a 4,000,000 bushel elevator was an extravagant estimate as to the elevator capacity required. If there is only going to be 4,000,000 bushel elevator capacity how is the grain going to be stored?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is not quoting me correctly; he must not say that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then there is another point. Would the western grain men care to lock up 100,000,000 bushels of wheat at Port Nelson after navigation closes with the certain knowledge that they could not get it out of there again until navigation opens the next August or September? Would you suppose they would do it? It is not an economic possibility. It is not necessary for one to know anything about the grain trade in order to understand thoroughly that that cannot be done in connection with any commercial commodity whatever.

Mr. DUNNING: It does not need to be done.

Mr. NICHOLSON: No need of it?

Mr. DUNNING: No need of its being done.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If there is no need of doing it, what follows? If you are going to store it at Port Nelson, the minister stated that the grain traffic begins about the first of September, so that you must get the wheat to Port Nelson and away from there between the first of September and the close of navigation, which will be between October 15th and November 1st, according to the most optimistic reports we have received. That means that traffic must be moved in approximately two months. Either the grain is moved in two months or we store it at Port Nelson. Are you going to handle the grain all the year round or not move it out? Perhaps you are going to take it out on skis.

Mr. DUNNING: We will do exactly as we do now with respect to other terminals. We will move out what we can during the period of navigation and we will not move any more until the next period of navigation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Again let me say that it is not necessary to be a wheat expert to know what is being done. The grain moves to the head of the lakes and is moved out from there until about the 20th December and sometimes until the end of December of each year. Then the elevators are filled excepting what is moved by the all-rail route. But the grain is available just the moment that navigation opens on the lakes. As a matter of fact it has been available for more than a month now at the head of lake Superior and it is moving eastward all the time. It is available for all-rail movement if that is required.

Mr. MANION: It has been available for two months.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My hon. friend reminds me that it has been available for two months. May I just digress for a moment in regard to what has been said about the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway? That railway did exactly what the Hudson Bay railway might have done at any time between the time that the first construction was started and to-day if the same conditions had applied. If minerals had been disclosed along the line of the Hudson Bay railway that were disclosed along the line of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway during the construction period we would not be debating the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. It would have been a commercial success long before now. But unfortunately they have not been so disclosed. If the government will take the position that this is a colonization railway, built for the purpose of developing that country, I will say: Go ahead and build it.

Mr. DUNNING: That is one of its purposes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If that is one of its purposes, before any other purpose is gone ahead with and before this country is committed to this other vast expenditure, parliament and the Canadian people should see to it that all the facts as to the possibility of navigating the Hudson bay and strait are made known. Just as surely as we are standing here to-night—and my opinion is that the minister knows it—in order to make the Hudson Bay railway with its terminus at Port Nelson a factor in the handling of the grain traffic of western Canada, this country will have to spend $50,000,000 on railway terminals and elevators at Port Nelson, to say nothing about providing special ships. Let me repeat what I said before. I am not expressing any opinion as to the feasibility of navigating the Hudson strait, because I do not know. I am in the same position as the rest of the 245 members of this House. That is the position we are in and it is solely because the government, if they intend to go ahead with this project, have taken no steps whatever to provide any information upon which a proper judgment may be based as to whether this route is feasible or not.

Mr. DUNNING: In order to clarify the matter before the committee I would like to ask my hon. friend a few questions with reference to the statement placed in his hands by his unknown railway expert. When I come before the committee and make a statement, based upon the authority of the engineering and operating officers of the Canadian National, that this 332 miles of railway can be put into operating conditions on a branch line basis for $3,000,000, it is an important matter that my hon. friend should produce figures demonstrating that to put this 332 miles into shape for operation on a main line basis will cost $10,000,000, I believe he said. If a member assumes the responsibility of advancing figures, he should be willing to give the committee information regarding them. He spoke for instance about sidings. What is the amount involved in grading and laying tracks upon sidings on this stretch of 332 miles?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Twenty-one miles of sidings at $10,000 a mile.

Mr. DUNNING: That is how much money?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Multiply it. Is that an excessive figure?

Mr. DUNNING: Is that for grading alone?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: The steel?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Steel rails for sidings will cost $264,000.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is aware that we already have sidings on this 332 miles.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There may be spur tracks and sidings, but the minister will not say that on the Hudson Bay railway there are passing tracks that can take care of main line traffic and the rolling stock that would be necessary to handle that traffic.

Mr. DUNNING: I was not responsible; the Minister of Railways of the Conservative party was responsible for starting the construtions of that railway on a main line basis. I am not blaming him for it. He made provision for 27.8 miles of sidings in 332 miles of line, and I am informed that the sidings are, in fact, main line sidings. If my hon. friend would tell us who his expert was we might know whether he knew what he was talking about.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am willing to leave it to the judgment of the House and of the country as to whether or not I know what I am talking about.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say my hon. friend; I said my hon. friend's expert, as to whether he knew what he was talking about. There are in existence 27.8 miles of sidings in 332 miles of line, whereas my hon. friend's expert asks for only 21 miles in order to make it a main line.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We are at the point where we have 27.8 miles of main line passing tracks on a railway on which the minister proposes to spend $3,000,000 in order to bring the main line of the railway itself up to the standard of a branch line. We have 27.8 miles of main line passing tracks capable of taking care of main line traffic such as we have been discussing this evening. Surely the minister is not going to take that position.

Mr. DUNNING: It is almost an insult to the intelligence of the committee, but it is necessary for me to explain that what was a main line standard when the road was originally constructed in 1913 or 1914 is not a main line standard to-day.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Exactly.

Mr. DUNNING: But as regards the length of the siding, the grading work, the steel work, it is all there, and we are able to ascertain what it would cost to put that particular piece of track and siding into a condition equivalent to present branch line standards. Surely that is plain enough to members of the committee. How much does my hon. friend's expert allow for new rails?

Mr. NICHOLSON: To put the present line into operating condition?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: $921,000.

Mr. DUNNING: The present line is being operated to mile 214. My hon. friend's expert surely would not claim that there had been enough traffic over those eighty pound rails since that railway was constructed to wear them out.

Mr. CAHAN: There has been enough frost to put them out of shape.

Mr. DUNNING: If trains are operating over them they are not in bad enough condition to require a great deal of renewal. The only provision made in my estimate for new rails is in connection with the last 100 miles, the calculation being based upon the experience we had with the other 214 miles. It is believed that 950 tons costing $39,000 will be sufficient. My hon. friend's figure is $900,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sorry I cannot stay to continue this debate with my genial friend; but I have to leave to catch a train. I want to add just one word more to what I have said. The minister has spoken all along to-night in reference to branch line construction. I am referring to what will be necessary to make the main line construction of this railway capable of carrying a traffic such as, for example, 200 cars of wheat per day, with the class of rolling stock used at the present time in handling that amount of freight. The minister knows as well as I do the nature of the sidetracks. Let him read the chief engineer's report wherein it is stated that the rails have become so kinked and bent, as they obviously must have done under the conditions to which they have been exposed, as to make it imperative to replace them. Anyone who knows anything about the operations of a standard railway under the strain of modern traffic must realize that every single rail on the whole of that line will have to be replaced before you can make a main line railway of it.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know who my hon. friend's expert is, but I have the estimate submitted by the engineers of the Canadian National system. That estimate contemplates the raising of the whole line to main line standard and it includes provision for three engine terminals at $500,000 each, covering all the items the hon. gentleman mentions. The total estimate is $4,373,000 to raise that 332 miles of main line to standard. My hon. friend's expert says it will take $10,000,000. Now, the names of the engineers of the Canadian National Railways are well known to the public; they are not anonymous. And the chief engineer of the system stands behind the estimate I have quoted. I would rather take that estimate, as I feel sure the committee would, than an estimate of $10,000,000 given anonymously by someone about whom this committee knows nothing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: So far as that goes, the minister knows perfectly well that a private member may secure information from an absolutely reliable source and be unable to disclose his authority. The person from whom he gets his information may be perfectly reliable but he dare not reveal his identity. I am prepared to stand by the figures I have put on Hansard. Is the minister equally ready to vouch for the figures he gave this afternoon and to-night in regard to the cost of terminals?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I shall deal with this question from a new angle. I have heard arguments made by different hon. gentlemen, and it seems to me that the same views might be advanced for the next ten years without any results. Three governments have studied this problem, and with every change of administration there has been a change in the arguments in support of the Hudson Bay railway and against it. What this country wants in this matter is action, and action forthwith. We have been thirty years discussing the proposal, and here we are at the end of that time still wrangling. Let us do something. I cannot speak from the standpoint of a westerner, but speaking as a resident of Ontario and one who lives in the east, I say that the great desire of the people of this province to-day is to get to Hudson bay and to James bay. It is their desire to extend the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway so as to get into those two great watersheds, which are second to none on the American continent apart from the St. Lawrence. The important feature about these two watersheds is that some of the greatest rivers in America flow from them. There is a passage in the Bible which claims for the waters of Aban and Pharphar, rivers of Damascus, a superiority to the waters of Israel. Can we not make a similar claim for these watersheds in western Canada in comparison with the waters in other parts of the country? The hope of Canada lies in the north. The poet has said:

Westward the star of Empire takes its way.

I say this: Northward the star of progress in this Dominion takes its way, and the most promising part of Canada to-day is the northern country. Not only Ontario but the province of Quebec as well wants access, through the extension of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway, to James Bay, and one railway will do for the two provinces.

There are more resources in that part of the country than almost anywhere else and they are lying there waiting for development. Most of the valuable things we have in Canada have been discovered in the west. It was the Temiskaming railway that was responsible for all these discoveries in the way of minerals. Sudbury, and the railways have also brought about the development of the pulp industry and the prosperity of the wheat fields of western Canada. There is therefore no way in which this country can be made to prosper except through the providing of means of communication. In so far as we have established lines of communication we have succeeded. The question is not altogether irrelevant, why so many of these clubs like the Kiwanis, for example, are coming here so frequently. We have natural attractions which they lack in the United States. Comparing one country with the other I see in Canada potentially the richest section of the American continent. I am not going to despair of our country. Three or four governments have tried to settle this question, and they have all realized to what an extent political intrigue can delay progress in any country. I am prepared to give the government a chance to go ahead with their estimates, and perhaps, as has been suggested, this railway might be tested as a colonization road. The important thing is, however, that we do something. It has been said that grain might have to remain in the elevators at Hudson bay over the winter. I do not quite accept that view; but even if the grain had to be stored for a time it could be moved and shipped. Certainly no grain will ever remain there six months. It may be tied up for a short time, but, as I say, it can be moved and in any case we shall have solved the problem to some extent in building the road.

People are apt to call this a God-forsaken country; they say there is something wrong with it; the climate is against us. Well, there are lots of things that are in favour of the country and if there are problems to be solved we can face them and solve them. Take for instance the difficulty in connection with ice; I do not regard this as insuperable. Indeed, I am as sure of this as I am of my own existence, that in five or ten years' time the scientists of the world will find some way of ridding the navigation of harbours of the obstacle which has now to be faced in this direction. Every day marvellous things are being done. Who would have believed thirty years ago that such a thing as the telephone was possible? Yet it has come—communication through a wire. Now a beam does everything, we have wireless communication, and it is most effective. And science is going to do something to further solve the transportation problems of Canada.

Let me tell my friends here what happened the first winter in the settlement of Quebec three hundred years ago. I was reading the other day the Jesuit Relations, and I came across this passage:

Si'l y a du froid il y a du bois pour nous rechauffer.

If it is cold here we have wood to warm ourselves.

Now that ought to be the attitude of us who are trying to solve the problems of Canada to-day. Let us take example from those Jesuit fathers. They did not ask for a ship to carry them home because they had winter ahead of them; they went on cutting wood. We have any amount of resources. Year after year we are cutting down a lot of our pulpwood, but science tells us to go in for reforestation, and by a proper system of replanting our cutover areas we shall have a constant supply of wood. I have studied that north country carefully, and I have no hesitation in saying that we have more resources there than can be found in any other country in the world. All we have to do is to build railways and open up the country, and by this development we will become the dominating part of this North America continent. The Americans would be glad to come over here to-morrow and do the job if we would let them.

I do not want to pass any opinion on others, but certain people would not like to see the Hudson Bay railway completed and a new port established there, for fear the ascendency of Montreal would be jeopardized. That ascendency has already been attacked, in a way, by Vancouver and Victoria, and by New York and other United States ports; but Montreal has not suffered. In the same way Montreal was not hurt by the opening of the Panama canal. I believe Montreal will be a better port than ever if it has to buck against the competition of the Hudson bay route. I want to see a lot of our grain go through Halifax and St. John, and if we believe in the Maritime provinces we should do our share to help them forward. I noticed in the Globe newspaper the other day that for some reason or other it is advising the government not to be in too great a hurry in dealing with this question. Well, we have not been in a hurry so far; we have been too slow. Let us deal with the question, and if the route is no good let us say so and drop it. But when Canadians undertake a work they finish it, and we would not be worthy of those from whom we come if we had not the courage to deal with a problem of this kind. I admit there is a lot in what the member for Winnipeg and the member for Algoma have said, but we have been saying the same things year after year, and we can go on saying them for another thirty years, but the one outstanding thing is that with all our talk there has been very little action. Let the government proceed with this work. The only fault I have to find with them is that they have not acted when they said they would. The men from the west have not said much to-night in favour of the scheme. Well, they have been fooled a great deal in connection with it, they have been promised this railway under three governments. I do not blame those governments so much because the war intervened, but now the opportunity is here to complete the road and make it a success. We have talked enough for and against this undertaking; for God's sake let us go on and make the experiment.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. Chairman, I think it is abundantly evident to anybody who has listened to the discussion to-night that the subject matter is one on which there is a considerable division of opinion. I congratulate the minister on the very temperate manner in which he introduced the question, and the caution with which he brought forward and dealt with most of the factors in the case. He made some reference to the cost of equipping the port. I am not quite sure as to what he included in that cost. A large amount of equipment was sent up to that country in 1913 and perhaps also in 1914. I do not know how much of it remains available for future work. That equipment included steam shovels, cranes, dredges and scows. In the estimate of the equipment required to carry on that work has he included the necessary dredges and other necessary construction equipment?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend wants to know about our general plant up there at the present time?

Mr. CANTLEY: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: We have two steam shovels, four keystone drills, concrete mixers, one five-ton single track locomotive crane, one fifteen-ton double track locomotive crane —I could give the whole list.

Mr. CANTLEY: Pardon me, I do not want the whole list. Is the minister convinced he has sufficient plant there to complete the work he has in mind?

Mr. DUNNING: The work connected with the vote before the House, or the work to be done in future on the harbour?

Mr. CANTLEY: Including work to be done in future on the harbour to make it available for the berthing of the ten steamers he mentioned.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not prepared to say that we have sufficient equipment up there at the present time and of the right type in all respects to take care of the dredging work, but in the estimate I gave this afternoon, prepared by the engineer, the cost of needed extra equipment was taken into account.

Mr. CANTLEY: I have no desire to put the minister in any false position, I am simply and solely asking for information so that I may make up my mind as to whether the amount proposed is likely to complete the equipment of the port to take care of tonnage such as he suggests. We had some six steamers up there in 1913. One third of them never came out. The first boat reached there in August; she was expected to be there in July, but was delayed on account of ice conditions. I know there is a great diversity of opinion held by members of this House and by people throughout this country in regard to the practicability of this route. We each have our opinions; some are better founded than others, but the fact is that of six boats which went in to Port Nelson in 1913 only four came out.

The reports in regard to conditions at the mouth of the Nelson river are, I think, such as should give anyone considerable thought as to how long it is possible to maintain an adequate channel in front of the estuary of the Nelson river. Captain Robertson, of one of the vessels which was lost, states that the bottom of the bay close to the mouth of the river, where the vessels must lie under this or any other plan which will make this a great grain shipping port, is strewn with great boulders covered by only about eighteen feet of water. It was largely because of that fact that this particular vessel was lost.

Mr. BIRD: What was his ship?

Mr. CANTLEY: He was captain of the Alette; the other boat lost was the Alcazar. One boat was loaded with 2,000,000 feet of hard pine, while the other one carried 3,000,000 feet of hard pine together with a couple of scows, which were never used.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will admit that those two wrecks did not occur in the straits.

Mr. CANTLEY: No, they occurred in the bay.

Mr. DUNNING: No, in the Nelson estuary.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not quite sure what the minister defines as the Nelson estuary; they occurred about as close to the site of the present dock as they could get.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right, because the works are not completed, of course.

Mr. CANTLEY: I do not think so; the disaster was not due to the non-completion of the dock. I think you will find a mass of evidence in Hansard of 1914 bearing on the cause of the loss of these vessels. The matter was argued back and forth and at considerable length in the House in 1914. However, I am not going into that matter very deeply. The point is that of the six steamers going in, two remained and are there yet.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend was asking for information; he asked me if it was correct that in 1913 two boats were wrecked. That is true, but it is also true that my hon. friend might have taken the whole period during which work was going on there, from 1913 to 1918, and the same number were wrecked. That is to say, there were only two wrecks altogether during all the years the work was proceeding.

Mr. CANTLEY: I hardly think that is correct.

Mr. DUNNING: I have confirmed the information.

Mr. CANTLEY: I repeat that I hardly think that is quite correct, but we will not quarrel over it. Is the big dredge that went up there still available?

Mr. DUNNING: The suction dredge?

Mr. CANTLEY: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CANTLEY: The last information I have is that it was piled up on the rocks. Have you salved it?

Mr. DUNNING: There is one dredge on top of the cribbing on the island, but it is in perfectly good condition and can be taken down if the chief engineer there so desires.

Mr. CANTLEY: We are assured that the ark is on mount Ararat, but it has not been salved yet. The top of an island is a rather poor place to have a dredge.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend must understand that the department did not put it there; the elements were responsible.

Mr. CANTLEY: Agreed, and that is exactly what you have to war against. There are several features which will make or unmake this whole project as a commercial proposition. One is the type of vessel it will be necessary to employ in order to navigate these waters. I do not think any man with practical experience particularly in connection with ice navigation will seriously propose or maintain that the ordinary type of freighter can successfully navigate these waters. I hold that the vessels carrying on that trade, if it is ever carried on, must be vessels of practically the same type as those prosecuting the seal fishing around Newfoundland. These vessels are constructed with double spaced scantlings and with double plating, and I take it that vessels of that type, especially as they will have to be more highly powered than the ordinary tramp vessels, will cost practically double the amount an ordinary tramp steamer of the same capacity would cost. If these vessels are to be engaged for three months only—and that is about the limit—how can they successfully compete in the trade of the world for the remaining nine months? They will be handicapped by the fact that their cost is practically double that of competing vessels of the same tonnage, and the result is obvious.

Then comes the question of insurance. The insurance out of the bay will certainly be double what it is out of the ports of New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Halifax, St. John and Quebec. Then there is the question of duplication of rolling stock to maintain this road in operation for a limited period. I am not going to go into that question more fully, because I think the House is rather tired of this argument. But I want in all seriousness to make a proposition to the minister which I think is reasonable, practicable and one which I hope will commend itself to him and to the House. From the utterances of the minister to-day I take it that he wishes to gang warily, to ca' canny, to make sure and so make no great mistakes. I would remind the minister, although it may be unnecessary, that reputations have already been lost in connection with this enterprise.

The minister has twenty or twenty-two Canadian merchant marine steamers of about 5,400 tons net register or 8,000 tons dead weight capacity. He will require at Port Nelson a considerable quantity of coal if he goes on with this enterprise, as I believe he fully intends doing. I propose to him that beginning in July of this present year he divert ten of these vessels—because they are just the size vessels he speaks of using in that trade—load them with coal in Nova Scotia and send them up. Such a fleet of ten steamers will carry 70,000 or 80,000 tons of coal, and he will need the coal for his port development. I am aware that he has no docks at which to discharge the coal, but that makes no great difference; let him throw the coal overboard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CANTLEY: Do not laugh; he who laughs last laughs best. I am making a serious proposition, and an entirely practical one, and I leave it to the minister or any man with a knowledge of the subject whether or not it is practical. He can have those ships discharge that coal over the side, and he can dredge it up with a clam shell or dipper dredge as he requires it. Coal stored under water loses none of its value. This proposal is practical, for I claim to be a practical man. Let him send these boats there beginning in July ensuing, next month; they will return light, but he will get his coal there and at a lower cost than is otherwise possible, and if he is able to get the ten boats out safely next fall without accident, I will cease my opposition to the scheme.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be very glad to have the suggestion made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) examined, and to give it consideration.

Mr. CANTLEY: Thank you.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MILLAR: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: I saw the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) first.

Mr. MILLAR: This is the third time I have attempted to speak to-night, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I saw the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre first.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): The situation in regard to the Hudson Bay railway as it stands to-night is briefly this. The projected line extends from the townsite of Le Pas nothward to Hudson bay, a total distance of 426 miles. Already the 426 miles have been graded from Le Pas to tidewater. Of that distance the steel has been laid upon 334 miles.

Mr. DUNNING: For 332 miles.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): The minister says 332 miles. It requires to be laid on 92 miles more, which 92 miles is graded, to finish it. There have been expended in moneys on that railway to date approximately, including upkeep, $20,000,000. There have been expended in the matter of materials and equipment stored at the bay itself several millions of dollars. That railroad has been promised to Canada by prominent men of every political party who have held the reins of government in this country ever since confederation, and the question now is: Will we finish a railway that is in that condition, or will we let it rot? So far as I am concerned, I am for finishing the railway with all despatch.

This is not a party question, Mr. Chairman. I must say that the Winnipeg Free Press has been a bit unfair in endeavouring to inject a little politics and propaganda into this question. In last Saturday's issue it calls attention to the fact that when the question of the Hudson bay estimate came up in this House on Friday for consideration, it was stood over at the instance of the acting leader of the opposition, the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) and it intimated that the reason the vote was not dealt with on that occasion was because a number of Conservative members were absent attending a meeting in Montreal, and that it should have been proceeded with. It further points out that direct information had been given by the government that the Hudson Bay estimate would be considered on that day. I take issue with that statement. It is true that we knew that railway estimates would come up, but many days are spent here on the estimates of a particular department without certain individual items being reached.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, in reply to a question across the floor of the House I stated a week ago that on the next occasion that the railway estimates were before the House, the Hudson Bay railway vote would be taken up. I am not now quarrelling with my hon. friend's statement; I mention this only in the interest of accuracy.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): If that statement was made by the minister, I did not hear it. So far as the particular occasion was concerned, there were a number of Conservative members absent on that day, including Conservative members who were in favour of that road. We spoke to the acting leader of the opposition and suggested to him that if by any chance the Hudson Bay railway vote was reached, it was our desire that it be not disposed of until we had had an opportunity to speak. I was one of those members, and I now take this opportunity to-night, as one of those then absent, to say that I stand four-square behind this vote of $3,000,000 for the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. FORKE: I think it is only fair to the Winnipeg Free Press to say that they devoted a whole editorial praising the Conservative members at Ottawa for the stand they are taking on the Hudson Bay railway in their speeches. The hon. member saw that, I am sure.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I do not know that the Winnipeg Free Press feels the need of any special sponsor here.

Mr. FORKE: It spoke very flatteringly of the Conservative members. Did the hon. member see it or not?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I did not, as a matter of fact. I say, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a party issue. Examine the records of the parties since confederation, and you will find that prominent leaders of both political parties in this country have declared for the Hudson Bay railway. Sir John A. Macdonald said that it was the great natural outlet for the west. Coming down to more recent times, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a great champion of that route. In the last political campaign, unless I misunderstood what they said in the west, the leaders of both the Conservative and the Liberal parties declared themselves for at least such a measure of completion of that road as would carry the line to the bay and give the road an effective test. For that measure of completion at the present I stand. I am not one of those who is going to urge upon members in the east, who are not perhaps so directly interested in that road as are we of the west, the necessity of immediately committing this country to the expenditure of $26,000,000 odd given in the estimated cost by the hon. Minister of Railways, but I am here to insist as a right, not only of the west but of this whole country, that that road be completed, and completed forthwith, to the bay. That I submit is not asking too much.

Appropriations for the completion of the Hudson Bay route have been included in the estimates every year between the years 1910 and 1918. They have been passed by successive governments and they have been passed by the Senate. Why, then, at this time does the whole question of the feasibility of the route come up? I submit that is a matter which has been passed upon at least to the extent of completion to tidewater. I will not go into an argument as to the feasibility of the route. I point merely to the last official report on the subject, which is the report of the special committee of the Senate in 1920, the effect and the exact wording of which has been placed upon Hansard by the hon. Minister of Railways. That committee declared the route feasible. I grant you that you can call witnesses for and against the route. Take any man who is placed on trial for his life on a charge of murder; you can call eminent alienists both for and against, twenty to prove that he is sane and twenty to prove that he is insane. It is much the same with the matter of the Hudson Bay route. I submit that the question of the feasibility of the route has already been passed upon, and is no longer a matter of argument in this House, at least in so far as to warrant its completion to tidewater.

On the question as to payment for this route, the Minister of Railways has drawn attention to the fact, if I interpreted his meaning correctly, that already certain western lands have been set aside, if not by statute, at least it was generally and distinctly understood, for the purpose of producing a revenue for the construction of this very route. In the matter of pre-emptions and purchased homesteads, provision was made under the Dominion Lands Act of 1908 for the sale of these pre-emptions and purchased homesteads. Speaking to the point as to what was to be done with the revenue derived therefrom, Hon. Frank Oliver—and remember he was a member of the government when that provision was made—speaking in this House on 26th May, 1913, as reported at page 10951 of Hansard, said:

> The question has been raised here in regard to the cost of this railroad, the charge upon the treasury. Some years ago the principle of pre-emptions was introduced into the western country, with the understanding that the fund accruing from the sale of pre-emptions would be considered as an extra source of revenue from which the Hudson Bay railway might be constructed.

That understanding has been confirmed to-night by the words of the Minister of Railways. What moneys up to date have been derived from the sale of these pre-emptions and purchased homesteads? A recent return submitted to this House in answer to an inquiry by the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Murphy) shows the following figures: The number of acres sold up to March 31st of this year were—pre-emptions 12,763,040 acres; sale price, $38,289,120. The acreage of purchased homesteads sold was 1,322,840 acres, and the sale price thereof $3,968,520, making a total sale price of $42,257,640. The moneys actually collected were as follows: Up to February 28th of this year there was collected on account of the sale of pre-emptions, $16,635,639.39 and for purchased homesteads $3,191,648.98, making a total collected up to the end of February last of $19,827,288 37. There is a balance still outstanding in respect of the sale of homesteads and pre-emptions that have not been cancelled of over $7,000,000. I draw attention to these facts for the reason that those are lands of the western provinces contiguous to that railway. On the word of the Hon. Mr. Oliver, who was in the government at that time provision was made for the sale of those lands, it was distinctly understood, although not definitely provided in the statutes, that as to these moneys the proceeds thereof should be earmarked as a fund for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. I think that is a matter worthy of some consideration.

It is urged against this route that it is but a dream. I ask hon. members of this House, was not Canadian confederation a dream? Was not the carrying through of the Canadian Pacific railway to the Pacific coast a dream? Was not the securing of Canada as an integral part of the British Empire a dream? But these are dreams that have since become realities. The opening up of northern Ontario by the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway was a dream, but it is now a reality. I say to those hon. gentlemen that at the heart of everything worth while there is a bit of dreaming. The people of the west have been promised the completion of this railway not by one party only but by the leaders of all political parties on the hustings throughout this country for the last forty years. If then the people of the west have come to believe the pledges of the leaders of these parties, no blame is to be attached to them. They now ask for their redemption. As much as two hundred and fifty years ago the Hudson Bay route was the only ingress and egress to that western country. The Selkirk settlers who settled along the Red river came from Scotland via the Hudson bay. The Hudson's Bay Company have been using that route in their trading operations for nearly three centuries. The feasibility of the route has been proved by that method of ingress and egress for two hundred and fifty years.

If you look at the map of Canada you will find that the Hudson bay is the great natural outlet for western Canada. You will also find something else. You will find that to-day our settlement runs along the American border. To what direction are we going to look? Are we going to look to the south? There is only one way and that is northward. Build this road and you roll the map of Canada northward. That means new Canadians. If that road does nothing else—if it never carries a bushel of wheat to the markets of the world, if it never carries a steer to the world's markets—it will open up a country rich in mineral resources, rich in water power, rich in possibilities. It will open up the fisheries of Hudson bay, and as a colonization road alone its construction will be worth while.

Mr. MILLAR: The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) raised one question that I should like to clear up. He seemed to find some difficulty in realizing that wheat could be taken out by this new route providing it was finished and the elevators built. May I point out that it has not been the custom of those who ship grain to ship it all out in a very short time? It would be impossible to do that even if they wished, and it would not be desirable. I have figures here, from government statistics, showing that on the 31st of March, 1924, 177,000,000 bushels of wheat were in the terminal elevators, in the hands of the farmers, in the country elevators, or in other places in Canada. If this line is built that grain is going to be fed to the market. It is the policy of the pool to feed grain to the market gradually, not rush it on to the market in a few months. Great Britain, for example, will take about 12,000,000 bushels a week, and it is the policy of the pool to feed that grain to that market just as it will take it. That grain is going to be fed to the British market in the months of May, June, July, August and September and it must be stored somewhere before the new grain comes in. Is there any reason why that grain that is to be taken to Great Britain in July or August cannot be stored in the elevators at Port Nelson? None whatever.

11 p.m.

It means a great deal if this route is feasible. I say "if", because there has been so much contradictory evidence given on the subject. And there are differences and degrees of doubt. I know that a great many hon. members have a doubt about the feasibility of the route. Others again are satisfied that it is feasible; that there is no danger whatever.

Mr. MANION: Have any of the party to which the hon. member belongs—and I ask this merely for information—investigated the matter, or are they just taking the reports? Have any of his party really gone up to the headwaters of the Nelson river and spent some time there to look into the matter?

Mr. MILLAR: Yes, two of the present members of our group, and Mr. Hoey—I think at least four of our group have gone over this route and carefully examined it.

Mr. MANION: I am speaking about the strait and so forth. That does not cover that.

Mr. MILLAR: Since my hon. friend has touched on that point, let me read a short extract from a statement by Captain Bernier of Quebec. I can of course read scores of them, and so can others on the other side. This is what Captain Bernier says:

> After sixty years of navigation experience, Captain Bernier declared to an interviewer: "It is while navigation is open a better route than the St. Lawrence. The difficulty is not the straits but the port."

Hon. members should take note of that because of some remarks that have been made recently. In another place Captain Bernier says:

> Hudson bay itself was a mariner's paradise. "It has," said Captain Bernier, "a level sandy bottom with no islands and no reefs in the course from Hudson straits." He declared that the period of navigation would be at least three and sometimes four months.

Do hon. members realize that Port Nelson is the same distance from Liverpool as Montreal if you do not go by Belle Isle—2,966 miles? But Port Nelson is 1,000 miles nearer the centre of the grain district than Montreal. I suppose hon. members will hardly believe that, but if they look at a map they will find that such is the case. That means 1,000 miles gained in distance. Let us consider for a moment what that 1,000 miles of distance saved means. If it was 1,000 miles of open water it would not mean very much, because the cost of carrying grain or other freight over open water is only one-eight of the cost of carrying it on land. But part of this is rail. It is 915 miles from Saskatoon to Fort William; it is 700 miles from Saskatoon to Port Nelson. When we get to Fort William there is open water for a distance, but the open water does not go through to Montreal by a long way. When we reach the canals, transportation through the canals is almost as expensive as by railway. There are 44 miles of canals on the St. Lawrence and 26 miles at the Welland; there is the difficulty and the waiting in going through the canals. A great deal of grain instead of taking the water route on the lower end takes the rail route from Parry Sound, Collingwood, Owen Sound and so on, and I think that is proof that the cost over the lower end of that route is almost as expensive as by rail. The transfer points which I have mentioned would be approximately 400 miles from Montreal, so that in that distance of 1,000 miles that I speak of, 400 miles and 200 miles are rail haul. If the Hudson bay route is feasible, that means that our grain will go to the Liverpool market over less mileage on water and with 600 miles less rail haul.

The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) asked: Would the pool like to tie up 100,000,000 bushels there? It is necessary for the pool or others who are shipping grain to have grain on hand at several points, at least to have enough grain at all times of the year to satisfy the market. For that reason they will always have to have grain at Montreal and Vancouver and perhaps at Halifax and St. John. But there is no reason why a portion of the grain that might be required in midsummer, as I said before, could not be stored at Port Nelson, and with the shorter route, unless the insurance is enormous, unless the losses are beyond anything that we can think of, there will be a vast gain. With the keen competition we are going to have in a very short time from Russia, the shortest and cheapest route we can get for our grain will be necessary if we are going to continue in the grain business.

This route, if it is feasible—and I believe it is—will also mean better trade with Great Britain. I know the majority of the people of western Canada believe it is. Another factor that affects this question is this: Frequently it has been pointed out in this House that the water on the Great lakes is going down. Perhaps every member does not realize exactly what that means. I am speaking only from memory, but I am quite positive that my memory is not playing me any tricks when I say that a large grain boat which is pretty well loaded would require eighty tons of freight to sink it another inch, or 2,960 tons to sink it one foot. That figures out to about 33,000 bushels. Hon. members will see where we are drifting. We hope that in a very short time we shall be able to stop the diversion of water at Chicago and in some way raise the water in the Great lakes to its former level. But if we are not able to do that, hon. members can see that the expense of transporting grain and other freight over the lake route is going to increase rapidly. What does it mean to have a large boat going down the lakes not filled but within a foot and a half of being filled? It means, if it is only a foot, 33,000 bushels short, and if it is a foot and a half, 49,500 bushels short. Therefore every foot lost in the depth of these lakes is an enormous loss. The situation is serious enough at the present. If it should become more serious and expensive the greater will be the necessity of opening up a new route via the Hudson bay. There are many other points that I could touch on; some of them have been touched on and some not, but at this late hour I am not going to prolong the discussion any longer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As one of the Winnipeg representatives I feel that I cannot give a silent vote on a question which has created so much discussion throughout western Canada. Some arguments which have been used do not particularly appeal to me. We are told that this legislation must be given simply to satisfy the west. I do not think that argument is good. The government should not yield to the clamour either of Oshawa or of Winnipeg. We are told that the question is not debatable. I do not think that position is tenable. We are told that the cost of construction is already provided for by the sale of western lands. I do not think that in itself is sufficient to warrant this estimate being passed. We are told that this is not a new project. I am inclined to think that argument has a considerable amount of weight, as we have already spent a great deal of money on the project and this expenditure would be lost if we did not go at least so far as the vote goes—that is to rehabilitate the road. I would point out incidentally that it is only on such an argument as this that we can justify continued expenditures on the Welland canal, more especially at this time and before the St. Lawrence waterway is deepened. Those who are afraid of the Hudson Bay railway ought to remember the Welland canal with its enormous expenditure; and it is a question whether or not it will be wise for us to complete that undertaking until we have finished the waterways lower down.

I have noticed that the advocates of the Hudson Bay railway are sometimes very resourceful and shift their ground as the necessity demands. If it is not a grain route, then it is a cattle route, and if it is not a cattle route then there is fishing or there are minerals to be developed.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does not the hon. member say the same of the opponents of the railway?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so. I say that we ought frankly to face all the facts of the case. This railroad, even though completed to tidewater, would be of comparatively little advantage without the terminals, and these terminals would be expensive. The question is undoubtedly of importance as to the choice between Churchill and Nelson as terminus. It is all very well for the advocates of the railroad to say that this question has been settled and that we cannot alter it. I do not believe that is so. It is no use suggesting that a discussion of the preference as between Churchill and Nelson is something in the nature of a red herring. Certainly we ought not to allow anything to divert us from the project if it is sound, but surely it is not too late to consider whether or not it is advisable to change the terminus.

For me, however, I confess, the most important consideration is the feasibility of the straits.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the hon. gentleman give us his reasons for thinking that the question as to which port should be chosen should be gone into again?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think it should be considered on general principle. We have the most diverse statements with regard to the two ports, and it is not too late to make a decision one way or the other, especially in view of the importance of the question.

Mr. HANNESSON: Is not the present vote intended for repairs to the existing system?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall come to that in a moment. At this stage we ought to consider not merely the vote now before us—and I may observe here that I intend to support it—but the future possibilities as well. I am going to support this vote, but I want to explain the grounds on which I shall do so. I should not feel justified in voting for this expenditure unless I put my position before the committee. We cannot very well go ahead and spend $3,000,000 without knowing what our objective is to be.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Two independent staffs of engineers went into the question fully and both reported in favour of Nelson.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am aware that there are those who favour Nelson, but surely we need not wait until the tracks are actually laid and the terminals built before deciding an engineering question of this character. I may summarize briefly the points which, in my opinion, should be considered in deciding the question of the construction of this railway. According to the evidence, which undoubtedly is conflicting and not altogether conclusive, we may gather the following facts.

The straits are open somewhere between two and four months, with a maximum of fifteen weeks, and this not to be depended upon every year.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Where does the hon. gentleman get his information?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend has studied the question thoroughly and, as he knows, this information is obtained from the various reports that have been submitted to the government, such for instance as the one referred to by the Minister of Railways today, as well as from returns brought down to the House on different occasions by the Department of the Interior, the reports of Mr. McLachlan and so on. I would refer the committee to one rather interesting document which I fancy is about as careful a statement as we may find on this question. This study was made by one of my own fellow townsmen, Mr. W. Nelson Smith, and is reported in the Engineering Journal of June, 1924.

As I was going to say, we may gather from the evidence which we have before us that there is a maximum of fifteen weeks during which the straits are open, and this is not to be depended upon every year. Apparently the months are August, September and October. Before or after would mean delay and would involve specially strengthened ships; and we should also be forced, as has already been mentioned, to move the crop of the previous year. Apparently we should require special aids to navigation involving large expenditures, and as has been so frequently pointed out, it would be commercially difficult to develop a port handling mixed cargoes. That difficulty has been experienced in the case of Quebec in competition with the port of Montreal. The latter port has a much larger city behind it, and all sorts of mixed cargoes are shipped there. That is one reason why it has been so difficult for the port of Quebec to attain the development which some of us had hoped for. Then, operating for but a short period of the year there would undoubtedly be a heavy additional expense in the way of insurance and overhead of all kinds.

I am inclined to think, after looking at the matter from the standpoint of the road as a grain route, that the annual expense would be greater than the saving that would be effected. Possibly in time that might be reversed; but so far as we can see now, basing our conclusions upon the evidence at present available, it would appear that the expenditure involved might perhaps be used to better advantage in subsidizing existing roads rather than opening out this new one. Last of all, may I point out that until we have some control of the shipping situation on the Atlantic, about which we heard so much last year, the shipping combine there could readily neutralize any gains we might make on the railway.

It seems to me that this matter should be frankly faced before we make any very great additional expenditures. In the Engineering Journal of June 1924 there appears what strikes me as a very sane resolution as passed by the Engineering Institute of Canada:

> That the proposed Hudson Bay railroad be thoroughly investigated from the engineering, economic and national viewpoints before any decision is made to construct, complete or operate the said railway.

I would not go quite so far. I would build to tidewater, seeing that we have constructed so much of the road. But before proceeding to construct expensive terminals and provide necessary aids to navigation we should, I think, have a most careful investigation made into the whole question. I have already said that I intend to vote for the estimate before us, which in my opinion is quite justified. But I do urge that we ought not to be asked next year to vote still further sums without having a great deal more evidence than is now before us. Why not carry out the suggestion made in one of the articles to which I have already referred and let the government appoint a commission, not of politicians, but entirely of technical experts—such men as the past president of the Engineering Institute, Mr. R. A. Ross, whom I do not know personally, but whose reputation is Dominion-wide?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Are not technical engineers a good deal like lawyers, never agreed on anything?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They may be; but after all I have a good deal of confidence in technical engineers and in modern scientists generally. I would say we ought to have experts in engineering, in railroading, in harbour construction, in shipping operation and in grain handling. Let these men get together and make a thorough study of the subject at a cost of a few hundred thousand dollars, if need be, and prepare a report—not such a report as that made by the Senate after calling a few people before a committee to answer a few random questions.

Mr. BIRD: How could engineers investigate the problem in any other way than it has already been investigated?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not an engineer, but when hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party go up to the Hudson bay, take a look at the water, swim in it, and then come back and tell us the route is feasible, I should suggest it is quite possible that engineers with the scientific data available ought to be able to give some sort of opinion that would be at least equally as valuable.

Mr. BIRD: How would engineers investigate navigating conditions?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said not only engineers but men expert in shipping operations.

Mr. BIRD: How would they go about the work?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are a number of suggestions to be made. I have heard, for example, that we could have a good deal of help if the line was once in operation by having ships direct their course through drifting ice by means of airplane observation. I might say I was talking to some airmen about it, and they did not relish the prospect, but if that suggestion is feasible after the line is completed, it is feasible now. Further, I cannot see why some of the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine that are being sold off should not be sent there to make frequent trips during the next two or three years and keep a careful record of navigating conditions.

Mr. HAY: An expedition was sent up there forty years ago by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald, and we have their report. They got expert advice.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I have read that report. And I know perfectly well as an old-timer in the west that that route has been used by the Hudson's Bay Company through all these years.

Mr. HAY: I am not speaking of the Hudson's Bay Company; I am speaking of the expedition sent by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald in 1885.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said I had read that report, and I added that the route has been used by the Hudson's Bay Company for a much longer period. All that is true, but it is one thing to have a ship go there and wait until the ice clears; it is quite another thing to operate steamships under modern commercial conditions. We might profitably spend a very considerable sum of money in investigating this proposition before embarking on the heavy expenditure necessary if it is to become a practical grain-carrying route.

Mr. DUNNING: I wonder if my hon. friend will permit me to make an explanation at this point that I should have made earlier in the day. So far as scientific investigation is concerned, we already have the Nelson estuary completely charted right out to deep water, soundings have been taken on two separate occasions, and the maps are in existence. So engineering data relating to the Nelson estuary is already fully available. With regard to the harbour of Churchill, there is in existence the hydrographic survey of 1910 with the soundings out to deep water. There is also considerable information available from the Department of Marine and Fisheries regarding the currents in Hudson straits and the navigation conditions there generally. I merely give this information in order to assure my hon. friend that the technical aspects of these various questions have not been lost sight of by past governments and are not being overlooked by the present government. We have in the various departments of government technical experts on these matters, and the air service suggestion to which my hon. friend made reference is under consideration. I may say that that idea is rather promising. It must be remembered that icebergs, as such, are seldom if ever found in Hudson straits; the difficulty is field ice. I may tell the committee frankly that since I came down here I have studied every log book of every steamer available in the Department of Railways, and every track chart.

An hon. MEMBER: Any from Lunenburg?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, some from Lunenburg. Of course, there is no market in Hudson bay for the kind of goods my hon. friend has in mind. What strikes one in connection with both the log books and the track charts, particularly the latter, is the fact that where a vessel does encounter ice, very frequently after being held up for a period varying from half a day to a week, it shortly finds a clear passage a few miles from where it originally struck the ice, but beyond the range of vision of the mariner at the time. As a matter of fact one vessel will find a clear passage relatively a few miles from another vessel that hits an ice field. The possibilities of hydroplane observation in that regard is receiving the attention of the technical experts of the government at the present time. In all probability valuable work can be done in that connection by communicating by wireless to the captain of the ship where he is likely to find open water. Under ordinary conditions without such aids the mariner of course is limited to his own vision from the ship. But these points are all under consideration now, and I can assure my hon. friend we require no commission of experts to take charge of them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to be assured by the minister that he has all this information before him. I would feel a little more satisfied if he were not quite so sure about the matter, because it seems to me with the very conflicting evidence which has been published throughout all these years we might very well have a little more definite information with regard to a number of the points to which I have already referred. However, I thought it was only right to explain my position with regard to this matter. I intend to vote for the expenditure if it comes to a vote. I am a westerner, and I have seen in the last forty-four years that great lone land develop until we have now three great provinces. I remember as a boy driving north from Calgary to Edmonton and ferrying across the river there. At that time there was absolutely no evidence that within a few years an imposing provincial capitol on one bank and extensive university buildings on the other would overlook the little ferry that then lay before the old fort. Any of us who have pioneered in the west, have become convinced, I think, that we must take some chances. I might remind the House that although we have not as full or convincing evidence as I should like before committing ourselves to this additional expenditure, the chances we are taking in going on with the Hudson bay undertaking are not nearly so great as the chances which western men continually have to take in carrying on their private business affairs.

There is just one other point I wish to mention before sitting down. I do not think we have started to estimate the water-power that will be made available in that northern country by the construction of this railway and the opening up of the country. We may get minerals; we probably will get fish, but I am sure these water-powers will repay us fully; they at least are already in sight.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have no intention of taking up much of the time of the committee at this late hour in a discussion of this matter. The question has been under discussion in this House for the past five years, but for the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I would like to refer to a report by an engineer named J. W. Tyrrell, who was sent to the Hudson straits in 1903 to study conditions. He established himself in a chamber in the rocks four hundred feet above water to study the ice conditions during the whole winter. He states in his report that there was no time during the winter when the ice was not constantly on the move, and that there were open spaces through which a vessel could pass in all except two months of the year, January and February. That is very much in conflict with the statements of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and would imply that there are some years at least when the ice conditions are not so bad. Then I would refer to a report made by Mr. A. P. Low, another engineer who was sent to the bay in charge of the steamer Neptune. He wintered inside the straits and came out in the spring, and said in his report:

> There is little doubt that a specially constructed ship for ice navigation might pass through Hudson strait at any season, but the voyage would be long and the difficulties and dangers would be great.

I might refer again to the Senate report of 1907. In part the report states:

> The consensus of opinion of witnesses is that Hudson bay remains open all year, strait also open all or nearly all year and would be open all the time except for drift ice from the channel. Aids to navigation would greatly facilitate and extend length of season.

I see nothing whatever to be gained by adding expense by a prolonged investigation into this matter. We have had two complete investigations into this whole situation at two different periods of our history; we have already spent a lot of money and this route is either feasible or it is not feasible. Surely we can decide on the evidence before us to-day and not waste time and money in further consideration.

Mr. FOSTER: I rise to speak on this subject with a great deal of diffidence, Mr. Chairman, because I fancy I am the only member of this House who has ever been in Hudson bay. Consequently I have had an opportunity of encountering the actual conditions there, and it might be supposed that I would have some personal knowledge of those conditions. But a little personal knowledge, however little it might be, would certainly unfit one for speaking on a subject of this kind. That reminds me somewhat of after-dinner speeches, of which they say he makes the best after-dinner speech who announces his subject, departs from it and never approaches it again during the length of his discourse. But the fact remains that in this particular vote and in all subsequent votes which will come before the House in the decades yet to come before we effectively dispose of this subject, I have a peculiar interest.

In the first place I represent a constituency in the far eastern part of Canada which cannot possibly be benefited to any material extent by this route if it is proven feasible and developed into a great grain-carrying route. If it should be economically sound to carry grain from the west by this route I am sure the grain going by Buffalo and the American ports, plus that which goes by this new northern route, will entirely overlook that route especially built to carry grain from Winnipeg to Quebec and the Maritimes, the Transcontinental railway. So in any case this will tend to sidetrack the portion of the country from which I come.

That, however, is not the main point to be considered because I realize, as the people of Nova Scotia have always realized since they came into confederation, that we must give a great deal in order to benefit the whole of Canada. If they have become a little tired of giving and not getting very much in return, as they think, I can assure you that it is projects such as these together with the great amount of money spent upon railways all over the country that have brought them partly to that conclusion.

I do not say that I am not going to support this vote, but my first objection is that in my humble judgment this is not the time in the affairs of Canada when we should embark upon a $3,000,000, $10,000,000, $20,000,000 or $50,000,000 project regarding transportation. I cannot help come to the conclusion that we have been spending money in this country on transportation problems for the last twenty-five years, piling up deficit after deficit year after year until we now have a staggering debt on the shoulders of our people. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite as well as hon. members on this side of the House get up and wave their arms in enthusiastic support of schemes of this character, which would indicate at least that our burden is very light indeed. It was that self same enthusiasm which sent us into our railway problems as we have them in Canada to-day; it was that same enthusiasm, without proper examination and proper information, which has cost this country millions of dollars which we will never get back.

What is the financial situation of Canada to-day? Hon. gentlemen might consider for a moment our national debt of $2,422,000,000; add to that if you will the provincial debts of $784,000,000 and the municipal debts of another $794,000,000. Then figure the amount of money borrowed from outside Canada, upon which we have to pay interest every year, and we arrive at the staggering sum of 8,000 million dollars owing by this little Dominion of 9,000,000 people, on which sum we have to pay interest. I say that when we start in on propositions of this kind by voting $3,000,000 now—and unquestionably in the next fifteen or twenty years it will take $50,000,000 or $75,000,000—we should go very carefully. Considering this debt we should pause before bringing in, for sentimental reasons only, a measure of this kind and proceeding to vote millions of dollars in this way.

That total of 8,000 million dollars owing by 9,000,000 people means $940 for every man, woman and child in this country. There is nothing wrong about these figures; they have been compiled by reputable business men, and are correct. The total is staggering, and the people of my constituency are asking themselves what this project means so far as they are concerned. I made a little notation here extending it over a period of twenty-five years, and assuming that the expenditure reaches $50,000,000. With $20,000,000 already spent, on the basis of 4 per cent it will mean $2,000,000 to the province of Nova Scotia, or for my own constituency alone something like $140,000 as a capital charge. On that sum the interest each year will amount to $8,000 or $10,000.

I am not casting my vote in this House because some person who never was in Hudson bay gets up and says that in September and October someone bathed there and the climate is beautiful. You will never make the route pay on climate alone, my information teaches me. In the bay itself, as the hon. minister says, the difficulty is with the ice fields, 100 miles long, and from 75 to 85 miles wide. Is it proposed that when a steamer leaves the dock an aeroplane shall accompany her overhead, with a string hanging down to chart the course and tell her where the opening in the ice field is? There may be some value in the air service there But after all is said and done, until you have determined, as the hon. member for Pictou has said, that this route is feasible, the conditions obtaining in the bay as we know them certainly indicate that as a grain route much has got to be done before it will be feasible. I do not know whether it is feasible or not, but I will say this: Having made one trip in there there is not enough money this House could vote to-night that would induce me to make another in an ice breaker in the Canadian service, which ice breaker was built for the purpose of navigating water such as that. Let me add that in 260 years the Hudson Bay Company, with all their millions, have never built a steamer until this last year. The newspapers advised us the other day that they are putting their first steamer in service in that bay, to cross the Atlantic, and that it is of the ice breaker type. If you are going to have steamers of that kind, as the hon. member for Pictou has pointed out, surely it is only a mathematical problem to figure out how much higher your rates will have to be when you attempt to carry grain in boats of that character, as against boats that are proper grain boats operating from ports further south on the Atlantic. So if we are asked to vote this item for the railway as a grain route, I say that our information at the moment does not warrant it.

Then we get back to the second reason offered, and that is that the land on either side is rich in minerals, and that the road should be built as a colonization road. As a Canadian, I hope that the land on either side is rich in all sorts of minerals, as I know the bay and streams are rich in fish. But I still say, in view of all the millions we have spent on colonization roads in this country and the difficulty we have in getting people by one scheme or another to settle along the various lines of railway that have been built, that now is not the time to embark upon another colonization road and spend three or four million dollars for that purpose.

If there is one reason why this road should be built now and why this item should pass, there is one reason only, and that is the sentimental one. In the west, through propaganda in all these years, due to the fact that one leader of one party, then another leader of another party, in order to get some support in that part of the country, had to go west and pledge the party all over Canada to the support of that proposition, there has grown up a sentiment in that part of the country in favour of it, and if we pass this vote we shall be doing so in obedience to that sentiment in that part of the country.

Listening to the arguments that have been adduced, I say that that is the only reason I can see for asking my people in Nova Scotia to vote any money for this purpose, namely, in order to satisfy the great mass of people in the west, to prove to them that we in the east are ready, as we have always been since confederation, to put our shoulder to the wheel and help bear these additional burdens, that we may have unity in the Dominion. That is the only reason that has appealed to me and if I vote for the measure it will be upon that basis, and upon no other that has been given to the House.

Mr. CAHAN: As it is now nearly twelve o'clock and we have been discussing other matters than this since two o'clock this afternoon, I would suggest that this is a reasonable hour to adjourn.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CAHAN: The expressions of opinion on this side have shown that there is a sufficient number of hon. members over here in favour of this measure to enable the hon. leader of the government to put it through. But in view of the interest taken in the Hudson Bay road, a greater interest than is taken in any other measure before this House, I suggest that it is not wise to force us to discuss this question after midnight. I am prepared to go on, but the House is dealing very fairly with this issue, I think. No time has been wasted in long speeches; and I am suggesting, with great deference that the debate might well now be adjourned and a couple of hours be taken to-morrow, because there are a number who wish to express their opinion upon it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Naturally it would be my desire to defer to the wishes of an hon. member like my hon. friend from St.

Lawrence-St. George if there were any general sentiment in accord with his own. But I am inclined to think that he is about the only person left who really wishes to speak.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of course in this matter I shall be very happy to place myself in the judgment of the committee. But certainly the government would not wish to have the debate prolonged, and I really think it is the wish of the House that we should if possible, conclude this debate to-night. If it goes over to another day, the chances are that a number of the speeches made this afternoon will simply be repeated, and another day will be lost. May I point out to my hon. friend that we were ready to proceed last week with this particular item, but at the request of the acting leader of the opposition we deferred the debate from Friday last until this time, in order to give hon. members opposite the latitude and opportunity they wished.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think you lost any time by that. Very good use was made of the time during which the discussion was deferred. It is not wise, it is not expedient, that it should go to the country that the Hudson Bay vote is being forced through at twelve o'clock at night without allowing due time for an expression of opinion by the members, for in the eyes of the country this is one of the most important issues before it. The hon. gentleman, as he knows, will have support on this side of the House sufficient to pass the measure when the final vote comes, but I think members on this side should have ample time to express their opinion. Does the right hon. gentleman insist that I should go on?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to hear an expression of the view of the committee.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I do not think it would be fair to the rest of us from distant parts of the country to stay here during the whole session and who cannot get home at all, as other hon. members can, to postpone this debate. We postponed it last week to accommodate members who were unable to be present, and I agreed to that; I had no objection to offer. But I do not see why the hon. member should not go on now. We have been discussing this thing all day, and if it is put over until to-morrow some hon. gentlemen will probably be asking to have it postponed still further because some other hon. gentleman is absent. I do not think that is fair to hon. members who have to stay here during the whole session.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have certainly lost no time by any adjournment.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I say that any further delay is unfair to the members from the far west and from the Maritime provinces, who have been here since the 7th of January. A few of us went home during the first adjournment because we have our own affairs to look after, just as have hon. members who come from Quebec and Ontario and whose homes are comparatively near this city. I think my objections are well founded. The members for whom I am speaking cannot go away over the week end but have to stay here. Therefore I think other hon. members should be fair to us and let us go on with this matter and finish it up to-night.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I simply rise for the purpose of pointing out that the time of the House has not been wasted by any adjournment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but the contention that there was any loss of time owing to an adjournment is entirely beside the mark. There was no time at all lost by it.

Mr. DUNNING: I should not like to be put in the position of attempting to force a vote through the House—I think that was the language used by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. There is no intention of the kind. It is really a matter for the committee itself to decide. Judging from the sentiment of the committee, there seems to be a disposition to go on with this discussion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not to-night.

Mr. DUNNING: So far as the government is concerned we are prepared either to go on or to stop, as the committee itself may decide.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There are a good many members who want to speak on the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to make a request, without seeking to get more than an undertaking given in the way I think it might be given at the moment: If the government agree to adjourn the debate now, will my hon. friends opposite undertake to see that we can go on with the debate when the House meets to-morrow afternoon? I announced last night, as hon. members will recall, that we would take up the Hudson bay vote in the expectation that the entire day would be given to it; but we were met on a motion to go into Supply by an amendment, the discussion of which took up a good part of the afternoon. If I thought the same thing was going to happen to-morrow I certainly would be opposed to granting an adjournment now. However, if hon. gentlemen opposite will undertake to say that they feel sure no opposition will be offered to-morrow to our proceeding with the Hudson bay discussion from the time the House meets, I am perfectly agreeable that my colleague the Minister of Railways should move that the committee rise and report progress.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If there is one thing I think I can say it is that the opposition have let this government off very easily in connection with motions on going into Supply or for adjourning the House. I am quite sure there is no room for any complaint there at all. Such being the case I think it is hardly fair that my right hon. friend should seek to make this condition. So far as I am aware at the present moment there is no right the opposition intend to exercise in that connection, but I am not going beyond that point. I simply do not know of anything at the moment; that is all I can say. My right hon. friend will agree with me that is all I could say. I really do think we are not to blame for bringing on many amendments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am prepared to accept what my hon. friend has just stated that so far as he knows the opposition do not intend to bring in any motion that will delay our proceeding with this matter to-morrow.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).
