Mr. WILSON (Vaudreuil): These fellows behind here happen to know what business I was in. Well, I have made a study of agriculture during that time, being honorary president of the Agricultural society of Vaudreuil, as well as honorary president of the Agricultural society of Soulanges. I know the good people that live along the Ottawa and St. Lawrence and I can assure the House that my county can boast the finest inhabitants that are to be found anywhere. As I say, I have made a study of conditions from door to door and I modestly claim to understand the requirements of the farmers in my constituency, which I have no doubt is pretty much like any other district in the Dominion. Now, as a result of my observations I think that what the farmer requires to-day above everything else is cheap money. He must borrow at a lower rate of interest than he has been paying if he is to succeed. We cannot expect him to pay 7 and 8 per cent and be able to carry on under those conditions. If he is to pay such rates of interest it will be impossible for him to buy the adjoining farm or a farm within a few acres of his own upon which to establish his son or sons. The great trouble has been that the farmer has had to pay altogether too much in the way of rate of interest. He cannot bear up under this load, nor will he be able to throw off the yoke unless we can help him to secure cheaper money. I claim, therefore, that the rural credits bill is the most important piece of legislation that has ever been submitted to this House and it calls for the most careful consideration.

On the order paper I asked the question whether the government will provide in the rural credits legislation that borrowers under the ten-year period shall pay not more than 5 per cent on their loans, and those borrowing for a longer period than ten years, not more than 4½ per cent. I certainly do not think that farmers who borrow from the Dominion should be asked to pay more than 4½ per cent. They cannot make both ends meet if they do. The government have not specified the rate of interest that will be charged, having left that question open; but when the matter comes up for consideration in due course I think that my labour friends and hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party, as well as hon. members on both sides, should ask the government and the Finance minister to see to it that those provinces which take advantage of the $10,000,000 loan shall charge the farmer no more than 4 or 4½ per cent for the money he borrows. Remember that the farmer with a family of eight, ten, fifteen of twenty children, such as we find in my county, pays these children nothing in the way of wages, and even then, notwithstanding the cry raised against the agriculturist about the prices he charges for his produce, he cannot make ends meet simply because of the extortionate rates of interest he must pay. In my opinion the solution would be for the government to borrow money at, say, 3 per cent. The banks to-day do not pay more than 1½ or 2 per cent on their deposits. I would ask my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) this question: Do the banks pay more than 1½ or 2 per cent? The hon. member will not answer. To my mind he is the best posted man in this House on banking and he knows that the banks do not pay more than 1½ or 2 per cent. And I will tell you why. The hon. gentleman is as foolish as a fox; he will not answer me. If you examine the statements of the banks you will find that two-thirds of the money on deposit is in the savings department at 3 per cent, while one-third is in current accounts bearing no interest. We may therefore discount that one-third, and that means that they pay 2 per cent. The banks do not pay you any interest if you deposit your money on the second or any other date during the month; you must deposit on the first, otherwise you lose your interest for the balance of the month. But when you borrow they charge interest from the moment you get the loan. It is not surprising, therefore, that the banks can put aside these wonderful reserves and pay their shareholders 10, 12, 13 and 14 per cent. No man knows better than I do that the banks now in Canada are as strong as the rock of Gibraltar; they are strong and powerful. I know it, and I am proud of it. But I say that it is immoral that they should declare dividends of 12, 13 and 14 per cent to their shareholders. Any man should be content to have his money safe in their vaults and draw 6, 7 or 8 per cent. That is why the farmers are paying so much for their money, and I defy any accountant or any banker to stand up in this House or elsewhere and contradict the statement I have just made.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) the other night stated that when there was a financial crisis in his county the manager of a small local branch had to write to the home office in Toronto or Montreal before he could make a small loan to a client to finance the shipping of grain or cattle. Why should these branch managers be restricted to that extent? It is simply because they are limited to a certain amount in each of these branch banks, whereas the large deposits held by the banks are sent to New York on what they term "call loans." In 1907 I happened to be in the city of Calgary when that terrible financial crisis took place, and out of sixteen or seventeen banks only one or two would lend to any of its customers. The managers had received telegrams from their home offices, either in Toronto or Montreal, to refuse advances to any person. I met a man in Calgary that day whom certain hon. members know, and one of the biggest merchants in the west, and I had to assist him in a small way because he could not get any money from his bank. I ask my friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan): Where was the money? It was in New York with the gamblers. Millions of Canadian dollars are sent down to the gamblers there, thus depriving our trade and industry of the money it requires.

I am not trying to make a speech to the gallery, I am just giving my impressions as a business man. I am talking of a subject which I understand, and I defy any banker to contradict me, although he may not like what I am saying. Why this timidity in the House of Commons about our banks? Why is the question of banking not broached by my friend across the way, the ex-Minister of Militia (Mr. Mewburn), one of our old loves? He understands what I am talking about. We are not attacking the banks. As I understand it, we are a big family representing the Canadian people. We are not attacking the banks, we are in a sense working as a close corporation in the interests of the people generally, and if we help the banks they should help us. I am giving the House to-night what to my mind is a solution of our banking problem. We must not allow the banks any more than we allow the railroads to go ahead without proper regulation, and without letting them know that we in this House understand the situation just as well as they do.

Mr. BAKER: Supposing after the war our banks had stopped discounting our paper, where would we be to-night?

Mr. WILSON (Vaudreuil): They did stop discounting with certain people—they were taking great precautions.

Mr. BAKER: Then give the banks credit for what they did.

Mr. WILSON (Vaudreuil): Many years ago a certain bank made me walk my room for months and months and refused to discount my paper although I showed a growing profit every year. Then I met a friend who asked me how much I owed the bank. I told him. At once he said, "You don't owe them enough."

Mr. BAKER: They gave the hon. gentleman credit—so would anybody in the House.

Mr. WILSON (Vaudreuil): I do not understand my hon. friend.

Mr. BAKER: They played fair with you.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WILSON (Vaudreuil): I am not worrying. My hon. friend can ask me any question he likes. I am talking on a very serious subject. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, my bank made me walk my room for months although my statement showed a growing increase. When I told one of my friends the situation I was in and that I would have to go into bankruptcy unless my paper was discounted as it usually was, but owing to the stringency of the money market my bank could not advance me any more money, having made large loans elsewhere in other quarters, he advised me, as I say, to get into my bank much deeper. This I did. Then I slept while the bank did the walking.

I know my friends opposite would be very much disappointed if I did not deal with one item of the budget—the income tax. I believe our friends across the way would have raised the roof with their applause if one of their number had been able to bring down the budget of our Minister of Finance. It is easily seen by everybody that the new income tax provision is intended to reach wealthy individuals—there is no doubt about that—wealthy individuals who have so far succeeded in evading the surtax and the super tax by incorporating themselves into joint stock companies and only paying the corporation tax of 10½ per cent. They will now have to pay from 30 to 50 per cent upon their dividends. The double taxation, that is, the corporation now pays upon its profits 9 per cent, and the dividend owner pays his tax—there is where the howl comes in. Let us see how it works out. To-day the corporation pays one-seventh less than under the old tax, consequently it can now pay 8 per cent to its shareholders instead of 7 per cent. These facts are absolutely uncontradictable. My friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) knows that the corporations are paying one-seventh less; consequently they can pay one per cent more to their shareholders and still come out the same as before. I admit the big man over $10,000 will pay more, and that is the man we are after. Unfortunately I happen to be one of the greatest victims of that law, I am glad to say. I do not think many men in this House will be affected as much as I will be affected by this attack which the Minister of Finance has introduced into this House, but I am willing to make the sacrifice for the state, and I hope my hon. friends opposite will do the same, remembering that those sacrifices are only temporary. We are only lending the money to the government and from what I can see, if we remain members of parliament we will get it back. When the election was announced they came and asked me to save the country; two Liberals were running, and they were afraid a Conservative would step in and win out. A deputation of about 5,000 people, including many Conservatives, asked me to run. I capitulated and here I am. They said, "Come along; the election won't cost you a cent."

I am reminded, Mr. Speaker, of two men in a county not far from my own who were selected as candidates, one for each party. They were neighbours, and one said to the other, "Baptiste, how much did you get from the party?" Baptiste said, "$3,000; how much did you get?" The first man said, "$3,000. We would be fools to spend this money; let's get into the same buggy and go round and shake hands with everybody and save our money." So they started out, and when they got to a certain part of the county they asked how it was going, and the answer was, "Oh, very doubtful, very dangerous; if you don't spend money you will both be beaten."

For the edification of my good friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) I would like to give one example which applies to all the figures which may be mentioned in regard to income tax. Surtax and supertax are paid, under the old law, only when above $5,000. If a corporation shows a dividend income of $10,000, under the old law the tax would amount to $115, leaving a net income of $9,885. According to the new tax the increased dividend amounts to $100, with a tax of $262, leaving a net income of $9,838, or a difference of about $46, so why should any howl be made?

The hon. member for West York stated in his brilliant speech that:

> If the average Canadian income from dividends of Canadian companies was $7,000, the government would receive $8,750,000 more than last year, and if the average was $10,000 the extra collections would be $12,500,000.

This is just what the Minister of Finance wants; this is just what the government wants, and what the people of Canada want; they want to reach the millionaire, and they are doing so. The hon. member forgot to say, however, that the dividend holders would now receive more from their corporations, and the government will receive less from the corporations. The excess revenue that he mentions will be sliced off the millionaire's melon, and I will have to contribute my slice. I am bound to admire the ex-Minister of Finance; he is a great artist and can paint a most dismal picture or a most brilliant picture, as circumstances demand. The dividend owner now pays exactly the same tax as the salaried or business man, although the dividend owner does not work for his money. The majority of investors are wage earners, professional and unincorporated business men, and this scheme affords great relief to the bulk of Canadian workers and small investors.

Now, gentlemen, I have here clippings from a hundred newspapers. I will not read them all, but there are one or two which I think are important.

> Mr. Robb's objective is obvious: he is directing his main attack against the larger private incomes and "unearned increment" derived from invested capital, and plans to afford some alleviation to the recipients of smaller salaries and wages. The theory of his plan is just and has the support of almost every class, including those adversely affected...
> "For some time past many wealthy individuals have successfully evaded the heavy assessments of surtaxes and supertaxes by the simple expedient of incorporating themselves and paying only the "corporation tax" of 10-1/2 per cent. The revenue from these private corporations probably ran far in excess of their living requirements, and the owner would draw down in dividends or salary only enough to cover his expenditure, and on this amount only would he pay tax, at the usual rate for individuals...

And so on.

"Those in receipt of salaries and wages which are declared to government by their employers have never had any possible means of evasion and have undoubtedly, proportionately, borne the brunt of income taxation in the past. They are now given a considerable measure of relief by the increase in the amount of statutory exemption and in the low scale of taxation governing lower amounts...

I have hundreds of extracts of that kind which I will not read. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been very courteous to me tonight, but in conclusion I wish to say something regarding concealed bonds and securities. I want to impress upon the Minister of Finance that there are concealed bonds, coupons and securities hidden away in strong boxes throughout this country, not paying their honest taxes to the government. I want to say on the floor of this House that I believe some people are concealing their securities, bonds and coupons payable to bearer, and thus cheating this country of its just dues. These men are despicable; they should not be called Canadians, and I claim that the Minister of Finance, who has it in his power, should start the machinery to break into these strong boxes, if necessary, and make the owners of these concealed bonds pay what is due the government. I am not exaggerating when I make that statement. By what means can he do it? It is rather difficult to know. It is almost as difficult as to find out in the customs probe who is doing the smuggling—difficult when you get all sorts of people coming forward who will swear but not bet. I claim that the Minister of Finance and the government, who are striving by every means to increase the revenue of this country, should see to it that the man who is hiding coupon bonds and trying to defraud the government and the common people of this country who are earning their living by the sweat of their brow should be brought before the criminal courts of this country. How are you going to reach them, Mr. Minister? Reach them, if necessary, by printing a proclamation in the newspapers of this country stating that in the case of any man who conceals bonds and does not report his income therefrom in the regular way, when he dies and a statement of his affairs has to be made to the government of the province in which he lives for succession duties, his whole estate will be confiscated. That man will then start thinking of his family and pay his honest debts. That is my advice, Mr. Minister, on that question, and I think in that way the treasury of this country would be the richer by several million dollars.

There is an hon. member of this House for whom I have a great admiration. I have not the pleasure of knowing him very intimately, but I have listened to all his speeches, and I consider that he is a very valuable man to the country, but like most great men he goes wrong sometimes. All great men have their weaknesses. I am now alluding to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). He stated in the House the other day:

I believe we are absolutely right in suggesting that after a certain exemption sufficiently large to enable a man's estate to provide for his immediate dependents, the rest of his estate ought to be very heavily taxed. Personally I would go a great deal further. I would say that it ought to be expropriated.

I do not know whether my hon. friend sent that out as a joker or not, but really it is a very serious thing. I have a high admiration for his ability; I am not trying to throw flowers by any means; that is not my style. Probably he is one of the most valuable men in this House, and we want men in this House like him and his colleague from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I once belonged to the international union of labour myself. But the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would confiscate the capital or estate of a dead man. If that were done, what incentive would there be for a man to increase his capital after he had accumulated sufficient to provide for his immediate dependents? After making a certain amount of money by his ability, by his intelligence, and taking advantage of his opportunities, what incentive would there be for him to continue if all his surplus capital were to be confiscated? It would take the ambition out of a man, and I would point out to my hon. friend that the big financial men of this world who have accumulated large fortunes have done considerable good for their fellowmen. Take Mr. Carnegie, for instance, who happened to make three or four hundred million dollars. He did not carry the gold away with him when he left this world for a better. He did one of the greatest things in the world with his money. He established libraries all through the United States and Canada in any place that required one, to help in educating the people. Take Mr. Rockefeller's son; I happen to know him and the good work he is doing for humanity. Mr. Duke, of the American Tobacco Company, only a short time ago gave between forty and fifty million dollars for hospital purposes. You gentlemen know what good the great kings of finance are doing with their capital, and remember many of these men came from the labour ranks. They are not men who have had a classical education. Carnegie, Henry Ford and all these men had only the ordinary commercial education. I really fail to see why the hon. member should propound such a theory in this country. To me it sounds too much like Moscow or Russia, if I may say so, to be introduced in the House of Commons of Canada.

I shall not detain the House for more than a few minutes longer. The other side of the House has been very kind to me. I can expect kindness from this side, because they are mostly old friends, but I appreciate the extreme courtesy and attention, numerical and otherwise, that has been accorded me. I have had some very great kindnesses extended to me since I came to this House on the 7th of January. I came here thinking I was a wonderful man, but I had not been here twenty-four hours before I found I was not in the picture. My friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) and a few other gentlemen were good enough to encourage me along by asking me to lunch, and I have now got sort of acclimatized. My friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) was also very kind to me, also my friend from East Hamilton Mr. Mewburn, and you, Sir, have also been very kind—and they have not touched me yet. I am going to tell you of the impression I had when I first entered this beautiful building. The first thing I saw when I came in by the Senate entrance was a big blackboard, with the word "Divorce." That was an awful thing to be staring one in the face. I got to the post office, and there I got a lot of printed matter from every department of the government, from the Minister of Agriculture, from the Minister of the Interior, from the Minister of Labour, and the Minister of Finance, informing me on international relations and how to kill moths in winter. I also received an envelope, with my address printed, advising me that there would be a caucus of the Liberal party at eleven o'clock. I thought that was wonderful. The attention given by the staff of the Sergeant at Arms of this House to hon. members is very satisfactory. You get stationery free, consisting of ink, pens, rubber, and pads of paper, maps, et cetera. I thought to myself when I came here first that I was in clover. I find they put me on several committees dealing with astronomy, botany and subjects of that kind, I have commenced to feel very important.

[Mr. L. A. Wilson.]

In conclusion I wish to say something about the railway question. I am sorry to disagree with my old friend of forty years standing (Mr. Maclean, York) on the railway question. My hon. friend wants a marriage of the railway systems of Canada. It is true there is a deficit on the Canadian National railway. The management show there is a surplus, but I do not believe there is any surplus at all. How can there be a surplus when all the members of this House get passes and travel free? I claim there has been a wonderful improvement on the Canadian National railways. There is no doubt about that. I travel on it every day and I have noticed the great improvement in the management of the line and in the deportment of the staff. I think Sir Henry Thornton is a wonderful railway man. He is working for love, I believe.

An hon. MEMBER: Fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. WILSON (Vaudreuil): I would ask my hon. friend to be discreet, and not give the price away. We have in Mr. Beatty a lovable man, trained under one of the greatest men who ever lived in this country and one of my oldest friends, Sir Thomas Shaughnessy. I pause to-night to pay a tribute to his memory. Under the tuition of Sir Thomas Shaughnessy Mr. Beatty learned the railway business and there are few better on this continent. Now, I believe in competition between these two systems. Allow them to be operated separately. If there is not competition between them you will not receive the attention or the satisfaction you are getting at the present time. This country is big enough to support two railway systems. Even though there should be a little deficit of twenty-five millions what does it amount to? The Canadian National Railways employ one hundred thousand people. One of the shops of the system is located in my own county and I know what an amount of good that railway is accomplishing. I know that the town of Coteau is dependent on the workshops of the Canadian National railway. If we consider that the one hundred thousand employees of the system have, on the average, families of three or four it means that half a million persons are dependent on the Canadian National railways for their bread and butter. Destroy that system, root it up, and it would cost you many millions more to support these people if you ever make an amalgamation with the Canadian Pacific. My advice is: Let Mr. Beatty and Sir Henry Thornton remain friendly enemies.

May I draw the attention of the House to the fact that in 1908 I sent a Christmas card to my friends, bearing the following poetic greeting:

Men should be judged not by their tint or skin,
The gods they serve, the vintage that they drink,
Nor by the way they fight or love or sin,
But by the quality of thought they think.

I happened to send one of those cards to a friend—the friend of both sides of this House—the then Prime Minister of Canada. The right hon. gentleman in question replied to me as follows:

Prime Minister's Office, Canada,
Ottawa, Dec. 26, 1908.

My dear Larry,

I received this morning your Christmas greeting and I will not lose one moment before sending you my thanks.

The ranks are getting thinner and thinner of the old friends who, in the early years of my career, urged me on, helped me and assisted me. You are one of them. To them and to you especially my heart goes with ever growing gratitude.

May the new year be to you a year of prosperity and happiness.

This is the wish of your old friend,

WILFRID LAURIER.

This shows the sentiment and the heart of a man we all respected and revered. Let us follow his example and harmony will reign forever in our beloved Canada.

Mr. H. C. McKILLOP (West Elgin): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I wish to congratulate the last speaker on the very entertaining and humorous address with which he has entertained the House.

I realize that the hour is getting late and for that reason I shall curtail my remarks; I promise not to detain the House for any length of time. There are, however, one or two problems to which I wish to draw the attention of the government and more especially of the Finance minister (Mr. Robb). The budget as brought down has dealt with only one industry in Canada. But there are a great many other industries that are hoping against hope that the government will provide a little more protection for their needs. I am afraid they are going to be disappointed, nevertheless I hope that before the budget is finally disposed of the Minister of Finance will give due consideration to the industries whose situation I am going to bring to his attention, and will see that they are given a little more protection.

There is a class of citizen of our country who want and need protection very badly. I refer to the truck farmer or the market gardener, of whom there are a great many throughout Canada. Now these farmers, owing to our geographical situation, are labouring under a heavy handicap, as the southern states produce each year so much earlier and flood our markets with their produce for which they obtain the highest prices; then when our farmers' produce is ready for market they frequently find the market filled up, or at least filled to such an extent that they have to take a very low price for what they have to sell and in a good many instances take a good part of their load back home with them. This, Mr. Speaker, is not as it should be. These farmers are up early and work late to produce these goods and it is certainly not very encouraging to see the cream of this business going to the producers in the south.

For instance last year the following fruits and vegetables were imported:

	Quantity	Value
Apples	150,840 bbls.	$ 800,059
Blackberries, Gooseberries, Raspberries	38,360 lbs.	6,227
Peaches	14,898,566 lbs.	643,001
Pears	20,905,150 lbs.	926,398
Plums	190,756 bus.	495,035
Strawberries	3,168,975 lbs.	607,345
Cabbage	to the value of	221,134
Onions	to the value of	423,546
Potatoes	26,129,680 lbs.	481,933
Tomatoes	329,781 lbs.	1,110,587
Making a total of		$5,715,265

This amount, Mr. Speaker, has gone to enrich the coffers of some other nation, and I am satisfied that if more protection were put on the various articles I have mentioned it would not be long before all the fruit and vegetables needed would be produced in this country and the money kept circulating at home, to the benefit of both producers and consumers alike.

For the last four years I have at every session raised my voice in protest against the low duty on beans coming into this country to the detriment of our own bean producers. For the benefit of those members who came for the first time to this House after the last election, I would just say that the duty on beans coming into this country is now and has been for a good many years just twenty-five cents per bushel, while on beans going into the United States the duty is $1.05 per bushel. In other words, if a bean dealer in the United States wants to send a bushel of beans, or for that matter a carload, into this country he has to pay 25 cents per bushel duty, while on the other hand if a dealer of this country wants to send beans into the republic to the south of us, he has to pay $1.05 per bushel. Now just to show how this is worked out to the detriment of the bean producer of this country, I want to go back to the years from 1891 to 1901. For that period of ten years the average annual amount of beans produced in this country was 875,000 bushels, but in the year 1901 there were imported into this country 11,000 bushel of beans. From that time on the production of beans in this country steadily grew smaller while the importations increased by leaps and bounds, until we find that in the year 1920 there were produced in this country only 388,000 bushels of beans, while in the same year 444,000 bushels were imported. In other words, for the year 1920 there were 56,000 bushels more imported than there were produced in Canada. I think that all hon. members will agree with me that that is a big change in this one industry in twenty years, all owing to the low duty of 25 cents per bushel on beans coming into our country. And further importations were as follows for the five years from 1921 to 1925:

Year	Bushels	Value
1921..	203,725	$637,632
1922..	148,157	376,792
1923..	329,974	777,214
1924..	298,647	754,090
1925..	150,524	350,369
Total..	1,131,027	2,746,097

In other words, nearly $3,000,000 has gone from Canada to enrich the producers of this commodity in some other country, while here at home many of our producers are still holding their last year's stock. For the months of January and February, and March of this year beans to the extent of 68,167 bushels, valued at $146,907 have come in under this low duty.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this is fair or equitable to the bean producers of this country, and I sincerely hope that this duty on beans will be raised as high as the duty imposed by the nation to the south of us on the same product. I want to say that as long as I am a member of this House I will continue to fight for an increase of this duty, because in doing so I contend that I am only trying to get justice for our bean producers.

There are a great many industries in this country that need more protection than they have at present, such as our woollen mills, our knitting plants, our coal fields, our pulp wood industry, and many others I could mention. It is my humble opinion that if, instead of spending so much money trying to get immigrants into this country, the government would increase protection all round and get the wheels of industry turning, there would be no need to spend money trying to get people to come here; because as soon as it is known abroad that there is plenty of work in Canada, people will flock here by the thousands and in this way our great Dominion will be built up and will soon become one of the greatest nations in the world.

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): I would not trespass on the valuable time of the House at this late hour, and indeed it had not been my intention until a very short time ago to say anything at all, but for the fact that after listening to the splendid address of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Hatfield) last night, and having read some of it to-day in Hansard, I thought I would reply, however briefly, to some of the criticisms he levelled at some of the Maritime representatives in this parliament on the grounds upon which they conducted their campaign and upon which they were elected. As the hour is so late I will not discuss the point at any length, but I should like to quote just a sentence of what the hon. member had to say. For instance:

> If my hon. friend will permit me to say so, this government has done the only thing done by any government to help Nova Scotia.

He went on to point out that the government had appointed a royal commission to investigate Maritime rights. Now the reason why there are so many representatives from the Maritime provinces on this side of the House is the fact that nothing has been done either by this or any previous government to assist either Nova Scotia or the other Maritime provinces. I make this statement in no partisan spirit, for the fact is that every parliament, Liberal and Conservative alike, has ignored the rights of the Maritime provinces. We feel that we have not received justice at the hands of confederation. On a former occasion on which I addressed the House I referred at some length to this question, and indicated why we Maritime righters, as we have been called, were elected. We were elected to press the claims which Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island justly have against the Dominion and which have been consistently ignored.

Just a word or two now with regard to the budget. I do not feel justified in supporting the budget. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), in presenting his statement, referred to it as a poor man's budget. I may be lacking in intelligence but I must confess that I cannot see in what respect this budget will be of any advantage to the poor man. Take for instance the reduction in automobile duties. Will that affect the poor man in any way? And when I speak of the poor man I am referring to wage earners whose income seldom exceeds $2,000. Are they interested in the purchase of automobiles? Take again the increased exemptions in income tax: is that a matter of interest to the poor man? And the reduction in postage: to what extent does that affect the poor man's purse? The average workingman writes two letters a week. That is a matter of $1 spread over a period of twelve months.

I do not know that there is anything else the government can boast about, apart from the slight reduction of 2½ per cent in the sales tax on canned fish. This will mean very little to the average wage earner. Had the Minister of Finance been sincere the first thing he would have done would have been to eliminate altogether the 5 per cent sales tax which this government imposed upon the people; for that would have been of direct advantage to every man, woman and child in Canada. I leave that suggestion for his consideration.

Just before the budget was brought down I happened to read an editorial from the Labour Gazette from which I took the following quotation:

> The tariff changes will lead to restriction of opportunities of employment without providing any commensurate benefit to the wage earner generally.

There is the opinion of the Labour Gazette. Further on, referring to the tariff board—and I call this particularly to the attention of the Labour representatives—the Gazette has this to say:

> In the creation of the tariff board organized labour has been given no consideration, for there is no group in Canada whose interests are more vitally affected by the tariff reductions.

I am not going to say more, but I want to read to the House something which were it possible under the rules to do so, I would move by way of amendment to the budget. I know it is not in order to propose a second amendment, but if I could submit one it would be to the following effect:

> That conditions in the Maritime provinces, especially with regard to employment and markets for basic products, such as coal and steel are at this very time alarming.
> That as a consequence people are leaving for other lands in numbers unnaturally large.
> That remedial measures have been already too long delayed.
> That such conditions are due in no small degree to tariff reductions made in recent years, especially in respect of steel, which discriminate against the Maritime provinces.
> And the House regrets that the budget of the minister of Finance contains not the slightest promise of relief.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough): In the space of just two minutes I want to say what in my opinion the policy of this government means to this Dominion. To my mind it is a tragedy that in this day and generation we should find in Canada a government, which is supposed to comprise the brightest minds in the country, utterly unable so to deal with our fiscal problem as to inspire the ordinary wage earners with confidence not only in themselves but in the country. Our people are leaving Canada for foreign shores to seek the employment which they are unable to find at home. It is most unfortunate that representatives of the Canadian government and representatives of our leading manufacturing industries, particularly of Ontario, including the producers of motor cars, should not find it possible to come together and decide upon a policy in the interests of the country.

I might mention again what I dealt with in some detail in the debate on the Address. The longer the Liberal party stays in power the more are we getting out of balance with regard to the number of our people engaged in the production of raw material as compared with those employed in the production of manufactured goods. Whereas in the United States every year more and more men are engaged in the various processes of manufacturing and a diminishing number are employed on rough labour, in this country the conditions are reversed. What is the reason? The United States consistently adheres to a protective policy, while under this government Canada is handicapped by an unstable tariff policy.

And the government has gone a step further. Under this budget the imposition of double income tax will discourage the investment of money in Canadian industries. This is another example of how the industrial life of the Dominion is being crippled by the ineptitude of this government.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Manion) which was negatived on the following division:

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1907, AMENDMENT

The House in committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Duff in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I will read the resolution:

1. Resolved, That the Customs Tariff, 1907, be amended by repealing subsection 1 of section 3 and substituting therefor the following—

Mr. ROBB: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With the unanimous consent of the House I would like to move that the name of Mr. Cannon be substituted for that of Mr. Goodison on the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent the House reverts to motions.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 4.34 a.m. (Wednesday).

Wednesday, May 19, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 113, respecting the Bronson Company.—Mr. McClenaghan.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MONTREAL AND QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

Mr. BELL (St. John and Albert):

Who are the officials connected with the harbour boards of Montreal and Quebec other than members of the harbour boards commissions, and what are their salaries?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

The names of the principal officials of the harbour boards of Montreal and Quebec, are as follows:

[Mr. Howden.]

Montreal Harbour Commission:

Thos. W. Harvie, general manager; Thos. F. Trihey, secretary; George E. Smart, comptroller; M. P. Fennell, Jr., director of trade and transportation; Paul Leclaire, chief engineer; F. W. Cowie, consulting engineer; Capt. J. F. Symons, harbour master; John Vaughan, Supt. of railway terminals; M. Peterson, Sup. of grain elevators.

Quebec Harbour Commission:

Charles Smith, K. C., secretary treasurer and legal adviser; Brig. Gen. T. L. Tremblay, chief engineer and general manager; Ernest H. S. Woodside, comptroller and chief accountant; Capt. A. Landry, harbour master; Louis Fortin, traffic manager; H. Peterson, grain elevator superintendent.

The government does not consider that it is in the public interest to require the harbour commissioners to furnish details of the salaries which they pay to these officials of their organization. The commissioners have power under their Act of Incorporation to appoint their own officials and to fix their salaries, and there is nothing in that act which requires the submission of proposed salaries to the government.

COST OF COLLECTION OF TAXES

Mr. DOUCET:

What was the cost of the collection: (a) of the income tax, (b) excise tax, (c) customs duties up to the end of March, for the years 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925 and 1926, respectively?

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN:

It is not possible to state separately the amounts paid for the collection of taxes as distinguished from amounts paid for other customs excise services such as prevention of smuggling and illicit distillation of spirits, registration of vessels, administration of laws and regulations affecting imports and exports, etc. The total cost of collecting the income war tax and the business profits tax for the said years, was as follows:—

1920-21	$1,953,988 54
1921-22	2,277,349 78
1922-23	2,040,461 08
1923-24	1,935,242 19
1924-25	1,693,025 23
1925-26	1,724,159 39

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. What is the total number of civil servants who were eligible to voluntarily elect to come under the provisions of the Superannuation Act of 1924 at the time of the passing of the act?

2. What is the total number of those thus eligible who have up to the present date declared their intention to come under the scope of the said act?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. A return presented to the House last session indicated that the number thought to be eligible was in the neighbourhood of 25,000.

2. 12,224.

JUVENILE COURTS IN CANADA

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. How many juvenile courts are there in Canada?

2. By whom may judges of juvenile courts be appointed?

3. By whom are juvenile court judges paid?

4. What are the names of the judges of juvenile courts in Canada who have received their appointment by order of the Governor in Council?

5. In what provinces is the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1908, in effect throughout the entire area of such provinces?

6. In what provinces does the jurisdiction of the juvenile courts cover children up to eighteen years of age?

7. How many juvenile court judges are there, (a) in the province of Manitoba, (b) in the province of Saskatchewan, (c) in the province of Alberta, and (d) in the province of British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The act has been proclaimed to be in force throughout four provinces, six counties, one district, twelve cities, four towns. The exact number of courts in operation is not known.

2. Where the act has been put into force in any city, town or other portion of a province under section 35, the Governor in Council may designate a superior court or county court judge or a justice having jurisdiction in the city, town or other portion of a province in which the act is so put in force to act as juvenile court judge for such city, town or other portion of a province. Where the legislature of any province has passed an act for the establishment of juvenile courts or for designating any existing courts as juvenile courts, and the Dominion act has been put into force in such province or part thereof under the provisions of section 34, the juvenile court judges may be appointed or designated in the manner provided by the provincial act.

3. The remuneration of these judges must be provided for locally without recourse to the federal authorities.

4. The following judges have been designated by the Governor in Council:—Hon. T. M. Daly, Winnipeg; G. O'Keefe, Ottawa; A. E. Bull, Vancouver; John A. Macdonald, Charlottetown; Judge Wallace, Halifax; J. E. Starr, Toronto; J. J. Coughlin, Stratford; S. Atkinson, Haileybury; A. Weir, Berlin; Judge Patterson, New Glasgow; Judge Hardy, Brantford; Robert Hawkins, Dauphin; Dr. J. Hunt, Halifax; D. W. McKerchar, Winnipeg; J. R. Blake, Galt; D. B. Harkness, Winnipeg; G. F. Jelfs, Hamilton; Judge McQuarrie, Summerside; E. H. Blois, Halifax.

5. Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Manitoba.

6. British Columbia and Manitoba.

7. This information is not in the Department of Justice.

A. F. MITCHELL—ALLEGED DEFRAUDING OF IMMIGRANTS

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings):

1. Is the government aware that an immigration agent named Andrew Fraser Mitchell, appointed to represent Prince Edward Island in Great Britain in the year 1923, whose remuneration was paid by the federal government, has defrauded certain immigrants or intending immigrants of amounts of money aggregating as far as known to about $17,000?

2. Have representations been made to the present government asking for reimbursement for parties so defrauded?

3. Did the legislature of Prince Edward Island pass and forward to the government an address praying for redress in this matter?

4. What action, if any, was taken by the government regarding such representations or address?

5. If such prayers have been refused or declined, upon what grounds?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. The government is aware that one Andrew Fraser Mitchell was appointed by the government of Prince Edward Island to represent it in Great Britain in 1923. No salary was paid by the Dominion government but it agreed with the provincial government to contribute $150 per month on account of expenses for a period of four months.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4. (a) Representations were considered but no action taken; (b) Answered by No. 3.

5. The federal government refuses to assume any responsibility for the actions of Mitchell who, as stated, was an appointee of the government of Prince Edward Island.

PRE-EMPTIONS AND PURCHASED HOMESTEADS

Mr. COOTE:

1. What was the approximate area of land disposed of in the province of Alberta under the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act, 1908, up to March 31, 1926, as, (a) pre-emptions, (b) purchased homesteads?

2. What was the approximate gross revenue received from the sale of, (a) pre-emptions, (b) purchased homesteads?

3. What is the approximate amount of arrears owing on the sale of, (a) pre-emptions, (b) purchased homesteads?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. (a) 1,991,840 acres, approximately; (b) 307,040 acres, approximately.

2. (a) $5,432,681.98; (b) $1,027,431.63.

3. (a) Principal $1,439,821.55, approximately; Interest $752,760.16, approximately. (b) Principal $54,166.04, approximately; Interest $25,-833.75, approximately.

DISMISSAL POSTMASTER AT PETIT ROCHER, N.B.

Mr. DOUCET:

1. Was Mr. Sydney DesBrisay dismissed from the position of postmaster at Petit Rocher, Gloucester county, New Brunswick?
2. If so, why was he so dismissed?
3. Were complaints made to the department?
4. Who made such complaints?
5. Was an investigation held, and if so, when?
6. Who was the investigator for the department?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Dismissal authorized, not effected yet.
2. Political partisanship.
3. Yes.
4. Member for the constituency.
5. Yes, 5th March, 1926.
6. C. T. Richard, barrister, Bathurst.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INDIAN AGENT AT CARDSTON

Mr. DAVIS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the department and any persons whomsoever, with regard to the suspension of Indian Agent Faunt of the Blood Indian reserve at Cardston. Also a copy of the report sent to the department by Inspector Christensen of Regina in this connection.

Hon. Mr. STEWART: I ask that this motion stand.

Motion stands.

PURCHASES OF LAND BY SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD

Mr. BROWN:

For a copy of the report made by Major Barnet to the government in connection with the purchases of land by the Soldier Settlement Board.

LONG TERM FARM LOANS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That there shall be a board known as the Canadian Farm Loan Board which shall be a body politic and corporate consisting of four members, one of whom shall be the Minister of Finance and the other three shall be appointed by the Governor in Council and of the latter one shall be designated by the Canadian Farm Loan Commissioners.

That the board shall issue farm loan bonds to make long term loans to farmers, and the government of Canada shall provide initial capital for the board to an amount not exceeding five million dollars and subscribe an amount of 5 per cent of the capital stock as loans are made by the board.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

The government of each province in which loans are made shall be required to subscribe to the capital stock of the board as loans are made in such province an amount equal to 5 per cent of the said loans and each borrower an amount of 5 per cent of his loan payable at the time the loan is made. The loans shall be made on the security of first mortgage on farm lands; the interest rate shall be such a rate in excess of the interest payable on the farm loan bonds as is sufficient to provide for the expenses of operation; the farm loan bonds shall be legal investments and may be purchased by the Minister of Finance provided that the amount of such bonds held by him shall not at any time exceed $15,000,000; and the amount of any payment by the government of Canada on account of capital of the board or as payment for farm loan bonds purchased shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund on the authority of the Governor in Council.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved:

That rule 10 of the House of Commons relating to the appointment of the select standing committees of the House be amended by adding to the select standing committees of the House for the present session a select standing committee on Railways and Shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government, to which will be referred the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Merchant Marine for the present session, for consideration and for report to the House. provided, however, that nothing in this resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of Supply; and that the said committee consist of Messrs. Bell (St. Antoine), Boys, Campbell, Fiset, Clark, Drayton, Dunning, Euler, Harris, Heaps, Jelliff, Jones, Johnston, Power, Robichaud.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I oppose the motion. I do not think it is in the public interest that this committee should usurp the rights of parliament. The committee should not be appointed. The National railway is a public utility which should be operated from the commercial aspect and the country has elected 245 members of parliament as directors to see it is run properly.

We appointed a committee last year to go into the estimates of this particular railway and its operations from the commercial standpoint. The same special committee was appointed two or three years ago and what did it do? It met once in a while. The members of the House could not get any information about the operation of the road unless they were on the committee. Then a report was presented in the dying hours of the session. Last year the matter was taken up at a quarter past one in the morning of the day the House prorogued. This railway does not pay interest on the debt due the country; $42,000,000 interest is entered as a bookkeeping item. It is a frozen asset. When we ask questions about the operation of the railway and its finances we are told that it is not in the public interest to divulge information. The Canadian Pacific Railway can get it though. We know the salary of the Governor General and the salary of Sir Henry Thornton and the cabinet, but when we ask for the salaries of some of the American imported officials they say the question is out of order. I think the Canadian National Railways should be operated according to business principles free of politics and should be put on a paying basis. From the president down the men on the Canadian Pacific are Canadians, but the National Railways are importing men from the United States and you do not know who they are, what their contracts are or what expenses they incur.

Let us take another case of public ownership, the Hydro-Electric Power Commission, with an investment of $262,000,000. Every year Sir Adam Beck, the late minister, had to meet the House and explain his estimates and he laid all the cards on the table. The Minister of Railway and Canals has had his functions taken away from him and the portfolio might as well be abolished. The railway commission has taken away part of the functions of the Minister of Railways in regard to rates and Sir Henry Thornton has taken away his other functions so that the portfolio itself as I say, might as well be done away with. The other day we asked for an agreement regarding the operation of the National Railways and the giving away of a public franchise of the Grand Trunk Railway on the streets of Detroit including Woodward avenue. Where is that agreement? Will the minister bring it down as he promised? No. On the other hand, Governor Groesbeck called the Michigan legislature on the Fourth of February last and it held a special session to consider that agreement before it was signed, sealed and delivered. Yet we have never seen it and will not until parliament prorogues and the agreement is signed over our heads.

Is this a free parliament or not? Are we conducting business in the way in which it is done in the mother parliament to-day? Does the National Railways belong to the president or to the people of Canada? Is parliament not entitled to this information? We are 245 representatives of the people of Canada; we are trustees of the people; we are asked on the hustings about the Canadian National Railways and no one can answer. Is there unnecessary duplication and waste? Are branch lines being built that are not necessary? Does politics enter into the administration of this railway? I do not believe this committee should be appointed. It is not in the public interest that five or six or ten members of parliament should be selected to take our functions away and to deprive us of our right to consider the estimates of this railway. I am interested in the operation and administration of the National Railways and the true and real success of public ownership in this country, and I do not propose as a member of parliament to sit in this House and see a committee of five or six or ten men who may be appointed, who may or may not be in favour of public ownership, take my rights and privileges away from me. The minister, like every other minister, should bring down and explain his estimates to parliament and all the money expended should be in the public accounts. Why should these things be hidden away so that we cannot find out the salaries of these officials or the details of operation and capital account? We know the salary of the Governor General and what is spent on Rideau Hall. The Hon. the Speaker who is the most important public servant we have in this country, who presides over this House, gives us the details of the expenditure for the maintenance of the services of this House.

Surely it is not in the public interest that parliament should have no control over the most important responsibility we have—the National Railways—on which two billion dollars of the taxpayers' money has been spent. What will happen after this committee makes its report? We shall have to sit here and practically take it as read. The minister's estimates are reached at half past one in the morning; only two or three members discuss them; we ask for information and we cannot get it because the minister says: We will ask the head of the railways, and he will say: It is not in the public interest. Is it Sir Henry Thornton or this parliament that has the final say as to whether such a matter is in the public interest or not? Is he superior to parliament which appointed him and gave him such great powers? We see instances that indicate that this road is not being administered in a commercial and businesslike way; day after day hon. members ask for information and the minister says: It is not in the public interest to furnish it. It is in the public interest of the Ontario legislature to give information in connection with the Hydro-Electric and in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway to give full information regarding its affairs to its board of directors. You are the board of directors, the trustees of the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific in connection with two billion dollars of the taxpayers' money which has been expended on this railway and the conduct of the enterprise. It is not in the public interest that this information should be withheld, and if a vote is taken I intend to register my vote and protest against the lack of responsible government which we have in this parliament to-day.

Is it responsible government that public property amounting to two billion dollars, which is not in my opinion being administered in a commercial, businesslike way, should be taken out of the control of parliament and handed over to a committee which will make a report, whitewash everything, in the dying days of the session when a formal vote will be moved in the House involving millions of dollars, perhaps at the end of a last and an all-night session? If that is the way in which the Canadian National Railways are administered, the sooner we have the end of public ownership, the better. It is not in the public interest that we should hand over our responsibility to a committee. The issue is clear: A vote for this committee to-day is a vote for inefficiency in the administration of this system. It is a vote against public ownership; it is a vote against the trust we have as representatives of the people of Canada, and for that reason I wish to vote against the appointment of this committee as not being in the best interests of the National Railways, of the Canadian merchant marine, of public ownership or of efficiency and economy in our publicly owned railway system.

Mr. A. de WITT FOSTER (Hants-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of supporting all that has been said by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church); but even if only part of what he says is true, there is much in the contention that he has laid before the House. During this session I have tried to get some information with regard to the Canadian National Railways and I am under somewhat of a disadvantage, not knowing what rules have been mutually agreed upon or enforced in this House or in the committee for the past ten years. I desire to have this information because I think it is vital in the interest of the country, but so far I have been unable to get it. We were told by the minister that when this committee was formed we would be in a position to come before it, ask questions and get information. If, however, what my hon. friend says is true, unless I am on that committee—and I am not—I shall not be able to appear before the committee, ask the questions I desire to ask and be sure of getting replies. I can appreciate coming before the committee and being peremptorily told with a wave of the hand: It is not in the public interest to furnish that information.

Is it in the public interest that the people of this country should know whether three or four men from the city of New York who may have been connected with a firm there that went into liquidation, should be given positions in Canada at salaries which, it is reported in the streets, are anywhere from $30,000 to $50,000 a year, when we know there are in this country to-day men who could be appointed to those jobs at one-half the salaries and who would do just as good work? These matters are in the public interest regardless of whether the management of the National Railways or the government of the day says that it is not in the public interest. I should like to know whether they are paying men three times what they are worth in order to perform jobs which could be very well performed by men raised in this country. If members are to be deprived of the opportunity of securing information in the committee and if when these matters come befroe the House in the last days of the session, and at one o'clock in the morning when everyone is weary, we have perhaps half an hour in which to delve into them—and we are speaking about limiting speeches to thirty or forty minutes—

4 p.m.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER: Let hon. members limit their own speeches, As regards these particular estimates, if hon. members feel they are not sent here in the interest of the people to discharge their public duties and to take such time as is necessary to do that, they ought not to be here. If, as I say, in the last days of the session we are not permitted to deal properly with these matters, certain considerations ought to enter into the formation of this committee so as to enable hon. members to get the information they require by coming before that committee whether they be designated by the Prime Minister as members of the committee or not.

Mr. H. E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec-Montmorency): I should like to ask the minister to give to the House some more information as to the work of this committee. For my part I should like to know what is the object of its formation. Why should not the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian merchant marine come before the House in the ordinary way?

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, as chairman for the last two sessions of the committee on National Railways and Shipping, I should like to make a reply to my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church). I have nothing to say particularly with regard to the willingness of the government to answer certain questions respecting the National Railways; that must be within their judgment. I think they are perfectly right in certain instances to refuse information which might be detrimental to the interests of the National Railways. I can recall very well under the former government that information of a similar character was refused, and I thought the government was right at that time.

Mr. MANION: There were many protests against the refusal, though.

Mr. EULER: I know, and I did not agree with those protests altogether. In reply to the statement by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest that the committee does not permit any member to ask questions of those managing the railway, I desire to contradict it flatly. So far as I remember—I am open to correction—no member of the committee was ever refused information by the officials, from Sir Henry Thornton down.

Mr. MANION: He said members who were not members of the committee.

Mr. EULER: I will go further. The meetings of that committee were always open to the members of this House, and there have been instances where members who were not members of the committee itself asked permission of the committee to address certain remarks and questions to those who were present on behalf of the National Railways, and in no case were they refused. I do not think there is any danger whatever, if the committee is reconstituted, that such permission will be refused. In addition to that, all the evidence brought before the committee was printed by permission of the House and was spread upon the records for the information of every member. Something has been said about the Canadian Pacific Railway issuing an illuminating report every year for the information of its shareholders. The National Railways issue a similar financial statement each year, and I think it is fully as illuminating as that issued by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Pacific management do not spread all the affairs of their railway before the public for their competitors to take advantage of, and I do not think any member of this House who has the real interests of public ownership at heart should ask the management of the National Railways to do something in that particular which the Canadian Pacific management would not do.

Hon. S. C. MEWBURN (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I rather concur in this resolution. It seems to me it is quite proper that these estimates should go before a special committee of the House, particularly as the resolution contains this proviso:

> That nothing in this resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of Supply.

I should like to see the government go a step further and refer all the estimates to a special committee of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEWBURN: I believe, Sir, that a great saving of the time of the House could be accomplished in that way. Departmental officers when their estimates were up could be called before that special committee. To me it has always been absurd when a minister of the crown was being asked all sorts of questions, some pertinent, others not, on matters affecting his department—which in many cases he could not be expected to know—to see his deputy, who naturally is familiar with the affairs of his department, compelled to whisper the information to his minister, who repeated it to the House, his deputy not being allowed to give the information direct. I believe in many departments of the government we would get more information and save a great deal of the time of the House if the estimates were dealt with by a special committee.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be permitted to add a word. I had no intention of starting a debate in moving this resolution. I had been informed by members on both sides of the House that the special committee appointed in the past few years to deal with government railway matters had been satisfactory and had been the means of placing much valuable information before the House and the country. The resolution as it stands on the order paper is in exactly the same form as the resolution which was adopted on former occasions. May I point out, Sir, that so far from restricting the members of this House, the resolution provides in addition to the ordinary machinery a special committee for the purpose of going into the complex details of National railway financing. It in no way reduces the opportunities of members to secure information; on the contrary, it rather widens them. In this connection I should like to call attention to the proviso referred to by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn):

> Provided, however, that nothing in this resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of Supply.

The whole machinery of the House still remains, but in addition to that machinery a small committee of men, selected by agreement between the party whips, is given the special task of going into the very complex matters connected with the administration of our National railway system and the Canadian merchant marine. Surely it is apparent to business men that a small body dealing with these very complex matters can do so more effectively than the whole House.

The matter of refusal of information I endeavoured to deal with yesterday. I admit its difficulty, as every previous Minister of Railways has admitted it. I might perhaps by way of illustration call attention to a question which is now on the order paper referring to the National railways, if it is in order for me to do so, Sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the third paragraph of the question:

> Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to purchase St. Paul's church property and a number of other properties in the vicinity for terminals?

Let us assume, Mr. Speaker, a question of that sort being answered in advance of the deal for the property being consummated, does any member think for a moment that the publication of such information would not be prejudicial to the interests of the railway, supposing such a deal was intended? It is manifest on the face of it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What question was that?

Mr. DUNNING: Paragraph 3 of question 16. I use it merely as an illustration. There may be parts of the question which are quite proper. From what I have heard from members on both sides of the House regarding the proceedings of this committee in former sessions, I understand that it operates in exactly the same manner as any other committee of the House. While, strictly speaking, hon. gentlemen who are not members of the committee have not the right to ask questions, they can and do, as in the case of all other committees, submit their questions to the parties who are being examined through the medium of a colleague who is a member of the committee.

I moved the resolution, Sir, merely because I am informed that it has been found in the past a satisfactory method of dealing with the affairs of the National Railways and merchant marine. I repeat, the resolution in no way restricts the liberties of hon. members or the ordinary procedure, but rather adds to the machinery of the House and makes it more efficient in dealing with this very important matter.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the Minister that representation on the proposed committee is to consist of six members from this section and nine from the other sections of the House. Why is not representation given to this party according to its parliamentary strength? I might also point out that the present representation is on the basis of eighty-one members from this side of the House.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like to ask a question of the minister. I understood him to say that he would not give the information regarding the purchase of the electric railway in Montreal because it was not in the public interest, but I may say the price appeared in the Montreal newspapers shortly after the transaction.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. DUNNING: In answer to the question of my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) I can only say that the matter was arranged after consultation between the whips. I had nothing personally to do with it.

Mr. CLARK: I would suggest that it is quite simple to amend the resolution. Surely it is obvious that several members on this side are desirous of appearing before that committee, and if proper representation were given us certain additional members would have an opportunity of putting their questions before that committee.

Mr. T. G. MURPHY (Neepawa): I do not know whether I am in order, but I would like to suggest that if the committee is augmented the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) be added to it.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): May I ask the Minister of Railways if he would be good enough to tell me, having doubtless considered the matter thoroughly, in what way he thinks the passing of estimates will be furthered by this procedure? As I understand it the House is to have full opportunity, as it has at present in regard to other estimates, of discussing each item, and I should be very much obliged if the minister would tell me the functions of this committee in regard to making reports, for example, and in sifting the evidence. Are they to be given some facilities which this House does not enjoy? Otherwise I cannot at the moment see any advantage in having the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I must apologize to my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) in that I omitted to answer his question; it passed from my mind for the moment. Will he repeat it?

Mr. CHURCH: Will the minister give a list of passes issued by this railway to the special committee, contrary to the Railway Act?

Mr. DUNNING: I think that would be a proper question for this committee to go into. If passes are being issued contrary to the Railway Act I would like to know it, and it would be stopped. But that is not the question my hon. friend asked me before.

Then I am asked as to the functions of the committee and the value to the House of the committee proceedings. That committee can do what this House in committee cannot do, that is, summon before it the railway officials and direct to them all sorts of questions respecting the operation of the people's railway. More than that, many questions which would arise in committee of the Whole if there were no special committee are cleared up in the proceedings of that special committee, without taking up the time of this House. Very much more time is taken up in a body of 245 men, of course, than is taken up by a smaller committee inquiring into the same question. That, I understand, is the facility provided as a result of previous experience. I believe it has generally been regarded as of value to the House to add this committee to the existing machinery of the House, without in any way limiting the right of members in committee of Supply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I have had the opportunity of serving on this committee since it was started. It functions well in some directions, and in other directions not so well. We get a lot of useful information but we do not get it all; it may be that we ought not to get it all. The former chairman of that committee is wrong when he says that no information is withheld in committee; if he considers the matter I think he will agree that his memory is a little faulty there. In connection with questions of salary, I think my hon. friend will at once agree that information was not forthcoming.

Mr. EULER: I think my hon. friend will admit that the information was given him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But what is the use, Mr. Speaker, of a member being given information in confidence? As a matter of fact I did not get it; I did not want it in that way. I wanted to know what the facts were in connection with the general business organization of the company, and in connection with matters of that kind the shareholders and directors of that company—because we are really the directors, and the Canadian people the shareholders—are entitled to know what is being done with their money. I still take that position.

Mr. EULER: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he state here definitely that information he asked for was absolutely refused him by the officials of the railway?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes; there is this salary question, as I say. But, Mr. Speaker, there are more things of importance in connection with this resolution than this. We do get some information which is certainly of great value; we get the opportunity of an extended investigation which could not be made in the House, and this is also of use. It could be made, as I say, a little more full without harm. I do think it would be a good thing if we could have some clear idea as to what we can and cannot do; as to when Sir Henry Thornton can tell the committee he is not going to say this or that. I think we should know that, because we do not know it now. In our informal discussions in the committee I do not think there is much between myself and the chairman; I think we both agree fairly well.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Will my hon. friend permit an interruption before going to another point? I am simply making the suggestion that in any committee, if at any time the committee finds it has not sufficient power, all that is necessary is for it to come back to the House and get further powers. Should not the same rule apply here?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not a question of the power of the committee, but rather one of whether information will not be given which is a matter of governmental discretion, or whether the government shall take the ipse dixit of the officials of the system, because that is what it amounts to. I was going to say that I do not think there is very much difference between us, when we are honest with each other, as to what should be done. The former administration took a course which, although strongly objected to at the time and attacked many times by hon. gentlemen opposite, was consistent. That position, which I still maintain, was that having regard to the operations of the railway system, the purchases made; the individual day-to-day business; things which have to do with matters of costs, should not be revealed. Take, for example, the question of supplies. As supplies are bought and contracts are made and running, we took the position that it would be against the interests of the system to make public, therefore giving to the competitor of the system, the prices of the supplies. Further than that, as was pointed out at the time, no special cuts could ever be made for the benefit of the people's railway, because if they were made public everyone else would want the same price, which would mean that the hands of our purchasing agents would be tied, and we would not get the economies we should get. I think that position is clear and that hon. gentlemen opposite although they bitterly opposed it formerly, will agree with me. We never took the position, however, that the officials of the railways were the custodians of the people's money, to do with it as they liked having regard to new capital commitments, or the sale of company asets and the purchase of new assets. Again I think my hon. friend the chairman of the committee agrees with me. I know the former Minister of Railways, Mr. Graham, after the Scribe hotel purchase had been ventilated, and after a question had come up as to the sale of some property in Montreal, I think it was, took the position that all matters either of the sale of the property or purchases for the extension of the property should be a matter for the government; in other words, that there should be no change in capital account having regard to new commitments, and no contraction having regard to sales of the physical property, without the knowledge, assent and approval of the government. Would my hon. friend the chairman of the committee say that I am wrong in that? Would he not agree with me there? He did agree with me at the time, and the former Minister of Railways agreed with me at the time. But what is the attitude to-day? The attitude to-day is, you cannot get that information. The Minister of Railways shakes his head. The attitude to-day is not only that there shall not be purchases made except with the government's approval, but the purchases when made are to be kept secret. Why, it is only a couple of days ago that we had this request in connection with the Montreal Tramways. That is a new purchase, a matter of capital commitment. Nevertheless we are told that it is against the public interest that that capital commitment should be known. Why? How is the committee to function if it is going to be tied in that way? Again, apart from the committee, surely it ought to be clear that the people's representatives in parliament should have the right to know what is going on in regard to these new commitments, and have a right to have their questions regarding these new commitments answered on the floor of the House.

Mr. JACOBS: I thought we were going to keep the railways out of politics. That was the slogan when we took them over.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not see the purport of my hon. friend's question. We never said, I do not think anybody ever said—perhaps my hon. friend now wants to take that position—that the capital commitments of the railways could be extended without governmental, without parliamentary consent. Does my hon. friend think that that should be done?

Mr. JACOBS: I think the Canadian National Railways management should be given the widest latitude to run the line as they see fit, with the least possible governmental interference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is perfectly right, but with his usual facility he dodges the question entirely. I absolutely stated that when I commenced, and then I stated that the view of the chairman of the committee, as I understood it, and certainly the view of the former Minister of Railways, Mr. Graham—

Mr. DUNNING: And of the present one.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And of the present one, the minister says, was that there should be no new purchases made with the people's money without the people's representatives having something to say about it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): The statute provides that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The statute should have governed in the case of the purchase of the Scribe hotel, but apparently statutes are made in connection with railway administration to be dodged and evaded.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): That will be found out in the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is being found out in the committee, but how much good do we get from that?

There was one very pertinent thing said to-day by the member from Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) that the committee's report is brought down to the House so late that there is very little opportunity of doing anything with it. I wonder if we could not have that changed this year, and if the report could not be brought down at such a time as would give the House full opportunity of dealing with it.

Mr. DUNNING: May I answer that question? So far as the minister and the department are concerned, I shall be very glad indeed to facilitate the proceedings of the committee, but the date on which the committee will make its report is entirely in the hands of the committee itself. But everything that can be done, so far as the ministry of railways is concerned, will be done to facilitate the committee's work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am glad to hear the minister say that, because that state of affairs has been one of the things which give a good deal of force to the objections which have been made to-day as to what has happened in the past.

I am objecting, Mr. Speaker, to this committee as constituted. I know of no reason why the opposition should not be given its fair numerical standing on this committee. We are entitled to seven out of fifteen members, seven as against eight; we are given six as against nine.

Mr. JACOBS: Perhaps yours are better men, equal in weight to the other nine.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): At the time when there was a discussion regarding the appointment of the different committees, this question came up of the representation of all parties in the House on the different committees. I think the chief whip of the opposition was not present, but a representative of his party was, and I think it was agreed that the number mentioned in the resolution now before the House was the right proportion for the different parties in the House. I think the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Tolmie) was present at that discussion, also the assistant whip of the opposition, and nobody seemed to find fault with the arrangement, seeing that other parties and groups in the House had their representation on the committee as well.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But my hon. friend does not show that the figures are right. He says there was no objection made at the time. It is time objection was made if it it wrong, and it is wrong on the face of it. I am not going to speak on this question any further now, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): I just wanted to mention, Mr. Speaker, that my chief objection to this proposal is the one lastly touched on by my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton), the question of when this committee is to report. By the rules of this House, no matter referred to this committee can be mentioned or discussed in this House so long as the committee is seized of it. Last year this practical difficulty confronted me. I had several matters concerning which I wished to inquire respecting the Canadian National Railways. I was not a member of this committee, and the committee did not bring in its report until one or two o'clock in the morning of the last day of the session, and no opportunity was given me to make the inquiries I desired to make. That is a practical difficulty that should receive attention.

There are only fifteen members on this committee in a House of 245 members, so 230 of these members will have no right to ask questions or bring up a subject pertaining to the National railways until that committee makes its report, and unless the committee is going to make its report within two or three weeks before the close of the session, our opportunity of discussing these railway matters will be very limited indeed. I personally think that a smaller committee is the best procedure.

Mr. POWER: What is to prevent any member of this House from going before the committee and asking any questions he pleases?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I want to discuss these matters in the House. I am not on that committee, and I think I am entitled to bring these matters up in the House.

Mr. POWER: What is to prevent my hon. friend from going to that committee and asking any questions he desires, and then bringing up these matters in the House?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not intend to go to the committee; I am not on it. I wanted to discuss certain matters in the House last year, and did not have the opportunity because of the late hour at which the committee's report was brought in. If we can provide against that state of things happening again this year I am quite content to have the committee appointed. I think a smaller committee is the best way of dealing with the business, but the composition of this committee is manifestly unfair to this side of the House. Here we are, a party of 116 members, with only six members on this committee; the government, with only 100 members, has six members on this committee. That does not give the main opposition its proper representation, and I think that matter should be remedied.

Mr. W. A. BOYS (North Simcoe): Just a word, Mr. Speaker. I do not think it is too late to ask the minister to put this matter right. I was not on the striking committee this year, as is usual in the case of the whip of each party, and when I was informed that the committee was to be constituted nine and six, I took exception to that at once, as I think the chief whip of the government party will admit. Before that, we had practically agreed that the representation on committees should be on a mathematical basis, disregarding fractions. He told me that the representatives of our party had agreed to that. I said I could not see how they could have agreed to a representation of nine and six, but if they had I would be bound by that agreement. It is proper for me to say that I made inquiry and found that they had agreed to nine and six. I then asked on what possible basis of equity such a request could be made. The whip of the government party could give me no good reason, but as the matter had been agreed to I felt that I had to waive further opposition. It does seem to me now that it only has to be brought to the attention of the minister and the government to see that an injustice is done this group. If we take the figures and carry out, as we did carry out in connection with all the other committees, mathematical representation as far as possible, the figures would show that we should have a representation of 7 5-49 on that committee and the government and the Progressives a representation of 7 44-49. That basis of representation has not been adopted and we get the short end of it. I think the government, nothwithstanding what has gone before, should now give us seven members, take seven themselves, and give one to the Progressives.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria, B.C.): I was on the striking committee along with some other representatives in this group, and I must say it is true that the proportion in this particular committe is wiped out in comparison with the allotment for the other committees. The representation on the other committees is, I think, satisfactory. As regards the representation in this particular case the chief whip and his associates were very insistent on the representation they thought was called for. In carrying out the work of these committees it is always a matter of give and take to a certain extent, and while the representation on the other committees was pretty satisfactory in this particular case, notwithstanding our insistence we did not succeed in getting the representation that is really our due. However, I think it is not too late to right the wrong, and the House should consider making a suitable change such as suggested by the chief whip of our party.

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): I was also a member of the striking committee and I may say this for the gentlemen who represented the various parties. They took the view that the committees were not partisan bodies but committees of parliament, empowered to ascertain what was the best course to pursue with respect to legislation on the matters before them, and there was a disposition to strike these committees on what would seem to be a fair basis. The government have a certain responsibility and in accordance with the ordinary procedure usually have a majority on a committee. As the House is now constituted that is not so. However, the government are prepared to accept that situation. The representation on this committee, I think, is in the same proportion as that on other committees.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think that is so, and I do not see why there should be a change.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why does the minister say the representation is the same when it is not?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The majority in this House is not with the Conservative party or with the Liberal party.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is a majority in this House and that majority will rule in the committees.

Mr. BOYS: What we are contending for is what has been granted in the case of other committees. I am not seeking to introduce any partisan feature at all. We are discussing what is fair, and we are complaining of the departure which has been made in this particular case.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think it would be a mistake to interject into our committees a party viewpoint in view of the present constitution of parliament.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why not have regard to the viewpoint of fairness?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think hon. gentlemen should be satisfied with the constitution of the committee as it stands.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): The Minister of Public Works was wrong, probably unintentionally, when he said that the representation on this committee is the same as on other committees. It is not. That is why our side of the House is objecting. The representation on the other committees, as the chief whip and other speakers pointed out, has been worked out on an absolutely mathematical basis. Owing to some misunderstanding the representation in this case has not been worked out in the same manner but is different from that of the other committees. The representation of the government side and the Conservative side should be worked out on a fifty-fifty basis, and the Progressive and Labour should have a representation of one. It will not be denied that the Progressives have voted pretty solidly with the government. They have a representation of two with twenty-four members, and we have a representation of six with one hundred and sixteen members. The representation therefore is not fair bearing in mind the numerical strength of the respective parties.

An hon. MEMBER: Would my hon. friend exclude Labour?

Mr. MANION: I do not exclude anybody, but the government may have to exclude somebody. It is the government that chooses the other members of the committee. I do not understand the attitude of the government. Our side has appealed to them simply from the point of view of the fairness which has been followed in the case of the other committees. Why should the attitude of fairness be departed from in this one case?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The government are acting in accordance with what they deem to be the position of the parties in the House.

Mr. MANION: I do not quite follow what the minister is trying to argue. A conference was held between the whips, and the leaders I presume of the three parties. They came to an understanding as to the representation on the other committees but either through accident or intention—and it begins to look as if it were intention—the question of representation on this particular committee is treated differently. My hon. friend the minister shakes his head but he is absolutely wrong. This committee is being treated on a different mathematical basis from any other committee in the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN: At the time the composition of the committees was being considered it was agreed that as regards certain committees the two chief parties should break even, that is, that they should have the same number of members, and that the majority should be represented by the other groups in the House, composed of Progressives, Labour and Independent members. Thus the majority given to the government would come from the various groups outside of the two main parties.

Mr. BOYS: Did I not take the position that we should form our committees on a mathematical basis? Was that not the position I took on behalf of this party in regard to the formation of the committees?

Mr. CASGRAIN: There was a discussion when the time came for the formation of the committees. At the conference there were present representatives of all parties in the House, including the Minister of Public Works and the ex-Minister of Agriculture the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Tolmie). We all agreed that on certain committees the larger number should be given to the main opposition and to the government side the lesser number; but in certain committees it was agreed by all parties there present that we should break even, and the majority should come from the remaining groups in the House.

Mr. BOYS: That has been done.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Those committees were the Privileges and Elections committee if I remember rightly—there may be another one, I am speaking from memory—and the committee on National Railways and Shipping. That was a committee upon which it was agreed that the two main parties should have the same number of members, and that the majority would be given by the other groups, Labour, Independents and Progressives.

Mr. BOYS: Does the hon. member not think if we concede seven members to the government, when they have a representation in the House of one hundred, and only ask for seven members for ourselves, when we number one hundred and sixteen members, we are being rather generous?

Mr. CASGRAIN: If the honourable member will look at the representation in the other committees, he will find that that of the opposition was greater, in some cases, than ours. In some committees, the number was greater because the proportion was agreed to. The Minister of Public Works conceded that the main opposition party should be given one more, and in some cases it will be found that there will be one, two, three of four members allotted to the main opposition party. This was done with the consent of all parties represented.

Mr, MANION: In conclusion, I wish to repeat that it seems to me it is a very unfair attitude to take. Of course there is no ulterior motive, in fact this is an absolutely new question coming before us now. All members are interested in the success of the National Railways. It is not suggested that there is any ulterior motive and there has been a fair arrangement in making up the different committees. Of course, there may be an exception as the hon. member says, but by and large, the government agreed that the committees of the House should be mathematically arranged. In this case, in the absence of our chief whip, they succeeded in making the numerical proportion different. I appeal to members of the government to look at it in a fair light, as they did in regard to the other committees, respecting which there is no complaint, and I ask that this committee be re-arranged in such a way that both sides will be represented proportionately. Even then the government will have the advantage.

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. member wish to repudiate an arrangement to which two members of his party agreed?

Mr. MANION: No, but if two hon. members of this House happen to make a mistake there is no reason why this House should not rectify it.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): I wish to say a word following up what has been stated by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). If the appointment of this committee means that all discussion in regard to matters relating to the Canadian National Railways is to be taken away from this House and transferred to a committee of fifteen members, then I object. Within a few days, or a very short time at least, we expect the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) will make the usual annual statement with regard to matters relating to the Canadian National Railways, and looking upon that subject as a most important one I, as a representative of some of the people, desire to make some remarks in connection with Canadian National Railway matters. If the apointment of this committee is going to do what has been done with regard to all other committees of the House —make it impossible for a member to discuss the matters which the committee is dealing with until the committee has reported—then you have effectivly closed my mouth and every other mouth in the House in connection with the National Railways until that committee reports. We have been in session four and a half months. The committee is being appointed to-day, and it is obviously impossible for it to make any intelligent inquiry into matters referred to it and report before the closing days of this session. In the meantime the Minister of Railways will have made his statement, all matters relating to the Canadian National Railways will have passed the House and we will have no opportunity whatsoever to discuss the subject. Unless there is a reservation made whereby it will be possible for us to discuss Canadian National railway matters here, notwithstanding the fact that the committee is sitting, then as a representative of my constituency I most strenuously object to having my liberty taken away.

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): I have noticed in checking over the committee as constituted that every province in Canada is represented except Nova Scotia.

An hon. MEMBER: Maritime rights again.

Mr. QUINN: Yes, Martime rights again. After all the talk we have heard in this House about Maritime rights since January 7, we now find the province of Nova Scotia is ignored again. The matter of railways is of great importance to that province, particularly at the present time. I might make a suggestion as to how this difficulty can be solved. With the fourteen members from Nova Scotia we have no representative on the committee. Take one member from the other side of the House from the committee, and appoint a Nova Scotia member from this side, and the whole difficulty is remedied.

Mr. O. B. PRICE (Westmorland): Had this committee been clothed with authority to thoroughly investigate matters concerning the Canadian National Railways and report back to this House information which we have been refused, I would be in favour of the appointment of this committee. We recall that on October 13, 1921, the Prime Minister speaking in the city of Moncton said, that if returned to power matters concerning the affairs, the direction and the operation of the Canadian National Railway would be thoroughly gone into and the public given information concerning them. That statement was made by the Prime Minister and it has not been lived up to. I have asked for information on the floor of this House, and I have been told that it was not in the interest of the railway to divulge it—not in the interest of the railway perhaps through fear of competition with other railways. As a matter of fact, I think the Department of Railways and Canals knows that the Canadian Pacific Railway has all the information the department has with regard to the traffic in and out of the ports of Canada. It must have that information just as surely as the Canadian National Railways, and my purpose in bringing up this matter was to get what I could in the way of data, to make comparisons between certain portions of the Canadian National railway in different sections of Canada. When hon. members opposite utter a little condemnation—possibly I better say a little criticism—with respect to the Maritime provinces, I would ask them to consider carefully the conditions in the Maritime provinces and to compare the railway facilities and opportunities for the movement of traffic in the west with those in the east.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. member is not speaking to the motion before the House and I would suggest that he confine his remarks to the matter under discussion.

Mr. PRICE: I am trying to point out some of the things I would give this committee authority to investigate thoroughly. I was going to mention some of those items and I trust, Sir, you will permit me to do so. In the Canadian west they have a freight rate which is practically 100 per cent less than what their neighbours across the line have.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am very sorry, but the hon. gentleman is really out of order. He must limit his remarks to the question at issue, which is whether or not this committee should be appointed. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity on the estimates to speak with reference to the particular grievance he has, but the question that the House has to decide is whether or not this committee should be appointed.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I understand that if this committee is appointed, this House under the present practice will not, until the committee reports, be able to discuss matters relating to the National Railways.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend permit me? I do not so understand the resolution. Discussion of the details of the estimates will of course have to be deferred until the committee reports, but it is my intention to make the annual railway budget statement, as it is called, just as soon as possible now that the budget debate is over and I expect that I shall be able to do so sometime next week.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend should go on in all fairness to point out that he refers this to the committee and we hear nothing further until the committee reports.

Mr. DUNNING: But on the statement that I make to the House debate can occur; at least debate has occurred in past sessions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: For a very short time.

Mr. DUNNING: It can last as long as hon. members wish. There is no limitation as far as I know.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like to have, if possible, the opinion of the Speaker with regard to the practice of the House which, I understand, is that when matters are referred to a special committee they cannot be discussed in this chamber except upon a report from that committee. The statement made by the Minister of Railways from time to time, to which the present minister has referred, is not usually made under circumstances which permit of debate. There are certain matters relating to the Canadian National lines that I and other members wish to discuss in the House. We desire to have ample opportunity to present our views with regard to those railways, and if the appointment of this committee is to postpone such discussion and to preclude us from entering upon such discussion until the committee reports, I am going to vote against the appointment of the committee. Therefore I would like to have some suggestion from you, Sir, because your familiarity with the rules of the House will enable you to decide.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): Having sat in the last two sessions of parliament where this motion went through by consent of all parties, I think hon. gentlemen who are worried about their rights being curtailed, need have no fear on that score. The Minister of Railways will probably next week present his annual statement to the House and a motion will be made to refer that to the committee for consideration. As in past years the fullest discussion was permitted as a matter of right and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George need have no worry about having an opportunity of putting before the House any views he has in regard to the question of the Canadian National Railways or its management because the fullest and most complete right of putting questions to the government exists during that period. As regards matters of detail on which members want complete and full information, they have a better opportunity of obtaining it through members on that committee than on the floor of the House where only questions may be asked.

Mr. CAHAN: All I wished to know was whether upon a motion made by the Minister of Railways to refer the matter to this special committee we are entitled to enter upon a full discussion of all matters relating to Canadian National lines. I do not so understand the practice.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): During the past two years on the statement being made by the Minister of Railways prolonged discussion has taken place without any question. I can say on behalf of the government and the Minister of Railways that when his statement is made the fullest opportunity will be given to hon. gentlemen to discuss the matter in detail.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: After having now satisfied the objection of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), why not go a little further and satisfy the objection which I have taken to the committee by providing for proper representation of the House upon it?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have asked my colleague the whip to let me have a statement of the several committees that were appointed by agreement on Tuesday, February 23, when the striking committee reached an agreement with respect to all the committees of the House. The point I want to make clear is this, that the committees were all arranged at one and the same time. There were reasons why a larger number of representatives from one party was given to one committee than to another, but the entire schedule was arranged with the view of doing justice to all parties concerned. With respect to the standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, I find that the total membership is 129. On that committee Liberals have 54 members; the Conservatives, 61, and the Progressives, 14. If the government were to follow the reasoning of hon. gentlemen opposite or meet the suggestions which they are asking us to meet, we should request that instead of having 54 members on that committee, we be given 61 as the Conservative party opposite are given.

Mr. CLARK: Why should the Liberal party have the same number as this party?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I am asking is perfectly fair.

Mr. CLARK: I am asking as a matter of representation in this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member will perhaps concede that the government has some rights and privileges.

Mr. CLARK: I will concede that the government has its rights and I shall be the first to support the Prime Minister in his contention. But on the representation of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) this is a minority government and on the minister's own submission, it being a minority government, it recognizes the principle of minority representation on committees. There is no reason in the world why the two parties should not be represented on committees according to their representation in this House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not wish to take up much of the time of the House on this matter, because I think all phases of it have been sufficiently canvassed; but I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact, which is a very material one, that on the standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, hon. gentlemen opposite have 61 of a representation while the government has 54. On the committee with reference to the National railways the representation is six, six and three. I have not the slightest doubt, although I was not present at the meeting, that there may have been reasons which made it in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite desirable to have a larger representation on the standing committee than on the special committee and which may have governed with respect to the larger representation there. The point is, as I have said, that the committees as a whole were struck in relation to each other and should stand or fall together. All the other committees have already been appointed; the government has accepted its smaller representation as indicated, and I think the government is justified in asking that the representation on this committee shall remain as it is at least until the committee gets under way. Then if it is found desirable to change the personnel in any way, it can be done as a matter of usual procedure.

I wish also to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the government will no doubt wish to have the chairmanship of this committee. The minute the chairman is appointed the active membership of the committee is reduced to that extent. I think when hon. gentlemen opposite consider all phases of this question in the light in which they have been presented, they will see an endeavour has been made to do justice all around.

Mr. BOYS: My arrangement at the very outset with the government whip was that the representation on committees should be on a mathematical basis. That is exactly what we have in the Railway committee. We have 116 members, the government have 100 and the Progressives and Independents have 28, and our respective representation on that committee is 61, 54 and 14.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no doubt my hon. friend presented the mathematical point to the government whip, by whom it was considered.

Mr. BOYS: The proposition was agreed to. I admit it was varied in this particular committee we are now discussing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I add this further fact, that on the Customs committee, the membership of which was agreed to by the right hon. leader of the opposition, there are four members of the Conservative party, and four of the Liberal party. The agreement was satisfactory in connection with that committee. Why should it not be equally satisfactory in this case?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But you had only one of your friends there; you have three here.

Mr. BOYS: That is exactly what we ask here. We conceded that, although you had only 100 to our 116, you should control the committee so long as the Progressives were with you, and we agreed to 4, 4 and 1.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what we want here.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (South Winnipeg): I should like to point out to my right hon. friend that, apart altogether from the strength of the respective parties, he appears to have overlooked the very important fact of Nova Scotia not having any representation on the committee at all.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I believe the membership of this committee is the result of an agreement. I have often heard my friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Boys)—who has acted as whip for a great many years with remarkable success—say in the House that these arrangements between the whips of the various parties are gentlemen's agreements and should be accepted and honoured by the members of the House. I have heard him state that on various occasions. This session all the committees were struck at the same time, and the number of members on this committee was also accepted at that time. But it happens that the other committees were organized at an earlier stage under that agreement, which was accepted by everybody in the House. Now when this special committee comes to be organized I claim that in justice and fairness to all concerned the agreement, so entered into by the whips and accepted by everybody should prevail.

Mr. CLARK: May I ask the Minister of Justice a question? Does he suggest that any party in this House is bound by the reports of committees? I assume he would say no.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I suggest that in this instance, as in other instances of arrangements between the whips, it is an honourable agreement and should be accepted and respected by the House.

Mr. QUINN: Are you going to persist in ignoring Nova Scotia on this committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the members of my hon. friend's party wish to substitute a member from Nova Scotia in the place of one of the three members from Ontario, the government will be pleased to accept the suggestion. But the point I wish to direct the attention of the House to at the moment illustrates wherein considerations have been taken into account by the striking committee which perhaps we are losing sight of altogether. A special committee cannot exceed 15 in number without the unanimous consent of the House. Now, I venture to say we cannot hope to get such consent to alter this committee as arranged by the whips. That being the fact, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the House pass the resolution, and if when the committee has been appointed there appear to be very strong reasons why its personnel should be altered in any particular, we can then take into consideration anything further that may be necessary to be done.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister: Having regard to the vast importance of matters to be dealt with by this committee, does he not really think that he could get the consent of the House to double its representation? I think this committee is entirely too small in view of the importance of the business which will come before it. Only those fifteen members on the committee will have the special privilege of getting information and keeping it to themselves. They are not to let it out to any person else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, let me say to my hon. friend that this committee is different from other committees in that in no manner does the committee take away from the members of the House the right to discuss railway matters in detail. It is simply a committee for sifting information in the first instance, and thereby enabling hon. members to discuss the points they wish to develop further in the House, without bringing in a lot of irrelevant matter, and so save a lot of time that otherwise would be taken up here in seeking information on minor points. It is really a committee for the purpose of saving time.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I appreciate that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. members who are not on the committee wish to appear and get any information, they will be at perfect liberty to do so. The government has no desire in any way to take a stand that cannot be modified. I would suggest that the resolution be permitted to pass, and that the whips of the respective parties should then meet. If they will agree among themselves to allow hon. gentlemen opposite another member, and the remainder of the House another member, we are quite agreeable to accept the arrangement. But I think this should be effected in the same way as the original arrangement—by the whips themselves.

Mr. BOYS: This is an unfortunate misunderstanding and I would propose this as a compromise. Would not the Prime Minister accept a suggestion that the membership, by unanimous consent, be increased by one, that we have the right to name that one, and that he be from Nova Scotia?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made a suggestion, Mr. Speaker, which I think is eminently fair, namely, that the whips themselves should get together and recommend any changes in personnel, seeing that they had to do with the original arrangement. A unanimous suggestion from the whips will receive favourable consideration by the government.

Mr. BOYS: Will the government agree to accept my suggestion to increase the membership by one?

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the Prime Minister that to be fair he should allow the resolution to stand and give the whips an opportunity to get together. He must realize that, as a party, his party is not the government. We do not recognize and never will recognize it as such.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take absolute exception to my hon. friend's statement. I wish him to understand that so far as the government is concerned this is not a question of party at all. It is a question of who is able to command a majority in this House. The present administration is in that position, and it intends to remain there.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Then do away with groups and say: Here is the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what we are doing.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Then let the government—or what you call the government—demand a majority.

An hon. MEMBER: That was done in January.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): It is suggested that the resolution should be allowed to go through and have the whips consult later, but I think that is quite unfair. Why not withdraw the resolution now and then let the whips get together?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Because the whip representing my hon. friend's party agreed to the list of names contained in the motion. If a change is desired my hon. friends should confer and make a recommendation to the House.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I desire to speak to this motion very briefly. I quite approve of this method of referring these accounts to a committee, because it does appear to me that we will get better results in this way than by attempting to thresh the matter out in committee of the Whole. But I cannot overlook the fact that this committee is dealing with perhaps the largest and most important matter before the House; the Canadian National Railways extend across Canada, and this committee should be representative of all parts of this country. I think the province of Nova Scotia should be represented, and I think the number suggested, fifteen, is too small.

I suggest that the House unanimously consent that this number be increased, then let the whips get together and agree upon a selection which will be thoroughly representative of all parts of Canada and of all groups in this House. The committee will then command the confidence of this House and the best possible results will be secured in this very difficult and very important matter.

Mr. L. G. BELL (St. Antoine): The Minister of Justice is generally very fair in his remarks, but though he has referred to this as a gentleman's agreement, even in an agreement of that kind misunderstandings may arise. It is quite clear that there is such a misunderstanding between the government whip and the whip of our party. It is quite clear that parliament is supreme; this question has been referred to parliament and I think even the suggestion of the Prime Minister, that this matter be referred back to the whips, is not quite in order, if I may say so. I think this should be settled by parliament this afternoon.

The injustice we on this side of the House are under has been clearly pointed out. The Minister of Railways has told us that any questions brought up by members not represented on the committee may be referred to those on the committee and that the matters will be discussed. We have sixteen members more than any other group in the House and these sixteen members will be unrepresented. For that reason we should have another representative on that committee. It has also been pointed out that every province, with the exception of Nova Scotia, has a representative on this committee. That surely is not fair, because I would point out that the Progressive group, having but twenty-two members, have two representatives, whereas the Maritime group having twenty-five members have no representative.

Mr. LAPOINTE: New Brunswick has two representatives, Mr. Jones and Mr. Robichaud.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): But the members representing Nova Scotia are so vitally interested in this question that they surely should have representation on this committee.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Who suggested those from the opposite side who should be on the committee? We know that the Maritime representation, especially from Nova Scotia, is largely Conservative, and if the Conservative party are desirous of having a representative of Nova Scotia on this committee it can easily be arranged through the whips.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): I think one of the chief difficulties is that this report is not brought into the House for a full discussion. For that reason we should have a full measure of representation in order to see that this report is presented to the House for discussion at an early date.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): I would like to ask the government if they consider it fair that the province of Nova Scotia, returning fourteen members, should have no representation on the committee. I appeal to the government and to the House, as a represenative of Nova Scotia; I do not ask the province of Ontario to divide their representation with Nova Scotia, but I ask that a representative of that province be placed on the committee. Transportation in Nova Scotia is quite as important as in any other part of Canada, and perhaps more so, and any arrangement which would preclude a representative of Nova Scotia from having some insight into the workings of the railway is grossly unfair. Perhaps it is because Nova Scotia returned so large a proportion of Conservatives that my province is now being penalized.

Mr. DUNNING: I can settle that point in a moment. If hon. members opposite are not prepared to so adjust their representation as to give Nova Scotia a member of the committee, I will undertake that someone on this side of the House will be sufficiently generous to do so.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not in a position to make bargains for our party, but I am pointing out that we are unfairly treated as the situation now stands. I am not content to come to Ontario and ask them to take a man off the committee in order that we may put one of our men in his place. I ask for justice for Nova Scotia.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Pouliot — Lennox,
Howden — Mullins,
Cahill — O'Neill,
Fontaine — Chabot,
Speakman — Black (Halifax),
Marcil — Perley,
Robichaud — Culligan,
Donnelly — Barber,
Power — Mewburn,
Bothwell — Fraser,
Sanderson — Wright.
Fournier — Garland (Carleton, Ont.).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I was not paired; I was not asked to pair, and there was no understanding with respect to a pair, but knowing the reason why my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition is not in his seat to-day, I felt that I would not care to vote on this motion. Had I voted I would have voted in support of the motion.

Mr. MARCIL: I was paired with the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Culligan). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. BARBER: I was paired with the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. POWER: I was paired with the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. FRASER: I was paired with the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. SANDERSON: I was paired with the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Wright). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, to amend the Canada Grain Act (Warehouse receipts).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1907, AMENDMENT

The House in committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the right hon. leader of the opposition desires to speak to resolution No. 1, so we will let that stand, and I will ask the committee to take up resolution No. 2.

2. Resolved, That schedule A to The Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter fifteen of the statutes of 1913, chapter forty-seven of the statutes of 1919, chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1921, chapter nineteen of the statutes of 1922, chapter forty-two of the statutes of 1923 and chapter thirty-eight of the statutes of 1924, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items: 7, 20a, 22, 23, 28, 30, 32, 39b, 77a, 90, 134, 135, 438, 448, 590a, 680a, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of said items, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of duty be inserted in Schedule A:—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would suggest that we take the resolutions up item by item. If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will address himself to each item as it comes up it will save a great deal of time.

Mr. ROBB: That will be satisfactory.

Customs tariff—7. Meats, fresh, n.o.p. per pound: British preferential tariff, 2 cents; intermediate tariff, 2½ cents; general tariff, 3½ cents.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend explain that?

Mr. ROBB: This is simply an increase of half a cent in the general tariff to correct a mistake that was made in the Australian agreement in cabling.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend is wrong in what he tells the House. I think the Australian or New Zealand rate is half a cent. If my hon. friend looks at the customs tariff he will find under the heading of "Australia and New Zealand, item No. 7," this very item of "fresh meats, n.o.p." and the rate under the British preferential tariff is two cents, under the intermediate two and a half cents, and under the general tariff, three cents, and in the case of Australia and New Zealand half a cent a pound. What is my hon. friend doing? Does he think he is raising the rate of duty on Australian fresh meats from half a cent a pound to two cents? Because if so I do not think he is.

Mr. ROBB: No, I am raising the general tariff from three cents to three and a half cents so as to give them an additional spread.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: While my hon. friend may think that is what he is doing I am afraid that is not the case. I have the statute here and am reading from it. The item he is striking out is:

Meats, British preferential tariff, 2 cents; intermediate tariff, 2½ cents; general tariff 3 cents.

Then the Australian and New Zealand rate is half a cent. I would suggest that my hon. friend look into this question and that in the meantime we report progress.

Mr. MANION: May I suggest to the Minister of Finance that there is a shortage apparently of these resolutions. I happened to find a copy in my room but I could not get any downstairs. I think there should be some extra copies because other members may have lost the copy they originally received and one cannot form an intelligent idea of what is going on unless he has the resolutions before him.

Mr. ROBB: May I inform the hon. gentleman that if the files of hon. members are properly kept a copy of these resolutions will be found in the Votes and Proceedings of April 15th. I would suggest that this item be passed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I want to find out what change is really being made here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It occurs to me that it would suit the convenience of hon. members if these resolutions were printed in the orders of the day. I understand there is no reason why they should not be reprinted and that being the case I would ask the Clerk to see that they are printed in the orders of the day so that we may have them before us.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That will suit me particularly. I received one copy of these resolutions but I took the liberty of sending it away, and it has been impossible for me to get another copy.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, May 20, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

FUEL SUPPLY COMMITTEE

First report of special committee on Fuel.—Mr. Lapierre.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PENSION TO COLONEL F. J. MURRAY

Mr. BROWN:

What is the amount of pension being paid to Colonel F. J. Murray?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): Seventy-seven dollars and fifty cents per month.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

IMPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS

Mr. DOUCET:

What were the importations into Canada from United States and from other countries, respectively, during the year 1925, of the following farm products: (a) fresh fruits, (b) dried fruits, (c) grain, (d) meats, including beef and pork products, (e) dairy products, (f) potatoes, turnips and sugar beets, (g) eggs, (h) wool?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Passed as an order for return, which I now table.

UNIVERSAL PROMOTION OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I would like to address a question to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) in regard to the so-called system of universal promotion for railway employees. I am told that there is an arrangement between the heads of the employees' brotherhoods to the effect that the system of universal promotion will be established in the near future. According to that system an employee who has seniority right in a railway region will have that seniority right all over that region. Accordingly a man from Riviere du Loup, in my constituency, will perhaps have to work on the Transcontenental railway if the other employees there are his juniors, and a man who works in New Brunswick may be sent to Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia or vice versa, for an indenfinite period of time. This would be very embarrassing to him, making it necessary to leave his family, and as everyone knows railway employees are not supposed to be Wandering Jews.

In that respect I would ask the Minister of Railways if it would not be proper, and if it is not the intention of the management of the Canadian National Railways, to ask the employees of every district to vote on that matter and decide among themselves what should be done in their own district.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING. (Minister of Railways and Canals): I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that these matters of seniority give considerable difficulty to the management of every railway in this country or in the United States. Up to the present it has been the policy of the management to endeavour, so far as possible, to have the men themselves, through their organizations, determine the broad general policy to be followed, provided that such a policy does not interfere with the proper management and conduct of the road, and does not add unduly to the cost of operation. With regard to the specific details to which my hon friend refers, there will, I am sure, be an excellent opportunity before the special committee which was appointed yesterday to go very thoroughly into details with the operating officers of the road, and I know that members whose constituents are affected will take advantage of that opportunity and get all detailed information regarding it.

Mr. POULIOT: Am I to understand that the new proposal will not be enforced until the committee has reached a decision?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not wish to convey that impression, Mr. Speaker. This is a matter for the management of the railway itself. The employees are under the control of the management, and I should not like to say that we could properly take the position that a committee of parliament should deal with such details as the conditions of employment of the railway men and their movement from place to place; but the committee is entitled to the fullest information from the management as to their reasons for adopting any particular policy in this or any other regard.

IMPORTATION OF MINERS

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT OFFICE ADVERTISING FOR MEN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, this morning I received from Winnipeg the following telegram which I wish to draw to the attention of the government:

Yesterday the following notice appeared in the government employment office, one hundred miners (shooters and loaders) for shooting and loading coal. Must have experience and be able to qualify as miners. Single men preferred. Rates forty eight to fifty-five cents per ton according to height of seam. Applicants are expected to join union and be prepared to pay own transportation. Board eight dollars to nine dollars per week. Position permanent. Superintendents having applicants please communicate with superintendent of employment service of Canada, Sydney, Nova Scotia. We took this up with Bowman,—

Mr. Bowman, I might say, is the superintendent of employment service in the city of Winnipeg.

—who advised us to see Rigg.—

Mr. Rigg, Sir, is superintendent of the employment service for the Dominion of Canada, with offices in this city.

—We wired Rigg as follows: Employment office advertising for one hundred miners for Nova Scotia. Are you aware that the miners in Pictou county only working two days per week and hundreds idle? Cape Breton, Sydney Mines and Florence two days out of last two weeks. We protest government employment offices advertising for men under these conditions. Wire reply what you can do." We received the following wire in reply this morning: "Replying to your wire even date re miners for Nova Scotia. Coal production in Nova Scotia mines rapidly increasing and request for importation of European miners has been filed with the Department of Immigration. Our efforts directed towards meeting requirements from labour resident in Canada. We are advised that demand cannot be met in Maritime provinces. Signed R. A. Rigg." This is the lamest excuse ever heard. The following are the wires received from New Glasgow, Sydney and Glace Bay. Sydney, Nova Scotia. All mines in Sydney Mines area have worked about one week since first of January. Glace Bay area almost as bad. When mines are operating they are overcrowded and contract men don't make three dollars a day.—

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Are certain members of this House to have privileges which are denied to others in being allowed to read articles at considerable length on the orders of the day?

Mr. SPEAKER: I was just about to call the attention of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) to the fact that it is not regular for a member to read a paper which he may have in his possession when putting a question before the orders of the day are called. A question of that nature should be placed on the order paper. Questions on the orders of the day ought to be short and to the point. I would advise the hon. gentleman to put his question on the order paper.

I may say to the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) that no member has special privileges; all members have equal rights.

Mr. HEAPS: I will now put my question, Mr. Speaker, and then follow your suggestion. Is the government aware that the Besco corporation have asked for one hundred miners to be sent to Nova Scotia, when there are hundreds and hundreds of miners down there who at present are out of work or working part time only?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am aware, the government has no information on the subject. I shall be very glad to look into the matter if I can have an opportunity of reading the messages which my hon. friend (Mr. Heaps) has been referring to.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Mr. Speaker may I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Elliott) what attitude he will adopt in reference to this matter in view of the correct information which has been presented to the House by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps)?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will let my hon. friend know when I decide.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, I could not quite catch the remarks of the hon. Minister of Labour. Do I understand him to say that he will undertake to investigate the matter and see what can be done?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, might I ask in that connection whether the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) would permit the importation of one hundred Europeans to go to work in the Glace Bay district?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Minister of Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if I caught the purport of the telegram correctly, it was that the Department of Immigration was being asked to permit the entry of miners from Europe. I have no knowledge of such a request. Before granting it I would have to make due investigation to decide whether or not any labour of that character was required.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, the information in the telegram comes from the superintendent of employment in Ottawa. The statement is distinct that an effort is to be made to induce European workers to come into the Nova Scotia coal mining area.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All I can say is that, as Acting Minister of Immigration, I have heard nothing about the matter. When it was up before I was consulted, and I will be consulted again before anything is done.

OTTAWA COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE

AMERICAN COAL SPECIFIED IN CALL FOR TENDERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): May I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Mines (Mr. Stewart) if he is aware that the collegiate institute board of Ottawa is calling for tenders for 950 tons of coal? The class of coal specified is "American smokeless or steam coal, run of mine." Now, surely, Mr. Speaker, after all the efforts—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I assume the hon. gentleman is going to put his question.

Mr. CANTLEY: Will the minister be good enough to inquire into the situation and use his best efforts to induce the collegiate board to exercise some common sense in this matter?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Mines): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will inquire; but I must point out to my hon. friend that the matter is not within our control.

Mr. STEVENS: The government is the biggest taxpayer, though.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Is it not a fact that the collegiate institute is under the control of the government of Ontario? That being so, my hon. friend should communicate with the provincial authorities.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is a municipal institution.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PASSENGER RATES FROM THE WEST TO THE MARITIMES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. O. B. PRICE (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) a question in reference to the operation of the passenger traffic department of the Canadian National Railways. I am directing his attention to the matter because of the fact that it concerns Maritime people in the west, and I believe it is of sufficient importance to bring before the House. I will just briefly state what the complaint is. At the present time there is a regular passenger rate—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Will the hon. member kindly put his question?

Mr. PRICE: I think I am in order. I wish to ask the Minister of Railways if he would please use his efforts to see that people residing in Winnipeg at the present time, who desire to get excursion rates to the Maritime provinces will be treated the same as those wishing to go from Winnipeg to the west. The excursion rate offered in that case is less than the regular rate to Vancouver, Seattle and Victoria. I wish to ask if the minister would use his efforts, and I believe he will, to see that the people in the Maritime provinces are given reasonable excursion rates as well as the people in other parts of Canada. I should like the minister to know that the excursion rate from Winnipeg to Halifax and return is only ninety-five cents less than the regular rate, while from Winnipeg to Vancouver and return the regular rate is reduced $20.38. Will the minister endeavour to have this discrimination remedied?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is exceeding his rights in making comment.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I understand the hon. member has asked me to use my influence to bring about an adjustment in the matter of rates. I shall be very careful on every occasion before promising to exert any influence in any such case as that. I believe the laws of this Dominion prescribe certain methods whereby railway rate adjustment may be discussed and adjudicated. I shall be very pleased to make inquiries as to the condition to which my hon. friend has referred, but I am not going to make any promise to get anything done with respect to railway rates.

MARITIME RIGHTS COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. I. D. MACDOUGALL (Inverness): I desire to ask the right hon. leader of the government if he can give the House any information as to when the commission appointed to investigate Maritime rights will hold its first sitting and where that sitting will be held?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The last word I had was that the chairman of the commission, Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, expects to be able to enter upon his duties in connection with the commission in the month of June. Just as soon as the chairman finds it possible to come out from England I understand the work of the commission will be proceeded with.

MR. JOHN HANNA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. E. MAYBEE (Northumberland, Ont.): I had a question placed on the order paper on March 22nd with reference to the dismissal of John Hanna and the Minister of Railways and Canals promised on May 6 to look into the matter. I should be glad to know from him whether he has carried out his promise?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): If the hon. gentleman will give me the number of the order I shall be very glad to have the matter looked into to-day.

FRUIT JOBBER BROKER COMBINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): In view of the fact that cherries were being picked in the Okanagan valley ten days ago, I wish to ask the Minister of Labour whether he is yet in a position to make the statement with respect to jobber owned brokerage houses to which he referred on April 22nd.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Labour): At the time to which my hon. friend refers an appeal was pending. Four of the brokerage houses were fined $25,000 each, and four individuals were fined a similar amount. An appeal was taken against those decisions on the ground that the judgment was not a proper one. On behalf of the crown a cross appeal was entered. Within the last few days I have received word from the gentleman in charge of that matter that the appeal has been withdrawn, and the government has decided that the cross appeal should also be withdrawn. I may tell my hon. friend that there are four other indictments preferred against those houses, but the present impression is that they will not be proceeded with at this time. A court is to be held in about three weeks and the cases are going to be traversed until the following court. Possibly later on, if it is considered that the jobber owned houses are carrying on business in a way that is detrimental to the berry growers, these prosecutions may be disposed of. So far as they are concerned no decision has yet been arrived at. If any further information is desired in connection with the matter I will be very glad to go into it very fully with my hon. friend or any other member of the House who may be interested.

RAILWAY CONNECTION IN STORMONT COUNTY

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. C. J. HAMILTON (Stormont): I wish to ask the Minister of Railways if he will use his influence with the Canadian Pacific and the New York Central companies who have a junction point in my constituency, to ensure more regular connection than at present exists so that the local people may enjoy a better service.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I thank my hon. friend for the high opinion he evidently entertains of my influence. I shall be very glad to look into the matter and see if there is any way in which I can render help.

QUESTIONS ON ORDERS OF THE DAY

MR. SPEAKER DRAWS ATTENTION TO THE RULES

Mr. SPEAKER: With respect to questions put on the orders of the day I find the following in Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure at page 355:

> Remarks with respect to a return not brought down in answer to an order or address, or on a matter of urgency, or of public business, or of personal explanation, may be allowed by the indulgence of the House, but not as a matter of absolute right. All questions and answers thereto—when answers are necessary—should be brief, and involve no matter of controversy or debate. A minister will sometimes request the member to put his question on the notice paper when he is not prepared to give a prompt and brief answer. If a member wishes to bring up a question of urgent public importance he should proceed under the provisions of rule 89.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1907, AMENDMENT

The House in committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Customs tariff—7. Meats, fresh n.o.p. per pound: British preferential tariff, 2 cents; Intermediate tariff 2½ cents; general tariff, 3½ cents.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Yesterday my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) directed my attention to the question of the difference in the rate. I think he was following a copy of the consolidation of the customs tariff used in the department and sent out to the offices, but the half cent referred to in no way affects this.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I wanted to know. The Australian rate remains at half a cent?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And it is not in the special tariff, but it remains at half a cent?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Would the minister inform us on what basis this increase is made in connection with this matter. It is true that it may apply to the Australian treaty, but how does it come that the increase of half a cent a pound is made, and that the tariff is not put on an equality with the tariff of other countries in regard to this product?

Mr. ROBB: The agreement with Australia was that we should give them a spread of three cents, and in transmitting the messages by cable a mistake was made, and this item is to corect that mistake, so that they will have a spread of three cents, instead of two and a half cents. It is an increase in the general tariff, raising the general tariff against the world, and automatically that gives Australia a spread of three cents. It does not change the Australian rate coming in, but gives them a half a cent more spread against the rest of the world.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister points out just exactly what happened with the Australian treaty. The real arrangement between Australia and Canada was that there should be a spread of three cents, and it was entirely in the hands of the government whether they would raise that rate in such a way as to protect the Canadian farmer, or whether they would not. Perhaps my hon. friend would answer the question of the hon. member for South Oxford better if he would explain why he did not make the Australian rate two cents, the same as the British preference tariff, and the general rate five cents.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. ROBB: That is a question of policy.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The policy in the future is, I presume, to be dictated by the tariff board?

Mr. ROBB: I think the Prime Minister has already made that very clear to the House and the country. The tariff board is an inquiry board to examine into conditions, but the government of the day must accept the responsibility, and the 245 members elected to this House from the different constituencies in Canada will have the last word to say as to what shall be the tariff policy of Canada.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): We are now dealing with an item in the tariff. Under the arrangements made by the government with Australia—and a few weeks before the election the same privileges were extended to New Zealand—Australia maintains a tariff of five cents a pound against similar exports from this country going to Australia. That is the reason. I asked the minister if he would inform the House upon what principle or basis this reduction was founded? There surely must be some principle, because a change of three cents per pound against imports of fresh meats from Australia is going to result in tremendous imports into this country of such products as mutton and lamb from that country, and it is going to be a great hardship on those engaged in producing similar meats in this country. So far neither the minister nor the government has informed the country why the reduction of two cents was made in regard to those commodities in those two treaties. It is quite apparent that, as a result of the treaty, our favourable balance of trade with those two countries has already decreased very much indeed, away up in the millions, and this is another evidence of an attempt to sacrifice the interests of agriculture to obtain some other concessions from other countries, and while on the surface it may appear as some degree of relief, as a matter of fact it is not, because of the danger to which I have referred of large imports from those countries. Now our good neighbours to the south of us are continually exporting into this country, or our people are importing from that country, large quantities, particularly of pork products, under this item, and instead of having an increase of half a cent a pound, I think the government would be well advised to make that five cents a pound, and then have your tariff board inquire into the matter. It is surely a matter which should be remedied. It is absolutely unfair to those engaged in agriculture in this province that they should have to submit to conditions of that kind, because it affords a convenient channel for dumping to take place in Canada from the United States. It has happened in the past and is the practice to-day.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps I had better place on record the real trade before any other hon. member speaks. My hon. friends opposite apparently change their policy every day. Heretofore they have been finding fault because of the importations from the United States and have said that we should increase duties against United States products and improve trade within the empire. That is exactly what we are doing under this legislation. We are increasing the rate against the United States and we are lowering the rate to the other British dominions where we have the preference. We have no preference in the United States. Let us look into it and find out how the trade has been flowing in recent years, and how farm products have been coming into Canada. The statistics I have here are not quite up-to-date, because they are for the year ending March, 1925, but I imagine they are fairly correct for the other years. The total importations of fresh beef for the fiscal year 1925 were $39,638; of that $69 worth came from other countries and the balance from the United States; or, in other words, the United States had all the business. Against that business we are adding an additional half cent tax. Now we come to mutton. My hon. friend has referred to the importations of mutton from Australia. During that year we imported a total of $221,596 of mutton, and $193,426 of that came from the United States. From Australia we imported $13,527 worth and from New Zealand $5,801, and let me say that New Zealand is four days nearer to Canada than Australia. We imported from all other countries $8,842 worth. Now we come to pork, and incidentally let me say we import pork during slack seasons for use in our packing factories, and very often when this is exported as bacon 99 per cent of the duty is rebated, but it gives employment to Canadian workmen in the slack season.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Could you tell us how much we imported last year?

Mr. ROBB: We imported of fresh pork for the year I am quoting now a total of $1,095,778 worth. Where do we import that from? None from Australia, none from New Zealand none from any country but the United States. It all comes from the United States and against that we are raising the tariff one-half cent a pound. My hon. friend who has been preaching politics throughout this session rises to-day to protest against this change.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I do not like a statement of that kind to be made when it is not based on fact.

Mr. ROBB: Of all other meats we imported a total of $26,585 worth of which only $19 worth was from countries other than United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The minister will understand that I advocate increasing the tariff so as to make it equal to that of the United States against us instead of reducing or raising it by this amount, one-half cent.

Mr. ROBB: I cannot agree with that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The minister says that he cannot agree with that. That is the reason why I was asking upon what principle they based the increase of one-half cent a pound. It is to enable the Australians and New Zealanders to have an advantage of three cents a pound in our market. While the minister has given the figures for last year he does not need to go very far back to find that some years seven or eight million pounds of Australian and New Zealand mutton were imported into Canada. It is true that not very much was imported last year until the Australian treaty went into effect.

Mr. DAVIS: What were the importations of mutton from Australia prior to March 31, 1926, and what have they been since the Australian treaty went into effect?

Mr. ROBB: During March, 1925, we imported from Australia 17,074 pounds of mutton. In March, 1926, after this treaty was in force, we imported 4,640 pounds.

Mr. DAVIS: Let me suggest that a much fairer comparison would be to give the imports for the year ended March 31, 1926, and for the first three months under the Australian treaty.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the minister will look at the return which he tabled to-day he will get some more light on the subject. It is only half an hour since the minister tabled a return on this point showing importations prior to March 31 of this year. The figures which he gave for last year do not correspond at all with the figures for the year ended March 31 last. In meats, including beef and beef products, for the year ended March 31 last there was a total importation of $6,313,-579 worth from the United States and $645,-040 worth from all other countries.

Mr. ROBB: The only item under consideration was fresh meats and that is what I was referring to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was quoting from the return in regard to meat and meat products.

Mr. ROBB: Meat products is not involved in this.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that and the House understands it. Going into details we find that of beef, fresh, chilled or frozen, there were imported from the United States 133,248 pounds of a value of $35,910 and from all other countries, $240 worth. Of mutton and lamb, fresh, chilled or frozen, we imported from the United States 1,072,134 pounds of a value of $229,361 and from all other countries—and this is where the great increase occurs—we imported 310,523 pounds.

Mr. ROBB: Included in that is some from Argentina.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The statement does not say whence it comes, but there is a marked increase in that item. Of pork, fresh, chilled or frozen, we imported from the United States 5,701,418 pounds of a value of $1,042,403. Practically all the importations of pork came from the United States. Hitherto, there has been against these importations a duty of three cents a pound. I suppose, following out its low tariff policy, this government would have maintained this duty of three cents a pound, but it was induced to change that by reason of a dicker with Australia and New Zealand, and the foundation of this part of the Australian treaty seems to be that we give Australia a clear preference of three cents a pound on beef, fresh, chilled or frozen, and on mutton and pork, in order to accommodate Australia which gives us nothing We now propose to increase the duty against the products of the United States by one-half cent a pound. The idea is not to give the farmers of this country any additional protection against the United States, although they will incidentally get an additional protection of one-half cent a pound, but to accommodate Australia. It is really to open the markets of the farmers of Canada to the people of Australia and not to afford any additional protection against goods coming from the United States.

What the hon. member for South Oxford asks is that our tariff on importations of these products from the United States be materially increased. The demand from this side of the House and from the farmers in Canada in general is that they be protected against importations of these goods from the United States. If the minister had listened to the arguments addressed to this House from time to time by the hon. member from South Oxford, he could realize only one thing, namely, that the hon. member for South Oxford, who is a farmer himself, made his demand plain and insistent and we on this side do the same. This additional duty of one-half cent a pound is of no value whatever; it will not check importations of United States beef, or mutton, or pork. If the minister will make a substantial increase in the duty against the United States he will satisfy part of the demand of the farmers of the country in this respect.

Mr. ROBB: I wish to put on Hansard now following a statement of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie)—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Put in the whole statement.

Mr. ROBB: I will put on Hansard the statement as it is in the printed copy of the Trade of Canada for the twelve months ended March 31 of the three years, 1924, 1925 and 1926, so that hon. gentlemen can make a comparison as to the movement of trade:

Country, United States

	Importations
	1924	1925	1926
	pounds	pounds	pounds
Beef, fresh, chilled or frozen	160,858	128,043	133,248

The importation from all other countries is only a bagatelle; it is not worth quoting.

Mutton, total importations	1,561,528	1,301,637	1,382,657

Now I will give the countries of origin:

Mutton

	1924	1925	1926
Country	pounds	pounds	pounds
United States	1,376,403	1,039,039	1,072,134
Australia	139,967	117,669	215,250

In other words, the reduction in imports from the United States has not been quite made up in imports from Australia. There is a difference of about 96,000.

Pork

Country	pounds	pounds	pounds
New Zealand	20,100	40,174	24,300
United States	2,039,955	7,860,831	5,701,418

Mr. DAVIS: I want to call the attention of the House, and especially of the minister, to an important fact. For a few years past the raising of sheep has been one industry in which the people of the western provinces have taken a great pride. There was a time years ago when Australian mutton was imported in such large quantities on the Pacific coast as almost completely to destroy the industry in the western provinces, and in order to revive and stimulate the raising of sheep the duty was increased so as to shut out that imported mutton. Under the tariff as proposed to-day, however, there is such a reduction as to encourage the revival of the Australian trade with the result that Australian mutton will flood the Canadian market. The minister has given us the imports during the past three years. While, in 1924, 139,000 pounds came into Canada and in 1925 and 1926, 117,000 and 215,000 pounds respectively, I would point out that according to a return which was brought down in the House and which I have in my hand there has been imported during the first six months in which the Australian treaty has been in force no less a quantity than 185,643 pounds of Australian mutton which has been sold on the Canadian market. I earnestly urge that something be done to maintain this great industry in western Canada. The west is better adapted to the raising of sheep than it is to any other branch of the live stock industry. What I predicted before has come to pass in western Canada, where we find to-day sheep being sold at from three to four dollars per head less than before this treaty came into effect. I am firmly of the opinion that if something is not done to offset the influence of that agreement this industry will be, if not ruined, at least seriously injured. In the interests of sheep raisers, not only in western Canada but throughout the Dominion, I therefore appeal to the minister to increase the tariff and so protect and build up the industry we now have.

Mr. TOLMIE: I endorse what the hon. member says concerning the precarious condition of the sheep industry in Canada to-day. Our showing in this industry has never at any time been flattering to Canadian farmers and to the Canadian people generally. We have in Canada two and three-quarter million sheep as compared with forty million in the United States and eighty million in Australia. Immediately after the war Australian mutton and lamb were shipped into the United States through the port of San Francisco, and Argentine mutton and lamb through the Atlantic ports, to such an extent as to create alarm in the American industry. It was feared that these importations would destroy the industry there and without any waste of time the United States authorities increased their tariff with the result that the importations have been very considerably reduced, the home market being preserved to the American producers. The situation is quite serious from our point of view. The Australian and New Zealand sheep growers can produce both mutton and lamb cheaper than we can, indeed, cheaper than any other country is able to produce these commodities, and this is due largely to their favourable climatic conditions and to the fact that they can raise their stock on grass the year round. And when you consider this grave fact, that in years of drought in Australia and New Zealand mutton and lamb fall in price owing to the tendency to rush them on the foreign market before they become affected, there is a very great danger of these products being dumped in very large quantities on the Canadian market. Taking all these facts into consideration, therefore, I certainly think we ought to protect our sheep industry by means of larger tariffs both on mutton and lamb and on wool. We ought to frame our tariff to suit our own needs and should manage the affairs of this country to the best of our ability for the benefit of the Canadian people instead of being quite so generous with other countries.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I wish to support most heartily the remarks of the hon. member for East Calgary as well as those of the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie). There is a large district given over to sheep raising in my part of the country, and the people engaged in the industry there are very much worried about the present tariff proposed by the minister. There is however another matter I want to emphasize particularly and in connection with which I would ask the minister a question. Does the minister know whether the attention of his colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has been drawn to the fact that the hog cholera prevailing, in western Ontario in particular, is attributed to the importation of American pork and that if that pork were kept out of the Canadian market there would be no fear of this disease in the various districts in which hogs are raised?

Mr. ROBB: That feature of the hog industry has not been called to my attention, but I suggest to the hon. member that when the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture are under consideration he might more properly discuss the subject. I am not disposed to be drawn into an argument on that question to-day. However, I shall direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the hon. gentleman's representations and ask him to be prepared to make a statement on the point. Regarding the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Davis), I think the hon. gentleman is somewhat astray. He said that the duty had been increased on mutton in order to encourage the sheep industry in Canada. I find that the duty on mutton has not been changed since 1906, notwithstanding that during a period of the time intervening my genial and good friend from Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Tolmie) was Minister of Agriculture and had ample opportunity as a member of the government to press his views on the tariff in relation to this matter. There has been no alteration in the tariff since 1906 until now, when we propose this slight change.

Mr. DAVIS: What was the duty prior to the change now proposed?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) intimated that we had made a change of two cents. As a matter of fact, the change is only half a cent on the general. The previous rates were: British preference, two cents; intermediate, two and a half cents; general three cents. All we propose to do now is to increase the general by half a cent.

Mr. CAHAN: But let us be fair and frank in a discussion of this kind.

Mr. ROBB: Are we not?

Mr. CAHAN: That is what I would like to ascertain. You are now charging one-half cent on importations from Australia.

Mr. ROBB: But that has not been changed; that Australian agreement has been approved of by this House.

Mr. CAHAN: I will grant that, and therefore let us be candid about it.

Mr. ROBB: The only thing before the House is the increase in the general tariff.

Mr. CAHAN: No, that is not all, if I may say so. It is true that when the Australian treaty was brought down the duty was decreased to one-half cent per pound on importations from Australia. But the essence of the Australian treaty was not that that duty should be retained at one-half cent on importations from Australia, but that this House in its discretion might impose any duty per pound on those importations, provided that it gave Australia a preference of three cents per pound over importations under the general tariff. Is that not right?

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: That is right; that is what I stated.

Mr. CAHAN: Therefore, the essence of my criticism is that you have provided for a preference in favour of Australia of three cents per pound, but, so far as the Canadian producer is concerned, with respect to Australia you have reduced the tariff from three cents per pound to one-half cent per pound.

Mr. ROBB: But that has been settled and approved by parliament already.

Mr. CAHAN: That has not been settled and approved by parliament if you please. It has been settled and approved by parliament that Australia shall have a preference of three cents per pound, but it has not been settled by parliament that the Australian duty shall remain at one-half cent per pound.

Mr. ROBB: Oh yes, it has; with all due respect to my hon. friend as a lawyer, that was settled in the agreement of June, 1925.

Mr. CAHAN: It was settled in that agreement, with the further proviso that the parliament of Canada might impose any duty per pound it pleased upon importations from Australia, provided that Australia had a preference under the general tariff.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is wrong again.

Mr. CAHAN: I read it so, and until my hon. friend convinces me to the contrary I am afraid I shall remain of that opinion. My suggestion is that the sheep industry of this country is one of our most important industries.

Mr. ROBB: We are agreed on that.

Mr. CAHAN: I remember in my native province of Nova Scotia when the sheep industry was the main reliance of a great many farmers. That industry, not only in Nova Scotia but in Quebec as well, which province my hon. friend and I represent, is simply fading away, while it could be made one of the best industries in the whole country. If you are bound to give Australia a preference, why not keep the two-cent duty against Australia and New Zealand, which would give some support to the industry in Canada, and raise the general tariff to five cents, if you see fit? I would rather see it at two and one-half cents against Australia and five and one-half cents under the general tariff. Let there be no misundertanding; this parliament, so far as its engagements with Australia go, is absolutely free to-day to make that change.

Mr. ROBB: I wish to correct that statement at once. My hon. friend, who is a good lawyer, will understand that we made a solemn agreement with Australia that they would be allowed in here under a tariff of one-half cent per pound. If we now jack it up to ten cents per pound can they put any mutton into this country? The trouble with my hon. friend's theory is that he wants to sell to all the world but does not want to buy anywhere. Yesterday it was agricultural implements; to-day it is mutton; to-morrow it will be automobiles, but in every case my hon. friend thinks he can always sell and never buy.

Mr. CAHAN: If I may be allowed to answer that statement, when this country gets back to economic common sense it will be the judgment of this parliament as well that we should not buy abroad, giving employment to foreign industries and foreign farmers and producers, those things which this country is better suited to produce than almost any other country in the world. Australia has exceptional advantages through years of experience in sheep raising on a large scale, but there is no reason why we should not have production of sheep in this country on a much larger scale than is the case at present.

Mr. ROBB: I will admit at once that we would have much more if some of the city and country dogs were muzzled. They are a greater menace to the sheep industry of eastern Canada than is the tariff.

Mr. CAHAN: If the dogs who sit on the government benches, not the farmers' dogs—

Mr. ROBB: I do not ask my hon. friend to withdraw that statement; the public will judge him by it.

Mr. JACOBS: I think the hon. gentleman really means the watch dogs.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not mean any unpleasant inference, but simply the watch dogs across the way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I asked the Minister of Finance to give us the principle upon which this reduction was based; aparently it is with a view to purchasing mutton from Australia. He has frankly admitted that if you put the tariff up it is going to shut out from this country the Australian products implying also that Canada is not capable of producing the mutton and lamb required for our own people. Surely no other inference can be taken from the minister's statement. Let me quote the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce of Australia when this matter first came before the Australian parliament on September 26, 1924. He refers to the fact that they are anxious to secure markets for their primary products, whereas Canada is anxious to secure a market for manufactured goods. He goes on to refer to the agreement which had been arrived at, and states:

> We can readily imagine that the concessions proposed by Canada on primary products,—

Proposed by the Canadian minister, not by Australia. We went there seeking to make a trade treaty with a country with whom we had a tremendous favourable balance of trade in our past dealings. The minister there went on to say:

> We can readily imagine that the concessions proposed by Canada on primary products, of which she is a large producer, will lead to criticism by representatives of Canadian primary producers on the ground that their interests are being sacrificed to Canada's need for markets for manufactured goods.

These so-called advocates of the common people, who are denouncing this party as friends of the big interests. Let me ask the minister whose interests were looked after by the government when they sacrificed the interests of those engaged in agriculture in this country in order to obtain this treaty. They made a similar treaty with New Zealand, a few days before the last general election, which has never been submitted to this parliament. Let me also remind the minister, when he says parliament put this law into effect, that many of those who voted in favour of that treaty are not to-day members of this House, having been defeated at the polls. This is a live question in this country to-day, and especially so when the government will not come into the open and let the people know where they stand and upon what grounds they base their interference with tariff stability. This continual interference, and tinkering, not knowing what the views of the government are, is a most disturbing factor in the country to-day; the people do not know what is going to be attempted next. With regard to the tariff board of which we have heard so much, the minister says, it is purely a board to investigate. After they investigate what are they going to do?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to the subject-matter under discussion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The minister having dealt with the matter, I assumed that I would be permitted to refer to his remarks. I ask, upon what grounds does the minister base the fixing of this item in the tariff? In other countries they have tariff commissions. For instance, in the United States a short time ago the tariff commission took steps to ascertain the cost of production of butter in Denmark. They reported to the United States government that it was produced there for 12 cents a pound less than it cost to produce similar butter in the United States. Thereupon the president put the tariff up 12 cents a pound, or an increase of 50 per cent. The same thing happened with regard to wheat. The commission reported to their government that wheat could be produced in Canada for 42 cents a bushel less than it could be produced in the United States on account of the lower cost of land and the greater yield per acre in Canada. At once the duty against Canadian wheat was raised 42 cents a bushel.

Now, the minister would surely be well advised to ascertain the cost of producing meats in Australia, New Zealand, United States and in the Dominion. Does he contend that it is not possible to produce mutton and lamb in this country in sufficient quantities to supply the home demand? Is this country not producing all that is required along that line? If the minister takes that ground, I suppose it is some justification for his action, because while our friends opposite advocate free trade in relation to many things that can be and are produced in this country, yet they are strong protectionists when it comes to certain commodities that we do not produce. By way of illustration, let me point out that the tariff on tea is ten cents a pound. Does the minister think he is going to grow tea in this country? Here, however, is an item which we can produce in abundance and have a surplus for export. But there is always the danger of a tremendous importation of this commodity, just as happened this year in regard to butter. In that instance it will be remembered the government had to step in and apply the dumping clause because eight million pounds had been imported during the last few months. Their action, I contend, is absolutely unsound and not based on the principles underlying the dumping clause in the tariff. These are some of the anomalies in regard to our tariff, and I think the minister would be well advised to ascertain the cost of production of meat and meat products in this country as compared with the cost in the United States and other countries.

Let me point out, Mr. Chairman, that in other countries they do not call a tariff item "protection." My friends to the left rather imagine that every item in a tariff constitutes a certain degree of protection. The United States tariff commission refer to it as follows: For example, the existing duty on a particular commodity does not equalize, as between the foreign and domestic manufacturer, the production costs ascertained as provided in the statute. It is the function of the commission to make investigations to assist the president to find a rate which will tend to correct the inequality. Now, if those commodities can be produced in another country cheaper than in this country, is not that a sound argument for affording a corresponding degree of protection, particularly on an item such as this? Meats and meat products are things that this country can produce in abundance, but the government is doing nothing to encourage those engaged in raising live stock; in fact, it is not making the slightest attempt to redeem the promises contained in the Speech from the Throne to induce farmers to remain on the land and also to persuade those who have had training in agriculture but are now living in urban centres to go back to the land. Does the minister think he is carrying out those promises by removing the small degree of protection our farmers have?

There is a scheme on foot to give the farmers in this country what is termed rural credits. They are not asking for rural credits. They are asking the government for some reasonable degree of protection. Let the government give them a fair chance. Do not allow the surplus products of another country, products which can be produced cheaper than in Canada, come in here and deprive our farmers of their home market. The minister states: Why, we are doing this for some reason. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce in Australia has given us the reason in specific terms: This government has sacrificed our agricultural interests in order to obtain a market for our pulp and paper people. That was the big consideration which impelled the government to move in this direction. If the minister is well advised he will change the item in the general tariff from three and one-half cents to five cents a pound. I am satisfied that this will be a stroke in the right direction and will result in greater benefit to this country than anything the government has attempted since it came into office.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to allow the minister to set aside the statement which I have made in regard to the development of hog cholera in this country being largely due to the importation of pork from the United States by saying that he and the Minister of Agriculture will talk this matter over before finally disposing of it. It is a matter for the Minister of Finance to take into consideration at this time when he is dealing with the tariff. He can raise the general tariff and shut out pork from the United States; or if not he can do just exactly what the United States would do under similar circumstances, he can place an embargo against that pork. I would ask the minister again if that was a fair statement for him to make, that by merely consulting with the Minister of Agriculture the matter would be considered. Why is it not possible for him to consider it now and deal with it either by raising the general tariff against pork and pork products from the United States or placing an embargo against their importation? If those products from the States are responsible for the hog cholera that has developed in different parts of this country, especially in my district, then either of the remedies I have suggested should be applied at once.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, when I became a member of parliament in 1908 one of the first members I met was my hon. friend from East Lambton, who has been in this House as long as I have with the exception of the few years when we missed his genial countenance ,and he knows as well as I know that we have statutory authority to place an embargo against the importation of animals if it is found that they are suffering from any contagious disease. As a matter of fact the Department of Agriculture does apply this remedy occasionally. Now, if my hon. friend can establish to the satisfaction of the Minister of Agriculture that there is hog cholera prevailing anywhere in any of the states whence we are importing hogs, the minister of that department will be the first to stop the importation.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Would the minister allow me to answer him now? At the first meeting of the agricultural committee the Deputy Minister of Agriculture gave an address, in the course of which he referred to the importation of pork from the United States, and he said in my presence and in the presence of other members of that committee that this importation was responsible for the hog cholera that had developed in this country. I would think that sufficient justification for the Minister of Agriculture to apply the embargo right away.

Mr. VALLANCE: With respect to what the hon. gentleman has just stated, may I say that the deputy minister was asked if it was possible for hog cholera to find entrance through the importation of dead meat. His reply was that it was quite possible, just as every farmer knows that it is.

Mr. DAVIS: As a member of the Sheepbreeders' Association of the province of Alberta, and being a sheepbreeder myself, I fully appreciate the importance of this industry. I want to impress upon the government that if the sheepbreeding industry is to be maintained in this country as it should be the Canadian duty on Australian and New Zealand mutton will have to be changed. If the government want to destroy that industry all they have to do is to leave the duty where it is. Let me say in that connection that the people of Canada through their respective governments have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in developing the industry to its present stage. In every province the government have been spending money year after year buying the very best of stock and distributing it among the farmers with that object in view. I know of cases where the owners of herds of sheep—

Mr. ROBB: Flocks.

Mr. DAVIS: Flocks or herds—have lost a considerable sum of money since the adoption of the Australian treaty. Furthermore, I am positive it is going to have the effect of driving quite a number of the men engaged in this industry out of the business. I venture the statement that we should conserve the Canadian market for everything we can produce. Our object should be to stimulate to the greatest extent possible every Canadian industry. In the interests of this particular industry I urge the minister to reconsider his decision in this matter.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I wish to say a few words in support of the view expressed by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Davis). I am one of those who believe in the idea that we should protect our own people; that so far as possible we should produce or grow at home everything we need for our own use; and if any class in the community is entitled to protection it is the Canadian farmer.

I have listened to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and the minister discussing the question of the Australian rate of duty and the effect an increase in the general tariff would have upon the Australian treaty. I must say that I am not very conversant with that subject, but my feeling would be that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is right in his view. I would remind the Minister of Finance of the point raised by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) that if the raising of the general tariff to five cents is not going to affect the rate under the Australian treaty he can have no objection to the increase. I think the general tariff should be increased to five cents a pound, and I ask the minister to agree to that course.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I presume the minister has arrived at the 3½ cent rate under the general tariff in order to give a preference of three cents per pound to Australia and New Zealand under the treaty that was entered into with those dominions. But is he aware that while he taxes lamb, we will say, at 3½ cents a pound the United States tariff on our lamb going into that country is four cents? It seems to me the minister should have regarded that as one reason why our tariff should be raised to some extent, at least, as against the United States; and I see no reason why, even though we have an agreement with Australia and New Zealand for a rate of half a cent a pound in their case, the general tariff should not be increased from the 3½ cents proposed here. Surely there would be some semblance of logic and reason in the minister's conduct if he did that. Manifestly he is giving Australia and New Zealand a preference of three cents a pound under the agreement entered into, and then he proposes that the general tariff against all other countries should be 3½ cents a pound. Well, I suggest to him that the general tariff as against the United States should be raised to a figure as high as their tariff against us. I am supported in making that appeal to the minister by the trade figures not simply applicable to one year but covering a period of years. For instance, if you take the five years, from 1920 to 1924 inclusive, you find that we imported from the United States in that period 274,354,713 pounds of meat, of a value of $55,442,000. Our exports of meats to the United States in the same period only amounted to $29,331,000. I cannot get away from the idea that inasmuch as our total exports for those five years amounted to $221,000,000—we were sending meats to all parts of the world—the reason we did not export a greater quantity to the United States was because their tariff shut out importations from Canada to a certain extent. On the other hand the reason why the United States supplied us with such large quantities was because our tariff made it possible for them to do so. In the same period we imported from Australia and New Zealand nearly 10,000,000 pounds of meat. Our tariff was very favourable to these two dominions, being very much lower than their tariff against us. Now, how much meat did we send to Australia and New Zealand during those years? In all only $25 worth. It is no further from Canada to Australia than it is from Australia to Canada. Australia has a surplus of meats and we have a surplus also. They are looking for markets for their surplus and so are we. But Australia says to the world through its tariff: We do not want your meats, we do not want your butter. We are producing more of those commodities than we know what to do with, and we propose to keep your butter and your meat out of our country in order that our people shall consume our own products. On the other hand we turn round to them and say: While you debar us from marketing our surplus in your country we throw our doors open and invite you to come in here.

There is another matter in connection with the question of meats to which I wish to draw attention. Something has already been said about the importance of protecting the sheep industry. There is this further fact that should be noted: We permit wool to come into this country free. But if we have any wool to export and want to send it to the United States they charge us a duty going as high as 42 cents a pound. I think it is utterly impossible to give any encouragement to the sheep industry in Canada if we not only expose the raisers of sheep in this country to the importation of the surplus production of mutton and lamb from Australia and New Zealand, but also expose them to the free importation of wool. That is not a fair deal. We have only about two and three-quarter million head of sheep and lambs in Canada and there are certain climatic conditions which militate against us in competing with countries like Australia and New Zealand where the sheep and lambs number 104,000,000. Australia and New Zealand are the greatest meat exporting countries in the world; they have advantages in the production of meat which we have not in Canada. I say to the minister this afternoon what I have said repeatedly in this House: However much people may theorize along free trade lines, we cannot and should not get away from the practical, and we cannot and should not shut our eyes to the fact that we have a winter in Canada which puts our farmers at a disadvantage in competing with countries such as Australia, New Zealand, Argentine and the Southern States. In regard to the sheep industry, you have only to travel over Canada to be impressed with this, no matter where you go. The province of Nova Scotia, parts of Ontario and Quebec, and certainly parts of the west, particularly Alberta, are specially adapted for the production of first class sheep, and if encouraged as they should be encouraged, I believe that industry will grow. I appeal to the minister in this regard, and I say that his tariff is illogical from the standpoint of looking after our own, in giving Australia and New Zealand a preference of three cents per pound. It is also illogical, though not to the same extent, in giving United States a preference of half a cent a pound on meat. If he will tell me any reason on earth why we should allow lamb to come into this country from the United States under a tariff of half a cent less than they charge us I should like to hear it. It does not occur to me what the reason can be. It seems to be illogical and unfair, and I think that it can only have one effect on this industry, and that is to drive it out of existence altogether.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I did not point out when I was on my feet before that the American tariff is 20 per cent against our meat exports going into that country, and if the suggestion I made were put into effect, namely a tariff increase to five cents a pound, even though it applied to the trade treaties with New Zealand and Australia, it would still leave the tariff as low as two cents a pound on mutton and lamb coming in from those countries, which is altogether too low and unfair. When I said five cents a pound I did not feel that that was as high as the tariff should be in that respect, because there is no lack of facilities in this country for producing everything that is required along that line. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Davis):

That the tariff item number 7 in the general tariff be amended by striking out the figure 3½ cents and inserting in lieu thereof the figure 5 cents.

Mr. ROBB: I direct your attention to what I am sure you already know, and what surely my genial friend the former Minister of Finance knows, that the amendment is out of order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On what ground?

Mr. ROBB: It increases taxation. However I am in the judgment of the committee.

Mr. MANION: Speaking to the point of order, I submit it is not necessarily an increase of taxation at all. You may raise the tariff, and you may not import the pork, and if there is no importation, there is no taxation whatever. Therefore I submit it is not necessarily an increase of taxation at all. If the amendment is not out of order on some other ground than that, then it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN: Sir Thomas Erskine May, at page 462, says:

The principle that the sanction of the crown must be given to every grant of money drawn from the public revenue, applies equally to the taxation levied to provide that revenue. No motion can therefore be made to impose a tax, save by a minister of the crown, unless such tax be in substitution, by way of equivalent, for taxation at that moment submitted to the consideration of parliament; nor can the amount of tax proposed on behalf of the crown be augmented, nor any alteration made in the area of imposition. In like manner, no increase can be considered either of an existing, or of a new or temporary tax for the service of the year, except on the initiative of a minister, acting on behalf of the crown.

Then again May, at page 463, says:

So long as an existing tax is not increased, any modification of the proposed reduction may be introduced in the committee on the bill, and is regarded as a question, not for increasing the charge upon the people, but for determining to what extent such charge shall be reduced.

I therefore have to rule the amendment is out of order.

Mr. ROBB: Now that we have got back to order again, may I just place on record the facts about the sheep industry of Canada and the injury to trade by importations. For the year 1926 we exported of mutton $593,475, and we imported $269,145; or in other words we exported almost double the quantity we imported. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has referred to the duty imposed by the United States. He will be interested to know that out of our total exports of $593,475, $523,130 was exported to the United States.

Mr. TOLMIE: With regard to the matter of importation of pork, I may say that it is generally accepted that hog cholera can be conveyed to other animals by the fresh, or even cured meat, of an infected hog. We have provided against that disease in Canada by quarantining live hogs for a period of about two months at the boundary line, making it impossible to import hogs for slaughter under those conditions, on account of the heavy cost of the quarantine. We have also recognized that fact in our garbage feeding regulations of the Department of Agriculture, whereby garbage feeders are compelled to cook all garbage very thoroughly before feeding, and we have other regulations in connection therewith.

With regard to the minister's remark concerning the period in which I was Minister of Agriculture, and my failure at that time to impose a tariff on American mutton or sheep, or to increase that tariff, let me say that I went into office late in 1919, and I went out after the earthquake in December 6, 1921. The hon. minister will no doubt remember that during that period the American government were considering the increasing of their tariff on agricultural products, and at that time it would have been in my opinion very injudicious indeed for us to aggravate the situation by making any suggestion for an increased tariff on this side. I would like to point out to the minister that they have occupied the treasury benches since December, 1921, up to the present moment, and have done nothing in the way of giving the farmers and producers on the land of this country any increased protection.

Mr. ROBB: Now when we are trying to give them that protection you stop us.

Mr. TOLMIE: You now propose to take off the protection against the greatest sheep and lamb producing countries in the world, and put it on as against the United States.

Mr. CAHAN: I have before me now chapter 30 of the statutes of Canada of 1925 giving the provisions in relation to the British preferential tariff concessions made by Australia to Canada and vice versa. It is true that in the schedule under tariff item 7, meats fresh n.o.p., the tariff rate is one-half cent a pound, but in the act of ratification and in the treaty itself it is provided as follows:

> Provided that the proportionate difference between the rates set out opposite the items above enumerated in this schedule and the general tariff rates under the said items respectively shall at no time be less than it is at the time when the said above-mentioned rates come into force.

Under that provision it is very clear that this parliament, within the rights reserved under the treaty with Australia, can raise the tariff on importations on fresh meats from that country to any rate per pound this parliament may in its discretion deem advisable, provided that the general tariff rate is raised proportionately or to exactly the same extent.

Mr. FORKE: We suffer from several disadvantages at this end of the chamber. We do not as a rule hear what is going on; we miss many of the speeches, and we have great difficulty in catching the eye of the chairman. I am sure I have several times risen ahead of any other member, but I have failed to catch the chairman's eye. We have however to put up with those little disadvantages. It has been suggested that we have another chairman at this end of the chamber. So much has been said regarding the deplorable condition in which the sheep industry finds itself at present that I feel I must say a few words on the matter. I am not wholly a wheat farmer; I raise both cattle and sheep. There is no part of the industrial life of the farm that is at the present time so profitable as sheep raising and I am going to give the House the exact figures as to the price I received for my lambs last year. I sold the lambs from their mothers, without their getting any other feed than they got from their mothers, and the grass they got, at $10.50 apiece. That means $21 from one ewe. The ewe got nothing but some straw and hay, costing almost a trifle, to bring her through the winter, and in the spring a little grain and the roughage she could pick up in the yard. Under such circumstances when you get $21 from one ewe in addition to the value of her fleece, I do not know of any other agricultural pursuit in the Dominion that pays as well as sheep raising. There are in connection with sheep raising some disadvantages to which I want my friends to the right to pay attention. One great disadvantage at present is the price of fencing, because there is a duty of 30 per cent on woven wire. I want the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) who is so anxious to help the sheep-raising industry to get woven wire fencing down to the lowest possible price.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Did the removal of the duty lower the cost of barbed wire? Did it not raise the price?

Mr. FORKE: We will take a chance in any case. In regard to wolves, all the wolves in Canada are not after the sheep. There is no doubt this is a serious drawback on the prairies in connection with sheep-raising and woven wire fencing with a mesh too small for wolves to get through would be of advantage so that sheep raisers would be greatly assisted if the price of wire fencing were reduced. On everything you sell the cost of production has a great deal to do with the profits likely to be made. As regards agriculture, our complaint is that everything we buy is too dear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the duty on wire fencing?

Mr. FORKE: I cannot say exactly. I think it is about 30 per cent. Some of my hon. friends would expect me to be a walking encyclopedia when I begin to speak, but I am not that. As farmers we have always claimed that we are able to compete with our products in the markets of the world and we are not complaining so much about the products regarding which my hon. friends are asking this afternoon. Anyone who has studied agricultural conditions knows that all the agricultural importations into Canada will not make much difference. President

Coolidge said the other day that within the lifetime of his hearers the United States would be the greatest agricultural importing country in the world. The United States does not balance its budget to-day on agriculture; it is importing instead of exporting so far as the balance is concerned. I know of course it exports meats, wheat and cotton, but the day is approaching very fast when those exportations will cease and that will be Canada's day. The Canadian agriculturist can compete with the farmer anywhere else in the world if he has a fair chance and is able to produce at the cost at which he ought to be able to produce. I want to tell my hon. friends that when they talk of benefiting agriculture they begin at the wrong end. I notice a tremendous difference between this parliament and the last one in this regard. In the last parliament the whole stress was on industry, but in this parliament there is a new move. The board of strategy must have been at work again and the whole idea to-day is to teach the farmer that he can be benefited by protection. I hope he will never fall for that.

Mr. MANION: I have listened to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) and he is hardly fair when he makes any such statement as he made when he sat down, namely, that in the last parliament we were not interested in farming; that we were interested only in what he called industry. In the first place all people in this country admit that farming is the greatest industry of all; but even laying that aside, our whole attitude has been since I have been in this House—and I have been here for some ten years—to protect all classes of producers in Canada. This has not been any move of the so-called board of strategy—and I do not know where that name came from—but it is a move on the part of the Conservative party, in consistently living up to the policy of protection, to endeavour to build up all the different industries, the farming industry, the manufacturing industry and the industry of the labouring people of this country by a consistent policy of protection. Among his last words he quoted something from President Coolidge. I would suggest that he quote what Mr. Coolidge said a short time ago when he declared that the duty on butter should be increased from eight cents to twelve cents—while our duty against American butter was only four cents. Why did President Coolidge make that statement? Simply because the farmers of the United States had asked him for protection against Canadian butter going into that country. When therefore the hon. gentleman undertakes to quote President Coolidge he ought to quote him in full.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are inclined to charge us with playing politics when we speak in the interests of the Canadian farmer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear": evidently they judge us by themselves. I do not know how many farmers there are in this section of the House, and indeed I shall take the trouble some day to count them up. But I can say without the slightest hesitation that there are a large number of farmers in this party, gentlemen who have made a success of agriculture, who are just as vitally interested in the welfare of agriculture in Canada as are other hon. gentlemen who presume to speak on behalf of the farmers of Canada. Any man with ordinary intelligence—and I hope we are all intelligent enough to understand the facts—must believe that the good of the farmers is the good of Canada. We believe in protecting the farmers, whether they be sheep growers or any other class.

Now to come to the item under discussion. I have not taken the trouble to retain in my mind the figures which I have seen myself, but I am informed that Canada has probably the smallest number of sheep of any agricultural country in the world. Someone says that Australia, for example, has at least forty times the number of sheep we raise in Canada; and more than that, the number here is steadily going down. I am not going to argue with the minister the necessity for increasing our duty on mutton and lamb coming into Canada from Australia, because apparently he has made up his mind that there shall be no changes in this regard, and no doubt he has enough support to carry out his intention. I will, however, argue this point with him. When the Australian treaty was first discussed the basis upon which it was considered was the desire of Australia for higher duties on nearly every commodity which she might ship into Canada when those commodities come from other countries; and it was only after extended negotiations between the present minister (Mr. Robb) and the Australian government that it was decided to concede these low duties to the United States and other countries on many of the products which the Australian producers are exporting to this country. In short, they aimed at an increase to other countries in the duties on goods they wanted to sell to Canada, and it is obvious that Australia would be only too glad to have our duty on mutton and lamb increased to other countries so long as it was reduced to Australian sheep raisers. I submit to the minister, therefore, that so far as this item is concerned he will only be carrying out his treaty agreement with Australia by shutting out a large proportion of mutton coming from the United States by imposing a protective tariff against that country. Such a duty against the United States would serve the double purpose of fulfilling the treaty with Australia—indeed, it would enhance the value of the treaty to that country—and, to some extent, of assisting the Canadian sheep industry in so far as it would protect our producers against the United States. What harm an increase in duty against United States producers could do to the raisers of sheep in Canada is something that passes my comprehension. It certainly could do nothing but improve the position of the industry in Canada. No matter what the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) may think of protection in general, I do not think he should have any objection whatever to the sheep growers, himself included, making a greater profit out of the industry by securing the home market.

Mr. FORKE: The United States farmer has been deceived in the belief that protection would do something for him and I do not want the farmers in Canada to be deceived in the same way.

Mr. MANION: I do not want to be in any way offensive to my hon. friend, but it seems to me that the hon. gentleman has the idea that the only farmers who have any intelligent grasp of fiscal matters come from Brandon and vicinity. I fancy that the farmers of the United States are sufficiently intelligent to understand their own interests, and they have consistently demanded of the United States President, and received from him, an increase in the tariff on agricultural products going into the United States from Canada.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member knows very well that agriculture in the United States, especially in the northwest, is in a deplorable condition, and that the farmers are asking the government to take care of their surplus products.

Mr. MANION: That only adds force to what I say: they want the United States government to protect them in every way. If the hon. member will look up the figures he will find that since the Fordney tariff went into force the exports from Canada to the United States in respect of a large number of agricultural products have declined many-fold. Now, for the life of me I cannot understand the attitude of any farmer in Canada who feels that we should treat the American farmer or, for that matter, any producer in the United States, with any greater degree of consideration than they are prepared to show us. I think we should improve the sheep industry of this country in every possible way, and one means of doing so would be an increase in the duty on mutton and lamb coming from the United States, even if we leave the duty on imports coming from Australia at the figure which the minister proposes.

The argument is frequently put forward that unless you sell you cannot buy; there must be freedom of trade. How is it that some of the most highly protected countries in the world, such as Germany before the war, the United States to-day and France, if you will, keep on trading with other nations on such a large scale in face of the high protection they maintain? They keep on trading because they buy such lines of goods as they do not themselves produce, and export such goods as are not protected or produced in other countries. Trade is always going on between countries, and the fact that we may protect the sheep industry in this country is not going to stop our trading with the rest of the world.

An hon. MEMBER: Is my hon. friend aware that our foreign trade per capita is three times that of the United States?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that that has anything to do with the question, inasmuch as what is of importance to any country is not the foreign trade but internal business, the ability of the people to buy and sell among themselves and to provide work and wages for their workers rather than force them to go to highly protected countries to seek a living.

The CHAIRMAN: Several hon. gentlemen are rising in their places evidently to ask questions of the hon. member who has the floor. I must point out that if the work of the committee is to proceed we cannot have a second budget debate. Hon. gentlemen must allow the member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) to continue uninterruptedly.

Mr. MANION: I am nearly through anyway, Mr. Chairman. I saw many of my good friends from Saskatchewan, whose views are supposedly the quintessence of all that is in the interests of the farmers, waiting for an opportunity to differ from me. Let me make one more appeal to them; it is this. Let us treat the United States, in relation to all branches of industry, including the raising of sheep and the production of mutton, lamb and wool, in the only way in which one self-respecting people should treat another. Let us adopt the honourable and the proud principle of doing unto them as they do unto us, and we shall secure their respect. The only principle on which we shall ever be able to transact business with them to our own satisfaction is to deal with them in a strictly businesslike way.

Mr. ROBB: I am very glad, Mr. Chairman, that you directed our attention to the fact that this is not a second budget debate, nor is the Australian treaty under consideration. I think I have sinned as much as anyone else in that regard. As I explained, this increase in the general tariff is to meet the agreement with Australia providing for a three-cent preference, but there is no lowering or changing of the Australian treaty. They say a woman has the right to change her mind occasionally and perhaps a member of parliament also has that right. The hon. member who has just taken his seat was not opposed to the Australian agreement last year, and all we are asking now is to carry out this agreement. I recall that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) was one of those who came to my room urging that this Australian treaty be proceeded with. Let me tell my hon. friend, as well as other hon. gentlemen who have criticized this Australian agreement, that they may not criticize it very long if they continue to pursue their present tactics. Australia will settle that, and Australia may settle it very quickly. Some of the gentlemen who came canvassing me to put this agreement through will have to take the responsibility if Australia cancels an agreement which has been very profitable to this country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Would the minister inform us in what way it has been profitable to Canada? Has not the favourable balance of trade decreased?

Mr. ROBB: We have increased our trade enormously, and the farmers who supply the foodstuffs for the men working in the paper mills, and those men as well, all receive additional benefits. The hon. member for Fort William not only urged me to put this treaty through when there was some doubt whether it would be proceeded with, but he was one of those who loyally stood up and voted for it. To-day he attempts to delay the passing of an item which is designed to carry out that agreement.

Mr. MANION: I ask the privilege of replying for a moment or two. The minister has implied that I was inconsistent this afternoon in relation to what I said last year. I do not think I have shown any inconsistency; no man either in or out of this House ever heard me attack the Australian treaty, in which attitude I am at some difference with hon. members around me. But I would like my hon. friend to be fair; I said this afternoon that he could do something to enhance the value of this treaty to the Australian people by raising the duty on sheep and mutton coming from the United States. I do not criticize anything he said about my having been one of those who asked him to put this treaty through. As a matter of fact I gave my reasons for so doing last year; if I had Hansard I could read my own words, but I said that I thought the Australian treaty was in some ways bad for the farmers of this country. At the same time, since northern Ontario was a large producer of pulp and paper; since I represent a constituency in that part of the province, and since the pulp and paper interests were deriving some benefit from this treaty, I must take the lesser of the two evils. But it will also appear in Hansard that I said then that if we got back into power, as I thought we were going to after the last election—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: We did virtually get into power, although we do not now have the reins of power. My good friend the Minister of Finance and his confreres are too fond of power to give it up so long as they can get a group of any kind to support them. I want to point out that in making that statement last year I said that the first thing I would advocate if we got into power would be a general, all round increase of the tariff on agricultural products from every other country of the world. So I was absolutely consistent, and if the Minister of Finance thinks he is frightening me at all by threatening that Australia will cancel the treaty, he has another thought coming to him. I am not so easily frightened as all that; it is up to the people of Australia. My argument is that we can enhance the value of this treaty to the Australian people and improve conditions in this country as well by treating other countries as they have treated us.

Mr. McGIBBON: I only rise because of the remarks of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). I would like to tell him that there were men in this House advocating the cause of the farmers and workmen of this country long before he had a seat here, and I was among them. There will be those advocating this cause long after he is out of this House as well. I might say, too, that I represent a constituency which had two representatives supporting the party to my left and the party opposite during the last election; neither of them came back.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot allow the hon. gentleman to get away from the item under discussion. I allowed a great deal of latitude, especially to the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Fort William, but I cannot allow it to go further.

Mr. McGIBBON: Very well, Mr. Chairman; I gladly acquiesce in your ruling. I started to say that I represent the farmers of a large constituency who want protection on sheep, on wool, on beef of all kinds, and in fact on everything produced by the farmer. The hon. member for Brandon said that the sheep raising industry is one of the most profitable on the farm. If that is his judgment it is not the judgment of the great body of farmers of this country. In support of that statement all I have to say is that there are less sheep in Canada to-day than there were thirty years ago, and that the proportion of sheep in this country as compared with other countries is very small. I might also tell the hon. member that of the seventy million pounds of wool used in this country, only fifteen million pounds is produced here. If this is such a profitable undertaking as he would lead us to believe, why does this condition of affairs exist? I would also point out to him and to the Minister of Finance that the actions of this government, especially in the French treaty, have hurt the sheep industry very much. I simply point out that the importation of woollen goods has increased 500 per cent since that treaty was made. Now we have this government practically slaughtering the protection on fresh meat.

I am not a lawyer, but I have a great deal of respect for the opinions of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) who sits in front of me. This House is bound by the Australian treaty until notice of cancellation is given, and we must keep the agreement. If Australia sees fit to break it, I think it would be a godsend to Canada. I am not one who advocates the giving of preferences to a few manufacturers of pulp and paper—who, by the way, are not Canadian citizens, if I am correctly informed—as against the interests of our farmers. I would recommend to the minister that he adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and raise the duty to five cents per pound, which will give Australia the preference we are bound to give and at the same time provide additional protection to this great industry in Canada. It must be protected, Mr. Chairman, if it is to succeed. There is not enough protection given to it to-day to enable it to continue and thrive. As representing what is largely an agricultural constituency in this province, I am here to voice the requirements of the people in the way of more protection not only for live stock but for everything they grow. I hope the minister will act upon that suggestion.

Mr. FOSTER: Mr. Chairman, when any subject is raised in this House which has for its object the protection of our farmers, I am always ready to support it. In the part of the country from which I come we are not able to produce meats, simply because of competition from other sources, largely from the United States. In fact, in the county of Hants-Kings it is not an uncommon thing to find United States butter, eggs and meats served in the very heart of an agricultural country. I notice my hon. friend from Yarmouth is listening to that, and I hope he will take it into consideration, because he can go into practically any store in that section of the country and find those commodities on sale. In the province of Nova Scotia we are trying to build up a meat-producing industry. There is not any question but that we can produce live stock in Nova Scotia to ship to the Old Country in competition with any other part of Canada. True, it can be raised cheaper in the western provinces, but the difference in freight rates gives us almost an even break.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. FOSTER: I will come to that in a moment, Mr. Chairman. All these things arise out of what we are discussing here. My hon. friend from Brandon deviated slightly from the subject matter a moment ago to tell us that the farmers of the northwestern states were in such a precarious condition that they were asking congress to pass a bill to increase the price of their surplus products. Since 1921 the farmers in those states have been enjoying such enviable prosperity that it has been practically impossible for our twenty-one government agents in the United States to bring any of them over to Canada. If their condition is not somewhat better than the condition of our farmers, why do they not come across the line?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is because they have not money enough to move.

Mr. FOSTER: The minister gets his information second or third hand, and I happen to have mine first hand.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He gets his information from the government agents.

Mr. FOSTER: Quite so; I appreciate that the government agents give him his information. I know them very well, I know the territory in which they work, and I know the conditions under which they work, but the minister himself does not know.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh, yes, he does. He has visited those localities.

Mr. FOSTER: Has he been down there? He made one trip to Chicago.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. FOSTER: I cannot quite hear what hon. gentlemen opposite are saying, but if they have any idea that I am going to get excited and lose my temper they are very much mistaken. I was merely pointing out that the hon. minister went to Chicago once and met the Canadian government agents there. So far as I know, he has never been out in the territory with any one of those agents and interviewed any American farmers. Therefore when I say he has not first hand information, I am merely pointing out what is the fact. I agree with him that in many cases those farmers have not sufficient money to move, but many of them have. But let me go a step further and make the point I was endeavouring to make in reply to the hon. member for Brandon. Through the northwestern states there are farms which in 1921 and 1922 had fallen from $600 an acre down to $250, but they have come back to $350 and $400 an acre, and the firm of Wood Brothers in Lincoln, Nebraska, made over $7,000,000 on farm lands in two states alone that had risen in value as a result of improved farming conditions. Those are the facts. It is true that the farmers of the United States were helped by their government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I ask that the speeches in this debate be limited to the item under discussion.

Mr. FOSTER: I know, Mr. Chairman, that we always have points of order raised when we endeavour to answer any of the statements made by hon. gentlemen to the left in regard to the farmers of the United States. My hon. friend from Brandon wandered over this territory himself, and he was allowed to proceed. I merely want to point out to him that agriculture was assisted in that highly protected country to the extent of $50,000,000 from government sources and over $50,000,000 from private sources, that the sheep and other live stock industries throughout the northwestern states were taken care of by the government of that highly protected country, and that as a result those farmers "came back." This government had the same opportunity to do something for the farmers of Canada if the ordinary methods of protection did not apply. Let me come to another point in regard to Australia. I—

The CHAIRMAN: I did allow some latitude to three or four members but it was my mistake, and I certainly cannot allow any further departure from the item under discussion.

Mr. FOSTER: I want to say a word or two in regard to the tariff.

Mr. WARD: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the statistics of the United States go to show that in that highly protected country ten million people have left the farms within the last ten years?

The CHAIRMAN: Are we going back to a second budget debate? I say no. I must ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the particular item under discussion.

Mr. FOSTER: Mr. Chairman, it will take me only a minute to—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I say there is not going to be any further irrelevant discussion.

Mr. FOSTER: I am awfully sorry that I cannot reply to my hon. friend.

The CHAIRMAN: I rule the discussion is out of order.

Mr. FOSTER: Then, Sir, I shall proceed with the item of tariff. On this item I think it is competent for us to point out that in Australia they have a protective policy, and the basis of that policy is to protect everything that can be manufactured in Australia, and to buy everything else in Great Britain. Those are the facts as taken from the official records of the Commonwealth. Now, if we in this House are endeavouring not only to protect ourselves by the tariff against the United States but at the same time are trying to do something to help Australia and protect ourselves, I am for that protection. I apprehend that that is what this item is intended to do. I regret that under the ruling of the chairman I cannot go further into the subject. I appreciate his good nature. But there are some facts with regard to the wheat business of Australia and United States which hon. gentlemen to my left do not seem to have grasped, although I admit they have studied the statistics very carefully, and perhaps on the next item we may have a chance to discuss those facts.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No, Mr. Chairman. A short time ago I asked a question of the Minister of Finance in regard to this item. Perhaps he did not intend to evade the question, but he certainly did not answer it. He gave me some figures in regard to our exports of meat and said that a certain amount went to the United States. But I asked the hon. minister to give me some reason, if he could, why our general tariff should not be raised against the United States or any other country, with the exception of Australia and New Zealand. That is the question which he did not see fit to answer. I endeavoured, Mr. Chairman, to point out the reason why I thought that item should be increased as against the United States, and I gave figures, which the minister will not dispute that so far as meats are concerned—since this is what we are dealing with—in estimating what tariff we should have against the United States, if we consider our imports from and our exports to that country, it shows that they are sending us two or three times as much as we are sending them. That does seem to me to be a good reason why the general tariff of 3½ cents should be raised. I do not suppose that Australia or New Zealand will object to a greater preference than three cents per pound. They are entitled under the agreement with Canada to a preference of three cents and it it not likely they would object to an increase in that amount. I would ask the minister again to give me some reason why, in view of our imports from and our exports to the United States, our general tariff on meats should be lower against that country than their tariff is against us. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, you have ruled quite properly that it is not competent for any private member to propose an increase in a tariff item; any such proposition must come from a minister of the crown. But I think I can point to instances where a member, other than a member of the government, has moved to reduce an item in the tariff. I think it is within the privilege of any member of this House to move to reduce a tariff item. I call that fact, if I may, particularly to the attention of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) who interjected something with reference to fencing. It is within the privilege of the hon. member for Brandon to move a reduction in the tariff on many of these items which in general talk he has condemned, but I venture to say he will not do it. The hon. gentleman has referred to a "board of strategy", but there is another board in existence. My hon. friend should not be jealous even if there does happen to be a "board of strategy" so-called. There is another board, of which I believe he is chairman, that is a sort of supplement to the cabinet. Whether he calls that a board of strategy or a board of dictation, whatever label he puts upon it, I do not know; he knows more about the subject than I do. However, these observations are no more pertinent to the subject than were those offered by my hon. friend; I am as much out of order in expressing them as he was. But coming back again to the subject, statistics show that under the tariffs as they exist to-day between Canada and United States the latter country is exporting to Canada two or three times as much meats as we are sending to them, probably for the reason that our tariff is lower than theirs.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I hardly think that is correct.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, it is correct. I gave the figures a moment ago covering a period of five years. It is fairer to do that than simply to give the figures for one or two months, or even one year, and the figures I gave are beyond dispute. They show that we imported from the United States in the five years from 1920 to 1924 inclusive, $55,442,000 worth, and we exported to that country in the same period $29,331,000 worth. The figures indicate that the trend of trade, so far as meats are concerned, is against us. Not only is that the case in the matter of meats but it is also true of the item of wool. I submit to the minister he would be well advised to increase the general tariff rate and give the farmers of Canada a certain amount of protection against the United States. If the minister's hands are tied by the treaty with Australia and New Zealand, that handicap does not prevail in the case of the country to the south. I therefore submit that he should seriously consider raising the general tariff on meats. The amount of increase must be left to the government to decide, the responsibility rests upon them. I ask the minister again, will he give me some reason why he should not pursue that course?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Just before this item passes—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If my hon. friend will permit me. I asked the minister a question for the second time and I should like him to answer.

Mr. ROBB: At an earlier period the discussion centred around the subject of mutton. I have already placed figures on Hansard showing that we exported to the United States almost double the quantity of our imports of mutton to that country, notwithstanding the tariff against us.

Mr. DAVIS: Did not those exports consist to a large extent of spring lamb?

Mr. ROBB: Even so the Canadian farmer got a good price, as the hon. member for Brandon has stated. The largest item in the imports of meat from the United States was pork. As I said before, the Canadian packers, during the slack season when they could not procure pork in sufficient quantities in Canada and in order to be able to continue operations, imported during one particular year from the United States something like $1,000,000 worth of pork. During that same period Canada exported over $28,000,000 worth of bacon. Is it any harm for Canada to import this little million dollars' worth from the United States in order to keep plants going, to keep down the overhead, and to meet the competition of Denmark and other countries in the matter of bacon?

Mr. CLARK: I understand that the tariff against Australian mutton prior to the treaty was three cents a pound?

Mr. ROBB: No, 2½ cents a pound.

Mr. CLARK: And now it is one-half cent a pound?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: I ask the minister what in his opinion will be the effect of the change in the tariff upon the sheep industry in this country? Will it tend to decrease the flocks of sheep in Canada, or will it have the opposite effect?

Mr. ROBB: I have already given the experience as to the effect of the importations since the treaty went into force. We have imported less from New Zealand and a little more from Australia.

Mr. CLARK: I point out to the minister that a fair opportunity has not yet been afforded of judging what the ultimate effects of the treaty will be. I think that is a fair statement. I wonder whether the experts of his department, or of the Department of Agriculture, have considered carefully the effects of the reduction in the duty upon the total flock of sheep in this country.

Mr. ROBB: The treaty has been in force now for nine months. The Chairman has ruled other members out of order and will probably give the same ruling in my case, but if we are going to have a debate on the Australian agreement I do not object to it. Is my hon. friend opposed to the Australian agreement?

Mr. CLARK: My vote is recorded in Hansard. I do not propose to discuss the Australian treaty.

Mr. ROBB: That is safer.

Mr. CLARK: I am not now discussing the principles of the Australian treaty. I have asked the minister what I consider to be a fair question and he has—I would not like to say as usual, but certainly it is true in this case—deliberately evaded the question. I think I am entitled to a fair statement if the minister has any information on this subject. As I stated before, I am not attempting to go beyond the question which is before the House, but I do want to come to an intelligent conclusion, if I can, as to whether or not it would be in the interest of this country to increase the general tariff to an amount beyond that proposed by the minister; and whether, in addition to that, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has put forward a proposition which is legally feasible, namely, to increase proportionately the duties on mutton from Australia. If that could be done legally it appears to me it would have a very excellent effect on the sheep raising industry of this country.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, that is a fair question. The position taken by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I think, can not be disputed. This parliament can put on a dollar a pound against Australian meat if they wish. Let them stop it all from coming in, and Australia will stop buying fish and pulp and paper from the Pacific coast.

Mr. CLARK: I once more express the hope that the minister will cease threatening or going to extremes.

Mr. ROBB: I am not threatening.

Mr. CLARK: The minister has made a statement which I am sure in the opinion of any fair-minded member of this House can only be considered extreme. I am not suggesting that a dollar a pound be placed on mutton coming from Australia. I am trying to get a considered opinion from the minister, if he has given the matter his consideration. If the duties are raised proportionately against other countries, if the general tariff is raised sufficiently and Australia is given the proportion of the preference called for in the treaty, surely that is not an objectionable increase. These adjustments will have to be made from time to time in the interest of our country, and surely we are not to be met on every occasion with the threat from the minister: "If you do that you are going to lose the great benefit of the pulp and paper and fishing industries in British Columbia." But the fact that we are deriving benefits for one industry is no reason why I should not plead for fair treatment for another, and that is all I am asking. I am asking whether the hon. minister's department have come to any conclusion as to the comparative effect on the sheep raising industry in this country, first, in leaving the duty as at present at half a cent a pound, and secondly, in increasing the general tariff and the Australian treaty rate proportionately, so that the preference is maintained.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I desire to say a word in reply to my hon. friend from Frontenac. He states that our imports from the United States have increased tremendously or that they were very much in excess of our exports. If he will take the figures for last year as supplied by the agricultural statistics he will find that our imports last year were $1,375,780 and our exports $2,520,524 of chilled meats—meats fresh, chilled, or frozen—and that is the item under discussion. The trend of exports and imports has been favourable to Canada for the last few years. Our total exports in 1925 were around $5,000,000 and our exports were about the same in 1923, while our imports have dropped from over $5,000,000 in 1923 to $1,300,000 in 1925.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is just fresh meats?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Our total imports for consumption in 1923 were $5,473,975, and our total imports in 1925 were $1,375,785. That is all from one country, practically all between Canada and the United States.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My figures cover meats as a whole.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I am speaking of fresh meats, as that is the item under discussion.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. member is right.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What year is my hon. friend referring to when he speaks about the very large quantity of meat and pork imported into Canada from the United States? Was it a war year?

Mr. ROBB: No, I was repeating some figures quoted by the hon. member for Frontenac.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I understood my hon. friend to give some figures of a very large quantity of meat imported into Canada in a particular year, and I was asking what year that was.

Mr. ROBB: I do not recall that.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The minister certainly stated that during a certain time we had a very large import of meat from the United States that was again exported.

Mr. ROBB: That was the year ending March 31, 1926—over a million dollars worth of pork, and we exported a much larger quantity of bacon.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That was last year?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Hon. members on the other side and members to our left very often point out that the exports of certain agricultural products to the United States in a particular year exceed the imports from the United States of like products in the same year, and they seem to think that ought to settle the matter, that really it establishes a balance in favour of Canada. Well, superficially it does, but I think we must take into consideration the population of the two countries. The United States is a country of 110,000,000 and we are a country of 9,000,000 or 10,000,000. Now under these circumstances I think it is only fair, when we are analyzing this question, to put it on a per capita basis, and if that be so then we find the United States, with 110,000,000, in many cases is taking less from us than we are taking them with with our 9,000,000 or 10,000,000 people. I submit that feature should not be lost sight of in dealing with these figures.

Mr. MILLAR: Is that not also the reason why the Canadian farmer cannot be protected, while the American farmer can be protected?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I cannot agree with that at all. I do not see why we cannot in Canada impose the same rate of duty in respect to farm produce that the United States imposes, and I cannot help thinking it would be to the advantage of the Canadian farmer if that were done. Many of the farmers' organizations in Canada have asked that that be done, and it has not been done. They ought to be the best judges as to whether or not it would be good for them. Surely our Saskatchewan friends do not claim that they know what is good for the farmer of Ontario better than the Ontario farmer himself knows, and he has been sending resolutions down to Ottawa asking for an increase in the duty on farm products, vegetables, fruit and that sort of thing.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the hon. member state what farmers' organizations he is referring to?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not the names of them under my hand, but if the hon. member will inquire of the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Agriculture he will get all the information he requires. As to this item which is under consideration, I submit two things have been made abundantly clear from the argument this afternoon: first, that without in any way disturbing the integrity or the effect of the Australian treaty, we are free to raise this duty as against meat products coming from the United States, and second, that it would appear to be in the interests of the Canadian farmer that that should be done. It is not equally clear that we might raise the duty as against Australia, and I do not think anybody now seriously advocates that, although I think it could be done without in any way violating the provisions or the understanding or the effect of the treaty. I think this item with respect to imports of fresh meat from the United States should be increased.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I should like to refer to a matter that was introduced into the debate. While this may not appear to be pertinent to the item and may come within the scope of your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that you cannot grow wool without also producing meat. The production of meat in this country is connected with the production of wool. The hon. member for Brandon referred to conditions in the United States and in Canada. We have no tariff on wool; it comes in absolutely free from all parts of the world. We import fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, seventeen and as high as nineteen million pounds of wool in a year and the great bulk of our wool has to find a market abroad.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I was just going to point out in connection with the objection raised by the hon. member for Brandon that these depressed farmers in the United States with a tariff of thirty and some odd cents a pound on wool yet received 5,000,000 pounds of our wool last year.

The CHAIRMAN: I acknowledged some time ago that I should not have allowed such latitude in the discussion but I took full responsibility for it. I rule now that the hon. member must keep to the item under consideration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The item is meat and the increase of half a cent a pound under the general tariff. I recall when the Australian treaty was before this House a year ago the item of meat was under discussion. I also remember that when parliament assembled the man who is apparently leading this government to-day, the hon. member for Brandon, took exception to the agreement which the minister had made with Australia in regard to this very matter, on the ground that he could not consent to an increase in the tariff because it would destroy the arguments they were advancing in favour of reducing the general tariff on manufactured goods. The minister made an agreement with the government of Australia, an agreement which was placed before the parliament of Australia and ratified by them, and in which they pointed out that it was the intention of the government to increase the general tariff on meats in this country. Nevertheless the government did not do so, because their dictator from Brandon could not allow that to interfere with his policy of demanding a reduction in the tariff on manufactured goods. On the 26th September, 1924, the Prime Minister of Australia, as reported in the Australian Hansard, made this statement:

> The ministry has entered into an arrangement with the government of Canada for an announcement of the proposed agreement to be made in this House as near as possible to 2.30 p.m. to-day.

The agreement was made; the announcement was made in the Australian parliament, and the minister had to change his policy under the dictation referred to. As a result the minister comes before this House to-day and asks to have a paltry increase of one-half cent a pound made in our general tariff on meats.

Mr. ROBB: And my hon. friend blocks it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I asked the minister at the outset what principle underlay this increase, but so far he has not given any reason other than to say that the object is to promote the importation of mutton and lamb from Australia. The statement the minister made when the treaty was before the House was that it was to reduce the cost of the breakfast table by encouraging the importation of this article. There is no use trying to beat about the bush; the minister might just as well let the people know what he has in his mind. The tariff is to be hacked a little here and a little there. In the second agreement that was made, by some oversight one-half cent a pound was left out of the general tariff and the minister is trying to insert that in order to complete the second agreement. With regard to the threat—because I cannot consider it as anything else—that if we oppose the Australian treaty it may be cancelled—

The CHAIRMAN: I have already ruled that any discussion of that kind is out of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I think it would be one of the best acts of this government if they would give immediate notice to have the Australian treaty repealed on six months' notice.

The CHAIRMAN: I have already ruled that the Australian treaty cannot be discussed. Will the hon. member please obey my ruling?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The Australian treaty is so involved in the tariff on meat that I do not see how one can keep away from it.

The CHAIRMAN: That is my ruling.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): If that is your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I say that your ruling is not a sound ruling and I appeal from it.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member want to appeal from my ruling?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): That I cannot discuss the item.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member may discuss the item as much as he likes. But I have allowed hon. members too much latitude, and it is only fair that we should get back to the item under consideration.

[Mr. D. Sutherland.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The connection between the Australian treaty and meat?

The CHAIRMAN: The item under consideration is the duty on meat.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The minister introduced the matter of the Australian treaty himself.

The CHAIRMAN: I ruled the minister out of order, and the hon. member for Brandon and two or three other hon. members out of order also.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I trust you will continue that latitude until the end and then rule the discussion out of order. Surely you will not allow the minister and these others to have this privilege and not allow me the same.

The CHAIRMAN: I have allowed too much latitude already.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): You have been so fair and good-natured about the matter that I certainly would not like to depart from any ruling that you might make. I should be glad if the minister could give the committee some reason why the increase has been made, the general principle on which it is decided that the increase should be one-half cent a pound and not two and one-half cents. I made a motion which was ruled out of order by the Chair because, according to the interpretation of the Chairman, this is a tax and a motion cannot be moved by a private member. I tried to persuade the minister to take my view of the matter and I suggested that he should make a move in this direction. But apparently he still has a recollection of the pressure that was brought to bear by the hon. member for Brandon when on a former occasion the minister had to change his views on a question of an item in the tariff. I am satisfied that he is living more in dread of that than even the action of a certain sister Dominion with regard to a trade arrangement which has been entered into. We ought to have a little more time to allow the minister to consider this matter so that he may come before the committee at eight o'clock and give us a frank explanation of what influenced him in making the change. This, I am sure, would be a move in the interests of the people as a whole and it would do more to promote the welfare, not only of agriculture but of the country generally, than old age pensions or rural credits or anything of that kind. Yet the minister sits here and treats the matter lightly. I do not think the people will not so regard it—certainly they would not if they were only aware of the minister's attitude—when they come to pass upon it at the next opportunity. I respectfully urge the minister to consider this suggestion before disposing of the matter. Let us have a more candid explanation as to the basis upon which this change of one-half cent per pound is made. Is that the limit which the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) can stand? Can he not concede one cent per pound? Is he so wedded to half a cent?

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, is the hon. member in order in invoking my name so often?

The CHAIRMAN: As it is rather a compliment than anything else I will not rule the hon. gentleman out of order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Can the minister give us the cost of transportation of meat from Australia to Vancouver, say? That is a pertinent question. We have been discussing mutton, lamb and pork all afternoon, but beef is also on the bill of fare, and I would call the minister's attention to the bonus paid by the Australian government at $2.40 on each carcass of beef exported. I understand that the government has taken into consideration the six cent Pattersen bonus on butter but whether the $2.40 bonus paid by the Australian government on beef has been considered in fixing the tariff, I do not know. It should be taken into consideration. Can the minister give me the figures as to the cost of transportation when the committee meets again at eight o'clock?

Mr. ROBB: I will not give my hon. friend the figures, nor will I attempt to find them, because the Australian treaty is not under consideration at the moment. The question the committee is discussing is the increase of half a cent per pound under this item and which most hon. gentlemen have opposed all afternoon.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): When the committee rose at six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I had put a question to the Minister of Finance which I think was perfectly fair and had a very direct bearing upon the item we were discussing. I asked the minister if he could inform me, not then but when the committee resumed, as to the freight charges incidental to bringing meat from Australia to Canada. If I understood him correctly he said he could not so inform me, and had no intention of endeavouring to get the information. It is my privilege, of course, to ask a question which I conceive to have a very direct bearing upon the item under discussion ,and it is the minister's privilege to answer or not, as he sees fit.

I say that the question I asked had a very direct bearing for this reason. We are discussing item 7, and the minister himself said that the rate of three and one-half cents per pound was fixed because of the agreement with Australia. Australia having a rate of one-half cent per pound and the agreement requiring that Australia be given a preference of three cents, the minister fixes the rate at three and one-half cents per pound. In bringing meat into Canada from any other country there are certain factors entering into that transaction; there is the duty, the cost of transportation, and still another matter which has been recognized by this government. In some countries, one at least, the government or certain societies undertake to encourage the transportation or exportation of certain goods by giving a bonus. For example—and this I submit to be a fair illustration—the duty on butter coming from a certain country was fixed at one cent per pound. In the course of time it developed that by an arrangement in that country called the Pattersen scheme a bonus of six cents was given on every pound of butter exported. We have been told repeatedly that the government did consider that as a factor which influenced the agreement entered into, and I understand they are applying a dumping clause of six cents per pound because of the action of this society.

Now I make the application to meats. The government of Australia gives a bonus, I am told, of $2.40 on every carcass of beef exported from that country. Although the amounts are different that is on all fours with the Pattersen scheme of bonusing butter, and if the government recognize one scheme as militating against Canada and unfair to the dairymen, then I ask why the same thing should not be taken into consideration in regard to meats. The $2.40 paid by the Australian government on every carcass of beef exported will, I presume, work out in the neighbourhood of one-half cent bonus per pound, so as a matter of fact, because of the bonus on the export of beef from Australia, there is really no protection at all, that bonus offsetting the duty of one-half cent per pound and leaving as our only protection the cost of transportation. Having in view the fact that this bonus is given, would it not be fair for the minister to increase this figure to four cents or five cents per pound on meats imported from other countries than Australia? If the same rule is applied to beef as is applied to butter, they will raise the duty and give us more protection against importations from, say, the United States or any other countries exporting to Canada.

The minister has said that we should not discuss the Australian treaty in connection with this item, and you, Mr. Chairman, have ruled to that effect. I have no desire to infringe upon that ruling, further than to point out that the minister himself has said that this very item we are now discussing was fixed by the Australian treaty. By that admission he has introduced the Australian agreement into the argument and under these circumstances, so far as it applies to the importation of meat, I submit that it is perfectly fair to discuss this agreement. If the minister could come here and say that the three and one-half cent tariff rate has nothing whatever to do with the Australian agreement I admit that we should leave it out of the discussion, but that is not the case. That being so we have a right to examine that Australian agreement and see to what extent we are being protected. If we can apply the rule in regard to butter where the Pattersen agreement comes in with a bonus of six cents per pound, how can you consistently disregard the fact that the Australian government gives a bonus amounting to about one-half cent per pound on meats? I assume that to be the figure; I thought probably the minister would have obtained these facts, but he has not done so. I say that in view of that bonus on meats this matter is exactly in line with the bonus on butter, and inasmuch as the government have dealt with the one scheme by applying the dumping clause on butter, I ask why they should not take into consideration the bonus given on meat, and raise the duty accordingly. Then, if you wish to be logical, you should apply the dumping clause of $2.40 to offset the bonus, just for the same reason that you apply the dumping clause of six cents a pound to offset the bonus on butter. I submit that that is a very good reason indeed why the minister could justify the government in raising the general tariff above the three and one-half cents a pound which is outlined in this part of the schedule.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Would not the dumping clause apply in this case the same as it does on other products that are bonused?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Chairman, it is not up to me to say whether this dumping clause will apply or not. Let me put the hon. member's question to the minister: Will the dumping clause apply in this case? If so, I repeat, there is good ground for raising the general tariff higher than it is now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Chairman, I thought the minister would give some consideration to the arguments which have been advanced by the hon. member for Frontenac. When the committee rose at six o'clock I urged upon the minister that he should at least give the meat producers of this country the same consideration that had been agreed upon by the representatives of this government and the government of Australia in 1924. The minister apparently has decided not to do so. I felt that during the recess he might have been able to consult with his chief or dictator, the member for Brandon, who evidently changed the government's agreement on this question when the proposal of 1924 was placed before him. I have the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Australian government and also that made by the Prime Minister of that country on that occasion. I do not wish to appear to be treating with discourtesy your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I would point out that the minister on Wednesday afternoon, in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for West York, stated that this is simply an increase of half a cent in the general tariff to correct a mistake that was made in the Australian agreement in cabling. So that it is absolutely impossible to discuss this matter intelligently without making some reference to the trade agreement entered into with Australia. The minister's statement on Wednesday afternoon clearly indicates that the rate of 3½ cents per pound is based on some misunderstanding which arose with regard to the cabling of the amount that had been agreed upon.

Now, with your permission, Sir, I should like to read a paragraph from the statement made by the Australian Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with this matter. Before doing so, I would refer to the statement by the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth himself, who in introducing the measure into the Australian parliament on September 26, 1924, after the agreement had been made, stated:

> Arrangements having now been made for a reciprocal treaty with Canada, the earliest possible opportunity should be taken to make the facts public. Another reason why I suggest the postponement of the remaining Orders of the Day is that the ministry has entered into an arrangement with the government of Canada for an announcement of the proposed agreement to be made in this House as near as possible at 2.30 p.m. to-day as a similar announcement will be made in the Canadian parliament at the same time.

Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce of the Commonwealth, in dealing with the question of meats—that is the item which is before the committee, and it is the only one to which I am going to refer—stated:

At present Australian meat pays 3 cents per pound, while meat admitted at British preference rates pays 2 cents per pound.

That is under the Canadian tariff.

Under the agreement Canada will alter her tariff, making the British preferential rate one cent per pound, which Australian meat will pay,—

That was the agreement, that Australian meat should pay one cent a pound on coming into Canada. That was agreeable to the Commonwealth government, and it was passed by the Australian parliament before someone interfered with the arrangements which the Canadian government had agreed to. The admission has been made in this House by the hon. leader of the Progressives that he and his party could not consent to an increase in the tariff on agricultural products because it would show inconsistency on their part in demanding that the tariff on manufactured goods should be reduced or removed. Now, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Australian parliament continued:

—and the general tariff 4 cents per pound, which will be payable on meat imported from, for example, the United States of America, which country is Canada's principal supplier. Our meat will therefore have a preference of 3 cents, equalling 1½d. per pound. The fresh meat imported by Canada consists chiefly of pork, of which the United States of America supplied about £500,000 worth. Australia's total export trade in frozen meat in 1922-1923 amounted to just under £7,000,000.

The Australian government were looking to Canada for a market, and realized that it would be to Canada's advantage to have their general tariff increased. In view of this, surely the minister in remedying a mistake which he says occurred in cabling can make the rate 4 cents a pound under the general tariff as at first agreed upon—I suggested 5 cents this afternoon—and that will still give Australia a preference of 3 cents a pound in the Canadian market.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—20a. Butter produced from cocoa bean, per pound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 2 cents; general tariff, 2 cents.

Mr. ROBB: This is to meet the requirements of the West Indian agreement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has some items here which are purely in ease of the West Indian agreement. Take, for example, some of these cocoa items, where we have a direct increase in the cost to our manufacturers, which they have objected to very much. If my hon. friend cannot do anything else, cannot he insert what is quite a usual provision—that the increases which are necessary for the purpose of putting into effect the West Indian agreement will not become operative until that treaty is ratified? That would be a good deal of assistance to our cocoa manufacturers and confectioners, and it does no one any harm under the agreement until that agreement is ratified.

Mr. ROBB: I do not think it will improve the condition of the cocoa men to act upon my hon. friend's suggestion. The preferential rate will not be in force until the treaty is proclaimed. I think we might put this item through. I fancy that as we go along it will be found that the cocoa people will not be so very badly off.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend does not get my point. It is quite true that the treaty will not go into effect until it is proclaimed, but we are making customs changes just for the purpose of giving effect to the treaty. Now, as the treaty does not go into effect until it is proclamed why should these customs changes go into effect until they also are proclaimed? We have done the same thing before. We did it in connection with the cellulose case. There is no difficulty in giving effect to my suggestion.

Mr. ROBB: I think we had better continue with the item. I recall that the previous West India agreement came into force just as the present one will.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is not getting my point. It is quite true the agreement does not come into effect until it is proclaimed. But for the purpose of giving effect to the agreement my hon. friend is making certain changes in the customs tariff. It is only being done for that purpose; it is not being done I assume—and I do not think I am wrong in the assumption—for the direct purpose of hurting Canadian trade, for the purpose of hurting the confectionery business. It is done for the purpose of implementing the contract—which will be a contract after it is ratified—with the West Indies. Now all I am suggesting is that my hon. friend should provide—it can be done—that the increases that are being made in our duties should not be made effective until the treaty comes into operation.

Mr. ROBB: The item we are considering does not provide for an increase in duty, it is a decrease.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am speaking in a general sense and with the idea of having the point settled now.

Mr. ROBB: I think we might proceed.

Mr. CLARK: The item refers to butter produced from the cocoa bean. Is that oleomargarine?

Mr. ROBB: No, cocoa butter.

Mr. CLARK: I know, but what is the nature of it?

Mr. ROBB: It is a butter used by confectioners.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—22. Preparations of cocoa or chocolate in powder form: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent. Or per pound, British preferential tariff, 2 cents; intermediate tariff, 2½ cents; general tariff, 3 cents—whichever rate returns the higher duty.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—23. Preparations of cocoa or chocolate, n.o.p., and confectionery, coated with or containing chocolate, the weight of the wrappings and cartons to be included in the weight for duty, per pound: British preferential tariff, 2½ cents; intermediate tariff, 2½ cents; general tariff, 2½ cents. And, British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a case particularly in point, is it not?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. This is to provide for the changes in regard to cocoa beans and is intended to meet the wishes of the manufacturers of confectionery. It puts them in a little better position.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend kindly explain that? I do not see how that is done.

Mr. ROBB: It gives the manufacturers an additional cent a pound.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is not the bean itself; it is a manufactured article.

Mr. ROBB: This is the preparation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Surely we might have some reasonable information from the minister with regard to this item. We have allowed the item dealing with butter produced from the cocoa bean to pass with a reduction of 1½ cents. In this case there is an increase of 1½ cents per pound and we have no explanation as to the quantity of the commodity used in this country or the purpose for which it is used.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. ROBB: This is to put the manufacturers in a little better position. The imports for consumption during the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1925, were: From the United Kingdom, $93,000 odd; from the United States, $28,000; and from all other countries $41,000; total $163,000. It gives an additional protection to the manufacturer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is not this the minister's idea? Inasmuch as for the purpose of complying with the agreement, and in particular meeting the case of the Trinidad cocoa bean grower, a substantial increase is being made in the raw material, there is here an increase in the manufactured article to keep confectionery, if possible, on the same basis?

Mr. ROBB: That is the point exactly. In that connection—and this meets the views of hon. gentlemen who say that we should have a preference for preference in some places—I may say that the people of the West India islands pointed out to us that we were admitting to Canada cocoa beans from the west coast of Africa where we had no preference. They said: We are giving you a preference for your Canadian dairy products, and other products, therefore why should you allow cocoa to come in from British countries, even from the west coast of Africa, where you have no preference, and where we are unable to obtain a preference because of an agreement with other countries—I think one is France—that does not expire for two years?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought it was six months.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—28. Coffee, green, imported direct from the country of growth and production, and green coffee purchased in bond in the United Kingdom, per pound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 3 cents; general tariff, 3 cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—30. Ginger and spices, unground, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—32. Nutmegs and mace, whole or unground: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Surely we shall have some explanation from the minister in regard to the reduction of the tariff on nutmegs.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe we are placing this on the free list under the preferential tariff. That is a reduction of 12½ per cent under the West India agreement. The importations were: from the British West Indies, $58,000; Straits settlement, $8,000; United Kingdom, $3,000; all other countries $19,000. Total importations $88,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—39b. Arrowroot per pound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 1½ cents; general tariff, 1½ cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—42a. Table salt made by an admixture of other ingredients, when containing not less than ninety per cent of pure salt. British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: This is done for administrative purposes to meet the views of the Customs department Complaint was made as to table salt coming in in packages, and the Customs board were compelled to make a ruling. In certain cases the salt contained a small quantity of medicinal ingredient; in other cases a small quantity of magnesia. The admixture was for the purpose of allowing the salt to run freely. Complaint was made that the salt should be given a different classification and it was increased to 25 per cent under the general tariff. This is to put it on the basis of 15 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And this is a reduction.

Mr. ROBB: It is to clarify the matter. It is not a reduction from the general tariff.

Mr. MORAND: Is there not really a reduction from the amount that was actually paid?

Mr. ROBB: The salt coming in before was classified as a medicine and was admitted at 25 per cent, which made it expensive for the householders of the country.

Mr. MORAND: The difference between the 25 per cent and the present duty has been figured out in the case of people who use the greatest amount of salt, to be a saving of two or three cents a year. In my city they have just developed an iodized salt which they have gone to considerable trouble to advertise throughout Canada, and no sooner have they established a market for it than the tariff is reduced. But that is not all. This salt can come in in a container at 5 per cent preferential or under the general tariff at 15 per cent, and there is no duty on the container, but if the firm manufactures the salt in Canada, and imports containers or packages in which to put it up, they have to pay a high duty on it, which removes any protection they might have. The Windsor Salt Company has just put out an iodized salt, and they were the first to do so in Canada, I believe. They spent a good deal of money to advertise it, and not only does this remove all the protection, but it gives the American manufacturers an unfair advantage because they send in their containers free of duty, while the Canadian manufacturers have to pay for theirs.

Mr. ROBB: The explanation is quite clear. This company and some others had a monopoly of the business, there was no fair competition, and the householder was paying that much more for it.

Mr. MORAND: How much more?

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend desires to pursue this question further, I have here the earnings of certain salt companies, and I would be glad to give him this information.

Mr. MORAND: Surely the minister does not base the change in tariff on the earnings of a company, whose manufacture comprises only a small proportion of table salt. Is that the only reason for the reduction—the high earnings?

Mr. ROBB: No. My hon. friend misses the point that I am here representing the consumer as well as the manufacturer of salt. I think in the interests of the consumer this is a fair protection and that they will in no way be injured by it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has not addressed himself to this one point; the hon. member has pointed out that in his view—and the minister can tell me if this is wrong—the proposed change can only make a difference of a very few cents in the course of a whole year. Has the minister any information on that point? Who is asking for the change? What is the name of the manufacturer who asked for the change, and what is he desiring to sell?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has missed the point. The person who asked to have this placed in a higher classification than before was the manufacturer. The customs people think that in the interests of the general public it is better to make this clear, so that this product will be classified properly as set out here rather than as a medicinal product.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister tell us what proportion of iodine and other medicinal properties are in it?

Mr. ROBB: I have not that information, but the item says:

When containing not less that 90 per cent of pure salt.

There could not be any more than 10 per cent of any other ingredient.

Mr. McGIBBON: Might I point out that iodine is one of the ingredients of ordinary salt. Much would depend on the relative qualities of the Canadian and American products.

Mr. ROBB: I am told there is not much iodine in it.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—72b, Tree seeds for reforestation purposes only: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—77a. Cocoa beans, not roasted crushed or ground, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, $1.50; general tariff, $2.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that also the treaty?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, this is the agreement. There is an increase there of $1.50 to $2 in the general tariff. The others are made the same, free.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): What is the rate under the old British preferential tariff?

Mr. ROBB: It is the same under the old British preferential. We are increasing the general tariff.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Could you inform the committee where our imports of this particular commodity come from?

Mr. ROBB: The records show the following imports, leaving out the hundreds:

United States	$317,000
British West Indies	255,000
United Kingdom	294,000
British West Africa	53,000
Ceylon	53,000
All other foreign countries	10,000

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—90, Fruits, viz.: plantains, pineapples, pomegranates, guavas, mangoes, wild blueberries, wild strawberries and wild raspberries: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROBB: This is just a reclassification. Bananas are left out of this item.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): A large number of the celery growers in my district plant several hundred acres each year in celery, and I am looking for an item on which I could present the claims of those interested in that industry. These celery growers produce several hundred car loads of celery each year. They find their market entirely undermined by the United States celery which is coming in, and a petition in the matter is being sent to the Minister of Finance. When their celery comes on the market, that market is flooded with United States celery, and they are compelled to send their product to cold storage in Toronto and elsewhere. Some of them interviewed me when I was home last Sunday. They told me a quantity of this celery was still in cold storage in Toronto and that they were paying insurance and storage charges on it, while dozens of car loads were coming in from the United States. The United States placed an embargo against our celery going into that country; they do not allow one stem of celery to go there from Canada at any time of the year. The celery growers in my district simply ask that, say for a month or two after their celery is ready for market, the government should impose an embargo against United States celery coming into Canada, similar to the embargo which has been placed against the Canadian product going into the United States, thus enabling them to get rid of their product at a reasonable price. That is practically the whole point. The petition is on its way, and I thought if the minister would allow me to present this matter to him he might consider it. The problem is a very serious one for the people who are compelled to send dozens and dozens of carloads of celery into cold storage, hold it there during the winter season and pay insurance, storage and all the other charges in connection with it while it is stored there. Now they find themselves, as they have during the last few years, with large quantities of celery on hand at a time of the year when celery from the United States is coming in and underselling their market while during the whole year they are not allowed to send one stem of celery into the United States market because of the embargo against it.

Mr. ROBB: I will take a note of the observations of my hon. friend. It is news to me that there is an embargo. I observe that the United States have a tariff of 25 per cent against celery while our tariff is 30 per cent.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): They have an embargo now.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—90b. Bananas: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

The Governor in Council may by order in council direct that there be substituted for tariff item 90b in schedule A of the Customs tariff, 1907, the enumerations of goods and the rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite items 90c and 90d in schedule A the following:

90c. Bananas, when imported from the place of growth by ship, direct to a Canadian port, per stem or bunch: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 50 cents; general tariff, 50 cents.

90d. Bananas, n.o.p., per stem or bunch: British preferential tariff, fifty cents; intermediate tariff, fifty cents; general tariff, fifty cents.

From and after the publication of such order in council in the Canada Gazette, tariff item 90b as it appears in said schedule at the time of the passing of the act founded on this resolution shall be repealed and the provisions of tariff items 90c and 90d shall be substituted therefor.

Mr. CAHAN: As regards items 90b, 90c and 90d, do not these reductions under the British preferential tariff conform to the rates which are enumerated in the proposed West Indies treaty?

Mr. ROBB: They do.

Mr. CAHAN: The suggestion then is that the Governor in Council may by order in council direct the substitution of the tariffs mentioned in the resolution. Do the government intend to bring this in force only in case of the ratification of the West Indies treaty, or do they intend to reduce the rate in any case?

Mr. ROBB: We intend to bring it into force. I am not sure what my hon. friend has in mind, whether he has in mind a gentleman that I met during this week or last. Hon. gentlemen will be interested to know, and I think it is fair to say to them now, that I was approached within the last few weeks to know when this treaty would be proclaimed and brought into force. It was intimated to me that there was now under consideration by a very large shipping company the question of putting on steamers to carry bananas to Canada if this treaty went into force, the only condition imposed being that they should not be subject to any subsidy.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not suggesting that. I am asking a plain question: If it is the intention of the government to make these reductions only in case of the ratification of the West Indies treaty, why should we not say so in express terms? I understand that the only consideration for making the reduction is that under the West Indies treaty we may give considerations for certain reciprocal considerations made in favour of Canada.

Mr. ROBB: This is inserted in the resolution so that the government may be in a position, if they see fit, not to bring it into force if the Canadian people are going to be unduly penalized. I think it is well to leave in the hands of the government the question of when they should bring it into force.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Has the hon. member for Brandon agreed to the proposition—the trade treaty with the West Indies?

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will refer to Hansard of Tuesday he will find that the hon. member for Brandon approved the policy of the government.

Mr. RYERSON: My understanding of this clause was that the imposition of this duty was not to go into effect until such time as the service which is provided for under the West Indies treaty was actually operating. I would like to point out to western members particularly the hardships that this treaty will impose upon the west. It will add anywhere from four to five cents a dozen to the retail price of bananas. I have already pointed out to the House that it will be an utter impossibility to distribute bananas from Canadian ports to points in the west and a large portion of Ontario If that is a fact, this duty which we are imposing will be a great hardship upon the people in those districts.

Mr. CLARK: What adjustment has been made of the case put before the minister by the Fruit and Produce Credit Association of British Columbia?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure that I have in mind what that was. Will my hon. friend give me the details?

Mr. CLARK: The hon. member for Cariboo can explain the matter better than I can.

Mr. FRASER: When this matter was being discussed under the West Indies treaty I understood from the Minister of Finance that he intended to make some arrangement in regard to the shipment of bananas from New Orleans to the western part of Canada. Has any such arrangement been made?

Mr. ROBB: I have nothing in mind as to bananas from New Orleans, but I have in mind a proposition that has been made to us by the people of the Fiji islands, where they grow a good banana as my hon. friend knows. They have represented to us that if they come in under these conditions they can very well supply the western market. They were cut out of the excellent market they enjoyed in Australia when the Australians imposed quite a heavy duty and they are now seeking a market for their product.

Mr. FRASER: I think the best thing I can do is to give the information I have to the committee. This letter, which is written by the Fruit and Produce Credit Association of the city of Vancouver, out lines the situation very fully from the point of view of those who are dealing in bananas throughout western Canada:

The wholesale fruit dealers in Vancouver strongly protest against the proposed placing of a duty of 50 cents per bunch on bananas imported through the United States.

At the present time we import our bananas from New Orleans, where there are several cargoes arriving each day. The fruit is selected with great care for long distance shipment and special trains in charge of banana messengers accompany the fruit to destination. The time in transit is usually eight days. As far as we are able to learn, there are no boats carrying freight between the West Indies and Vancouver, which have the facilities for carrying bananas. This would mean that the fruit would have to come by rail from St. John, Halifax, or other Canadian port, and it would take, under the most favourable present conditions, at least fourteen days from said port to Vancouver. The present rate from Halifax to Vancouver is $3.79½ per cwt. as against $1.87½ per cwt. from New Orleans.

During the winter months it would be impossible to bring bananas from eastern Canadian ports on account of low temperatures. If the temperature at which this fruit is carried gets below 52 degrees the fruit becomes chilled and is unsalable. The reverse condition applies, when on account of warm weather it would be impossible to hold the fruit at a sufficiently low temperature while in transit, in order that it should arrive at destination in proper condition.

At the present time we are enjoying a messenger service of fifteen dollars per car, which is only possible when train loads come through all the way to the Pacific coast. During the winter months Vancouver uses one car of bananas per week, and it would be out of the question for a messenger to accompany only one car from Winnipeg to Vancouver, as the cost would be prohibitive. During the summer months Vancouver uses from seven to eight cars per week, but the average is not sufficiently high to enable us to secure a messenger service at a minimum cost.

Another drawback to importing our fruit from St. John or Halifax would be the uncertainty of supplies, the proposal being to have a weekly service to Halifax. If the fruit arrived there unsuitable for long distance shipment, we would be without fruit for one week, necessitating our purchasing supplies from Seattle, which would mean that the dealers there would secure the benefit.

During the year from 1st March, 1925, to 1st March, 1926, there were imported into Vancouver at least 95,000 bunches of bananas, and we feel that to place a duty of 1 cent per pound on this fruit, which is approximately what fifty cents per bunch would amount to, would result in a considerable curtailment of consumption.

[Mr. Robb.]

Unless Vancouver had the same service in the way of securing their bananas as Halifax or St. John, we feel that to place this duty in effect would be discriminating against Vancouver. From the above you will see that it is impracticable for us to secure our bananas through any of the eastern Canada ports, and the placing of a duty on bananas would add to the cost to the consumer and prove a detriment to our business.

As I understand the situation, that would not only apply to British Columbia but it would affect the distribution of bananas throughout the northwest, particularly in Alberta and Saskatchewan, because all these bananas come in the same way and the duty will add to the cost.

Mr. ROBB: I know as well as my hon. friend does that there is considerable opposition on the part of the distributors in New Orleans, who stand to lose business. However, we have looked carefully into the matter and are satisfied that the Canadian public will not pay more for bananas, while the Canadian railways will benefit by the haul. If things turn out as we anticipate, Fiji island growers will come into the market and Vancouver, instead of getting the bananas from New Orleans, will get them direct by steamer. Vancouver in that case will serve as the point of distribution to markets as far east as Winnipeg at least.

Mr. CLARK: There is no duty that applies to Fiji.

Mr. ROBB: We have the power to give them the same concession. They can come under the British preference.

Mr. CLARK: How do we know at this moment that there is any steamship service that will cover the trade between Fiji and the Dominion? I would ask the minister this question, by the way. If there are bananas in the Fiji island why is it that we have not been importing this fruit from them in the past? Surely steamship rates on bananas from Fiji would be lower than freight rates from New Orleans. If there were anything in the minister's contention we should now be getting our bananas from the Fiji island duty free, and a considerable trade would have developed long ago. I do not think the minister has given the matter adequate consideration. It was called to his attention on April 20, I believe, and obviously it has not been seriously considered. Now, if British Columbia is to get its bananas from the West Indies the fruit must be hauled by the Canadian railways, and while of course that is a point worth considering, it must be remembered that the rates will be prohibitive; we shall have to pay $3.79½ per hundred pounds, which is considerably higher than the rate we are now paying. In this connection I would point out that our railways are not fitted for the banana trade. In the extreme temperatures which we experience in winter the weather would be too cold while in midsummer it would be too hot, and there is no provision for proper storage in our cars. But the important point is that we shall have to pay $3.79½ for the bananas hauled over the Canadian railways as compared with $1.87½ from New Orleans.

I am anxious to support any measure that will make for improved trade within the empire, but I must insist, first of all, that the minister be fair to our own people. That is the principle by which we should always be governed in matters of this kind, and under this arrangement the people of British Columbia will be most unfairly dealt with. I may ask the hon. member for Brandon a question while he is in his seat, although I must observe that he is quite unwilling to let me put a question to him when he is speaking. The hon. member is ready enough to vote for a tariff in the interests of the farmers of another British dominion, but he will not support one designed to protect the farmers of his own country. Does he think that is right? And I would put the same question to my hon. friends from Saskatchewan. Do they realize that by adopting this provision they are now affording protection to the farmers of the West Indies? Apparently they are willing to give such protection to farmers down there, but when it comes to protecting a bona fide and necessary Canadian industry such as the raising of sheep and the production of wool—oh, no! No protection for the Canadian farmer! Perhaps I might remind those hon. gentlemen that for the most part the West Indian labour engaged in this industry is coloured. It is labour of that sort which my hon. friends from Saskatchewan and the hon. member for Brandon are now proposing to protect to the detriment of the Canadian consumer—the consumer about whom the Minister of Finance has so much to say. Now, I want the minister to protect the consumer of British Columbia in this matter; at least, let him give the consumer fair consideration. So far as I can see, the minister has failed to do so. If anyone suggests that the Minister of Finance is obdurate, then perhaps the hon. member for Brandon may be induced to come to the assistance of the public in this regard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What kind of labour is there in New Orleans?

Mr. CLARK: I am not concerned with that; I am concerned first and foremost with the Canadians. I am pointing out that while my hon. friends from the west refuse to protect Canadian producers, they are willing enough to give protection to producers in other parts of the world.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not catch the point of the hon. gentleman's reference to coloured labour.

Mr. CLARK: I do not know why my hon. friend should have missed the point; it was perfectly clear.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Bananas are not grown in New Orleans.

Mr. CLARK: The labour employed in the production of bananas is coloured labour, and I am pointing out to my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) that he is now proposing to vote, as he has already voted, in support of measures to encourage and protect that labour, while he refuses to assist the producers of his own country. That is the situation.

Mr. LADNER: I have received several protests in connection with this matter. Most of us, I think, are agreed that we want goods to come into Canada through Canadian ports, and as a matter of fact the government should have taken some step in that direction long ago. But the principle here involved is discrimination in favour of one part of the country as against another. As a matter of policy it is quite unfair that the supply of bananas coming to British Columbia should be taxed to the extent of fifty cents while that landed in eastern Canada escapes such taxation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Where do you get your bananas now in British Columbia?

Mr. LADNER: They come from the southern states, principally from New Orleans.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, from the West Indies.

Mr. FRASER: From the West Indies, via New Orleans.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Exactly.

Mr. LADNER: My argument from the Canadian point of view is this. The government is now passing legislation to place a tariff on bananas, and in so doing they are creating a situation which discriminates against the people of the west, leaving free the people of the east. That is one place, perhaps not a very important one, where difficulties are liable to arise.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How does that discrimination against the west figure out, as a matter of information?

Mr. LADNER: Because in the actual working out of the business under this proposed legislation, bananas coming from the West Indies to Halifax and Quebec are in the free class. But in the practical working of the business on the west coast they cannot come by that route; it is not practicable. The trade and facilities for handling, the storage, and the practices of the trade, all combine to make it necessary to secure these goods from California or perhaps from New Orleans.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is there no cold storage shipping via the Panama canal to Vancouver?

Mr. RYERSON: No, not at present.

Mr. LADNER: You cannot ship bananas in that way. If members of the government and particularly the Minister of Finance would scrutinize this letter, which is from a responsible source and is quite comprehensive, they would not be disposed to pass legislation of this kind, in my judgment. They are simply imposing upon the people of Canada a discriminatory piece of legislation which puts a tax on the west as against the east. That is a bad policy, in my opinion.

Mr. ROBB: I will admit that if the only source of supply was the West Indies there might be something in what my hon. friend has said, but I repeat that I anticipate that a large quantity of bananas will come from the Fiji Islands.

Mr. LADNER: They will have to pay a duty.

Mr. ROBB: No, they will come in free.

Mr. LADNER: What steamship service is there?

Mr. ROBB: I was just coming to that. I was rather surprised that the gentleman living in Vancouver and so greatly interested in the trade of Vancouver; who has been in this House for three years and has heard us vote subsidies, is not aware that Canada pays $100,000 a year for a subsidized service to New Zealand and Australia calling at the Fiji Islands, and that under the contract the company is compelled to provide a certain amount of cold storage.

Mr. LADNER: But bananas are not carried in cold storage.

[Mr. Ladner.]

Mr. ROBB: I was with the president of the company when the planters of the Fiji Islands waited on him at Suva; they were very anxious to get into the Canadian market, and he said, "You give us the trade and we will provide the chilled storage to carry these bananas to Canada." The companies operating in central America, where we have no tariff, very naturally try to crowd these people out. They do not want the Fiji Island bananas to get into Canada; they are trying to hold the market now and my hon. friends opposite are innocently helping them. But if we can get that business for Canada it will help the Pacific coast as much as, and perhaps more than, any other part of Canada. If they do not come in from the Fiji Islands and the business is as large as represented to us, it will be profitable for steamers to run direct, because they will get a cargo both ways. Under this agreement we have a considerable preference for Canadian products such as flour, fish, condensed milk, butter, cheese and lumber; these are the main preferences. We have other preferences which I will not quote just now; hon. gentlemen can read the agreement, but in no case is the preference to be less than 66⅔ per cent of their general tariff. My hon. friends from the Pacific coast will enjoy these preferences, as well as those in other parts of Canada. They send their fish to the West Indies now, and when they can send their fish to the West Indies profitably surely they can buy bananas there.

Mr. LADNER: On the statement of the minister there is no reason why we should not be quite happy, but supposing the situation does not work out in that way. Will the minister assure the west now that if, when the legislation is in operation, there is a discrimination, and the supply of bananas for the people of the west is taxed, he will then review the situation so as to correct any inequality with respect to the tax on bananas as between the east and the west?

Mr. ROBB: I will assure my hon. friend now that we will admit bananas from the Fiji Islands free if this arrangement goes through.

Mr. CLARK: The minister, in a tone of more or less derision, suggests that there is a steamship service with the Fiji Islands and that I should know all about it. I know this much about that steamship service, that there is no service to-day which will supply the market for bananas in British Columbia. I can state without hesitation that the steamship service is not sufficiently frequent. For a perishable fruit such as bananas, according to the trade in British Columbia, you must have a frequent service.

Mr. ROBB: How frequent?

Mr. CLARK: I have forgotten exactly, but they now get a car a week, and I presume that the reason they bring them in in small carload lots is to save the very heavy storage charges at that end. I am quite sure the minister knows that if the steamship service with the Fiji Islands is a monthly service, it is no more.

Mr. ROBB: I think it is every three weeks; it might be monthly.

Mr. CLARK: The service is not sufficiently frequent, and consequently it has been proven in practice that although bananas have been on the free list this service has not actually brought bananas into Vancouver. So if the subsidy of $100,000 is supposed to bring bananas to British Columbia it is very badly spent. However, I feel certain that even if the minister puts bananas from the Fiji Islands on the free list it will not provide a solution at all, because the people of British Columbia must continue to get their bananas through New Orleans and pay a penalty which other parts of Canada are not called upon to pay; we are paying a penalty for the benefit of West Indian labour. The only other alternative I see will be to pay nearly $2 per hundred more in freight rates to haul our bananas by rail from Halifax. These are the alternatives we are faced with, and I very strongly suggest that so far as British Columbia is concerned, and not only British Columbia but the whole west, the result will be an unfair discrimination against us.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think it is well to remember that under the West India treaty it is proposed that bananas will be brought into Canada not only through St. John and Halifax but through Montreal as well.

Mr. ROBB: Any Canadian port direct.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is true, but I think the contract would call for St. John, Halifax and Montreal. During the summer season, which is the principal season for the importation of bananas, large quantities are imported through Montreal. The minister may be able to tell us what quantity of bananas now come from the Fiji islands. It will hardly do to say that this fruit is not imported from those islands at the present time, because two years ago I personally saw bananas loaded on to a boat for Vancouver. Undoubtedly there is a certain trade in bananas even to-day from Fiji to Vancouver. Has the minister any information with regard to the volume of this trade?

Mr. ROBB: None.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Chairman, I would point out to the minister that I have a letter under my hand which says that at the present time the city of Vancouver is consuming seven or eight cars of bananas per week, that is one car per day. We are told that the service between the Fiji islands and Canada calls for a boat every three weeks. It would require twenty-one carloads of bananas to supply the trade of Vancouver during this period. Can the minister tell me if there is any such accommodation on the boats plying on this route?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the information offhand as to the accommodation. The boats are a considerable size, one is 15,000 tons, another 12,000 and the third is 7,000. I would suggest that my hon. friend from Cariboo sit in with my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard and check up the statistics. He has just told us that Vancouver uses one car a week; my hon. friend says seven.

Mr. CLARK: Excuse me: one car a week in the winter and seven cars in the summer.

Mr. FRASER: One car a week in the winter time and one car a day in the summer time. The minister assures us that the west coast is to get as good and as cheap a service from the Fiji islands as is being enjoyed at the present time. Supposing the supply of bananas is not available either from lack of space, crop failure or something of the kind, how are you going to make up the difference of $1.92 between the rate of $3.79½ from Halifax and the rate of $1.87½ from New Orleans?

Mr. ROBB: I should not like to be drawn into a commitment for the supply of bananas to any part of Canada, but I may tell my hon. friend that British Columbia has the same concessions for its products going to the West Indies as has any other part of Canada. I imagine they would tell me that British Columbia produces more fish than any other province. Well, there is considerable advantage under this agreement for the fish trade of Canada.

Mr. RYERSON: I do not think hon. members from British Columbia or the prairies need concern themselves much about any discrimination. In my opinion the whole scheme is impracticable. Notwithstanding this arrangement, I believe that 90 per cent of our bananas will still come from the United States, and in that case this is merely a tariff for revenue. I have letters from dealers in many parts of Ontario and also from Manitoba and the west in which they express the opinion that it is utterly impossible for them to consider bringing in bananas through Canadian ports. The entire distribution of bananas is scientifically arranged by the three large companies engaged in the business. They are distributed from New Orleans, Baltimore, New York, Philadelphia and Boston, and every centre is reached within eight days. Let me give a few figures of comparative distances. The estimated distance direct from Kingston, Jamaica, to Halifax, is 1,834 nautical miles. The 14 knot passenger service which is provided for in the West India treaty would cover this distance in 138 hours; from Halifax to central Ontario points you have to allow another 120 hours; extra time for stops at the Bahamas and Bermuda would consume a further 24 hours—in all 282 hours, or 11½ days. If the bananas are distributed from Montreal we would have to add one day to this time, for the simple reason that the water trip from Halifax to Montreal would be just that much longer than the rail haul. The distance from Kingston, Jamaica, by the freight service, which is every other week, would take one day longer. The distance from Kingston, Jamaica, to Baltimore, New York and Philadelphia is given as 1,440 nautical miles, that would mean 103 hours, and the rail journey to central Ontario points would take 48 hours, making in all 151 hours. In other words, 6 days and 7 hours against a possible 12½ to 13 days via Canadian ports. New Orleans and Mobile receive their supplies altogether from Central America, and in no case is the time over eight days from the point of shipment in Central America to our markets. This alone makes a difference of anywhere from three to five days. In addition, the dealers have the option of buying their bananas from every one of the ports mentioned every day of the week; they do not have to wait for their supplies. Take a firm handling three cars of bananas a week which many of our Ontario and Quebec firms do; they would have to buy them all at one time. Does the minister know that bananas cannot be held for an indefinite time for the simple reason that they cannot be kept in cold storage or in a temperature below 50 degrees for any length of time without becoming useless? On the other hand, in hot weather bananas can be held for only a very few days or they will become over-ripe.

For that reason we have the trade throughout the whole Dominion buying their supplies from ports not more than three, four or five days distant from the source of supply. Any day of the week they can get their bananas delivered, for instance, on Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays. I think the House will see how impracticable the scheme will be in view of the present distribution.

There is another thing I should like to point out to the minister. Why are the large importing companies who are looking for business all the time—there are three or four of them, but three anyway—not distributing from Montreal and Halifax now? If it were feasible to do so I know that those companies would be moving bananas from those ports now. These companies can still bring bananas to Canadian ports direct. If another service is inaugurated there is no reason why the existing companies cannot come up the St. Lawrence with their bananas and enjoy the benefit of the free entry. That would practically ruin any opposition that might be attempted. In my opinion all these matters are worth considering. If the government simply wants the tariff for revenue I contend that a duty of fifty cents a bunch is too high. If for revenue purposes I suggest that a duty of twenty-five cents a bunch would be ample. If the tariff is needed for the other purpose I think it is entirely useless.

Mr. ROBB: I want to answer my hon. friend who has just made two points. One point is that rather than try to divert this business to Canadian ports we should allow it to remain in New Orleans.

Mr. RYERSON: Not at all.

Mr. ROBB: That is the unmistakable inference from the argument my hon. friend has advanced. And all the afternoon it has been argued that we should insist upon preference for preference and encourage Canadian trade. May I point out to my hon. friend,—and he was speaking particularly for Ontario —that he cannot sell the condensed milk, butter, and cheese, of Ontario in the United States market on the same favourable terms as he can under this agreement with the West India islands, and that if the business is distributed from New Orleans or Baltimore the railway that will get the long haul will be a United States railway. On the other hand if the imports come through Halifax, St. John, or Montreal, Canadian railways will get the benefit of the long haul, Canadian workmen at those ports will profit by the handling of the commodity, and the returning vessels will carry Canadian products intended for the West India islands. My hon. friend has argued that these products are distributed from Baltimore and New Orleans. I submit that if they can be shipped from St. John, Halifax, or Montreal and distributed to points in Ontario it would not take any longer than would the distribution from New Orleans.

Mr. RYERSON: The difference in time between shipments from New Orleans and shipments from Halifax is about five days.

Mr. ROBB: I am talking about products originating in the West India islands. They can be shipped from Montreal and distributed in Ontario just as quickly as they can from Baltimore. As to the other point my hon. friend made, I wondered when he made his statement if he was on the inside and knew something of the distributing companies at present doing this business. It has been stated that these companies could come in under this agreement and distribute the fruit throughout Canada. I do not contradict that. I do not see that there is anything in the agreement to hinder anybody from engaging in the business.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—105a. Pineapples in air-tight cans or other air-tight packages, n.o.p., the weight of cans or other packages to be included in the weight for duty, per pound: British preferential tariff, ½ cent; intermediate tariff, 2½ cents; general tariff, 2½ cents.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—134. All sugar above number sixteen Dutch standard in colour, and all refined sugars of whatever kinds, grades or standards, not covered by tariff item No. 135, and sugar syrups testing over fifty-six degrees of polarization, when not exceeding eighty-eight degrees of polarization, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 83 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.50; general tariff, $1.50.

When exceeding eighty-eight degrees but not exceeding eighty-nine degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 85 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.53; general tariff, $1.53.

When exceeding eighty-nine degrees but not exceeding ninety degrees, per one hundrd pounds: British preferential tariff, 87 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.55; general tariff, $1.55.

When exceeding ninety degrees but not exceeding ninety-one degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 89 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.58; general tariff, $1.58.

When exceeding ninety-one degrees but not exceeding ninety-two degrees, per one hundrd pounds: British preferential tariff, 91 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.62; general tariff, $1.62.

When exceeding ninety-two degrees but not exceeding ninety-three degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 93 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.65; general tariff, $1.65.

When exceeding ninety-three degrees but not exceeding ninety-four degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 95 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.68; general tariff, $1.68.

When exceeding ninety-four degrees but not exceeding ninety-five degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 97 cents; intermediate tariff, $1.70; general tariff, $1.70.

When exceeding ninety-five degrees but not exceeding ninety-six degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, 99 cents; Intermediate tariff, $1.74; general tariff, $1.74.

When exceeding ninety-six degrees but not exceeding ninety-seven degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, $1.01; intermediate tariff, $1.77; general tariff, $1.77.

When exceeding ninety-seven degrees but not exceeding ninety-eight degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, $1.03; intermediate tariff, $1.80; general tariff, $1.80.

When exceeding ninety-eight degrees but not exceeding ninety-nine degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, $1.09; intermediate tariff, $1.89; general tariff, $1.89.

When exceeding ninety-nine degrees, per one hundred pounds: British preferential tariff, $1.09; intermediate tariff, $1.89; general tariff, $1.89.

Provided that refined sugar shall be entitled to entry under the British Preferential Tariff upon evidence satisfactory to the Minister of Customs and Excise, that such refined sugar has been manufactured wholly from raw sugar produced in the British colonies and possessions, and not otherwise.

Provided further that sugar imported under this item shall not be subject to special duty in excess of three-fourths of one cent per pound.

Mr. CAHAN: In respect of these reductions on sugar, are the British preferential tariff rates mentioned in the first column the rates which will be levied on sugars coming in under the West India treaty? Do they coincide? I have been endeavouring to obtain a copy of the West India treaty from the distribution office but I have not been able to get one this evening.

Mr. ROBB: Is my hon. friend referring to item 134?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change whatever in that. I will point this out to my hon. friend if he will follow me: He will notice the words near the foot of the item after the figures "135"— —and sugar syrups testing over fifty-six degrees of polarization, when not exceeding eighty-eight degrees of—

And so on. That was put in for administrative purposes because we discovered that sugar was being melted and brought in in tank cars at about a quarter of the proper rate and defrauding the revenues of the country.

Mr. CAHAN: Do I understand from the minister then that except for this further more explicit definition—

Mr. ROBB: There is no change.

Mr. CAHAN: Then except for the purposes of the department the item remains the same?

Mr. ROBB: Just the same.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is the refined sugar, is it not?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, the refined sugar.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Would the minister be good enough to tell us the exact difference in the number of cents per hundred pounds between the figures which are in item 134 and the figures that will appear in connection with the west India and the Australia treaties?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure that I follow my hon. friend. I think he is referring to the next item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The change is in item 135.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Then as I understand it this item does not interfere in any way with the rates charged for refined sugar coming in from the West Indies and Australia?

Mr. ROBB: The rates are exactly the same as they were before.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I understand it there is a change made in our raws. The raws are made cheaper than they were before, but there is absolutely no change in connection with our refined sugar. Item 134 stands as it was before except for the little change in the wording which does not amount to anything.

Mr. ROBB: Except for that there is no change whatever.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Under this tariff a preference is given to bananas landed at Canadian ports. May I ask if the same principle is applied to sugar landed at Canadian ports?

Mr. ROBB: Beginning the first of January.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): To enjoy the preference, sugar coming into Canada must be landed at a Canadian port?

Mr. ROBB: Under this rate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it that means everything?

Mr. ROBB: Everything.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. DAVIS: I look upon this as one of the most important things we are going to deal with in connection with the tariff. We have to-day in the Dominion two big sugar refineries which are only producing ten per cent of the sugar consumed in Canada. Now, if there is one industry that should be taken care of and protected it is the sugar industry. Last year there was a sugar factory built in the town of Raymond, Alberta, which has been very successful. While last year there were only eight thousand acres under cultivation, this year ten thousand acres are being cultivated. The seed for the production of the sugar beet is brought into Canada from Germany. To produce all the sugar used in Canada which could be produced from sugar beet we could have under cultivation 300,000 acres of land, giving employment to 100,000 people. To transfer that into sugar we could have ten factories of an equal capacity to the one at Wallaceburg. In Alberta we have 1,000,000 acres of irrigated land, and I suggest that there is no place in the Dominion where sugar beets can be grown more successfully than in that province. The average yield per acre from the sugar beet is about 2,200 pounds of sugar. If there is a bright spot in Canada for development it is in connection with the sugar industry, and seed can be produced in British Columbia of an equal quality with any seed that has ever been shipped from Germany. It will take three-quarters of a million dollars' worth of seed to produce the sugar in quantities sufficient for home consumption. I leave these thoughts with the government for their consideration when making treaties. Let them consider what a great advantage that would be to Canada as a whole and what an enormous amount of employment it would give. In order to make it a huge success and to make the business profitable, the industry must, in common with all other industries, be protected to some extent. All I ask is that the government give a kindly hearing to these representations and endeavour to stimulate that industry in which such a great amount of labour can be employed. We have a splendid foundation for such an industry in Canada, and taking it all in all I think Canada has a great future before it in the development of this industry.

Mr. BURY: I notice that all these figures represent considerable reduction on the sugar items under item 135. I am not sufficiently familiar with the sugar industry in Alberta, but it seems to me that this item is going in the wrong direction. Under the previous tariff the British preferential, for instance, on the first item under number 135, was 35 cents. Here is a reduction of almost 15 cents. In the same manner in the next item there is a reduction of practically 15 cents, and every single item under 135 shows a considerable reduction. I cannot see that the result will be otherwise than to injure the Alberta industry.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): It has already hurt it in Essex and Kent.

Mr. DAVIS: Did the minister not say the duties had not been reduced in respect to this industry?

Mr. ROBB: Not on the refined.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But on the raw.

Mr. BURY: Here is 41 cents reduced to 21 cents and 41.50 reduced to 21.89, in some cases almost cut in two.

Mr. CAHAN: With regard to the British preferential tariff rates under item 135, are those the rates which will apply in case the British West India treaty is ratified, or will the British West India treaty necessitate a further reduction from these preferential tariff rates, as specified in the resolution now before the House?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are these not the treaty rates?

Mr CAHAN: Are the rates mentioned under the British preferential tariff in item 135 the reduced rates which will be enforced in accordance with the terms of the British West India treaty, or will the British West India treaty involve a further reduction than the rates here specified?

Mr. ROBB: No, these are the rates.

Mr. CAHAN: It seems to me absurd that we should have negotiated a treaty with the British West Indies, asking from them certain reductions and preferences in view of this parliament making certain reductions in the tariff and giving certain preferences to the West Indies, and yet before the West India treaty is ratified we re-enact a rate of duty which takes from the government all power of future negotiation with respect to the matter. This is resolution number 2, and schedule A is in resolution number 2. Resolution number 5 enacts:

That any enactment founded on the foregoing resolutions number two and three shall be deemed to have come into force on the sixteenth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-six, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

So that now, with the West India treaty negotiated but not yet ratified, in respect to which the government have not presented the detailed information to the House which was promised as soon as certain tenders for steamships were received, the minister comes to the House and asks us by statute to enact that since the 16th day of April 1926, these reductions have actually been made which were the consideration offered by the government for certain tariff considerations to be granted by the West Indies. In other words, before the treaty is ratified we are now giving to the British West Indies, without any consideration having been offered by them in the way of tariff reductions, a free gift which takes away from the government all power of negotiation.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend, who is an old experienced parliamentarian and who has been following the business of parliament for many years, will remember that in 1921, when the party he now supports made a treaty with the West India Islands, they adopted the same process and procedure.

Mr. CAHAN: Before the treaty had been negotiated?

Mr. ROBB: After the treaty was negotiated, and it came into force the day the minister presented his budget. That is the way it is generally done. The hon. member says we are giving to the West Indies a gift or an additional concession. We are doing nothing of the kind. We are giving an additional concession—I will admit that at once—to the West India planter and to the Canadian sugar refiner. The Canadian sugar refiner will get a part of this benefit.

Mr. CAHAN: In what respect?

Mr. ROBB: Because there is an additional something over 16 cents a hundred in their favour. I imagine they will divide it between them. Let me point this out to my hon. friend and to my friend from the west. When the West India delegates were in Canada they were most insistent that we should give them some additional advantages in their gray sugars. They wanted to get their grays into this market. We said: No, we must look after Canadian interests and the Canadian refiners. We had in mind the beet industries that were started throughout Canada and the Canadian refining industry that employs labour. We insisted on that, but I am not so sure to-day whether we were quite wise or not. I notice in the press of the United States that there is a good deal of criticism of the protection given to the refiners of that country, and I have noticed some of the same criticism in Canada. It is true there is not much to-day because sugar is fairly cheap; the raw sugar is cheap and consequently the refined is down in price. But if the price of sugar became high again we might find an agitation throughout this country for a little cheaper sugar for the Canadian people, so that I think we are dealing fairly well with the trade generally and with the West India planter.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not understand that a preference given to the West Indies is of very much advantage to the Canadian sugar refiner, because the Canadian refiner of imported raw sugar will certainly charge up again to the Canadian consumer whatever duty he pays on the raw article. But this is the point I wish to make: We have negotiated a treaty with the West Indies; that treaty has been submitted to the consideration of this House and it is not yet ratified. In the treaty there appear certain provisions with regard to steamship subsidies and the employment of steamships. The Minister of Finance stated before the long adjournment that at the close of that adjournment he hoped to be in a position to place before the House the result of the tenders then being received so that the House would be in a position to decide definitely whether or not it would ratify the West India treaty as a whole. But before that treaty, which provides for certain preferences on the sugar tariff in favour of the West Indies, has been finally ratified by the House the minister presents to us resolutions granting to the West Indies every preference which the West Indies would have had if the treaty itself had been ratified. I ask the minister if he is not thereby throwing away every consideration which he offered to the West India delegates as grounds for their making corresponding concessions to Canada. He says: This is the ordinary practice of the House and the practice which was followed when the previous West India treaty was brought before the House by the previous government. I suggest to the minister that when the reductions were made in the general tariff on the previous occasion the West India treaty had been ratified by parliament, and these tariff amendments were made in order to conform to the treaty which had been ratified. It seems to me, with all deference, that the Minister of Finance, if I may use the expression, is now placing the cart before the horse. Before the treaty is ratified, before he is in a position to place before the House the material and salient facts which will be grounds for ratification of that treaty, we have resolutions introduced which grant all those concessions and which under the terms of the fifth resolution come into full force and effect on the 16th day of April, 1926.

In order to deal fairly with the public interests of this country I suggest to the minister that we should in these resolutions take power in the government to make the reductions which are here made, but that the reductions so made should come into force only by authority of an order in council to be passed when the corresponding treaty with the British West Indies comes into full force and operation. I am suggesting that as being fair to the House and to the country and conserving the interests of all parties.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think no attention should be paid to the remarks of the hon. member.

Mr. ROBB: I was waiting to see if other hon. gentlemen had observations to make.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would be a good thing to get rid of this question; it is the same as I have suggested with regard to the cocoa item. These are treaty items and the treaty is not yet ratified. There are some difficulties in connection with the treaty and my hon. friend has recognized them. He has recognized in connection with bananas that the matter cannot become law now. He keeps his hand on it; he is going to police it. The change in the duty on bananas does not come into effect now; it will come into effect only when the government takes action. All that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is suggesting is that precisely the same thing shall be done in connection with sugar as has been done in connection with bananas. It is done in connection with bananas simply because there is the contingency not only that the treaty may not be ratified but that there may be difficulties in regard to supplying the service. But the fact that the difficulty is greater in connection with bananas than in connection with sugar is no reason why the same course should not be followed in connection with both. If my hon. friend will arrange when the bill comes down to have a provision inserted that the change will come into effect only when the appropriate order in council is passed after the agreement is ratified, that is the easiest thing to do. If my hon. friend says he will do it, the thing is settled at once.

Mr. ROBB: I am following the procedure which my hon. friend followed in 1921. I have under my hand a memorandum sent out to the collectors of customs and excise indicating that the West India rates have been brought into effect prior to the ratification of the treaty. Regarding the observations of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I hold the position again that this is a concession to the Canadian people as well as to the West India planter. They may divide it between them, but this additional concession on the raws cannot all go to the planter. If later for any reason the West India agreement is not put through, there will be nothing to hinder us in another parliament from correspondingly reducing the duty on refined sugars. Does my hon. friend favour a reduction in refined sugars corresponding to the reduction in the raws?

Mr. CAHAN: If there is a reduction in raw sugar and no corresponding reduction in refined sugar you give a greater protection to the refiners than they had before. It all depends upon the disclosures of an investigation as to whether the refiners are getting sufficient protection or too much, whether they are profiteering or not. What I say is this: In order to negotiate with the British West Indies we need to keep up the tariff on raw sugars. For my part I would keep them up on refined sugars to a corresponding extent so as to give adequate protection to the Canadian refiners. The minister by proposing to put the reduction in raw sugars into force from a specified date, is giving to the West Indies, without any consideration in return, a concession which he previously reserved as a ground on which to negotiate a treaty which he commends to the House for support. That is impolitic and it is unbusinesslike. I suggest that he reconsider that decision, because, in my opinion at least, when the bill comes before the House for discussion we should protest the manner in which the minister is carrying out these reductions before the treaty has been ratified by parliament. In the bill he might very well consider the advisability of bringing this provision into operation by order in council after the treaty has been ratified. If that treaty were not ratified I for one would not endorse the reductions at all. I am simply supporting them, if I do support them, on the ground that they are concessions given in a treaty with the West Indies in return for which we are to receive certain equivalent values. On that ground I am prepared to consider favourably the items suggested in the West India treaty. On the other hand the minister recognizes, I am sure, as well as does the hon. member for East Lambton, that in making these reductions on raw sugar he is taking away from the beet sugar industry of this country a large part of the protection which it now has. He is in effect, without any inquiry or even any suggestion of an inquiry, reducing the protection which has been allowed to the cultivation of beets in Canada, and he will destroy to a very large extent, I believe, and certainly will prejudice very seriously the Canadian producers of beet-root. There is no doubt, from the knowledge and experience we have, that beets can be grown in the province of Quebec in sufficient quantities to supply a large part of the sugar needed for consumption in that province. We all know, too, that Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia are in large part as well adapted to the growing of beets and the production of beet sugar as are Germany, Belgium and northern France, and there is no reason in the world why we should not, so far as we possibly can, safeguard and foster that growing industry, looking to the future.

To sum up, therefore: my objection is that by statute the minister is now reducing the tariff, the reductions to come into force from a specified date, when they should be made effective only upon ratification of the treaty. He should reserve the power to make the reductions by order in council, contingent upon the treaty with the West Indies being ratified. In any case, in my point of view, he should put up the duty even higher on raw sugar, giving a preference to the West Indies and at the same time retaining adequate protection for this growing industry in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: Had my hon. friend been one of those who negotiated the agreement with the West Indies he would have had the representation made to him that an increase in the protection would meet with serious opposition from the fruit growers of Ontario who require sugars in large quantities for the canning industry; and if he had ventured to put up the duty as high as he now suggests he would have put the canning industry out of business.

Mr. CAHAN: I take exception to that statement entirely; I know something about the matter.

Mr. ROBB: That is the opinion of the men who grow fruit, and that was the representation made to us.

Mr. CAHAN: All the more reason for an inquiry.

Mr. ROBB: They know something about their own business. Far from putting the beet sugar industry in a serious position we are improving it, because we are stabilizing the industry for twelve years under this agreement. For that length of time the spread now proposed will be maintained. As regards making changes in the bill, I will consider the matter overnight, although I should prefer to follow the procedure of the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and put it through. My hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) quarrels because we are putting this through before the West India agreement is ratified. May I suggest that there is no one more responsible for the delay than the hon. gentleman himself. He led a group of gentlemen who carried on a debate from the seventh of January, causing a serious delay.

Mr. MANION: We were no more responsible for that delay than hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. ROBB: Well, admitting that we were all in it—

Mr. MANION: Yes, admit that.

Mr. ROBB: —there has been a delay, just the same. The West Indies carried out their part of the bargain, putting through the necessary legislation so far as they were concerned. I do not know whether my hon. friend was in the House when I told hon. members that representations had been made to us that certain people were prepared to put on a steamer service between Canada and the West Indies. We want therefore to be in a position to enjoy the benefits of the trade at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. CAHAN: I want to repudiate one suggestion. The minister as a man of honour will admit that he has never yet been in a position to submit to the House the actual facts necessary to enable the House to form an opinion, either favourable or unfavourable, upon the West India treaty. Long ago the minister admitted that he had delayed asking for tenders so long that, as a matter of fact, the returns had not yet come in, so that he was unable to give us any details whatever as to the cost of the proposed service. It is therefore entirely his own fault that nothing has been done in the matter. Whether it was himself or someone else that did so I cannot remember, but a member sought to excuse the government on the ground that they had been so taken up with the elections in September and October as to have had no opportunity for calling for tenders and placing the facts before the country. I therefore take no responsibility for any delay. Personally I do not wish to press the matter. I am not sufficiently informed as to the practices that have formerly obtained, but I am free to admit that in my opinion there have been many bad practices which should be avoided by future governments, and this is one. We should not reduce our general tariff to correspond with preferential treaties before those preferential treaties are in force.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I had to tell my hon. friend the other day that it was a matter of astonishment to me that he is so keen on following form and leaving out substance; he follows the letter but always forgets the principle. If he would only follow the principle of former administrations we would not have to say anything at all to him; he would be right. However, my hon. friend says that he will consider the matter and see what can be done, so I will say no more at present. But I would like to ask my hon. friend the reason for the changes in the schedule, apart from those changes necessitated by the West India treaty?

Mr. ROBB: It was pointed out by men accustomed to figure out these polarization tests that it was not quite correct, and this is brought in to follow exactly the practice of the British Board of Customs and Excise.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are these now in accordance with the British board?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I notice that the rearrangement does not seem to be made under any exact percentage at all, over and above what we had before.

Mr. ROBB: It was taken up at the time by the experts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If you take polarization at 90 degrees, which I think is a practical degree, you will notice that besides the change which would be necessary for the treaty under the British preferential tariff, there are changes in the intermediate and general tariffs. For example, the general tariff was $1.07457; it is now advanced to $1.11000, and while that is advanced I see that on higher degrees of polarization, taking the 98 degrees as an example, it is reduced. Do I understand now that that is merely correcting former errors?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. If my hon. friend will look at the minutes of the meeting he will discover that the West India experts and the Canadian representatives had a considerable discussion, and we suggested that they retire as a committee and agree upon it. This is exactly in conformity with the practice of the British Board of Customs and Excise, which enables them to keep their records correct. They have a preference in the United Kingdom as well.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Our importations under the preferential tariff are small as compared with those under other tariffs, as I recall it; I think we get a great deal of our raws from Cuba, which does not come under the British preferential tariff. But why should there be a change made in the intermediate and general tariffs this time?

Mr. ROBB: I imagine it is making it uniform, to correspond with the others.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But it is not made uniform; there is no uniform change at all. In connection with the British preferential there is a drop of almost 15 per cent, while in the intermediate tariff the drop is not 10 cents.

Mr. ROBB: The error might have been greater before; that is the only explanation I have in mind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But that is an explanation which cannot explain. You will find the same condition where you have rectified it.

Mr. ROBB: They start at 96 degrees and work back.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not the point. You have a reduction in the British tariff altogether out of line with those reductions made in the intermediate and general tariffs. I am not raising any point as to that reduction, but if the sole reason for the changes in the intermediate and general tariffs is that the preferential tariff is changed, why is not the proportion preserved?

Mr. ROBB: I understand it was simply made to conform with the British practice. I am bound to say that it was beyond me to understand those experts when they were figuring it out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend will see that when we had a higher degree of protection our sugar beet growers were much better looked after. I am delighted to see one thing, however; my hon. friend to-day is a convert to the ideas of his predecessors as to the necessity of stability. He said to-day that this is a great thing for the growers of sugar beets in Canada, because they will now know that for twelve years they are to have stability. So I take it that he is now a convert to what Mr. Fielding told us a few years ago as to the necessity of tariff stability.

Mr. CAHAN: Where does the stability come in?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Because a contract has been made with the West Indies which is to run for twelve years.

Mr. CAHAN: But it does not prevent this government from reducing the tariff still more in favour of the West Indies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, but the minister says there will be stability now, because that contract runs for twelve years. The great thing is that we now have a convert to tariff stability, although I do not know how long the conversion will last. Be that as it may, I would like to ask what the minister's advice is as to the manner in which the product of the sugar beet grower is purchased. I understand that it is purchased having regard to the cost of raw cane sugars; then again there is a further determining factor, the degree of sugar content in the sugar beet. Those are the two factors. I would like to know whether in fixing this duty, having regard to the position of the sugar beet grower, my hon. friend has considered that question and whether he thinks I am stating the position correctly. If not, perhaps he would say what the correct position is. I want to know upon what basis prices are fixed for the sugar beet growers in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: It is upon the saccharine content, I think.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Plus what?

Mr. ROBB: I can get that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can tell my hon. friend; it is something absolutely necessary to know. It is not only based upon the saccharine content, but also upon the general ruling price of cane raws.

Mr. ROBB: I think that is so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend agrees. What is my hon. friend told by those doing the figuring for him that the effect of a drop in the price of raw cane sugars of 5 cents a hundred, as a result of a reduction of 5 cents in the duty, has upon a ton of sugar beets? Is the reduction to the grower as I have found it to be, 50 cents? Perhaps my hon. friend can ascertain that now.

Mr. ROBB: I do not think I could give that information to my hon. friend. But, as he knows, there has been a great drop in the price of raws all over the world.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: I will admit at once that the growers of beets have not the same encouragement to-day to put in their crop as they had when the prices were very much higher.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We really require to know the basis, Mr. Chairman, when we consider what we are doing to the producers of sugar beets. Surely my hon. friend's adviser can tell him whether I am right or wrong, that when you wipe 5 cents a hundred off the duty on cane sugars you automatically knock 50 cents a ton off the value of the product of the sugar beet producer. I think this is right.

Mr. ROBB: I am told they are practically in the same position as they were before under the general tariff.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend really serious about that? Is it the position of this government that in connection with the importation of raws the amount of duty is not reflected in the price, and that there is not a decrease in the cost of raw sugars in Canada when the duty is reduced? Will my hon. friend say that? It follows from his former remark.

Mr. ROBB: If the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is right there is no difference

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not what I asked. The hon. minister said a few minutes ago, Mr. Chairman, if I understood him rightly—he will correct me if I am wrong, for I do not wish to misrepresent him—he said that the position of our beet growers was just as it was before having regard to the general tariff.

Mr. ROBB: Practically.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But there are reductions in the general tariff. Is it the position of this government that there is no economy whatever to be got out of reducing duties? That follows from what he has said. I know very often that that is true; but is that the position of this government? We have been told that a reduction in duty is a great thing for the consumer. Now my hon. friend says it makes no difference at all.

Mr. ROBB: No, I said the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George had said it would make no difference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think so. I thought the hon. gentleman said that the beet man was left in the same position.

Mr. ROBB: Practically in the same position under the general tariff.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Although the general tariff has been reduced, I want to be absolutely fair to my hon. friend in connection with this. Surely he will admit—he has already admitted it—that as the price is fixed having regard to the cost of these raws, if, for example, we got in enough sugar under the British preferential tariff to look after all our raws, why then the grower of sugar beets would be practically out of business; there would be a reduction there proportionately of almost fifty per cent. But I am quite willing to admit, Mr. Chairman, that that is not the case, that we have a lot of sugars which do not come in under this item. But what does my hon. friend say as to the protection that ought to be given to the grower of sugar beets; where does he come in here? What is my hon. friend's idea as to the proportion that his price is cut? It seems to me his price would be cut five per cent again. That was done in 1923 by the Fielding budget.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. minister is not going to answer the member for West York, I should like to place myself on record as being strongly opposed to this item in every particular. I have already given a great many figures in support of my argument, and I do not intend to prolong the debate any more than to put myself on record, as I have said, strongly in opposition to this item going through in its present form. The member for East Calgary has already told the committee what a serious effect the reduction would have on the sugar beet farmers in his riding. Should you come down to my part of Ontario where tens of thousands of acres of sugar beets are grown, and where hundreds of thousands of acres could be put under sugar beet cultivation to advantage, you would appreciate how important it is, Mr. Chairman, that instead of discouraging sugar beet growing by lowering the duty on raw sugars our sugar beet producers should be given every encouragement. To-day raw beets from tens of thousands of acres in western Ontario are being sent to the United States sugar refineries, 83 cents a ton excise tax being paid on every ton of those beets entering the United States. There the beets are manufactured into refined sugar, which is brought back into Canada, because we produce only 10 per cent of our requirements. We are importing the other 90 per cent when we should be encouraging the industry here.

Let me draw the minister's attention to a few of the facts put on Hansard the other day by the member for Kent (Mr. Chaplin).

He mentioned that when in 1923 the minister reduced the duty half a cent a pound the refineries at Chatham and Wallaceburg reduced the price of sugar beets to the farmers 50 cents a ton. Now, if I understand it correctly—and the information I have is from a most reliable source—this further reduction in duty will amount at least to one cent a pound. If that is the case, then our farmers can expect for the next twelve years that another dollar per ton will be taken off their sugar beets in order that the West Indies and Australia may have this preference. I apeal to the minister to consider the matter very seriously. I have already told him of a sugar refinery that was under way in my home town when the minister made the reduction of half a cent a pound on refined sugar, a refinery on which $200,000 had been expended, contributed to by four thousand farmers. Those people are very anxious to carry on. The member for Kent told the minister that in 1923 there were 40,000 acres under sugar beets in his riding, and after the reduction in the duty on refined sugar the area cultivated dropped the following year to 30,000 acres, and that he does not expect the acreage this year will be over 20,000 acres. If the minister would come to my riding, which adjoins that of the hon. gentleman in question, he would find a similar state of affairs. Ever since the reduction was made in the duty on refined sugar. and the fifty cents bounty per ton was taken off sugar beets, the farmers have become so discouraged that they have decreased the crop year by year. This further reduction will help to drive them out of business.

I have just one other word to say and it is this: I want the minister to remember that while the farmers were getting $8 and $10 a ton at outside points for sugar beets some years ago, to-day they are only receiving $5 or $5.50 per ton. The men who raise those beets have to do the hardest kind of work, and the beets have to be taken to market when the roads are in the worst possible condition. I again urge upon the minister the need of giving assistance to the sugar beet growers of Canada, either along some other line, or else restoring the tariff to where it stood some years ago.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister any idea under what conditions sugar is grown in the West Indies? Is the labour employed indentured labour or free labour?

Mr. ROBB: I understand that in the West India islands there is no indentured labour of any kind. In Australia, as my hon. friend knows, where they boast of having a white man's country, one of their difficulties is the high cost of labour. I think there is some indentured labour in the Fiji islands, and possibly in British Guiana. I do not know of any other places where the system obtains.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I may say that sugar is produced in the West India islands, speaking generally, by labour that earns about forty cents a day.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the Minister of Finance not be quite frank and admit that the peculiar way in which this resolution is introduced, and that it is to come into force as of April, is due to the fact that hon. gentlemen have about made up their minds that the West India treaty is not likely to be ratified, and that they are offering these concessions to the West Indies as a solatium for not getting the full benefits of the treaty itself?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure that I understand my hon. friend? Does he insinuate that the West India agreement will not come into force? Is that the idea?

Mr. CAHAN: I am suggesting that possibly the tenders which the hon. gentleman received were so very high as to place it beyond the government's power to ratify and carry out the terms of the West India agreement, and it occurred to me that possibly this resolution is introduced as a solatium to the West India islands in case they do not get the full benefits of the treaty.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is wrong in his conjecture.

Mr. BURY: I should like to call the attention of the minister to the fact that the reductions proposed in the schedule now before us, which are not merely in respect of the British preferential tariff, but also in respect of the general tariff, follow very drastic reductions. For example, taking the first class of sugar mentioned in item No. 135, the British preferential tariff was reduced from 70 cents in 1922 to 35 cents in 1924. Now it is cut to 20.627 cents. The intermediate tariff in 1922 was $1.16080. In the last tariff which we are proposing to change now it was reduced to 81.08 cents, and a further reduction is now proposed to 70.851 cents. So that this really is not one reduction, it represents a process of reductions, reductions that must be hitting the beet growing industry in Alberta and elsewhere in Canada. What I want to know is why the reduction in the intermediate tariff and the general tariff are necessary. I understand that the reductions in the British preferential tariff are necessary, but why should reductions in the other tariffs be conceded?

Mr. ROBB: When my hon. friend was not in the House, I explained that the idea was to have uniformity and to follow the practice of the British Board of Customs and Excise. My hon. friend has mentioned rates as low as 81 and 71 cents, but there is practically no sugar which comes in under 90.40 polarization.

Mr. BURY: Are the beet growers of this country to lose the benefit of protection merely in order that the minister may adjust his schedule to some British schedule?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BURY: I cannot understand the minister's explanation of the reduction in the intermediate and the general tariffs. The minister has just explained this reduction by saying that he wanted to make his schedule conform to the English schedule. I ask him now, are the beet growers of this country to be put out of business simply because it is supposed to be of benefit that the schedule here should conform to the principles of the British schedule?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend, who comes from Alberta, will feel better satisfied if I tell him that I have under my hand a letter from the Canadian Sugar Factories Limited of Raymond, Alberta, who direct my attention to the difficulties of their business. They do not complain so much of the tariff, but they do tell me that they suffered considerably last year owing to early frosts, shrunken beets, and conditions of that kind. They go on to assure me that the people of Alberta are putting in practically the same acreage, indeed a little more, than they did the previous year. I imagine that they are going to make some request to the federal government or the provincial government because they direct my attention to the fact that the United Kingdom subsidizes the beet growers in that country.

Mr BURY: In other words, as I understand the minister, they are going to suggest a subsidy?

Mr. ROBB: I do not say they are, but they direct my attention to certain facts.

Mr. BURY: That appears to be the suggestion, that they will require a subsidy of some kind.

Mr. ROBB: No; I did not say that.

[Mr. Bury.]

Mr. BURY: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. ROBB: May 7, 1926.

Mr. BURY: Could the minister tell us whether the tariff changes embodied in this schedule were made before the sugar refiners wrote that letter?

Mr. ROBB: The budget was delivered on April 15. I do not say they are satisfied.

Mr. MANION: The minister said they did not complain much of the tariff. What did they say?

Mr. ROBB: They made a reference to the conditions and said they hoped there would be no further reduction.

An hon. MEMBER: Did they tell the minister how much money they lost last year?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Would the minister tell us the wages per day of the men working in the fields in the West Indies?

Mr. ROBB: I have not that information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the minister said about forty cents.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say so.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): On raw sugar delivered from the West Indies, how much more will the refineries at Wallaceburg and Chatham pay than the sugar refineries in the east?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure whether my hon. friend was in the House when the West India agreement was before us. I made a statement in reference to that matter. It was pointed out to me that the refinery at Wallaceburg would not be in as good a position as the refineries close to tidewater. It so happened that representatives of the two Canadian railways were in Ottawa at that time, and I suggested to them that inasmuch as they were sure of getting the additional haul on the West India business inward and outward they could very well afford to absorb the difference and place the refinery in Wallaceburg in as good a position as they would be if the product were being sent up from New York—because that is where they were getting it. The complaint was not of the change in the tariff, but that under the conditions they were compelled to come in by a Canadian port. Heretofore the product was brought in from New York, and it was thought reasonable they could meet the rate.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—156b. Angostura bitters, the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies enumerated in section 8A of the customs tariff 1907, when conveyed without transshipment by ship direct into a sea or river port of Canada, per gallon: British preferential tariff, $5; intermediate tariff, —; general tariff, —.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the two blanks there for?

Mr. ROBB: To make it clear that only the British preference is affected.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it not usual to put in the other rates so that there may be no misunderstanding?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): What is the object in reducing the rate from $10 to $5?

Mr. ROBB: It is a concession we gave to one of the islands—Trinidad, I think.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): What quantity of angostura bitters was used last year?

Mr. ROBB: I have no idea, I do not use any of them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I would imagine my hon. friend would have some idea before making a reduction of $5 in the rate.

Mr. ROBB: There was no separate classification.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Why take this item out from the other items and give it a preference of $5 over that which it had heretofore? Surely the minister made some inquiry as to the effect of the reduction? Or is it a parity with the whole tariff—based on no general principle, but simply a matter of convenience?

Mr. ROBB: It was represented to us during the conference that angostura bitters are used in the preparation of certain drugs. In the United States, where they are supposed to be bone dry—although we have heard through the customs inquiry they are not—the rate was only two and one-half. They wanted us to make it two and one-half, but we said it was a matter of revenue and we made it $5.

Mr. CAHAN: Angostura bitters were manufactured, unless there has been a recent change, by a family which employed about half a dozen hands. Why should a special consideration of $5 be made in favour of a family monopoly such as that?

Mr. ROBB: The rate is two and one-half in the United States and we are getting $5 out of it.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—216a. Cresylic acid when imported for use only by manufacturers in the manufacture of preparations for disinfecting, dipping and spraying: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BARBER: What is that?

Mr. ROBB: This is a new item. There is no separate classification of the imports, but the import is small. This acid will be used in the manufacture of non-alcoholic liquid preparations for disinfectant, dipping and spraying, which are subject to a duty in tariff item 209.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that produced here?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—295a. Zirconium silicate: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROBB: This is a new silicate. It is now subject to a rate of 15, 17½ and 17½; in the French convention it was 15¾. We propose to make it free all along the line. There is no separate classification of imports. It is used largely in the manufacture of fire clay and fire brick. Fire clay is free of duty and the fire brick is subject to a low rate of duty.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—384c. Rolled sheets of iron or steel coated with tin, of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada: British preference tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 5 per cent.

Mr. CAHAN: I think we should have some explanation in regard to this item. For some time past negotiations have been taking place in Montreal by manufacturers of rolled sheets of iron and steel. There have been negotiations also on behalf of American companies, and I understand that English and American interests have gone in with the Canadian undertaking for the manufacture at Montreal of rolled sheets and sheets of iron and tin, which would employ one thousand hands at least in the first year. I notice this item says: "Rolled sheets of iron or steel coated with tin, of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada." Does that mean that so soon as factories are established in Canada and begin to produce their output, this reduction

Mr. ROBB: It was 12½.

Mr. CAHAN: —that the old rate will ipso facto come into force?

Mr. ROBB: The understanding of the hon. member is I think correct. It has been represented to us for some time that an industry of this kind was to be established in Canada. It has not been established, and in the meantime the canning industry generally, fish, fruit and other products that are put up in tins, have been suffering. This is a concession to them It is estimated that one-half the tin plate is exported, in which case, as hon. members know they get a rebate of 99 per cent. We are now making it so that the local industries will be in a better position, and as my hon. friend pointed out, when it is made in Canada then it reverts to the other tariff item.

Mr. CAHAN: I am very anxious that that should be done, not that I have any personal interests in the matter, but the constituents whom I represent have a very deep interest in it. Will the hon. gentleman consult the Solicitor General or the attorneys of his department and see if the wording cannot be slightly changed so as to read:

Rolled sheets of iron or steel coated with tin, of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada and so long as it is not manufactured in Canada.

Or some such words as would make the item more clear and definite than it is at present, because as it is now worded those who are interested, after consulting their attorneys, are afraid that it may not mean just what I have suggested to the minister and what the minister confirms to be its meaning.

Mr. ROBB: I am here representing the people generally, and this is the language that has been followed in regard to some other items of the tariff. I can assure my hon. friend that the customs officials will deal fairly with this industry as they have dealt fairly with all other industries, but we do not propose to put ourselves in a position where some very clever attorney, in order to come under the act, may say to the Customs department: I am manufacturing this in Canada now, when perhaps he has only a little shop ten by twelve and is not manufacturing in sufficient quantities reasonably to supply the trade. The matter should be left to the officials to administer so that they may be certain that manufacturers are able to supply the public with a reasonable quantity. The law officers of the Department of Justice and the legal advisers of the Department of Customs and Excise advise us that this is the correct language for that sort of item.

Mr. CAHAN: I want nothing more than justice, and I am simply suggesting that justice should be done; that the factory should be one that can reasonably supply the trade or a large part of the trade. But in justice to those who are undertaking work of that kind I think the minister should make the item as clear and definite as possible in the statute so that there may be no misunderstanding. It is not the duty of the legal advisers of the Department of Customs and Excise to make laws or to add to or subtract from laws by interpretation. This matter is so vital that the hon. gentleman might at least consider whether it could not be made more definite by inserting, if necessary, this provision:

So long as it is not manufactured in Canada to an extent to satisfy the demand in Canada.

Or something of that kind.

Mr. ROBB: I understand the practice in the department is that it must be manufactured in commercial quantities. The customs officials are dealing with these items every day and my hon. friend can rely upon them to interpret the item fairly.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I would suggest that we pass over the automobile items and clean up the others. I imagine hon. members will desire to discuss the automobile items more fully.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend has some new light for us first.

Mr. ROBB: We will clean up the other items.

Customs tariff—448. Spraying machines, fruit or vegetable grading machines, incubators for hatching eggs, brooders for rearing young fowl, pruning hooks, pruning shears, hay loaders, potato-diggers, fodder or feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, farm or field rollers, post hole diggers, snaths, milking machines, milking machine attachments; centrifugal machines for testing butter fat, milk or cream; pasteurizers for dairying purposes; equipment for generating electric power for farm purposes only, viz: engine, generator, storage battery and switch board; stumping machines, and other agricultural implements, n.o.p., and complete parts of articles specified in this tariff item: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

The part referring to—

Pasteurizers for dairying purposes; equipment for generating electric power for farm purposes only, viz: engine, generator, storage battery and switchboard—

—is new.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the effect of it?

Mr. ROBB: The effect is to bring those items under that classification.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is supposed to be the effect on the treasury

Mr. ROBB: A loss of roughly $87,500.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): What is the present tariff on equipment for generating electric power for farm purposes?

Mr. ROBB: Ten, twenty-five and twenty-seven and one-half per cent. It is now reduced to five, ten and ten per cent. The items going into the manufacture of this can be imported at 6 per cent under the general tariff, under items 445a and 445b, so that we are not placing the manufacturers in any worse position. This is a concession to the farmers of the country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): How many firms are manufacturing these lighting plants in Canada and what is the value of the output during the past year from these factories?

Mr. ROBB: I regret I have not the information before me. I will try to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): In the meantime we shall have passed the item and damage will have been done. I know as a matter of fact some of these industries have been established in Canada under the impression that they would be practically safe with a tariff of 25 to 27 per cent. Now the minister proposes to reduce that to 10 per cent. Some of them have only recently been established and they are turning out a splendid output. They should receive some consideration from the government; the minister surely does not intend to allow the impression to go abroad that he has made this reduction without making any inquiry into the matter.

Mr. ROBB: I will admit that I have looked very carefully into the matter. I have observed outside and I have heard it frequently said in this House that the young men and women are being lured away from the farms to the bright lights of the cities. I propose, so far as I am able, to put it within the reach of the farmer, who is far away from the electric current in the cities, to have cheap light.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend gives us a very fine generalization, but I have not yet learned that tariffs are built upon generalizations. He has a laudable object in front of him and I would like to follow it out with him. I would like him to take any one item he likes and tell us what the difference in cost is to be to the people of the country. That is a question to be considered when we are going to get the bright lights on the farm. What does this mean?

Mr. ROBB: It means that the government will lose, as I said before, about $87,500 through reduction in customs revenue. We will not lose all of that in the manufactured product; we will lose part of it in the raw material that may be imported. Some raw material will be produced in Canada and not imported. We lose in addition to that $55,000 in sales tax so that there will be a concession of $142,500 of taxation, making it easier for people far away from electric current developed in the cities and from water power, to get their own electric light.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not told me yet what reduction in price he is figuring on. What is the output in Canada? What is the disturbance? What was the previous net protection which these people had?

Mr. ROBB: They had a protection of 15, 25 and 27½ per cent. Under the French convention the protection is 22½ per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That means nothing, stated without qualification. The minister is aware that the item includes matters of revenue to this country as well as the element of protection. What I want to know is what their net protection is. Have all the tariff reductions this year been arrived at without any idea of what net protection means?

Mr. McMILLAN: If there is one class of people in the country who ought to have the benefit of electric lighting and generating plants it is the farmers, especially in sections where hydro-electric power is not available. So far these plants, apart from installation, have cost around $350 to $375, and repair parts, when needed, cost in Canada 50 per cent more than they do in the United States. It would therefore make a considerable difference to the farmers who wish to instal electric lighting apparatus to have plants and parts brought within reason in the matter of price. This is one indispensable utility which makes for a greater degree of comfort in farm life. With an electric plant the farm can be supplied with power for various machinery including washers, irons, and, in the barn, fanning mills, grindstones, cream separators, and so forth.

Mr. MANION: How do the prices of these things compare in the United States and Canada?

Mr. McMILLAN: I do not know what the respective prices are to-day, but for four or five years I sold these plants in my own section of the country, and at that time I had a thorough knowledge of prices. I do know, however, that repair parts cost to-day in Canada 50 per cent more than they have to pay in the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford: The hon. member (Mr. McMillan) has had experience in handling plants manufactured in the United States and he says that the firms here are charging double what they charge across the border. Well, after putting the manufacturers in this country out of business, what better position shall we be in than at the present time? The words "for farm purposes" in this connection do not mean very much. In towns and cities where electrical power is available that power will certainly be used, while in rural districts where hydro power is not generated these small plants are installed. We have some factories turning out these plants and their work is most satisfactory; the plants they turn out are the most efficient electric lighting apparatus that can be found anywhere. I have sufficient faith in the genius of the Canadian people to believe that they are competent enough to manufacture electrical machinery quite the equal of that made in the United States or anywhere else, and in view of the fact that some of these factories have recently been established it is unfair to reduce the protection which they had been assured they might depend upon. By way of comparison I would call the minister's attention to item 590c,; which deals with engines and complete parts when imported for use only in the equipment of aircraft. At present they are free under the British preference while the other duties are 7½ and 10 per cent. On and after July 1, 1928, they will be 15, 25 and 27½ per cent.

11 p.m.

Mr. ROBB: Under the British preference they are free until that date. Thereafter the duty goes on.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): After that date the manufacturers will be led to believe that they will have a tariff protection of 15, 25 and 27½ per cent. But what assurance will they have of any permanency in that tariff? What encouragement is there for people to invest money in such an enterprise in Canada? They have no assurance that this tariff will be maintained, and that is what is undermining confidence among the people. Let us have some degree of stability. The minister has shown no regard whatever for the sugar beet industry; apparently it makes no difference to him whether we use sugar produced in Canada or sugar made by foreign labour. He thinks he has done enough when he comes to parliament and declares that he is going to provide rural credits legislation to relieve farmers who may be hard up. Surely this is not the principle upon which a sound policy should be based. I have endeavoured time and again to-day to induce the minister to state to the committee precisely on what principle these reductions are based, and what the government's objective is in its tariff legislation. The country is entitled to know just what the government proposes to do. It must have some assurance of tariff stability.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Knowing the minister as I do, I have been very much surprised to hear the reasons he has advanced for having been driven to this, that and the other change, but the surprise of the whole evening has been to hear him make the statement that this item had for its object the providing of lights on farms as a means of keeping the farmers' children at home. Bright lights will do the trick. As one who was brought up on a farm, I must say that I have listened to that sort of reasoning so much that I am about sick of it. The idea is preposterous that it was the bright lights of the city or any thing of that kind that attracted me and hundreds and thousands of others from the farm. It is absolute rot. The sons and daughters of farmers have as much brains as the sons and daughters of city people, and if they have taken advantage of their talents and their opportunities to go into other lines of business they have done so because they could not prosper on the farm. Now the farmer, along with other creatures he raises on his farm, rears more children than he can make use of, and many of them consequently are obliged to leave the farm. The minister proposes to retain these people by providing them with bright lights. That is not the idea at all; these are no reasons for the townward trend that has gone on for years. But I will tell you one reason. Agricultural development has taken place in the last sixty or seventy years and there has been a demand for those implements which have made farm work easier. These have been made in the cities and towns, and the farmers' boys in a large way assist in the manufacture of these implements. That is one reason for the townward trend, and it is not because of this lack of bright lights on the farm, and all that sort of thing. Consequently I want to draw the attention of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) to the fact that if he has a boy on the farm and that boy is a mechanical genius, where is he to apply himself? My hon. friend is going to insist that that boy go to the United States, where thousands have gone for that very reason. We should recognize the fact that these batteries and so on can be made in Canada, and boys from our farms can get employment in these factories instead of going to the United States.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Does the hon. member think he can keep that boy on the farm by keeping him in darkness?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): If a boy has brains he will use them, whether or not you keep him in darkness. Do not keep him there if he has brains; give him a chance to get ahead, but give him a chance in Canada. We are not only sending our natural resources out of this country, but we are sending after them our most valuable natural resource, our boys and girls. Now I want to draw to the attention of the minister the fact that batteries are being made in Canada; men are just beginning to manufacture this electrical equipment, but they are becoming downhearted as they see one thing after another put through this House of Commons to give them less and less opportunity. I have listened to all these ways of keeping the boy on the farm, and I do not believe the minister believes in his heart one word of what he said. I know him well, and it is only trash and nonsense to say that this is going to keep the boy on the farm.

Mr. FORKE: I have listened to the remarks made in reference to keeping the boy on the farm. When we who live in the country come to the city we recognize the tremendous advantages of city life over country life in the matter of many conveniences. Light is one, postal service another, and I think our city friends should be very anxious to help those on the farms enjoy some of the conveniences and luxuries of modern civilization. Good light is something which will help keep the boy on the farm. Anyone who has ever lived in the country and who knows what the coal oil lamp means will know how difficult it is to enjoy reading on a winter evening with poor light. They will realize how good light makes country life more attractive. Perhaps I will not be in order, but I would like to give the reason why the boys are leaving the farm. The last speaker said we should not keep the boys on the farm if they had ability for other work, and I quite agree with him. But what is happening all over Canada to-day? I can look back to my old district in Manitoba, where I have lived for over forty years; there I have seen a generation grow up to manhood and womanhood and leave the district. Why?

Mr. RYCKMAN: To go to the United States.

Mr. FORKE: No, Sir; their parents have lived under great disadvantages and difficulties, and the children have grown up to appreciate this fact. We are proud of the fact that education is within the reach of every boy and girl. They go to the common schools, the high schools and the universities and have been educated away from the farm—not because education has done that, but they have learned the disadvantages of agricultural life and will not go back to the farm. I must be careful in what I say, because some people will think I am speaking against education. Education will not take a boy away from a farm if conditions on the farm are right. The way to keep the boys and girls on the farm is to make farm life so attractive that the cities will not draw them away. Light, while it may seem trivial, is very important. I know what it is to sit through a long winter evening trying to read with a poor light, and I know that good light is a prime requisite. We simply ask that electric lighting plants for farms be made and sold as cheaply as they possible can. I would like to repeat what I said in opening; when I come to the city and realize the advantages of electric light, almost like daylight, and consider the conditions on the average country farm, I think we should be prepared to do something to help those farmers get the very best light possible at the cheapest rates.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I am sure the country will be pleased with the light we have had on this subject from the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). He informed the committee this afternoon, when another item was under consideration, what he was capable of doing in the west. Now he is referring to the hardships the people in the country districts have to undergo, and he tells us that the young people, after securing an education, do not find things as attractive on the farm as in the city, and that they desert the farm as a consequence. I could not help but think of the illustration given the House this afternoon by the hon. member for his actions of last year and this year in regard to the duty on agricultural products. He told us of an old ewe he had on the farm, which produced two lambs, for each of which he received $10 without having to feed them anything of consequence. He forgot that there was no duty on wool, which we are getting from Australia, from Argentina and other countries; he forgot there was no tariff worth speaking of on meat products as well. I am inclined to think that if the hon. member for Brandon prefers a coal oil lamp on the farm, he is welcome to it, but I can assure him that we have people manufacturing lighting plants in Canada which are not only equal but, I believe, superior to those manufactured in the United States. Has the hon. member for Brandon shown or attempted to show that these plants could not be obtained in this country as cheaply, and of as good quality, as in the United States? I can assure the hon. member for Brandon that we have in the county of Oxford a plant manufacturing an electric lighting equipment which is equal to anything manufactured in any country in the world, and that this plant is likely to be put out of business by the proposed change in the tariff.

Mr. FORKE: Why?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): For the reason that those people have only recently become established and the large plants in the United States, in order to put them out of business, will very likely for a short time reduce the price of their equipment, and having accomplished their purpose, they will then raise their price to recoup themselves, as they have done in other cases. I call the minister's attention to another item on this list which is of a similar character. I refer to item 590c:

Engines and complete parts thereof, when imported for use only in the equipment of air craft.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are dealing with item 448.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Surely, Mr. Chairman, I am permitted to make a comparison with an article of a very similar nature. I am referring to engines. The assurance is held out that the tariff is going to be increased on those things after 1928, it being at present 7½ and 10 per cent. The other engine in the lighting plant is subject to a tariff of 27½ per cent, which is a reasonable degree of protection, and it has enabled those people to go into business. But here the government comes along and says: After 1928 we are going to put the tariff up on these other things. That is the inducement which is being held out to people to invest their money in an industry of that kind. It is absolutely out of the question because they have no assurance that the government will show them any consideration. After investing their money the government will probably say to them: You can take your chance with the big industries in the United States, who after having destroyed your business will immediately put up their prices, as they did with barbed wire. We purchased barbed wire cheaper when it was being manufactured in this country than we have ever been able to do since. The same thing applies all along the line. It is anything with the government to destroy Canadian industry and drive our people across the line. That is what the hon. member for Brandon and this government are doing, and to-day the country is suffering more under this government than it has ever suffered before. The government are doing their best to destroy Canadian industrial life.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Mr. Chairman, I am going to tell my hon. friend from Brandon something within my own experience. Within the last few days I met a gentleman who has travelled a good deal both in the United States and in Canada, and he said to me—I have seen something similar in the press—that the greatest advance in economics in the world to-day has been made by the western farmers in pooling their grain and taking over the selling of it, by which they have increased their price. "Now," he says, "if the western farmers will go one step further and pool their buying from industries that will put up great factories in the west for the production of the agricultural implements and other things required by the farmers, it will give their boys and girls an opportunity to get industrial training in those establishments. That is the next thing the farmers of the west ought to do." I give that idea to my friend from Brandon. There may be some protection in it, but I think its adoption would locate a lot of industries in the west.

Mr. EVANS: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take part in this debate, but such erroneous ideas have been put forward on this item that it is hard for me to keep my seat. The commodities contained in this item are of great value to the farmer, and it is only fair that he should have them duty free. I cannot help thinking that if the hon. member for South Oxford would only analyze his own statements he would see how contradictory they are. He says that the genius and industry of our workmen are equal to those of any other workmen in the whole world, and that we can make electric lighting equipment here the equal to anything made in the whole universe. Yet he points out that that equipment is worth less than the material and labour that went into its construction. If it was not so its manufacturers would not need protection. The very idea underlying the need of protection is that the value of the finished article is worth less than the raw material that entered into it. Nobody can deny that. It is an economic law. If it was, as the hon. member says, equal to any similar equipment made in the world it could be sold on its own merits. But there is not a thing that our manufacturers and workmen can touch to-day that would be worth as much finished as in the raw state, according to their plea for protection. That is the strange thing. It has got to be a little tiresome hearing those to the right chiding the member for Brandon, as though he was responsible for all the trouble our cities are enduring to-day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mostly.

Mr. EVANS: The hon. member has even accused the Minister of Finance of being two-faced in his argument. Well, all day my friends to the right have been advocating something for the farmer. They have said: "Oh, if we could only give him protection and make life on the farm as it should be." But now they are willing to deny him even a small electric light plant!

Mr. MANION: We would give protection all round.

Mr. EVANS: The two-facedness of the whole thing is beyond expression. The hon. member says, "Why don't we give protection all round."

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. EVANS: He has been advocating that for two years, but during that time he has never come forward with one idea to show how it can be done. I challenge him to do so to-night. The principle underlying protection is that an industry cannot live and sell its product in competition with the world. How, then, can the farmer pay a high duty on what he needs, amounting in some cases to 35 per cent or more, and then sell his product against all the cheap labour of the whole world? We have to compete against Russia and India, where the people work for a few kopeks or a few annas a day. Is it reasonable, is it fair? Have our people lost all sense of right and British justice and fair play? Why, the thing has become too childish for words.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I have been listening the whole evening and rather enjoying the discussion, but the hon. gentleman challenges me so I must give some defence of myself. I always listen to him with the greatest interest, because he is so enthusiastic. I always notice that what he lacks in logic he supplies in enthusiasm. I say that with no disrespect, for I have the friendliest feeling for him. But he says we are not consistent to-day because we are advocating protection for the farmer and we are also advocating protection for the manufacturer. What is inconsistent in that? I have kept away from the discussion to-night because I thought someone would get up and say exactly what my hon. friend has said. But as a matter of fact the hon. member for South Oxford is absolutely consistent, and he showed his breadth of mind this afternoon by fighting for protection for the farmers and then standing up courageously to fight for protection for the other industries of this country, although a farmer himself. The hon. member for Rosetown says we cannot, or never have offered, any original suggestion—I believe that was the way he put it—for giving protection to all classes. Now, I do not pretend to any originality, but I certainly do believe that the people of Canada can protect all classes in this country, with the possible exception—and I have said it many times—of the wheat grower, who has to sell his product in the markets of the world. But the farmers in Ontario and Quebec—and there are two millions of them in these provinces, or about four times as many as there are in the prairie provinces—sell their products to the industrial centres in their neighbourhood to the extent of about ninety per cent.

Mr. McPHEE: Are there two million farmers in those provinces?

Mr. MANION: Yes; two million farmers in Ontario and Quebec, and they sell their products to the workers in the industrial centres.

Mr. McMILLAN: There are only 711,090 occupied farms in the whole of Canada.

Mr. MANION: There are two million people living on the farms of those provinces.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MANION: Well, there are only about three million people, in round figures, in the three prairie provinces, and quite a number are in the cities, so you can figure out the number for yourselves. I am quite within my estimate, I think, when I say that there are two million people, probably more, in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec living on farms. These people sell about eighty-five to ninety-five per cent of their products in the industrial centres in their neighbourhood. I submit that you can protect these farmers just the same as the people engaged in any other industry. I will admit that the wheat farmer at the present time cannot get the benefit of full protection. We do increase his home market to some extent, but we admit we cannot consume all the wheat grown in Canada. On the other hand, the United States—and my hon. friends opposite are always boasting of it—are consuming at home practically all their wheat. It is their home market, because they have had protection for practically seventy-five years.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot allow a second budget debate. Shall the item carry?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Before the item carries—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): No, it is not carried. I should like to assure the minister that this item is one that may well stand for the consideration of the tariff board. These engines have been taken out of the class in which they formerly stood and placed here among a whole lot of other articles. The minister admits that he does not know how many factories are manufacturing them, nor what the output of these factories is. I would ask him to show due consideration for the people who invested the money in their business, and allow this matter to stand for a little further consideration. That course may well be pursued seeing that the automobile item is to be allowed to stand for some time. If the minister takes the trouble to inquire into this matter he will realize that by what is proposed there is going to be great injustice done to some people who are endeavouring to carry on a legitimate business in this country.

Mr. ROBB: I think we might very well allow the item to go through. That will not prevent any manufacturer who wishes from going before the tariff board a little later.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The minister was asked a few minutes ago by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) why he proposed to put a duty upon engines for aeroplanes two years from now, the same duty he is taking off the engines in the present instance. Why is he encouraging the starting of an industry in the future when he is killing the industry that is already in existence?

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Manion.]

Customs tariff—453f. Iron or steel castings in the rough, not further finished than with the burrs removed, when imported by manufacturers of shotguns for use only in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories, under regulations prescribed by the Minister of Customs and Excese: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the change here?

Mr. ROBB: There is no change. This is a new item. It is represented to us that a company proposes starting the manufacture of shotguns, and that owing to the limited consumption in Canada it would not be economical for the company to install the high priced machinery necessary to make certain castings.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): How long are you going to keep the duty on?

Mr. KAISER: This item is one that has created curiosity from various points of view. In the first place it rather mystifies some people in regard to the attitude of this government, particularly towards industry. Here is an item having reference to shotguns, and a favour is conferred upon manufacturing concerns which have no existence whatever in Canada. I went to the trouble of searching through all kinds of business directories, and having failed to discover any such thing as a shotgun factory in Canada I asked the government whether they had discovered or knew of any such institution. The government replied that there were none. Now, the facts of the case are somewhat to this effect. The general duty on shotguns is thirty per cent, and here we have an item which reduces to ten per cent the tariff on the parts that enter into the manufacture of shotguns. If these parts came into Canada they would be admitted, I am told by the customs officials, at a rate of 27½ per cent and 25 per cent, but the government is reducing the duty to 10 per cent. This might be the right thing to do if we wanted to encourage the manufacture of firearms and shotguns in Canada, but an interesting anomaly presents itself: While this government is doing all it can to encourage the manufacture of firearms, a bill has been introduced into the Senate to reduce their use and to prevent people from carrying them around. There is no such thing as a shotgun factory in Canada, yet the government is arranging the tariff in such a way as to bring about the establishment of the industry in this country. And as to a successful Canadian industry which has shown itself capable in every way of meeting the requirements of the country, the attitude of this government is that such industry must be destroyed. On the other hand the government says with respect to an industry that does not exist in Canada: We must start to build it up. I claim that this attitude on the part of the government is quite incomprehensible.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. KAISER: I am speaking about the industries of the country, also about shotguns. The chances are that this kind of shotgun will be a double barrelled one, for this reason. With one barrel it is blowing up the ordinary duties in Canada, and with the other it is blowing up the British preference. The facts are that there were two concerns selling shotguns in Canada, one American and the other English. The guns of the English company were admitted to Canada at a rate of 20 per cent. The guns of the American firm were dutiable at 30 per cent, so the English company had a 10 per cent advantage over their American rival. However, the agents of the American shotgun firm, by some means or other, obtained the ear of the Canadian government and it is through their efforts, I understand, that the duties have been reduced. I am informed that the American firm has established, or is about to establish a branch factory at Farnham, in the province of Quebec. That is a good place to start manufacturing, there is no doubt about that. The point I am trying to make is this: while it may be all right for the Canadian governments to encourage the manufacture of goods in Canada, when these manufacturers become successful in attending to the needs of the country we should not, by reducing the tariff, destroy them and force their workmen to leave the country

With reference to the statement of my hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans), the idea of saying that they are selling their grain—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. KAISER: —in the markets of the world—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We cannot have a general discussion of tariff matters on this item; the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. KAISER: In regard to this world market, the only thing that is sold in the markets of the world is the surplus that is left over beyond the Canadian requirements. The same thing applies to manufactured goods. After we supply our own market it is the surplus that is sold. We are selling manufactured goods in the world markets, and we should encourage all our industries to develop to such an extent that they can supply our own wants and sell if possible in the world market. I do not think it is the intention of Canadians to frame a tariff in anticipation of the requirements of prospective industries, while destroying factories that have built up a successful business in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: I did not know until to-night that there was a controversy between British and United States manufacturers in this matter. I gather from the remarks of the hon. member for Ontario that this is put in to meet the wishes of some United States concern, who in some way got the ear of the government. I propose to be frank with the committee and tell them how they got the ear of the government. This item was put in at the request of a lobbyist who came to me from time to time, who camped on my door step for a month, on behalf of the General Motors of Oshawa. The same gentleman who made representations to me on behalf of the General Motors of Oshawa is the gentleman at whose request I have inserted the item. He did not tell me it was an English or a United States concern, but he said there was an industry prepared to open in Canada if we gave them a concession.

Mr. MANION: Was he speaking on behalf of General Motors?

Mr. KAISER: Oshawa has been a pioneer in the industrial development of this country. On very many occasions we have opened up industries, only to see them destroyed. I say that while we should encourage industries that are just starting we certainly should not try to destroy industries that already exist.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—460e. Belt and cap lamps and parts thereof to be used exclusively in a mine; parts of miners' safety lamps, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROBB: Before any hon. member rises to protest against this item, hon. members will notice we are dropping from 20, 27 and 30, or 15, 25 and 27½, to free. I wish to say this item was put in at the request of the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Would the minister state that this lobbyist who has been around here is responsible for the change in the tariff in regard to equipment for electrical plants?

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—469b. Machinery and apparatus and parts thereof for use only in producing unrefined oil or fertilizer from shales, not to include motive power of a class or kind made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Will the minister allow this to stand? This is an item dealing with the question of the production of crude oil, and I have a great many questions to ask.

Mr. ROBB: Very well.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—502d. Gun stocks and fore-ends for shot guns, of walnut in the rough, not further manufactured than bored and channelled, when imported by manufacturers of shot guns for use only in the manufacture of shot guns in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—590a. Aeroplanes and other aircraft and complete parts thereof, n.o.p., under regulations described by the Minister of Customs and Excise: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the change there?

Mr. ROBB: The letters "n.o.p." are added, that is the only change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—590c. Engines and complete parts thereof, when imported for use only in the equipment of aircraft: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

On and after 1st July, 1928: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I asked a question about that item a few minutes ago. Can the minister give me the information now?

Mr. ROBB: It has been represented to us there is a considerable demand developing for aircraft and that there is not a suitable engine made in Canada. Representatives from British Columbia, from Quebec, and one from Hamilton pointed out that the business of manufacturing aircraft was considerably hampered by the fact that they could not get a suitable engine in Canada, and they argued that we should give them this concession. We said we would let them have it until 1928.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): This item says, "and complete parts thereof."

Mr. ROBB: That is, complete parts of the engine when imported for use only in the equipment of aircraft.

[Mr. D. Sutherland.]

Mr. BURY: What is the idea of adding that statement, "on and after 1st July, 1928?"

Mr. ROBB: They are free, 7½ and 10 per cent; on and after July, 1928, they will be 15, 25 and 27½ per cent.

Mr. BURY: Is it customary for governments to assume they will be in office at some future time?

Mr. ROBB: They claim they will be able to improve on the engine in Canada, and we think we should give them a reasonable time.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Perhaps hon. gentlemen think another government will be in power and this provision will then be more in line with their policy.

Mr. ROBB: I should not like to encourage the hon. member to believe that another government would be in power too soon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The minister stated there was considerable demand for aircraft. There is also a considerable demand for lighting machinery in regard to which we have just passed an item. The minister slashed that item. Now he believes there is going to be an inducement offered to go into the manufacture of aircraft engines. The attitude of the government is on record, and hon. gentlemen can rest assured that if the present government is in office no one will pay any attention to the item we are now considering, because they would at once slash the duty on engines.

Mr. ROBB: We are encouraging the building of aircraft in Canada. If we did not give them this protection they would not build them.

Mr. BROWN: What was the duty on these articles before?

Mr. ROBB: The duty was 27½ per cent, 25 per cent and 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—626a. Men's and boy's hats made of hatters' felt in the rough, not blocked or further finished, when imported by manufacturers of men's and boy's hats for use only in the manufacture of such hats in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I have an amendment to this item. As amended the item will read:

Customs tariff—626a. Men's and boy's hats made of wool, felt in the rough, not dyed, not blocked or further finished, when imported by manufacturers of men's and boy's hats for use only in the manufacture of such hats in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

The present rate is 22½, 30 and 35 per cent. The reason for the proposed change is that the hat bodies are manufactured principally in Italy and other countries. The British manufacturer can import the hat bodies and further manufacture them and ship to Canada, where they can be imported under the preferential tariff at 20¼ per cent, while the Canadian manufacturer has to pay 30 to 35 per cent for his raw material, being at a disadvantage of 9¾ or 14¾ per cent with his finished hat. It places the manufacturer in a better position.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have some recollection of the matter. The minister says it puts the manufacturer in a better position. That means some manufacturers are put in a better position and some in a worse position. The manufacture of these parts was going on in the country, but I observe a change has been made. It has been made to-night as I heard it read for the first time, and it would look as if the effect would be to help some manufacturers and to hurt others, but it is going to be changed in such a way as not to do the others much harm.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What will be the figures in the amendment?

Mr. ROBB: The same figures. I think this will provide for the industry my hon. friend has in mind.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—664b. Ethylene glycol, when imported by manufacturers of explosives, for use only in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROBB: The present rates are 17½, 17½ and 15. There is no separate classification of imports. Ethylene glycol is not manufactured in Canada and there is practically no possibility of that being done, as the consumption is not large and a plant to manufacture it would cost $500,000. It is imported for the manufacture of explosives.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—680a. Sponges of marine production: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 17½ per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the change there?

Mr. ROBB: This is under the West India agreement. The tariff is reduced from 12½ per cent to free under the British preference.

Item agreed to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we should adjourn now.

Mr. ROBB: Yes. I agreed to leave certain items for consideration when the leader of the opposition was here.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): When may we expect to take these items up again?

Mr. ROBB: To-morrow.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

Friday, May 21, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

AUSTRALIAN TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I desire to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) if he has received any protests or complaints or other mainfestations of disapproval or displeasure from the Australian government in regard to the manner in which Canada is carrying out her part of the agreement with Australia.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I ask one further question? Do those complaints or protests relate to the application of the dumping clause regarding butter, or to what do they relate?

Mr. ROBB: Inquiry has been made as to the administration of that.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY AND PORT NELSON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): May I ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) when I may expect the return asked for by an order of the House passed on March 22nd, for correspondence relating to a possible purchase of the Hudson Bay railway?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): The return may concern different departments. My impression is that so far as it relates to my own department it has gone forward, but I shall have the matter looked into.

LOCARNO TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I would ask the Prime Minister, now that the session is drawing to a close, if he is willing to tell the House what attitude his government is going to take on the Locarno treaty.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Locarno treaty does not became effective until after Germany has been admitted to the League of Nations. If we wait for another week or two to discuss the question at the regular time, I do not think the interests of any parties concerned will suffer. I may say to my hon. friend that it has been suggested that the subject of the Locarno agreement might properly come up for discussion when we are taking up the estimates relating to External Affairs, and I hope to bring on those estimates very shortly after we conclude with the budget resolutions.

Mr. McGIBBON: I understand that the next meeting of the league will not take place until next September. I hope the Prime Minister will not keep us here till then.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am at one with my hon. friend in the hope that the session is drawing to a close.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1907, AMENDMENT

The House in committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Customs tariff—469b. Machinery and apparatus and parts thereof for use only in producing unrefined oil or fertilizer from shales, not to include motive power of a class or kind made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) expressed a desire to speak on this item. I am not sure whether any other hon. gentlemen wish to speak on it or not. I suggest that we might clear the slate, with the understanding that the hon. member can speak on another item.

Item stands.

DRAWBACKS

3. Resolved, that schedule B to the Customs tariff, 1907, as amended by chapter thirty-eight of the statutes of 1924, be further amended by striking thereout item 1031, the enumeration of goods, and the rate of drawback to the said item and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of drawback of customs duties be inserted in said schedule B:—

Customs tariff—1050. Sugar, when used in the manufacture of loganberry wine. Provided that drawback shall not be payable in respect of any raw sugar produced in a British country—payable as drawback 99 per cent.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the change there?

Mr. ROBB: It is a new item to permit the use of sugar in the manufacture of loganberry wine.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that a new industry?

Mr. ROBB: It is not a new industry, but they claim they have not been given the same privileges as the other wine-makers throughout Canada. This places them in the same position as the others.

Mr. ROGERS: Is there anything else in the loganberry wine except sugar?

Mr. ROBB: You will have to ask somebody from British Columbia.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, the finest berries in the world.

Mr. SPENCER: On account of the noise in the chamber it is impossible for us in this section of the House to hear anything that is being said.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. members will have to refrain from talking.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1051. Artificial silk tops and waste or artificial fibre silk tops and waste enumerated in tariff item 583A, when further manufactured after the 31st day of December, 1925, and prior to the 1st day of January, 1928—payable as drawback 80 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the change here?

Mr. ROBB: This is extending the privilege they have had for some years for the further period of two years only. The article is not made in Canada. It is used in Canadian mills for making wool.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have not heard one word the minister has uttered.

Mr. ROBB: I will speak more loudly.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If it is impossible for the minister to make himself heard where he is sitting, perhaps the Minister of National Defence will permit him to take his seat, and then we might all hear.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): This item is under tariff number 583A. I understand this matter was dealt with during the last several sessions of parliament. The article mentioned herein, in regard to which this item is submitted, is now being manufactured at Cornwall, and yet the minister wants to extend this provision for a longer period. Is that the wish of the people who originally had this item put on the statute book?

Mr. ROBB: The people to whom this was originally given have been consulted, and they offered no objection to this extension. My hon. friend will observe that it refers to waste, and they have not made any of this waste yet.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): This item is to be taken into consideration along with the other item. Just as soon as they begin to manufacture they will have waste. They started to manufacture only a few months before the first of January, and they could not be expected to have waste. If we change that item now, what becomes of them during the next six months or a year?

Mr. ROBB: It is extended for two years only and it has been represented that the people interested have no objection.

Mr. TOLMIE: Reverting to item 1050, in connection with loganberry wine, is the condition in that item, with reference to sugar produced in British countries, the same as that which applies to grape wine?

Mr. ROBB: The same condition.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1052. Artificial silk yarns or filaments enumerated in tariff item 583aa, imported prior to the 1st day of January, 1926, when further manufactured prior to the 1st day of January 1927—payable as drawback 80 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: This is to permit them to use the stock on hand on the 1st of January, in order to give them a year to clean up.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1053. Cellulose acetate in powdered form imported after the thirtieth day of April, 1927, and prior to the first day of November, 1927, when imported by manufacturers and further manufactured in their own factories before the first day of December, 1927—payable as drawback 99 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: This is for a new industry, a very large one, which it is proposed to establish at Drummondville, and this is given them for a six months' period until they get started.

Mr. MANION: Are there any other industries of this kind in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: No, it is a new industry. It is represented to us that it is different from any of the other industries.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): What is the difference between this industry and the one established at Cornwall? They are both manufacturing artificial silk are they not; both products are made by practically the same process, out of pulp, and both in exactly the same way, or as nearly as possible in the same way.

Mr. ROBB: It has been represented to us by the promoters that in many respects they are different products.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): What do the gentlemen who are not the promoters but are the beneficiaries under the last tariff say with regard to it?

Mr. ROBB: I am interested in getting new industries in the country. It is represented that this concern will make a capital investment of $10,000,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Is the minister not at all interested in keeping faith with the gentlemen with whom he made arrangement a year ago? The minister made an arrangement a year ago with another firm already established, and now by this tariff he takes off this duty—

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): —by permitting this cellulose acetate to be brought in. This acetate is the basis of artificial silk. The cost of cellulose acetate is 75 per cent of the cost of artificial silk.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe that this is only for a period of six months. The department has had no objection from the other industries which have been established.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it not true that, in the case of the industry established in Cornwall, the permission to import or to secure the drawback on cellulose acetate was extended until they had installed the necessary plant and machinery to make their own cellulose acetate; that in the period so fixed in previous legislation they expended the capital, put in their own plant and are now successfully making cellulose acetate? The minister extends this privilege to a sister concern, a new concern, as he says, but does he not realize the injustice he is doing to the concern established a couple of years ago which acted in perfectly good faith?

Mr. ROBB: No. The business is so large that the older concern is not able to supply the requirements of the industry. I repeat that they have no objections.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it intended to limit this strictly to six months?

Mr. ROBB: That is what the item says.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The minister says that they have no objections. Has he had any correspondence with that company?

Mr. ROBB: I have had correspondence, but they have offered no serious objections.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The minister uses the word "serious" now. Will he read some of the correspondence so as to let us see whether the objection is serious or not? The minister said a moment ago that he had no objection from this company upon whom this duty was levied in this country. Now he tells us that there is no serious objection. It is only fair that the minister who has had correspondence with these people should place it before the House so that we may know whether the objection is serious or not.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): No. Surely the minister is going to make some statement in reference to the matter. What does he mean by "serious"? Is he serious himself? It is only fair to the committee that he should put on record the letter showing whether there are any objections or not. The truth of the matter is that this House imposed a duty on an article so that a firm might make it in this country. That duty came into effect on the first January of this year and this firm has had three months and fifteen days of protection. Now the bars are let down for another company. It does not make any difference whether this other company is large or small, the arrangement was made; it was on the faith of the government that this company, one of the best in the world, came here from England. They have established themselves in this country on the basis laid down by this government, on the promise of a duty, and this government left them with three months and fifteen days of that protection. Now they have practically taken it off in favour of another company.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend moves to have the correspondence brought down there will be no objection whatever. I repeat: This is only for a period of six months in order that this company may establish itself. It represents to us that the product is not the same; but even if we admit for a moment that the product is the same, does my hon. friend argue that for all time Canada is going to give a monopoly to one industry?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I never argued any such thing. I say that when a duty is imposed on an article, anyone can come in and take advantage of the duty the same as anyone else. What right has the minister to take the protection away from one firm and give another the benefit of it? That is what is being done by this measure.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: We are giving this only for a period of six months and we are giving to this concern concessions similar to those given to the other.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): But the minister made an arrangement with another firm that the duty would come into effect on a certain day. Instead of carrying out that arrangement, the minister says that they are doing this only for six months. In other words the minister says that the government are justified in breaking their word for six months.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Has my hon. friend in his possession correspondence from the company complaining in this regard?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The company did not correspond with me. The minister has the correspondence.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Is the hon. member speaking on behalf of the company? He seems to be very much exercised over the matter.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I am exercised because of the silk industry being established in my own city. I know of the circumstances and of the arrangement that was made. I was a member of this House when the legislation was put through and I took part in the debate that occurred at that time. When this company was being organized, when it came before the House to have the duty fixed, the late Minister of Finance said certain things about it. When he was talking about this very duty he made use of these words which are taken from Hansard of 1923, page 2648:

> There is a thought which does not receive as much consideration as I think sometimes it should be given in public discussions, and that is the desirability of something like tariff stability. Business men do not like to be always threatened with changes in the tariff. . . . Speaking broadly, it is possible to give the country a reasonable assurance of stability in tariff. Such assurances are very desirable, for no business man would care to enter upon enterprises which may be brought into peril by frequent tariff changes.

He goes on further to say:

> The tariff as it will be when the changes proposed to-day come into effect will be a moderate tariff and probably as low as the country can afford to have under present conditions. Of course we cannot expect that it will be satisfactory to everybory. It will not meet the desires of those who would rigidly apply the principles of free trade. It will not meet the wish of the advocates of high protection. After all life is largely made up of compromises. In the realm of political affairs orderly government can be possible only where a spirit of compromise exists.

When Mr. Fielding proposed to place a tariff on these products the gentlemen who were anxious to start this business came here from the Old Country and interviewed the minister. They came to an arrangement that was satisfactory to the British people who wanted to establish this industry. When the duties were brought down in the budget they did not quite meet the Englishmen's ideas of what was wanted and they refused to accept them. They went off to New York and somebody called them back. Finally a change in the tariff was made by means of changes in the resolutions. That is all a matter of record. The first duty was: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent; but the change was made and they were increased to meet the Englishmen's wishes to: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; and general tariff, 17½ per cent. When the matter was before the House I asked this question of the minister as reported in Hansard of 1923, volume 4, page 3489:

Is it the intention that this duty shall become effective at once or after the yarn is made here?

Mr. Fielding's answer was:

Yes, but there will be a drawback up to the first of July, 1924. In the meantime, there will be drawbacks, but those who are obliged to get this from other sources will be able to do so.

Mr. Chaplin: In other words, until the factory is here ready to make the goods?

Mr. Fielding: Until sufficient time at which it is expected the factory will be in operation, yes.

At page 3491 the matter came up again and I asked this question:

I would like to inquire from the minister what the determining factor is in arriving at the 60 per cent drawback on artificial silk yarn. Why 60 per cent?

Mr. Fielding's answer was:

These are all matters of fair adjustment. I do not know that I can lay down any absolute principle to govern all matters of drawback. They vary.

As a result of that and some further discussion, the present Minister of Finance, a day or two following, himself proposed that the drawback should be made 80 per cent. And that was agreed to. Later on when the firm got into production they of their own accord requested that the drawback time be extended for a year for the reason that they had not been able to get their plant going and did not wish, until it was running at full capacity, to injure anyone else. Until that time they wanted any user of the product to be allowed to import it on the full rebate.

Mr. ROBB: They take the same attitude to-day.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): They take the same attitude to-day? How do we know that? Why should the minister refuse to put the correspondence on the table and let us see for ourselves? For my part I do not agree with the minister at all that they take the same attitude. However, the result was that the time was extended and the duty was to take effect on January 1 last. With these budget resolutions now before us, however, we find that these people have had only three months and fifteen days of protection. Another firm comes along and the minister says, "Oh, well, we have somebody big to attend to now. We have to help them." Why should the minister help someone else at the expense of the people who are already here and with whom he has made an arrangement? The thing is absurd; it is unreasonable; and it is eminently unjust. It is something that is not at all creditable to the minister.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend apparently has not read the resolution. He says that they have had only three months' protection. If he reads the resolution he will observe that its provisions will begin to take effect only on April 30, 1927, and will continue in force until November, 1927. Now I confess at once, after listening to my hon. friend, that I have some doubts as to whether he represents the views of this company or not. If he does, then the representative of the Manufacturers' Association in Ottawa, who called upon the minister, has misrepresented the situation, for he said to me that these people offered no objection and did not regard the change as serious.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): This is my answer to that statement: I do not see why the minister should want to hold someone else responsible now. Why should he drag somebody else into the proposition? That is very much in line with his statement last night, which in my opinion was very much beside the point, to the effect that another gentleman had camped on his doorstep on behalf of some other firm. It seems to me the Minister would do well to leave out such irrelevancies, especially as I understand that he has had correspondence with these people. If he has had such correspondence in reference to this matter, why should he not put it on the table?

Mr. ROBB: The correspondence of the Department of Finance is not carried around by the minister or anybody else. If the hon. member moves for a return I will table it.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I will ask the minister to allow the matter to stand for the time being until the correspondence is tabled.

Mr. ROBB: No; I cannot let it stand.

Mr. MANION: I confess I am at a loss to imagine why the minister should refuse the request of the hon. member for Lincoln that this matter be allowed to stand pending the return of the correspondence. If the minister is acting in good faith, as I beileve he is, I see no reason why he should object to bringing down the correspondence before the item is disposed of, in view of the fact that the hon. member makes rather serious charges against him.

Mr. ROBB: My reason for not holding over the item is the fact that this House comprises 245 members and the hon. member for Lincoln is only one individual. I do not propose to hold up the rest of the House on his account.

Mr. MANION: Let me point out to the minister that the hon. member for Lincoln is one of 116 members sitting around him, the vast majority of whom most probably share his views. He is therefore not alone in this matter. Apparently, if we are to draw any conclusion from this incident, it is this—that the Minister of Finance will enter into an agreement with some corporation from England to establish an industry in this country and, having given them a solemn undertaking to protect them for a certain length of time, he will go back on his word after a very brief interval. In other words, the government again break faith with those to whom they have pledged themselves to carry out some undertaking.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not so.

Mr. MANION: Who says it is not so?

Mr. DUNNING: Read the resolution.

Mr. MANION: I know quite well what the resolution contains. But does it make any difference that there is a slight change in the time specified in the resolution? The fact is that the minister is violating his agreement.

Mr. ROBB: The representative of the Manufacturers' Association has said that the company offers no objection.

Mr. MANION: But the representative of that association is not the representative of the company, and it is the company with whom the minister dealt.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend speak for the company?

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. MANION: No; nor do I know the company at all. But I have heard this discussion, and I have heard the member for Lincoln make a statement which the minister so far has not denied, that an agreement was entered into with the company to give them protection until they were well established. And now the minister comes along, when another company comes on the scene, and proposes to ignore his agreement, in order that this other company may be established in Quebec. That is the situation as it is represented to the minister now.

Mr. ROBB: Is my hon. friend opposed to industries being established in Quebec?

Mr. MANION: No; I am as good a friend of Quebec as the minister is. The minister will not question that. I have never had anything against Quebec. I do believe, however, in living up to one's agreements; I believe in keeping faith with the industries of Ontario as well as with those of Quebec. Now, are we to draw the conclusion from the minister's attitude in this matter that no corporation that proposes to set up in this country may place confidence in this government for any longer period than three and a half months? Are we to assume that in so short a time this government will set aside an agreement it makes with such a corporation for the reason that some other firm wishes to establish an industry? It does not seem to me that we shall attract many capitalists if we pursue such a policy.

Mr. ROBB: Before the item passes I want to clear up this matter. We never agreed with any company. Neither this government nor the preceding nor any other government ever undertook to give the company a monopoly of business for all time, and the company recognize this fact, because through the representative of the Manufacturers' Association they have said that they offer no objection to the item. I want to know now whether my hon. friend from Lincoln and my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) are speaking on behalf of the company?

Mr. MANION: I cannot speak for the hon. member for Lincoln, but I have already told the minister that I do not even know the name of the company. But I have heard the matter discussed this afternoon and I heard the hon. member for Lincoln make a reasonable request, that the minister allow the item to stand over until to-night and table the correspondence in the meantime. Why cannot the minister let the item stand? We shall not get through these resolutions tonight, and to my mind the minister is taking a very unreasonable and unfair stand in this matter.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The minister again implies that I am acting for the company. Let me assure him, as I have already done, that I am not doing anything of the kind. I am saying, however—I have said it many times before—that in my opinion the minister is not treating these people fairly. He wants to know whether they have complained to me. No. But I understand that they complained to the minister. Now, the minister says the matter is not serious. Well, if that be so why can he not table the correspondence and let us see for ourselves just what it says?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Even if they do complain, why should parliament be deprived of the right to change the tariff in any matter?

Mr. MANION: Parliament is not being deprived of any right, but we are simply asking that the correspondence be brought down.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In regard to tariff matters the House of Commons is supreme.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Undoubtedly. Parliament is supreme, and the minister is getting his cue from the hon. gentleman alongside him when he makes that statement. But is there a government at all?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): And does that government make an agreement and then break it in six months? That is what you have done and what you evidently will continue to do.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Governments cannot make agreements on tariff matters.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister on reflection will, I think, postpone consideration of the item. I fancy he will make headway if he does so. We know nothing of the matter, having had no information regarding it until we came into the House. The minister knows that after some difficulty—I will not expatiate on that point—the member for Lincoln discovered that objections had been made, and he finds now that there has been correspondence on the subject. He wants to have that correspondence brought down, and the minister is willing to bring it down but he proposes to do so at a time when the correspondence can do not the slightest good. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) gets very wrathy and declares that parliament is supreme. Who is questioning that fact? Who is challenging the right of parliament in any respect? But may I suggest to the Minister of Justice that we on this side constitute a part of parliament and that we too have some rights? We have got at least 116 out of 245, and we propose to exercise those rights. And we are justified in doing so. Now, the only way that parliament—this supreme body—can handle this matter intelligently surely is with the evidence before it. The minister says he has the correspondence and that we can have it after this is all settled. I wonder if the Minister of Justice—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Whether this company likes it or not, in what way does it affect the merits of the proposal?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We might, for example, Mr. Chairman, know for the first time something about the reasons which are actuating any tariff change; we might, for example, know whether there were any real reasons against it; we might, for example, get to know whether the government are acting on sound reason or without any reason at all. So far as I am concerned, I have absolutely nothing against this item. I am frank to say I know nothing about it. But I do think, Mr. Chairman, we will make better headway if when a request which does seem to me reasonable, a request which flows from what the minister himself says, that he has this correspondence, is not lightly turned down. Apparently, from what the minister says, there are some objections to the legislation. I wonder if the Minister of Justice thinks we ought to decide the question without knowing anything about the objections, without knowing anything about the merits. There is no doubt as to what these people want. It is a question of the merits they show in their correspondence, that is all. Is not the House entitled to consider the merits one way or the other; and how can they do so without having the facts before them? As I say, I know nothing about this item, but, it does seem to me we will get better results if we deal frankly with each other, and if these objections, whether good or bad, be made known to the House before the House acts.

Mr. KAISER: The Minister of Justice says that parliament is supreme in these tariff matters; but yesterday when a motion was proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) to raise the tariff on meats to five cents, the Chair ruled that parliament had nothing to do with it, that it was the discretion of the government alone.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman is mistaken; that was not the reason at all.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, so far as this industry is concerned which is to be established in the province of Quebec, I am naturally desirous of giving every advantage to it or to any other new industry which may be established in that province or in any other province. But the only reason which we have so far before the House for the passing of the item in its present form is that some representative of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, orally or in writing, stated to the Minister of Finance that there is no reasonable objection to it. Now, I for one, although a Conservative and a protectionist, absolutely refuse, even if the Minister of Finance is willing to do so, to put my conscience and my judgment in the keeping of any representative of the Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree with that.

Mr. CAHAN: I think we are entitled to know if there is any serious objeetion. The minister admits that there is objection, but in his mind it is not serious. Now, many objections have been presented in argument before this House which the minister does not regard as serious—

Mr. ROBB: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: —but which we regard as very vital, material, relevant and important. Therefore I suggest that in keeping with the usual courtesy of the minister it will assist in passing those items as expeditiously as possible if he does lay before the House the information which he has. The Minister of Justice suggests that there is no ground for inviting the presentation of this correspondence to the House because it does not matter what protest has been made, it will not influence the opinion and judgment of the government. Now I am sure the Minister of Justice does not intend to go that far. He is certainly one of the most courteous of ministers, and he is always more courteous than his suggestion would indicate. I am sure he really does not mean that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A moment of weakness.

Mr. CAHAN: Having knowledge of the objection, the minister does not regard it as very serious or very relevant; but as the question has been raised with regard to its seriousness and relevancy, why not allow the members of this House to judge for themselves, to have the actual facts presented by the correspondence?

[Mr. Kaiser.]

Mr. ROBB: I observe that the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) is now in his seat and I am prepared to take up item 469b—in view of the very great courtesy with which the hon. member for Lincoln has asked for this.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, I have to thank the minister very heartily for his consideration.

Item stands.

Customs tariff—469b. Machinery and apparatus and parts thereof for use only in producing unrefined oil or fertilizer from shales, not to include motive power of a class or kind made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the courtesy which the minister has extended to me in allowing me the few minutes' grace necessary to bring up this matter. The industry which I am speaking for is located in my riding and over $3,000,000 has been invested in it. Thousands of people in the town and adjacent villages are vitally interested in this industry. In the first place, let me say that I have no objection whatever to the item as it stands. I am merely bringing up the subject at this point, this being the only item in which crude petroleum is mentioned. The minister supported the Hon. Mr. Fielding in 1923 in removing the bounty on crude petroleum. At that time there was a bounty of a cent and a half per gallon. This bounty was to offset the removal of the protective tariff. The minister is well aware that every bit of casing, pumps, tubing, rods, valves, and tools of all kinds used in the oil industry have either to be purchased from a protected industry in Canada, or, if that material is brought in from the United States, a duty of from 27½ per cent to 30 per cent has to be paid thereon, in addition to sales tax of five per cent, all of which goes into the treasury of this country. So it will readily be seen that it is impossible for the producers to carry on under present conditions, if they have to buy their supplies from industries in this country protected to that extent. The minister has been told this a number of times; delegations have come to Ottawa and placed this matter before him and he has been urged in the strongest possible terms to give some relief to this industry. Last session there was placed before the minister the report of an investigation made by Mr. Hume of the Geological Survey, which showed conclusively that the industry could not carry on under present conditions. I will admit that a great many properties are continuing to operate, but I do not know of one being carried on at a profit. I can safely say that practically every property in that western district is being carried on at a loss, owing to the conditions I have stated.

The minister was urged last year to make an investigation, and he was good enough to do so. He sent his expert, Mr. Russell, who is now before him, to investigate that industry. Mr. Russell spent a considerable time there and, as we thought, made a very fair investigation. He was given every opportunity to investigate every part of the industry; he had statements placed before him of the operation of a number of the large producing companies; they showed their books to him, gave him financial statements, and placed before him conclusive evidence showing that they could not possibly carry on without some form of protection or bounty, or the removal of at least the duty on supplies which they purchase from protected industries. I understand that Mr. Russell made a report upon his return to Ottawa, as was natural. I have asked for that report, which I think is a reasonable request, but unfortunately the minister has not seen fit to bring it down. I am satisfied that if it were placed before parliament it would be seen that Mr. Russell has come to the same conclusion as Mr. Hume, that this industry could not possibly carry on.

I received a letter from the minister a day or so ago asking why the production of crude oil in Canada had materially increased since the reduction of this bounty. I can answer that in this way, that so far as the old districts are concerned the production has decreased. But two or three years ago an important well was drilled by the Imperial Oil Company in the northwest, and that well is responsible for all the extra oil worth mentioning that has been produced in this country. Millions of dollars were spent by the Imperial Oil Company before that well was brought in, and millions of dollars have since been spent by that company and others in trying to bring in another such well. That well is not producing what we call crude oil, but it is oil of a more refined nature, and I am informed that it can be taken from the well and placed right in the motor, while the crude oil produced elsewhere has to be further refined.

These are just some of the things I would like to place before the minister, and I would like to urge that this industry be given some relief. I do not wish to take up the time of the House in going into further details, but I sincerely hope the minister has come to some definite conclusion in regard to this matter. I looked upon the minister as a fair minded man in years past, when I had the privilege of sitting in the House with him, and I cannot believe that he will continue to keep the producers of crude oil in western Ontario in their present position. I tell him frankly that unless some immediate assistance is given that industry, inside of twelve months it will be in a very much worse condition than it is to-day.

Mr. MacLAREN: This item deals with the duty on special machinery connected with the production of oil from shale and the production of fertilizer from oil bearing-shale. This is a new industry in Canada; at present no such operations are being conducted in a commercial way, and the necessary machinery for this work is not made in Canada. This is therefore an instance where it seems proper that the tariff should allow this expensive and special machinery to be brought into Canada without duty. It will not interfere with any firm or firms making this machinery in Canada, because this machinery is not made here. I therefore take this opportunity of approving of the item, because I hope it will lead to the establishment in Canada of these industries, and because it does not interfere, as I have already said, with any manufacturers in Canada who make this special apparatus. So much for that.

I should also like to say a word in reference to the bounty on oil. There was a bounty granted by parliament for a number of years, but two or three years ago it was removed by the previous Minister of Finance. His reason was that there were immediate prospects of there being a large discovery of oil in the northwest of Canada, which, should it occur, would involve the payment of a very heavy sum of money by way of bounty to the owners of these oil wells. At the time it was pointed out in this House that that was a premature decision. While we hoped that the oil would be found, actually it was not found, and it has not been found up to to-day in large quantities. It was also pressed on the minister that the amount of bounty to be paid might be safeguarded by limiting payments to a certain amount of production, to a certain number of barrels from any particular well in a certain time. That would have safeguarded against any great expenditure of the funds of the country. However, that view did not prevail, and with two years' notice the bounty was removed. I would again take this opportunity of stating that I think the bounty was removed prematurely. Actually the oil wells that we have in Canada to-day are not remunerative; they require further development. The oil wells in the county of Albert, for instance, at the present time are just able to carry on; I do not think they pay a dividend to the shareholders at the present time.

My observations, therefore, Mr. Chairman, on this matter are that I am glad to have the opportunity of approving of this item because it gives an opportunity for the further development of a new industry which I trust will prove a profitable one. Secondly, I hope that the matter of bounty on oil production in Canada, properly safeguarded, will still remain in the memory of the Minister of Finance, and that he may see his way to restore the bounty for a certain period.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): May I ask the minister to consider this question, if he does not care to give his decision to-day, and to take into consideration the fact mentioned by the hon. member who has just taken his seat to the effect that the payment of the bounty might be limited to a certain number of barrels per day, say five barrels, or less. In that way the treasury would be safeguarded, no undue advantage could be taken of the bounty, and in addition, the industry could be carried on in a reasonable way.

Mr. ROBB: I will do the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken the credit of saying that this is not the first time they have represented to me that there should be a bounty for this industry. They understand that while their duty towards their particular districts is to urge the payment of bounties to help along local industries, my duty is to safeguard the treasury; I must look upon the whole of Canada, and see how it is going to affect the Dominion as a whole. I understand that there is no opposition whatever to the item under consideration, but that hon. gentlemen have taken advantage of this opportunity to present once more to the government the views they have presented so ably and so frequently to the minister in his office regarding the bounty. I gather from the observations of my hon. friend from East Lambton that the oil wells in that district are handicapped to a certain extent because they have to buy supplies in a protected market. We had that matter very carefully looked into. Those industries are located in the oil district near Petrolia—

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): No.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

Mr. ROBB: Well, to a degree; not all perhaps, and they rather objected to us taking away the protection which they now enjoy. We have had representations made to us by hon. gentlemen in other parts of the country where they dig the wells very deep that the casings and certain of the pipes required for these deep wells are not obtainable in Canada. They say that they have obtained these pipes and casings from some of the industries in Canada that are protected, but that they do not stand up under the pressure when they go down to great depth, and we have been urged to reduce the duty and make some concessions in order to allow these pipes and casings to come in. Let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite that I have had these representations presented to me not only from gentlemen on this side, supporters of the government, but from some hon. gentlemen opposite, who have said to us that we might make some concession by way of tariff reductions on certain casings required for the oil industry. I make this statement now so that the industries in Canada which enjoy the protection might at least attempt to improve the quality of their goods. I think it is reasonable, if they get the protection, that they should at least be in a position to supply the goods that are required by the trade. It is true that in the older sections the flow of the oil wells has somewhat diminished, but in other sections it has increased, and my predecessor, the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, having in mind the advertisements we were reading of the great possibilities of developing gushers overnight, with a great flow of oil, and the danger of the bounty on these gushers bankrupting the treasury, gave notice that the bounty, which had prevailed in Canada for many years, since 1903 or 1904, I think, would be 1½ cents a gallon up to the 30th of June, 1924, and then be reduced to three-quarters of a cent a gallon up to the 30th of June, 1925, when it would be discontinued. Now it is remarkable that while the bounty was on, the flow of oil decreased rather than increased, and as soon as the bounty was taken off, the production of crude oil increased.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Is that due to the government?

Mr. ROBB: Well, there was greater production. I have not the figures for many years back, but the total production of crude petroleum in Canada in 1922 was 179,068 barrels; 1923, 170,169 barrels; 1924, 160,773 barrels. During that period we were paying the bounty, also during the six months ending June 30, 1925, for which six months the production was 80,970 barrels. Then, for the following six months, after the bounty had ceased, from the 1st of July to the 31st of December the production, which in the previous six months had been 80,970 barrels, increased without the bounty to 237,283 barrels. With these figures before us I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, I appeal to my genial friend the former Minister of Finance, would we have been justified in going back to the bounty system?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I know the minister is well aware of the reason for that increase; he knows quite well that it is due to that one well of which I spoke a few minutes ago, which has been producing four hundred or five hundred barrels of oil a day. It is folly, in a way, to attribute the increase to the reduction of the bounty.

Mr. ROBB: I did not attribute it to the reduction of the bounty.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The minister has tried to lead the House to believe that since the bounty was removed the increase had been brought about. I cannot possibly see why the minister persists in compelling this industry to continue to purchase its supplies from protected industries in Canada, and expect them to compete with the tremendous production in the United States. He must realize that in the United States the flush production to-day amounts to over two million barrels a day, and this average has been maintained for the past year. The minister must also remember that in the United States, with their flush production, they have no such thing as a sales tax and no such thing as a duty on the materials they have to purchase. How, then, can he expect this industry to carry on under these conditions? The minister has removed the duty on the larger casings and supplies used in the large wells in the northwest, so why does he not remove the duty on the tubing and supplies used in the eastern territory? That is surely a fair and reasonable request. Let me repeat. The minister has removed the duty on the large casings and supplies coming into Canada for use in the northwest territory, while the small tubing and supplies used in the east are still under a duty of from 27½ per cent to 30 per cent, with the sales tax added. Surely it is not fair to the men in the old territory to expect them to carry on under such conditions. Might I ask the minister whether or not he has considered this phase of the question?

Mr. ROBB: I can assure my hon. friend now that I will look very carefully into this part of his observations. He understands, of course, that tariff changes require some time to consider. I think my hon. friend is on fair ground when he attacks the imposition of the sales tax, and I will have to look into that very carefully as to how it may be administered and restricted to this particular industry. I will take the matter under consideration.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I am very much indebted to the minister; I am sure Mr. Russell will bear me out in the statements I have made.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438. Locomotives and motor cars for railways and tramways: British preferential tariff, 22½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 30 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no change at all, is there?

Mr. ROBB: There is no change in the rate.

I beg to move that item 438 be amended to read as follows:

Locomotives and motor cars for railways and tramways, and chassis, tops, wheels and bodies for same.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That really means parts for railway motor cars?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the change for?

Mr. ROBB: For administrative purposes to cover chassis, tops, wheels and bodies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the past what rate has been given to those parts?

Mr. ROBB: The same as appears now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is absolutely no change?

Mr. ROBB: No change.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—438a. Automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move that the following be substituted for 438a:

Automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds, n.o.p., and chassis for same.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, this is one of the items we have heard a great deal about. My hon. friend now has the opportunity—which I think the right hon. Prime Minister sighed for—of producing the expert and furnishing information as to the exact manner in which this reduction was arrived at. Will my hon. friend now give the details that the Prime Minister said he had?

Mr. ROBB: As we get into the details I shall be very glad to give my hon. friend the information. In the first place let me give him the run of the business. For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1925, the total importation of cars amounted to a value of $8,726,714. Of this total, cars of an estimated value of $1,000 each and under accounted for $1,731,340, while cars of an estimated value in excess of $1,000 each accounted for the balance of $6,995,374. Of passenger automobiles made in Canada on which excise tax was paid during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1925, there were 58,547 cars of a value of $1,200 each and under, valued at $35,047,097, and 6,205 cars of more than $1,200 each, valued at $10,308,230.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was paid under the different luxury taxes, sales tax and the like?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure that I have that information at hand just now, but my hon. friend will recall that besides the duty and the 5 per cent sales tax, on cars of $1,200 and under the excise tax is 5 per cent, and that on cars costing $1,200 and over it is 10 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The luxury tax over and above the sales tax?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no doubt the minister will proceed and give me the information which shows the manner in which this reduction was arrived at.

Mr. ROBB: The reduction in duty?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: It was estimated on the basis of the experience we have had in the department. My hon. friend knows that 47 per cent of the automobile business in Canada last year was an export business, and we can check that up fairly well by the refunds we have to make when the machine is exported. We give them a refund of 99 per cent, and from what we make the calculation arriving generally at the cost of the machine and the general production in Canada. My hon. friend knows that in the automobile business, as well as in the liquor business, cigarette business, the silk business, and some other businesses, the high duties have made it profitable for smugglers. There was an expression of opinion in this House a year ago, and I am bound to admit that I opposed it, although I thought at the time I was wrong. I happen to live in a county where I could observe the smuggling and could hear the complaints of my neighbours of the dangers along the road from the smuggler, who drives along rapidly, with no regard for the farmer's wife who may be on the road. I made up my mind that if the smuggling was so profitable it was worth while looking into the observations made last year. I observed there was a general sentiment throughout Canada that the automobile industry was taking full advantage of the duty. I am bound to say, in all fairness to some other industries that were supplying parts in the automobile business, that after having looked into the matter I made up my mind that these people were not taking full advantage of the protection, but the automobile people were taking the very last farthing they could get out of the protection, and we considered it was reasonable that there should be a reduction of the duty. I think that sentiment prevails not only on this side of the House, but on the other side, and I am satisfied, having listened to all the arguments for and against, that the government are dealing pretty fairly and generously with the industry, and that they are receiving now sufficient protection to make the industry profitable.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want to understand my hon. friend and to be absolutely fair with him. Has the minister come to any conclusion as to what protection the industry should have?

Mr. ROBB: As we proceed with this discussion I will have something to say.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But we are on it now. Has the minister any idea of what protection the industry should have? I think the question is perfectly fair.

Mr. ROBB: After looking into the automobile industry I was confirmed in my opinion that we were absolutely right in putting in the clause that 50 per cent of the car should be manufactured in Canada, because I discovered that some of these concerns in Canada were not manufacturing plants, but were simply assembling plants, and that they were in Canada, not so much for the Canadian business, but on account of the advantages they enjoyed in the export markets of the world, under the export treaties we have with other countries. My hon. friend asks what protection they should have. Well, they are getting a rate of 27½ per cent on cars over the value of $1,200 and 20 per cent on cars under that value. Now my hon. friend is going to ask what is the net protection—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: Because the manufacturers of parts come in there. When the manufacturers of parts can sit down and agree among themselves, I will be in a better position to discuss this matter with them. I can quite understand why hon. members in this House are divided in opinion over this automobile duty, but I can assure them that the division of opinion here is not any greater than the division of opinion among the manufacturers of automobiles and automobile parts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Am I correct then in gathering from what the minister says that I was right in the assertion I made during the debate on the budget, to which I understood him at the time to give assent, namely, that at the time these budget proposals were made the government had no information whatever as to the net protection the industry was receiving?

Mr. ROBB: No, I would not admit that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If not, let us get the facts. I think I am right, but the minister may not want to admit it. I know he agrees I am right; he did before.

The CHAIRMAN: I would make the suggestion that we might as well consider items 438a and 438b together, if there is no objection.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Better take them separately, they are entirely different.

Mr. ROBB: I have the figures of the drawback on automobiles. Does my hon. friend wish me to put them on record. I have a statement of the drawback paid on automobiles and their exported value. This is the sworn statement of the manufacturer. I suppose we can accept that statement. It is as follows:

Make of car	Sworn value	Drawback claimed
Chrysler four (after July, 1925).	$697 56	$145 01
Chrysler coupe..	732 50	180 21
Chrysler coach..	758 00	188 62
Chrysler sedan..	808 00	202 85

We will take another car which does not come quite in this class, but it will give an idea of the run of them:

Dodge touring (after September 1924)..	$ 801 04	$ 125 88
Dodge sedan..	1,202 32	173 95
Ford runabout..	282 00	19 29
Ford tudor sedan..	494 00	62 73

If there are any other cars that hon. gentlemen are interested in I have them here.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has the minister those in percentages?

Mr. ROBB: No. Let us come now to the General Motors:

Make of car (After 26th November, 1923)	Sworn value	Drawback claimed
Chevrolet sedan..	$ 604 54	$ 83 03
Chevrolet coupe..	540 54	131 91
Buick sedan, No. 50..	1,674 16	376 56
Buick limousine sedan..	1,755 34	317 44
(After 12th June, 1925)
Studebaker phaeton..	870 00	228 41
Studebaker brougham..	1,113 00	298 76
Studebaker Berline..	1,254 00	326 50
(After 15th September, 1924)
Willys-Overland, 91 touring..	378 00	65 10
Willys-Overland sedan..	474 00	98 98

Mr. EVANS: Was that drawback given on the raw material or on the manufactured parts?

Mr. ROBB: On imported material. It may be imported raw material or imported parts, but not only automobile manufacturers but all trades are entitled under our act to a drawback of 99 per cent if the goods are exported.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister must have come to some conclusion on these figures. What conclusion did he come to as to the net amount of protection enjoyed by these companies, or was that ever put down as a percentage? One hon. gentleman asked the minister a moment ago if he had any percentages and he said: No. Surely that was considered.

Mr. ROBB: I have no wish to injure or to affect adversely the automobile industry of Canada. I want this industry to grow and I am glad to know these manufacturers are doing such a large export business. But I want them to do a reasonable business in Canada and looking into the matter I am bound to say that some of these people have been enjoying in Canada a protection of about 100 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are glad to get the figures. We all want to see this business carried on properly and we cannot come to a conclusion on a few general statements. It is a mere matter of calculation to find out the percentages. What was the result the minister came to or did he come to any result?

Mr. ROBB: I came to the conclusion that they were receiving too much protection and I decided to reduce it. I came to the conclusion that I was wrong last year in opposing some of my hon. friend's friends. I thought a protection of 27½ per cent on the higher priced cars and 20 per cent on the lower priced ones was a pretty fair protection. I am still of that opinion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I only want to know what the fact is. At the time that these figures were either decided upon or received by the government from the hon. Laird of Pipestone, am I right in assuming that really the government did not know what the net tariff protection was. I have been trying to get it and I cannot.

Mr. ROBB: I am not surprised that my hon. friend cannot get it because I have not been able to get it. Each manufacturer of automobiles seems to have a different idea and I have not yet been able to have them checked up uniformly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend did not have it then and he does not have it now. Not only did he not know what he was doing when he first made the change, but he has been unable to find out. In that case I am going to turn to what was said by Mr. Russell in Montreal and ask my hon. friend whether he has checked this up yet and whether he can tell us whether it is correct or not. Mr. Russell said:

> In 1925 the domestic production of motors cars amounted to $67,000,000 in value; that if all those motor cars had been imported at 35 per cent the duty so collected would have amounted to $17,000,000.

Are those figures correct?

Mr. ROBB: I have not checked them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has his expert with his figures in front of him. On the other hand the motor manufacturers themselves paid in duties less the drawbacks they received more than $7,400,000. Is that right? Does the government yet know whether that is right or not? That is apparently one of the first things one would want to know before one could come to any conclusion. As apparently it is not yet known by the government there is still something for this committee to do. Again he said part makers from whom we received data paid $1,250,000 more in duties. Will my hon. friend tell me whether that is true or not? Did the department ever make that inquiry. I pause for an answer.

Mr. ROBB: I have not checked that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Russell goes on:

> A conservative estimate establishes that our car manufacturers and those supplying material and parts to them paid to the government $10,000,000 of duties as compared with a gross duty that would have been collected had all the cars been imported of $17,000,000.

I take it from what my hon. friend has already said that he has not that information because that is a summary of what we have had before. These figures, which go to the vital question as to what protection the industry actually receives, show that there has been a protection, not of $17,000,000, which is the full extent of the tariff, but only of $7,000,000, that being the difference between the $17,000,000 and the $10,000,000 in duties paid by the automobile manufacturers in connection with the parts they buy, and by the parts makers themselves. That works out at a net protection of 14½ per cent. Now, is the minister in a position to say whether that statement is correct or not? He does not answer. He cannot say whether it is or not.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): How does the drawback affect that point?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member will see that it does not enter into the question at all. This is over and above what was exported. These are cars used locally, and with this the drawback has nothing in the world to do.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): That is a point on which we want to be clear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The manufacturers do not receive a drawback in connection with local business, and we are here referring to local cars. And it is in connection with local cars that the whole of the reduction is supposed to be recommeneded.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is it not a fact that the manufacturers get the full amount of the protection on the portions of the car manufactured in Canada, while they pay the duty on those parts manufactured in the United States or elsewhere?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not only a question of what is manufactured in the United States. Now, here my hon. friend is asking a pertinent question in regard to which he is entitled to information; and I am going to ask the minister at this point to tell the committee what parts the Canadian automobile manufacturer must of necessity buy from the United States or some other foreign country. That question arises immediately out of the question my hon. friend has just put to me. Perhaps the minister will tell us, from his experts, what parts our manufacturers have of necessity to purchase abroad.

Mr. ROBB: I could not tell my hon. friend what parts they must buy "of necessity." The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that this week it might be necessary to buy certain parts outside the country because they were not obtainable here; the local industry might not be able to supply those parts at the time. On the other hand, next week they might get at home all the parts they required and the following week, again, they might be short. It depends on the run of the business. Later on I propose to give a list of certain parts which are said not to be manufactured in Canada and to give an additional reduction on them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend from Melfort is interested in this matter and he evidently wants some information. The minister will agree with me that, apart from local production, there are parts not manufactured in Canada such as speedometers, carbureters, speedometer cables, ammeters, ignition switches, clocks, horns and similar accessories. These things have to be got from outside.

Mr. ROBB: Not made in Canada? What does the hon. gentleman suggest then?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At the moment I am trying to elicit the facts. The hon. member for Melfort has asked a question, and his point is that the Canadian manufacturer gets the benefit of the full protection on whatever he made in Canada, whereas, if he bought parts from the United States, his protection is reduced to the extent of the duty paid on those parts. Now, I am stating, indeed the minister has admitted as much, that some parts must of necessity be purchased from the United States or elsewhere. And it is not only parts that must be so obtained but certain steel that cannot and is not yet produced in this country, as everyone knows who has paid any attention to the subject. We have the raw materials but these things have not been produced here, although they ought to be.

These are concrete figures that I have given to the House, and I do not think that the automobile people would give away profits which they would retain if they could. The minister is not in a position to quarrel with the figures I have submitted, inasmuch as he does not know anything about the subject; at least, he has himself no figures to offer. These concrete figures having to do with the business the minister is not possessed of, but he was able to say that there was smuggling going on. Am I to take it from his statement that one reason that a cut was made in these duties was the fact that automobiles were being smuggled into Canada?

Mr. ROBB: Not exactly; but that influenced me to change my views since last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It did, and it did not—"not exactly." My hon. friend in groping around to find some possible excuse for what he has done pulls down this cobweb from the ceiling. The fact of smuggling may have had something to do with the change! Now I really do not think that the minister believes that, for he knows very well that if there is one thing that cannot well be smuggled into Canada, that is to say if we have a customs force which is doing what it ought to do, it is an automobile.

In view of the fact that the minister did not know what the net protection was, nor that these people were paying to the government in connection with customs duties alone the sum of $10,000,000, why does he say, how indeed can he say, that they were taking the full advantage of the duty? Perhaps he will explain that point later on. Over and above these duties collected from the trade in 1925, Mr. Russell stated that the excise, sales and stamp taxes amounted to $7,400,000? Did my hon. friend have that figure before him, or is that too a matter of news to the government? The minister does not answer. Evidently it is a matter of news to him. So that in respect of these items alone the federal government collected from the motor industry $17,400,000. Did the minister ever calculate how much tax the government was placing on the cars sold in Canada under its taxation?

Mr. ROBB: Under the taxation of my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister is wrong there. I know he wants to be fair, but he is driven from one hole to another in his attempt to find a sure footing. He has challenged the duty, as he had every right to do, but surely he did not make his reductions without the slightest information upon which to base a scientific tariff. Here we have reductions that can only be described as drastic and the minister in his vain endeavour to find an excuse says that the taxation which the trade has to pay is something for which I am to blame. Surely he recollects that the former luxury taxes were all taken off and that there were no such taxes on the automobile when this government assumed office. Surely he knows that. If he does not, I think my hon. friend alone is ignorant of a fact to which a great deal of publicity was given at the time. Surely he will recollect that he voted for a budget which put these luxury taxes on at a higher rate, 5 and 10 per cent. Now I point out to him that this form of taxation which makes the production of cars more expensive in this country than in the States is not, as he says, a matter for which I am to blame. But it would not make any difference if I were. The fact is those taxes make it more expensive to manufacture motor cars here. Does my hon. friend object to that statement?

Mr. ROBB: I admit that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course. I should like my hon. friend to do a little figuring and ascertain a little more about this subject. I think he will find that on every car manufactured and sold in Canada in 1925 the federal government received a tax which averaged $207. When he was so exercised about the price paid by the public he should have looked into that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is paid in the United States on the same car?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Three per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, what is the total taxation in the United States?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend did not have even that information before him.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I knew it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then why ask the question? Then is the minister really to blame for it all. He really does not know anything about it. When the Minister of Finance came to the conclusion that motor cars were costing a great deal too much in Canada—and they were costing too much—did he realize that his government was causing them to cost too much by an average of $207 for every car made and sold in Canada in 1925? Mr. Chairman, it is idle to go on further in that connection. But just take another matter which is absolutely basic to any question of tariff. Does my hon. friend not agree with me that in any scientific tariff you have your duties lowest on the least processed article?

5 p.m.

Mr. ROBB: That is sound.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why is it sound, Mr. Chairman? For the simple reason that as an article is further processed we get a greater percentage of Canadian labour in it, and that is what we want to look after.

Mr. FORKE: Has my hon. friend ever seen a scientific tariff? Is there such a thing?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend will find there is such a thing if he ever seriously looks into it. I admit that the present tariff is not at all scientific.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. ROBB: When my hon. friend admits that he is admitting his own negligence, because he had an opportunity of improving it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The chief whip does not do himself justice when he hear, hear's and bangs his desk. He knows that that retort is old and worn out. He knows perfectly well the reason why the former administration could not touch this question. Everbody knows it. My hon. friend admits it. So we have the principle admitted, Mr. Chairman, that in a proper scientific tariff as you go further up in your processes your tariff increases for the purpose of protecting Canadian labour. I am going to give a few figures just to show how, when you take a jump in the dark and know absolutely nothing of what you are doing, as we have clearly shown the government acted, disastrous results are bound to follow. I can take any single basic material going into this manufacture and show that my hon. friend has absolutely violated the principle that he upholds.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend is speaking seriously?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Why does he have such a nice smile on his face all the time when he says that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite sure my hon. friend's suggestion is a great help to the debate. But does he think it is possible for me to portray in my face just what I feel when I see mirrored before me such appalling ignorance in dealing with this subject? I cannot do it. The position is laughable.

Mr. POULIOT: I said smiling.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, it is really laughable to think that people who are supposed to have serious responsibilities placed upon them—other than the one responsibility of hanging on to office as best they may—would with the information before them take the step which is here taken. It is sad, but at the same time it is laughable. Now then, I am going to take cotton. The raw material is of course free. When it gets to cotton yarn the tariff is 25 per cent; cotton cloth and yarn the same; cotton cloth, not dyed, 25 per cent; cotton cloth dyed, 32½ per cent. Rubber-coated cloth, 30 per cent; top material 30 per cent. These items all go into tops, and there is a good deal more Canadian labour in the tops than there is in the cotton cloth dyed, which is given to-day a duty of 32½ per cent, while tops are given a duty of 20 per cent. That is how it works out.

Mr. ROBB: I notice my hon. friend is well posted on the cotton trade. Will he tell me what percentage of a dollar's worth of cotton is labour?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend gets my point, but the trouble is he will not take his medicine in the way it should be taken. He is perfectly right, there is far less Canadian labour to be found in a yard of cotton—which when it is dyed cotton cloth gets protection from my hon. friend of 32½ per cent—infinitely less labour than is to be found in the completed tops of automobiles, yet he maintains the one at 32½ per cent and he cuts down the other to 20 per cent—against the very principle which he himself has to admit.

Suppose we take something else. Suppose we take iron. That is part of your materials again. The free iron ore you convert into pig iron. Then there is a duty of $2.50 per ton. Then you are going to do something with this iron in connection with your cars. You have to have wheel hubs and wheels. Your wheel hubs are metal. There is a 30 per cent duty on the wheel hub, which the Canadian manufacturer has to pay. The next thing you have in connection with your iron is malleable castings which you put into your axles. When it takes the form of malleable castings it gets a protection of 27½ per cent. It goes a little bit further and becomes rear axle housings—a little more Canadian labour in that, and the duty then becomes 30 per cent. It goes on and becomes a rear axle—a bit more Canadian labour in that, if they are made here—and it gets a protection of 35 per cent, while the protection to the whole automobile is put at 20 per cent, with infinitely more Canadian labour upon it.

Take iron and steel billets. When they get in the form of springs, you have again the same story. On iron and steel billets the duty is $2.50 a ton, but when rolled into alloyed steel the duty is twelve and a half per cent. When you get them down to the cold rolled steel the duty is 30 per cent, and when it gets down to the chassis springs and screws the duty is 35 per cent. There you have that 35 per cent, in defiance of all rule and of all principle as admitted by the minister himself, while the duty on the finished article is put at 20 per cent—35 per cent on the raw material and 20 per cent on the finished article.

We have learned this to-day, Mr. Chairman, that a serious mistake has been made in not referring this matter to somebody who knew something about it. We have learned that there was no expert sitting in as the Prime Minister said, that there were no figures before the government that have anythink whatever to do with the question. We have it from the minister himself that the whole of this reduction is just simply a leap made in the dark by a government that does not apparently know what it is doing.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I should like to inquire from the minister what he had reference to a few minutes ago when he spoke of the makers of automobile parts not having got together, and that they did not themselves understand exactly what they wanted, and he could not tell them until he had found out what it was they wanted. I do not know that I understand just what he meant by that, and I should like him to explain that statement.

Mr. ROBB: That is a fair question. I would not betray the confidence of any of the parts men, any more than I would betray the confidence of my hon. friend if he came to see me—

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Which he has not done yet.

Mr. ROBB: No, I admit that, although he has said a number of times that he is going to give me that pleasure. The parts men, as my hon. friend knows, met the government in a delegation and presented certain representations to the government. The following day—I do not recall how many of them there were exactly—but I remember that there were at least three or four different fellows who came in to see me at different times, and they said: We were there yesterday and presented our case, but listen, we want to tell you this thing; and another fellow would come in and say, listen, I want to tell you this thing. My hon. friend can quite understand how bewildered a minister becomes when he meets men who are in the business and discovers that they really cannot agree among themselves as to what would be fair. That is what I meant.

My hon. friend the former Minister of Finance has presented certain figures. He asked me a few moments ago about the records as to automobiles and automobile parts. I have here a long statement, which I shall not read to the House, but will ask permission to have put on Hansard, so that hon. gentlemen may see it, giving a summary of the exports and imports of automobile and automobile parts, as follows:

Let me take just one year, 1917. The value of the passenger automobiles imported into Canada in that year was $7,981,177, and the value of the automobile parts, n.o.p., $7,200,017, or almost the same figure as for the automobiles. When we come down to 1926, we find that the value of the passenger automobiles imported was $14,022,814, and the value of the automobile parts imported was $23,111,109.

Mr. CLARK: What was the total production in that year?

Mr. ROBB: I have not got the production. Now I will give the exports for 1926. The exports of Canadian passenger automobiles in 1926 amounted to $29,434,358, and the export of automobile parts to $7,121,747.

The desire and the policy of the government is not to injure the manufacturers of parts, but to compel the manufacturers of automobiles to cease having simply assembling plants in Canada. If they are in Canada to enjoy the advantages of the trade treaties that we have, and of the British preference—and the British preference has recently been stabilized for ten years—then we submit that it is only fair that they should manufacture at least 50 per cent of the products in Canada to be entitled to that concession.

New Zealand has recently ruled that no industry can enjoy the advantages of the New Zealand preference unless they come up to the 50 per cent basis. Canada has the advantages of the New Zealand preference if the automobile industry here comes up to the 50 per cent British material and labour basis. Under the New Zealand tariff the rate under the British preference—I am only quoting this as an example—is 10 per cent, and the general tariff is 25 per cent, so the Canadian industry has an advantage of 15 per cent in that market. But how does it work out? The New Zealand government has ruled—and I think it is a pretty fair rule, one that we might very well adopt—that for duty purposes the assessment shall be made on the fair market value in the country of origin. What is the result? Because the Canadian car is sold higher in Canada than the United States car is sold in the United States, the whole advantage of that 15 per cent is practically wiped out on some Canadian cars, and the United States car gets into the New Zealand market at as low a rate of duty, for just as many dollars of duty, as the Canadian car. Now we propose to correct that position, and to see that the fair market price in Canada shall be lower than it has been, and consequently the industry here will be in a better position. Consequently the industry will be in a better position; they will enjoy to a greater extent the advantages they now have in other countries because they will come in under a lower duty, but if they continue as at present they will be under a disadvantage.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To which you contribute $204 per car, on the average.

Mr. ROBB: There is a good deal in what my hon. friend says, that because of the war conditions and the necessity for revenue, with the government groping about to find that revenue, we imposed the excise tax and sales tax on cars. But my hon. friend will notice, if he looks at this year's estimates, that we have to correct some of his own troubles in the matter of taxes. It is all costing money; no one knows better than does my hon. friend that it is not so easy to fix up a tariff to satisfy every person. My hon. friend says the Canadian tariff has many inequalities, and I think he is absolutely right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I quite agree.

Mr. ROBB: But he carried on an investigation throughout all Canada; he must have looked into the matter pretty carefully, and he had ample opportunity at the time to correct some of these inequalities, but he said a moment ago that he could not do it. And why? Because it is hard; it is dangerous to start changing tariffs, but this government has had the courage to do so, and I think we are receiving the support and approval of the Canadian people.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the Canadian people to-day would very much rather see this question put upon a fair and proper basis. My hon. friend knows very well why, at the end of that former investigation, nothing could be done. Every hon. gentleman knows that having regard to the United States market and to the invasion of our markets by the United States, this matter had to be looked after very carefully with especial regard to that nation. Everyone knows that at that time taxes which were then temporary, and which bore very heavily upon our people, were in effect in the United States. These were at the balancing point as to whether they should be repealed or should become permanent, and we were told that if we took any action we might perhaps provide an excuse for making those taxes permanent. We therefore held our hand, and whether we were right or wrong, everyone knows why that was done. They know very well we did not do it for any dishonest political purpose; we did not do it for the purpose of catching votes in this House.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask a question?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why is it that in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the session of parliament after my hon. friend had held his investigation, it was announced to the Canadian people that there would be a revision of the tariff?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: For the very reason I just finished stating. If my hon. friend had paid attention he would have known. At the time that investigation took place and when that statement was made the intention was to do what I thought should be done, namely, put this tariff upon a business basis. I have just said so, but I will repeat my statement. There were taxes in the country to the south, temporary taxes, which we thought bore very hardly on our people. These were emergency measures, of which hon. gentlemen all know if they would only admit it. At that time, while this House was in session, the question of whether these temporary taxes should be repealed or made permanent was in the balance; it might fall one way or the other.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And all this happened between the delivery of the Speech from the Throne and the bringing down of the budget?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. My hon. friend knows that that was a most critical period. But however that may be, there is surely no good in going back all the time to these vain recriminations.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is better not to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know what my hon. friend is laughing at; I did not raise that point. My hon. friend thinks recriminations better than Canadian business?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the effect of his remark. I suggested that it would be a good thing for us to try to do business in this chamber upon business principles, and my hon. friend thinks it better to get back to recriminations.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I say it is better not to do so.

Sr HENRY DRAYTON: Then I apologize for misunderstanding my hon. friend. He agrees that the minister should not have raised this point and he is right. Now the minister refers to the Canadian people, and what the Canadian people would want. I rose to say that the Canadian people would like to see this House know what it is doing before anything is done. We should know all the facts about what we are doing before we attempt to do it. That is not the case now. Take the words of the minister himself; he says that they were groping here and groping there for revenue. Yes, and he is groping to-day to learn what on earth he is to do when answering the call of others in this House.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend who has just taken his seat has used as a very strong argument against the reduction of the duty on automobiles the fact that on all the automobiles made and purchased in Canada the government received $207 in taxes. There is no doubt that the Dominion government did receive approximately that amount on every car produced and consumed in Canada, but my hon. friend did not say that that amount included excise and sales taxes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is wrong; he could not have listened to me. I did say that the duties amounted to about $10,000,000, and the excise and sales taxes to about $7,000,000.

Mr. BOIVIN: But my hon. friend did not say how much of the $207 was made up by each tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I gave the figures; my hon. friend was not paying attention. The duties amounted to approximately $10,000,000 and the sales taxes to about $7,400,000.

Mr. BOIVIN: So that almost fifty per cent of the taxes collected, according to my hon. friend's statement, were collected in excise and sales taxes. On every car imported from the United States the same amount of sales and excise tax was imposed. This government has a double duty to perform. It must live up to the obligations of the Dominion of Canada and honourably pay the interest upon the debt incurred during the recent world war for the benefit of civilization. That can only be done by imposing taxes. The second duty of this government is to make the cost of every commodity required in this country as low to the Canadian consumer as possible. It might be all very well to follow the suggestion of my hon. friend and reduce the cost of automobiles by removing the excise and sales taxes, but if we do that what happens?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not make that suggestion; I merely stated that we should know what we are doing before we start.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend said that if we wanted to reduce the price of cars it could be done by reducing the tax. We all know and admit that if we reduced the sales tax and the excise tax we could reduce the price of automobiles without hurting our manufacturers and without hurting those who export their cars to this country, but it is our duty to pay our debts, and it is absolutely necessary to maintain that tax, at least for some time, in order to do so. Now my hon. friend says, "But you did not look into the question; you know nothing about it. You have indiscriminately removed the protection to our automobile manufacturers without knowing exactly what that proportion of protection was."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is a pity the hon. minister did not give the information to the Minister of Finance; he did not have it.

Mr. BOIVIN: The Minister of Finance had all this information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He said not a few minutes ago.

Mr. BOIVIN: He said he did not verify the list of figures which was placed in the hands of my hon. friend on the other side by some automobile manufacturer.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. BOIVIN: I will endeavour to answer it.

Mr. CLARK: I do not expect the minister will be able to answer it, but the Minister of Finance might be able to do so. Will my hon. friend tell the committee whether he can state the net protection enjoyed by any one of the companies named by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. BOIVIN: The net protection enjoyed by each of these companies depends upon the amount of raw material and the amount of manufactured parts which they import from the United States. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CLARK: Has the minister or the government worked it out mathematically, in connection with the production of any manufacturer in Canada, to show what net protection is enjoyed by any one of them, or the average protection of the industry?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, the net protection enjoyed by the automobile manufacturers of Canada up to the present time has been almost 10 per cent greater than it appeared in the tariff. Instead of being 35 per cent, it has been approximately 45 per cent or even more.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend's colleague the Minister of Finance stated that some manufacturers enjoyed as much as 100 per cent protection on their Canadian production. I ask the Minister of Customs to give us the details of the 45 per cent protection enjoyed by many of the manufacturers. Will he give the names of the companies and so on?

Mr. BOIVIN: I shall be glad to do that. Although I have no right to speak for the Minister of Finance, I wish to point out in the first place that the Minister of Finance did not say that any Canadian automobile manufacturer enjoyed 100 per cent protection. He said the profits of some automobile manufacturing concerns in Canada were as high as 100 per cent.

Mr. CLARK: He did not say anything of the sort.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. CLARK: He said they enjoyed protection as high as 100 per cent on the portion manufactured in Canada.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not know what my hon. friend means by 100 per cent on what was manufactured in Canada. The tariff is there and speaks for itself.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What does the minister mean by 45 per cent?

Mr. BOIVIN: I will explain, if the hon. member will follow me, and he will see where it comes from. In the case of a car the list price of which in the United States is $3,500, the list price to the Canadian consumer of the same car is $5,414.36. We all know that the list price of a car in Canada is based upon the American price of that same car, plus the duty, plus the sales tax, plus the excise tax, and plus a certain amount of freight, which I am willing to leave out of the calculation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Not at all.

Mr. BOIVIN: That was shown during the course of the debate on the budget, and if my hon. friend will take any of the official motor magazines of the United States and make a comparison between the prices mentioned therein and the official list prices of the same cars in Canada, he will find it is not only the amount mentioned, but a little bit more. On a car which is listed at $3,500 in the United States you will find that the duty at 35 per cent on the list price, plus the excise tax in the United States, amounts to $1,250.73; the sales tax on that car is $241.21. The excise tax on the first $1,200 is $60 and the excise tax on the balance is $362.42, forming a total, leaving aside all freight charges, of $5,414.36. When that same car is imported into Canada, as it is generally imported by subsidiary distributing companies—I am speaking of American cars, not cars manufactured in Canada—the company receives a reduction on the list price of 30 per cent for duty purposes. They pay the duty on $2,450 plus the American excise tax of $73.50, so that the duty is $883.40; sales tax at 5 per cent is $170.35, excise tax at 5 per cent is $60, and the excise tax at 10 per cent on the balance over $1,200 is $220.69, making a laid down cost on this side of the line of $3,784.44. When the American manufacturer pays his dealer 20 per cent for selling the car he receives $3,500 less $700, or a net price of $2,800. When he sells that same car in Canada for $5,414.36, he pays in duty and taxes the sum of $1,334.34 and he and the dealer to-gether get the balance of $4,080.02. If the dealer gets the same price for selling the car as the American dealer, or $700, the American manufacturer gets the balance of $3,380.02. In other words he gets for every car he sells in Canada $580 more than he receives for the same car when it is sold in the United States. If the American manufacturer gets an additional profit of $580 I claim the Canadian manufacturer enjoys not only the protection of 35 per cent, but also the additional profit made by the American manufacturer on a similar car, because the price is based upon the American list price plus that duty and other taxes. That is why I do not consider it necessary, in order to enable the Canadian manufacturer to live thrive and prosper, to maintain a protection of 35 per cent on his product.

Mr. KAISER: What car?

Mr. BOIVIN: Any car which costs $3,500 in the States and is exported to Canada by the United States manufacturer.

Mr. KAISER: Are cars similar to that made in Canada?

Mr. BOIVIN: There are cars of that price which are supposed to be made in Canada, but they are not always made here.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The minister knows very well that they are not made here.

Mr. BOIVIN: The Cadillac car made by General Motors of Canada is assembled in Canada, but—

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I do not want the minister to get away from that car. Tell us how much of that car is made in Canada?

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not think that many of the parts are made in Canada. A great many cars that are presumably made or assembled in Canada are not made here at all, but are imported from the United States and sold to us as Canadian assembled cars.

Mr. CLARK: And they pay duty on all the parts that come in?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, at the rate of duty which the parts carry.

Mr. CLARK: Would the minister prefer that the cars should be assembled not in Canada, but in the United States?

Mr. BOIVIN: I would prefer that they be assembled in Canada. I would like to see them all assembled in Canada and I would still better like to see the parts made in Canada. That is the reason for the present change.

Mr. CLARK: The minister and I are at one as to having the parts made in Canada. Has the minister now come to the end of his answer to my question as to the net protection enjoyed by the automobile industry in Canada?

Mr. BOIVIN: I have told my hon. friend that it is absolutely impossible for any minister or any member of His Majesty's loyal opposition to say exactly what protection is enjoyed on any car because the different cars are not always manufactured with the same quantity of parts purchased in Canada. Sometimes more parts are imported than at other times. Sometimes it is possible to secure a certain number of bodies from a Canadian body manufacturer and at other times the output of that plant may not be sufficient to meet the demand and bodies have to be imported from the United States and duty paid on them. For that reason it would be absolutely impossible to give the exact net protection on any particular car.

Further the interests of the different car manufacturers are not all alike. The more parts that are imported for one car and the fewer that are imported for others cause a difference of attitude on the part of these manufacturers. Some want one thing and some another. Many of these men came to the Minister of Finance and said that it would be a terrible calamity if a 25 per cent drawback were given on parts imported from the United States when at least 50 per cent of the car was manufactured in Canada. There were other part manufacturers who were begging with both hands for that conditional concession. The representations of the different part makers had to be carefully weighed and the benefit given to the majority.

Some automobile manufacturers asked us for free parts; some asked us to put on the free list certain parts not manufactured in Canada and others stated that they were quite willing to pay duty upon all imported parts. They did not explain the reason but it is evident that there are a certain number of manufacturing interests in this country who have different views. Their views were all heard, weighed and considered, but in weighing and considering those views, one thing was not lost sight of, and that was the cost of the finished car to the great consuming public of Canada. So long as these automobile industries are able to carry on, so long as they are able to show a fair profit and increase production, they should not ask for more. The government does not desire to do serious injury to any industry. It has listened to the representations of every one of the automobile manufacturers in Canada and of the great majority of manufacturers of parts in this country, and it has endeavoured to meet their views and wishes.

Mr. CLARK: May I ask a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLARK: I understood from the Speaker that when we were in committee it was the privilege of every member to interrupt and ask questions. I understood that the Minister of Customs was only too glad to have questions put to him. Before he goes on with another part of his argument I wanted to know from him—

The CHAIRMAN: I think it would be better to let the minister finish his argument. The hon. member speaks of interrupting.

Mr. CLARK: I certainly will not interrupt the minister when he goes on with his argument, but I wanted to know for information whether he had finished answering my question.

Mr. DUNNING: He will be finished when he sits down.

Mr. CLARK: Just now I have the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BOYS: The minister courteously gave him the floor.

Mr. CLARK: I presume the minister has at any rate finished his statement as to the industry having 45 per cent net protection. I would like to ask him this question. Taking the case of a motor car imported from the United States paying a duty of $136 and the company which manufactures the same car in Canada paying a duty of $74 on the imported parts, I would like to ask the minister whether he agrees with me that the net protection enjoyed by that company on the car produced in Canada amounts to $62.

Mr. BOIVIN: If it is going to please my hon. friend I will say this. If a manufacturer gets $136 protection and pays a duty of $74 on parts imported from the United States, his protection is exactly $62.

Mr. CLARK: What percentage would that be?

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not know what car my hon. friend has in mind. It all depends on the price of the car.

Mr. CLARK: It does not matter what car. I could name probably four or five models, such as the Essex, Overland, Durant, any car with a United States valuation around $400. What I suggest to the minister is this: If it is enjoying a net protection of $62, that would mean that the net protection for that particular car, instead of being 35 or 45 per cent as the minister suggests, would not be more than 16 per cent.

Mr. BOIVIN: Possibly, but in order to arrive at the 16 per cent protection to which my hon. friend has just referred, he would have to admit many things. He would have to admit in the first place that the top or the body or the wheels purchased for that car would be imported subject to the same rate of duty that they are paying at the present time. He would have to admit further that on the parts which it is impossible for the manufacturer to buy in Canada and which he must import from the United States, he will continue to pay the same rate of duty that he is paying at the present time. Perhaps, if all those things are taken into consideration, that manufacturer would be protected on that particular car to the extent of 16 per cent. In other words he would have the right to charge 16 per cent more because he made his car in Canada than the United States manufacturer would have the right to charge for the same car in the United States.

Mr. CLARK: Surely the minister is not serious when he says there is a right to charge that much more. I think he will admit that the cost of manufacturing has something to do with the matter.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am willing to admit all that. I am willing to admit that owing to the enormous production and the consequent smaller overhead in the United States the cost of production there is less than it is in Canada.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Wages are higher in the United States.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, but mass production there makes the cost a little less. But what my hon. friends sometimes forget is that not all the cars made in Canada are sold at home, and that on cars the manufacturer makes in this country for export he is not obliged to pay the duties referred to. He gets the drawback on all parts imported and incorporated in cars shipped out of Canada, and on an average 47 per cent of the cars made here are exported. On that 47 per cent the manufacturer is very well able to compete with labour conditions on the other side.

Mr. CLARK: The minister will admit that the cars exported from Canada are sold very much lower than the cars sold here. There is a difference of about 16 or 17 per cent equivalent to the drawback.

Mr. BOIVIN: That is what we have always contended on this side of the House. These cars are sold at much less than the same cars when sold in Canada and the Canadian people ought to get some of the advantages enjoyed by the foreign purchasers.

Mr. CLARK: But my hon. friend forgets—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Sit down.

Mr. CLARK: I understood that the minister had given me permission to ask a question.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend, a moment ago, said he was not aware whether or not I had finished my remarks. I thought I was speaking sufficiently loud for him to hear me. In case he does not, I may tell him that when I have concluded I shall take my seat and will not do as an hon. member did a few years ago, when he insisted on keeping the floor without speaking.

Mr. CLARK: When was that?

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friend has a question to ask I shall be glad to endeavour to answer him.

Mr. CLARK: All I wanted was to ask a question. I want to know whether the difference between the price the manufacturer charges abroad and that which the home consumer pays is not equivalent to the drawback allowed under the Customs Act.

Mr. BOIVIN: The manufacturer sells his car cheaper abroad than he does in Canada because he pays a lower duty on parts imported for use in the cars he exports. If therefore he pays a lower duty on such parts for the cars sold at home, he ought to be able to sell his cars in Canada at a lower price. There is of course one possible objection in that respect: it may be said that because of these lower duties in the form of a drawback on imported parts we shall wipe out the parts industry entirely. But this argument is of no force inasmuch as the only drawback which the manufacturer gets in connection with the cars he exports is a drawback, not on the cost of the car, but on the duty paid on American material or parts entering into the manufacture of the car when it is made in Canada. And is it not a fact that there are Canadian wheels and bodies on many cars that are exported? I am glad that my hon. friend and I are agreed on one point—that the more you reduce the duty, the cheaper can the manufacturer sell his car.

Mr. KAISER: As regards the selling of cars abroad, the reduction in the sales and luxury taxes that must be paid in Canada should be fairly set forth. That is where the difference comes in.

Mr. BOIVIN: That of course makes a considerable difference, but in the present debate I do not think the question of the sales and luxury taxes has been taken into consideration by anyone except the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) who referred to them in order to present what appeared on the surface to be a very good case. The hon. gentleman is an able parliamentarian. He submits his views in convincing language, and I am sorry that any hon. member should reproach him for putting them forward with a smile. He used the argument that $207 is paid to the government on an average, on every car manufactured in Canada, and of that $207 he admitted that about 45 per cent consisted in excise and sales taxes. That 45 per cent does not apply to the car that is exported, in connection with which neither sales nor luxury taxes are collected. I want the committee to understand that for the purposes of my argument I have no intention of introducing the sales and luxury taxes, which after all are taxes imposed upon our own citizens, to meet the obligations of the country. I want to consider the cost of the car in Canada in comparison with the export cost without taking these taxes into account. In my opinion the automobile manufacturers made a grievous mistake when they published the list prices of their cars and included therein the sales tax and the luxury tax. This was unfair to themselves. I am prepared to admit that if the manufacturers in Canada had not included in their list prices the sales and luxury taxes, they would not perhaps be so severely censured for the high cost of cars in this country. They have done so however and it may have been for the purpose of making the buyers of cars forget that they had these taxes to pay. I know that the automobile manufacturers are great friends of the party in power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MORAND: Is that why the duty was reduced?

Mr. BOIVIN: We did not consider that when the tariff was discussed.

Mr. MORAND: That is the trend of the minister's argument.

Mr. BOIVIN: The tariff was reduced for a reason which I have already given to the committee and which I shall state again. It was reduced in order to bring down the prices of cars in Canada, and put them within reasonable reach of the consumer.

Mr. CLARK: Without regard to those employed in the industry.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend and I agreed a few moments ago that the manufacturers of Canadian cars were selling their exportable surplus at lower prices than they were charging the Canadian consumer.

Mr. CLARK: Because they got a drawback.

Mr. BOIVIN: Because they got a drawback, yes. Now if instead of a drawback they get permission to import free the parts not manufactured in Canada—

Mr. MORAND: Thereby putting the other factories out of business.

Mr. BOIVIN: What factories?

Mr. MORAND: The parts factories.

Mr. BOIVIN: May I ask my hon. friend how we are going to put any parts factory out of business by admitting duty free into Canada any part not manufactured in this country?

Mr. MORAND: There is no objection to that.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend has no objection to that? Well, I can assure him that it is not the intention of the government to go a step further. We do not intend to ruin any parts factory in this country.

Mr. CLARK: It is enough to ruin the automobile factories.

Mr. BOIVIN: We do not intend either to ruin the automobile factories, and as a matter of fact they will not be ruined. Far from that, the manufacturers will sell their cars at a lower price and on that account will sell more cars, making a bigger profit, increasing production, lessening overhead and paying dividends to their shareholders. That will be the result of this tariff change. Whether the part comes in free or whether it gets the 99 per-cent drawback makes very little difference; in one case or in the other the reduction in tariff is going to be passed on to the Canadian consumer. It is not our desire to ruin any manufacturing industry. The Minister of Finance and the government have one desire in mind in all the proposals submitted to parliament—to encourage production in Canada, and instead of having merely assembling plants, to have fully equipped plants for the complete manufacture of automobiles and other commodities and so employ more Canadian workmen. That is the reason why while some parts may be placed on the free list other parts will not be; but a drawback of 25 per cent on those parts will be given only upon condition that the manufacturer applying for the drawback shall prove to the government that more than 40 or 50 per cent Canadian labour and Canadian materials have been incorporated in the car.

Mr. KAISER: In the car or in the parts?

Mr. BOIVIN: In the car or in its component parts.

Mr. KAISER: There is quite a distinction. Take the case of a man making a part, and that part goes into a car, how is he to prove that the car contains 50 per cent Canadian labour and materials? If it read "50 per cent of Canadian-made parts" it would be clear.

Mr. BOIVIN: A few moments ago I stated that in the case of cars exported in which Canadian bodies, Canadian wheels, Canadian springs and other Canadian parts were used, the manufacturer exporting will get a drawback of 99 per cent on everything American whether imported direct by himself or by the maker of the parts sold to him to be embodied in the completed car. The 25 per cent drawback which is to be granted by the government under another item of the tariff will be administered in absolutely the same way. That is, if the Canadian car manufacturer buys a part from a Canadian parts manufacturer, he will get a credit of 50 per cent for the Canadian labour and materials in that part.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend I think has cleaned it all up. Take, for example, rims. As my hon. friend knows, we have not the steel in this country for the manufacture of rims, therefore we have to import the rims which are used by our wheel manufacturers. For the purpose of administration, will my hon. friend say that if the Canadian automobile manufacturer buys his wheels from a Canadian wheel manufacturer, notwithstanding the fact that the rims had to be imported from the United States, those wheels will be looked upon as a Canadian product? I so understood from my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. BOIVIN: Then I do not think my hon. friend understood me exactly. I said that everything Canadian in those wheels would be considered as part of the 50 per cent of Canadian manufacture and materials contained in the car. It is absolutely the same as the regulation that applies to export at the present time. If those wheels are embodied in a car which goes to a foreign country, a drawback is paid upon the duties paid in respect of all parts included in the car.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the case of the wheel it would be the duty on the rim?

Mr. BOIVIN: The duty on the rim would be considered to be duty paid by the Canadian manufacturer of the Canadian content in the car. The drawback of course would not be on the full cost of the wheel; it would be 25 per cent of the duty paid on the rim when imported.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is six o'clock.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if we might not pass this item which we have been considering all the afternoon.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are really discussing both items.

Mr. ROBB: I had intended before six o'clock to make a statement of certain amendments so that hon. members might have an opportunity to consider them. On 438b I propose to offer as an amendment after the word, "only", the words, "n.o.p., valued at retail when new."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is new cars of a retail value of $1,200?

Mr. ROBB: That applies to cars of $1,200 and over when new. To that item we shall also add what has been added to the other items, "chassis for motor vehicles specified in this item."

Then there is another item:

Customs tariff—438c. Tops, wheels and bodies, n.o.p., for motor vehicles enumerated in tariff items 438a and 438b: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 37½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

That is to make them the same rate as the others, and when the discount comes off it will equalize them. They will get the 25 per cent rebate.

I was glad during the discussion this afternoon to find my hon. friend from West York and myself were in agreement, as we oftentimes are. He argued at considerable length that there were many materials that were not manufactured in Canada upon which duty was paid. A new item will be introduced placing on the free list a long list of items, some of which were mentioned by my hon. friend this afternoon, with the safeguarding clause, "of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has my hon. friend copies of those resolutions?

Mr. MANION: What will be the rate there?

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. BOIVIN: Free. I think you should read them.

Mr. ROBB: 438d—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The usual thing, Mr. Chairman, is to supply members with copies of such changes.

Mr. ROBB: I expected my hon. friend would make that statement. I have read Hansard containing his budget, and I would advise him during the dinner hour to refer to it. He will find that he brought down about three pages of changes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Everyone knew about them, and Mr. Fielding had copies. We made lots of changes in committee, but we had the idea that "parliament was supreme".

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear. My hon. friend is becoming converted.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 113, respecting the Bronson Company.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1907, AMENDMENT

The House in committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Customs tariff—438a. Automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. McGIBBON: I notice that the Minister of Customs is not in his place, but he made some statement this afternoon in respect to which I should like some information. Probably the Minister of Finance can supply it. The Minister of Customs made the definite statement that Canadian made automobiles were being sold in other countries cheaper than in Canada, excluding the sales tax and the drawback. I would ask the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the Minister of Customs, to give us details in that regard. This is a very important question, to my mind, because it is one in which the consuming public are vitally interested. If it is true, the public should know it; if it is not true, I do not think a wrong impression should go out.

Mr. ROBB: The Minister of Customs will be in, I imagine, before we get through with the next item. He has the papers with him, and I am sure he would not have made that statement had he not known it to be true. Does my hon. friend say it is not true?

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not believe it is true. I do not see how it could be possible for a Canadian manufacturer to send an automobile to England, pay the duty on it, and sell it over there cheaper than it would be sold in this country. I am only asking for information, because I think this is a question on which the people of this country should know the facts.

Mr. ROBB: That statement is not limited to automobiles. We have heard it frequently made in this House regarding other commodities. My hon. friend has been here almost as many years as myself, and he must have heard that argument applied to other goods.

Mr. McGIBBON: But I have never had any proof that it is true.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The allegation has been made in reference to agricultural implements especially, and it has never been proved. It was always denied.

Mr. ROBB: And in regard to flour.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The hon. minister knows more about flour than I do. He probably knows how it is done.

Mr. MANION: It has often been stated that flour manufactured in Canada is sold more cheaply in other countries than in Canada, and just as a matter of information I should like to know if that is true.

Mr. ROBB: I have heard the statement.

Mr. MANION: I have heard the statement too, but I want to know if it is true.

Mr. COOTE: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is entirely out of order, and I would ask you to try to keep this debate to the point.

The CHAIRMAN: If there is no further discussion of item 438a we might pass on to the next, on which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario could ask his question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have been discussing this matter at large, and I think we might as well discuss this item and 438b together, because the subject matter is about the same.

The CHAIRMAN: Then I will read 438b as proposed to be amended:

Customs tariff—438b. Automobiles for conveying passengers only, n.o.p., valued at retail, when new, with standard equipment complete at not more than twelve hundred dollars each; motor cars or motor trucks (not for railways or tramways) for carrying goods only; motor cycles; chassis for motor vehicles specified in this item: British preferential tariff, 12½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

The new item 438c reads:

Customs tariff—438c. Tops, wheels, and bodies, n.o.p., for motor vehicles enumerated in tariff items 438a and 438b: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think, Mr. Chairman, we should discuss the two main automobile items together, and deal with 438c when we reach it.

Mr. ROBB: I think so.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister explain what he means by that phrase in 438b, "valued at retail when new"?

Mr. ROBB: This applies to automobiles where the duty is 20 per cent. As every hon. member knows, there are men who sit up nights planning how they may beat governments and customs house officers, and it was represented to us that a car coming under the 27½ per cent rate might be run around for two days and then represented to the customs as not a new car, and that it should be allowed to come in under a lower valuation.

Mr. MANION: This is just taken at the retail price?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have been waiting for the Minister of Customs to come into the chamber; he gave us a very interesting illustration of how the Canadian manufacturer exploited the tariff by using the goods of the American exporter here instead of the Canadian product. It was very interesting, but not at all illuminative of the point. Perhaps we can get a case where we are dealing not with an importer of American goods, some agent here who, through the tariff, is enabled to get ahead of the Canadian public, but with a Canadian manufacturer who is doing what the government have alleged, although I do not think they meant it, they have done; that is, exploit the Canadian people. It would be so much better if we could have an illustration of the charge made. The figures given by the Minister of Customs may be absolutely right, but they have nothing to do with the case. The question here is whether or not the Canadian manufacturer was exploiting the tariff; I do not know whether he was, but the statement was made, and illustrating that statement we have something the American importer is doing. I would suggest that if the government really has anything, they should let us have it.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): According to the figures given by the Minister of Customs an American manufacturer of cars provides a car at an American list price of $3,500. He is allowed to discount that price in here, as the minister says, by means of a fake company. I would like to know why the minister and others are not preventing this fake business. Whose business is it to look after that sort of thing? Just look at the figures; it seems to me there is something more than smuggling that needs to be taken care of in this country, if those figures are correct. A car valued at $3,500 is discounted to bring it down to $2,800; it pays duty into this country and is sold at $5,400. That, on the face of it, shows incompetency on the part of the customs, if nothing else. That illustration is provided to show that the Canadian manufacturer is doing the same thing, but does it explain it? No. But the minister says the Canadian manufacturer is allowed to compete with that sort of thing and does not compete with it; he is allowed to charge the same price because the other man does it. That is the lamest argument I ever heard of, and I would like to hear the Minister of Customs explain it.

Mr. ROBB: I expect the Minister of Customs to be here in a few moments. I have no quarrel with the statement just made by my hon. friend. When we began going into this automobile question I discovered for the first time—and it was also a surprise to the present Minister of Customs—that that method had prevailed for some years under previous governments. They made this arrangement; they had a ruling on it, and some of them had a discount of as much as 35 per cent. It was not only the dealers, but we discovered that some of the manufacturers were taking advantage of that and were bringing in cars and reselling them.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): That is the fault of the customs.

Mr. ROBB: Surely; I will admit that at once; I will admit that that should not prevail. It is not fair.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I have heard of similar cases. For instance, we have a law on our statute books providing for the goods to be entered at the fair market value on the other side. How do they find out the fair market value? They do it by making a sale to somebody. In other words, a manufacturer in the United States will go to New York and give a whole district comprising three or four states to one firm; they will make that firm responsible for the district and give them the outside discount. That is the discount used to come into Canada, and these very people, by means of what the minister describes as fake companies, are allowed to sell these cars at 20 per cent off another list. On the very face of it that shows that the customs is being robbed, but how on earth the minister can blame the Canadian manufacturer for this same thing I cannot understand.

Mr. ROBB: I do not blame the Canadian manufacturer.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I am speaking of the Minister of Customs. How he can conclude from that that the Canadian manufacturer is to blame for this condition is something I cannot understand. The Minister of Finance told us he did not want to injure either the automobile manufacturer or the manufacturer of parts, that in fact what he wanted to do was to have more cars and more parts made in this country, and he was going to accomplish that by this reduction. And he said that in respect to the Cadillac car he expected to have them or their parts made here. That shows at once that the minister and his advisers do not know the question at all. The Cadillac car, in the quantities used in this country, could not be made here; it is an absolute economic impossibility. This is not the kind of car that can be made in Canada. The duty on these cars should be kept higher, because they are for the rich people who can afford to pay and should pay for them. Nothing can be done by this or any other government to have that car manufactured in Canada.

I am not an automobile manufacturer, but I have something to do with the parts business and I know something about it. The minister says that he is not going to hurt the parts people at all, and he would like to know how he is doing so. First of all, as I pointed out before, in order to conserve this parts business, you must have the automobile industry conserved; the parts people are simply out of luck if the automobiles come in from the United States as such. How can you expect me, as a manufacturer, to supply a rim or a wheel or a hub or any other part of that car if the car comes into Canada fully manufactured? It cannot be done. Now the minister brings in a new resolution in respect to wheels and parts of cars. We have not reached it yet, but in it the duty is made a little higher than on the finished car. That is not practical.

Mr. ROBB: There is a drawback of 25 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): But even if that is taken off, this is worth nothing. In other words, everyone knows that you cannot charge a higher rate of duty on the parts than on the finished car. That is unbusinesslike and impracticable, and I will show the minister why, under his very resolution. Let us assume that 50 per cent is made by the automobile manufacturer in the way of the body, the chassis, the frame, or otherwise. Then he sets out to buy the other parts of the car. There are some small accessories that must be brought in. The manufacturer of the car looks around to see where he can get his parts. He has to buy his wheel, he may have to buy his engine, and may have to buy the body and top. Some manufacturers make these and then buy the remainder of the car. He comes to me as a wheel manufacturer, and what does he say? He says, "If I import those wheels from the United States I can bring them in on that duty less 25 per cent. How much can you save me of this duty?" Now that is the business end of it. These wheels have to be supplied, therefore, at less than the American price plus the duty, saving the manufacturer of cars probably one-half the duty. I ask the minister, what good to me is the 20 per cent tariff on wheels? It is not worth a snap of the finger.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely my hon. friend does not argue that he must sell the wheel at the American price plus half the duty or he will not get the business? He does not contend that the Canadian manufacturer would force him into that position?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The hon. minister has not been in the business and does not know the practical side of it. In the first place, every one of the manufacturers are exporters of wheels. We as manufacturers of wheels, or of the bodies or tops or anything else, try to get as much of that export business as we can, and by getting the rebates of duty we must, if we want the business, meet the American price. Having done so on part of the export business, they say to us, "Now we have given you so much of the export business you are able to make your whole article for less money, we expect you to do it, and we are doing it by means of the export business and the volume of trade." You could not do it otherwise, and if by any chance any of the export business is lost to us we could not make the article that we are making, even at the price we are. It is impossible to do it. I do not know whether I have made that clear or not.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, I do not follow my hon. friend.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): As a matter of fact the process is this: when we make goods and the American manufacturer comes over here he says to us, "You must show us some reason why we should not buy these goods in the United States. If we buy them in the United States we pay a certain rate of duty, but on that wheel we are making in the United States we have a profit, and if we give that business to you we lose the profit we are making in the United States," so that we have got to come down below the American price plus the Canadian duty.

Mr. ROBB: Before we get too far away from the observations of my hon. friend, who is in the business and understands it, I may say I was impressed with his argument when he first started. He quoted the case of a car similar to the Cadillac and said it was impossible that that type of car could be made profitably in Canada, and for that reason we should put on a higher duty.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Not on account of the type of car, but on account of the quantity of production.

Mr. ROBB: He said that they could not be built in Canada, and for that reason we should keep up the tariff and get the revenue. I do not agree with my hon. friend, but he is in the business and knows better than I do.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I am not in the business. That is my own personal opinion.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend is right, why not take off the duty altogether and put on an excise tax of 50 per cent; then the government would get all the revenue? I do not say my hon. friend's argument is right, but if it is, why should we not do as I suggest?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): That is for the government to decide. I have given my own opinion. So far as that particular car is concerned, the only work you get out of it if you bring it into Canada in parts is the assembling cost. But the hon. minister knows right well, and the gentleman sitting in front of him can tell him, what the assembling cost of a car is. It is a very very small item, and if it is to assemble the car only, I simply say that so far as the employment of labour goes it does not amount to a hill of beans.

Mr. ROBB: I do not agree with my hon. friend. I believe Canadians can do this work as well as they can in the United States, and it is to their advantage to manufacture in Canada because of the export business. They would not get the advantages they have in Canada if they were shipping from the United States. I will admit at once that they are under a little handicap because of the fair market value in the country of origin. If they get their fair market value down a little lower in Canada they will be in a more advantageous position to export. I know that the fly in the ointment was the clause providing that they must manufacture 50 per cent in Canada, but some of them had frankly admitted that they had no objection to that. Another matter which I have not mentioned before is that for the first year we are going to put them on a 40 per cent basis in Canada and give them up to March 31 next year to get up to the 50 per cent basis. That will give them leeway enough, and I have the assurance of the automobile men—Mr. Russell and Mr. McLaughlin; I forget the other gentleman's name, representing one of the other companies—that they think they can come to that figure within that period. I am told the Ford people are over that; they are quite satisfied and are not finding any fault. The policy of the government is to encourage the additional manufacture of these goods in Canada, and we believe this measure will help us.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The minister has confidence that Canadians can do this work. So have I. But they cannot work against impossibilities. They cannot manufacture a few cars of a certain type at any cost on the basis of which they can sell them. Surely that must be clear. No matter what the minister does; whether he makes it 50, 60 or 70 per cent, we are not going to make this range of high priced cars in this country. The tooling cost of one of those cars is so immense that it would never pay to make them in Canada. The matter is one of dollars and cents. To put out an absolutely new model car the tooling cost is more than half a million dollars. If you spread that over a thousand cars made on this side, what do you have? You have an impossible proposition at once. Such a car can never be made in Canada and if the minister has any expectations along that line he is going to be disappointed. Any arrangements made regarding the smaller car are sound, but any arrangements regarding the higher priced cars are absolutely unsound. I would not undertake to make a wheel for a car like the Cadillac. You would not get your tooling cost out of the profits on it in five years. What applies to that article will apply to every other article about the car.

Mr. BOIVIN: If that be the case why does my hon. friend object to allowing those cars to come into Canada at a reasonable rate of duty?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): On those high priced cars I think the rate of duty should be as high as it can be placed. A man who can afford to buy a Cadillac or any other car at $4,000 or $5,000 should be taxed to the limit.

Mr. BOIVIN: That man is already taxed 27½ per cent of the value of his car plus a 5 per cent sales tax, a 5 per cent excise tax on $1,200 and a 10 per cent excise tax on the balance over $1,200. What more protection does the hon. member advocate for a high priced car?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): As regards luxuries I would impose a tax as high as possible. They were brought in under a duty of 35 per cent and people who can afford to buy a high priced car will import it even if the duty is 50 per cent.

Mr. BOIVIN: Then my hon. friend gets away entirely from his argument of protection.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The question is one of revenue, not protection at all.

Mr. BOIVIN: This is the first time that I have heard my hon. friend agree with us that the tariff should be for revenue and not only for protection.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I never argued that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Hon. gentlemen are very easily pleased, but if they will look over my addresses in this House on the French treaty they will find that I have advocated consistently a duty as high as possible on all imported luxuries. A high priced car is a luxury if there ever was one. There is not a bit of protection in such a duty.

Mr. MORAND: Surely there is an element of protection. If you raise the duty to 75 or 100 per cent you are going to force a certain number of people in Canada to buy cars manufactured in this country. Those who can afford it will pay the higher rate of duty, but those who cannot will buy cars manufactured in Canada.

Mr. BOIVIN: I shall be glad to answer my hon. friends opposite when they can agree amongst themselves. One argues that it is tariff for revenue only—

Mr. CLARK: Nobody argues that.

Mr. BOIVIN: I heard that argument of my hon. friend from Lincoln just a few moments ago.

Mr. BOYS: The minister misinterpreted it.

Mr. CLARK: The minister did not hear all the argument this evening.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am sorry I was not here early enough to hear the whole argument, but if I wait to read it in Hansard I shall have to wait until to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The hon. member understands perfectly what I mean. I give him credit for more common sense than he is trying to make out he has.

Mr. McGIBBON: I should like to ask the Minister of Customs the question I asked the Minister of Finance a few minutes ago. The Minister of Customs stated this afternoon—and his confrères nearly smashed the tops of their desks in applauding his statement—that Canadian manufacturers were selling their automobiles in foreign countries at a lower price than they were selling them in Canada less the drawback, sales tax and all other taxes. That means that the manufacturers were exploiting Canadian consumers. I should like to ask him now to give us the details, the price of any particular car he wishes after deducting all the taxes, and the price that it is sold at in this country and any other country he likes.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am afraid my hon. friend did not exactly understand me this afternoon.

Mr. McGIBBON: I understand the minister perfectly.

Mr. BOIVIN: I said that for the purpose of my argument I was willing to eliminate the sales tax and the excise tax. It is well understood by all of us that the sales tax and the excise tax are not collected on cars exported. I further said that when a car manufactured in Canada is exported to a foreign country, the Canadian manufacturer charges a lesser rate than he charges in Canada and the difference in the rate is the amount of the drawback which he receives on the United States parts and materials which go into that car. I have tried to follow and carry out my argument by saying that if parts upon which at the present time a duty is paid and a drawback given should come in free and if other parts should come in with a reduction in duty, the Canadian consumer can get the benefit of that reduction just as well as the consumer in New Zealand, Australia or any other country to which those cars are exported. In every case the same amount of Canadian labour is used and the same wages are paid. I claim that the government by reducing the duty on the car and at the same time reducing the duty on some of the parts and putting on the free list a number of parts that are not made in Canada—that cannot by any stretch of the imagination hurt Canadian industry—will reduce the price of the car to the Canadian consumer. If my hon. friend wants me to tell him the exact difference in price in regard to any particular make of car I will admit frankly I have not that information before me. I have seen it; I can get in the department copies of the orders in council passed by the government fixing the exact amount in dollars and cents which is allowed to every Canadian manufacturer as drawback upon the special make, special model and special type of car exported to a foreign country. I do not happen to have the information before me, but that is the difference between the cost of that car to the foreign consumer and the cost to the Canadian consumer. Once more I say that except in so far as it is necessary to protect to a certain extent the part manufacturers in Canada, there is no reason in the world why the Canadian consumer should pay any more for his car than the foreign purchaser of the same car.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister has now given us an entirely different version from what he said this afternoon.

Mr. BOIVIN: It may appear to be an entirely different version to my hon. friend. Perhaps I was not clear this afternoon. I want to assure my hon. friend that if I did not say that this afternoon, I surely wanted to.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am glad to hear that, but the Minister of Finance received the same impression that I did. It is a statement that has been made in this House and on the hustings almost from time immemorial in regard to not only automobiles but agricultural implements and everything else. In fact the Minister of Finance asked me a few moments ago if I disputed it. I am glad to have the minister state now that when I disputed it I was correct, that is that there is no more reduction than the drawback that is received on cars exported from this country.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am told that when I was absent from the chamber there was perhaps a little misunderstanding concerning a statement made this afternoon, namely, that a United States manufacturer of a motor car actually received more for his car sold to a Canadian consumer than he did for the same car sold to a United States consumer. I understand some hon. members said that if that was the case the Department of Customs and Excise was to blame and the matter should be corrected. While that condition exists—and it does exist as we all know—it has existed since long before this government came into power. It is carrying out that provision in the Customs Act, that the value for duty of an automobile shall be the value in the country of origin when sold in like quantities to dealers of a like class. It is true that there is a clause in the act giving the Governor in Council authority to change that provision by order in council, but the power has never yet been invoked by this or any other government.

Mr. CLARK: Was it not invoked in connection with agricultural implements in 1924? Was there not passed at that time an order in council such as my hon. friend refers to?

Mr. BOIVIN: An order in council may have been passed changing the dutiable value of agricultural implements; I was not a member of the government at that time. But I was referring to automobiles.

Mr. CLARK: The minister said that the power to change the value by order in council was never exercised.

Mr. BOIVIN: What I said was that we had the power to make the change by order in council but that it was never taken advantage of by this or any other government. There, again, there seems to be a misunderstanding. What I had reference to was the value for duty of automobiles imported into Canada. I am referring to the American automobile manufacturer. He has a subsidiary company in Canada and in most cases that subsidiary company is represented only by a customs broker.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): That is what you refer to as a fake company?

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes. I am not speaking of the General Motors or any other company assembling parts in this country. I am referring to concerns who have no assembling plants in Canada but who, nevertheless, sell their cars on the Canadian market. They have in this country subsidiary companies which do nothing but collect all orders forwarded to the parent company, and then come before the collector at the border point at which the cars come into Canada and represent themselves as distributors for the parent concern. They contend that inasmuch as they are distributing cars in such enormous quantities they are entitled to the same rate of discount as distributors doing the same quantity of business in the United States. There is some semblance of right in their claim. They take the view that distributing, as they do, all cars sold in the Dominion for the parent company they ought to receive, for duty purposes, the same rate of discount as is given to distributors of like quantities in the United States. In that way they get a 30 per cent discount on the value of the cars and they pay a duty on 70 per cent of the value. I should not care to mention any names, seeing that the matter is treated with secrecy in the department; but without being specific I may say that one concern is getting a discount of 35 per cent. In other words, it is paying only 65 per cent of the value of the cars. These people pay the sales tax and excise tax plus the duty on 65 per cent of the value.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): And does the minister expect us to manufacture against that sort of thing?

Mr. BOIVIN: We do not expect the Canadian to manufacture against that sort of thing, but as a matter of fact that is what he has been doing right along without complaint. He has been getting the benefit of his entire protection, because in spite of the fact that these people receive all these discounts, they have never passed them on to the Canadian consumer, who has been obliged to pay the full price plus the full duty and the sales and excise taxes.

Mr. MANION: The minister says that there is some regulation in the Customs Act by which the government by order in council may fix the value of goods being imported into this country. I take it therefore that this is a matter that need not come before parliament. If therefore the government desire to do so they can, after this budget is adopted and the House prorogues, fix by order in council the dutiable value of automobiles coming into Canada, say 50 per cent higher than it otherwise would be, and this without submitting the matter to parliament.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am glad that my hon. friend has asked that question. Let me tell him frankly that the government have not so far considered applying section 42 of the Customs Act.

Mr. MANION: I was merely asking the question for information.

Mr. BOIVIN: Section 42 of that act reads:

If any difficulty arises in determining the fair market value for duty of goods imported into Canada, which are the manufacture or production of foreign countries or Great Britain, such as musical instruments, sewing-machines, agricultural machines or implements, medical preparations, commonly called patent medicines, and other goods, the prices of which are published by the manufacturers or producers, or persons acting on their behalf, the governor in council may, from time to time, fix and determine a certain rate of discount which may be applied to such published prices of any such manufactures or productions, and such published prices, subject to deduction of the amount of discount according to such rate, shall be deemed and taken to be the fair market values of any such manufactures or productions respectively as are specified in such order in council.

That is the authority and I interpret it as a provision intended to prevent abuses. It was never the intention of that clause to enable any government to decide by order in council that the duty should be collected on the retail price of an article, and so long as I remain Minister of Customs the clause shall never be so interpreted. If however I do find that there is abuse, if I find that any American corporation is bringing cars into the country on a 35 per cent discount and then disposing of them to the Canadian dealer at a discount of only 20 per cent, I shall ask my colleagues to pass an order to ensure that they pay the duty on the price of the car, less the discount they give to the Canadian dealer.

Mr. MANION: The idea is to prevent dumping.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Mr. MANION: I have no quarrel with that; I simply want to have the point cleared up. The other evening, in conversation with a gentleman who was on a visit to the city, I gathered that the government could fix for customs purposes the retail price, if you will, or could alter the whole valuation of the car. I understand from the minister, however, that unless any dispute arises or some such eventuality as he suggests, this will not be done.

Mr. BOIVIN: The intention is to prevent abuses.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and which has been discussed a good deal this evening, I hold here a piece of specific information which I think I should submit to the committee. It is an article taken from the Lethbridge Herald of April 27, 1926. The Lethbridge Herald is, I think, a reliable paper, and under the caption "Protection that protects" it states editorially:

It is little wonder that Canadian motor car manufacturers have been wailing loudly about some of their protection being taken away from them: why shouldn't they when an Oshawa-made automobile which costs $2,090 in Oshawa, can be bought for $1,295 at Nassau in the Bahamas, British West Indies?

Gerald A. Sweeting, now living in Toronto, who formerly lived in Nassau, ordered a 5-passenger McLaughlin sedan there. He could have bought it for $1,295. When he tried to buy the same car in Oshawa, where the factory is located, he was asked $2,095. Both cars were from the Canadian factory, the Nassau car being made for export.

In explaining how this $800 difference in a $1,295 car comes about, the factory officials explain that there is a 5 per cent sales tax and a 10 per cent luxury tax which are not paid on the export cars.

It is also pointed out that, to help the export trade, a 99 per cent drawback of the duty on imported parts is allowed. But with these figures in mind, the general public will still be left with the impression that the Oshawa manufacturers will be able to get along very nicely with 27½ per cent protection on higher priced cars as against the old import duty of 35 per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the old saying is that where there is smoke there is fire. It is not always true, but generally it is.

Mr. MORAND: Oh, oh.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member for East Essex laughs, but when so many intelligent people in this country are firmly convinced from their own knowledge and from the knowledge of their friends that certain articles, highly protected in Canada, are sold in foreign markets at lower prices than are available to the domestic consumer, there is some reason for their contention that the duty should be reduced so that Canadians should not be compelled to pay higher prices for a Canadian product than those at which it is sold to people in other countries. We are all familiar with the argument that if we have not high duties to protect the domestic market, foreign manufacturers will dump goods on us at lower prices than those at which they sell those goods at home. If it is fair to assume that German, American and other manufacturers do this, we may also assume that Canadian manufacturers will also follow the same course.

Mr. COOTE: No, no.

M. McGIBBON: Will the hon. member tell us what proof there is for that statement?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There is no proof in this statement, but here is a reputable newspaper circulating—

Mr. McGIBBON: And members of this House are doing so.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am quite satisfied there is as much truth in this statement as there is in many of the statements that have been put on Hansard this session.

Mr. MORAND: The hon. member referred to my laughing. I laughed because he said he could give a specific instance, but what there is specific about the statement he read is beyond my comprehension. There is nothing specific on the face of it, it is simply a general statement.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There is a statement that a Canadian citizen living in Toronto went to Nassau, in the Bahamas, British West Indies and could have bought a five-passenger McLaughlin sedan for $1,295, but when he tried to buy the same car in Oshawa, where it is manufactured, he was asked $2,095. Could there be anything more specific than that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is the meaning of "specific"?

Mr. MANION: In medicine it has a bad meaning.

Mr. MORAND: But to that price you have to add taxes, freight—

An hon. MEMBER: Freight!

Mr. MORAND: Well, there is a luxury tax and there is also a sales tax. But what I am referring to is that the writer of the article makes no mention whatever about the taxes and difference in equipment; he simply makes the statement that there is a difference in the two prices. Of course there is, we all admit that; but the difference is made up by reason of other conditions which do not enter into the price of the exported car. If there was anything specific about the statement it would specify what the taxes were and the amount of freight on that car.

Mr. DUNNING: What about freight?

[Mr. McLean.]

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Would the Minister of Finance tell us the amount of the excise tax and luxury tax on a $2,095 car in this country.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, for the satisfaction of the hon. member who did not hear me read this article, I said it went on to explain that there is a 5 per cent sales tax and a 10 per cent luxury tax, which taxes are not paid on the export car. Figuring that roughly,—I do not pretend to give the amount to the exact cent, it would amount to $183. Add this to $1,295, and you have a total of $1,478, which would still leave a difference of $600 odd, to which should be added freight.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no freight at Oshawa.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I know. The freight to Nassau should be added to the $1,295.

An hon. MEMBER: No, it should be taken off.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It should be taken off the $2,095 and added to the $1,295.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, hon. gentlemen are convinced that the freight should not be added to the price of the car at Nassau.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Perhaps I am a little thick-headed to-night, Mr. Chairman. The car goes to a foreign port, and I take it the freight charges should be added to the price.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Wait a moment. I take it the freight should be added to the Canadian price, that is, the freight charged on the carriage of the car to the foreign port.

Mr. MANION: You are right this time.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There is still a difference of $800.

An hon. MEMBER: More.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Anyhow, the statement is specific that the taxes amount to $183. If that $183 should be added to the $1,295—

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about the drawback?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): To find out what that car cost in Canada you must add the taxes from which the export car is exempt to the price of that car at Nassau. Putting these taxes at $180, and adding this amount to the $1,295, the relative price would be approximately $1,475.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about the drawback in duty?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Deducting that $1,475 from the $2,095 would leave a difference of over $600. Now, the car sold in Oshawa at approximately $600 more than the similar car could be obtained for in Nassau. To that price you must certainly add the freight to Nassau, for undoubtedly the car did not get there by itself.

Mr. FORKE: The Nassau car was sold for $1,295?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes. There is a specific case of a commodity made in Canada, apparently under a high tariff, being sold abroad at a lower price. The same is true all along the line. We are told that we must have a high tariff in Canada to enable our manufacturers to sell their goods in the foreign market. As I say, if the American, German and other manufacturers sell their goods abroad at a lower price than they charge for them at home, is it not reasonable to assume, in spite of the denial of my hon. friends opposite, that the Canadian manufacturer might be tempted to do the same?

Mr. KAISER: I think if the hon. gentleman would take the trouble to investigate he would learn that a car made in Oshawa for export differs materially from the car intended for the domestic home market. Our manufacturers have to study the requirements of the foreign market. I asked Mr. Keller why it was that some of his cars sold for less in the south, and he replied:

9 p.m. You must remember that the southern country is a cotton country, and the linings are put up in cotton, which is much cheaper, whereas in a northern country your linings must be made of different materials costing two and a half or three times as much as the cotton linings. I am certain that if my hon. friend would investigate all the details he would be satisfied that there is no misrepresentation on the part of the manufacturers.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But this car was made in the same factory.

Mr. KAISER: I tell my hon. friend that they make a different car for every market.

An hon. MEMBER: You do not get mass production that way.

Mr. STANSELL: Mr. Chairman, I am quite satisfied that quotations even from the editorial columns of reliable newspapers are not sufficient proof to make this discussion valuable. For example, I have on my desk a copy of a reliable publication—at least I presume so, for it supports my friends opposite—and it has some glaring headlines and speaks in no complimentary terms about certain members of this House. I want to know if my hon. friend is willing to be judged by the statements in this reliable paper.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Read it. I cannot give an opinion on something I know nothing about. What is the hon. member referring to?

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438c. Tops, wheels and bodies n.o.p. for motor vehicles enumerated in tariff items, 438a and 438b: British preferential tariff 20 per cent; intermediate tariff, 37½ per cent; general tariff 30 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Before the Minister of Customs was in the House I made a few remarks in reference to a statement he made before six o'clock. He referred to what I supposed was the hypothetical case of a car which was invoiced into this country at $3,500, was discounted at a certain manufacturers' discount—

Mr. BOIVIN: At 30 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): At 30 per cent, and was landed here, or paid duty, at $2,800

Mr. BOIVIN: At $2,450.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Paid duty on $2,450, and it sold at $5,414.36. The minister says that the law on our statute book allows us to accept as a fair market value the lowest price at which these cars are sold in the United States. He admits that in order to reach this low price a fake company has to be established in this country in order to enable these people to come out on the same basis as a large corporation in the United States, and that these men are allowed to sell these goods to our people on this side so that a tremendous profit is made, and that the customs must necessarily on that basis be beaten out of thousands of dollars.

Mr. BOIVIN: I did not say that.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): That is the effect of what the minister said, because undoubtedly due to the under-valuation it cannot be otherwise. If a man who establishes a fake agency on this side is allowed to go out and market goods at pretty nearly double the price he ought to charge, there is evidence on the face of it of something wrong. But the minister does not stop there. He says, forsooth, that the Canadian manufacturers avail themselves of that price and sell goods on equal terms, and consequently are just as bad. Will the minister, after having made that statement—he must have had a specific example in mind—tell us of one or two cars made in this country that sell at a price equal to this $5,414.36?

The CHAIRMAN: Before the minister answers, let me call the attention of the committee to the fact that we are now discussing item 438c:

Customs tariff—438c. Tops, wheels, and bodies, n. o.p., for motor vehicles enumerated in tariff items 438a and 438b.

We are not dealing with the automobiles now.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, these items were to be discussed together. I brought this matter up, you will remember, before you declared the previous item carried.

The CHAIRMAN: I might say to the hon. member that I asked the committee to allow the four items to be discussed together, but the hon. member for West York said no, that we would discuss together items 438a and 438b, leaving items 438c and 438d to be discussed separately. We have passed items 438a and 438b after a long discussion, and I must ask the committee to keep to the item under discussion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are we discussing tariff items, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are we discussing the effect of tariff items, their relationship and their reactions on Canadian business? Then can we discuss intelligently the effect of a tariff on tops, wheels and bodies, when at the same time we are not permitted to discuss the basis of valuation of the completed car which comes in in competition with those bodies? It is impossible properly to consider the duty which is to enable Canadian manufacturers of parts to compete with what is their competition, namely, completed American cars coming in here, unless we can refer to the practices which have to do with those American cars. I think the Chairman will see, when he considers it, that he cannot eliminate the discussion of the other items.

[Mr. J. D. Chaplin.]

Mr. ROBB: If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I quite appreciate that you want to be fair with us all, and that your ruling is intended to expedite business, but inasmuch as items 438a and 438b are automobile items, may I suggest that you allow pretty wide latitude in this discussion?

The CHAIRMAN: I think some hon. members are jumping too hastily to conclusions. I did not make any ruling as to what should be discussed. All I called attention to was the fact that we are discussing this particular item, and that we should endeavour to keep as closely to it as possible. I think the committee will agree that I have given as wide latitude as possible, both yesterday and again to-day, and I intend still to do so. But we must not get too far away from the item under discussion and repeat matters that have already been discussed, and pretty well decided, on previous items.

Mr. MANION: If you will remember, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Customs was not in the House when the hon. member for Lincoln first brought this matter up, and it was remarked that when he came in he would answer it.

Mr. BOIVIN: I agree entirely with your interpretation of the rules, Mr. Chairman, but as the question has been asked, I would not like to have it appear that the minister was unable to answer it. So I hope the committee will be indulgent and allow the answer to be given, and then we can take up the next item in the regular way.

If I understood the question correctly, my hon. friend asked me to give the name of some specific car that came in in this way, or of some specific car where the Canadian manufacturer got the same protection, or the improper protection, that I have pointed out.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): If the minister will allow me to interrupt, he is very skilfully putting my question in his own way. I prefer very much to put my question in my own way. The minister gives the House a hypothetical case of a car being brought in from the other side. I do not question that; I believe that it can be established. Now I ask him, in view of the fact that he said the Canadian car was taking advantage of a similar price for a similar car, to name a car made in Canada that approximates this car sold at $5,414.36. I asked him to name two cars; I will ask for only one.

Mr. BOIVIN: I told my hon. friend that before six o'clock; I gave him the answer. My hon. friend well knows that there are two cars on the market to-day, one, which is supposed to be a Canadian car, known as the Cadillac limousine sedan, which was priced in Canada just previous to the change in duty at $5,600, and the other a Pierce-Arrow seven-passenger limousine sedan. The car imported direct from the United States, costing $3,500 in that country and $5,414.36 here, plus $180 for freight which brings it up to $5,600, is a Pierce-Arrow. The Cadillac limousine sedan, which is supposed to be a Canadian car—I do not know whether it is assembled here or imported from the United States, but it is sold here as a Canadian car—is sold at exactly the same price as the other American car. They both sell in the United States for $3,500 and in Canada for $5,600.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): If the minister will say that either of these cars is a Canadian car in any sense of the word I will admit that he is right. There may be some force to his argument, but neither of these cars can be classed as a Canadian car, and I defy the minister to name one solitary car made in Canada against which company the claim he made a few moments ago can be substantiated.

Mr. BOIVIN: I wish my hon. friend were so absolutely right every time he defies anyone on this side of the House. He knows very well that I cannot name a Canadian car which is sold in this country at $5,600, because there is no Canadian car made in Canada which is sold at that price. But if my hon. friend wants me to start my calculations all over again and take a $1,200 car or an $1,800 car, he will see that the proportions work out in exactly the same way. The American manufacturer, instead of putting $500 into his pocket on a $5,000 car, will put $100 in his pocket on a $1,000 car.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if the minister could explain something to me. The price of the Ford coupe in the United States is given as $500, while in Canada, since the new prices have been published it is listed at $625, an increase of $125 or 25 per cent. The Tudor sells in the United States at $520 and in Canada at $650, an increase of 25 per cent, while Fordor sells in the United States at $565, and in Canada at $710, or an increase of 25.6 per cent. The tariff as fixed in the new schedule is only 20 per cent, and yet these cars are sold in Canada at an increase of 25 per cent, 25 per cent and 25.6 per cent respectively over the United States price. Possibly the Minister of Customs can explain that.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, I think I can explain that to my hon. friend. It may be that the published price of the Ford car in Canada includes sales tax and excise tax.

Mr. COOTE: I am quoting from an advertisement appearing in the Grain Growers' Guide, which says:

All prices at Ford, Ontario, Freight and government taxes extra.

Mr. BOIVIN: I still think I can explain it to my hon. friend. The reason is that the American Ford car must be imported by the original purchaser who goes to the United States, buys it, and brings it to Canada. In other words I am informed that there is a business undertaking between the Ford Motor Company of Detroit, Michigan, and the Ford Motor Company of Ford City, by which the United States company will not sell cars to Canadian dealers, and for that reason the Canadian consumer cannot buy an American Ford car from a Canadian dealer. Therefore the company manufacturing Ford cars in Canada are not obliged to limit their price exactly to the difference in duty; they can afford to charge, and they do charge, a little bit more, because they take advantage of the inconvenience to a Canadian citizen in going to the United States and making a purchase, and of the increased rates of freight the Canadian purchaser would be obliged to pay if he bought his car in the United States. They claim that the Canadian car is of better quality, but that explains the difference between the 20 per cent provided for by the tariff and the 25 per cent difference charged by the Ford Company.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister admit that instead of having a 20 per cent protection under the new schedule, the automobile men really have a protection amounting to 25 per cent?

Mr. BOIVIN: I would not like to admit that. The protection which the automobile manufacturer has is certainly the amount of the tariff rate, that is to say, the amount that a Canadian consumer would be obliged to pay if he went to the United States, purchased his car, paid the duty, paid the sales tax and excise tax, and brought it into this country.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister tell us how much that is? Is it not practically 24 per cent?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, it is exactly 20 per cent on the retail price of the car. Then there is a five per cent sales tax on the price of the car plus the duty and there is a five per cent excise tax on the price of the car plus the duty as well.

Mr. COOTE: But is there not in the United States a three per cent excise tax which the buyer of the car must pay? That certainly makes 23 per cent, and the 20 per cent is charged on that total, which makes practically 24 per cent. In addition to that, if a Canadian buys a car in the United States he must provide himself with a license of the state in which he buys the car before he can drive that car out of the United States. So the point I would like to bring out—and if I am wrong I hope the minister will correct me—is that the manufacturers of these cheaper cars in Canada to-day have a protection of at least 25 per cent.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is certainly right when he says that the individual Canadian consumer going to the United States has to pay a 3 per cent excise tax, and the retail value of that car in the United States is the cost of the car plus the excise tax, so he has to pay duty on that price. When my hon. friend says that amounts to a protection of 24 per cent or 25 per cent I would hesitate to agree, because I would hardly call protection the amount of excise tax the purchaser is obliged to pay to the United States government before he brings his car across the line. But it means practically what my hon. friend says. The reason why in my argument a moment ago I did not take into account the excise tax is that when the car is exported from the United States to Canada, the excise tax is not collected by the United States government. It is used for the purpose of determining the retail value of the car for duty purposes, but it is not collected when the car is sold for export from the United States.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: By the dealer.

Mr. BOIVIN: By the dealer or by the distributor. I think if it were possible for the consumer to prove export of a Ford car from the United States, that tax would not be collected even from the consumer. But I agree with my hon. friend that it is impossible for the purchaser of a Ford car in the United States to prove export of that car, because the Ford dealers in that country are forbidden to sell cars to Canadians. They can buy them as individuals, pay the American excise tax and bring them across the line themselves, but if the Ford dealer knows the car is to be exported to Canada, he is instructed by the Ford Motor Company not to sell it, owing to the agreement existing with the Ford Motor Company of Canada.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to ask the hon. member what class of Ford car he was referring to.

Mr. COOTE: I named them all. I started with a coupe.

Mr. McGIBBON: Very well; that is a closed car. I would like to ask the minister if it is not a fact that you must take from the protection which the customs duties give, the duty on imported parts, for instance; the duty on coal, or the duty on steel. Would that not be a fair reduction from the amount of duty which is placed upon the imported article complete?

Mr. BOIVIN: Oh yes. My hon. friend is quite right when he says that from the protection given on the car we should deduct the duty paid on coal and the duty paid on parts which are necessarily imported from the United States. But I say that with the amendment which was announced by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance just before six o'clock, and which we will reach in a moment, the Ford people will no longer have to pay any duty on any of their parts. They will come in absolutely free, because they are the most complete manufacturing plant in Canada. Everything that is made in Canada is either made by them in their own plant or purchased from a Canadian manufacturer, and all the Ford company imports is the parts which they cannot possibly obtain in Canada. They will derive perhaps more benefit than any other plant from the provision placing parts on the free list, but of course when my hon. friend from Macleod made the statement concerning the Ford car imported by the consumer and made the comparison between the 20 per cent duty mentioned in the tariff and the 20 or 25 per cent absolute protection which the Ford plant had in Canada, he was absolutely right. But that is a special case which relates only to the Ford car.

Mr. COOTE: Would that not apply to the Dodge car, the Buick, and almost any other car assembled in Canada?

Mr. BOIVIN: Not exactly, because the Dodge dealers, the Buick dealers and the other dealers in cars assembled in Canada are not bound by contract and there is nothing in any written agreement between the Canadian and the American companies which prohibits Canadian dealers from buying American cars. If the car is bought through a Canadian dealer, it will escape the payment of the 3 per cent excise tax.

Mr. COOTE: My hon. friend will admit they will hold the consumer up the same as the Ford people are doing.

Mr. BOIVIN: I have been arguing all afternoon that the Canadian consuming public has been held up by these manufacturers—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And also has made it plain that what he is doing is not making much difference. He laughs, but he knows it is true. The greatest thing behind the agitation has been the Ford car, and anybody who knew anything about it knew the whole situation. It has always been the same, there never was any change. All the different statements about everything being tariff was just so much nonsense. Here we have the exact figures and a confession.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): And the complaint is that it is not going to be worth much.

Mr. BOIVIN: Did my hon. friend say the complaint was that it was not going to be worth much?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The complaint that the duty of 20 per cent is inactive; instead of that there is a duty of 25 per cent.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend pointed out to hon. members opposite that the cut in duty was not quite so great as they imagined, but at the same time I think we will all admit that the 25 per cent duty is very much better than the 40 per cent duty which they previously enjoyed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just in the same way, we have lots of things covered by patent. Our cream separator business is on the same basis. True, we have absolutely no tariff at all on that article; the whole thing is covered by patent right. The best protection for anybody in the world is the patent protection with agreements from the parent company. My hon. friend has been quite interesting to-night. He has been giving us an honest confession. Frauds have been committed on the country and on the customs, and they are continuing. Frauds are being committed with reference to automobiles coming in, on his own statement. Then he refers to bogus companies. He says they are within the law. I do not know that a bogus company can ever be looked upon as being within the law.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Or fake company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Or fake company.

Mr. BOIVIN: I may perhaps have used a word I should not have used.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): All right, we will accept that.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not pretend for a moment that the company does not exist. It is a Canadian subsidiary company, the stock of which is owned and controlled by the American parent company, and without that company operating in Canada to act as a distributor there would be nobody here to import the cars. The dealers would import them direct subject to the discount they are entitled to receive.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Paying at a higher value.

Mr. BOIVIN: Well, they use a subsidiary company as a distributing company. It is a company which has a legal existence, which does not ask for one cent more reduction in the price of the car than the reduction which is given to distributors of cars in like quantities in the United States; so that it is pretty hard to say it is a fraud that has been perpetrated on the Department of Customs. If it is a fraud, it has been perpetrated on the Customs department for many years, and those who brought it to the attention of the Minister of Customs are precisely the same motor car manufacturers my hon. friend is defending to-night.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Your hon. friend is not defending anyone to-night. I do not know why my hon. friend should say that, unless he wants to draw out some of the arguments which I do not think are at all conclusive which we have been favoured with this afternoon.

Mr. MANION: He wants to draw out applause from behind him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not see why the clapping does not materialize when he makes that statement. He will have a complaint against his back benchers; they are not running up to form. My hon. friend says this was drawn to his attention by a Canadian manufacturer. I do not wonder at it. I would have thought they would have drawn it to his attention and would have been insistent upon getting rid of it. But he says it is an evil; he does not like the word "fraud."

An hon. MEMBER: Fake.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not distinguish between fraud and fake. The fact is that the Canadian Customs department have been losing a lot of money which they should not have lost. My hon. friend will agree that if we had in this country a different basis of valuation this fraud or fake could not take place. Am I right?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, I certainly will not admit my hon. friend is right. He is so seldom right that I do not think he can be right this time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has answered the question. Is he at all aware of the suggestion—it was more than a suggestion, it was put into legislation—that the valuation for customs purposes should be a valuation based on the cost of production. plus manufacturers' profits and distributing expenses? Is the hon. minister aware of that?

Mr. BOIVIN: That that request was made?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, that there was a provision to that effect.

Mr. BOIVIN: No, I am not aware that there is a clause to that effect. I have been told by the officials of my department who have been there for many years administering the Customs Tariff that at one time there was such a clause. It is not in existence now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The clause was struck out in 1922, rendering it possible for this sort of thing to go on. Instead of making a complaint against the Canadian manufacturers and instead of making a complaint against the tariff with which it has nothing to do, it would have become my hon. friend very much better if he had brought in something to enable him to stop this kind of fake business in Canada, these fake companies, these schemes of beating the customs. I might go back to the valuations which we had in 1921, which would have prevented those frauds, but I suppose that is a course of action that it is idle to seek any progress on from this government.

I want to address myself to the particular item under discussion having regard to it as such and not to its relation to the valuation of motor cars for customs purposes. The Minister of Finance admitted this afternoon that as the processing went on the rate went up. The Minister of Customs did not admit it, but it was a sound argument and I suppose he will admit it.

Mr. BOIVIN: I also admit it.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then we have both ministers agreeing; we are all agreed on that, and therefore the rate on the parts ought to be always less than the rate on the whole because there is just that much Canadian labour to be looked after as the processing is carried on further and further. The Minister of Customs nods his head. I assume he means that is correct. He again nods his head. Very good. Under those circumstances, I seriously ask the government in view of their own statement: How do they think this item is proper? On parts such as tops, wheels and bodies which are the chief parts that go into automobiles we have rates of 20, 27½ and 30 per cent. Of course, the 30 per cent rate is really the one in which we are interested. I am quite aware that it is proposed to give a rebate of 25 per cent in connection with that rate. I understand from the Minister of Finance that that is correct. That would reduce the rate of 30 per cent in which we are interested to 22½ per cent. Is my hon. friend going to leave it in that way?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In other words, against the principle which they laid down, the rates on the parts are to be greater than the rates on the completed article, because that is the effect of this section as I read it.

Mr. BOIVIN: When the government had the intention of reducing the duty on motor cars from 35 to 27½ per cent on the high priced car and from 35 to 20 per cent on the car valued at less than $1,200, those parts that are mentioned in this particular item were not taken into consideration by the government. It was in the minds of the officials of both departments that the intention of the government was to reduce the rates on the parts to absolutely the same rate as that on the motor cars themselves.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was the old law.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, because under the original item 438—there was then only one item—an appraisers' bulletin had been issued on the 21st November, 1919, under a ruling of the Board of Customs, that those four component parts, chassis, wheels, tops and bodies, would pay exactly the same rate of duty as the completed car. There were many reasons for that, the principal one being to prevent people from dismantling cars, importing them in portions and then putting them together. Relying upon that old bulletin, the Department of Customs, after consultation with the tariff advisers in the Department of Finance but without referring the matter to the government, issued an appraisers' bulletin on the 17th April, the day after the budget came down. The bulletin reads as follows:

In conformity with the ruling in appraisers' bulletin No 2018, tops, wheels, chassis or completed bodies, for use on automobiles or motor trucks, are rated under tariff item 438a and 438b.

Those articles are to be rated under tariff item 438b only when the following certificate is subscribed to on the face of the sworn to entry; otherwise, they are to be rated under tariff item 438a.

Then the bulletin contains the form of a certificate which is to be signed by persons importing those parts for the cheaper cars. When that bulletin was issued parts makers from all parts of Canada came to Ottawa and asked the government to do something to meet their needs and requirements, pointing out that if the duty on their parts was reduced to 20 per cent and if, in addition to that 20 per cent, there was to be a 25 per cent drawback on the same parts when imported from the United States to be placed in cars the content of which was 50 per cent or more Canadian, they could not remain in business. They interviewed the Minister of Finance; many of them came to see me; they saw nearly all the members of the government. It was explained to them very frankly—and this is the only change that is being made now in the budget and it is not a substantial change—that we intended that the duties on parts would remain as they were, but that they would be reduced by 25 per cent when the parts were imported from the United States to go into Canadian made cars. Parts men and automobile manufacturers met and in their meetings—and one of those meetings took place in my room—they came to the understanding that the duty on parts should be reduced to 30 per cent. The present tariff is 35 per cent and the reduction is therefore from 35 to 30 per cent. My hon. friend says that there is only one thing wrong; that it would be perfect if that rate was not higher than the duty on cars; that as the part is a component part of the entire automobile, the duty should be less instead of more. The duty is not less, but it is also not more and I am going to show my hon. friend how that happens. He saw the point at once and he admitted a moment ago that this 30 per cent was subject to a 25 per cent drawback which reduced the rate to 22½ per cent. The part makers told us that it was absolutely impossible to have two rates on parts; that the same material entered into the wheels, bodies and tops, and that they would prefer a uniform rate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is right.

Mr. BOIVIN: They all admitted that twice as many cars under $1,200 in value are sold as cars over $1,200 in value; in other words that the proportion of those cars was two-thirds to one-third. The duty on one-third of the cars at 27½ per cent and on two-thirds of the cars at 20 per cent evened up, exactly equals 22½ per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On the average.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Cars are not sold on the average.

Mr. BOIVIN: But still we must meet the demands of the parts manufacturers and try to meet their wishes by finding an average. That is the plan which they proposed to us. They said: Seeing that you are going to impose a uniform rate on parts, we would like to have you average the rate on the parts to the average rate on the cars sold. The average rate on cars will be 22½ per cent and the average rate on parts will be absolutely the same.

Mr. CLARK: Does the Minister of Customs consider tires a part of a car?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: What duty is now assessed on tires?

Mr. BOIVIN: The duty on tires at the present time is 35 per cent, but I am glad to say that there is no tire factory in Canada to-day taking advantage of the full protection.

Mr. CLARK: The minister said that there would be no higher duty on parts imported for further manufacture. Any Canadian manufacturer importing tires or any part which bears 35 per cent duty—and there are many such parts—will now have a protection of 27½ per cent, whereas if I, say, want to import a car carrying tires or parts of the same value, I shall have to pay a duty of 20 per cent. I do not think the minister can question the truth of this statement. In other words, the minister in this budget says to me: "If you want to buy a Canadian car I am going to charge you 27½ per cent on every American part that enters into the manufacture of that car; but if you import an American car made by American labour I will charge you, in respect of those parts, only 20 per cent." Is not that the situation?

Mr. BOIVIN: Is my hon. friend anxious to reduce the duty on tires to 20 per cent?

Mr. CLARK: No, but I am anxious to have the matter scientifically investigated. And to prove my contention that it has not been studied on that basis I will quote two observations made by the Minister of Finance this afternoon. In the first place he declared that he was bewildered when confronted by the manufacturers with their problems, and then he talked about having to grope around to find a solution for certain difficulties. These two admissions alone constitute a sufficient evidence that due investigation has not been made into this industry. I do not pose as an expert on the automobile question, but I am asking for fair treatment for the industry and I claim that it is unfair to expect a Canadian manufacturer to compete with American producers when we levy a duty of 27½ per cent on parts imported by him while every other Canadian citizen is encouraged to go to the United States and buy a finished car on which he will pay only 20 per cent in respect to these particulars parts.

Mr. BOIVIN: When my hon. friend makes a plea for the tire manufacturers of Canada—

Mr. CLARK: I am not making a plea for the tire manufacturers or for anyone else. I want the minister to understand that I am speaking in behalf of the industry as a whole, and particularly in the interests of the workmen. The great bulk of the automobile manufacturers are Americans who have branch factories here, and so far as they are concerned it is not a matter of very much moment to them if you do kill the industry in Canada, because in a very few months, almost anyone could absorb the capital lost in the Canadian factories. But my point is that for the sake of the tremendous pay-roll and of our Canadian people who are employed in the industry, the matter is one that should be scientifically investigated and not left to the decision of a government which has to grope around in a bewildered state.

Mr. ROBB: We have had a fair discussion of this item and I think the committee is satisfied that we are trying to deal fairly with all industries. I suggest that we might now pass the item and proceed with the three I mentioned at six o'clock. We could clean up this sheet and get through, seeing that many hon. gentlemen are anxious to catch the train.

Mr. CLARK: The minister has said that in New Zealand the regulations provide that for duty purposes the assessment shall be made on the fair market value in the country of origin, and he went on to suggest that it would be advantageous to Canada to adopt the same principle here. I would ask him, first, whether he proposes to make a change in the present valuations for duty purposes; and, secondly, what in his opinion is the difference between the principle applied in New Zealand and that applied in this country.

Mr. ROBB: Why should we go over that ground again to-night? The Minister of Customs explained the point fully.

Mr. CLARK: The Minister of Finance made the statement a moment ago that the duty of 20 per cent would be assessed on the retail value of the car. Is the duty so assessed to-day?

Mr. BOIVIN: At the present time the duty on a car imported by the ultimate consumer who buys it in the United States is assessed on the retail value, but in respect of all cars imported from the United States by dealers or distributors—and my hon. friend will readily recognize the difference between a dealer and a distributor—the duty is charged, not on the retail, but on the wholesale price.

Mr. CLARK: Charged to whom?

Mr. BOIVIN: To the distributor, if imported by him.

Mr. CLARK: On the first sale from the manufacturer.

Mr. BOIVIN: On the first sale from the manufacturer to the distributor, and if it is imported by a dealer he also is entitled to a discount.

Mr. CLARK: In what way does that differ from the practice established in New Zealand now?

Mr. BOIVIN: When goods are imported into New Zealand the value for duty is calculated on the retail value in the country of origin. At the present time they have a duty of 10 per cent on cars imported from Canada as against a duty of 25 per cent on cars imported from the United States. As the Minister of Finance pointed out this afternoon, every time we do anything by our tariff to reduce the retail value of motor cars manufactured in this country we are giving an advantage to our manufacturers in the New Zealand market by widening the difference between the duty paid by our manufacturers and that paid by their United States competitors.

Mr. CLARK: Does the Minister of Customs agree with the Minister of Finance that the New Zealand system would be preferable to the one in vogue here?

Mr. BOIVIN: I was not present when the hon. Minister of Finance referred to that matter. I am not sure that he made the statement, because I know that our automobile manufacturers have for the last month been asking him to incorporate that system in our tariff and make the duty payable on the full retail value of the car. So far as I know he has not granted their request.

Mr. CLARK: He stated this afternoon that in his opinion it would be advisable.

Mr. ROBB: I stated this afternoon that the New Zealand method was worth considering in view of the situation that had developed in Canada of a 35 per cent discount.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, how can you ever expect to be able to export Canadian cars to New Zealand under present conditions, where you have your excise tax that enlarges the retail value of your car, with the result that New Zealand imposes a discriminating duty because of that very enlargement of price? You never can do it.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is trying to induce me to lose some of my excise tax.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): No, I am stating what is a fact. While that excise tax is continued you absolutely prevent the export of Canadian cars to New Zealand.

Mr. ROBB: There is very much to be said for that view.

Mr. CLARK: Does the Minister of Customs think the government has power under section 42 of the Customs Act to change the basis of valuation for duty by order in council?

Mr. BOIVIN: The hon. member for Fort William asked me that question early in the evening, and I answered him that we had never discussed the matter around the council table, but that my own interpretation of section 42 and that of my officers was to the effect that we could not take advantage of the section to impose the retail price as the value for duty; that we could only apply the section to prevent abuses, for instance, to prevent a subsidiary distributing company from obtaining a higher rate of discount than it could legitimately obtain when cars were merely passing through its hands to be sold to other dealers.

Mr. CLARK: May I point out that in 1924 this government did pass an order in council in connection with agricultural implements under which they changed the basis of valuation for duty? That order in council provided that the American manufacturer must invoice his goods and pay duty on the basis of the price payable by the American purchaser. So apparently the government have recognized that they have such power and have actually practised it in the past.

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friend and those who surround him advocate that we should pass an order in council obliging any Canadian dealer importing an American car to pay duty on the full American retail value, I promise to give his request very serious consideration and to bring it to the attention of my colleagues in council. Possibly if it is within the law, and if everybody on the other side of the House desires that it should be done, it may be done, because it will make absolutely no difference whatever in the cost of the car to the Canadian consumer. What we are endeavouring to do by these changes in the tariff is to lift the load off the shoulders of the Canadian consumer by bringing down the price of motor cars.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would have thought in view of what my hon. friend said to-day that he would want to stop fraud on the customs and secure proper valuations, irrespective of whether the act covers it or not. I would have thought that he would consider it his duty to see that proper valuations are made and render impossible fraud on the customs of this country by fake companies. All such frauds ought to be stopped now.

Mr. BOIVIN: I said this afternoon that if my hon. friends on the other side would allow me to remain Minister of Customs a little while longer I would recommend to council the passing of an order whereby no importer of cars would be allowed to claim an unreasonable discount upon the list price of the car imported to evade the payment of fair duty.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: The next is a new item:

Customs tariff—438d. Horns. distributors, ammeters, instrument board lamps, oil gauges, gasoline gauges, thermostats, oil filters, carburetors, purifiers for oil, purifiers for air, clocks, monograms of metal and enamel, annular ball bearings and parts thereof, lock washers, speedometers and parts thereof, vacuum tanks, gaskets of copper and of asbestos, rims for steering wheels, welded axle housings, electric terminals other than battery terminals, and fuses, all of a class or kind not made in Canada, when imported by manufacturers of goods enumerated in tariff items 438a, 438b and 438c, for use only as orignal equipment in the manufacture of motor vehicles enumerated in tariff items 438a and 438b: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: There is another one—

Mr. MORAND: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon the Minister of Customs very emphatically stated, and a few minutes ago the Minister of Finance also stated, that neither wanted the excise tax to be touched. In other words, they wanted this money for the purpose of paying off the war debt. I wonder if it has ever occurred to some other hon. gentlemen—I know it has to those ministers—just how much is now being taken off the revenue of the country by lowering the price of automobiles. Eleven per cent of the cars used in Canada are imported. Those cars used to pay 35 per cent; they are now going to pay 20 per cent. Two out of every three of them will pay 20 per cent, the balance will pay 27½ per cent. Besides this, the price of all cars being lowered, the excise tax and the sales tax will be reduced upon the total amount of sales. Furthermore, the duty on parts that are imported is cut to 20 per cent in some cases, and many will be admitted free, which again will reduce the revenue very seriously. If hon. gentlemen opposite had taken the easy way and removed 5 or 10 per cent from the sales tax, instead of upsetting the whole country by these changes, I wonder if they would not have arrived at exactly the same result. What is going to happen now, with some exceptions, is that we are going to get a slightly cheaper motor car at the expense of the national revenue. The minister shakes his head, but that is the fact. Further than that, all these parts were absolutely parts upon which the tariff for revenue—much lauded by my friends across the way—applied, because none were manufactured in this country, such as horns, distributors, ammeters, instrument board lamps, oil gauges, gasolines gauges, thermostats, oil filters, carbureters, and so forth. That is taken out of the revenue of the country; there is nothing else for it. It is a straight reduction of the revenue of the country for the purpose of reducing the price of automobiles. But it does more than that. Many of these items undoubtedly have been gone over by the experts, and it is only unfortunate that they were not gone over by the experts before the budget was brought down, instead of afterwards. It would have saved the government and the country a great deal of trouble and anxiety. There is this point. Some of these parts are new; they have just been put on cars recently, and there has been no chance for a Canadian manufacturer to develop an industry in these parts. This absolutely precludes the possibility of Canadian manufacturers entering into their manufacture.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend loses sight of the fact that the moment any one of these parts is manufactured in Canada, it comes off the free list, and the duty presently paid on these parts goes on automatically. These parts will be free from duty only so long as they are not manufactured in this country. My hon. friend need not worry, because, after all, the duty paid by automobile manufacturers on these parts averages only about four dollars per car. We are giving this reduction to the automobile manufacturer to compensate him in part for the reduction of the duty, the advantage of which we are passing on to the Canadian consumer. I repeat, the duty paid on all these parts that cannot be manufactured in this country at the present time amounts to an average of $4 per car and possibly $8 on the higher priced cars.

Mr. MORAND: I do not know what is the exact amount, but we will admit that it is $4 per car. That means just that amount taken from the revenue of the country for the purpose of reducing the price of automobiles. The minister must admit that we shall not receive the same amount of duty per car imported into Canada as before, and 11 per cent of the cars used in Canada were imported up until a short time ago. So is not this going to reduce the amount of revenue you are going to receive?

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friend desires to have us collect the largest possible amount of duty on cars imported into Canada, we have been wasting our time arguing here this afternoon and this evening. I thought my hon. friend was not anxious that cars be imported into Canada. I thought he wanted them manufactured in this country.

Mr. MORAND: That is what I want.

Mr. BOIVIN: Then why base his argument on the loss of revenue on cars imported into this country?

Mr. MORAND: That is very simple. I have known the Minister of Customs for a long time, and I know that he can wiggle out of almost anything. But the fact remains that if you lower the duty to 20 per cent you are going to have more cars imported.

Mr. BOIVIN: Then there will be more revenue.

Mr. MORAND: Yes, and fewer cars manufactured in Canada. You cannot eat your cake and have it.

Mr. BOIVIN: Seeing that my hon. friend has made his speech and my own, there is nothing left to be said.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 1055 as amended reads:

Customs tariff—1055. Materials including all parts:—When used in the manufacture of goods enumerated in tariff items 438a and 438b. Provided that before April 1, 1927, no drawback shall be paid under this item unless at least forty per cent of the cost of producing the finished article has been incurred in Canada; Provided that on and after April 1, 1927, no drawback shall be paid under this section unless at least fifty per cent of the cost of producing the finished article has been incurred in Canada;

And provided further that no drawback under this item shall be payable more than once on any article; portion of duty (not including special duty or dumping duty) payable as drawback, 25 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There seems to be a complete change in the wording. What is the effect of the changes?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know whether my hon. friend was out a moment ago when I explained that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, it is just the 40 per cent?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): A few minutes ago the Minister of Customs told us about the strenuous efforts he made and the time he had with the parts makers in order to bring their condition on a livable basis. He told us that the duty was adjusted, not on the basis of 20 per cent, but it was fixed at 30 per cent, 27½ per cent and 20 per cent on the parts of cars. I want to ask the minister, does he expect that the articles mentioned there will have the protection he speaks of, even less the 25 per cent of rebate, in the event of their being used by manufacturers of cars who make the 50 per cent? Does he think, for instance, that a manufacturer of tops or bodies will have the benefit of that duty?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am not sure that the manufacturer of tops, wheels and bodies in this country will be able to take advantage of the full 30 per cent. That will depend a great deal upon internal competition. That is the argument that is used by my hon. friends on the other side all the time, that if you put the duty high enough, you will have so many factories making the same line of goods that competition will keep prices down. That may be; I am not prepared to argue against that tonight, but I do not exactly get the point that my hon. friend wants to make, and I would like to explain to him anything I possibly can, if I understand it myself. He says that by giving a protection of 30 per cent to the manufacturers of tops, wheels and bodies, the manufacturers will not get the 30 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Not at all.

Mr. BOIVIN: I admit that; I admitted it a little while ago. They will be getting 30 per cent less the 25 per cent of the duty provided in the drawback clause. That will reduce their protection to 22½ per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Does the minister think that they will get the 22½ per cent? That is what my question is.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is a manufacturer. He may know that they will not get the 22½ per cent. If they do not get the 22½ per cent it certainly will not be the fault of this parliament, because that is the protection we are giving them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is a trade condition. My hon. friend must know it.

Mr. BOIVIN: That is what I say. I say that if they do not get that full protection it will not be the fault of parliament.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): It is partly the fault of the 25 per cent rebate.

Mr. BOIVIN: There are a great many arguments that can be used against the 25 per cent rebate, and the principal argument used by the parts manufacturers is that every one who makes a car in Canada the material entering into the manufacture of which will be at least 60 per cent Canadian can go to each individual Canadian parts maker and say: "The part you are selling to me is the part that makes up the difference in my car between the 50 per cent and the 60 per cent Canadian content. You must sell that part to me at 25 per cent reduction on duty paid on an American part or I shall buy it from the United States." Then he can go to some other part manufacturer and use the same argument with him. I am willing to admit, and I think the Minister of Finance will admit, that this drawback clause is almost tantamount to reducing the duty on parts to 22½ per cent. But it has this additional advantage. It will prohibit people from importing all their parts from the United States and using Canada simply for assembling plants to get the benefit of Canadian prices on their shipments overseas. It will oblige them to manufacture their cars in Canada. There is that advantage to the 25 per cent drawback; there are those who are assembling in Canada at present, such as the Dodge Brothers and the Durant people and others, who are not putting 50 per cent of Canadian content into their cars. Some manufacturers came to us and assured us that they wanted to develop their plants in Canada, and this 40 per cent provision is made to enable them to do so during the next year.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): There is one mistake the minister makes; he should refrain from mentioning names, because he does an injustice to the manufacturers. He mentioned the Durant plant, for example; I can tell him that already the Durant people make more than 50 per cent of their car in Canada, consequently they should not be referred to as people who are making less than that percentage here. What the minister says may be true in respect to others but it is an injustice to this particular firm.

Mr. BOIVIN: If I have done any injustice to the Durant people, I withdraw the name at once and apologize most sincerely. If they are making more than 50 per cent of their cars in Canada at present, I am glad to be so advised and I hasten to add: All honour to them for it.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I know whereof I speak.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am sure the hon. member is right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Minister of Customs has put his finger on the one thing this government is sure of and the one thing I think they are relying on as the reason why the manufacture of cars must continue in this country. I refer to the British preference, and other preferences with the British dominions. They must continue manufacturing, as he points out, in order to sell in these export markets, and I think there is a great deal in what he says. But so far as the parts manufacturer is concerned I do not think my hon. friends quite realize the condition. In addition to what has been already stated we have a very large proportion of our business which is export business, calling for refunds. Take the case of a man manufacturing parts with a 50 per cent export business and a 50 per cent local business. What is the effect there? It is to cut down the duty to practically half. He buys for his output, and he knows what proportion of his business is export, so it works out to about 50 per cent net real protection to the part manufacturer.

Mr. ROBB: Just before the item passes—and I will hasten, because I know hon. gentlemen want to catch the train—I was rather pleased that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) reminded my junior colleague that we should be careful in this House in advertising different companies. It now gives me an opportunity of saying to him what I did not like to say earlier in the evening. It occurred to me that he was doing an injury to a certain industry in this country when he said certain cars could not be manufactured in Canada at all. I will tell hon. gentlemen why I mention that. While I was in Australia, trying to negotiate as favourable a trade agreement as I possibly could, the Australians said to us, "We cannot give you a preference on automobiles; you do not manufacture them in Canada; they are all United States concerns." So we should all keep in mind as members of parliament, whatever views we may have, that to say we cannot do things in this country injures our trade.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I think the minister is inclined to be fair. It was not I who first mentioned the name of a company; I have absolutely refrained from mentioning company names. The minister mentioned that name first, as Hansard will show, and I stated that cars of that description and category could not be made in this country economically. I make that statement now; I am not afraid to repeat it, because I know it is absolutely correct.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not like my hon. friend to get away with that. I do not want to start another argument but if you will look at Hansard to-morrow you will find that when I discussed the price of automobiles and the duty upon them, I took as an example a $3,500 car. I said that I referred to no particular make; I refused to mention any names, and it was only after I had been repeatedly urged and questioned by the hon. member, who asked me to give the name of any particular car in Canada selling at that price, that I told him there was a car in Canada known as the Cadillac that did sell at approximately this figure.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): That is perfectly true; I asked that question, but the minister gave me the names of two cars which are made in the United States and not in Canada. He did not answer my question at all.

Mr. BOIVIN: Then I did no harm to any Canadian company.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1053. Cellulose acetate in powdered form imported after the thirtieth day of April, 1927 and prior to the first day of November, 1927: When imported by manufacturers and further manufactured in their own factories before the first day of December, 1927, portion of duty (not including special duty or dumping duty) payable as drawback, 99 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: Before this item passes, my hon. friend from Lincoln desired that I bring in a letter from Courtaulds Limited, dated February 3rd. I have that letter here. I also made a statement this afternoon that this industry would invest about $10,000,000 in Canada. I find that the estimated expenditure for buildings and plant will be in the neighbourhood of $8,000,000, while an ultimate expenditure of about $20,000,000 is expected. Within six months after breaking ground the company expects to employ between 500 and 2,000 hands, and when the plant is fully equipped the number is expected to be 4,000 in practically equal proportions, male and female. The letter from Courtaulds I shall be very glad to table, if my hon. friend has seen it.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Yes, I have seen it, and I shall be glad to have it tabled.

Mr. ROBB: As these are the originals, I will have copies made and tabled.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—1054. Yarns produced from cellulose acetate, dry spun, not more advanced than singles, when imported after the thirty-first day of October, 1926, and prior to the first day of August, 1927, when imported by manufacturers and further manufactured in their own factories before the first day of September, 1927, portion of duty (not including special duty or dumping duty), payable as drawback, 80 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I will not ask the committee to pass any of the other clauses.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is only the items that we have passed; the general resolution stands.

Mr. ROBB: I have agreed with the right hon. leader of the opposition to hold one resolution over until he could have an opportunity of discussing it, I should like to keep my word. We all hope he will be in the House on Tuesday next, and we will continue then.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 10.23 p.m., until Tuesday, May 25th.

Tuesday, May 25, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

FUEL SUPPLY COMMITTEE

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing) moved that the first report of the committee appointed to investigate the fuel supply of Canada, which was presented to the House on Thursday last, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT PRESENTED

Annual report of the directors of the Central Vermont Railway Company.—Mr. Dunning.

IMPORTATION OF CELERY FROM THE UNITED STATES

PETITION FOR EMBARGO FROM LAMBTON COUNTY GROWERS

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present a petition from the celery growers in my constituency which reads as follows:

To the honourable the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled

The petition of the undersigned celery growers of the constituency of East Lambton, Ontario, humbly showeth: That we desire to have an embargo placed on celery coming from the United States into Canada similar to the embargo placed on this product going into the United States from Canada by the government of the United States, from October to February of each year.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable House may be pleased to grant the prayer of this petition, and as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray. May 18th 1926.

The explanatory note is very short. It reads as follows:

Thedford, Ont., May 18, 1926.

J. E. Armstrong, Esq.,
Member of House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

Enclosed find two copies of our petition for the Senate and the House of Commons.

For your information the duty on celery entering the United States is twenty-five per cent and an embargo has been on for years against the celery from Canada entering the United States on account of the corn borer which to date has never bothered celery but is used as a handle to stop exportation.

We would appreciate it as a body if an embargo was on from October to February 1st each year, so as to allow the local supply to be consumed before the southern states flood the market.

This resquest is asked not as a handle to boost prices but to allow the home grown product to have the market and work off the supply before foreign goods come on.

Thanking you in advance and trusting you will be successful in our cause,

I remain,

Yours very sincerely,

CHAS. KINMERLEY.

I may say that the crop grown in the district in 1924 consisted of over 250 carloads.

MR. MEIGHEN'S RECOVERY

CONGRATULATIONS BY PRIME MINISTER AND MR. FORKE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition that we are all pleased to see him back in the House again. We hope very sincerely that he has completely recovered from his recent indisposition.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Leader of Progressives): On behalf of hon. members in this corner of the House, I desire to express our very great pleasure at seeing the right hon. leader of the opposition in his place once more. We hope that his health is fully restored.

IMPORTATION OF MINERS

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT OFFICE ADVERTISING FOR MEN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he can give us a statement with regard to the application for workers from Europe for the mines in Nova Scotia?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Labour): I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the information I have received is to the effect that applications were made for workers by some of the mines in Nova Scotia. The applications were communicated to the department which asked its various agencies for information as to the extent to which these demands could be supplied. The reply received was to the effect that there were, perhaps, sufficient workers available in Canada to meet the requirements. Up to the present it has not been deemed necessary or advisable to at all comply with the request which was made for additional workers from outside Canada. That is the information on the matter so far as I have been able to obtain it.

[Mr. J. E. Armstrong.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask whether it is the policy of the department to supply workers from Canada before allowing workers to be introduced from Europe?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That was exactly what the department had in mind. It endeavoured to get an estimate of the labour available in Canada before attempting to send outside for help. That is, of course, the policy of the department.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ANNUAL STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee of Supply.

He said: In attempting to present, for the consideration of parliament, what has come to be known as the railway budget, I do so with every appreciation of my own somewhat recent contact with federal railway affairs. Since taking hold, I have gone far enough into the activities of the department over which I have the honour to preside to acquire a lively appreciation also of the splendid service rendered by that veteran of public life and my own immediate predecessor, the Right Hon. George P. Graham. We on this side of the House regret his absence to-day and none more so than the one to whom has fallen the difficult task which years of experience had made so easy for the former minister. Mr. Graham had the very happy faculty of presenting National railway matters in such a way as to invite their consideration on a high plane. It is my wish that there should be no departure from that very desirable practice, and that whatever criticism there may be—and criticism there is bound to be—may be of a constructive and helpful nature, and to the advantage rather than hurt of the country's immense investment in our National railways.

Following the precedent established last year the Canadian National railway report was this year made available in advance of the minister's annual statement, and has been in the hands of the members for some weeks. The report presents much detail, not only as to operating results, but of the financial ramifications of the system. It is well that such full information as to the management and operation of the National lines should be freely available to parliament. The National railways are the people's property, in the success of which the Canadian public are deeply concerned, and, as representatives of the owners, it is desirable that members of this House should take a very close interest in our railway affairs.

Last year's operating results were so far in in advance of previous years that I feel that my first duty in relation to the report itself should be the altogether happy one of congratulating the chairman and president, the board, the responsible officers and the rank and file of the National railways on the results achieved. To have done more business at less cost is an accomplishment which has brought commendation from quarters ordinarily inclined to hold that such things were not really possible under public ownership. The figures indicate roughly that while two-thirds of this year's improvement of fifteen millions in net earnings was the result of increased business due to a good harvest and improving trade, one-third was due to decreased costs of operation. And it will be noted that Sir Henry Thornton affirms that this improvement was accompanied by no deterioration in service or unfair treatment of employees. It affords me pleasure, therefore, on behalf of the government, to acknowledge the loyal service of officers and employees, whose enthusiasm and good will made last year's achievement possible.

This gathering, Mr. Speaker, in the House of Commons, is the only body which bears the relationship to our National Railways which is borne by the annual shareholders meetings of a private company to the affairs of that company, and I propose to deal with the subject this afternoon rather as if the members of this House were, as they are, representatives of the great body of shareholders throughout the Dominion of Canada in this property. The presentation I will endeavour to make will be analytical in character rather from the point of view of a man who comes freshly into contact with the railway system and its affairs, and who settles down to study the system, and probably my point of view will be more interesting because of that.

The accounts are presented in balance sheet form as designed by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States, and adopted by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. The form is that used by the railroads of the United States, and by the use of such a standard form, comparison is readily made with the accounts of other railroads which have adopted this standard of accounting practice. The balance sheet of the National lines carries the signature of the chief accounting officer of the railways and, in addition, the certificate of a well-known firm of chartered accountants.

It should be kept in mind that this is not the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railway Company, but is a consolidated balance sheet designed to show the aggregate assets and liabilities, under each balance sheet classification, of every company embraced within the Canadian National system, with all inter-corporate transactions eliminated. By this form of presentation there is clearly displayed the total assets under the control of the National Railways, the total liabilities to the public against such assets, and the total liabilities for capital less deficits to the government as shareholders, and for loans and advances.

The Central Vermont Railway is not included in this consolidation except in respect of the control account with that company carried in the National books under investments in affiliated companies. It will be of interest to honourable members to know that there are no less than 87 separate balance sheets included in this consolidated account. Between many of these individual balance sheets are numerous inter-related transactions which require to be eliminated in any consolidation so as to present a clear picture of the relationship of the National Railways to its public creditors and to the government.

I believe every hon. member has in his desk a copy of the annual report, and will be able to follow my reference to the various pages of that report.

On the asset side of the balance sheet it will be seen that the accounts are separated under four headings—Investments, Current Assets, Deferred Assets, and Unadjusted Debits—and that on the liability side, a corresponding separation is made. A classification under Interstate Commerce Commission standard headings of expenditures, less retirements, during the year 1925, applicable to investment in road and equipment, is given on page 23 of the report, and similar information relating to improvements on leased railway property will be found on page 24. These statements indicate a net improvement of $17,964,827 during the year in the railways' investment in road and equipment, and of $430,628 on leased railway properties.

In the next item, sinking funds which have been created in accordance with the provisions of trust deeds for the redemption of certain items of funded debt, there is a balance of $9,374,000 of which $5,064,000 represents the par of system securities acquired, but held alive in such sinking funds. This should be considered in the sense of a reduction to that extent of the total funded debt held by the public.

The item, miscellaneous physical property, $53,912,609, includes hotels, lands, and so on, and in connection with the latter a footnote directs attention to the fact that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec dispute the title of lands valued at $7,318,140.

A detail of the investment in affiliated companies is given on page 37 of the report. In this list is a new account of $3,677,500, representing acquired bonds of the Toronto Terminal Railway Company issued in connection with the financing of the Toronto new station and viaduct scheme in connection with which legislation was enacted last session. Twenty-five millions odd of this thirty-seven millions shown as investments in affiliated companies represent the Canadian National holdings in the Central Vermont.

The next group of accounts, Current Assets, shows a total of $95,500,000 as against $99,500,000 last year. Cash on hand in the general funds of the company which, at December 31, last, totalled $31,677,083, is up $1,669,000. Special deposits, which represent funds set aside for specific purposes, are up $4,000,000. In this account are carried unexpended balances of proceeds of securities which are released, from time to time, on the authority of the Minister of Finance. Miscellaneous accounts receivable are down $2,500,000. Part of this decrease is due to accounting reclassification, but the decrease is also attributable to better collections, indicating better business conditions generally. The value of materials and supplies on hand at December 31, was $42,582,983, as compared with $50,459,444 at the end of the previous year. As explained by Sir Henry Thornton in his review of the year's operations, expenditures on purchasing and stores account were considerably less in 1925 than in 1924. A determined effort also was made to reduce stocks, so that at the end of the year, materials and supplies on hand amounted to almost eight millions less than at the end of 1924.

Under Deferred Assets—Insurance and Other Funds—is carried the investment of the company's fire insurance and other reserve funds which I will refer to when I come to the reserves under deferred liabilities. The increase of a million in other deferred assets is occasioned by accounting reclassification.

Discount on funded debt, an unadjusted debit item, represents the discount below par at the time of the sale of all securities, which discount is amortized by charges to income account in equal amounts over the life of the securities.

On the other side of the balance sheet the principal account is that of long-term debt, which shows an increase during the year of $63,630,126.52. It will be noted that in this year's presentation it is made a little clearer that this account includes interest accrued on government loans, which, under present conditions, is a matter of book-keeping only and does not represent additional cash advances by the government. This interest account has been increased by $31,703,510.70 during the year, and now accumulates to more than $161,000,000. Analyzing the increase in debt of $63,000,000 during the year, we shall find the debt held by the public has increased $17,416,219.94, and the debt to the government $46,213,906.58. The increase in the debt to the public, as explained under the heading of Finance on page 6 of the report, comprises two guaranteed issues, one of $17,000,000, and the other $18,000,000, against which there were retirements amounting to $17,583,780.06. The increase in debt to the government of $46,213,906.58 is made up of three items, the first of which is the book-keeping item of interest accrued on government loans, $31,703,510.70. It will be well to keep in mind, in discussing the railway debt, that a large portion of the increase in debt as shown by the railway accounts is not additional cash advanced by the government to the road, but is this item of interest which they are compelled to set up in their books. I wish to emphasize this because frequently the impression gets abroad that the railway has used up during the year much more cash than is actually the case. For the year 1925, for instance, of the increase in debt, approximately one-half is cash and the rest is a book-keeping transaction.

The second item in the increase in government debt is an amount of $14,259,435.69 repaid to the railway. When the railway issued its four and a half per cent gold bonds in September, 1924, the proceeds not immediately required were temporarily lent to the Minister of Finance and were repaid by the minister to the railways in the early part of 1925. The third item is an amount of $250,960.19 representing certain payments made through the Department of Railways and Canals for compensation and pension payments to Canadian Government railway employees under special legislation, which are taken up in the accounts of the National Railways so as to make a complete accounting for the entire property.

Full details of the outstanding debt held by the public, or by sinking funds, are to be found on pages 28 and 29 of the report. The schedule also shows to what extent the outstanding securities are guaranteed by Canada or the provinces, and indicates that of the $931,000,000 of funded debt due the public, $674,000,000 is guaranteed and $256,000,000 is unguaranteed. Of the $674,000,000 guaranteed, $581,000,000 is guaranteed by the Dominion and $93,000,000 by the various provinces, as follows: Ontario, $7,859,997; Manitoba, $24,389,892; Saskatchewan, $17.-904,061; Alberta, $18,394,427, and British Columbia, $25,026,001. Grand Trunk debentures of 216 millions, included in the guarantees by the Dominion, are guaranteed as to interest only under the Grand Trunk Railway acquisition agreement.

The provincial guarantees have, in effect, been taken over by the Dominion, since it has also acquired the properties. There never was any question of interest being paid other than by the Dominion so far as any of the Canadian Northern guarantees are concerned. In the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific, complications due to receivership created confusion at first and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were obliged to meet certain branch line interest payments. It developed that on the provinces meeting this obligation over four six-monthly interest periods, they could have taken possession of the Grand Trunk Pacific branch line properties. Former President Hanna, considering that these branches would be useful to the National system, recommended that they be retained by the Dominion. The danger of partition of this Grand Trunk Pacific property was thus avoided, the two provinces concerned were reimbursed the interest charges they had met, and the Dominion has since provided the interest.

In the debt due the government is included appropriations account of the Canadian Government Railways amounting to $453,935,303. As is well known, this item includes the direct contributions by the Dominion to the Intercolonial and branch lines, the Prince Edward Island railway in Eastern Canada, the Transcontinental railway between Moncton and Winnipeg, including the Quebec bridge, and also the construction cost of the Hudson Bay railway. It also includes the working capital advanced from year to year by the government to those railways prior to their being taken over by the Canadian National for management and operation, and it also includes the operating losses on those railways since January 1, 1921, at which date authority was taken to pay operating expenses out of earnings. It is understood, of course, that this item of $453,935,303 is not a liability of the Canadian National Railway Company, but is brought into the consolidated balance sheet as the offset account against the assets of the Canadian Government railways as set up at their ledger value.

It will be observed that the total of loans and advances on Dominion of Canada account is shown in the balance sheet as 572 millions. Hon. gentlemen may have noticed that the Minister of Finance, in his budget speech, stated that the actual cash outlay in respect of these railway corporations charged to the debt of the Dominion, was 601 millions. The apparent discrepancy of $28,-720,547 is accounted for by these circumstances: The ten millions advanced by the government to the railways was made after December 31 last, and appears in the budget statement, but not in the railway statement. The railway does not include in loans and advances $8,720,547.06 voted under Advances to Canadian National Railways and utilized for requirements of Canadian government railways. The amount is added by the railways to the separately-shown Appropriations account, Canadian Government Railways. The balance of the difference is the ten million dollars paid by the Dominion for Canadian Northern common stock. Naturally, that item has no place in the railways' loan account with the Dominion.

I have here a statement showing the allocation of these 601 millions to March 31 last. It is of interest in that it shows the extent to which these government loans and advances have gone to meet operating deficits, interest, refunding and retirements, capital expenditure and to working capital. With the permission of the House, I would like to hand the statement to Hansard, for the information of the members generally.

The statement is as follows:

Of the loans from the Dominion of Canada, 485 millions odd, 127 millions went directly into betterments during the last six years. Including capital expenditure provided from moneys raised by guarantees during the same period, the total is $228,693,560. If to these be added 36 millions put into the property as the result of the railways' own financing, we have a total expenditure on investment account, during the last six years of $265,068,560. This capital expenditure, on a yearly basis, is set forth in a statement which, with the permission of the House, I will hand direct to Hansard.

The 18 million guarantee, 1924-25, was for branch lines construction and Toronto terminals, under the viaduct agreement.

Turning now to some of the other items on the liability side of the balance sheet, traffic balances and accounts payable show an increase due to additional business at the close of the year. Interest matured, unpaid, shows a substantial reduction of $6,500,000, due principally to a reclassification of unpaid interest on the Grand Trunk Pacific 4 per cent debenture stock. The interest on this security is accrued by charge against income, but is not paid if not earned. Unpaid arrears are now classified as a deferred liability, and this explains the increase in the item, Other Deferred Liabilities.

Under unadjusted credits, insurance and casualty reserves increased $1,408,000 of which $1,387,000 is the fire insurance reserve. The merchant marine is also insured through the railway insurance fund. The steady increase in this reserve indicates the wisdom of the policy adopted in placing insurance through the company's own fund instead of outside underwriters. Under present policy, all profits which the underwriters would have received, remain with the company.

Profit and Loss account, being a debit balance, is shown as an impairment of the government equity in the property as represented by $265,628,338.70 of capital stock owned by the Dominion and $1,188,482,341.48 in Dominion of Canada account.

Before leaving the balance sheet, I would just like to make one further observation. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in his budget speech, estimated that for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1926, there was a shortage of net earnings against the interest payable to the public of $7,400,000. When the budget speech was delivered, the actual figures for the government fiscal year were not available. Since they have been available, it is shown that the position is even better, and that the deficiency in net earnings to meet interest charges due the public was not $7,400,000, but $5,735,502—and this after allowing for such charges as amortization of discount, depreciation accruals, and retirements of the ledger value of equipment taken out of service, amounting in all to more than three million dollars.

Sir Henry Thornton, on page 7 of the report, has dealt with increases and decreases in certain items of the income statement. I will simply add, for the information of parliament, a statement of the profits of separately operated companies as shown in account No. 512 of the income statement, and of losses of separately operated companies, as indicated by account No. 545. Perhaps the members will be good enough to take these as read and let them appear in Hansard.

The adjustment item represents the National's contributions to March 31, 1925, to the Toronto Terminals Railway Company, to enable the latter to pay the interest on their outstanding notes in favour of the Bank of Montreal and charged to Account 545. In September 1925 this amount was repaid in bonds of the terminals company, hence the adjustment.

It is customary, also, to bring down a statement of income account, including the Central Vermont, also giving separately the detail of operation of Canadian lines and United States lines, and this I shall, with the consent of the House, hand to Hansard for use as an appendix.

Briefly, the Central Vermont adds $8,463,639 to the Canadian National gross revenues, and $7,357,918 to the operating expenses. The net revenue from operation was $1,105,720, but taxes took $238,665 and the total operating income was thus reduced to $867,055; income charges of $455,521 further reduced this amount to $411,534. As the fixed charges were $1,234,289, the deficit after fixed charges was $822,755, an improvement of $75,000 over the previous year.

I would like also to hand to Hansard, a summarized statement of the progress of branch line construction under the programme at present in hand.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Branch Line Construction

During 1925 the following work was done in connection with the railways' branch line programme, involving an expenditure of $6,743,164:

Grading	166.6 miles
Tracklaying	355.0 miles
Ballasting	238.5 miles

Last year's work brought the total expenditure on branch lines, under the three-year programme, to $8,386,052 to December 31 last, at which date the following work had been done:

Grading	235.7 miles
Tracklaying	446.5 miles
Ballasting	277.0 miles

The following programme of work has been prepared for the current year:

Grading	104.9 miles
Tracklaying	157.2 miles

involving an estimated expenditure of $7,568,000 on the following projects:

	Grade (miles)	Track (miles)	Ballast (miles)	Estimated cost
Eastern lines:
St. Remi d'Amherst	....	2.3	2.3	$ 70,000
Prairie lines:
Pine Falls	1.6	4.7	19.0	260,000
Bengough-Willow br.	4.5	19.8	28.4	681,000
Dunblane-Central Butte	....	1.4	26.0	1,530,000

British Columbia lines:
Kelowna-Lumby	....	....	....	453,000
Cowichan Bay	....	....	1.1	45,000
Vancouver Island	....	....	....	95,000
Total				$7,568,000

Dunblane-Central Butte expenditure includes the cost of completion of the bridge over the south Saskatchewan river. Rosedale-Bullpound item is for half cost only and the work is subject to a joint section arrangement to be made with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Kelowna-Lumby item covers cost of stations at Kamloops and Kelowna, and other facilities. Cowichan bay estimate covers ballasting, buildings and telegraph lines and the Vancouver island item covers certain buildings and fencing.

It is now six years since the government became responsible for Grand Trunk financing, and while the reorganization and consolidation of the National system did not take place until late in 1922, we have a six-year background from which to judge of the progress made by the railways towards recovery from the difficulties which proved too much for private ownership. There are a number of ways in which progress may be noted. It is four years now since there has been an operating deficit. In 1920 the operating deficit was $34,000,000. In 1925 there was an operating surplus of $32,000,000. The extreme swing between the operating deficit of 1920 and the operating surplus of 1925 was $66,000,000, or an average improvement, over that period, of 11 millions a year.

A very hopeful feature also of our railway situation is the fact that the annual increase in operating earnings in recent years has been greatly in excess of the annual increase in fixed charges. While as stated, the total of the annual increases in operating earnings during the last six years was 66 millions, the total of the annual increases in fixed charges over that period was but 26 millions, or 40 millions less.

There has been improvement, also, in the matter of total deficit, including fixed charges. Six years ago, it was $80,000,000, while last year it was $41,000,000—or about one-half. And of this deficit of 41 millions for 1925, 31 millions was a book-keeping charge for unpaid interest due the government, which has been written into the debt of the railway.

During the six years in question, the debt of the railway due the public increased by 130 millions, and the debt due the government—including interest—by 506 millions—a total of 636 millions. But of the latter sum 153 millions consisted of government interest. It may be asked why this item of interest should be segregated. Such a question might be answered in this fashion, if applied to an ordinary case of loan on mortgage. The mortgagor failed, and the chief creditor took over the property on his own account, and that of other creditors interested. But the requirements of present railway accounting methods make it necessary to continue to set up the interest charges, although the government, the chief creditor, has taken over the property. Such a situation could rarely arise in an ordinary business transaction.

There has been criticism, in another place, to the effect that there is no assurance that the increase in railway debt would grow less in the near future. The answer is that the annual increase already grows smaller. Including government interest, the increase in railway debt has, as stated, amounted to 636 millions during the last six years. Stripped of the 153 millions of government interest the increase was 483 millions. Of the 483 millions, 243 millions were added during the two years 1920 and 1921, and 239 millions during the succeeding four years. In 1920, the actual addition to the debt, omitting the book-keeping charge of government interests, was 131 millions; in 1925 it was $31,926,617. Quite clearly then, there is substantial reduction in the rate of increase in the railway debt.

I have pointed out that the debt of the railway increased to a greater extent during 1920 and 1921 than in the four years since. There were reasons for that, and in fairness to those responsible during those years, I should state that the railways, during 1920 and 1921, were at the very depth of their difficulties. It so happened that heavy maturities coincided with the peak of the deficits, and there were as well consistently heavy demands on capital account. Thus the total requirements of the railways were heavier in those years than they have ever been since that time or are ever likely to be again. The bulk of the burden of financing the railways fell upon the government, private capital at that time not being entirely sure of the National Railway situation, and there was the added fact that money was not as plentiful as it has since become. That condition may be traced in the statement of the railway's unmatured funded debt, and will be found expressed in rates of interest which, even with the guarantee of the government, ranged as high as 7 per cent, in contrast with the 4 and 4½ per cent issues put out in 1924 and 1925.

I now come to what seems to be a contentious matter in this chamber, the question of assistance to the railways in the form of guarantee rather than by direct aid, and, as a newcomer to the federal arena, I have endeavoured to familiarize myself with the actual situation, not with the object of provoking further controversy, but with a view to ascertaining in what particular, if any, there has been change of practice and policy.

I find that prior to 1921-22, issues guaranteed were additional to the cash vote, as certain subsequent issues have been. In that way, the guarantees of 1920-21 were for refunding, and could not be utilized for any other purpose.

In 1921-22 for the first time, the estimates provided that advances to the railways might be made in the form of cash, or by way of guarantee, or partly in cash and partly by guarantee, in the discretion of the Governor-in-Council. It was further provided that the moneys thus loaned could be used on any of the following accounts, (a) operating deficits, (b) acquisition of property, materials and supplies, (c) interest on notes, securities or obligations, (d) the principal or interest on maturing or matured loans, secured or unsecured, and (e) construction and betterments. Thus it was specifically provided that the guarantees of that year, which of course reduced the cash vote to that extent, could be used for general purposes, and the 50 millions guaranteed that year were so utilized. The general form of this estimate has simply been continued by the present government. There is nothing wrong about it, and the utilization of such moneys is of record in both railway and departmental reports. Unquestionably, the moneys were utilized by the railways in accordance with the provision of the vote. Had they not been, the auditors whose duty it is to watch such matters would have had something to say. The practice, therefore, has been consistent since the present form of vote was introduced in 1921-22.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend allow a question?

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend find any error in the figures which I gave the House in the budget debate, and which will be found at page 3258 of Hansard? I know his accountants have been studying them.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, I have not studied the figures given by my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They happen to be figures dealing with this question my hon. friend is speaking about.

Mr. DUNNING: In reply to my hon. friend, I have in my hand a statement dealing with the utilization of the guaranteed issues in 1921-22, and I find that on Canadian Northern account there was $26,228,163 guaranteed, of which $2,725,784 went into betterments and $5,172,807 into materials and supplies. On Grand Trunk account I find that $23,186,181 was expended under the guarantee, of which $1,177,245 went into betterments and $1,000,000 into materials and supplies. I find also that the date of the Canadian Northern issue to which I have just been referring was July 1, 1921, and of the Grand Trunk issue September 1, 1921. All of the Canadian Northern issue was utilized for 1921 accounts. The Grand Trunk issue was mainly applicable to 1921. I have the detailed figures in that regard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can my hon. friend give the total amount of guaranteed bonds for 1920, 1921 and 1922, and the total amount of retirements? That is what counts.

Mr. DUNNING: I have the retirements for each year. I presume my hon. friend refers to refunding. Of the $23,000,000 odd guaranteed for the Grand Trunk in that year $11,967,596 was for refunding, and in the case—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I asked as to the total, that was all.

Mr. DUNNING: I am trying to give my hon. friend the details; then he can total them himself. I have not the general total.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The general total is the only thing we are interested in.

Mr. DUNNING: If I give my hon. friend the individual figures he can put them together. Or I will gladly sit down and add them myself.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have got them together.

Mr. DUNNING: Of the amount guaranteed for Canadian Northern account, $4,730,063 was for refunding and $8,599,507 for interest due the public. On Grand Trunk account $4,966,175 was for interest due the public. Those are the total figures for that particular year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What year is my hon. friend referring to?

Mr. DUNNING: 1921-22.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As a matter of fact, the statement of the Department of Finance shows that instead of the figures my hon. friend gives, there is a total redemption of $48,000,000 odd. It is extraordinary how different the figures are.

Mr. DUNNING: As I said at the outset, I went into this not to add to the controversy but to settle whether or not there had been any change in practice as to the utilization of the guaranteed moneys, and I think I have proved conclusively that the practice now followed was started during the fiscal year 1921-22 by my hon. friends opposite. I am not finding any fault with them. What is the matter with the practice? I have not been able to discover anything wrong with it. The practice started in that year, as the figures I have just quoted prove, has been continued ever since, and I must say, Mr. Speaker, that from my point of view it is a good business practice and sound in every particular. I give my hon. friends credit for introducing it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not a question of practice; there has never been any challenge of that. It is a question of presentation in so far as the debt is concerned.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sure my hon. friend will not have any fault to find with my presentation of the debt of the National Railways. I presume what he is referring to is the debt statement as presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb.) He is quite capable of taking care of himself, and I do not intend to digress in that direction to-day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is attempting to come some way.

Mr. DUNNING: I am also advised by the Finance department that there has been no change on their part in their treatment of guarantees of railway issues—that is to say, they have never been taken into account as increasing the public debt. There has been no departure from former practice, therefore, in the matter of guarantees. Fortunately, during the last fiscal year we were able to get through without resort to guarantee. The only object of the guarantee is to secure a better rate of interest than might otherwise be possible, and, I have no doubt we shall all welcome the day when the position of Canadian National Railways will inspire such confidence as to attract any requisite capital without necessity of guarantee. During the last six years, guaranteed issues have totalled $264,500,000, but the increase in the debt due the public, of which the guarantees form part, was, during that period, but 130 millions, or slightly less than one-half the total of the guarantees. The explanation, of course, is that much of the guaranteeing was for refunding and simply replaced former debt. During the same six years, 265 millions were provided on investment account. Thus while the increase in debt to the public was one-half the guarantees, double the amount went into improvement of the property. In the matter of public borrowings, therefore, there has been no impairment of the margin of safety to the investing public.

The chairman and president informs us that a searching examination of the company's financial structure has been under way during the last year and it is expected that, during the current year, definite proposals having for their object the placing of the company's finances on a sound and permanent basis will be presented. Reference is made to the difficulty of unravelling financial data relating to the host of constituent companies, and an idea of the complicated character of the task may be gathered from the schedule of companies comprising the Canadian National Railway system accompanying the annual report, the capital stocks connected with those companies, the investments in affiliated companies, the securities comprising the funded debt, the loans and advances from the government, the appropriations on account of former government railways, the scores of mortgages involved and the innumerable intercorporate transactions.

The task of simplifying and consolidating the variety of obligations outstanding and of reducing varying financial practices to a uniform basis presents many difficulties. The former government lines were constructed out of consolidated revenue at the expense of the Dominion at large, and there is no capitalization involving interest charges. The Canadian Northern was added; its heavy financial requirements have been supplied in part by the public, and to a greater extent by the government. The Grand Trunk Pacific was next taken over and is still being operated under receivership, with the legal requirements thereby involved. Afterwards the Grand Trunk itself was acquired, together with financial complications as between the Grand Trunk Pacific and the parent organization, and both, as the records show, have required much government assistance, but for which—and this is frequently lost sight of—the private investments in both roads would probably have been wiped out. With each of these large corporate entities was brought in a number of subsidiary concerns.

In view of the continued criticism abroad of Canada's action in respect to the Grand Trunk acquisition, and the position of certain Grand Trunk Pacific debenture holders, it may be stated at this point that the theory that Canada, in taking over the Grank Trunk, was acquiring at no cost an immensely valuable property has not been justified by the results which are of record in the report before the House. Heading the unmatured funded debt, on page 28 of the report, will be found the $216,000,000 of Grand Trunk debenture and guaranteed stocks, the interest on which Canada has guaranteed in perpetuity, and which interest amounts to about nine millions a year. In addition, the government has had to provide on Grand Trunk account since acquisition cash loans totalling $118,582,182, detail of which will be found in the schedule of loans on page 27. In addition to this direct cash aid, $74,899,157 has been provided by guarantee, and $12,000,000 for equipment. Then the Toronto viaduct scheme was a Grand Trunk responsibility which the government has had to assume. For this, around $7,000,000 will be used from the $18,000,000 issue of February 15, 1925. The foregoing items total $212,481,339, and it will be recalled that the par value of the preference and common stocks of the Grand Trunk, which the majority award of the arbitrators declared of no value as at the date of agreement, was $180,000,000. The arbitrators' estimate of the condition of the property in 1920, and of its requirements, has thus been amply sustained by subsequent developments.

In connection with the Grand Trunk, there is a curious echo of the past in the balance sheet—"Governmental grants in aid of construction, $16,280,820." This represents aid to the Grand Trunk in the early days, on which interest was to have been payable when Grand Trunk common stock became productive of dividends. As is well known, the common stock of the Grand Trunk never paid a dividend in the seventy years of the separate existence of the company. The balance sheet item is, therefore, without interest. After recording interest in the public accounts of the Dominion until a charge of more than ten millions had accumulated, the Department of Finance gave up the job of recording interest on this venerable loan. This item of $16,000,000 is additional to the $212,000,000 advanced since the Grand Trunk was taken over.

The loans charged to Grand Trunk Pacific account—page 27 of the report—total $127,862,716, of which $53,576,000 was advanced prior to receivership and $53,768,000 since March, 1919, when the property was abandoned. Since that date, we have also provided more than twenty millions to pay interest guaranteed, much of it by the provinces. And because Canada has not also provided interest for Grand Trunk Pacific four per cent debentures which it did not guarantee, the Dominion continues to be adversely criticized by news writers abroad. This can only arise through lack of information and to supply this deficiency is my excuse for placing the foregoing facts on record in this connection.

Before digressing, I was referring to the present complicated financial structure of the Canadian National system. What is desired is a capital structure which will simplify financial and accounting practice, with consequent saving of expenditures, and which also will ease the burden imposed on the Canadian National system by inheritance from private ownership. It may well be questioned whether it is humanly possible for any railway management to make good the frantic borrowings which overwhelmed the former owners. The former minister, Right Hon. George P. Graham, after considerable experience with the problem, had this to say last year, in the course of his annual statement:

> Under present conditions—and I do not want any person to be disturbed about this—with all this mass of intricacies that nobody has been able to unravel, the Canadian National Railways cannot under any management pay carrying charges if we take into account the amounts advanced by the government. The people of Canada could not stand rates which would be sufficiently high to carry all this under our present arrangement.

The object sought by the present examination is a capital structure reasonably commensurate with the earning prospects of the property. Although the Department of Finance has for years treated the loans and advances by the government to railway companies as non-active assets, with no present, if any, prospect of return, the present form of Canadian National accounts requires the setting up yearly of an immense figure—thirty-one millions odd last year—of interest due the government; and that figure is about half as large as it would be if the practice were consistent to the extent of computing similar interest charges on appropriations of nearly half a billion which have gone into former government lines, and on which no interest has ever been computed, as against the Canadian National lines, by the Department of Finance. Government interest accruals relate to loans and advances to former privately-owned lines only. Although we have taken possession of the security against which the sums in question were advanced, the corporate accounts continue to pile up interest charges that now form the largest single item of the yearly addition to the railway debt.

An hon. MEMBER: Wipe it out.

Mr. DUNNING: As many hon. gentlemen know, there is lack of uniformity even in the computation of interest. As already stated, there are no interest charges connected with former government lines, nor is any interest accrued or unpaid interest due the government, which sum now amounts to about 162 millions. Simple interest only is accrued on government loans and advances, but interest is compounded in so far as it has been necessary to borrow from the public to meet interest charges due the public—which was not the case, I am happy to say, during 1925-26.

I find, also, the accounting system of the Canadian National Railway burdened with the work which an ordinary railway company is not required to attempt. The accounting of the National management is of necessity on a system basis. Then, because of the requirements of certain issues connected with the Grand Trunk, Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian Northern, as well as the Grand Trunk Pacific receivership—and also because the former Canadian government lines must be provided by the government with cash if the earnings are not sufficient to meet operations—it is necessary to recast the accounts on a corporate basis, all of which entails much costly and otherwise unnecessary book-keeping and accounting.

There is still another somewhat awkward feature of these railway accounts. As hon. gentlemen are well aware, the railway accounts are on a calendar year basis and the estimates and public accounts which enter largely into our railway affairs, are on the basis of the federal fiscal year. This leads to occasional difficulties and misunderstandings in the discussion of railway finances, which would be avoided if it were possible to reduce both accounts to the basis of a common year.

With regard to the estimates, a year ago, parliament was asked to provide $50,000,000 to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred by the National Railway during 1925-26. At that time, the immediate outlook for the railways was not very bright. During the early months of the year, indeed well into the summer, their business showed a decline as compared with the previous year. The second half of the year proved to be the very reverse of the first six months. A good crop, and consequent improved business, enabled the Canadian National Railways to almost double the operating net of the previous year.

It transpires—and we are discussing fiscal year figures at the moment—that of the fifty millions voted a year ago, only ten millions were required of the government, and there were no bond issues, either guaranteed or otherwise. This improved state of affairs appears to have been made possible by a number of circumstances. As hon. gentlemen will have noted, the railway was itself able to provide 80 per cent of its interest requirement due the public. That supplied the chief reduction in the estimated requirements.

The forty millions, which were not required, are accounted for in this way:

1. Increase in net revenues	$ 13,700,000
2. Decrease capital expenditures	7,000,000
3. Discount on proposed bond issue cancelled	1,600,000
4. Interest on proposed bond issue cancelled	400,000
5. Reduction in stores purchased	8,000,000
6. Cash available from former bond issues.	2,700,000
7. Balance provided from working capital.	6,600,000
Total reduction	$ 40,000,000

These figures are, in part, estimated and cover the period from April 1, 1925, to March 31, 1926.

Nothing, perhaps, could be more indicative of the rapidly improving position of the National lines than the fact that a Minister of Railways finds it necessary to explain why forty million dollars voted were not required to be forthcoming. I can assure hon. gentlemen that it is a very much more agreeable task than would have been the necessity to explain why the railways had required 40 millions more than had been estimated.

The budget amount required for the present fiscal year, 1926-27, is $31,000,000, distributed as follows:

Interest on funded and other debt	$36,540,598 34
G.T. Pacific guaranteed interest	1,108,000 00
Sinking fund payments	165,133 33
Equipment principal payments	7,397,400 00
G.T.R. 4 per cent guaranteed stock	2,433,333 33
Retirement of capital obligations	808,000 00
Total financial requirements	$48,452,545 00
Less resources	34,379,829 00
Net financial requirements	$14,072,716 00
General additions, betterments, including new equipment	15,727,284 00
Discount on securities to be issued	1,200,000 00
Total estimate	$31,000,000 00

The gross capital expenditure proposed is $19,127,284, including Central Vermont. Retirements recoverable through operating account reduce this figure to $15,727,284. This year's vote for betterments is intended to provide for the following:

Betterments to road	$13,047,211
New equipment	1,325,000
Betterments to equipment	1,500,000
Comm. Telegraphs and Express	750,000
Electric lines	795,000
Hotels	336,300
Miscellaneous	637,013
Central Vermont	736,760
Gross capital expenditure	$19,127,284
Less retirements recoverable through operating accounts	3,400,000
Net increase in investment account	$15,727,284

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the $736,760 intended to meet a deficit on the Central Vermont?

Mr. DUNNING: There is provision for deficit on the Central Vermont.

It is not customary to do more than outline the current estimates at this stage. As usual, they have been referred to the select standing committee on National Railways and Shipping for preliminary examination. I do not think it would be wise for me to interject matters other than those directly connected with the subject we are examining this afternoon; such matters for instance as the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, which can be better dealt with in a separate discussion; such matters, for instance, as the provision in the departmental estimates for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, which can be better dealt with in committee of the whole on that item and which, of course, is entirely outside the provision proposed for Canadian National railway construction.

With regard to the railway problem, we hear various proposals, from time to time, intended to relieve our railway ills. My own view is that the solution of the problem must be found along the line of greater density of traffic. It must be remembered that, so far as the Canadian National is concerned, we have several thousand miles of purely colonization railways. They are necessary to the development of the country, but they reduce the general good showing of the older established lines. Greater density of population will provide greater density of traffic where most needed, and when we have settled and prosperous communities contributing business to our colonization mileage, the lean kine of the National system will no longer absorb so much of the vitality of the fat. The president of the National lines recently advised me that, for the first four months of 1926, 40,924 passengers had been landed at Halifax, St. John and Quebec by the Canadian Pacific steamships and services allied with the Canadian National Railways. This compares with 24,152 passengers for the same period last year—an increase of 69 per cent. Improvement is apparent, therefore, in that direction.

There is, it is true, a great necessity to develop a simplified financial structure, but, after all that is a means rather than an end. We have provided the money as needed. To the extent that the railways have required assistance, we are carrying obligations in public debt which otherwise could have been reduced. Much of the railway advances have gone into irrecoverable losses, but, as I have indicated, much also has gone to the improvement of our railway property.

In the circumstances, we may congratulate ourselves that the demands of the railways grow less, and, instead of getting dust in our eyes sitting in the observation end contemplating at too great length the retreating past, we might well look forward with a measure of confidence to the immediate future. Concerning it the thing most to be desired is that the system pay its way out of its own earnings, and on the basis of a rate structure which shall be fair to all industries of Canada and to all sections of the country. That is the goal, and I am optimist enough to declare my belief that the goal is attainable if we do nothing to prevent the realization of our objective. We must not forget, when we come to the consideration of railway rates, and railway capitalization, that there is relationship one with the other. Call it what you may, there would be no object in writing down, or writing off, or suspending obligations due the government if, at the same time, we force upon the railways an uneconomic rate structure that, so far as the Canadian National is concerned, would result in the piling up of fresh charges on government account, later to be similarly written off.

I have spoken with a certain optimism and a degree of confidence which I would like the House and the country generally to share. With me it is not merely a case of the wish being father to the thought. I have been able to secure the operating results of the Canadian National lines for the first four months of the present year. They indicate net earnings of $9,689,217, as compared with $3,774,782 for the same period last year, an increase of $5,914,435—far more than double. Canadian Pacific returns for the same period are not yet completely available, but I am assured that they also indicate greatly improved conditions. It is on this outlook that I base the confidence I would have you share. Our railways are excellent barometers, so far as business is concerned. They reflect, in accurate measure, the trade and commerce of the country. Given a reasonably good harvest and freedom from traffic losses due to labour difficulties, it may be possible for the National Railways this year to meet their entire interest charges due the public. This, needless to say, would constitute a remarkable and welcome achievement.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that I am simply voicing the feeling of the House when I say that we have all been delighted to hear the presentation of the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) in this, his first statement to parliament as Minister of Railways and Canals for Canada. We are all pleased I am sure to note the optimism with which he concluded his statement, an optimism that I frankly say at the moment is at least partly borne out by the figures he was able to present. I am afraid, however, that in presenting this statement he has accepted without question and has used very largely figures which have been placed in his hands, or at his disposal, without analyzing the character of those figures or ascertaining just exactly what they meant. I do not propose to follow the minister through the intricate details of the financing and operation of the National Railways, but I do ask the privilege of presenting to the House what the situation in relation to these railways is, as I see it at least, and as I think the reports of the National Railways disclose.

The minister has stated in the first instance that the total additional obligation on account of the National Railways including interest was $636,000,000 in the last six years. I will undertake to show from the reports themselves, that the total amount of cash advanced, without any interest accumulations on moneys advanced by the government was over $800,000,000, and I will undertake to show from these reports that of that $800,000,000 advanced no details are given for at least $250,000,000. When you turn to the operating statement, taking the year 1925 in the first instance, it can clearly be shown that, instead of there being a surplus of $32,000,000 or $35,000,000, there was a very substantial deficit, and I will begin at that point and show how the accounts have been presented in order to get this surplus. Turning to page 17 of the annual report of the Canadian National Railway we find the net revenue from railway operation is given as $32,264,414.79. In looking over this statement the thought struck me that the financiers, or the accountants of the Canadian National Railways, in preparing this statement were emulating the example of the Minister of Finance in presenting the budget statement to the House and the country in this regard; that they were simply taking the total amount of revenue that had been derived, setting against that a part of the expenditure and giving the surplus at whatever sum they desired it should be. To illustrate now, from this surplus of $32,264,414.79 certain figures are taken, termed non-operating expenses. What are some of these? In the first place the railway tax accruals are deducted. If the taxes the railway has to pay on its property all over Canada do not constitute an operating expenditure, what sort of expenditure is it? Can you apply it to capital? If the average individual, after paying his taxes each year, entered up so much as capital available to his business, he would not go very far until he got into difficulties. The next item is uncollectable railway revenue $59,163.36, which is also a non-operating item. I will mention two or three of these items. We have debit to miscellaneous operation, taxes on miscellaneous operation, hire of freight cars and so on. I would like the House to note that in this operating statement showing $32,264,414.79 as a favourable balance, the hire of freight cars, rent of locomotives, the hire of joint facilities, and all these Canadian National expenditures which in reality are nothing more nor less than charges which should be properly applied to transportation costs, are given as non-operating expenses. If we take the total of these figures and set off against them certain non-operating revenues we get the sum of $8,636,569.12 reducing the surplus to $23,627,845.67.

As I said a moment ago there are certain non-operating revenues such as hire of freight cars which are in reality operating revenues and not non-operating revenues. They total $1,857,670.36 so that the actual operating surplus is $25,485,516.03 instead of $32,264,414.79 as shown. From this there must be deducted interest on the funded debt amounting to $40,438,235.34, leaving, before interest to the Dominion government is taken into account, a deficit of $14,952,719.31 instead of $8,173,820.55. Interest owing to the Dominion government amounts to $31,450,381.89 so that the total deficit amounts to $46,403,101.20. That is the amount shown in the balance sheet itself on the bottom of the page as the addition to the debt of the railway. Nevertheless the public is told that the railways have a surplus of $32,264,414.79. The detailed statement is as follows:

1925 Operating Results

Net revenue from operations as shown in statement		$ 32,264,414 79
Deductions applicable to operations—
Railway tax accruals	$ 4,224,033 58
Uncollected revenue	59,163 36
Debit on miscellaneous operations	30,388 17
Taxes on miscellaneous operations	73,486 99
Hire of freight cars	1,718,372 07
Hire of locomotives	27,125 51
Hire of passenger cars	353,854 10
Hire of floating equipment	21,748 16
Hire of work equipment	5,672 08
Rent of joint facilities	683,544 04
Rent of leased lines	1,276,119 89
Miscellaneous taxes	162,061 57
Total	$ 8,636,569 12
Balance forward	23,627,845 67
Total	$ 32,264,414 79

Total deficit	$ 46,403,101 20

Certain non-operating debits and non-operating credits enter into that, and last year there was cash advanced by the Dominion government. If I understood the minister aright he stated that in 1925 there was an advance of $10,000,000 and there were no bond issues whatever. Am I right in that?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: On page 6 of the report over the signature of the president it is stated that there were issued in February, 1925, $17,000,000 Canadian Northern 4½ per cent ten year guaranteed gold bonds and $18,000,000 Canadian National 4½ per cent five year guaranteed gold bonds.

Mr. DUNNING: I stated in that connection that I was using fiscal year figures for the moment because I was dealing with the statement of the Minister of Finance. What I stated was true in relation to the fiscal year. But the issue to which my hon. friend is referring was made before the commencement of the fiscal year.

Mr. NICHOLSON: These bond issues are applicable to the period covered by the report.

Mr. DUNNING: The proceeds might be partly used.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If the bonds were issued in February and the statement is that the advances in February amounted to $18,000,000 and $17,000,000 and the retirements amounted to $17,583,780.06, surely that must be applicable to this report.

Mr. DUNNING: A great proportion of that is for retirements.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The retirements amounted $17,583,780.06 as I have said. The additions on account of bond issues amount to $17,416,219.94 bringing the total net debit up to $68,860,984.36 exclusive of interest on the Canadian government railways and the Intercolonial railway.

If you refer to the report of 1924—and I will not go into the details of the figures at all—you will find that the same situation prevails. A surplus of $17,244,251.48 is reported and the same items are included in non-operating expenses that should be included in operating expenses such as non-collectable revenues. Surely revenues that the railways have not been able to collect cannot be looked upon as a non-operating revenue, and the same thing is true of the hire of cars and equipment. If we employ the same calculations the conclusion we come to is that instead of there being a net operating surplus of $17,244,251.48 there was a surplus of $7,740,251.37, and the gross debit worked out in exactly the same way amounts to $101,761,158.65.

If you turn back to 1923 you will find that the same situation is presented. From the operating surplus which is given as $20,236,563.09 must be deducted those items that are strictly charges against transportation costs and would amount to $9,086,306.42. This reduces the operating surplus to $11,150,256.67. If you add capital charges and interest on the public debt, the total debit for the year amounts to $124,856,551.33.

Mr. DUNNING: Is my hon. friend referring to 1925?

Mr. NICHOLSON: 1923. In 1924, the debit was $101,761,158.65 and in 1925 the debit was $68,860,984.36.

Coming to the general financial position of the Canadian National Railways, I should like to refer to the original cost at the time the roads were taken over. Let us take first the figures in regard to the Canadian Northern Railway, which are as follows:

Original cost Canadian Northern Railway System funded debt	$285,795,420 61
Equipment trust obligations	13,526,000 00
Demand and short term loans secured by collateral	58,056,961 11
Due to other companies on construction account secured	30,502,392 04
Current liabilities	19,408,495 79
Accrued interest	4,730,069 93
Reserves for taxes and insurance	1,245,038 19
Total	$413,264,377 67
Added to the above the total amount of 5 per cent income charge convertible debenture stock	25,000,000 00
Making a total of	$438,264,377 67

In addition to this there is the added sum of $10,000,000 for the $60,000,000 of capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railways, bringing the gross total to $448,264,377.67 Against this there are the following assets:

Cash, materials, supplies and accounts receivable	$30,759,013 95
Insurance paid in advance	823,708 51
Deferred charges	860,113 95
Total of liquid assets	$32,442,836 41

Leaving the net cost of the railway as at September 30th, 1917, as $415,821,531.26, from that there is to be deducted on account of land assets, exclusive of railway property, $29,044,790.74; leaving the actual cost of the railway as it then stood with all its equipment $386,776,740.52, equalling in round figures $38,677.67 per mile. At the time it was taken over a careful estimate was made of the amounts required to bring the line up to standard. As regards the Canadian Northern I will give the details, but as regards the others I will omit the details. The figures are as follows:

Rails, fastenings and railway ties, on the basis of the difference in weight of rails now in use and those required to bring the whole mileage up to standard	$14,605,000
Ballasting, ditching, etc.	15,000,000
Replacement of temporary bridges with stone, concrete or steel construction	20,000,000
Roundhouses, coaling plants, intermediate terminal facilities, way stations, track men's houses, and general maintenance of way equipment	13,395,000
Main terminal facilities and interchange connections	22,000,000
Locomotives	30,000,000
Cars of all classes	55,000,000
Total	$170,000,000

That is what was required to bring the Canadian Northern part of the Canadian National railway system up to standard, basing that standard practically on that of the Canadian Pacific. The Grand Trunk Pacific had cash and bond guarantees for which the government of Canada and the Grand Trunk Railway Company were each responsible. These amounted to $127,939,888 and the cash advanced directly amounted to $7,500,000, or a total in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific of $135,439,888. There is excluded from that bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk alone of $69,189,499, bringing the total liability up to $204,629,387. If you add the cost of the requirements to bring the system up to standard namely $46,250,000—and I have the details in my hand but I will not take time to read them—that makes a total capital cost when the system was taken over of $181,789,888. In order that the railways might be taken over into the Canadian National system at a proper valuation there should be written off $73,669,888, leaving a net proper capitalization of $108,120,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Is that for the Grand Trunk?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The Grand Trunk Pacific. The amount should have been written off because of reckless and extravagant expenditure in connection with the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely the hon. member knows that we have not taken over the Grand Trunk Pacific, which is being operated under a receivership.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Perfectly true. But is it not also true that the obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific are included in the statement of the Canadian National Railways? If that be so it follows that, in order to deal with the Canadian National reports intelligently, we must take into consideration all branches of the system.

Mr. DUNNING: How could we have written that amount off?

Mr. NICHOLSON: If my hon. friend will bear with me I will come to that point presently. The amount required to bring the Grand Trunk Pacific up to standard was $46,250,000. The total cost of that portion of the Canadian government railways from Winnipeg east known as the Transcontinental at the time of the amalgamation was in round figures $200,000,000 and of the Intercolonial, $137,184,199. These properties are now carried in the balance sheet at $451,712,483.60 showing an increase of $114,528,284.60. I have not included the $114,000,000 in that $800,000,000 of cash advanced, for the reason that I cannot find anywhere in the railway statement anything to indicate what this sum of money was used for or where it came from, but as a matter of fact the value has been increased in the books by that $114,000,000. The amount required to bring the Transcontinental up to standard was $26,250,000, the details of which I have here and which may form part of the $114,000,000 added.

Now we come to the Grand Trunk. At the time of the amalgamation we became responsible for the interest on $216,207,141, as the minister has stated, and I shall give in detail the estimate of what was required to bring the Grank Trunk up to standard. I have also the details of the amount expended.

Estimate of Amount Required to Bring Roads to Standard

Grand Trunk

Deferred Maintenance as follows:
Increased weight of rail.. ..	$1,436,400
Ties—25 per cent of total..	2,700,000
Ballasting, surfacing, etc.. ..	2,250,000
Extension to sidings, spurs, etc..	1,250,000
Bridges, culverts, etc.. ..	750,000
Roundhouses, machine shops, turntables, coaling plants and water services..	750,000
Miscellaneous, including repairs to general buildings..	1,000,000
		$10,136,400
Rolling Stock:
100 locomotives at $70,000..	$7,000,000
50 locomotives at $60,000..	3,000,000
250 locomotives rebuilt at $10,000..	2,500,000
250 locomotives repaired at $4,500..	1,125,000
6,000 Standard frt. cars at $3,500..	21,000,000
1,200 Flat cars at $2,500.. ..	3,000,000
1,000 Miscellaneous at $3,500	3,500,000
150 Passenger cars at $25,000	3,750,000
500 Service cars..	1,500,000
150 Dining, sleeping and parlor cars..	7,500,000
	$53,875,000
Less retirements as above.. ..	1,250,000
		52,625,000
		$62,761,400

I should like to put on Hansard a table showing the cost of lines to date exclusive of operating deficits:

Gross cost at date of amalgamation..	$1,075,607,969 14
Betterments and equipments, all lines to date..	203,774,265 95
New construction..	48,134,932 58
Branch lines acquired..	8,388,193 66
	$1,335,905,361 33
Add sum still required for permanent improvements and equipment.. ..	101,487,134 05
	$1,437,392,495 38
Deduct amount that should be written off original cost of Transcontinental and G.T.P..	200,364,888 00
	$1,237,027,607 38

Approximately $59,000.00 per mile for all lines comprising the system.

Gross present liability including interest due Dominion government on all lines	$2,336,330,871 66
	1,237,027,607 38
Gross debit balance	1,099,303,264 28
Deduct interest account Trans. and I.C.R.	106,155,000 00
Balance	$ 993,148,264 28
Deduct all interest due Dominion government	161,608,374 17
Net debit balance	$ 831,539,890 11

In addition to interest already paid, $267,763,374.17.

The next statement I desire to give is a summary of the amounts necessary to bring all lines up to standard:

Can. Northern, Jan. 1st, 19	$170,000,000 00
Transcontinental, Jan. 1st, 19—	26,250,000 00
G. T. Pacific, Jan. 1st, 19—	46,250,000 00
Grand Trunk, Jan 1st, 19—	62,761,400 00
	$305,261,400 00
Expended to date	203,774,265 95
Balance required	$101,487,134 05

I noted that the minister in his statement gave something like $264,000,000 which had been expended on betterments, but according to the details disclosed in the reports there has been expended only $203,774,265.95, leaving yet to be expended on the basis of the original estimate the sum of $101,487,134.05.

I come now to the cash advanced and moneys expended, and taking first the Grand Trunk I must say frankly that the minister's figures are in excess of those I have here. The figures I have were taken from the latest report of the Department of Railways and they show that cash advanced to the Grand Trunk Railway since acquisition totals $190,477,340.95. The minister stated that there had been advanced some $216,000,000. Now, when I made up this total and began to look into it, the question was forced upon me at once: if the sum of $190,000,000 has been advanced to the Grand Trunk, what has been done with it? The total expenditures for 1920, 1921 and 1922 in the matter of equipment less retirements were $25,725,888.30, while for betterments of all classes, in connection with which I shall give the details, there was the sum of $5,837,293.17. On the other hand the gross deficits for the years 1920, 1921 and 1922 amounted to $26,476,173.39, making a total for which we have any details of $57,039,351.94. That leaves unaccounted for $133,437,989.01.

If all the deficits that have been incurred on the Canadian National Railways from the end of that period until the present time had been charged up directly against the Grand Trunk Railway, that total of $133,000,000 odd would not have been absorbed. The following is a statement of cash advanced to the Grand Trunk:

Cash advanced to Grand Trunk as per report of the Department of Railways and Canals, March 31, 1925		$190,477,340 95
Total expenditures 1920-21-22:
Equipment less retirements	$ 25,725,888 38
Betterments all classes	5,837,293 17
Gross deficits 20-21-22 including interest on Dominion loans	26,476,173 39
	$ 57,039,351 94
Unaccounted for	133,437,989 01
	$190,477,340 95

—equal to $57,100 per mile on the entire line.

Also note deficits 1920-21-22 include interest due Dominion government not paid, thus increasing the total of the sum not accounted for.

We come now to the Canadian Northern. The following is a statement of cash advanced to this railway:

Cash advanced 1919-20-21 shown at page 10—1921 report		$251,088,248 88
Cash from Canadian National Railways page 6—report Department of Railways and Canals 1924		48,202,877 96
Loans, 1922—page 1-E—1922 report		29,845,010 59
Loans, 1922—page 1-E—1922 report		784,751 10
Total advanced		$329,920,888 53
Gross deficit including interest on funded debt 1919-20-21	$103,487,706 81
Gross deficit including interest on funded debt 1922	18,509,965 84
Betterments 1919 to 1922, all Canadian National lines except Grand Trunk	83,515,096 06
	$205,512,768 71
Unaccounted for	124,408,119 82
	$329,920,888 53

The question I want to ask is, what has become of all this money? Let us take now the Grand Trunk Pacific. The following table will show what advances have been made, together with the gross deficits:

Cash advanced 1919-20-21 shown at page 10—1921 report	$ 82,480,303 66

		$105,173,930 84

Now I come to the Canadian National system since the reports were amalgamated. At this point, Mr. Speaker, may I say that it is worth scanning the reports of the Canadian National Railways for 1921 and those for the preceding and succeeding years, because in the report of 1921 you get details of what was done with that money; but from 1922 on you get no details whatsoever. In a moment I will give a specific instance to show exactly what the position is in relation to the reports that have been issued since 1922. In 1923 there were the following Canadian National bond guarantees and cash advances:

1923
Cash advanced by Dom. govt..		$ 24,500,000 00
Guaranteed bonds..		50,000,000 00
Equipment bonds..		22,500,000 00
1924
Cash advances..		10,000,000 00
Bonds issued..		46,000,000 00
Equipment bonds..		9,375,000 00
1925
Cash advanced..		10,000,000 00
Bonds issued..		35,000,000 00
		$207,375,000 00
Less retirements, 1924.. ..	$15,511,973 30
Less retirements 1925.. ..	17,583,780 06
	$33,095,753 36	33,095,753 36
Net balance..		$174,279,246 64
Cash to Can. Northern ..	$48,202,877 96
Deficits 1923-24-25..	53,123,490 02
Betterments, all lines 1923-24-25..	86,695,988 34
	$188,022,356 32
Credit balance..	174,279,246 64
Excess of expenditure.. ..	$13,743,109 68

At this point I would ask the House to note that in the Canadian National statement of betterments to all lines are included the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian government railways and the Grand Trunk for 1923, 1924 and 1925, amounting to $86,695,000 odd. It will also be noticed that from the total of $188,000,000 odd there is deducted a credit balance of $174,000,000 odd, leaving an excess of expenditure of nearly $14,000,000. The details of the expenditures are shown as follows:

1919-20-21
Betterments..	$21,962,955 31
Equipment..	42,339,483 81
Rails, Accessories, etc..	19,212,656 94
	$83,515,096 06

In the 1922 report there is no record whatsoever of what was expended on capital account. At least if there is I have not been able to find it.

1923
Betterments..	$19,868,425 23
Equipment..	29,060,521 62
General..	786,633 67
	$49,715,581 12
1924
Betterments..	$20,234,892 75
Equipment..	17,125,738 96
General..	5,201 27
	$37,365,837 98
1925
Betterments..	$15,763,796 43
Equipment..	1,291,644 43
General..	222,301 83
Suspense appropriations..	264,111 05
Investment expenditures, separately operated properties..	1,044,708 54
	$18,566,562 28
Less adjustments..	621,734 98
	$17,944,827 30

The expenditures on the Grand Trunk I am going to give in detail:

1920—Roadway and general deferred maintenance. Page 33..			$ 1,702,806 62
1920—Equipment all classes.. ..		$ 1,950,495 34
1921—Deferred maintenance all classes..			2,228,177 70
1921—Equipment all classes.. ..		23,135,857 71
1922—Deferred maintenance.			1,906,308 85
1922—Equipment all classes.. ..		2,899,361 09
		$ 27,985,714 14	$ 5,837,293 17
Less equipment retired—
1921... ..	$ 621,708 28
1922... ..	1,638,120 48
		2,259,828 76
			$ 25,725,885 38
Total expenditures equipment and betterments..			$ 31,563,178 55

Now let me give a summary of the expenditures on betterments and equipment:

Summary of Expenditures on Betterments and Equipment

Canadian National 1919-20-21	$ 83,515,096 06
Grand Trunk 1920-21-22	31,563,178 55
Canadian National 1923	49,715,581 02
Canadian National 1924	37,365,837 98
Canadian National 1925	17,944,828 30
	$ 220,104,521 91
Less estimate of new construction 1923-24-25	18,330,258 96
	$ 201,774,262 95

That total is what I gave before.

Now, I come to the cash advances:

Canadian National credit balance brought forward	$ 13,743,109 68
New construction as shown at page 10, 1921 report	29,804,673 62
New construction Canadian National 1923-24-25, estimated	18,330,258 96
Branch lines acquired, page 13, 1921 report	8,388,193 66
	$ 70,266,235 92

The following summary is interesting, showing the balances unaccounted for:

Balance unaccounted for Grand Trunk	$ 133,437,989 01
Balance unaccounted for Canadian Northern	124,408,119 82
Balance unaccounted for Grand Trunk Pacific	60,768,221 33
	$ 318,614,330 16
Less credit balance Canadian National.	70,266,235 92
Balance unaccounted for	$ 248,348,094 24
Add land sales	3,510,635 53
	$ 251,858,729 77

That is, the statements show what has been advanced to those railways in cash for which no account is given in any statement the railways have issued either by way of deficit or betterments or new construction.

Mr. DUNNING: What does my hon. friend suggest has become of that two or three hundred million?

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is just exactly what I should like the minister to ascertain.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not got it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is perfectly true.

Mr. CAHAN: You came in too late.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We have a statement given to the public for example, that $216,000,000 new cash has gone into the Grand Trunk railway. The details given to the House in the Canadian National reports show that about $55,000,000 has been expended to make up deficits in operation and betterments. Now I say at once that it is impossible that that sum of money can have gone into the Grand Trunk railway. It is equal to an expenditure of more than $60,000 a mile on the whole line. We took the system over in the early part of 1922 by arbitration, and all that the original owners were allowed for it was $216,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what I said.

Mr. NICHOLSON: At the same time the minister says this afternoon that we have advanced $216,000,000 additional cash.

Mr. DUNNING: No, $118,000,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about bond guarantees?

Mr. DUNNING: Those amount to $74,000,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is $192,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: And another $12,000,000—

Mr. NICHOLSON: That gives us a total of $204,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: —for the Toronto viaduct.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Leave that aside for the moment.

Mr. DUNNING: But I included that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I take the statement of the Department of Railways and Canals, that the Canadian people have advanced on behalf of the Grand Trunk railway $190,000,000 odd, or $58,000 a mile for every mile of the system. If you deduct the deficits from that, I say to you it is impossible that that sum of money could have been properly expended either by way of betterments or in new equipment. You can search these reports from A to Z, and you will not find any detail showing where that money has gone. That is my point. The same remarks apply to the Canadian Northern. I am taking these reports and they show the following details for new construction, which details represent the total amounts spent on betterments and new construction:

1923	$12,136,591 57
1924	12,715,935 93
1925	11,807,990 43
	$36,660,517 93

And I take one-half of this, or $18,330,258.92. May I say at this point, Mr. Speaker, that the only means by which it is possible to find in these reports since 1922, what has been spent on new construction is to take one-half of the account under certain headings, shown as betterments, engineering, new rails, new ties, ballasting, bridges, and so on. Betterments and new construction are lumped together in these reports. Prior to 1922 the details were set out, such as the miles constructed, where constructed and so on, but we have none of such information in regard to more recent construction. In the 1921 report, page 10, I find there was expended $29,804,673.62 on new construction and on branch lines acquired, as shown at page 13 of the same report, $8,388,193.66, making with half of the total I gave for engineering, grading, and so on, for 1923, 1924 and 1925, $36,660,517.93, or $18,330,258.96, an aggregate of $56,523,126.24.

Now we come to land sales; I am not going to give the details, but the total is $3,510,635.53. Then let me take these cash advances once more. The cash and bonds advanced, less betterments, deficits and new construction, according to the report of the Department of Railways and Canals and the reports of the Canadian National Railways, are as follows:

Cash and bonds to Grand Trunk Railway		$190,477,340 95
Cash and bonds to Canadian Northern Railway		329,920,888 53
Cash and bonds to Grand Trunk Pacific		105,173,930 84
Cash and bonds to Canadian National Railways		174,279,246 64
Land sales		3,510,635 53
Total		$803,362,042 49
BETTERMENTS, EQUIPMENT AND DEFICITS—
Grand Trunk	$ 57,039,351 94
Canadian Northern	205,512,768 71
Grand Trunk Pacific	44,405,709 51
Canadian National	139,819,478 36
New construction	48,134,932 58
Branch lines purchased	8,388,193 66
Cash, Canadian National to Canadian Northern	48,202,877 96
Total	$551,503,312 76	551,503,312 76
Balance unaccounted for		251,858,729 63

If the difference between that $57,000,000 and the $190,000,000 was spent on the Grand Trunk the people of this country, who are the owners of the system, have a right to know what it was spent on, but you cannot find any figures, aggregate or in detail, which will show where it has gone. To spend $190,000,000 on that property, and expend it properly, is an impossibility. It represents $58,000 per mile, and the total capitalization of the Canadian Pacific is just about $60,000 per mile for the entire system. The Canadian Northern was originally taken over at $38,000 per mile and the Grand Trunk was taken over at about $60,000 per mile.

If these statements are correct, and $803,000,000 of new cash has been expended, I say again, where has it gone? We cannot find any details. There is a net balance of $251,859,000 unaccounted for. I do not know where it has gone; I doubt very much whether anyone can tell accurately, but I at least have the suspicion that the public have not been given the facts with regard to what it was costing to operate the Canadian National system. That is the only answer that can possibly be given. If the public have been given accurate details as to what it has cost to operate the Canadian National system; if the public have been given accurate information as to cash which has gone into the system, as to the betterment and the deficits, then there is a difference of $251,000,000 which the people do not know anything of, but of which they should be given a full explanation.

I have before me the details with regard to deficits and betterments. The statement is rather long, but the total for 1919, 1920 and 1921 was $140,199,790.13, for the Canadian Northern Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The total gross deficit for the Grand Trunk, 1920-21, was $18,064,442.36, while the total on all lines to the end of 1921 was $178,721,387.80. The Canadian Northern operating deficit, 1922, and interest on funded debt amounted to $1,599,026.45 and $16,910,939.39, respectively. The Grand Trunk Pacific operating deficit for 1922 amounted to $5,352,360.22, while the operating deficit of the Canadian government railways totalled $2,910,657.93. The gross deficit on the Grand Trunk Railway for 1922 amounted to $8,411,734.03. The Canadian National Railway deficit for 1923, less interest to the Dominion government, amounted to $21,539,731.27; for 1924, $21,589,376.22 and for 1925, $9,994,382.53; a grand total of $269,370,862.80. The interest due the government totalled $164,788,864.13, making a final total of $434,159,726.93.

There has been absorbed by these railways if the reports are to be relied upon, $89,926,482.96 of surplus earnings, and there is just one item which may possibly be applied against that sum on the Grand Trunk Railway which is unaccounted for. In 1918 they spent $1,126,019.15, and in 1920, $790,000, or a total of $1,916,019.15, although I cannot see how it would be possible to include this amount in the charges against the Canadian people, because the Canadian people had not taken over the lines at that time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have before me details of the gross cost of the system to date:

Intercolonial Railway..	$137,184,199 62
Transcontinental Railway, to December 31, 1918..	200,000,000 00
Canadian Northern Railway..	386,776,740 52
Grand Trunk Railway..	216,207,141 00
Grand Trunk Pacific, less unguaranteed obligations..	135,439,888 00
Total..	$1,075,607,969 14

The cash advances since amalgamation, as I have already said, amount to $803,362,-042.49; Grand Trunk Pacific obligations to Grand Trunk Railway, unguaranteed, were $69,189,499; Grand Trunk Pacific loans outstanding at the time of amalgamation, $20,-539,357.10; additions to capital, Transcontinental and Intercolonial railways, since amalgamation, $114,528,284.60—and may I repeat that there is nothing to show how that increase was brought about. The 1925 balance sheet, unadjusted debits, $10,721,206.19; miscellaneous balancing items $4,619,138.97, a grand total of $2,098,567,497.49. That is the exact figure set out in the balance sheet for 1925, showing that when the Department of Railways and Canals say that roughly $803,-000,000 of new money has been put into the system, the Canadian National Railways must be taking that amount into consideration in bringing their balance sheet out to this figure. In addition there is the interest for government advances to the end of 1924 amounting to $130,157,992.28, and the interest on government advances for 1925 amounting to $31,450,381.87, making a grand total of $2,260,175,871.66, with no interest at all on the Canadian government railways, the Transcontinental railway and the Intercolonial. The minister stated that there was no reason why interest should be charged on that money. There is only one reason why interest should not be charged on it, and that would be the assumption that there was no value produced for that amount of money. Before I get through I intend to show briefly the proportion expended for which no value has been received, but there has been some value given for the money expended on the Canadian government railways, and there is just as much reason for interest being charged on that money as for interest being charged on any property whatever. But we must take the gross cost of the lines to date in order to find their correct value.

Now, the statements show we have spent on these lines approximately $1,335,000,000. To this $1,335,000,000, however, must be added $101,500,000, the sum required to bring the roads up to standard, a total cost of $1,437,-000,000. Now, there should be written off for money that was improperly expended on the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental, no less a sum than $200,364,888, leaving the net cost of the National system to-day $1,237,000,000, approximately $59,000 a mile. I give that figure because I intend to refer before I conclude to the statement of the minister as to the difficulty there was in arriving at a proper financial structure for the Canadian National Railways. The original capital cost of the Transcontinental railway was $200,000,000. The amount required to bring it up to standard was $26,000,000, making a total of $226,000,000 or $125,500 a mile. Its value is about $55,000 a mile, or $99,555,000. The balance which should be written off is $126,695.000.

If I may be permitted to digress for a moment the statement is frequently made—the statement was made this afternoon by the Minister of Railways—that the railway difficulty we are faced with is due to the failure of private ownership in connection with these lines.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope my hon. friend will quote me correctly.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Perhaps I misunderstood the hon. minister, but if he did not say that these roads were taken over when private ownership had failed I did not understand him correctly.

Mr. DUNNING: That is better.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, when private ownership had failed. Let us be honest with each other. Was it private ownership that failed? Was it private ownership that brought about the difficulties that the Grand Trunk Railway found itself in in 1918 or 1920? Was it private ownership that brought about the difficulties of the Canadian Northern Railway? No, it was the mad exploitations of railway building on the part of the Canadian people that brought about the condition with which we are faced, the projection of two paralleling or competing transcontinental railways at the same time when at the very outside one was all the country was capable of taking care of. On top of that there was the expenditure on the construction of these lines of money that was not spent in any proper part of the work of building the railway, for instance approximately $126,000,000 in the case of the Transcontinental. And while we were spending $125,500 a mile in building the Transcontinental railway and while $92,500 a mile was being spent on the Grand Trunk Pacific the Canadian Northern was being built alongside of it for $38,000 a mile, and the total capitalization of the Canadian Pacific for all of its lines is to-day about $60,000 a mile. The amount that should be written off the Grand Trunk Pacific, exclusive altogether of $69,000,000 of bonds that were issued and guaranteed by the Grand Trunk is $73,669,888, or a total of more than $200,000,000 for the two lines.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if you take the Canadian National railway system as it is to-day. That is to say, if you take the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk, and the Canadian Northern, link them up together, and write off from their capitalization the two sums representing the money misspent in connection with the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, you have a capitalization that these roads will stand. That is the position which they are in exactly.

Mr. EULER: How much would that be?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Approximately $1,250,000,000.

Mr. EULER: Just to get my hon. friend's point clear. That $1,250,000,000 should be the capitalization?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, that should be the capitalization. I will come to the subject again in a moment, but that is just what the capitalization should be. And that brings me to the last point in connection with the financing, or rather the refinancing of the lines, the position which the Minister of Railways said was so difficult to handle. May I at this point say that although the Canadian National, or to be more accurate the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern, are made up of a number of smaller lines, they are not different in that respect from any other great railway system. You will find included in the Canadian Pacific system, for example, twenty-five or thirty companies and the method of accounting is exactly the same. All that is necessary is to find out the value of the property, and fix that value at what it is or what it should be. We know the amount that was actually spent in taking over all these lines. If we deduct from that amount what has been misspent on the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental we have the valuation that could be placed on these railways and if they are properly operated they should earn a fair interest rate on that amount of money. If the figures in regard to refinancing and outstanding obligations are properly worked out this would be the present position of the National Railways: The amount due the public including guaranteed and unguaranteed securities is $931,329,302.74. The amount due the Canadian people less all outstanding interest is $1,167,238,194.75. The interest charges, including the Canadian government railways, amounts to $267,763,374.15, or a total of $2,366,330,871.66. Now if you deduct the value at $59,000 per mile, which amounts to $1,237,027,607.38, the gross loss to be absorbed is $1,129,303,264.28. Deduct all interest of whatsoever character, which would be $267,763,374.15, and you have a net loss to be absorbed of $861,539,890.13. If you increase the capitalization to $65,000 per mile you bring the net loss down to $736,539,890.13. My own opinion is that if the Canadian National Railways are to be put on a sound basis it would be unwise to increase the capitalization to $65,000 a mile. I think that $60,000 a mile would be a proper limit to put, and on that basis, the net loss to be absorbed by the Canadian people is approximately $861,000,000, in addition to all interest due to date. Is there anything very difficult in connection with that? The railways stand to-day with obligations to the public of $931,329,302.74. The net interest of the Canadian people after absorbing the loss already incurred amounts to $305,698,294.64. That represents our equity in the National Railways on that basis. But that equity will not exist very much longer under present conditions; it will be wiped out unless a change takes place very soon.

Mr. EULER: How so?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does the hon. member not know that? We have spent on these lines now all they are able to carry, and this large sum of $861,000,000 in addition.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. gentleman include in his statement the building of branch lines which are quite necessary and which will be self-sustaining?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The building of branch lines is something entirely different. I am taking the lines as they are, and not increasing the mileage. If the House will bear with me for a few moments, I intend to refer to some method whereby some of the mileage can be decreased and the operating costs reduced. The distribution of the new capital on the basis of a cost of $65,000 per mile would be: Securities held by the public, $931,329,302.74. Net interest of Canadian people $431,698,294.64; total $1,363,027,597.38. If you increase the capital charges to $65,000 per mile you simply increase your equity, but my own opinion is that it would be unsound financing, so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned.

In connection with this I would point out that there are $69,000,000 of outstanding obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway which are not included, as I understand it, in the outstanding obligations to the public, and in any plan that may be advanced or adopted for re-financing these railways the question as to what is to be done with this $69,000,000 must be taken up. I take this position: Notwithstanding the fact—and there can be no question whatever about it—that those responsible for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific literally wasted the money, threw it away and never put it into the railway, the railway was constructed with the approval of the Canadian people, the Canadian government, and those securities were sold on the market to the public. The innocent investor, with the endorsement, if not the guarantee, of the Canadian people bought these securities, and in my judgment the Canadian people cannot afford to repudiate those obligations. It is a grave question whether the Canadian people can afford to repudiate the $69,000,000 of securities issued by the Grand Trunk Pacific in view of the conditions under which that road was being constructed, being a joint undertaking between the Canadian people and the Grand Trunk Railway. That agreement was fatal to both parties, there cannot be any question about it. But are the people who put up their money to suffer? That is the point which some day the Canadian people will have to decide.

I am going to give figures in regard to the cost of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern. The Grand Trunk cost $74,000 a mile and the Canadian Northern, with all betterments and equipment to date, cost $54,000 a mile. The Grand Trunk can properly stand a higher capitalization than the Canadian Northern, because it is a double track line, and the capitalization is not excessive. In this connection may I point out that the earnings of the Canadian National Railway per mile of their line are practically the same as the earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but when you turn to the operating cost of the Canadian National you will find there is a marked difference. Maintenance of way cost the Canadian Pacific Railway, $1,698 per mile but it cost the Canadian National $2,050 per mile. That is the operating cost. If the Canadian National maintained their lines on the same basis as the Canadian Pacific they would save $7,350,000 a year in operating cost. In transportation the Canadian National would save $9,050,582.15. Transportation costs the Canadian Pacific Railway 35 per cent of their earnings, and costs the Canadian National 43.7 per cent of their earnings.

Mr. MANION: Do the Canadian National Railways take in the Grand Trunk?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, all Canadian National lines. The earnings of all Canadian National lines are practically the same as the earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but when you get to the operating costs the figures are different. The transportation costs of the Canadian Pacific Railway in handling their freight traffic are 8½ per cent less than the Canadian National and in maintenance of equipment their cost is 1.7 per cent less. The general expense is $6,421,807.28, and miscellaneous cost $528,549.65. On these four items, if the Canadian National were operated on the same basis as the Canadian Pacific Railway, they would save $23,929,960.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member not think it is fair to say that the Canadian National Railway consists to a fairly great degree of what are known and described by the minister as colonization lines. Those lines cost a good deal more to operate than the Canadian Pacific lines which were built more as business lines. The Canadian National Railway consists of a number of systems not built for business, but which must be operated as part of the system.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My point is that if it can be shown that the gross earnings on the mileage of the Canadian National railway is less than the earnings on the Canadian Pacific railway, the argument holds good. But if the gross earnings per mile of the Canadian National railway were equal to the gross earnings of the Canadian Pacific railway, then what one gains in one place is offset by what the other gains in another place.

Mr. EULER: Gross earnings per mile?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, you will find that in 1924 the gross earnings per mile on the Canadian National were higher than on the Canadian Pacific railway. In 1925 the gross earnings per mile were practically the same, but the difference in operating cost on maintenance of way was the difference between $1,698 and $2,050. In transportation cost the Canadian National could save 8½ per cent and in maintenance of equipment 1.7 per cent.

I am not going into details, but anyone who desires to get the information for himself can obtain it by referring to the operating statement of the Canadian National Railways for 1925 in which year the showing was better than usual, but what do you find? You find that it was in some degree due to the fact that they allowed their equipment to run down, because they had less rolling stock in service at the end of 1925 than at the end of 1924, indicating that a considerable part of their rolling stock was out of repair and could not be used.

In connection with the matter of proper freight charges, my hon. friend referred to the much debated point as to whether we were handling traffic in some parts of the country at less than cost. The fact that the railways earn more money in the last three months of the year than in the first, second or third three-month periods, indicates, it is claimed, that the major part of traffic they handle during the last three months is the most profitable kind of traffic they have. Turn to the operating expenses, and hon. members will find that for maintenance of equipment the Canadian National Railways spent $47,902,092.16 and for maintenance of way $43,006,813.70, a total under these two items alone in round figures of $90,000,000 spent for maintenance of way and maintenance of equipment. When is that money spent? In the first place, there is a heavy traffic on all lines in Canada in the last four or five months of the year, commercial as well as grain traffic—very much greater than in the first half of the year. The equipment begins to be retired at a very early period in the new year, and sent to the repair shops to be put into condition for the fall operations and at least 75 per cent of the $47,000,000 for the maintenance of equipment is spent in the first half of the year.

Anyone who knows anything about maintenance of way costs on a railway knows that those costs take place in March, April, May, June, July and the first half of August. Maintenance of way costs are reduced to a minimum beginning with the middle of August or the first of September. I am making this statement simply in order to show how easy it is by taking group figures to reach a fallacious conclusion in relation to the operation of these railways. Approximately 30,000 cars must be gathered in western Canada to move the grain crop and these cars are sent west commencing with the first of the year. On either the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National you will find to-day long strings of empty equipment being sent to the west. The operating charges for moving this empty equipment to western Canada are applicable to the day the equipment is moved. Those empty cars are set out on side tracks and they remain idle for the time being. Another point in connection with the movement of this seasonal traffic is that those 30,000 cars are used almost exclusively for the movement of the grain crop. This situation is not peculiar to Canada; the same thing is true in the United States, both in the west in connection with the grain crop and in the south in connection with the cotton crop. The crops must be moved when they are ready to be moved, so that the railways must have a large quantity of rolling stock which they otherwise would not require. On the Canadian railways at least 30,000 freight cars could be abandoned altogether if the total freight movement was distributed equally over the twelve months of the year. Those 30,000 freight cars mean an investment of $90,000,000 and the capital charges must be kept up in addition to the equipment being maintained in proper condition. I refer to that, not from a controversial standpoint, because transportation is the question before the Canadian people to-day that must be solved if we are going to get down to a sound industrial and economic basis. There are in my opinion commodities both east and west that must be moved at a minimum of cost. We must find a means of moving the surplus grain crop out of western Canada and the coal and iron of the east to central Canada at a minimum of cost.

Mr. EULER: What does the hon. gentleman mean when he speaks about a minimum of cost? Would he base his rates on cost, or less than cost, or more than cost?

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is a question that must be determined, but I will answer my hon. friend in this way. I am not averse to saying that in order to develop western Canada by assisting in the movement of the surplus grain crop to the markets of the world, and particularly through Canadian ports, it might be, and I believe would be, a wise policy for Canada to carry that grain crop at less than cost if necessary.

Mr. EULER: Would the hon. member bring that policy into effect by a reduction of rates or by means of a subsidy?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will come to that, if my hon. friend will allow me. In order to develop industry in eastern Canada, particularly in relation to coal and steel, I believe it would be wise for the Canadian people to consider moving that traffic for less than cost. How are we going to make up the difference? There are only two ways in which this may be done. One is by direct cash subvention, and I do not believe that is necessary or wise, because in the first instance it would be a difficult matter to determine what the cash subvention should be. The other way is to distribute the reduced cost of handling the traffic of the far west and the traffic of the east over the other classes of traffic that are handled in the more densely populated parts of Canada. How can we accomplish that?

There is just one way in which it can be done, and this is a point that is being entirely lost sight of. We should first establish an equitable rate structure for all commodities for all parts of Canada. I understand that the matter has been referred to the Board of Railway Commissioners. While they have the matter before them, what do we find? We find that special commodities are being taken and special rates applied, making it utterly impossible for the Board of Railway Commissioners, I care not how expert they may be, to establish an equitable rate structure in this country. We must first start with the Canadian National Railways and determine the capital cost that should be applied to it. Then we must put in charge men who will operate it so that it will earn enough money to pay operating expenses and interest on capital costs. We have not made a start at doing that yet. After that is accomplished we must ask the Board of Railway Commissioners to establish what will be equitable rates.

Another reason why equitable rates cannot be established at the present time is because of the unfair competition that exists owing to the fact that the Canadian National Railways are not called upon to earn the money necessary to operate them. So long as that condition exists neither the Canadian National nor its competitor can reach a point where it can stand the application of an equitable rate. To put it in plain terms, so long as the Canadian Pacific is subjected to the form of competition that can be applied against it by a system of railways that is not called upon to earn its operating costs and to pay a return on the money invested in it, the Canadian Pacific cannot bear the application of an equitable rate structure. That is the point.

In that regard may I say one further word and I will conclude? We have heard a great deal in the last two or three years with regard to getting rid of duplicate services; it is said that the two railways should get together; that unnecessary trains should be taken off here and there. We must start first with the Canadian National Railways itself: let us begin by eliminating some of the duplicate lines. If we eliminate 1,000 miles of unnecessary lines of the main line of the Canadian National Railways we shall save on the item of maintenance of way and transportation alone $5,000,000 a year. In addition we shall get all the material on these lines to build branch lines in western Canada. Can anyone tell the House or the country why the Canadian National Railways should have two lines of railway starting at the city of Montreal and paralleling each other from there to the town of Sudbury, running side by side and competing with each other for business? Just a short time ago I went with a member of this House to an Ontario town on the Canadian National Railways. I went to the Canadian National ticket office to make a reservation and I made a reservation to go out on a night train. The man who brought me to the station took me to another station entirely. I said: "You must be making a mistake; this must be the Canadian Pacific." He said: "No, this is another Canadian National system." It was a beautiful station, all lit up with electric lights, with a ticket agent, telegraph operator, baggage express man, and so on, but it was not the station at which this train came in at two o'clock in the morning. I said: "Do you mean to tell me that the Canadian National Railway has two stations in this town each competing with the other for business?" He sand: "Why, certainly. One is the Canadian Northern station and the other is the Grand Trunk station." This was on the Grand Trunk double track line, the best piece of railway in the country, with the Canadian Northern line competing with it. The same thing is occurring all over the country.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about the stretch between Winnipeg and Brandon?

Mr. FORKE: Those lines serve local purposes.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the point.

Mr. NICHOLSON: They serve local purposes, my hon. friend says. When two trains leave the terminal at Winnipeg side by side and you stand on the observation platform of one, how much of the line is there from which you cannot see the other train? You would see mile upon mile the other railway track running almost parallel. As a matter of fact, for miles they are within a hundred yards of each other.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I beg your pardon; it is so between Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie.

Mr. FORKE: Both lines run into Portage la Prairie.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, and the only trouble is that the two lines cannot be used as a double track. If the rails of the one were taken up and laid alongside the other, so that the two might be used as a double track, some purpose would be accomplished, but as it is now there is a duplication of service along the main lines. However, I will not labour that point. It is certainly most unfortunate that there should be such keen competition for business in the various towns in which one sees two ticket offices vieing with each other for public business. The policy is absolutely unsound and the first thing for us to do if we are to make any progress in the direction of solving our railway problem is to eliminate this unwarrantable duplication of service.

The minister has referred to the construction of branch lines. So long as Canada continues to develop we shall need to build branch lines to meet the demands of that development, but our first aim should be to reduce to the very minimum the duplication which at present is so costly to our transportation system. The minister also expressed the opinion that the solution for our railway problem is to be found in an increase in population. I agree with him. And, let me add, the solution for that problem is, in turn, the inauguration of a sound industrial policy in this country, a policy which will render such an increase in population possible.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Another Daniel has come to judgment, for the hon. member (Mr. Nicholson) now confesses that there is an altogether unnecessary duplication of railway service in this country. As one lone individual in parliament, and outside as well, I have been emphasizing this fact for years, and now I am glad to see that in all quarters it is receiving increasing recognition. This morning I read in one of the Montreal newspapers, in an article dealing with this subject, the opinion that some arrangement must be made looking to the settlement of our railway problem. We have thousands of miles of unnecessary lines of two great systems competing with each other, adding tremendously to overhead costs, and we have competition in telegraph and express services as well. Then, again, there are hundreds of unnecessary stations scattered throughout the country in places where one station would better serve the purpose than two.

Unless parliament deals with this question the people of Canada will deal with the men whom they have sent here and who are sidestepping the issue; for this is going to be the issue in this country from now on. There is altogether too much partyism in Canada in connection with our railway problem and the people themselves will insist upon their representatives coming to parliament with a determination to find some satisfactory solution for it. Only this morning I was talking with a young man of about thirty-five who said while the young men in his community were not quite conscious of what was wrong with Canada they were determined, so far as lay in their power, to get rid of party politics. He said, "Unless you old timers do something we will find new and younger men who will undertake to solve this problem, among others." I repeat, we are simply sidestepping this issue to-day as we have been doing all along. The presentation of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) this afternoon offers no solution. I thought that he would introduce some new proposal in which there might be some ray of hope. I have not of course had time to study the statement he has made, and while there may be some promise in it, I do not think that the minister has really touched the problem. The duplication in headquarters staffs and in various branches of the railway service still exists. We have engaged on the railways of Canada 30,000 or 40,000 men with whom we could dispense. If we consolidated the two systems we could pay these men $1,000 each a year until they were able to find other occupations and still we should save hundreds of millions of dollars. We are simply wasting money to-day, and we shall continue to waste money until we tackle the problem in real earnest. Neither the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) nor his government has taken hold of it, and I regret to say that the opposition offers no real constructive policy. Some people tell us that time will settle the question. Yes, time will settle it. Time will settle the politicians who refuse to deal satisfactorily with it. I have gone up and down this country and have been sick at heart to see the rivalry between our two railways. We have duplicate trains running between Toronto and Montreal and Toronto and Ottawa, and the same thing is true throughout the country. We know that the Canadian National Railways to-day have 70 per cent of the railway strategy in Canada, while the Canadian Pacific Railway has an equal advantage in regard to steamship lines. The president of that system I was reading to-day, is going to England on a mission in connection with this service, and I take this to be an indication that the Canadian Pacific is getting ready for some form of co-operation or consolidation.

We must remember that transportation is not confined to the railways alone; in its broadest sense it includes water service and motor and bus transportation. The passenger business on our railways is declining. Yesterday I was at Niagara, one of the most glorious parts of the country, and I saw vast numbers of automobiles—an evidence of the falling off in railway passenger service.

Another formidable competition which our railways have to face is water transportation. As soon as the St. Lawrence waterways are completed, perhaps with the completion of the Georgian Bay canal, we shall see ocean ports on the Great Lakes, up to Duluth, Fort William and Port Arthur, and the competition which will ensue will be a very serious matter indeed for our railways. It will then be imperative for them to eliminate unnecessary competition to the utmost, if they are to pay half their costs.

It is regrettable that the government has not the courage to propound a policy looking in the direction of co-operation and consolidation. If they would only make overtures towards that end I have no doubt that the Canadian Pacific would lend a sympathetic ear. The government should make some step in this direction; otherwise the country will express its opinion in no mistakable terms.

To-day for the first time the new Minister of Railways has addressed the House as a meeting of shareholders. I am here to-day as a shareholder in this railway representing 50,000 citizens of Canada, and some hon. gentlemen represent even a greater number. Well, I do not know how I am going to face my electors and explain to them why this unnecessary, this unwise, this scandalous competition between our two great railway systems is allowed to continue. We cannot keep it up. The government are going to bring down the rate structure, and they are going to tell the people of the west, who are greatly concerned in freight rates, that they will be able to give them lower rates. But I say you cannot have lower freight rates in this country while this unnecessary competition is allowed to continue. You can reduce the freight rates only by consolidating your two great transportation systems covering water transportation and transportation by rail. By such a consolidation we will reduce operating and other expenses, and it is only by this economy of operation and management that you can give what the Canadian farmer is calling for—lower freight rates. There must be a merging of these two railways with their steamship services. We must also provide for airway transportation and link it up with this consolidation.

I wonder if hon. members have any conception of the high-class service that the United States government is maintaining for the transfer of money and mails in that great country. It is a splendid service, and I am told that saving in interest alone by rapid transfer of money pays the cost of operation. We must be prepared to inaugurate a similar service in conjunction with a consolidated railway and steamboat service. We cannot afford to sidestep the issue any longer. The present unnecessary duplication is costing this country an annual waste of about $300,000,000. This is not efficiency. One of the greatest improvements possible under a consolidation such as I have urged will be improved re-routing of all traffic. Any traffic man will tell you what a great saving and what a great improvement in service this will bring about. There is something in the suggestion of bringing about a new capital structure, but that is not the way to achieve the purpose we have in view. The people of this country, especially the western people, want lower freight rates, and they are not going to get them unless we consolidate our transportation facilities. We must stop spending more money in trying to run these two great railway systems; we must consolidate them. That is the keynote of the situation. I am glad to that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is listening to me. He must know that it will be a problem for him to go to the people and say: I am still a party to this mad competition in railway service. He cannot face his electors, nor do I believe that half of us in this House can face our electors and justify that mad business. Go where I will I find the people are responding to what I have said in this House with regard to this vital question. They are glad to see me, and they are even beginning to ask me to address meetings on the subject. While I have been scarified in some quarters because I had the courage to say the other night that this House ought to appoint à committee to deal with the question, and that once an agreement was made between the whips of the respective parties it ought to be carried out, while I was said to be a "bad Conservative" for having so expressed myself, yet I am content to disregard those attacks and to go on the platform and justifiy my action. I am not going to talk on any minor issues if there is an appeal to the country—and I warn the House again that there is every prospect of a general election in a very short time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are wrong about that.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No, I am not wrong, my brother; perhaps you are looking the wrong way. I am confident that something is likely to force the government to go to the country, and then this and other problems will have to be presented to the electorate, and we shall have to defend or condemn this mad rivalry we are now maintaining between express companies, telegraph companies and railway companies. By a consolidation of our great transportation systems we would get much greater efficiency and we would get real service both by rail and by water, and we would be also prepared for that formidable competition which our railway systems will have to meet as soon as the St. Lawrence route has been deepened to allow ocean-going vessels to reach Port Arthur and Duluth. With the competition from that quarter and from motor transport there will be no future for two competing railways in this country. In fact even to-day there is only room for one consolidated system which will include transportation by water and transportation by rail. This, as I say, will permit of better routing of the roads, and in this will be found the real salvation of Canada's transportation needs, rather than in a reduction of freight rates. Stop this mad competition, start re-routing your lines, and you will see a great improvement in the railway service of this country. The Minister of Railways has told us about establishing a new capital structure for the Canadian National Railways, but I tell him we have got to have a new capital structure of all our commitments in connection both with the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. When that is brought about it will be easy to create a system of transportation which, while giving the people what they desire, will stop the extravagance which prevails all over the country to-day.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, with other members on this side of the House I listened with a great deal of pleasure and attention to the instructive address of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) this afternoon. I congratulate him upon having presented his case in a very lucid manner. He has the advantage, of course, of the expert advice and assistance of the officials of the Canadian National Railways, and also of their expert accountants. It would be somewhat more satisfactory to the House, I think, if from time to time those who are in actual control of the Canadian National Railways should appear before hon. members in committee in order that a clearer understanding might be had of some of the points which are beclouded by the public discussions of the day. I have not had the assistance such as the Minister of Railways has had, but a few salient facts are before me which I should like to present for the consideration of the House.

I will not go back to 1867, when the construction of the Intercolonial was undertaken at the expense of the government, or to the time when the Prince Edward Island railway was commenced. However, in order that we may ascertain the present financial obligations of the country with regard to railways I should like to present a few statistics running back to the year 1903, when the government undertook the construction of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental line from Moncton to Winnipeg, on the understanding that it was to be taken over by the Grand Trunk Pacific under lease and operated in connection with the western section of that road. In 1914 further obligations were assumed by the government of the country when the Canadian Northern Railway Company began to collapse, and large loans or advances were necessary in order to keep that road in operation at the outbreak of the war. In 1917 further obligations were undertaken when the Canadian Northern railway lines were taken over by the government. Going back for two years before that, on the failure of the Grand Trunk Pacific to operate the eastern section of its road the government was compelled to include the eastern section of the Transcontinental railway in its railway system. In 1916 I find that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway began to ask the Dominion government for loans and advances; and finally, in 1918, the government was compelled to take over that line and assume its obligations. In 1919, I think it was, the Grand Trunk railway was taken over, and since that time has been operated as part of the Canadian National system. I have had a schedule prepared. It is not very lengthy but it shows from year to year since 1903 the increasing mileage of the National Railway system. Then the second column shows the total long term indebtedness of that system, being the amount of money expended by the Dominion government, together with securities bought and held by the people of Canada, and other countries, for all of which the government is really liable. In the third column there is shown the increase of government liability from year to year, which is represented by the difference between the total expenditures made upon the system and the total received from operation. The fourth column gives the annual fixed charges, being the annual fixed interest charge which the Canadian government will have to pay to the holders of Canadian National Railway securities and Dominion government securities issued to raise loans made by the government to the Canadian National system. This is to be paid for all time or until the securities are redeemed by the income of the government realized from taxation of the people of Canada. I would like to place this short statement on Hansard:

(2) The Canadian government assumed the liabilities of the Canadian Northern system in September, 1918, became receiver of the Grand Trunk Pacific in March, 1919, and assumed control of the Grand Trunk Railway in May, 1920.
(3) Interest on funded and unfunded debt C.N.R., G.T. R. and G.T.P.
(4) Includes 60 miles of Inverness Railway and Coal Company taken over under lease, April 1, 1924.

This statement shows, as the Minister of Finance stated, that on December 31, 1925, there was a total long term indebtedness, which was an indebtedness primarily of the Canadian National Railway but equally an indebtedness of the Canadian government and the Canadian people, amounting to $2,119,811,644. I have excluded the amounts owing on ordinary revenue accounts of the year. I have simply taken the long term obligations of the Canadian people in this respect, and I find that this annual increase in capital liability has been continued from year to year. When we took over the liabilities of the Canadian Northern in September, 1918, there was an increase in liability made up from that source and others of $730,000,000. It was $580,000,000 in 1920 and $132,000,000 in 1921.

Mr. EULER: Is my hon. friend right in saying that we took over the liability of the Canadian Northern in 1918? Was it not the Grand Trunk?

Mr. CAHAN: I said the Canadian government assumed the liability of the Canadian Northern in 1918.

Mr. EULER: Is my hon. friend correct in that?

Mr. CAHAN: There may be some mistake about it.

Mr. EULER: Was it not the Grand Trunk?

Mr. CAHAN: The government became the receiver of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway system in March 1919 and assumed control of the Grand Trunk Railway in May 1920. I have taken from year to year, with the assistance of an expert accountant, the annual increase in liability since that date down to December 31, 1925. There were increases in liabilities as follows:

1921..	$132,000,000
1922..	59,000,000
1924..	118,900,000

And in 1925 I find an increase of long term obligations of $63,630,000. Naturally with this large increase in capital obligations the annual fixed charges of the Canadian National Railway have increased from year to year. In 1919 I find that the annual fixed charges for interest amounted in round figures to $29,000,000. In 1925 I find that they amounted to $71,888,000, showing that the railway loans had been extended, and as their obligations had increased it resulted in a large annual increase in the fixed charges payable by the Canadian National Railway lines in respect of those capital obligations.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend tell me whether that $63,000,000 increase which he speaks of for 1925 does not include the amount due the government for interest, $31,000,000? That I presume is true of all the other years.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly that is so, and that is an obligation, is it not? I do not agree with the hon. member's suggestion that when the government advances money to the railway from time to time the interest accruing to the government is not an obligation of the National lines; and if it is not paid of course it is an increase in the obligations of the National lines for which the people of this country are directly and indirectly responsible. As I progress I will make that perfectly plain. Dealing with the question of interest, I noticed a statement of Mr. J. L. Payne in the London Free Press in July last, in which this matter is discussed pro and con. He deals with the fixed charges for the year 1924, and I think there is a great deal to be said for the contention he makes in the Free Press. He says:

> How much are those fixed charges? The official announcement placed them at $69,632,747, but beyond the possibility of doubt that is not the correct amount.

He is dealing with 1924. The statement continues:

> It is merely the sum set down against the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Grand Trunk; and in these cases it does not allow for unpaid interests on a compound basis, as standard accounting would require. Interest charges on the capital liability of the Intercolonial, the Prince Edward Island, the Quebec bridge, and all eastern branch lines, representing at least $1,000,000,000 are omitted. The excuse, certainly not the defence, for such irregular accounting, is that such liability is incorporated with the National debt. That is true, but it also very distinctly and properly is a part of the railway account. If it were brought into the railway statement, as it should be, fixed charges would reach a total of considerably more than $100,000,000 per annum.

The statement is frequently made in respect to the extension of colonization roads that these roads simply pass the interest upon the amount expended upon them during their construction. In the case of a private company or a privately owned utility company there is an additional cost to the aggregate cost of construction, a cost resulting from the interest charges on the amount expended in the construction until the road is in a condition, if it is a private utility, to pay its operating costs and its fixed charges. That is as much a cost on capital account in respect of the road as money actually expended on construction. According to the report of Mr. G. A. Bell, Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, which is now published and circulated as a government return, I find that the long-term funded indebtedness of the Canadian National Railways amounted on December 31, 1924, to $2,056,181,516 and on December 31, 1925, it had increased to $2,119,811,644. That is how I ascertained my increase for the year 1925, the difference showing the increase in liabilities of $63,630,128 as I stated.

I call this long term liability because I am not dealing with any amounts owing on current account or petty banking accounts or for materials bought in for the operation of the road. I am leaving this out of account and this amount of $2,119,811,644 would, I think, be somewhat increased if I took into account these other smaller amounts which are changing from month to month during the year's operations.

Of this amount the security held by the public amounted to $931,329,303. Loans from the Dominion government made directly to these companies, not including the old loans made with respect to the Grand Trunk railway to which the Minister of Finance referred, but loans recently made within the term with which I am dealing, amounted in actual cash to $572,685,535. That does not include interest on Dominion government loans or the appropriation account of the Canadian government railways. The appropriation account of the Canadian government railways amounted to $453,935,303 and no interest has ever been charged, and possibly properly so, in the account of the National Railways as accumulating from time to time on this appropriation account. But interest is charged on loans recently made by the Dominion government, which interest has accrued and is unpaid amounting to $161,861,503. This comprises the total amount of $2,119,811,644 to which I have referred. That amount of $453,935,303 is, I repeat, the appropriation account of the Dominion government in respect of the former Canadian government railways, and in dealing with the account of the Canadian National Railways that amount is taken as not bearing interest at all; no interest accumulates from year to year in the accounts of the Canadian National Railways with reference thereto.

Mr. DUNNING: It never did.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not talking about what happened before; I am trying simply to get the fact before the House so that there will be no misunderstanding that the $161,861,503 of interest due and unpaid has nothing to do with appropriations formerly made by the Dominion government for the construction of railway lines. It has solely to do with interest accrued and unpaid on recent loans or advances made in cash in respect of those lines which now form a part of the Canadian National Railways. There is ground I suppose for the contention that this item of $453,935,303 represents money which the Dominion government has put into railways apart altogether from the lines which originally made up the Canadian National railway system and which failed, as the minister said, by reason of the failure of private ownership.

But let me go a little further. Exclusive of this item, that is, exclusive of every dollar that the Dominion government has paid out from 1867 to the date of the organization of the Canadian National Railway system, there are obligations which are directly due to the Canadian National lines. Of these, as I said before, securities held by the public amounted to $931,329,303. On Dominion government account there is a funded debt unmatured and receiver's certificates of $86,816,865, and loans from the Dominion government of $485,868,000, making a total of $572,685,669 for which the Dominion government is directly liable. Accrued but unpaid interest on loans amounts to $161,861,503, so that all this represents an aggregate liability of $1,665,876,340 owing by the Canadian National Railways for principal and interest, exclusive of every dollar expended by the government on Transcontinental and eastern lines.

As the Minister of Finance stated, the interest on securities hald by the public amount to $40,438,235 and interest on loans from the Dominion government to $31,450,381 or a total interest accrued in 1925 of $71,888,616. But the Minister of Finance, if I may refer to his statement in his absence, in introducing the budget, said that for the year ended March 31, 1926, there would be a reduction in the public debt of Canada of $22,353,000, and he added:

> May I again emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that this reduction is net clear of everything?

But the Minister of Finance in dealing with the matter took into account only a loan of $10,000,000 to the Canadian National Railways during the past fiscal year, although the liabilities of the Canadian National Railways, which are a debt of the Canadian people, increased from December 31, 1924 to December 31, 1925, by $63,630,000. So that, exclusive of the $10,000,000 to which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) referred, after allowing for that sum so as to avoid any possible duplication, there was an increase of the obligations of this country, reckon them how you will, fix your bookkeeping how you will, put it in one account or in the other, amounting to $53,630,000.

The Minister of Finance, in referring to this item when presenting his budget, also stated that the annual interest charge on the Canadian National Railways was $71,800,000, in round figures, of which $40,400,000 consists of outstanding securities in the hands of the public, while the balance of $31,400,000 payable on loans made by the Dominion government to the Canadian National Railways he set aside as a mere book-keeping entry and not as a cash item. But the loans made by the Canadian government to the Canadian National Railways were cash items, and the interest paid by the government upon its outstanding bonds and debentures, a part of which was used for this purpose, is a cash item. Therefore, as regards the interest payable to the Dominion government by the Canadian National Railways in respect of the actual cash loaned to the railways and owed by them to the government, I cannot conceive any imaginable reason for not regarding this as a cash item unless you wish to call it a book-keeping item for the purpose of beclouding the public mind as to the real facts of the case. In any case the entries are made in the accounts and the interest is paid in cash out of the government's receipt of taxes. It is taken from the people of Canada and devoted to the payment of interest on obligations of the Canadian people in connection with the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. CAHILL: In computing the increase in the national debt—on which point my hon. friend differs from the Minister of Finance—does the hon. member contend that the national debt has been increased to the extent of the $31,000,000 of interest due the government by the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. CAHAN: I was not dealing with the national debt.

Mr. CAHILL: A moment ago.

Mr. CAHAN: I was dealing with obligations of the National Railways which are necessarily obligations of the government. I quite realize that if there had been received from the Canadian National Railways the interest which was due and payable to the government in respect of government advances, it would have gone into the treasury and have been used either to reduce the national debt or, possibly, to reduce taxation.

Now with regard to the past year, and indeed every year, the Canadian National lines have failed to pay a dollar of the loans made by the Dominion government and have failed to pay one dollar of the interest upon those loans. As a matter of fact the officials of the company and of the government have become so accustomed to dealing with what they call net operating income, and to congratulating themselves and the country upon certain increases in that income, that they have entirely lost sight of the fact that these railways have never so far paid a dollar on interest account due to the federal government. The Minister of Finance indeed, proceeded to set off the $35,000,000 of net operating income of the National Railways against the $40,400,000 of interest paid to the holders of outstanding securities, and then he naively remarked that there remained a shortage of $7,400,000 which represented the actual cash loss to the railways in the fiscal year.

Mr. DUNNING: I made it five.

Mr. CAHAN: The Minister of Railways in making it five did not distort the figures to the same extent as did the Minister of Finance. It happens that since his colleague has spoken the Minister of Railways has discovered an increase in income during the first four months of this year and apparently hastens to take advantage of it.

Mr. DUNNING: That is wrong.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg your pardon: you were taking it up to March 31, that is to say, the first three months. Now, this certainly is a very quaint, and if it were parliamentary I would say, so far as the public is concerned, a very deceptive way of dealing with the railway accounts. The railways, it is true, according to the figures of the Minister of Finance, did not earn sufficient, within $7,400,000, to pay their liabilities in connection with interest accrued during the year upon the $931,000,000 of securities outstanding in the hands of the public. I give my hon. friend this credit, that he did not glide over it so smoothly as did the Minister of Finance. He has not learned that happy knack yet.

Mr. DUNNING: I must object to that expression. I have under my hand just what I said. I said in one place, "interest payable to the public" and in another place "interest charges due the public." There was no attempt to glide over anything. There was a clear distinction drawn between interest due the public and interest due the government.

Mr. CAHAN: I admit that both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways emphasized the amount of interest due the public, but they slid quietly over the fact of there being some $31,400,000 due to the government. My hon. friend did not slide over it quite so smoothly as did his colleague.

Mr. DUNNING: I object again. I stated and restated that there was $31,000,000 of interest due to the government. There was no sliding over anything and my hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps I should have said "slipped over". The Minister of Finance in his budget statement made no announcement whatever of the fact that of the aggregate interest in like manner accrued, payable and due to the government on December 31, 1925, amounting to $161,861,500, not one dollar had been paid by the Canadian National Railways, although every dollar of that enormous deficiency had been made up by taxation of the Canadian people.

But the hon. Minister of Railways—and I will refer to my notes for fear I may again misquote him, which I would not willingly do; he was so charming this afternoon that I should like to treat him with all courtesy—the hon. minister said, according to my notes, that owing to the excellent earnings of the Canadian National lines during the last year he had a great deal of confidence for the future. I am not giving his exact words, but that is their effect. He said that our railways are excellent barometers and reflect in accurate measure the trade and commerce of the country. With respect to that, I have also prepared a statement showing how the revenues and expenses of the National Railways compare for the years 1923, 1924, 1925. I should like to place it on Hansard.

This is the statement referred to:

	C.N.R.	C.P.R.
	1923
Gross earnings..	$253,135,487	$192,827,930
Operating expenses..	232,704,838	155,040,207
Net operating revenue..	$ 20,430,649	$ 37,787,722
	1924
Gross earnings..	$235,588,182	$180,796,044
Operating expenses..	218,343,931	143,258,643
Net operating revenue..	$ 17,244,251	$ 37,537,400
	1925
Gross earnings..	$244,971,202	$183,356,005
Operating expenses..	212,706,787	143,201,299
Net operating revenue..	$ 32,264,414	$ 40,154,705

That comparison is taken from the financial statement presented to us by the president of the National Railway system, and does not seem to me to support the conclusion that the prosperity of the country has very greatly increased during the past three years if we are to take the returns of these railways as an accurate barometer of the country's condition. Those returns do not show that more freight and passenger traffic was being carried than in 1923, in fact not as much, nor that the domestic trade of the country was largely expanded in 1925 over 1923 and 1924. The total revenue of the Canadian National Railways as shown by those returns, which was over $253,000,000 for the year ending December 31, 1923, decreased to less than $245,000,000 for the year ending December 31, 1925; as between those two years, a decrease of over $8,000,000 in the aggregate annual revenue. Between those same two dates the net liabilities of the system increased $182,500,000 on capital account, and the fixed charges thereon increased by $6,900,000 per year.

Sir Henry Thornton's latest report shows that as compared with 1923, for instance, the freight earnings in 1925 were $4,758,000 less, the passenger earnings $3,366,000 less, and the miscellaneous revenue $750,000 less. The number of passengers carried decreased from 23,683,781 in 1923 to 22,707,880 in 1924 and to 20,675,239 in 1925. If there was such an assured increase in the business and commercial condition of the country, it is difficult to see how it is shown in a passenger traffic decreasing year by year to the extent of millions as compared with 1923.

Mr. DUNNING: What about 1924?

Mr. CAHAN: I gave it. I will repeat the figures. In round numbers, 23,600,000 in 1923, 22,707,000 in 1924 and 20,675,000 in 1925—a continual sliding down the scale.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, I think his information differs from mine. He says 20,675,000; my figures are 21,675,000 passengers.

Mr. CAHAN: If my hon. friend has the accurate figures of 21,600,000 odd, I must have made a mistake in taking mine from the returns. But even so, admitting that the correct figure is 21,675,000 passengers—

Mr. DUNNING: There is still a decline.

Mr. CAHAN: —it is still less than 1924, and 1924 is less than 1923. Probably in getting my statement typewritten by the stenographers at hand some inaccuracy may have arisen. I am glad you have the correction.

Now, as compared with 1923, the Canadian National Railways last year carried 2,500,000 tons less freight, although the total tonnage was 2,500,000 more than in 1924. I have prepared a comparative statement of the revenue tonnage carried by the Canadian National lines in 1923, 1924 and 1925, which I should like to put on Hansard. The impression seems to be prevalent in certain districts, and in the minds of certain hon. gentlemen on this side as well as on the other side of the House, that the traffic tonnage of the Canadian National lines is chiefly made up of agricultural products, and that these products consist almost wholly of wheat tonnage from the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. But this statement shows that in 1923 the products of agriculture carried by the Canadian National system amounted to 11,600,000 tons—I am allowing the odd figures to go because they are confusing at times; 11,769,000 tons in 1924, and 11,624,000 tons in 1925. In fact the tonnage of agricultural products carried over the National lines in 1925 was less than in 1924 and also less than in 1923. Then the products of the mines also ran down from twenty million tons in 1923 to seventeen million in 1924 and eighteen million in 1925. The products of the forest, including pulp, paper and that sort of thing, remained practically the same. Of a total tonnage carried by the railways in 1923 amounting to 57,248,338, only 6,008,725 tons were of wheat from any part of the country; in 1924, of 52,498,614 tons carried, only 5,317,519 were of wheat, and in 1925, out of 54,999,257 tons, only 5,682,992 were of wheat.

I hope the Minister of Railways will some day, before the close of the session, be so kind as to enlighten our ignorance as to the real cost of carrying wheat over the National lines. There was a return brought down in this House showing that in 1923 wheat was carried at a loss of about $6,000,000 by the National lines, and that in 1924 the loss was approximately the same. I find that in his evidence before the Board of Railway Commissioners at a hearing in March, Mr. F. J. Watson, of the Canadian National lines, repeated this statement under oath. I therefore think it is expedient, in order that we may thoroughly ascertain the real facts, that the Minister of Railways should give us the best information available from the officials of the railway company with regard to the cost of carrying wheat and the revenues derived therefrom. But in any case the Canadian National railway lines in 1925 carried 416,000 tons of wheat less than in 1923. They did carry 365,000 tons more than in 1924, but inasmuch as the wheat tonnage carried was only about one-tenth of the total tonnage, there is little to sustain the contention that the prosperity of the Canadian National Railways is largely or almost entirely dependent upon the transportation to the seaboard of the wheat production of the central west. The following is the table referred to:

9 p.m.

Revenue Tonnage of Canadian National Railways

Tons carried	1923	1924	1925
Products of agriculture	11,638,819	11,769,288	11,624,809
Products of animals	1,677,526	1,583,761	1,571,114
Products of mines	20,115,185	17,426,522	18,097,528
Products of forests	9,851,666	9,154,706	9,515,143
Manufactures and miscellaneous	13,964,042	12,564,337	14,190,663
Total tons	57,248,338	52,489,614	54,999,257
Tons wheat included above in agriculture	6,008,725	5,317,519	5,682,992

The prosperity of these lines in the west is to a large extent bound up with wheat production at present. I am not saying and do not intend to say one word against giving every possible assistance to encourage wheat production in western Canada; I am not advocating any increase in the tariff on wheat in any new rate structure which may be devised; but the Minister of Railways says that the difficulty surrounding the National railway lines will never be solved except by an increase in the traffic over these lines. That is perfectly true, and I say to the minister that he need never look to the production of wheat in the west and its transportation at present rates to solve these difficulties and make the Canadian National Railways self-sustaining. The difficulty with the Canadian National lines and the reason they do not show an increase in tonnage is because of the fact that the domestic production of industry in this country is being demoralized and destroyed from year to year, or if not destroyed, curtailed in every possible way. If you look into any increase in tonnage of this kind, in every case it will be found to be a short haul from some American city to a Canadian city across the border.

Mr. FORKE: Would the hon. gentleman allow a question? Does he not think the production of about $900,000,000 worth of new wealth through wheat and other products of the west will have a great deal to do with railway improvement?

Mr. CAHAN: It will, if you pay the cost of transportation.

Mr. FORKE: The circulation of $900,000,000 of new money.

Mr. CAHAN. We do not obtain from the northwest $900,000,000 worth of new wealth. If my hon. friend will take the entire agricultural production, then the cost of that production, he will get down to the net wealth.

Mr. FORKE: Say the net wealth, then.

Mr. CAHAN: The net wealth is a good deal less than the amount suggested by my hon. friend. That, I say, is a very great advantage to this country, but so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned this production does not supply in tonnage one-tenth of the total carried by these lines at present, and rather than look solely to an increase of the one-tenth from the west, if the government would look to an increase of the remaining nine-tenths—

Mr. FORKE: I do not like to interfere too much, but I would like to point out—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. FORKE: If the hon. member does not wish me to interrupt, I will sit down. Has he taken into consideration the return traffic westward provided by wheat?

Mr. CAHAN: I am quite willing to grant that. There are 2,000,000 people in the three central western provinces, I believe, and of this number I think from 250,000 to 300,000 are growing grain in considerable quantity. I will admit that the consumption of these 2,000,000 people gives a considerable traffic to the railways, the larger part of that traffic being a short haul north and south across the American border. But hon. gentlemen have forgotten altogether that there are seven other millions of people in this country; that we have in British Columbia, which is not a wheat growing country, and in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes, 7,000,000 people who consume, man for man, woman for woman and child for child, quite as much as the per capita consumption of the people who reside in the central west. If these 7,000,000 people are encouraged, if they are allowed to earn a sufficient income to live well, they will give quite as much per capita employment to the National railways as will the supporters and friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba. That is all I am saying. I am not disparaging at all our wheat production. You have never heard from me intentionally any word of disparagement. I am simply trying to point out to hon. gentlemen, if I may use a vulgar phrase, that they are not "the only pebbles on the beach" in this country; there are some other interests which must be considered.

Mr. DUNNING: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question just for the sake of clarity? In arriving at the figures he used relating to the proportion of wheat tonnage—I think wheat was the commodity he spoke of—did he take merely the gross tonnage of the railroad, or did he take a standard of comparison per ton mile? In other words, did he take a ton mile or the gross total? There is a very important distinction to be drawn there.

Mr. CAHAN: I dare say there is. I was simply taking the returns brought down by the hon. gentleman and laid on the table of the House respecting the number of tons carried.

Mr. DUNNING: I may point out that my hon. friend was speaking of the short haul. If he was just taking the gross tons carried, a ton carried between two stations counts just as much in those figures as a ton carried from the head of the lakes to the Atlantic seaboard, or from some point in the west to Vancouver, and the picture drawn is consequently not a correct one.

Mr. CAHAN: I know that a ton carried between two stations means just as much per ton as the carriage of a ton of wheat from the entire west to the seaboard. I had occasion to look into the matter the other day in connection with this question of freight rates, and a friend of mine, who is engaged in sending salt, dried and smoked fish from Nova Scotia to the west, pointed out an interesting fact. What did he find? He found that the fisherman in Norway can send his salt, smoked and dried fish from a Norwegian port to Vancouver, up to Calgary and on to Medicine Hat, at a less rate than it costs to send exactly the same article from Halifax to Medicine Hat, or to Calgary, if you please. It is this whole freight structure that is so discouraging to many people in the east. I agree that in the case of the long haul great consideration must be shown. But some consideration must also be shown to the people who send their products over the short haul. Now, Sir Henry Thornton in his report says:

> The decrease in short haul traffic is no doubt due to general business depression during the earlier months of the year.

That general depression is shown by the fact that the industries of this country have not been able to produce and to put on the cars, in the case of many factories, so large a tonnage as they had been doing during the last ten years, or even during the last three or four years.

Mr. DUNNING: Have you looked at the earnings for the first four months of this year?

Mr. CAHAN: I will deal with the earnings of the first four months of this year in a moment. I am dealing now with the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have undertaken to make it appear to this whole country that the railway tonnage of 1925 showed a remarkable increase of prosperity throughout this country, and I am showing by their actual figures, which are available to me down to December 31, 1925, that they do not indicate such a general increase in domestic prosperity, especially when one bears in mind the seven millions of population who reside outside of the three wheat producing provinces.

To what, then, is due the improvement in net earnings? It certainly is not due to the carrying of more tonnage over the National lines. It certainly is not due to any considerable increase in the freight revenue as compared, for instance, with 1923. It is not due to any increase in manufacturing products and the miscellaneous assortment of goods carried. And here I should like to put a comparative statement on record in that connection, showing revenue and expenses under different heads for the years 1923, 1924 and 1925.

The statement is as follows:

Canadian National Railways

	1923	1924	1925
Revenue
Freight	$185,240,896 71	$171,045,297 89	$180,482,543 54
Passenger	39,285,318 14	37,233,998 44	36,618,481 66
Mail	3,543,078 11	3,595,261 61	3,554,200 23
Miscellaneous	25,066,194 65	23,713,624 61	24,315,977 18
Total	$253,135,487 61	$235,588,182 55	$244,971,202 61
Expenses
Mantenance of ways and structures	$ 44,778,445 45	$ 44,039,965 51	$ 43,006,813 70
Maintenance of equipment	52,176,320 13	47,972,444 24	47,902,092 16
Traffic	5,792,928 06	6,892,751 22	6,726,472 90
Transportation	120,302,450 60	110,085,033 62	106,477,437 08
Miscellaneous	2,304,105 65	2,381,469 56	2,253,050 54
General	8,063,390 52	7,633,834 05	7,223,773 87
Transportation for investment credit	712,801 88	661,567 13	882,852 43
	$232,704,838 53	$218,343,931 07	$212,706,787 82

It will be noted that the total income from freight in 1923 was $185,000,000, in round numbers. It decreased in 1924 to $171,000,000, but increased in 1925 to $180,000,000, still $5,000,000 less than in 1923. The freight passenger traffic ran down from $39,000,000, in round numbers, in 1923 to $37,000,000 in 1924 and $36,000,000 in 1925, showing that in freight and in passengers the revenue was not increasing. How was it the Canadian National Railways apparently made so favourable and satisfactory a report during the present year? It is due to the fact that expenses were cut down in certain particulars. For instance, maintenance of ways and structures are down by about $1,770,000. Now the expenditure on maintenance of ways and structures may be brought down by a million or two million dollars, but the real matter of interest is whether ways and structures are kept up to the proper standard on those lines. I do not pretend to have any technical or expert knowledge about the matter, but certainly the Canadian National Railways must prepare, in renewing their trestle work and their bridges, for an expenditure not only of tens of millions but running up to at least one hundred millions or more within the not distant future.

An hon. MEMBER: It is about due now.

Mr. CAHAN: And before I am satisfied that in the year in which there was a great election campaign that reduction in maintenance of ways and structures was justified, I want to know whether the ways and structures were kept up to a reasonable standard during the year, and in dealing with these railways we wish to know—

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend permit me to answer now?

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly.

Mr. DUNNING: The expenditure on maintenance of ways and structures last year by the Canadian National amounted to $43,000,000, as compared with $35,000,000 expended for the same purpose by the Canadian Pacific. The decrease on the Canadian National was $1,033,000; the decrease on the Canadian Pacific was $1,800,000.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, but does my hon. friend ever go over these two lines? I have gone over them time after time, and there is no comparison between the two systems.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The whole question of comparison is of course the rate per mile expenditure in connection with maintenance of way and structures. I have the figures, and perhaps the hon. minister would like to hear them. They are as follows:

	Canadian Pacific	Canadian National
1924..	$2,042 per mile	$1,984 per mile
1925..	1,862 per mile	1,942 per mile

The Canadian National is by a little the greater this year.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. DUNNING: That is my whole point. I did not happen to have the statement and I am glad my hon. friend has given the figures. They show that an effort is being made to keep up the property.

Mr. CAHAN: With all due deference to the present Minister of Railways and to the ex-Minister of Finance, no man who has lived with engineers at his elbow, as I have done; who has sat on the rear end of trains going over the two lines, observing the tremendous amount of trestle work on the Canadian National railways on the section through the mountains, can fail to realize that the expenditure in keeping up the trestle work to any standard must be very much greater per mile on the Canadian National line than upon the Canadian Pacific railway. That is the point I wish to make.

Now there was another decrease in the maintenance of equipment, from $52,176,000 in 1923 down to $47,972,000 in 1924, and further down to $47,902,000 in 1925. Any shareholder or director would want to have detailed information before he would be able to ascertain whether or not those decreases were justified. According to the notes I have of the statement made by the Minister of Railways, we are now to make large appropriations for equipment. I notice one of his statements of principal payments on equipment gives an amount of $7,397,000 during the present year, and on betterments and equipments another capital expenditure of $1,500,000. I do not say it is so, but there is good ground for the inquiry as to whether, during the last year, maintenance of equipment was not kept down with a view to very considerable larger expenditures during the present year upon equipment.

Mr. DUNNING: That matter can be dealt with by the committee. I hope my hon. friend will see that the committee makes every inquiry with regard to it.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not on the committee. I hope they will look into that matter, because there are very pertinent and relevant questions that should be asked by the members of the opposition. I would also suggest that the committee should ask certain questions in regard to transportation costs. As between 1923 and 1925 there was an increase, as shown by the returns, of something like $11,800,000 in net operating revenue, and yet I find that transportation costs have been brought down from $120,000,000 in 1923 to $106,500,000, in round numbers in 1925, showing that more than the entire increase in net operating revenue comes out of the reduction in transportation costs. That is a matter with respect to which obviously the House should have some explanation, either from the Minister of Railways or from the officials. I am not suggesting for one moment that the Minister of Railways should necessarily be in a position to explain this matter. I think he did excellently in presenting his report to-day, and if he continues in office for another year probably we will have more expert evidence from him personally in this matter.

Sir Henry Thornton does not give credit to the improved commercial condition and increased prosperity of the country for the improvement which he makes in his net operating. He says:

> In the face of the decreased business which obtained during the greater part of 1925, every effort in the direction of economy was put forth and maintained throughout the whole of the year.

He certainly has failed, so far as the report goes, to find any evidence of greatly increased domestic prosperity. I am prepared to give him all credit for that, so far as credit is due, but before the House and the country can form any accurate opinion as to whether credit is due, we certainly should have full explanation with respect to these items before the special committee that is to hear the evidence and then report to this House.

I have not the pleasure of the acquaintance of Sir Henry Thornton. I believe he is a very expert political propagandist. I judge that from what I see in the press. Whether he is a thoroughly competent railway manager is yet to be proved, but this House and the country is prepared to give him every reasonable opportunity to disclose his ability in this direction, and if the government will only assist in promoting the general industrial prosperity of these eastern provinces, I for one feel sure that no matter how extravagant the operation of the Canadian National lines may be, this country in prosperous times would give such increased tonnage and increased passenger traffic to those lines that they could wipe out the annual deficit with which they are now overwhelmed.

Last year, as compared with the year ending December 31, 1924, the products of agriculture carried by the Nationel lines decreased by 144,479 tons, and animal products decreased by 12,647 tons. The products of the mines increased, as did the products of the forest, but the increase in products of the mines was largely due to increased importations from abroad. While the total of manufactured products and miscellaneous items increased, I find that this increase was largely due to importations of petroleum and petroleum products, bar and sheet iron and structural steel from abroad, household goods and second-hand furniture which Canadian emigrants were carrying with them out of the country; and, in addition, our increased export of wood pulp which might under a proper regime be manufactured into paper products in this country. From the detailed examination I made I could find nothing to indicate any considerable increase in our domestic trade, which is relatively of far more importance to Canada than our foreign trade can ever possibly be.

Dealing with revenue freight on the Canadian National lines, I find that it decreased from 18,500,000,000 ton miles in 1923 to 16,900,000,000 ton miles in 1924, a decrease of 8-⅔ per cent, and that it again increased to 18,000,000,000 ton miles in 1925, or about 500,000,000 ton miles less than in 1923.

There is one other matter which I would like to mention and then I will close. The Canadian National Railways own more than two-thirds of the stock of the Central Vermont Railway, which in itself operates about 500 miles of railway in the United States. I can see no reason why the statement of the Central Vermont line should not be included in the annual statement of the Canadian National Railways. It is as much a part of the Canadian National railway system as any of the roads mentioned in this report, and yet this annual report for the year ended March 31, 1925 may be read through from beginning to end without disclosing to the reader or to the country the fact that the Canadian National railway system owns and controls 500 miles of railway in the United States which is operating at a deficit of some $800,000 a year, a deficit which must be borne by the Canadian National railway system. It is only fair to the House and to the country that in future the statement of the Central Vermont railway should be included in the annual report of the Canadian National railway system.

I have moved for a return in connection with the Central Vermont railway prior to December 31, 1925, and I have not yet obtained it, but in answer to a question the Minister of Railways and Canals disclosed the fact that the net income deficit of the Central Vermont Railway for the year ended December 31, 1925, amounted to $822,755.29. That amount must be added to the deficit shown in the report of the Canadian National railway system. For the year ended December 31, 1924, its deficit amounted to $897,062.51 or a little better, it is true, than for the year ended December 31, 1923, when its deficit was $1,081,675. As I say, I see no reason why these deficits should be excluded from the report of the Canadian National Railways, especially in view of the official statement of the Deputy Minister of Railways in his report of September 15, 1925, to the effect that:

> The practice of bringing down separate statements of operation of component parts of the system will, after the issue of this report, in all probability be a thing of the past.

I hope in future that can be said in truth and in fact. The country demands to know the truth and the whole truth. The country must, at an early date, make up its mind upon the various suggestions, plans, proposals or schemes advanced for dealing with the Canadian National railway system, and in order that it may come to an intelligent decision either upon the proposals which the Minister of Railways will bring down at another time or upon other proposals which we find set forth in the press, it is necessary that we have the whole facts in as clear, concise and intelligent a form as it is possible to give them.

Dealing with the Central Vermont Railway, I find that its funded indebtedness on December 31, 1924 amounted to $32,176,023. That is not included in the statement of the Canadian National Railway. I find that its accumulated deficits on December 31, 1924, amounted to $4,292,854. I have not the returns for the present year ended December 31, 1925, but the total annual deficit of the Canadian National Railways, including the Central Vermont Railway, is shown by the last report of the Deputy Minister of Railways to be $52,779,350 in 1923 and $44,757,481 in 1924. Taking the answers made by the Minister of Railways, to my recent questions, I find that the net income deficit of the Canadian National Railways and the Central Vermont Railways for the year ended December 31, 1925, aggregated $42,267,519. In view of statements which have gone to the press showing that we are growing out of our railway deficits and gradually solving our railway problem by the improvement, it is stated, in the general prosperous condition of the country and by cutting down of certain expenditures for the past year, the people of the country have been led to believe that we are nearly surmounting our difficulties. They do not realize that this railway which is on our hands in the United States and the Canadian National railway system in Canada had together an aggregate deficit of more than $42,000,000 last year.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. DUNNING: I understood my hon. friend to charge me with a lack of frankness. I placed on Hansard this afternoon complete details of the whole matter.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no doubt the minister did. I have not had an opportunity to examine his figures, but I am expecting him to be more candid than some of his predecessors, and I hope he will give to the country full information with regard to these matters so that there may be no misunderstanding whatever.

In dealing with the financial reconstruction of the road, the hon. gentleman suggested, in keeping with the report of Sir Henry Thornton, that the indebtedness due to the government in respect of accummulated interest and for part of the loans made by the Dominion to the railways should be cut down. It was a great pity, it seemed, that the Canadian National Railways in their annual reports should be forced to tell the truth, even though it were not the whole truth, with regard to their financial condition! I would suggest that it does not help the railways nor does it help the country to transfer these liabilities from one account to another where they may be overlooked and probably forgotten. In the pharmacies, as we know, when certain medicines are retailed, the druggists are compelled by law to place upon the label the figure of a skull and crossbones, and I think it would be well for this country if the skull and crossbones of these expenditures, some of them very unfortunate, which have been incurred by Dominion governments in the past, were kept in mind by the Canadian people in order to obviate the pursuit of similarly reckless courses in the future. My hon. friend suggested that even he might be compelled to make some expenditures of that nature. He suggested that certain colonization roads should be considered separately from those Canadian National lines where there is a greater density of traffic.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not make any such suggestion.

Mr. CAHAN: I think I am mistaken in my notes; the suggestion was made by another hon. gentleman. At any rate, there was a suggestion to that effect and I may as well discuss it. The suggestion is that certain roads which may be considered as performing the functions of colonization railways should not be expected to earn their operating expenses for many years to come, and that the deficit created by interest accruing on capital expenditures in connection with the construction of these roads, and the deficit in connection with ordinary operating expenses, ought not to be stated so clearly and definitely in the public returns. We must, it is said, expect deficits of that kind. Now I submit that until this country is in a more prosperous condition industrially, and in a better position to bear the burden of taxation which now rests upon it, we should place a limit upon the further construction of colonization roads and of extensions to the railroads already built. In my opinion, under present conditions, such colonization roads and extensions thereto should within a reasonable time, say within five, six or seven years after construction, offer a reasonable prospect of paying operating expenses. In this country we should certainly reduce these capital expenditures until we are on our feet again. I would not eliminate all extensions, some of which may be necessary; there are extensions which undoubtedly will pay. But the extensions to existing roads which in the present financial condition of Canada hold out no reasonable promise of paying their way within an appreciable term of years or even within the present generation, should be cut out entirely, until in population, in industry, in commerce, and in trade we have caught up with the railway structure which we have at the moment from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): The reports of the railways for the year 1925 show a tremendous increase in the trade of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EVANS: Hon. gentlemen laugh at that, but it is a well established fact; indeed, our railway earnings constitute a sound barometer of the trade of the country every year. But this advance, like other trade increases in Canada, is shown to have been due chiefly to the prosperous state of agriculture during the past year. The Canadian Pacific Railway statement, like that of the Canadian National system, is proof that the profits earned by the railways have resulted from the hauling of the wheat of western Canada. A study of the two railway statements should be an effective answer to those who have made the erroneous statement that $60,000,000 more could have been earned by our railways in the hauling of Canadian wheat, and the public will surely realize that there is still some room for a reduction in rates, even both ways. There is no doubt that the Crownest rates on wheat and flour should have come into full force last year, as they were intended to.

After paying all dividends the Canadian Pacific Railway had a surplus of $6,567,690, and their accomulated surplus is now $35,000,000. This, in conjunction with the reports of earnings month by month, will prove beyond question that the carrying of western wheat is the most profitable business our railways are engaged in. I have here a list of the monthly earnings of the Canadian National Railways and of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In 1925 the lowest gross earnings for any month were $11,786,710 in the month of February; in the month of January they amounted to $11,896,513, and in May, $12,467,612. The largest earnings of any month last year were those of December, $19,818,544; October came next with $19,569,188. The net earnings are in proportion mostly with the gross earnings, those for the month of October being $7,444,027, as compared with January, $583,768. This surely is conclusive evidence that the moving of the western crop is the most profitable business that the railways engage in. I have also the figures for 1923, and they are relatively very much the same. The greatest earnings were in October, $23,769,733, with net earnings of $8,160,988, while the lowest were in January, only $720,000. I repeat, this is conclusive evidence that the railways are not losing money hauling western wheat eastward or westward. Indeed in the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the president has this to say:

> The relatively small increase in gross earnings is largely accounted for by the depression which existed in Canada during the first part of the year, the effects of which on general traffic were only overcome by the excellent harvests, to which is largely due an increase of $10,354,946 in the gross earnings during the last half of the year.

Then again, in the report of the Canadian National Railways which we have before us the management also emphasize the crop conditions as the means by which the earnings have been made:

> The movement of the large western crop made itself felt towards the end of the year, with a consequent increase in gross revenue of 3.9 per cent for the year.

I do not like to hear hon. gentlemen making statements which are calculated to set one part of the country against the other. In fact the member for Kent (Mr. Chaplin), speaking in this House on May 11, stated that the Canadian National Railways had earned over $32,000,000, but, he added, not one cent of this was earned by hauling the western wheat crop. His words can be found at page 3303 of Hansard. What is a statement like that calculated to do, but to set one part of the country against the other? And there is no foundation whatsoever for such a statement.

There is another feature of the railway problem to which I want particularly to address myself. One of the most prominent planks in the Progressive platform for many years has been the nationalization of public utilities. In 1910, when the farmers of five provinces visited Ottawa, public ownership of public utilities was one of the things they asked for, and at that time public ownership of terminal elevators was a live question. The railway situation as we have it to-day has long been foreseen by the organized agriculturists of the Dominion; at least years ago we warned the country that our railway system could not be left in private hands and made to serve the best interests of this Dominion, particularly the interests of the primary producers It is a plank in the Progressive platform to-day that all railways and their subsidiaries, such as telegraphs and express, should be owned and operated by the government in the interests of the people. We have never yet had reason to change our attitude on this question. The railway situation to-day is such that it carries with it a serious menace to the permanent prosperity of this country. Indeed, it is not too much to say that the time is at hand when the public will demand something better than we are now getting year by year.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Hear, hear.

Mr. EVANS: We are in such a slough at present regarding railway transportation that only by an unprecedented prosperity extending over a number of years shall we be able under the present railway arrangements to keep the railways, and perhaps the country, solvent. It is true that 1925 has seen a great improvement in the earnings of the National Railways, but we must not forget that it was an exceptional year in wheat production, and we cannot expect such a condition every year. If a series of adverse years came, such as we have experienced in western Canada more than once, railway earnings might be impaired to the extent that even the solvency of the Canadian Pacific might be threatened. Then the country would be called on to shoulder the burden of taking over that system in its adversity as we had to do the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk railways; and the former at one time threatened to drag down into insolvency one of the strongest banks in Canada, if not in the whole world. To do that at a time when this country would be hard put to it for money for administrative purposes, to meet maturing loans—the payment of which we keep putting off from time to time—for the National Railways might cause us serious concern. It would be better to do this on a rising tide of trade and prosperity than in a time of commercial depression and adversity.

When we survey the British Empire we find that all the overseas dominions except Canada own and operate their railways. It is to this fact I think that we can attribute the close competition that some of our sister dominions are giving us in natural products to-day. Every year our railway problem increases in intensity, until now it is seriously handicapping the primary industries of the country. I am sure it will be admitted that the live stock industry even in Ontario cannot be profitably carried on under present conditions, to say nothing of hoping to keep up an export cattle trade from western Canada and pay the rates we are now paying.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If my hon. friend will permit a question,—how do the rates in Canada compare with those of the government-owned railways in Australia?

Mr. EVANS: I have not the figures before me, but I do not see that my hon. friend's question has much to do with what I am now discussing. One of our great systems is to-day earning dividends of 10 per cent and 12 per cent, besides each year adding a large sum of money to the accumulated surplus, while the people have to tax themselves to make good the deficits of their own system. I do not think that is a very desirable condition.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are not the rates the same?

Mr. EVANS: The rates are the same but the conditions are not the same. No one knows better than does the hon. gentleman that much of the Canadian National system is scattered in a way the Canadian Pacific system is not, and that many more colonization roads are kept up by the National system. But the foolish competition and duplication which we are tolerating to-day is unceasingly increasing the debt on the National system, on which interest must be paid. Indeed, unless trade increases tremendously, the nearer the National system comes to paying its way the harder will the privately owned system be put to it to pay its 10 per cent. Under our present arrangement one system cannot prosper except at the expense of the other, unless and until our agricultural production is increased to a much greater degree, which at present is very largely prevented by high freight rates.

The present report is good, but we must bear in mind that last year we raised over 400,000,000 bushels of wheat which had to be transported. When we consider the purchasing power throughout this country of a good crop, it is not to be wondered that we are facing this year a more favourable situation than formerly obtained. A total sum of about $76,000,000 has been earned on the two systems this year, and indeed it is not too much to say that with a saving in operating expenses, which might be expected by amalgamation, and the elimination of all duplication, a favourable rate of interest might have been paid on all capital expenditure.

When our railways are run in a manner becoming to a democratic country there is no doubt that all rates on both long and short hauls can be lowered, and our exports increased because of the easy movement to the seaboard of what we have to sell. Industry really depends on the ease with which our products can move to the markets of the world.

Belgium has owned and operated her railways from the beginning, and there is no sign of a desire to change. Government ownership of the railways obtains to-day in some of the most diverse countries and among some of the most diverse peoples. Turkey, Russia, Switzerland, Austria, Germany and India all own and operate their railways; they realize that railways, like highways, should be owned, operated and controlled in the interests of the people rather than for private gain. Indeed, to me it would be just as reasonable for the province of Ontario to turn its splendid system of highways over to private individuals, to be maintained and operated by them for gain, as to have our railways in private hands. We have loaded our people with a scattered, over-capitalized concern, putting them as well under the disadvantage of competition from a privately owned enterprise.

Another feature with which we have to contend, with half our railways privately owned and half government owned, is the intrigue carried on in the interests of the privately owned company. We have seen branch line bills passed by this House and thrown out by the Senate, and to-day we can point to extensions of the privately owned concern which have been constructed practically on surveys first laid out by the Canadian National system. So I say that our present railway situation cannot be considered as permanent. It will be better to make an amalgamation now than to wait until circumstances are intensified, or until we are forced to take that step.

There are several fundamental things to be considered in our railway problem to-day. It is a basic economic necessity that the people should retain control of the machinery through which they are subject to taxation. In this respect the railways serving this commonwealth should not be considered, as I said before, differently from the provincial system of highways. To provide and maintain a nation's means of communication is a function of sovereignty; it is an economic blunder, then, to permit private individuals to exploit the people through a public or national utility. Along with the Canadian National deficit, the excess earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway cannot be considered other than as a supertax on the people, wrung from the necessities of the nation, and there is no reason why this should be so. There is no better time than the present to bring both systems under government ownership and control, when means can be taken to cheapen transportation, and permanent economic methods of operation may be adopted.

10 p.m.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not think the members for Montreal are endeavouring to monopolize the early discussion of the railway question, for I can assure the House that I will be on my feet but a very few moments. Those who are familiar with the Bible, as I presume some of you are, will remember that in the book of Exodus Moses said to the Lord, "I am slow of speech, and of a slow tongue," and he suggested that Aaron, who was more fluent, should carry the messages. I am a Moses in that respect, and it is somewhat comforting to know that the House is not lacking in Aarons. I desire to join in the felicitations extended to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), on the occasion of what I suppose it is fair to call his maiden speech, for the temperate tone of that speech and the absence of acrimony and of anything of a partisan nature. It does not, in my opinion detract from the merits of the minister's speech that he followed closely the annual report of Sir Henry Thornton.

I do not intend to go into any analysis of the earnings of the railway or of the character of its traffic. We know that the first six months of 1925 were lean months, and that the second six months, in consequence of the very abundant harvest, were fat months, and that the railway emerged from the year in considerably better financial condition than in 1924. The hon. member for St. Lawrence St. George (Mr. Cahan) has, in considerable detail, analyzed the financial statement, and I am bound to say that I was impressed by the assertion of the hon. member for East Algoma, (Mr. Nicholson) that in estimating the items chargeable against operating expenses several that should fairly be taken into consideration had been omitted. But if the basis of comparison for the last three or four years has been the same I would not attach a very great deal of importance to that point. Nor am I disposed to discuss the question of public ownership alluded to by the hon. member who has just spoken. I am one who firmly, and I fear unalterably, supports the principle of private ownership under government control. I thought when a recent Conservative government acquired what is now the Canadian National railway system a mistake had been made—that those roads should have been allowed to go through the hands of a receiver, and that their capital should undergo reorganization by that process. I do believe that not one mile of necessary railway in Canada would have ceased to be operated had that method been adopted. But it is fair to remember that if we have in the Canadian National railway to-day a white elephant upon our hands—though Sir Henry Thornton predicts that it may become somewhat different in hue—the policy of acquiring the various systems that now comprise the Canadian National Railways would never have become necessary but for the mad, insane,—aye criminally insane,—policy of the Liberal government in promoting and constructing thousands of miles of railway in excess of the requirements of Canada. We have heard a great deal of the failure of private ownership in the case of the Canadian Northern, of the Grand Trunk Pacific, of the old parent Grand Trunk if you like. But it was not private ownership that failed in the case of the Canadian Northern or the Transcontinental. It was the imbecility of the government that caused the failure of these roads. Had the Liberal government contented itself with the single Transcontinental in competition with the Canadian Pacific there would have been reason to believe—indeed I think a strong probability—that the one road would have succeeded in spite of the difficulties that arose out of the war.

I am willing to accept the figures, and not go behind them, as to the net earnings of the Canadian National railways in 1925 amounting to some thirty two and a quarter million dollars. One of the reasons why I have attempted to address the House on this subject is my fear of an early effort being made to write down the capital charge of the Canadian National railway. Sir Henry Thornton in his report for last year—as he also did, as hon. gentlemen will remember, in his report for 1924—alludes to that question. He says:

> During the year a searching examination of the company's financial structure has been under way. . . . The work is being performed effectively and it is expected that, during the current year, definite proposals having for their object the placing of the company's finances on a sound and permanent basis will be presented.

What sounder basis could the finances of the Canadian National Railways have than the credit of the Dominion of Canada? The Minister of Railways hinted at the probability —I do not say the desirability, perhaps possibility would be the better word—at the possibility of such readjustments of the finances of the Canadian National Railways being made as would involve a writing down of the capital charge. Now my point is that if you wrote down the capital account of the Canadian National Railways—presently upwards of $2,000,000,000—if you wrote it down to a dollar you would not save the taxpayers of Canada one single copper. What you would do is this and this only—you would transfer the item from the railway accounts to the accounts of the Dominion of Canada, but every liability of the railway whether to the Dominion government—which is a book-keeping item—or to the investors in Canada and elsewhere who hold the bonds, every charge arising would still have to be paid by the taxpayers of this country. What I fear, and greatly fear, is this: That our friends to the left, known as the Progressives, and others, not merely in the western provinces but in other parts of Canada, having the capital of the road written down, we will say to $500,000,000, and an annual statement of receipts and expenditures showing that interest on $500,000,000 had been earned and that a substantial surplus of five or ten million dollars had accrued over and above that charge, would immediately and incessantly demand that the carrying charges be reduced because of these circumstances. We know already from the events of the present session the power of the Progressive party over this parliament. And if the government so manipulated the finances in connection with the capital charges of the Canadian National railway that an apparent surplus was produced in the operation of the road, I am as satisfied as I am of my own existence that that party would say to the government, "You must have no surplus on government railways, but you must reduce the rate to the point where income and expenditure balance." But all the while the taxpayers of Canada would be required to pay precisely the same amount as they are paying to-day.

I fear our western friends are sometimes prone to forget that in connection with the organization of the Canadian National railways, the eastern provinces did not get a square deal, and I will explain what I mean by that. If my memory serves me rightly, the Minister of Railways this afternoon stated that something like $170,000,000 of guarantees in connection with the construction of the Canadian Northern and the Transcontinental had been given by the four western provinces. The province of Quebec and the Maritimes did not give one single dollar, yet when the Dominion acquired this system all the liability attached to those guarantees fell upon the people of Canada at large. If the proper course had been adopted the liability would have fallen where it belonged, upon those who gave the guarantee, namely, the western provinces. I do think it is only fair that our friends of the party to my left, when they are criticizing what they think is a lack of generosity on the part of people in the central provinces, should remember that fact.

I am unable and have always been unable to understand why the Canadian government should operate unprofitable railways in the United States. The case of the Central Vermont was cited by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. The people of Canada last year had to meet a deficit in operation in respect of that road, over and above interest charges, of upwards of $800,000, in order that the people of the United States, where the larger mileage of that system is located, might have rates so low as to be unprofitable. Take the Island Pond and Portland branch of the old Grand Trunk railway, which is now operated by the Canadian National, and consider the inconsistency and the anomaly of the policy of the government in respect to that piece of road. The Minister of Finance announced in his budget—and the statement was received with applause on both sides of the House—that hereafter the preferential tariff would apply only to goods imported direct into Canadian ports. In doing that he struck a blow at the Portland end of the Canadian National Railway system. I do not complain of the government's policy in the encouraging of trade through our own Maritime and eastern Canadian ports. On the contrary I entirely approve of it, and I would go so far as to say that not only should imports through our own ports be encouraged, but that exports also should be encouraged. But if we could succeed in a national policy of that kind; if we had strength enough in Canada to stand up for Canada alone, what would become of that section of the Canadian National railway between Island Pond and Portland? That railway is the property of the people of Canada. Why should we continue to travel with this old man of the sea on our back in the shape of an unprofitable road? I complain that there does not seem to be courage or activity enough on the part of ministers of the crown to grapple with questions of that kind and apply to them the Canadian doctrine and the Canadian doctrine only.

These are the two points that I desire to present to the House. I emphasize the danger of writing down the capital of the Canadian National, which danger will become a menace when a surplus upon a fictitious capital compels a reduction of railway rates to a point below service at cost. While I hold no brief for the Canadian Pacific Railway, I say that no proper consideration of the railway problem in Canada can be given if we disregard the services that the Canadian Pacific Railway have rendered the people of this country.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I could not use the time to any advantage to carry through a further analysis of the figures contained in the annual statement of the Canadian National Railways. Such analysis would be worthless, because it has already been well done by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). I do not wish to reflect at all on the fairness or the care with which the minister himself presented the figures which are embodied in the annual report. My only comment of an adverse character, if it may be called such, would be this: that his statement to-day was too much a compilation of the figures which already appear in that report, contained too much in the way of mathematics and too little in the way of illumination. While we are blundering or burrowing through the trees and the underbrush we are apt to lose sight of the woods, and I am afraid the House, during the statement of the minister, lost its conception of the great big outlines of the situation in a mass of necessary, but at the same time not very useful, details.

I take a very keen interest in the annual railway discussion because it has to me an historic aspect. I watch with curiosity the conduct of members of the government and their supporters while the colours are being painted of the progress of the National system. This system has a history; we became its owners after a series of fatalities of a dimension unprecedented in history of a country the strength of ours, railway fatalities which shook the very foundation of our finances and clouded our future. Out of the chaos of it all emerged the present great system.

I am in accord wholly, or almost wholly, with what has been so gracefully said by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White). As to the cause of those calamities there can be now no question whatever; each and every system which came to its crash came because of blunders of public policy to which those systems became a party. The only feature in which I must differ from the hon. member from Mount Royal is this, that of the alternatives more or less ghastly which presented themselves, the only one that after very thorough review seemed to be acceptable at all was that of amalgamation under government ownership. He seems to feel that we might have preferred the alternative of liquidation. In respect to one of the systems we did accept the alternative of liquidation; I refer to the Grand Trunk Pacific, which seven years ago last March fell into the hands of the receiver. Who was the receiver? Who was there standing around ready to receive? It was in a position where it had to be operated; there was no alternative in our control except operation. Towns and cities were built along its lines; other industries depended upon it; but there was nobody on the horizon ready to take the position of receiver, provide the money and run it. The Dominion of Canada was the guarantor of millions of its bonds, and if anybody was to suffer by the reorganization of its finances we of course would be the first, if not indeed almost the only sufferers. Consequently, we became receivers; we are receivers to-day; the system is in liquidation yet. I would like to suggest to hon. members that we have not saved any money by the process of liquidation; nothing has been gained by the step. Supposing we had applied the same process to other systems; supposing we had applied it to the Canadian Northern; who would have taken up the Canadian Northern and operated it? Where was the philanthropic organization or corporation lying in wait ready to assume that responsibility? No voice was heard at that time, and if anyone had applied, the millions which first would have been squeezed out would have been the millions of the people of Canada, because we were guarantors of the Canadian Northern and we were compelled to become guarantors in order that the system might be rescued from a state of incompletion and worthlessness and brought to a state of completion and use.

The next was the case of the Grand Trunk. Why did the Grand Trunk approach a state of liquidation? What was the reason that the Grand Trunk, in the words of its president, "reached the end of its tether"? The reason was that the Grand Trunk was guarantor of the defunct Grand Trunk Pacific. The guarantees of the Grand Trunk to the Grand Trunk Pacific were so enormous that under them the Grand Trunk could struggle no longer. Of course it might have gone into liquidation also but what would have been the result? Those guarantees would all have been wiped away; somebody else would have owned the assets and the liabilities would have been removed. The Grand Trunk Pacific, the white elephant, would have been on our hands with no support for it at all. Who would have owned the assets? I pause to see if there is any suggestion from any hon. member as to who could have been the purchaser at the liquidator's sale. Is there any corporation in the mind of any hon. member? What other railway corporation was there in this Dominion? There was only one left. Whether that one would have purchased or not we do not know. If anyone can suggest anybody else who would have been the purchaser of the system as such under those conditions, undoubtedly his imagination and retrospect are powerful indeed.

We had a system truncated in western Canada with two lines protruding away into the east, ending nowhere, not connected in eastern Canada in such a way as to furnish any traffic to the railway at all. Would it have been the part of business for us to permit the only hope of gathering traffic in eastern Canada to go on the liquidator's block to be sold to the rival corporation? Those things need only to be stated to be understood. This was the only option. We were not anxious to rush into additional responsibilities; our responsibilities had already become terriffic at this time without further railway obligations, but circumstances were beyond our control. Those circumstances had been set going by the follies of ten years before; those circumstances were such that we had to deal with them, and in dealing with them we had only one course to pursue. The matter was one not of choice, but of the inevitable.

But the curiosity of the history does not end there. Though this situation was forced upon us, hon. gentlemen now members of the government pictured the step which we were taking as one of madness leading directly to financial chaos in Canada. Government ownership suddenly became not only a folly, but a crime; we were painted not as having crushed the life out of the poor British stockholder or bondholder, but rather as having conferred a great favour upon him and wasted millions of the money of the taxpayers of this country in unnecessary philanthropy to those British stockholders. A general election came on and not all hon. gentlemen opposite but the majority of them who were elected were elected because of denunciation of the step which we took one year, two years and three years before. They were elected on a platform of direct antagonism to government ownership in every form. The dire consequences of the folly, as they described it, which the late government had perpetrated was pictured in language lurid and memorable. I remember at that time being in Montreal when the billboards of that city were plastered with advertisements of Liberal candidates in the metropolis. One of these advertisements clings to memory very firmly. It was one prepared by the late member for St. Lawrence-St. George. His manly photograph was its principal feature. He was pictured with his arms folded, and below that picture there appeared this simple text: "I am against government ownership." Upon this declaration was he elected, and thus was the whole array elected. What has been the story since? I congratulate hon. members of the government upon the thoroughness of their conversion, and I congratulate them upon the fact that years of experience in office or of responsibility have not been in vain. And now this child whom they buffeted and beat, this child they took to their bosom. Of its parentage they boast and they proclaim it to be the hope of the country. They stand up now and in language of eloquence defend the whole principle and practice of government ownership.

I am glad to see anything that looks like a betterment of conditions in the Canadian National railway system. I believe the last year had something of improvement over the year before. I believe that, with the exception of one reverse, there has been a pretty general improvement ever since 1920—indeed, ever since the end of the year 1919. Large outlays were for some time essential. We took one road in complete dilapidation and another in semi-dilapidation; we took roads which were disjointed, never having been made to be operated together. And the process of conjunction necessarily was more or less difficult. It meant that sums had to be spent in resuscitation and improvement. New life was seen at the end of 1919, from which date up to the present time the system has progressed. And never was the progression so rapid as it was in the years 1920, 1921 and 1922. At the same time it is well to recall—for I have heard some remarkable utterances made in this House even during the present session still more remarkable statements in the course of the campaign—just how this process of amalgamation was effected. I have heard the late member for Regina declare that this government found the roads in a state of chaos and of severance one from another, with three or four different managements, one management overlapping the next; and that in the exercise of its great genius for organization the present administration had worked out a plan which had brought the railways together, this having accounted for the improvement noticeable to-day.

Well, what are the facts? Are hon. gentlemen opposite really responsible for any amalgamation at all? Is any alteration whatever in the railway policy of this country due to anything they have done? Have they done anything more than sedulously to pick out the footsteps of their predecessors, forgetting that they had reviled them and to try to follow them as carefully as possible? The whole plan of amalgamation was worked out by the late government; the whole legislation was put on the statute books by the parliament which preceded the election of 1921. And that legislation stands unchallenged to this hour. That legislation provided that the moment it could be done each and every system owned by the government should be brought into one great unit; and at the time the late government went out of office the execution of that legislation was all but complete, all branches of the railways now constituting the National system having been gathered in, with the single exception of the Grand Trunk. In respect of that exception a clause was there in the legislation which had been passed providing that, at the first opportunity which offered, the government should by order in council take steps to bring in the Grand Trunk. Why had it not been brought in before we went out of office? For the simple reason that this could not be done pending, not only the completion of the arbitration proceedings, but the execution of the arbitration award. This took place during that fall. There was an appeal, and that appeal had necessarily to be disposed of before the Grand Trunk could be brought into the National system. That appeal was not finally disposed of until shortly after or about the time this government came into power. They waited for another ten months before passing the order in council under the legislation which had been on the statute books for years providing for the incorporation into that great system of this last outstanding unit.

This is the history of the evolution of what is now the Canadian National Railways. We are glad to see any evidence of betterment, because betterment in the National Railways means betterment in the condition of the Canadian people. The National system is just another phase of the national activities of Canada, it is just another account on our national balance sheet. But while we are glad to see any improvement in our railways we do not want to be deceived merely by appearances, nor do we want to be misled by cunningly worded sentences. I am afraid we are not in so much better condition as so many hon. gentlemen imagine. I am impressed by the analysis made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, who pointed out that while we provided last year only $10,000,000 we find that the National Railways owe this year some $63,000,000 more than they owed a year ago. That is to say, at the end of 1925 they owed about $63,000,000 more than they owed at the end of 1924, and this in the form of funded, that is, long distance, liability. If one takes the other liabilities one finds that there was a still greater increase in the debt: the exact figures would be $65,798,349.62, taking into account some $2,000,000 extra of increase in other liabilities over other assets as compared with the year before. This is a serious increase in the public indebtedness of Canada—because it is public indebtedness. It does not matter whether the government as a committee of parliament or as an executive council has guaranteed the indebtedness or not; it is our indebtedness. Our representatives borrowed the money and we, standing behind those representatives, have to see that money paid. It is just as much our indebtedness as if we had borrowed it on the bonds of Canada and put it into the national treasury. This fact must be borne in mind.

Hon. members will recall that in the budget statement it was claimed—and for the present I do not dispute it—that the national debt account proper was reduced by $22,000,000. Very well. This phase of the national debt is increased by $65,000,000. I know that of that $65,000,000 $10,000,000 is loaned by the Dominion; therefore it has to be added to the first account, and it cannot be added to both. Deducting it we have $55,000,000 left. So that with $55,000,000 of an increase in one place and $22,000,000 of a diminution in another we have a net addition to the Canadian burden of $33,000,000. And we are so proud of the accomplishment of being $33,000,000 more in debt that we throw our hats in the air, kill the fatted calf, place an order with the liquor commission and reduce our taxes!

It is just possible to become too enthusiastic over the situation that confronts us, especially when we analyse the cold facts. I know the increase of the debt is not as much as it was the year before. I listened with some admiration to the skill with which the Minister of Railways informed us with enthusiasm that the increase in the debt was not as great this year as last, or last year as the year before, that we were almost improving—were not getting worse as fast as we had been. That is what it means. The year before the increase was $118,000,000; the year before that $116,000,000. I do not want to be taking credit where credit is not due, but I would certainly like to think that some lesson had been taught by the debates in this House last session, that the wild reign then prevailing in the National Railways was somewhat checked, and that now we are at least not going at the pace in capital expenditure that we were then. Still, it is serious enough. This country, with a debt so tremendous as that under which we groan, and adding to it this year on railway account $65,000,000, should not become over-enthusiastic and feel that money is water.

I do not think you can ever run a railway without some capital expenditure, but undoubtedly after the road was rehabilitated and put in the condition it is in to-day we ought to be able to get on with substantially less capital expenditure than we made last year. We are told: Oh we voted $50,000,000 for the railways last year, and they only needed $10,000,000. I could not help pausing in admiration of the finely palatable verbiage used by Sir Henry Thornton in connection with this matter. It is to be found at page 6:

> In the Appropriation Act for 1925 the sum of $50,000,000 was voted for Canadian National purposes during the (Dominion) fiscal year ending March 31, 1926. It has only been necessary to obtain $10,000,000 of this amount from the government. Payment of the balance has not been required, partly because of increased resources due to larger gross and net earnings than were expected, and partly as a result of substantial reductions in the purchase of materials and supplies, also partly by use of working capital.

Those of us who are outside the holy of holies of railway finance will be greatly impressed by that language. Let me read the next paragraph and see the light it throws upon that statement.

> In February 1925 there were issued $17,000,000 Canadian Northern 4½ per cent ten-year guaranteed gold bonds and $18,000,000 Canadian National 4½ per cent five-year guaranteed gold bonds. The $17,000,000 issue was practically speaking a refunding of two Canadian Northern issues, namely, $6,000,000 which matured in December 1924, and $11,000,000 which matured in March 1925.

The $18,000,000 was for new construction. In other words, we are first told that we did not need the $50,000,000 but only $10,000,000, the reason being improved conditions, increased resources, higher net earnings and the use of working capital. In the next breath we are told that $35,000,000 more was borrowed. In a word, we did not need the $50,000,000, we needed only $45,000,000; we borrowed $10,000,000 from the government and $35,000,000 from somewhere else. This is the residuum from the paragraph.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask you, on what security did the Canadian National borrow that $35,000,000? Are we to fold our arms and feel quite secure and indifferent to the whole situation because they borrowed it without the express guarantee of the government of Canada? Does anybody believe that the Canadian National could borrow the price of a used tie except on the security of the Canadian people? Did anyone ever hear of a corporation which does not pay, and cannot pay, one-half of its fixed charges going out into the money markets of the world and borrowing money at 4½ per cent? Did anyone ever hear of it in the world's history? The reason they were able to borrow the money was because the money lenders of the world knew that the Canadian National Railways represented the people of Canada, and that the people of Canada had to see that debt paid. It is our debt. So the result of this whole paragraph is simply what I have stated: We did not need the $50,000,000, we only needed $10,000,000 because we borrowed $35,000,000 somewhere else.

There is another paragraph which mystified me at first and afterwards amused me. It is on page 7, and I suggest to the minister that he never try to "paint the lily," that he never try to improve on the smoothness and the beautiful coating of the language of this report. When reserves of fuel or of ties are reduced, one would think it was something to be admitted in the report. If those reserves are reduced by a million dollars, it just means a million dollars more appears in the earnings account; if by two million dollars, why it means that there are two million dollars more to the credit of net earnings. This year we have an increased credit of net earnings, but we find in this paragraph that $7,876,460 of that amount was secured by selling off fuel, rails, ties and so forth. I do not say it was wrong to sell them, but I know that if we increase the net earnings by selling those stocks, it is only a fictitious increase. Now, one would think that would be stated in the report by way of admission, but wait until I read the beautiful diction in which this admission appears:

Expenditures on this account were considerably less—

That is, purchasing and stores.

—in 1925 than in 1924. During the year there was but little fluctuation in the price of materials. A determined effort was made to reduce stocks by close supervision and the development of improved methods. The quantities of materials and supplies on hand, including ties, fuel, rails, and so forth, at the end of the year amounted to $7,876,460.79 less than in 1924.

I do not think I ever knew a virtue to be made of necessity more skilfully than that.

Mr. EULER: Does the right hon. gentleman state seriously that earnings are increased by reason of the sale of stocks on hand, or any other assets?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It says so. Of course, they would be one of the expenses of running the road.

Mr. EULER: You are merely changing that asset into another form.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But it certainly is reflected in the increased net revenue.

Mr. EULER: That is different from earnings, though.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When you are boasting of net revenue you have to remember that you have $7,876,000 less coal.

Mr. EULER: There is a difference between earnings and revenue.

Mr. DUNNING: Not coal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, ties, fuel, rails.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I am pointing out. We must remember that we have that much less on hand, and it is because of that fact that our earnings are so much more. But, Mr. Speaker, there was one slip in the composition of this report. I look at page 8 and wonder where the skill of the draftsman passed to. He says frankly:

Passenger earnings decreased by $615,516.78, as compared with 1924 earinngs. The number of passengers carried showed a decrease of $1,032,641.

Why such a bald, crude statement as that? In accordance with the plan adopted in the rest of the report that passage should have read about like this. "The management was very much impressed with the extravagance of the general public in indulging in unnecessary passenger traffic, and a determined effort was made to curtail the propensities, especially of the poor, in this regard. The herculean efforts of the directorate met with great gratification, and $615,516.78 was saved to the Canadian public." Had this clause been worded as I have suggested this would have been in line with the plan adopted in the remainder of the report.

It is true that the earnings of the company were substantially increased over those of 1924, but compared with 1923 they are not as good; the result is some millions, I have not figured it out exactly, less than the result of 1923. Consequently it is not something to lose our heads over, and especially is that so when we read this most significant sentence, found on page 8:

> The Dominion government estimate for all grains in the Canadian grain crop for the calendar year 1925 was 1,126,113,100 bushels, an increase of 33.5 per cent.

That is an increase of more than one third in a single year. This is a phenomenal year; this is the year out of which these results grow. I know that the entire result could not have been expected to be reflected in the railway statement of 1925; it is reflected in the four months of this year which the minister quoted as well.

Mr. DUNNING: There was less grain moved in 1925.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was a great deal more wheat, although a little less grain; wheat is the long haul, which accounts for the increase in 1925: Nevertheless the stimulus which that crop gave was such that the total increase in earnings is certainly not something we should go wild over. We had no very great result, but I hope this year will show a much better result and a much finer reflection of the abundance of last year's harvest than has been seen so far.

Hon. gentlemen have sought to argue that we are getting on just splendidly; that the rates are all right, and everything is fine. But I notice that the minister said we could not possibly pay our interest, and we cannot pay our interest right out in western Canada, the very place we are getting all this grain. The minister says there are guaranteed 4½ per cent Grand Trunk Pacific debentures, and we have to let these bondholders go without their interest, as we have done since I don't know when, with the exception of the year 1923. Well, we are not paying these debts; this interest really is not our debt in the sense that we have not guaranteed it, but it is the debt of the railways we are running, and while we cannot pay it we should not be throwing our hats into the air and saying how well we are getting on.

I do not know that I understand exactly the reasoning of the government in relation to these 4½ per cent debentures. I am quite in agreement with the government that the holders of the Grand Trunk securities have no complaint whatever as to their treatment at the hands of the Canadian people. I am not going to make the statement that the holders of the Grand Trunk Pacific securities have no shadow of complaint, neither am I going to say that they have, but I must say that I am somewhat troubled about it. As I understand the situation the Grand Trunk Pacific among its other securities issued these 4½ per cent debentures, the interest of which was undertaken to be paid by the Grand Trunk Pacific, together with the principal at maturity. The interest was guaranteed as well by the Grand Trunk Railway, the parent company, but the Grand Trunk Railway limited its guarantee to the excess of its earnings over its own interest responsibilities. If it had no earnings over and above what it had to pay on its own debentures, it was not liable. The minister says that contingency has not arisen; the Grand Trunk is not earning more than the interest on its own outstanding liabilities. I accept his word, but I know that that is still a debt of the Grand Trunk Pacific. There is no condition there; the Grand Trunk Pacific agreed to pay it, with no reservation whatsoever. I know the Grand Trunk Pacific is in liquidation, and there is some distinction; there is certainly a wide legal distinction because of the fact that it is in liquidation. But are we quite sure that the distinction is enough? How long are we going to keep the Grand Trunk Pacific in liquidation, using the fact of that liquidation as an excuse for not paying its debts? It has now been in liquidation for seven years, and should surely be liquid enough by now. There may be some reason for continuing it; I do not know at the moment what it can be, but unless there is some reason of which I have not heard so far, I would ask the minister to take up seriously the question of making some arrangement in respect of these debentures. I have never been approached by one of these debenture holders; I have spoken personally to Sir Henry Thornton about the matter, but I think I have never discussed the subject with anyone else outside this House. But I do not like the idea of this country running a railway and refusing to pay the debts of that railway.

There is another application of a different character; I do not think it is on so strong a footing, but it is worth mentioning. The Canadian Northern Railway has what is known as income debenture stock, amounting to about $25,000,000. These bonds carry interest at 5 per cent, but this interest is not payable unless it is earned. Strange to say, these debentures sold at above par; the purchasers bought them believing that the Canadian people would charge themselves such rates as would enable them to pay the interest on the money which built the road. Now the management say, "We have not earned the money". I do not say they have; I do not know, but it must be remembered—and I ask the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) to keep this in mind—that these debentures are a charge on those very railways of which he spoke most. And they are only a second charge; added to the first charge they make only a very small capitalization of the whole Canadian Northern system in the west. They have nothing to do with the Ontario branches nor with the others in the east, but are a second charge on the great branch line system of western Canada, upon which the entire development of over half that country depends. We have not paid a cent of interest since 1914, not a nickel. And while we refuse to pay one cent of interest we stand up and boast in this parliament that we are getting along just uproariously, and our rates are plenty high enough. I do not know that it is a very manly boast. I am not saying that legally we are bound to pay, but if we are in the position that we are not legally bound because of our poverty, do not let us be heralding to the world that we are wonderfully prosperous because of our low rates. The two claims do not harmonize at all. I ask the government to consider both of them. The first is on the stronger footing—much stronger, it seems to me. We should not be content to rest on our oars and boast that we are doing our duty and paying our way when as a matter of fact we are using the money of others and refusing to pay a nickel of interest upon it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to make any further comment at the present time save this: I wonder did the minister, before he made his statement this year, read the statement of the Minister of Railways last year? If he did he could not have missed certain prophecies of reform with which the minister furnished the House just a year ago. Why, the speech at that time was charged with a certain prophetic illumination. Great things were going to come. The minister was against monopoly—but not so very much, you know. He wanted it only when other remedies were exhausted. The phrase "No monopoly by land or sea" had not then been born; but the word "co-operation" was in constant use. The minister kept telling us that he had compelled the president of the Canadian National Railways and the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway to get together, and to find some way of remedying the evil of duplication and the tremendous expense it was to the Canadian people. He told us that he was determined on this policy, that he was determined to get somewhere with it. His language will be found at page 2921 of Hansard of last year. He is reported there as saying:

> I am going to ask the railways to see if they cannot devise some plan by which savings can be effected in this respect, because I frankly confess that at the present time I am not in favour of a monopoly on the part of either private or public ownership. If that cannot be done—and this is not a threat at all—I shall consider advisedly the question of asking the Railway commission or its chairman to sit in on the job to see if some satisfactory arrangement cannot be arrived at. One hon. gentleman said the other day, quite rightly, that in his opinion if the problem is to be settled it must be by means of a friendly agreement. But if a friendly agreement cannot be reacched then I am going to suggest that by some method the Board of Railway Commissioners be allowed to have some say in outlining a plan that would bring about the desired result without injury to either of the railway companies.

We did not hear very much about the harvest from these efforts in the speech of this afternoon. Have all these words vanished into air? Are all these prophecies forgotten?

Mr. DUNNING: I may say that considerable progress has been made along that line by the heads of the two railway corporations. It is true I did not deal with the subject this afternoon, because the details were not immediately available with respect to the actual services curtailed. But I am informed that progress has been made in that direction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would have been a fair subject for information to the House if anything had resulted, and it would have been additionally interesting for the reason that I am sure none of us have been able to observe anything in the removal of duplication.

Mr. DUNNING: I may inform my right hon. friend that I have received very serious complaints from many sections of the country during the short time I have been minister on the reductions in train services which have been effected in connection with this agreement. That is the way in which I know something has been done, because there is complaint about it from the people affected.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There has been a reduction in train service in certain places, I know that, but I think the minister will have some trouble in showing that it is the result of any agreement. I think he will have some difficulty in explaining to this House what the nature of any specific agreement is. At all events if there is such an agreement the House should have known it, because it was led to believe last year that the government had some really virile intentions in this respect, that it was going to get something done; and if I recollect correctly, although I have not the speech before me, the Prime Minister at Richmond Hill foreshadowed that they were going to extend the powers of the railway commission; that we already had railway commission control of rates, and he could not see why we could not have railway commission control of services too. What has been done in this regard? Nothing, of course; absolutely nothing, for the reason that at that time we had just as much railway commission control of services in Canada as we had railway commission control of rates. At the time the Prime Minister spoke the control of the railway commission over the one field was just as ample as its control over the other. But the alluring phrase was good for a public speech; it seemed to be a necessary part of the manifesto of the campaign, and the state of the law did not matter at all.

Now I ask the government to let us know before the debate closes something of what has been accomplished by this process of co-operation. Let us know just what Sir Henry Thornton agreed to and what Mr. Beatty agreed to, just where the consensus came in, what the two presidents agreed upon, if they really agreed upon anything; and if they have not, is the railway commission to be called in or is it not? In a word, let us know something of the governments intentions as to the future. Let us know something of what the government propose to do in the way of public policy. Let us have something which will indicate that we are going to hold the reins tightly in respect of expenditure—both capital expenditure and, so far as our influence can go, operating expenditure; but that we are to be content, so far as any railway possibly can, with the capital structure that we have got to-day; that we shall not multiply the expenditure while our country, in point of population, remains practically at a standstill. Let us have assurance that there is going to be some real control of the headlong pursuit of capital investment in the Canadian National Railways.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee of Supply, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Civil government—Railways and Canals—Salaries, $222,155; contingencies, $38,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I observe that some matters which have been talked about and which were to be arranged do not seem to be progressing very quickly. One of these was the statement that there would be a big change in the personnel of the department of Railways and Canals, now that the work of running the railways disappears from the government entirely. What does the minister say in regard to that?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no information of any commitments in recent years with respect to further staff reduction, I am informed that the work of the department is now substantially the same as it has been for a number of years past, and the staff remains approximately the same.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is exactly my point. We had the idea that when the government did not have to run the railway they would not require as big a staff, and others had the same idea. It was thought that when we went out of the railway business we would not still require a staff of expensive experts, accountants and the like.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend probably forgets that the great bulk of the civil government with which we are now dealing is for the purpose of the administration of the canals. There never was any considerable staff in the railway department directly related to railway operation. The staff connected with the operation of government railways was charged with the railways, even when the government operated them as government railways. The great bulk of the staff now in operation is connected with the canal service and only such supervisory and auditing work as is required by reason of the expenditure of the railway appropriation through the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know whether it is fair to expect my hon. friend to have gone into the matter very much as yet. I know it has been thought—and this thought is not confined to one party—that the proper thing to do just as soon as we got rid of the railways—and we are now rid of them—was to transfer the canals to the department of Public Works and wipe out the railway department. Does the minister know any real reason why that department should not be wiped out now?

Mr. DUNNING: I can only say I am finding plenty to do, and I am reasonably sure that the officials of the department are in the same position. I do not think the Department of Railways and Canals is one of those that the Prime Minister or the government generally ever contemplated merging with another department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I notice also that we have two new employees. Why is that?

Mr. DUNNING: One engineer was transferred from an outside post to an inside post. There is one new appointment, and one extra typist.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister be good enough to go through the list and give us those who have to do with engineering work and tell us what their work has been in the past, so that we can get some idea of it? The list is practically the same as when we were carrying on a great deal of activity in connection with railway work, when we had right of way agents and the like.

Mr. DUNNING: We have one now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What do we want them for?

Mr. DUNNING: We have purchased a large amount of land for a right of way on the new Welland canal. We must have a right of way agent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is a bad name for it. It looks very much like railways and not like canals. There has been no attempt whatever to do the right thing by the people of Canada in connection with the compilation of that list. No attempt whatever is being made by the government, in connection with this department to take advantage of the cessation of railway activities to effect some belated economies for the public. The ratepayer is overlooked altogether.

Mr. DUNNING: The violence of my hon. friend's statement is surely out of proportion to its importance. Is it not the most natural thing in the world that the man who is looking after the rights of way of canals should also look after rights of way in the jurisdiction of the department? We have government railways, and in many respects the administration relating to such matters as rights of way still has to do with the department. There is just one railway right of way agent, and I shall be pleased to call over every name in the whole list of ninety-one employees and tell my hon. friend which ones are connected with railway work and which with canal work. The deputy minister is engaged with railways—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very largely both.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Then we have the following officers:

Chief engineer—Canals.
Assistant chief engineer—Canals.
Counsel—Railways and Canals.
Comptroller—Railways and Canals.
Secretary—Railways and Canals.
Assistant deputy minister—Railways and Canals.
Right of way agent—Railways and Canals.
Senior electric engineer—Canals.

I should also say that the senior electric engineer is adviser to the railway commission.

Senior hydraulic engineer—Canals.
Bridge engineer—Canals.
Assistant comptroller—Railways and Canals.
Senior office engineer—Canals.
Chief clerk.

That is the chief clerk of the department.

Departmental accountants.

That is self-explanatory. Advances made to the Canadian National and so forth have to be taken care of through the departmental accountants.

Secretary clerk—Canals.
Hydraulic engineer—Canals.
Departmenttal purchasing agent—Canals.
Travelling auditors—Railways and Canals.

It should be remembered that the federal aid to highways is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Railways.

Mr. FOSTER: What else do the auditors do?

Mr. DUNNING: They audit the grants to the provinces in respect of highways and receipts and disbursements in connection with canals. Any advances made under certificates to the Canadian National Railways are also audited by these two auditors.

Senior assistant engineer—Canals.
Principal draftsman—Canals.
Departmental accountant—Railways and Canals.
Departmental purchasing agent, grade 1—Canals.
Departmental accountants—Canals.

Translator—Railways and Canals.
Principal clerks—Canals.
Principal file clerk—Railways and Canals.
Division hydrometric engineer—Canals.
Junior hydrometric engineer—Canals.
Secretary to executive—Railways and Canals.
Draftsman—Canals.
Senior law clerk stenographer—Canals.

Then follow clerks from there to the end.

Mr. FOSTER: There follows a list for 1925-26 but they are not in for 1926-27.

Mr. DUNNING: That is on account of the reclassification by the Civil Service Commission and the grading is different. There is no distinction in numbers.

Mr. FOSTER: Do they come in lower down on the list?

Mr. DUNNING: There are thirteen classified as clerks in the 1926-27 classification, whereas they are strung out in the 1925-26 classification.

Mr. FOSTER: Are they the same employees?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister now tell me what it costs just to look after the bookkeeping of this department alone? Now that the railways are out of his hands there are just the canals to be looked after.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the information with me to-night but I can get it. My deputy has not the departmental file with him. I have just my own file.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I would suggest that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. DUNNING: May we not pass this one item? I am not asking the committee to pass any other.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No. We feel that there is extravagance in connection with this department and it should be stopped.

Mr. DUNNING: I will endeavour to get the information for my hon. friend. I think I have it on the general plan of the department. In the comptrollers's division, for instance, the executive and office staff consists of one comptroller, one assistant comptroller, one head clerk, two senior clerk stenographers, one clerk stenographer, one senior translator. In the audit subdivision of the comptroller's department there are three travelling auditors, one departmental accountant, grade two; one departmental accountant, grade one; one senior account clerk, eight account clerks, two clerk stenographers and one junior clerk typist. In the accounts subdivision there are two departmental accountants, grade four; one departmental accountant, grade one; two senior account clerks, two account clerks, one senior supplies clerk, one supplies clerk, one clerk stenographer, one junior clerk stenographer and one typist. That completes the accounting staff of the comptroller's department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the total cost?

Mr. DUNNING: One would have to pick that out separately from the other information which I gave my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend would like to know what his department is costing. Surely he wants to know what he is paying for bookkeeping in his department before he asks us to vote this item, or is he going to approve everything like a rubber stamp? Surely he wants to know whether it is costing just as much to look after the bookkeeping of his department to-day as it did when there was a great deal of business to be done. I had an idea my hon. friend was the sort of man who would want to know what he was doing.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I think my hon. friend does not regard me as of the rubber stamp type.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not.

Mr. DUNNING: I endeavour to deal with first things first. I am not yet convinced that there is less work in this department now than there was previously. In fact I have found that there is a great deal of work in connection with the present relationship with the railways; and more especially, with the work of the Welland canal going on, a certain amount of co-operation is entailed between our department and others. The responsibility is also very largely thrown upon this department with regard to the St. Lawrence waterways question and other allied matters. I am however prepared to look into the question further. As my hon. friend is evidently not disposed to allow this one fairly simple item to pass to-night I will therefore move that the committee rise and report progress. I shall endeavour when I come before the committee again to have this information for my hon. friend who, I have no doubt, will find that there is some other information which he will require and which I may not have on that occasion.

Mr. GEARY: Will the minister give me some information too?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. GEARY: Is the staff personnel the same in 1926-1927 as it was the year before, or has anyone dropped out causing a vacancy? If there is any such vacancy has any attempt been made to fill it?

Mr. DUNNING: There may have been an odd vacancy in the case of a junior but there has been no important change. The hon. member understands, of course, that all vacancies are filled by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GEARY: Yes, but some need not be filled at all.

Mr. DUNNING: I should have observed to my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) that in the Highways branch we are contracting every year as the necessities diminish.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That follows as a matter of course.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Wednesday, May 26, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo) presented the first report of the select standing committee on Railways and Shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, as follows:

Your committee recommends that its minutes of proceedings and evidence be printed from day to day for the use of the members of the committee and of the House, and that rule 74 be suspended in reference thereto.

Mr. EULER presented the second report of the select standing committee on Railways and Shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, as follows:

Your committee recommends that it be granted leave to sit while the House is in session.

He said: I move that the first and second reports of the select standing committee on Railways and Shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government be adopted. It may be necessary to give notice of this motion, but we desire to meet to-morrow, and the reports deal only with the printing of the evidence and the permission to sit while the House is in session. Perhaps the House will adopt the reports.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I think the motion might be adopted, but I should like to point out to the chairman of the committee that there is not much use sending out notices of meetings which reach the members after meetings are held. I do not know when the notices were sent out, but I know that I got mine this morning. Notices for meetings of committees should be sent out in time, so that members will be able to make arrangements to be present. However I do not object to what is now being done.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT

Annual report of the Civil Service Commission of Canada for the year 1925.—Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

EXPORT OF GRAIN THROUGH VANCOUVER

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—DIVISIONAL HEADQUARTERS

Mr. MacNUTT:

1. Is it a fact that locomotives are now run right through between Halifax and Mulgrave, on the Canadian National Railways, instead of changing at Truro, as formely, and that divisional headquarters have been moved from Truro and Bridgewater to Halifax?

2. If so, what has been the effect of the change, and the exact financial saving, if any, thereby?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING:

1. Yes.

2. Increased efficiency in operation, and saving of $52,000 per annum.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PASSENGER CARS

Mr. DOUCET:

How many steel passenger cars have been added to the equipment of the Canadian National Railways during the years ending March 31st, 1923, 1924, 1925 and 1926?

INCOME TAX

Hon. Mr. MANION:

1. How many individuals in Canada paid personal income tax in the fiscal year 1924?
2. How many individuals paid income tax on incomes below $10,000 in the same fiscal year?

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN:

1. 225,514.
2. 218,474.

DR. J. F. McQUAY

Mr. McGIBBON:

1. Is one Dr. J. F. McQuay a member of the Board of Pension Commissioners?
2. If so, when was he appointed?
3. What is his salary?
4. When did he join the Canadian Expeditionary Force?
5. What date did he leave Canada?
6. What date did he leave England for France?
7. What unit or units was he with in France?
8. Was he in any engagements in France?
9. What service had he in the front line?
10. When did he return from France to England; (b) from England to Canada?
11. Were there any other applicants for the position at the time of his appointment?
12. If so, what service did they have?

Hon. Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. Yes.
2. December 2, 1921.
3. $6,000 per annum.
4. February 24, 1916.
5. June 24, 1916.
6. Did not serve in France.

7, 8, 9 and 10(a). Answered by No. 6.

10(b). Invalided to Canada for medical treatment on March 28, 1918.

11 and 12. No information.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

REMISSION OF SALES TAX

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac):

1. What was the amount of the sales tax remitted in each fiscal year since 1921?
2. When and to whom were such remissions made?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CHINESE IMMIGRATION

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of the report on Chinese immigration made by His Honour Mr. Justice Murphy of Vancouver, and known as the "Murphy Report," also for a copy of all correspondence in connection with the alleged improper entry of orientals during the years 1910 and 1911, and also for a copy of all correspondence in connection with the alleged improper entry of Chinese immigrants as merchants or students into Canada during the years 1917 to 1921, inclusive, more particularly all correspondence passing between the mover of the resolution and the Minister or Deputy Minister of Immigration.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MONT-JOLI

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, reports and other documents exchanged between the civil authorities of Mont-Joli, Quebec, and the Department of Railways and Canals regarding the change of status of Mont-Joli as terminal point or divisional point.

KINGSVILLE CUSTOMS AND EXCISE OFFICERS

Mr. GOTT:

For a copy of all papers, reports, letters, telegrams and other documents, exchanged between Customs and Excise Department and the Civil Service Commission or other sources, including the G.W.V.A., relative to the appointment and dismissal of Mr. C. R. McCallum of the town of Kingsville, Ontario, as customs and excise officer at the port of Kingsville, Ontario. Also copy of all papers, reports, letters, telegrams and other documents pertaining to the appointment of Mr. Allen D. Pearsall to the position of customs and excise officer at the port of Kingsville, Ontario. Also a copy of all letters, reports, telegrams and all other documents relative to the dismissal of Mr. Ernest McKay from the position of customs and excise officer at the port of Kingsville, Ontario.

SOUTHEAST SHOAL LIGHTSHIP

Mr. GOTT:

For a copy of all papers, reports, letters, telegrams and other documents in connection with the sale of the southeast shoal lightship to Captain J. S. McQueen of the town of Amherstburg, Ontario. Also a copy of all correspondence passing between him and the department, or any other persons interested either in, or outside the department, who acted in any way as advisers.

PEACE RIVER—RAILWAY FACILITIES

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River):

For a copy of the joint report of engineers of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway with regard to the construction of a railway from the Peace River country to the Pacific coast.

TRIBUTE TO CANADIAN ARTIST

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to draw the attention of the House to three examples of real Canadian art, the calendar, the seal and the inkstand of the House of Commons, made by a young Canadian artist whose name is well known and who is intimately connected with some of the beautiful iron work which has been done in this House of Commons. I refer to Mr. Paul Beau, ironmaster.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (South Winnipeg): Has the government had an opportunity of considering an amendment asked for by the Canadian Legion in respect of the Pension Act and, if so, when will the amending legislation be brought down?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Labour): Certain recommendations have been received from the Canadian Legion and are under consideration. No decision has yet been reached.

EXPORTATION OF PULPWOOD

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Does the government intend to do anything with respect to the exportation of pulpwood or is the matter still under consideration?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is still under consideration.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): I would like to call the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that on the 22nd March an order of the House was passed for the production of documents in connection with Mr. Potvin, former postmaster at Bonnyville, Alberta. The return has not yet been brought down and I have not been able to get the papers. When may I expect them?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am sorry my hon. friend has not already received that document. I will make an inquiry and if possible table the return to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FURTHER LEGISLATION TO BE BROUGHT DOWN

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Will there be any legislation this session other than what is now on the order paper and, if so, what?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think there are some amendments to the Criminal Code. With that exception and with the possible exception of some very minor bits of legislation there is nothing else that I am aware of in contemplation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What will be the nature of the amendments to the code? Can the government indicate the subject matter of the other legislation?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The bill to amend the Criminal Code will be introduced perhaps to-morrow, or in a couple of days, and I will then give the necessary explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the minor legislation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give an answer in a day or two as to any legislation which is further contemplated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the government say whether they purpose dropping any legislation that is now on the order paper?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had better answer that question at the same time.

PEACE RIVER ELECTION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): When the prosecution of the various deputy returning officers in connection with the Peace River election has been completed, will the Chief Electoral Officer make a report to this House?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Under the Dominion Elections Act the Chief Electoral Officer is reporting to the House on everything that comes before him.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston City): May I ask that his report be brought down?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Any report of the Chief Electoral Officer will be tabled.

GENEVA CONFERENCE ON DISARMAMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Was Canada invited to have a representative at the Geneva Conference on Disarmament? Was Canada consulted as to policy, and has the British representative, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, been instructed to speak for Canada?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would like to look over the files before I answer my hon. friend's question. I will give him an answer to-morrow.

SADDLE LAKE INDIAN RESERVE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): May I ask the Minister of the Interior whether he now has the full information which I asked for on the 19th April in connection with the sale of lands in the Saddle Lake Indian reserve? The reply given by the minister on that date stated that the report had not yet come in. That reply left some of my questions unanswered.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I did not have the complete information on Friday last, but I have not inquired since then. I will make inquiry and answer my hon. friend to-morrow.

Mr. BURY: Will the minister expedite the sending in of the report by the agent in Alberta? The sale took place on the 3rd March.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am well aware of that, but I would not want our agent to be criticized because of the date. At the date of my hon. friend's question the matter had not been sent to the agent for final adjustment and I am waiting for his report now.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the third reading of Bill No. 17, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1907, AMENDMENT

The House in committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Duff in the chair.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Customs tariff—British preferential tariff

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Resolution agreed to.

Customs tariff—Schedule A.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand that we have passed all the items embodied in this resolution and it now merely remains to consider the resolution as a whole. In the course of the discussion of the various items the hon. member (Mr. Cahan) and I both asked that the minister provide, in relation to the items affected by the West India treaty, that those items should come into effect only upon the ratification of that treaty. We urged that they be left in abeyance until such time as action one way or the other might be taken upon the treaty. The minister declared that he was following precedent in the course he proposed to take. I admit that he will find precedent for that course, but I assure him that he will not find any precedent for a situation analogous to the present. Under the former treaty with the West Indies, so far as I know, no damage was done to any Canadian industry, and everyone was in favour of the treaty. To-day the claim is seriously put forward that Canadian industry will suffer as a result of the tariff it is proposed to enact in relation to the West India treaty. At the moment I am referring particularly to the increase in duties on cocoa beans, and in order that my objection may be stated as concisely as possible, I am going to read a letter which I have received from one of the manufacturers. The minister, I think, is perfectly familiar with the circumstances:

> When the West Indies treaty is ratified we will have to pay two cents per pound duty on foreign grown cocoa beans, one and a half cents per pound on British grown cocoa beans, exclusive of West Indies kinds, and West Indies kinds will come in free.
> We will not be able to use cocoa beans grown in the West Indies, except in very limited quantities. The price of Trinidad cocoa beans is always several cents per pound higher than Accra cocoa beans which are grown in British West Africa. We will, therefore, continue to bring in Accra cocoa beans, and will have to pay the duty of one and a half cents per pound on them. Cocoa beans from Jamaica we cannot use except in very limited quantities, because of their poor quality.

I pause here to ask the minister whether there is anything in the foregoing statement of fact with which he disagrees. I do not think there is; the minister does not reply. So that we have no issue on the question of fact that the manufacturers will now have to pay a duty of one and a half cents per pound on the cocoa beans which they import from British West Africa; nor is the fact denied that they will be unable to use the beans which will come in from the West Indies. The writer continues:

On from 80 to 85 per cent of the cocoa beans we will use, we will be forced to pay a duty of one and a half cents per pound or two cents per pound. Now, from 100 pounds of cocoa beans we only get from seventy-five to eighty pounds of cleaned cocoa beans.

He goes on to indicate what the effect will be on the trade. We have had the discussion as to whether this tariff should be enacted or not, and all I intend to do now is to ask the minister to assure the committee that these duties will not be put into effect until the West India treaty becomes operative.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I might call my hon. friend's attention to the trade agreement between Canada and the West Indies, article 3 of which provides:

The Dominion of Canada undertakes to withdraw the benefit of the British preferential tariff from any British country which produces cocoa beans if that country does not extend a preference, satisfactory to the Governor in Council of Canada, to goods the produce or manufacture of Canada over like goods imported into such country from any foreign country.

We made that stipulation in our agreement with the West Indies: the preference will be withdrawn from British West Africa when this treaty becomes effective.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It will not be done until then

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Looking down the list of items in this resolution I notice quite a number of increases in the tariff, general and intermediate, in some cases, I think, even in the British preference; at any rate there are increases in the general and intermediate tariffs on such items as meats, bananas and so forth. Is that all in pursuance of the policy of free foodstuffs?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe that there is a corresponding reduction in the British preference column.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the free foodstuffs chart was only for the purpose of meeting the wishes of Australia?

Mr. ROBB: Oh, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Or has the chart really been pitched away?

Resolution agreed to.

Customs tariff—Schedule B

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Resolution agreed to.

5. Resolved, that any enactment founded on the foregoing resolutions number two and three shall be deemed to have come into force on the sixteenth day of April, one thousand, nine hundred and twenty-six, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, what are you considering? We do not know down here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I may inform the hon. member we have just been advised that the chart has been thrown away,—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —notwithstanding the Saskatchewan Liberals and the Progressives and that the resolutions so often passed in the Saskatchewan legislature are now ignored, forgotten, and never moved in this House, where they belong.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Mr. Chairman, do I understand that resolution No. 5 is carried?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I was expecting to hear some word from the Minister of Finance in regard to item No. 469. I wanted to ask him whether he had considered granting the sugar beet growers a bonus, in lieu of the large amount of protection which they enjoyed previous to this legislation going into force.

Mr. ROBB: I am not in a bonus humour to-day, but when we come to the sales tax resolution my hon. friend will find that I am making some concessions to the oil men to whom he referred a few days ago.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Might I ask if he would not consider abolishing the duty on piping material?

Mr. ROBB: It is too late for consideration in this budget.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 114, to amend The Customs Tariff, 1907.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT

The House in committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and to provide:—

1. That subsection five of section thirteen of the said act be repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"(5) On every post card for transmission by post for any distance within Canada and on every letter and post card posted at and intended for delivery through the same post office, there shall be levied and collected a tax of one cent in addition to postage payable in the form of a postage stamp to be affixed thereto at or before the time of posting the letter or post card; but such tax shall not be levied or collected on any letter or post card entitled to the privilege of free transmission under the provisions of The Post Office Act. The stamp so affixed shall be cancelled by the Postmaster or other officer of the Post Office Department whose duty it is to cancel the postage stamps affixed to such letters or post cards in prepayment of postage."

2. That section fourteen of the said Act be repealed.

3. That paragraph (a) of subsection one of section nineteen BB of the said act as enacted by chapter fifty of the statutes of 1921, be repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"(a) A tax on playing cards for every fifty-four cards or fraction of fifty-four in each package,—ten cents per pack."

4. That section nineteen BBB of the said act be amended by adding after subsection two thereof the following as subsection two A:—

"(2A) In case any person other than the manufacturer or producer or importer or transferee or licensed wholesaler or jobber hereinbefore mentioned acquires from or against any one of these persons the right to sell any goods, whether as a result of the operation of law or of any transaction not taxable under this section, the sale of such goods by him shall be taxable as if made by the manufacturer or producer or importer or transferee or licensed wholesaler or jobber as the case may be and the person so selling shall be liable to pay the tax."

5. That subsection four of section nineteen BBB of the said act, being the list of excepted articles not liable to the consumption or sales tax, be amended by adding thereto the following:—

"pot barley; pearl barley; split peas; goods enumerated in Customs Tariff items 469b, 700, 701, 702, 703, and 704."

6. That subsection five of section nineteen BBB of the said act, being the list of articles liable to only fifty per cent of the consumption or sales tax, be amended by adding thereto the following:—

"fish, or products thereof, canned but not medicated."

7. That schedule two to the said act be amended by striking thereout the last five lines respecting carbonic acid gas which were added to the said schedule by section twelve of chapter seventy of the statutes of 1923.

8. That a refund of the amount of taxes paid under sections sixteen A, nineteen B, nineteen BB, and nineteen BBB of the said act be granted to a manufacturer, producer, wholesaler, jobber, or other dealer on goods hereafter sold as ships' stores.

9. That any enactment founded on paragraph one of this resolution shall come into force on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-six.

10. That any enactment founded on paragraphs two and eight of this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the sixteenth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-six.

11. That any enactment founded on paragraphs three, five, six, and seven of this Resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the sixteenth day of April, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-six and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

[Mr. Robb.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Suppose we take these resolutions section by section?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

On section 1.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Listening to what the chairman has read, apparently drop letters and postcards are still to be subject to two cents postage?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then what is the reason for introducing this at all? What is the change?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, becoming effective on July 1, the rate of postage on all letters will be two cents instead of three. The postage on drop letters will remain the same as heretofore. Let me read the notation:

This section will remove the one cent additional postage on letters for transmission by post for any distance within Canada; the additional cent will remain on drop letters and post cards as heretofore; effective July 1, 1926. The estimated reduction in taxation for the nine months will be $4,125,000; for the twelve months $5,500,000.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that the minister by his explanation has not unravelled this Chinese puzzle. I recall that Talleyrand once wittily said, "Language was given us to conceal our thoughts." I think if a serious effort had been made to give effect to that purpose it could not have been more successfully served than by this clause. If the intention of the government is to make the rate of postage two cents on letters dropped, we will say, in the city of Ottawa for delivery outside of Ottawa, why is it not possible to say so in plain, understandable language? I understand that the intention of the minister, and the effect of this clause, is to retain the rate of postage on local letters; for example, on a letter dropped in the post office here for delivery at a residence within the city the rate of postage will continue to be two cents, instead of reverting to the pre-war rate of one cent on such letters. But I do press upon the minister the desirability of so recasting this clause that a mind less dense than mine may be able to understand it.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, this impost is nothing but a nuisance tax in a new form and causes the utmost trouble to the public. It is going to cause untold annoyance just at a time when business men are congratulating themselves that some of these burdens and nuisances are being eliminated. I venture to say that the people will not use the post card in this form, and that we will get far less revenue than was formerly received. The city of Toronto contributes $6,000,000 yearly to the postal revenues of the country, yet we cannot get an up-to-date post office. With the many amendments to the Postal Act we already have great difficulty in knowing what the law is, and now, when the government say they are reducing taxes and eliminating nuisance taxes, they impose a regulation of this kind which it requires a lawyer to understand. I urge the minister to consider the advice of the heads of the postal service, because this is nothing but a new form of nuisance tax which will place barriers in the way of business in this country. In the larger cities there are many foreigners; who is to explain this amendment to them, and to the people in the rural places as well?

The time has come when the post office should be placed on a proper basis. It is very unfortunate that we have no Postmaster General in the House. From 1899 to the beginning of the war we had a surplus from the post office, and all the various postmasters general tried to cater to the public and give them the proper facilities desired. But now when everyone is hoping for a revival of trade this obnoxious, objectionable regulation is brought forward, which means nothing and which will take a good deal of revenue from the government. I would like the minister to tell us who recommended this change, whether the heads of the postal service have been consulted; what revenue will come out of it and how it will help trade in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: Apparently the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) misunderstood the reading of the clause. This legislation was drafted to meet the wishes of the Post Office department, who administer the act. They understand it quite well.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): What about the public?

Mr. ROBB: And the public understand it. To show that the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) has not read the clause, he finds fault because the revenue is to be reduced. Certainly it is to be reduced; that is the intention. It is going to lighten the taxes of the people who are doing business. It is quite true that the postage on a drop letter will be the same as that on a letter going to any other part of Canada, but the Post Office Department estimate that, with the requirements of the cities for delivery at each house, it costs just as much to deliver these letters as to send a letter from Ottawa to Vancouver. So the postage is made uniform, two cents on drop letters and post cards, as before.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend interests me very much. He tells us that it costs just as much to look after a drop letter, because there is local delivery here, as to send a letter from Ottawa to Vancouver. I was under the impression that Vancouver also had a local delivery, and that this was general in all cities and towns. I was further under the impression that we have rural mail delivery to-day, which is very expensive, in a large part of the country. I am afraid my hon. friend's brief is not right; I think the Post Office Department has loaded him wrongly there. Certainly the illustration they give is very wide of the mark. Could my hon. friend really tell us why the post office think the reduction should be made in this way; whether it is because they think it will cost the treasury far less than if they were to reduce drop letters and post cards to one cent? Is that not the real reason?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, my hon. friend is quite right; had we been in a position to lose $2,000,000 more we could have gone back to the conditions prevailing prior to 1915. But under this plan we figure that we will lose $5,500,000 during the year, and that is all we can afford.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The whole thing really amounts to this; the drop letters and post cards are not looked after because the government cannot afford to go further than they have gone?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BURY: I have one strong objection. If it is the theory of the government that the one cent on drop letters and post cards is not enough, why add the extra cent as a tax?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend fails to understand the regulation. We are adding nothing, but simply amending the legislation of 1915 and removing the extra cent from the letters. We are not removing it from drop letters and post cards.

Mr. BURY: But the proposed regulation reads as follows:

> On every post card for transmission by post for any distance within Canada and on every letter and post card posted at and intended for delivery through the same post office, there shall be levied and collected a tax of 1 cent—

The effect in the end is the same; on a post card or drop letter you pay your postage of one cent and this extra tax of one cent, which tax is not paid on a letter going from here to Vancouver or to anywhere else in Canada. The result is that you draw a tax distinction between drop letters and post cards and other letters than drop letters. Why can you not amend the Postal Act and raise the rate of postage, rather than do this by way of an extra tax?

Mr. ROBB: This is not in the form of an extra tax; we are repealing certain parts of the legislation of 1915, the Special War Revenue Act. My hon. friend has paid the postage which he now complains of since April 15, 1915, and we are relieving him of this postage on letters.

Mr. BURY: I am not complaining of anything in the way of paying. The net result is exactly the same. But I do say this: While you are making this change you are making it in a wrong way. You say that you are not imposing anything. I say that this does impose expressly a substantial tax of one cent. It is there already, I know, but you are removing the tax from the long distance letter and the net result is that you are leaving a one cent tax on post cards and drop letters, while you are taking the cent tax off the long distance letter. You are doing expressly what I said a moment ago: You are making a tax distinction between the post cards and drop letters and the long distance letters ,and the thing is wrong. If you are not satisfied with your postage, alter the rate of it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is encouraging the long haul.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to point out the objection I have to this resolution. The tax of an extra cent should be passed on to those best able to pay it. I would ask the minister to consider this question of the ability of the working classes, the farmers, and the ordinary people of this country who use post cards, to pay this added cent. Does the minister know that to-day the government of Canada is practically giving the newspapers of this country a bonus of $8,000,000 in the carriage of the newspapers? That is according to the returns I got in the House of Commons last session. The newspapers are carried as third-class matter, and it cost the government to carry these newspapers $8,000,000 more than they received in revenue for the service. So that the post office is practically giving to the newspapers of Canada a bonus or subsidy of $8,000,000. The newspapers of this country are carried practically free, as third-class mail. If you can do that for some of these rich corporations owning newspapers in this country, corporations strong enough sometimes to control parliament and nominate political leaders, surely you can do something for the poor workingman who has to pay this extra cent on post cards. This tax is unfair to the large centres of population, which are now bearing the greater proportion of the cost of administration of the post office. The revenue of the post office comes largely from the large cities of Canada. Toronto's contribution, $6,000,000, is equal to the contributions of the cities of Hamilton, Montreal, Halifax, Winnipeg and Vancouver put together. I think the working class in the large centres should have the benefit of one cent postage on post cards. To-day they have to pay one cent, plus this additional cent, or two cents to have a post card delivered in their own city, and this tax will largely be taken from the large centres like Toronto, to maintain public utilities here and there in different parts of the country. It is class legislation of the worst kind. There is one class of legislation for the newspapers and large corporations, and a different class of legislation for the working classes. A post card posted in Parkdale, for instance, to be delivered across the road will have to pay a tax of two cents. I say that is class legislation of the worst kind. Furthermore, the returns of the Postmaster General show that the more restrictions you put on mail, the more nuisance taxes you impose upon it, the less revenue you get. That is a well known principle in the administration of the post office. When you remove the nuisance taxes, automatically you increase the number of users of that form of communication. Impose restrictions on that class of mail, and automatically fewer people use that particular form of communication.

What we need, Mr. Chairman, is a Postmaster general sitting in this House, not an Acting Postmaster General. I have every confidence in the ability of the present Acting Postmaster General, the Minister of Justice, who is very popular, but he has enough to do to look after his own department; he is almost a quorum of the cabinet in himself. What does the British Postmaster General do when he has a surplus? He hands it back to the people who use the mails, by lessening the charges and giving them increased facilities. In England the radio, the telephone and everything else are connected to-day with the British post office, which is doing everything it can to encourage a revival of trade and commerce. But what are you doing in this country? At this late hour of the day you are imposing restrictions which will retard the use of this particular form of communication. What part of the revenue derived from this tax will be used to provide proper postal facilities in the city of Toronto? The revenue Toronto contributes will be used to maintain post offices in other parts of the country. We want a proper postal service, and at the present time we have not got proper postal facilities in the city of Toronto. Now the minister comes along and imposes restrictions on the use of post cards within the four corners and gates of that city. I do not think the public will stand for it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am somewhat surprised that the Minister of Finance has not put up the usual reason for this change, namely, that this is another endeavour to keep the boys and girls on the farm. That was the usual justification for changes made in the past. In 1915, whatever tax was put on as a special war revenue tax, it was evenly distributed; it was a fair and just tax. This tax is a discriminatory tax and nothing else. There is not a fair distribution of the tax; it is a tax upon the cities. I suppose the minister forgot his usual reason to justify this change, that it was for the purpose of keeping the boys and girls on the farm.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): What is the annual deficit each year on the rural mail delivery service?

Mr. ROBB: I have not got that.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Then it is all nonsense to say it costs as much to deliver a letter from one side of the street to another in Toronto as it does to deliver it in Vancouver. The minister should know what the deficit is before making such a statement.

Mr. HANSON: I agree entirely with the observations that have been made with respect to discrimination. I would like to ask the minister a question with reference to the postage on letters going to the United States. We have not the old act before us and are therefore not in a position to say what the law is, but will the postage on letters going to the United States be two cents?

Mr. ROBB: After the 1st of July.

Mr. HANSON: What about letters to Britain?

Mr. ROBB: I think Britain comes under a different act. My hon. friend will recall that notwithstanding the argument of his colleague, the British postage is higher than ours.

Mr. HANSON: I suppose the discrimination is because so many of our people have gone across the line in the last three years.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Has the minister considered the advisability of increasing the postal rates on newspapers? What is the present rate on newspapers?

Mr. ROBB: The carriage of newspapers and other mail matter, as my hon. friend knows, is done under regulations by the Postmaster General, and when his estimates are under consideration this information I imagine, will be available.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I think it comes under an act of this House.

Mr. ROBB: That may be, but an act passed under the direction of the Postmaster General, not this one.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): If it does not come under this act, it certainly comes under an act of this House.

Mr. ROBB: I am interested in the observations of my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest and the hon. member for Lincoln. I think the hon. member for Toronto Northwest was very clear, and I think my hon. friend from Lincoln was leading up to the same thing.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Leave the hon. member for Lincoln to state his own case.

Mr. ROBB: That would be fair, but I think my hon. friend will be in a better position to state his case after I have given my experience. My hon. friend from Toronto Northwest has argued that we are carrying newspapers at a loss to the country, and that there should be an increase in the charges for carrying papers. The men who run the newspapers, particularly some of the newspapers that strongly supported my hon. friend in the last election, do not adopt that point of view. They have represented to the government very strongly that we should reduce the charges for carrying newspapers. The government has answered and said, "Until we give some concession to the people who are using the mail for letters we think you should pay those charges. We will look into your case, but you are sending advertising matter through the mail throughout Canada, and you have a right to pay for it." I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest that we are carrying some of the newspapers at a loss, but there are other newspapers in Canada which do not take that ground. I want to be frank and say they are not all taking that attitude.

An hon. MEMBER: Name them.

Mr. ROBB: I would not like to name any of them, but there are newspapers which have been very decent toward my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest, and which argue that the newspapers should be carried for less. The government does not share that view.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I can tell the minister—and he knows it—that we are carrying newspapers for less than cost. We are carrying newspapers on express trains, taking them in bulk to-day, at a less figure than the ordinary freight rate. Further than that, Mr. Chairman, the minister says that the big newspapers, some of those that are helping their party, are in favour of it. How about the newspapers which are helping the other side?

Mr. JACOBS: Not very many.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I do not care what side they are on, they are entitled to pay their share for the delivery of their own goods. That is the stand I took in this House when we changed the rates a few years ago, and I do not think the minister is doing himself justice when he tries to make out that we on this side of the House are not prepared to tackle the question. Evidently he is not prepared to touch it. The rate given to the newspapers to-day is below cost, and what is happening is this: Under the present system the minister is helping to put the small country newspapers out of business. To-day they are delivering some of these large newspapers at a less rate than is granted to the ordinary country newspaper. I venture to say that a large number of newspapers, I I was going to say a thousand, have gone out of business. Certainly quite a large number have ceased operations due to the action of this parliament.

Mr. EULER: I will agree that newspapers are being carried at a very low rate, but I rise to a point of order. This provision deals with the method of taxation.

Mr. NEILL: I did not fully catch the reply of the minister in reference to the rate to the United Kingdom. The present rate to the United States and to points in Canada is three cents and the rate to the United Kingdom is four cents. Is it not contemplated by the government to make a proportionate reduction in the rate of postage to the United Kingdom?

Mr. ROBB: I will have to sumbit that to the post office authorities.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not in this bill?

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: It is not in this bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not in the budget.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): I submit to the House in all seriousness that the drafting of this clause is as clear as mud. Look at it. It says:

> —there shall be levied and collected a tax of one cent in addition to postage payable in the form of a postage stamp to be affixed thereto at or before the time of posting the letter or post card; but such tax shall not be levied or collected on any letter or post card.

The tax of one cent is distinct and separate, according to the phraseology of this paragraph, from the postage stamp. Why not say in clear easy and comprehensive language that the rate of postage on a certain class of letter shall, after the first of July be two cents? Why not repeal this section, entirely, remove it from the war revenue, and amend your Post Office Act with a very simple and short three or four line section, so that he who runs may read? I know what the minister intends and what the department intends, but the man who, unaware of the intention of the government, undertakes to obtain this information from this paragraph will land himself in an insane asylum before he understands it.

Mr. ROBB: He has had ten years to get there, because we are following exactly the language of my hon. friend's name-sake who introduced this legislation in 1915, and it was approved by the Department of Justice.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest that we hold this over until we get an answer in connection with the United Kingdom rate of postage.

Mr. ROBB: That is not involved in this legislation at all.

Mr. BURY: Section 14 is a purely defining section of the terms used in section 15. What is the idea? Is the idea of repealing the statutory definitions to throw you back on the dictionary definitions?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BURY: I object to passing section 2 of the resolution until it is explained fully to the House.

Mr. ROBB: We are repealing the receipt tax and thereby losing $750,000 a year.

Mr. BURY: I must have got the wrong act, because section 14 of the War Revenue Act of 1915, in the volume of statutes which I have, is the defining section to section 15.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has the wrong section 14. If he refers to section 14 on page 18 he will find that, for the purposes of this section, the expression "receipt" includes any note. He is quoting from another act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The reference here is wrong. We should know what we are doing. The reference is to the main act. What is the minister repealing?

Mr. ROBB: We are repealing the receipt tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This section has nothing to do with it. Section 14 of the act referred to here is the act which refers to the definitions covering packages of perfumery, bottles and that sort of thing.

Mr. ROBB: The section which my hon. friend was talking about was repealed long ago. The section we are repealing now reads:

For the purposes of this section the expression "receipt" includes any note, memorandum or writing whereby any money amounting to ten dollars or upwards, or any bill of exchange or promissory note for money amounting to ten dollars or upwards is acknowledged or expressed to have been received, deposited or repaid, or whereby any debt or demand of the amount of ten dollars or upwards is acknowledged to have been settled, satisfied or discharged or which signified or imports any such acknowledgement, and whether the same is or is not signed with the name of any person.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister refer to the act so that we may know what we are doing?

Mr. ROBB: It has been checked by the law clerks. The section is section 10 of the acts of 12-13 George V. chapter 47.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would suggest that we should have the resolution altered so that we may be clear as to what we are doing.

Mr. ROBB: It is quite clear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend still collecting any taxes on perfumeries under the War Measures Act?

Mr. ROBB: That was repealed long ago.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was my impression.

Mr. ROBB: This is purely in reference to receipts.

Mr. STANSELL: I understood from the clause the minister read and which he said was being repealed that notes were included. Do I understand that stamps are no longer required to be placed on promissory notes?

Mr. ROBB: No. This refers to a note given as a receipt.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the minister could not tell us what the revenue is on receipt stamps.

Mr. ROBB: The estimated loss is $750,000 a year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How is that made up?

Mr. ROBB: The Customs and Excise department have that. I have not the details.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask the Minister of Customs and Excise how he made up his estimate of $750,000.

Mr. ROBB: I am informed that they have kept no separate record, but this is an estimate. We will admit frankly, if it will save time, that the tax has been evaded. It was not uniform; some were paying and some were not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A few people who thought the tax was seriously intended started to observe it. When the different kinds of regulations came down which showed how impossible and ill-judged the whole tax was, nobody paid attention to it at all. My hon. friend says that some people did not observe it. He could have gone further and said that nobody was observing it at all. This amount of $750,000 is a guess of the wildest kind. The department have no idea as to what the revenue has been and it is very far short of that sum.

Mr. HANSON: We have the minister's frank admission that the tax was a failure and the sooner we get rid of it the better.

Section agreed to.

On section 3.

Mr. ROBB: The present tax on playing cards is as follows:

A tax on playing cards for every fifty-four cards or fraction of fifty-four in each package—when selling at twenty-four dollars or less per gross packages, eight cents per pack; when selling in excess of twenty-four dollars per gross packages, fifteen cents per pack.

This provides for a straight tax of ten cents a package.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister will probably get a little more money too.

Mr. ROBB: It is a fair thing to collect taxes from.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): What is the estimate?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would expect there would be a slight increase in revenue.

Mr. ROBB: I do not think there will be much change. The tax will be a little easier to administer. I have no estimate.

Section agreed to.

On section 4.

Mr. ROBB: I have a memorandum which reads as follows:

This is for the purpose of removing doubt as to whether goods are liable to sales tax when sold under process of law or under a lien. The court of appeal of the province of Quebec in the case of the King versus the Bank of Hochelaga by unanimous decision has ruled that a bank is not required to pay the sales tax on the sale of a stock in trade sold by them in pursuance of a security obtained under section 88 of the Bank Act. Quite sometime ago the Macamic Pulp and Paper Company made an assignment under the Bankruptcy Act and the Bank of Hochelaga,—now the Banque Canadienne Nationale,—seized and sold the company's stock in pursuance of a security which they held under section 88 of the Bank Act. The department therefore requested the bank to pay a tax on the sale of that stock on the ground that when a bank assumes the status of a manufacturer or producer and sells a stock which in the ordinary course would have been subject to the sales tax, they should be required to assume the same liability as any ordinary manufacturer or producer so far as the sales tax is concerned. Our view in the matter was upheld by a ruling made by the Department of Justice in April 1923 and I understand that the banks have always been paying the sales tax when realizing under their securities. In this particular case, however, the Bank of Hochelaga refused to pay the tax and the matter had, therefore, to be submitted to the courts for decision. The Superior Court of Montreal gave a decision in favour of the bank which decision was subsequently upheld by the appeal court of the province. In the circumstances I would suggest that section 19 BBB of the Special War Revenue Act be amended so as to provide that in future all sales of stock seized by a bank or any other pledgee or lien holder be subject to the sales tax just as if the goods were sold by the manufacturer or producer himself.

This is signed by Noel Chasse, departmental solicitor.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are not clarifying the law; we are changing it. The law we take from the courts. We are told by the unanimous decision of the court of appeal of Quebec that the sales tax under these circumstances is not collectable. I do not know that it is right that it should not be collectable; but let us be fair with ourselves. We are changing the law and providing for more sales tax under these circumstances. I do not see any reason why the tax should not be paid by these people.

Mr. BURY: My view of the matter is that where a company's stock is seized by a creditor it is a hardship on both the creditor and the company for the government to come in and take out a tax in the form of a sales tax. If a sale has been effected under those circumstances surely there is no need for the government to extend a tax that is vicious in any case. I never heard anybody on general principles support the sales tax; it is in force only of necessity as a war measure. You are going rather far. Where there is seizure and sale under legal proceedings the creditor in nine cases out of ten does not get the whole of his money. I think you might very well leave the sales tax as it stands instead of extending it to cases where undoubtedly there will be a hardship.

Mr. HANSON: Is there not a danger under this section of goods having to pay the sales tax twice? Take the case of manufactured goods in the hands of a trader. On those goods the sales tax has already been paid by the manufacturer, and under this section I can see a great probabilty of their having to pay the tax a second time. I do not conceive that to be the intention of the provision.

Mr. ROBB: Under the present law the sales tax is collected only once. This provision applies to goods on which the sales tax has not yet been collected and which may have been taken over by a bank. On such goods the government has a right to its charges.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): How many articles are exempt from the sales tax?

Mr. ROBB: There is a long list of them.

Mr. BURY: The minister says the government is entitled to the sales tax on such goods.

Mr. ROBB: Just as a law court is entitled to the charges which it levies.

Mr. BURY: Surely the basis of that contention must be that there is some profit out of which to get the sales tax; but in many cases of seizure there will be no profit and the government will simply be taking the tax out of the pocket of the creditor. That is entirely wrong. If you could prove that there was some profit accruing there might be something to be said for exacting the tax, but there is no justification whatever either in law or in reason for the government to collect the tax out of the pocket of the already suffering creditor who most probably, in any event, will not get the whole of his money.

Mr. ROBB: The creditor has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BURY: Why not?

Mr. ROBB: Ever since the sales tax has been under discussion all the arguments on both sides of the House have gone to prove that the consumer pays the tax.

Mr. BURY: If goods are seized under process of law and are put up for sale by the sheriff, there is no knowing who pays the tax. But it is a safe assumption that in nine cases out of ten it will be the unfortunate creditor who will foot the bill, for he will get so much less. The government is therefore taking the tax out of his pocket. I care not what has been said in previous parliaments; I have my own sins to bear, and so far as I am concerned the whole principle is pernicious.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend's sins are light. It seems to me that when it comes to a question of principle it is rather difficult to defend any tax which you do not want to pay. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) no doubt knows, we have in the Bank Act a provision whereby banks may make advances in connection with manufacturing processes and similar enterprises on which they have a very effective lien. Some people contend that this provision should not be retained in the act, but it is a part of our banking system. That lien enhances the bank's position, which is already one of considerable advantage as against everyone else. The bank taking action, the courts of the province of Quebec, at least, have held that it need not pay the tax. We are here really dealing altogether with the banks, and clearly the bank is in a unique position: it may, and as a matter of fact it does in many instances, virtually carry on the business. Now I do not like the tax any more than does my hon. friend (Mr. Bury), but in the matter of taxation we must try to deal fairly with all; we should not help one trader as against another. We must try to preserve an equality of taxation among the people from whom we secure revenues, and we cannot do so if the bank, with special privileges, can force the sale of goods without paying anything in the way of sales tax, while interest must be paid to the bank. That is the feature that appeals to me.

Mr. BURY: If a bank, having a lien on certain stock, steps into the shoes of the proprietor and carries on the business it should pay the sales tax. But I am not dealing with such a case. I am suggesting the case of a seizure of goods made by a lien holder and the subsequent sale by the sheriff under proceedings similar to those taken under a writ of fieri facias. I have not in mind either the case of a bank, such as my hon. friend has mentioned, or the case of a receivership; I am not discussing anything of that nature. I am referring exclusively to cases of seizure by a sheriff under a lien note or a chattel mortgage or a writ of execution. In nine cases out of ten the creditor fails to realize the full amount owing to him and the government proposes now to scoop the sales tax out of the proceeds he receives. If there were any margin of profit over and above the taxable costs of the debt due to the creditor then I would say that the government might be entitled to the sales tax out of that surplus. But I cannot see how the government can fairly assert a preferred claim in respect of the sales tax. It is just that sort of thing that is hurting us in Alberta. I do not know how far it is true of this government, but in that province the government has persistently pressed, in front of the secured creditor, government charge after government charge until the secured creditor does not know where he is. The result is that loans are not made. The principle is a pernicious one, and if the minister would consider the advisability of confining the sales tax to cases in judicial proceedings where there is some margin over and above the just debt, the difficulty might be got over. Where, on the other hand, as my hon. friend has mentioned, the lien holder exercising his rights steps into the shoes of the proprietor and continues in business, then as a trader he is certainly under a moral obligation to pay the sales tax. But that is vastly different from the realization of the whole capital stock at once under a sheriff's sale.

Mr. ROBB: This will apply only to such goods as are liable to the sales tax in the first instance, and there is a great list of exemptions. Supposing my hon. friend has a line of goods upon which he had paid sales tax; the bank sells similar goods, and I buy them, exempt from sales tax; then I sell them in competition with my friend. At once I start with a 5 per cent advantage over him. He will see that we must be fair to all traders. That is the reason for this legislation.

Mr. BURY: The hon. minister has not met my objection at all. I am talking of realization under a sheriff's sale, where the articles are sold in gross and where there is no possible competition with the other man down the street who is selling the same kind of goods. I stated expressly that I was not citing the case of a creditor exercising his right of lien and selling over the counter the stock of goods in the store. In that case undoubtedly he is in the shoes of the trader and he will have to shoulder the burden of the trader in the form of sales tax. But suppose I have a chattel mortgage on the stock in trade of the trader who has not yet paid his sales tax, and who would have had to pay it if the goods were sold in the ordinary way in the course of business over the counter. If the sheriff seizes those goods under my chattel mortgage—as he would do in Alberta—and advertises them en bloc by auction on a certain day, do you mean to tell me there is any question of competition in such a case? There is no competition at all, for the prices paid at an auction of that kind will not be anything like the prices paid on the same goods sold at retail over the counter in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, under this item I wanted to bring a matter to the attention of the minister which I cannot see any way of doing otherwise. A couple of years ago the minister put a tax on dies, patterns and tools made in the manufacturer's own plant. These the manufacturer never invoices and never sells, but under the law tax is collected upon them. He gets his money out of the work produced by those dies, patterns and tools. Under the law a great many manufacturers are being made to pay the sales tax twice, once upon the equipment and again upon the goods therewith produced. Their competitors pay no such tax; you do not reach any of them in the United States, England or anywhere else with that tax. In short, you are putting a direct double tax upon the Canadian manufacturer. I do not know why it was done; I do not know how much the minister makes out of this tax, and I should like to get some information about it. It was first done in 1924.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend will allow this item to pass, perhaps when we come to the next item the amendment which I shall propose will clear up what he is referring to.

Section agreed to.

On section 5.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I have the following amendment to make to this resolution—

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are we at?

The CHAIRMAN: No. 5.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before we pass that I want to ask the minister, now that he is rivetting more sales tax on the people, has he forgotten the crocodile tears he and all his followers shed over the sales tax of 3 per cent and the fearful burden that it imposed on the great consuming masses of Canada? And how does he now reconcile himself to a tax of 5 per cent on those poor consuming masses while he remits from the large incomes of the wealthy as much as a quarter of a million a year?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I am removing some of the sales tax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The general level is 5 per cent now. What tears were shed when it was 3 per cent, in fact when it was 1½ per cent! I can remember one hon. gentleman—I wish he were in the House; it was the hon. member for Last Mountain—he will not even whisper any objection now, but when the sales tax of 1½ per cent was put on, the hon. member for Last Mountain—

An hon. MEMBER: Long Lake.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Long Lake, is it now? Well, this is a story that will not remind us of Long Lake. He stated you could not expect anything but burdens on the poor from the government of that time, that you could no more expect anything better from them than you would expect the scent of roses if you had a polecat under the table.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You have a wonderful memory!

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have a pretty fair memory. But how fragile is the memory of hon. gentlemen opposite, how short! Now the sales tax is 5 per cent, I want to know if the minister has any of that odour coming around. Not satisfied with the 5 per cent he is rivetting it on in further cases.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does he remember his colleague from Cape Breton at that time who pictured the government letting the Queen of Sheba in all her robes and feathers walk by untouched while we knocked the bag of flour out of the hands of the little fellow taking it home to his mother? Does he not remember that? How does the minister feel when he gets some of his followers, including the member who formerly represented Last Mountain, to support not only the 5 per cent sales tax but in addition the rivetting of it on the people, while he remits the tax on the feathers of the Queen of Sheba and all the fine dresses of the wealthy to the extent of a quarter of a million a year? Will the minister give an explanation of the change of front and what trouble he has had convincing these hon. gentlemen? How has he got rid of the odour?

Mr. ROBB: By reducing the sales tax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the minister has increased the sales tax. It is now two-thirds higher than it was then—in fact four times as high as it was at the time of the polecat. The minister cannot escape by the mere assertion of what is absolutely incorrect. There are very few articles omitted, merely chaff and straw; the great mass of the sales tax still exists, and the workman has got to pay it on his smock, on his underclothes and on everything he wears; but the Queen of Sheba passes now and pays a quarter of a million less tax than she did at that time. Will the minister kindly explain how he has reconciled his followers to this change of front, and especially how he got the support of the party which egged on the attack at that time?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): And who are very quiet to-day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Cannot he recall the philippics of his leader against the big interests and the alliance of the government of that day with those interests, and against the way the profiteer was allowed to escape clothed in fine linen? Now he takes the great consuming masses, for whom their hearts were bleeding in that day, and he rivets on them a 5 per cent sales tax and lifts off the great burden from those who were said to be the big interests and the favoured few of that time.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I would give a great deal to have the memory of my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be a great thing for the government.

Mr. ROBB: I am not so sure about that. My right hon. friend with his great memory appears to have forgotten that we have removed the sales tax from a long list of articles.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just what?

Mr. ROBB: I have not them all here. There were agricultural implements in 1924; boots and shoes were reduced by one-half in 1924.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But they are still half as high again as at the time of the polecat.

Mr. ROBB: In the case of foodstuffs, certain biscuits, the sales tax was reduced by one-half— on certain fish and canned foods it was removed altogether. I am not going to be drawn into a long controversy on this much disputed method of taxation; I will admit at once that it should be our objective to get rid of the sales tax as fast as possible. I am going to offer a little free advice; when we remove this sales tax it should come down one per cent per year. If you knock it all off at one time it is not quite fair to the dealers who may have paid sales tax on some goods in stock. The objective should be to get down one per cent every year or every six months, or something like that.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Why not start it?

Mr. ROBB: We have started it by taking off a lot. I challenge the statement of my hon. friend that we have increased the sales tax to any great extent. This has been argued back and forth for some years, but my right hon. friend will recall that under the previous system the sales tax was pyramided. I had a calculation made that it worked out on boots and shoes to 7 per cent; on other items it came to 6½ per cent and on a few things it worked out to about 9 per cent. I will admit that the sales tax is higher now than I would like to have it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And more pyramided.

Mr. ROBB: No, I think not. Now, I move the following amendment:

> Articles and materials, not to include permanent equipment, which enter into the cost of manufacture or production of goods manufactured or produced by a licensed manufacturer or producer; wrought, seamless, or lap-welded iron or steel tubing, less than four inches in diameter, threaded and coupled, or not, when used only in oil wells, and materials used in the manufacture of such tubing; machinery and apparatus used only in the pumping of crude oil out of wells, and articles and materials used in the manufacture of such machinery or apparatus.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is using the very best of good judgment in not getting into a controversy, because he could not say a word either for himself or his party. The idea of the minister suggesting that this government have not raised the sales tax; 98 per cent is two-thirds higher than it was when the minister came into power, and for a while it was twice as high. The minister says it was pyramided then, but the pyramiding to-day is necessarily much greater because of the legislation passed by this government. The more you bring the sales tax back to the first transaction; the nearer you bring it to the originating transaction; the larger proportion you transfer to that originating transaction, the greater the pyramiding, because from that transaction it proceeds through all the other transactions, pyramiding as it goes. In our day we had a portion of it on the originating transaction and a portion gathered later on. That method proved somewhat cumbersome and rather distasteful to the retail dealers; it all came out of the consumer anyway, and the consumer had no organization, so the minister went back and put it all on the originating transaction. Now the pyramiding is greater than it ever was; it starts at 5 per cent where it formerly started at 3 per cent, and indeed at the time of the worst of the attack it was only 1½ per cent. The minister says they are going to get good some day and reduce the tax one per cent. How is it that he has reduced the tax on those having large incomes, and the larger the income the greater proportion of reduction, before he took the one per cent off "the great consuming masses?" We never hear that phrase now from hon. gentlemen opposite; apparently it has been dropped from their vocabulary altogether, but some of us remember it. The minister says his memory is not very good. I know that; it is a convenient thing for their consciences, but it does not add to their value as legislators.

Mr. JACOBS: I would like to ask my hon. friend if he ever heard of a politician having a conscience.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have seen the type who have none, and I do not wonder that the hon. member, having regard to the company he has been keeping, has despaired of any politicians having consciences at all. When I recall to him the incidents I am now recalling I am sure it is only a tribute to his logic that he begins to despair of politicians having consciences. I do not think he said very much at that time, but I know him and I will guarantee that he recalls the phraseology I am bringing to his mind this afternoon. He heard it all; he did not take very much part in it; he sat back and smiled and only reaped the fruits and thanked God. That was the part taken by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs).

Mr. JACOBS: I would like to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that I have as yet reaped no fruits.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The fruit the hon. member reaped was the representation of Cartier. I know that is the only fruit he has reaped, and I know he is worthy of something greater.

Mr. JACOBS: They elected me in spite of party.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think they must have. Now I think there are some further facts which will be brought out in this discussion, but it is well that the minds of hon. gentlemen should be turned back for a while to what was perhaps as fraudulent, as conscienceless, as unprincipled and as discreditable an attack on a great party as ever disgraced Canadian politics.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): In view of what the minister said a moment ago about the decrease in sales tax I would like to call his attention to the fact that in 1920 we raised by this tax roughly $15,000,000. In 1921 the amount was $78,000,000; in 1922 $73,000,000; in 1923 $106,000,000 and in 1924 $120,000,000, in round figures.

Mr. ROBB: But we are doing more business.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Only $95,000,000 was raised this year by the same tax, and to that extent less business was done.

Mr. ROBB: But in 1924 we removed a number of items from the sales tax.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): And the minister never brought any statement to the House of what they were. According to his own words this tax should have been decreasing every year, but the opposite has been the case. How does the minister account for that? A moment ago the minister said a number of items had been removed from the sales tax, but the facts are that the sales tax increased from $15,000,000 in the first year of its existence to $120,000,000 in 1924. It fell off to $85,000,000 in 1925, but this year it has gone back to $95,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If business has been increasing will the minister explain why he has been collecting less income tax every year?

Mr. POWER: People are getting wise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are wise to the kind of government we have.

Mr. BURY: I am delighted to hear the Minister of Finance damn the sales tax, but of course he keeps it on. It is not a good thing to have $120,000,000 of a sales tax around the neck of business. If I remember history correctly the sales tax was invented by the Duke of Alva and was enacted for the Netherlands, not so much for the purpose of raising money as for the purpose of crushing the people. Even that brilliant economist, Philip II of Spain, had grave doubts whether it was not an insane tax, and subsequently it was removed. It remains for Canada in the twentieth century to do what Alva and Philip II of Spain discovered ultimately was folly, and to put $120,000,000 a year around the neck of the trade of Canada.

I would ask the minister to consider two further exemptions to those which he has already suggested. One is an exemption upon lumber and building materials used by settlers in the erection of their residences and farm buildings. We are asking for settlers to come to this country; we are trying to improve the conditions of the settlers when they come here and make their living as cheap as possible, and yet we stick a sales tax on almost every article they have to use for the purpose of establishing themselves here. I would ask the minister to consider whether the sales tax should not be removed from all articles that come within that category.

There is another smaller line of article that I would like to mention. It is almost ludicrous, but I discover that eggs come into this country, when they are eggs, free, but that when they are blown and there is nothing but the empty shell, they have to pay the sales tax. The way that came to my knowledge was this: A naturalist in the province of Alberta who is accustomed to exchange or get in specimens of eggs from the United States, either by purchase or exchange, finds that he has to pay the sales tax the moment the empty shells come in here. It seems to me that naturalist specimens imported for this or other scientific purposes ought to be exempt from the sales tax. I mention these two, but particularly the question of the exemption of all building materials from the sales tax in the interest of settlers.

Mr. MURPHY: I was very pleased to hear the minister say that he was going to reduce the sales tax one per cent per year or every six months until it was done away with. Of all taxes that is the one that presses most heavily on the common people of this country, and it should be removed at as early a date as possible. As you read the amendment, Mr. Chairman, I understood it to say that the sales tax was to be taken off casings for oil wells.

Mr. ROBB: Certain casings.

Mr. MURPHY: I think casings for oil wells were mentioned. Possibly the minister has overlooked the fact that there are many salt wells in the country which use casings for the same purpose, and I think casings for this purpose should also be added to the list of exemptions.

Mr. ROBB: I will look into that. We have power under the act to arrange for that, but I should like to look into it first.

Mr. MURPHY: It is just to bring salt wells into the same category as oil wells.

Mr. ROBB: I will look carefully into it. The case mentioned by my hon. friend from East Edmonton regarding blown eggs, I imagine, does not amount to very much; it is rather a small matter.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I was hoping that the amendment the minister moved would have had some bearing on the case I brought to his attention a few minutes ago. Would the minister look into it—the case of the sales tax on dies and tools? I presume that the minister has found a great deal of trouble in collecting this tax. There are no invoices for it in the first place, and you must require special collectors; you have to go after that tax in a special way when no invoice appears, because the manufacturer, of course, will not invoice an article to himself. I doubt if the minister is getting very much out of the tax. It is not fair, it is not just, it is not right, it is not decent even, because it is a tax that is collected twice. You collect it on the tool the man works in his factory, and then again on the product of the tool itself; you collect the tax twice. It is almost impossible to get a knowledge of it for the reason that there is no invoice for the first tax. There is an invoice for the second, and you get your tax in that case, but there is no invoice for the first. I cannot see either the sense or the justice of keeping a tax of that kind on the statute book.

Mr. ROBB: There is very much in what my hon. friend says. He has convinced me that this is a tax on production that we might very well get rid of. I observe that the minister has the power to determine the value for taxation, and possibly that was placed there with the idea that the minister could provide that it should be very low.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): No, no.

Mr. ROBB: Let me tell my hon. friend how it came to be put in there. I am advised by the officer that it was put in there at the request of the manufacturers' association. I gather that they must have had in mind that the minister might impose merely a nominal tax, say one or five dollars. I think it is quite right; there should not be any tax on that, and I will have the matter looked into.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): It may be as the minister says, that after the law was passed the manufacturers' association advised you how to collect it, and the only way you can collect it is by making the manufacturer keep a record of the cost of the article. You say to him that the cost must be the labour on the article at $1.25 an hour, plus the cost of the raw material used in the article itself. You are putting the manufacturers to a lot of worry over something that you are not getting anything out of. The thing is not a reasonable propostion because they are paying the tax once anyway.

Mr. ROBB: I am sure my colleague the Minister of Customs, who administers the act, when he hears of my hon. friend's observations, will look into the matter. I agree with my hon. friend that the tax should be fixed at the minimum.

Mr. BURY: Will the minister look into the case I suggested, the exemption of lumber and building materials for settlers?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but I am not sure how we can relieve from taxation the settler who buys lumber and impose a tax on some person else who buys lumber. I am not sure that it might be a good thing to lighten up on the taxes on all these building materials.

Mr. HANSON: Why not wipe out the sales tax on all lumber used for domestic consumption? You do not tax lumber that is exported, and I never could understand why the distinction was made between domestic and foreign sales.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will admit at once that lumber is only one of many building materials. We shall have to look into the whole question before arriving at a conclusion.

Mr. LUCAS: Would the minister consider putting lumber and shingles in the list of exemptions under the sales tax? We are spending a great deal of money to induce settlers to come here, and practically the only place we allow them to go is on the farm. Lumber enters largely into the construction of houses and outbuildings on the farm, and one of the great problems we have in the west to-day is to keep the boys and girls on the farm. In my opinion one of the greatest things that is driving our boys and girls off the farm is the type of homes we have in the west. Many of them are nothing more than shacks and are not attractive enough to keep the boys and girls on the farm. I think the government would be doing something worth while if they would reduce the sales tax on lumber and shingles, and on other building materials if they can see their way to go that far. That would be doing a great deal to assist the incoming settlers, and to assist the settlers who are already on the land in improving their homes. We know that the finances of the country are improving, and I believe that this is a question that the minister might very well consider.

Mr. ROBB: We will look into it very carefully.

Mr. MANION: I would just point out to my hon. friend from Camrose and many of his friends that they have been telling us ever since this budget was brought down that it was a poor man's budget, that it was a budget for the great masses of the people. Despite the fact that we in this part of the House have pointed out that the only reductions made were in the taxes on high incomes, and a few things of that sort, they still insisted that this budget was going to help the masses of the people. If the Minister of Finance would explain to my hon. friend from Camrose the many ways in which this budget is going to help his friends in the west who are living in shacks, my hon. friend will be able to go back home quite satisfied that this budget is really a poor man's budget. Some of us have been unable to see how it can be so characterized. I made the statement about a month ago that I could not find anything in it for the working man or the small farmer such as my hon. friend referred to, and I have been hunting to find out where there is anything that will benefit those classes. I admit that once a month the ordinary working man saves a cent on a postage stamp and on angostura bitters. That is the only saving he makes.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): That applies only to Quebec.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend from Lincoln suggests that angostura bitters are to be found only in Quebec and that you cannot use them in this province.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not sure about that.

Mr. MANION: I was on the point of asking my hon. friend a question about the searching of rooms, to which I have seen references in the press, but I will not do so. I think the minister should point out to my good friends over here the many ways in which he says the small farmer will be benefited by the budget. Half of my constituents are farmers, and I should like to be able to go back and tell them of the advantages that will accrue to them.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend can find time to come to the Department of Finance, I will show him the correspondence from all over Canada.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend seems to be able to convince the people of Canada that he is benefiting them when he is not. He keeps on repeating the statement that he has lowered the sales tax when he knows that since his government came into power it has been increased from about 2½ or 3 per cent, where it stood when we went out of power, to 5 per cent. They removed the tax from a few small items, but taking it by and large it has been increased. I do not know why the minister invites me to go to his office to get the information in secret. Let him tell the public of Canada how the small farmers are benefited by this budget.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister says he has letters of commendation. I wonder if anyone has reminded him that he described his income tax reduction as a reduction all round, when he knew it was only half way round?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): "All along the line."

Mr. ROBB: I will come to that later.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In a word, misrepresentation followed misrepresentation all through the budget address.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): All along the line.

Mr. MEIGHEN: These things produce their momentary round of applause at the time, but the reaction and the disillusionment follow. It has come often in the life of this government, and it is again on the way. I do not think the records will be complete unless I put on Hansard some extracts I was referring to a few moments ago. I will first ask the committee to listen to this statement, directed against a 1½ per cent sales tax, by the late Solicitor General in this government—the Solicitor General in a government which raised the same tax to 6 per cent:

> The tax is simply for the purpose of drawing the line of demarkation more strongly between the millionaires and the profiteers of the country, and the poorer classes, who now get fairly decent clothes.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Who said that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. D. D. McKenzie, late Solicitor General in this government, and Solicitor General when they put the tariff up. The quotation continues:

> The idea is that they shall not be permitted to get purple and fine linen such as is worn by the millionaires.

That language was typical of those times. The Prime Minister himself inveighed against the sales tax. He said:

> Why instead of the removal of any of the taxation that bears immediately upon the masses of the people, the duties upon the necessaries of life, it is the business profits taxes and the luxury taxes that have been abolished.

Then he goes into a long dissertation to show how heavily this sales tax bears upon the backs of the masses of the people. I will quote now from Hansard, June 1, 1920, page 2978:

> Instead of alleviating the high cost of living as it affects the great mass of consumers they have added to it. They have increased the cost of living and made it more difficult for the people of Canada to live than it has been heretofore. To an invisible tariff they have added a visible tariff on a great multitude of commodities, thereby increasing the cost of living to the vast body of consumers.

And to this visible tariff, superadded to the invisible tariff, the same Prime Minister superadded again three per cent—that is to say, 100 per cent of what it was, leaving it 66⅔ per cent higher than it was—while to the "millionaires and profiteers" remissions are made in vast amounts by the government of which he is the head, all supported by the eloquent democrats of western Canada on both sides of the House. I will quote something from a speech by the hon. member for Last Mountain, now Long Lake. Since passing from Last Mountain to Long Lake the hon. member has become very much subdued; he is just as docile as the most democratic leaders could desire. Speaking against the 3 per cent sales tax on March 18, 1921, he said:

> The sales tax has been increased by 50 per cent, and that, to my mind, is a direct increase in the customs tariff. But what are we to expect? Some one has said that you cannot expect to have the perfume of roses around while there is a polecat under the table.

Has the polecat got so strong that the hon. member keeps out of the House? The perfume is now 66⅔ per cent stronger than when he uttered those words. He continues:

> Neither can you expect to have fair methods of taxation imposed by a government whose policy is dictated by and wholly in the interests of the big interests of the country.

Well, since the policy in respect of that tax has been on the one hand exaggerated, multiplied and intensified 66⅔ per cent, and on the other hand reduced in its application to what they describe as profiteers in big business, then I want to know what is the relationship and the affiliation between the government which does that and the big interests of the country? Will some hon. gentleman be good enough to explain how this language can be reconciled with support of the present budget? Will someone be good enough to explain how it is that a three per cent sales tax on the masses and a 66 per cent income tax on the very rich is a rich man's budget, a big interest budget, while a five per cent sales tax on the masses and a thirty per cent income tax on the very rich is a poor man's budget? There is scope for the ingenuity of those hon. members who have become enthusiastic over this budget and especially over the feature which we are now discussing; there is some scope for the ingenuity of the Minister of Finance himself. The language however did not stop with that which I have quoted. I take this from the former member for the constituency of Marquette, then leader of the Progressive party.

Mr. FORKE: Would the right hon. member mind mentioning the date?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I knew I would arouse the present leader of the Progressive party. The date is the 17th May, 1921. That was when the sales tax was three per cent. He was the leader of the Progressive party then and he was leader when it was increased, but he forgot all about this language when it was increased and so did the hon. member for Brandon. This was the language which the former leader of the Progressive party used against a three per cent sales tax:

> The operation of the sales tax will also bear heavily upon the poor man. If it raises the prices of commodities, it limits and decreases the consumption of them. If it limits and decreases consumption, it decreases production, and if it decreases production it brings stagnation to business and unemployment to labour.

Nothing could be worse than that. That was to follow a three per cent sales tax. How are hon. gentlemen able to tolerate a five per cent sales tax and all the dire consequences to the poor and to labour that are bound to ensue? He went on:

> But the minister, through the operation of the sales tax, is increasing the cost of living to every person in the country. What about the wealthy man who spends six months in California, or Florida, or Europe? He has not to pay taxes when he is away. But the poor man with the limited income—he may be out of work, without any income at all, just living on the slender resources he may have accummulated in the past—finds himself in an altogether different situation. What position is he in? And what position is the returned soldier in? This tax will hit them every day in the year; they cannot escape from it; and to that extent my hon. friend has been very unwise in the taxes he is imposing.

[Mr. Meighen.]

This is the sales tax increased to five per cent which hon. gentlemen support while they palliate and applaud a reduction of hundreds of thousands of dollars a year to the richer men of our country.

Mr. FORKE: Did the former hon. member for Marquette not move an amendment to that budget?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume he did right along the lines of his speech. But I was not tied up to his speech and the hon. member for Brandon was. Being tied up to the principles he then espoused, upon which he went to the people, how does he now cajole his party into supporting an intensification of what he then condemned?

Mr. BROWN: Is it not also true that the hon. member for Brandon and those who voted with him voted against that part of the budget for two years—in 1922 and 1923?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the conversion has been rather recent. Is that what the hon. member is making out?

Mr. BROWN: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that I am particularly concerned as to the exact date of the metamorphosis. All I know is that it is already perfected in the hon. member for Lisgar. Nothing could be more complete than the shackles which bind him to the Liberal party and as I look across the floor I find him in his natural place.

Mr. BROWN: I think the hon. member ought to feel flattered when the member for Lisgar comes where he can hear him best.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And I hope he never loses the lessons I am giving him now. I do not doubt that in the process of composing the Progressive party and getting them behind this budget or, in a word, making them Liberals or, as I would call it, "Grits," the hon. member for Brandon had a faithful coadjutor in the hon. member for Lisgar. There is no negation of the past; there is no superconversion that the hon. member for Lisgar is not capable of if it will help the Liberal party. The government could have raised the sales tax to 50 per cent; he would still have supported it and he would have brought all the pressure he could bring to bear to get hon. members to my left to do the same. If they wanted to let all the Queens of Sheba in the world pass by with no tax at all he would have supported that too so long as it was done by the Liberal party.

I come now to the words of the former hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, lately Solicitor General in this government. He said:

The Minister of Finance—I am sorry he is not in his place—

That is the present hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton).

—has shown favouritism to the millionaires, the trusts and the combines in this country—

How those words used to ring through the parliaments of that time.

—and, as usual, he has kept a heavy hand upon the poor people.

This is in relation to the sales tax:

While he abolished the luxury tax, the only weapon by which he could reach those who are able to travel and who can revel in luxuries, he retains the means for making things uncomfortable for the poor man and of taking from him practically that which he has not. He allows to escape the ladies with the diamonds and sumptuous furs, the silks and the satins; he lets go the Queen of Sheba, while he chases the little boy with the twenty-five pound bag of flour under his arm.

I need not remind the House that at the time those words were uttered there was not a single tax, not a five cent piece on a twenty-five pound bag of flour. The tax made no difference whatever to the opposition of that day, any thing at all that would raise a wave and storm of prejudice through the country against the government, the falser the charge, the better they liked it. Anything would do if in the minds of the great masses of the people they could get them to think that the government was favouring the rich. What I am calling attention to is that this is the government which now holds the sales tax 65 per cent higher than it was then while it boasts of a reduction in the income tax. I do not think I have finished with the former hon. member for Cape Breton and Victoria yet. He said further:

Now I am telling the present Finance Minister that while he lets the Queen of Sheba go by in swell array he is having a tax collector stand on the corner, stick in hand, to knock down the poor fellow that has not paid the tax on his twenty-five pounds of flour. All these things constitute evidence that the poor man is visited with the scourge of taxation, while those who can better afford to pay such taxes are allowed to go scot-free.

I wonder what he would say about the government now who added to this same tax that he describes as bearing especially upon the poor, making it 5 per cent where it was 3 per cent, and who smile in peace and admiration while all the Queens of Sheba in the world pass by. The language used by these gentlemen does not differ substantially. Mr. Speaker is not in the chair, but perhaps I may quote some of his words as the most moderate I can find of the attacks on the sales tax. One never heard any attack on the income tax in those days, for it was impossible to make it high enough to suit hon. gentlemen opposite. These are the views expressed at that time by the present Speaker.

One has not to be much versed in political economy to know that the basic wants of man are threefold: food, clothing and shelter.

One would think, to hear hon. gentlemen opposite now, that the basic want of humanity was a motor car.

These necessities, in a cold country like Canada, should not be taxed. Any tax on the necessities of life are a handicap to the labourer, to the worker; they press more heavily on the poor man than they do on any other man in the community.

It is fortunate for Mr. Speaker that he does not have to vote in favour of a government which has added mightily to the tax on these necessities in a cold country where they should not be taxed at all. The government has now come to the conclusion that these things are not half so necessary as a luxurious motor car to ride around in. I have some other quotations, but I think I have gone far enough, Mr. Chairman, to show the sincerity which has characterized the Liberal party in the matter of taxation—sincerity which is now so obvious in the present budget. The Liberal party stand to-day convicted of having for years in Canada conducted a campaign in which they had not a particle of belief and which they knew was insincere and fraudulent from the beginning. They stand convicted now of having attacked us for pursuing a course which they knew was right, and for not not doing just what they found essential to avoid doing when they got into office. If what we committed was an offence, what they perpetrated in the same direction was a crime. To-day they sit with no defence whatever; they cannot utter one word in palliation of the language they used at that time. All they say is, "Oh, well, we described the budget in this way and we described it in that, and as a consequence we have received letters from people who believed us." Well, the number of those who have believed them will diminish day by day.

Mr. BOIVIN: The remarks of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) whom we are all glad to see back in the House after his recent illness, were certainly very interesting. His memoirs of days gone by were especially illuminating in so far as they related to some members who are no longer here and who will not be obliged to vote upon the resolutions now under consideration. But when he read so admirably those extracts from Hansard I was reminded of the reading from Hansard by members on this side of the House of extracts from certain speeches made by the right hon. gentleman himself when it was proposed to reduce the tariff on agricultural implements.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Give some of those quotations.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not happen to have them under my hand, and they have been quoted so often that I should not care to repeat them. I do not want to follow my right hon. friend's example and quote from past debates to-day, but if I did I certainly would see that they applied to the question before the committee. My right hon. friend's recital of the story of the polecat is not apropos because the government is not increasing the sales tax at the present time. The story of the polecat and references to hon. gentlemen who have left the House would have been much more appropriate two or three years ago when the sales tax was increased.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are pretty apt yet.

Mr. BOIVIN: The right hon. gentleman has tried to convey the impression in his very able and subtle manner that the government is to-day increasing the tax when as a matter of fact it is decreasing taxation. The former government increased the sales tax in some respects, but that government levied the tax at the source. It imposed a sales tax of 6 per cent on practically all commodities, later reducing it to 5 per cent and then to a smaller amount on certain commodities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the hon. member mean by "the former government"?

Mr. BOIVIN: The government which was in power previous to the last election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought it was still the same government.

Mr. BOIVIN: Well, the government in power during the last parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It should be the former government.

Mr. BOIVIN: No, I am not at all prepared to admit what my hon. friend seeks to imply. The only one who thinks that the former government ceased to exist at the conclusion of the election is my right hon. friend himself. Parliament has decided against him on many occasions and he does not like to be reminded of the fact.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. MANION: The majority of the people in the country were of the same opinion.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am always glad to hear from my hon. friend from Fort William who has the habit of interjecting the right remark at the wrong time. Does the hon. gentleman say that the majority of the people decided against this government?

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOIVIN: When?

Mr. MANION: On October 29.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not want to precipitate that debate again, but if the hon. member will count the votes given to supporters of this government, he will find that they were much more numerous than the votes given in favour of supporters of the opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did this House ever vote confidence in this government?

Mr. CAHILL: It never voted non-confidence.

Mr. BOIVIN: This House has voted confidence in the present government every time any question has been submitted to its decision.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister said it was not the same government. I thought he would go back on what he had said.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not intend to go back on anything; nor has this government the slightest intention of doing anything of the kind. If my right hon. friend will consult the majorities cast in favour of the government, he will find that we are going forward vote by vote.

Mr. McGIBBON: Wait until the people get another chance at you.

Mr. BOIVIN: My right hon. friend, after endeavouring to create the impression that we were increasing the tax when he knows very well that we are decreasing taxation—

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about section 4?

Mr. BOIVIN: Section 4 is merely for the purpose of securing uniformity in the law in all the provinces of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Extending it where it was not before.

Mr. BOIVIN: Not at all. Heretofore there had been differences in the interpretation of the law as between different judges in various parts of the country, and the proposed provision merely seeks to bring about uniformity. It has no other object. There is no increase in the sales tax this year. My right hon. friend is suggesting to-day, as I remarked before, in his very able and subtle manner, that this government has reduced the income tax to a considerable extent, particularly as it affects the richest people in the country; and in the same breath he blames the Minister of Finance for claiming that the income tax has been reduced all round. He claims that this statement is not correct. One story or the other must be wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think so.

Mr. BOIVIN: Does my right hon. friend think that both are right?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. BOIVIN: That we are reducing and increasing at the same time?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly. The hon. minister understood me before, and so that everybody may know he understood me I will repeat what I said. On all incomes from $50,000 up there is a diminution; only on part of incomes from $50,000 down is there a diminution, on scores and hundreds there is an increase. This government is quite capable of increasing and decreasing a tax at the same time. They increase the tax on the lower incomes and decrease it on the higher.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am quite willing to admit that we do increase the income tax in part on the incomes of those who should have paid the tax before, but who were exempted by hon. members on the other side of the House when they were in power, and who consequently were not called upon to pay the tax that they should have paid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why did you not do it four years ago?

Mr. BOIVIN: Because last year, two years ago, three years ago and four years ago there was no general revision of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why not?

Mr. BOIVIN: The first revision came this year. I was not a member of the government three years ago.

Mr. MANION: That is the reason?

Mr. BOIVIN: Not the only reason, but it might be one reason.

Mr. MANION: I think so. There were a great many taxes not reduced three years ago.

Mr. BOIVIN: The sales tax was increased three years ago and the income tax was not reduced three years ago because this government was obliged to find funds to pay the debts placed upon the shoulders of the people of Canada by the government of which my right hon. friend was prime minister. That is why the reduction did not take place, and that is why the sales tax was "increased"—that is to say, if reducing it from 8½ per cent to 5 per cent can be called an "increase." My right hon. friend says: Oh, when I was in power, and the sales tax was originally imposed, there was no great burden placed upon the people and there was no pyramiding of the sales tax; we imposed half of the three per cent at the source and the other half a little further on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am glad that my right hon. friend says, "hear, hear." I happen to have in my hand a document prepared by the officials of the department, which shows that in the days when my right hon. friend and his supporters were in power, instead of paying 2½ per cent on shoes the tax was 8½ per cent. When the hides were imported by the manufacturer he paid 2½ per cent; when the leather was sold by him to the wholesaler there was 1½ per cent paid on the value of the leather; when the wholesaler sold that leather to the boot and shoe manufacturer there was another 1½ per cent paid; when the boots and shoes were sold by the manufacturer to the wholesaler there was another 1½ per cent paid on them, and when those boots and shoes were sold by the wholesaler to the retailer there was another 1½ per cent paid, making a total of 8½ per cent on the boots and shoes. Of course, there is no pyramiding there!

Mr. KAISER: How many boots are made out of a hide?

Mr. BOIVIN: That is a staggering question, but my answer is that it would depend a great deal on the size of the hide.

Mr. MANION: And the size of the boots.

Mr. BOIVIN: But we were talking of the percentage of tax on the price of the hides, on the price of the leather and on the price of the shoes; so the tax in reality was 8½ per cent. But that was not the only place where taxes were pyramided.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Surely the hon. minister is not serious in saying that because there is a tax of 1½ per cent on the hides that means another 1½ per cent tax on all the shoes made out of it? Absurd.

Mr. BOIVIN: No; that would not be so bad, but there was 1½ per cent on the hide and 1½ per cent on the shoes besides.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no, the minister added the two together.

Mr. BOIVIN: I have added five taxes together to make the 8½ per cent. I added the tax on the hide, the tax on the leather when it was sold to the boot and shoe manufacturer, the tax on the boots and shoes when they were sold to the wholesaler, and the tax when they were sold by the wholesaler to the retailer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But you would make a dozen pairs of boots out of one hide.

Mr. BOIVIN: Certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then why do you add the percentage for each pair?

Mr. BOIVIN: The percentage is what I am adding, not the tax itself nor the price. Let us now pass on to clothing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am not in a hurry to pass on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would get away from that if I were you.

Mr. BOIVIN: I would be willing to discuss the matter with my right hon. friend at considerable length.

Mr. KAISER: Is the minister convinced that the final percentage on a pair of boots would be 8½ per cent? The hide itself would make a dozen pairs of boots. The total percentage cannot be 8½.

Mr. BOIVIN: What I intended to convey was that under the old system of imposing a small tax on every transaction there was more pyramiding than there is under the system in force to-day whereby one tax only is charged on the manufactured article.

Mr. McGIBBON: But the minister said the final tax was 8½ per cent on the cost of the pair of boots. Absurd.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, absurd.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was absurd, but it was so.

Mr. BOIVIN: It was absolutely absurd to charge 8½ per cent on the cost of the boots, but that is what it amounted to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. McGIBBON: The first 1½ per cent would be probably on thirty or forty cents' worth of leather.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. BOIVIN: Certainly, the tax on the first transaction was of course smaller than the tax on the last because it kept pyramiding all the time. Perhaps I should have charged the percentage of profit in each instance on the tax, but I have left that out of the computation, and to arrive at what I term the final pyramid I have only added the rates of taxation on the different transactions. Now I come to the sales tax on clothing manufactured in Canada. When the wholesaler sold his wool to the manufacturer of cloth there was a sales tax of 1½ per cent; when the cloth was sold by him to the wholesaler there was another 1½ per cent; when he sold it to the manufacturer of clothing there was another 1½ per cent; when he sold the suit of clothes to the wholesaler there was another 1½ per cent; and when he sold it to the retailer there was another 1½ per cent, making a total of 7½ per cent approximately on the cost of the clothing to the retailer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Ridiculous.

Mr. BOIVIN: It may sound ridiculous now. It was wiped out because it was so ridiculous that the people of Canada would not stand for it any longer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same process will wipe out the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BOIVIN: Oh no, it will take a much more strenuous process than that to wipe out any hon. gentleman on this side of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is ridiculous.

Mr. BOIVIN: I merely bring this to the attention of the committee to show that the sales tax which is imposed to-day, large as it is, and liable to be pyramided as it is—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am willing to admit that the sales tax is liable to be pyramided to a certain extent; I do not think anyone on this side of the House ever said it could not and would not be pyramided under certain circumstances, but I say it is not nearly so bad to have one straight sales tax which the consumer knows he is obliged to pay and which is based upon the manufacturer's price of the goods. It is a hundred times better to have this tax than to have a sales tax of one and one-half per cent on every transaction, which was almost tantamount to a turnover tax. There are a great many things to be said in favour of a turnover tax, but if such a tax is to be imposed it should be a very small tax and should be imposed on all transactions. That is not what hon. gentlemen opposite did when they imposed their sales tax which they said was only one and one-half per cent, but which in many cases worked up as high as seven and eight per cent.

I do not want to go into a discussion of the income tax at present, because I know I would be very properly called to order by the Chairman. To-morrow, I hope, the income tax resolutions will be before parliament, and it may then be my privilege to show the people of Canada that the old tax as it was imposed, was a very unfair tax, by which a great many people did not pay what they should pay, while others paid a great deal more than their fair proportion. But I will say that in connection with the income tax there are at least 35 per cent of the people of Canada who paid income taxes last year who will pay no income taxes this year, and for those people there is certainly a real reduction. I will say also that for those who are between $10,000 and $50,000 a year, it is only in the case where 50 per cent or more of those revenues are derived from the dividends of joint stock companies that there is any increase. When the figure of $50,000 is passed there is a decrease all along the line, but there is not the same proportionate decrease for the big incomes as for the smaller incomes. I am sure that if my hon. friends compare the figures they will admit that statement; they will see that this is really a poor man's budget, and that when this budget was introduced it brought a reduction in income tax to the man with the small income. The hon. member for Fort William smiles again; I know he is going to interject another remark, but before he does so let me tell him that of the $12,000,000 reduction in income tax over $6,000,000 is removed from the people with incomes of less than $6,000 a year. If that is not a poor man's budget I would like my hon. friend to tell me what is.

Mr. MANION: What about the 90 per cent of the people who never pay income tax at all?

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friend wishes us to pay a bonus to those who never pay taxes, that may be good Conservative legislation, but I have yet to learn how we can reduce taxation to those who do not pay taxes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is always wise to do the applauding before the truth is revealed. I would suggest to the minister that if he really wants to relieve the poor—those for whom his heart as well as others bled some years ago; those who never get within striking distance of ability to pay income tax—the thing to do would be to reduce the sales tax. How is it that the government stand to-day with that tax 66⅔ per cent higher, while they reduced these other taxes and boast of having a poor man's budget?

Mr. BOIVIN: My right hon. friend is very familiar with the law; he knows it very much better than I know it, and he helped frame it. If he will take the Special War Revenue Act of 1915 as amended to date, even without the amendments of this year; if he will read sub-paragraph 4 of section 19 BBB he will find that everything required by a poor man, everything going into a poor man's budget and almost everything really a necessity of life, does not pay any sales tax at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman, then, is the author of the theory that clothing is not necessary to a poor man, but an automobile is?

Mr. BOIVIN: The automobile pays sales tax.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Robb moves that section 6 be amended by adding thereto the following:

Apples, dried, dessicated or evaporated; goods enumerated in customs tariff item 105a.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7:

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does this do? Is carbonic acid gas a necessity of life, or what?

Mr. ROBB: This is removing taxation; it will be a loss in revenue of $28,000 a year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does this affect?

Mr. ROBB: Soda water.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 115, to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, May 27, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Mr. W. F. KAY (Brome-Missisquoi) presented the second report of the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization as follows:

Your committee recommend to the House that they be given leave to sit while the House is in session.

He said: By unanimous consent of the House I beg to move:

That the second report of the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization presented this day be concurred in.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I do not wish to direct any special opposition to this motion, but I think there are already just about enough committees sitting while the House is in session; there are more committees than House. I hope the precedent thus set will not be pursued very far.

Motion agreed to.

SADDLE LAKE INDIAN RESERVE

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): With reference to the further inquiry yesterday of the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) with respect to the recent sale of Saddle Lake lands, it is now possible to answer two of the three questions to which definite answer was not given some days ago. The questions were as follows:

8. What were the names and addresses of the successful allottees and how many acres were allotted to each?

9. How many and who among the said successful allottees were at the date of the said allotment farmers actually engaged in farming operations in the district?

10. Have any of the said allotments been approved by the government? If so, which and when?

We are now in a position to reply to questions 8 and 10, but it will be necessary to obtain a special report from Agent Ostrander before reply can be made to question No. 9.

The answer to question No. 8 is as follows:

Joseph Gagnon, Brosseau, Alberta, 320 acres.
Edwin McPheeters, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Joseph W. Beaudry, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
John Pratch, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Arthur Fontaine, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Alphonse Fontaine, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Henri Fontaine, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Antoine Fontaine, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Oliver Bussieres, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Flore-ida Charest, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Fortunat Charron, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Henri Charron, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.

[Mr. Robb.]

Alphonse Turnul, St. Paul, Alberta, 160 acres.
Joseph Leroux, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
James Cormack, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Ernest Belzil, St. Paul, Alberta, 160 acres.
Victor Tessier, St. Paul, Alberta, 160 acres.
Cyrice Lafrance, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Charles Lambert, St. Paul, Alberta, 160 acres.
Joseph Parent, St. Paul, Alberta, 160 acres.
Alphonse Poitras, St. Paul, Alberta, 160 acres.
Donat Bougie, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Napoleon Garneau, Legal, Alberta, 320 acres.
Elzear Tremblay, Legal, Alberta, 320 acres.
Frank Jakubik, Edmonton, Alberta, 320 acres.
Pierre Charron, St. Paul, Alberta, 320 acres.
Ed. LeBlanc, St. Paul, Alberta, 160 acres.

Question No. 10 may be answered by stating that the allotments as indicated above and reported by our agent have been approved by the department.

With reference to the return ordered at the request of the hon. member, calling for the production of copies of correspondence, documents, data, etc., in connection with this sale of Saddle Lake lands, some delay must occur in preparation of this return, as it will be necessary to obtain considerable of the information desired direct from Agent Ostrander, at Saddle Lake.

PEACE RIVER ELECTION

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): I beg to present the petition of James Arthur Collins of Chisholm, Alberta, praying that the House of Commons of Canada will investigate the conduct of the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada, the returning officer for the electoral district of Peace River, Edward Henry Sheppard, aforesaid, the deputy returning officer, Peter A. Robb, aforesaid, and such other officer or officers as may be necessary in connection with the establishment of a polling place at Brule Mines poll No. 4 aforesaid and the taking of, the counting and recounting the votes cast at such poll in the electoral district of Peace River aforesaid, and that such Chief Electoral Officer, returning officer, deputy returning officer or other officer or officers be directed to take such action as may be requisite and necessary to secure the return to the House of Commons of the candidate who secured the greatest number of votes cast by the electors of the electoral district of Peace River on the 29th of October, 1925, aforesaid, and for such other and further relief as may seem meet in the premises.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—LAND PURCHASES

Mr. FOSTER:

1. Has the property known as the Stephens property, on Dorchester street, Montreal, adjacent to the tunnel, been purchased by the Canadian National Railways?
2. If so, at what price and for what purpose?
3. Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to purchase St. Pauls church property and a number of other properties in the vicinity, for terminals?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING:

1. Yes.
2. (a) $550,000.

(b) For the protection of the interests of the Canadian National Railways.

3. No present intention.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TORONTO BUILDING

Mr. MANION:

1. Has any new agreement been made regarding the erection of a building corner King and Yonge streets, Toronto, formerly occupied by C.N.R.?
2. If so, with whom?
3. On what terms as to rental?
4. How many stories is the building to consist of, and how many stories are the government taking?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING:

1. No.
2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

SCHOOL LANDS

Mr. BLACK (Halifax):

1. How many acres of land have been set aside by the federal government for school purposes in each of the provinces of Canada?
2. What were the conditions under which the land was set aside?
3. What is the amount to the credit of each province on account of school lands with the federal government?
4. What amount has been paid by the federal government to each of the provinces to date on account of school lands?
5. What is the average amount received per acre in each province on account of school lands?
6. What is the approximate value of the school lands unsold in each province?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. School lands are designated as such only as survey progresses. When provinces have been fully surveyed, it is estimated that the total acreage allotted for school lands will be approximately as follows: Manitoba, 7,993,600 acres; Saskatchewan, 8,421,100 acres; Alberta, 7,798,600 acres.

2. See Section 22 of the Statutes of Canada, Chapter 55, Victoria, 1872.

3. Manitoba, $5,840,489.21; Saskatchewan, $14,834,655.86; Alberta, $7,826,970.26.

4. Manitoba, $5,596,575.18; Saskatchewan, $10,384,483.21; Alberta, $6,724,069.73.

5. Manitoba, $9.76; Saskatchewan, $17.76; Alberta, $14.02.

6. Impossible to estimate even approximate value, as unsold school lands, even in surveyed territories, have not been inspected and valued.

PROTECTION OF ESKIMO

Mr. ROGERS:

1. In view of the great decrease in the Eskimo population of the Canadian Arctic and the marked increase in the Eskimo population of Alaska, U.S.A., and Greenland, Denmark, are any steps being taken to provide local medical service such as is being done in the countries named?
2. Are Royal Canadian Mounted Police posts generally established where new trading posts of importance are set up amongst the Eskimo of the Northwest Territories?
3. Are there any Indian agents amongst the Eskimo of Northern Quebec or Hudson strait and the bay?
4. If not, what protection can they obtain corresponding to the protection afforded the Eskimo of the Northwest Territories by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.
2. Yes, as far as possible, up to the present.
3. No, the Department of Indian Affairs is represented by officers in charge of established posts of the R.C.M. Police.
4. Answered by No. 3.

WAR REPARATION CLAIMS—MR. JAMES FRIEL

Mr. DOUCET:

1. From what date has Mr. James Friel, advocate, been performing the duties of investigator of war claims?
2. What sums of money has he drawn from the public treasury during his term of office?
3. Of the total amount what was drawn as salary and what was drawn for expenses?
4. How many claims were heard and how many decisions were rendered?
5. What action has been taken following the decisions rendered?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. 11th July, 1925.
2. $11,015.92.
3. Salary, $7,258.06; expenses, $3,757.86.
4. 282 heard, 560 decisions made. These include cases heard by the late Mr. Pugsley.
5. No report has been submitted.

CHICOUTIMI HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to incorporate the Chicoutimi Harbour Commissioners, and to make provision for the improvement, management and regulation of the Harbour of Chicoutimi, in the province of Quebec.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend section 262 of the Railway Act, 1919, and to provide that the total amount of money to be apportioned and payable from any annual appropriation shall not, in the case of any one rail level crossing, exceed forty per cent of the cost of the actual construction work, and shall not, in any such case, exceed the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars.

He said. His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT ORDERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday, the 31st of May, instant, and every Monday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I do not think the extra Monday which was promised private members has ever yet arrived. The budget debate, of course, had precedence on Mondays as on other days, and last Monday was a holiday. So far there has been no day available for the discussion of one or two important motions which I understood the government to guarantee. Personally I would not object if one more day were granted, and that, I think, was the understanding of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I recollect, the extra Monday was desired in order to afford my hon. friend from Toronto East Centre (Mr. Bristol) an opportunity to go on with a motion he intended moving, but I understand he has since decided not to proceed with it. The government has no desire to prevent any hon. member from going on with private motions, but most of the motions have been dealt with and there is a general feeling that we should get on with the other work of the session.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are some private motions remaining to be considered. What the Prime Minister says does apply to the hon. member in question, but there are one or two others who would like to take up motions standing in their names. I would suggest that the motion stand until to-morrow so that we may have an opportunity of considering the matter in the meantime.

Motion stands.

INQUIRY AS TO PUBLIC BILLS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I would like to direct the attention of the government to pages 12, 13 and 14 of the order paper, on which appear public bills and orders. In these public bills and orders are a number of bills standing for second reading, including many matters of public interest and public importance. I wish to also direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that I moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Post Office Act, but the Prime Minister asked me to have the bill stand over, although I was prepared to go on. I want to ask the Prime Minister, is he prepared to carry out the bargain he made with me in that debate, and to give me an opportunity to move the second reading of this bill?

I would further draw his attention to the public bills on the order paper for to-day, on pages 12 and 13, standing in my name, under Orders Nos. 23, 24, 26 and 27. Is this a free parliament or not? Are private members to be prevented by the rules of the House from bringing in and going on with a bill? What are we meeting for? I would ask the Prime Minister if an opportunity will be given to give these bills a second reading, which will take only a very few moments, so that they can be referred to a committee. I would direct the Prime Minister's attention to the undertaking that was given.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with my hon. friend that it is regrettable that the session has occupied such a long time. With respect to the public bills that he has mentioned, I think they will have to take their chance in the regular way. Any agreement that has been made with my hon. friend, though, with respect to any particular measure will be carried out.

RESOLUTIONS WITHDRAWN

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I want to ask the permission of the House to drop from the order paper certain resolutions which the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) asked should be transferred from their proper place to another order, wherein they have remained in cold storage, from the time of their transference until the present moment, without any possibility of their being reached. As they are simply cluttering up the order paper unnecessarily and as there is no likelihood of their being discussed I would ask that they be dropped. The resolutions to which I refer are, on page 22, numbers 17, 18, 19 and 20, and on page 23, numbers 22, 23 and 24. I want to congratulate the minister on his success in preventing me from reaching these motions.

Mr. BOIVIN: They all came out in the committee.

Mr. CLARK: No, they did not.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) wishes to drop certain motions of his now standing on the order paper. In order to do this, according to the procedure of the House, a motion should be made that the hon. member be given leave to drop the notices of motion standing in his name on the order paper, being Nos. 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 23 and 24.

Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to drop those motions?

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS ANSWERED—DUPLICATES FOR MEMBERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): It has been the custom in the past when questions are answered to have duplicate copies handed at once to the members interested. At present this practice is sometimes followed but occasionally it is not. For example, a duplicate of an answer to a question of mine to-day was handed to me, but yesterday I could not get a copy of an answer that was given; I had to wait until to-day to read it in Hansard. I would suggest that the government insist upon all departments forwarding, for the convenience of members, duplicate copies of answers to all questions appearing on the order paper.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS AND REPORTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): When members apply to the distribution office for documents and public reports, no copies of which are available there, may they receive such papers from the Printing Bureau free of charge or must they pay the cost charged by the bureau? I am quite willing to pay my share of any expenses incurred by the Printing Bureau in connection with documents procured there, but I think that when members of the House are required to consider bills, with respect to which necessary information is to be obtained only in public reports, they should be allowed to obtain those reports from the bureau. I have in mind Bill No. 8 now before the House, about which I know nothing. I wanted to read the report of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission, and I sought also to obtain a copy of the Canada Grain Act of 1925, unbound. I cannot find these in the distribution office and on previous occasions, when I have applied to the Printing Bureau, I have received from them a bill for current reports. These reports and papers should be made available to members in order to facilitate the discussion of matters under consideration in the House.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Labour): Members have a right to apply to the distribution office for any documents they may require. These documents are distributed subject to certain regulations as to quantity and so on. I shall be very glad to make inquiries with regard to any particular matters that my hon. friend refers to, and perhaps to-morrow I may be able to give him a statement as to those.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, when I applied to the distribution office I was treated with great courtesy, but the officials told me that they have not these documents on hand and that I should apply to the Printing Bureau. When I applied there I was told that I would have to pay for them at certain rates, to be charged up against me. I am perfectly willing to pay my share, but still I think public documents of that kind should be made available to members who need them in their parliamentary work.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Minister of Railways if he intends to give the House an early opportunity to discuss the estimate for the completion of the Hudson Bay Railway?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I am hoping to be able to deal with the estimate for the construction work on the Hudson Bay railway when the estimates for the Department of Railways and Canals are next before the committee of Supply.

INTERNATIONAL PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE ON COMMERCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister to a despatch from London which appeared in La Presse of the day before yesterday, and to found a question upon it. The despatch is as follows:

> Canadians in London are asking to-day why Canada alone among the dominions, and almost alone among all the countries of the world, is not represented at the Parliamentary International Conference on Commerce.
> All the great nations are represented there, and even countries like Afghanistan, Portugal, Luxemburg, Turkey, Honduras and San Salvador have their parliamentary or diplomatic representation. Australia has sent three delegates; New Zealand three, of whom Sir Thomas McKenzie, is one; South Africa one; and the Indias three. But Canada has no one.
> The reason given, in reply to questions put on the subject, is that Canada has nobody here who is able to represent the country officially. The Hon. E. N. Rhodes, Premier of Nova Scotia, ought to be the official delegate of Canada, but he sailed yesterday on the steamship Arabic to return home, and apparently there is nobody who is able to take his place.
> The first sitting of the conference is being held to-day at Westminster palace. It is proposed to discuss all questions relative to international companies, to bankruptcy, to agricultural credits and problems of urgency. The object is to elaborate plans capable of guiding countries which contemplate instituting a code of commerce.

I should like to ask the government if they can give us any information whether Canada is really represented or to be represented; and if not, why not?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the despatch read by my right hon. friend it sounded to me as though it was a well-intentioned bit of publicity for Mr. Rhodes. This I do not take exception to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is in La Presse.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Nevertheless it looks as though it was so intended. However, it is the first intimation I have had of the international conference referred to. I do not know that any invitation has been extended to the government to be represented. I do not know that it is an official conference; I am inclined to think it is not, but I will have this phase of the question looked into.

As to capable representation, there can be no doubt as to our having very many persons in London well qualified to represent Canada. I cannot think of anyone better qualified than the present high commissioner to represent our country at any international conference on commerce and I believe had he been invited he would have attended. I am inclined to think that the conference is of a voluntary character, not official and that those who are attending it are representing boards of trade and similar bodies.

BRITISH MARKET FOR CANADIAN CATTLE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to read a letter for the benefit of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning)—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. member to kindly base his question on the letter, but not to read it.

Mr. MULLINS: This is a letter from Lord Bledisloe, Minister of Agriculture in England. He has recently received one hundred steers from this country and is very much pleased with them. Lord Bledisloe was strongly opposed to the admission of Canadian cattle into the British Isles, but I asked him to try a hundred, and he adopted my suggestion. He has now written me a splendid letter of recommendation of Canadian steers, and he has also influenced a number of others to purchase Canadian cattle for grazing purposes in England. There is a wonderful market for Canadian cattle in that country—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sure the hon. member is coming to his question—he is steering that way.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Railways if they are doing anything to secure tonnage for shipping cattle to the British market. There has been so much delay in this regard—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MULLINS: I would ask those hon. gentlemen if there is any probability of putting the government merchant marine into this service.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I beg to assure my hon. friend that I have not charge of the merchant marine. Everything is being done that can be done to increase the amount of tonnage available for shipping live cattle to the British market. There are plans on foot that I hope will be completed at no very distant date.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer offhand in regard to the government merchant marine, but perhaps I may indicate to my hon. friend how information along that line can conveniently be secured. The special committee on Canadian National affairs is to meet to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock for the purpose of dealing with the merchant marine, and I feel sure from discussions which have already taken place in the committee that its members would welcome my hon. friend there, where he will have an opportunity to address detailed questions to the officials of the merchant marine regarding this matter. Possibly such a discussion would be helpful to him and to the Canadian cattle industry.

HOUSE PROTECTIVE SERVICE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the Ottawa Citizen of last Friday, there appeared a sensational article headed, "Secret House sessions debate booze round-up." Since this article has been broadcast throughout the length of Canada, it affects very definitely each member of the House. It strikes me that the present situation is most unsatisfactory to all members, and I think it is even more unsatisfactory to the officials concerned. I should like to ask the government whether we may hope to have a statement with regard to this matter; and, further, whether in the meantime the government will state if what is contained in the final paragraph of the article referred to represents the position of the government:

> It is known that parliament hill claims exemption from ordinary supervision in such matters and that local officers charged with enforcement of the Ontario Temperance Act are forbidden admission to the precincts of the federal House in discharge of their duties.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I should say that this matter is one for His Honour the Speaker of the House to deal with rather than for the government. I understand the House and its precincts are under his Honour's jurisdiction.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I am quite right in saying, Mr. Speaker, that a matter of this kind which reflects upon unnamed individuals in this House reflects upon the whole membership of the House of Commons. Some of us know the effects of charges of this character which were made some years ago in the Ontario House, and some of us think it quite right that we should ask for a public statement when a public charge of this kind is made in one of the leading Ottawa papers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I quite agree with my hon. friend that a statement should be made, but I think the statement would come more appropriately from His Honour the Speaker of the House than from a member of the government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quite satisfied, if we get the statement. With regard to the second part, I should also think it would be a good thing to know if this House possesses what might be called extra-territorial rights.

Mr. SPEAKER: I had intended, when the reports from the Sergeant at Arms had been handed to myself, to call a meeting of the Board of Internal Economy, and then bring the question before the House. I may say at once that I do not take much stock, if I may use the expression, in the publication of the article which has been read by the hon. gentleman. I think I can claim without flattering anyone that this House is composed of gentlemen, and that there has been nothing sinister here since I have had the honour of being Speaker. But, of course, when something is published in the papers with headlines, people are liable to be frightened about the morale of this House, I therefore intended to bring this matter before the Board of Internal Economy and then report fully to the House.

Let me say, however, that it was to prevent petty thefts which had taken place in certain parts of the House that the visit which is usually made by the officers under the Sergeant at Arms was made on that occasion, with perhaps a little more care. I declare once more that from the reports I have received there is nothing reflecting on the honour of any member of this House, but I am bringing the matter before the Board of Internal Economy so that a full report may be published in the press in order to counteract the effect which may have been produced by the publication of the article in question in the Ottawa papers.

GENEVA CONFERENCE ON DISARMAMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked me a question yesterday, the answer to which I promised for today. The question is:

Was Canada invited to have a representative at the Geneva Conference on Disarmament? Was Canada consulted as to policy, and has the British representative, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, been instructed to speak for Canada?

In answer I would say that the Conference on Disarmament has not yet been held. In September 1925 the assembly of the League of Nations requested the council to make preliminary studies with a view to holding a conference for the reduction and limitation of armaments. In December the council appointed a preparatory commission consisting of representatives named by each of the ten members of the council and by certain other members of the leauge specially interested by reason of their geographical position, namely, Poland, Jugoslavia, Rumania, Finland, Holland and Bulgaria. Invitations were also extended to three non-members of the League, the United States, Germany and Russia, and accepted by the first two. The meeting which is being held at Geneva in the present week is simply a meeting of this preparatory commission, on which Canada and the great majority of the other members of the league are not directly represented. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who is a member of the preparatory commission, represents the government of Great Britain, and has not received any instructions to speak for Canada. If it is found feasible to hold a disarmament conference in 1927, as is now anticipated, Canada, and all other members of the league, will doubtless be represented and our country will have an opportunity of setting forth its views.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the Prime Minister would tell us what Canada has to disarm.

PETITION FROM SUMAS LANDOWNERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HARRY J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to a question I asked on April 27 concerning a petition from the Sumas landowners, asking that certain provincial legislation be disallowed. At that time I asked the Minister of Justice if such a petition had been received, and if the correspondence might be laid on the table. Since then a considerable time has elapsed, and I might also ask if the governor in council has reached a decision in this matter.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am glad my hon. friend has raised this question. At the time he made the inquiry I hesitated to give an assurance that the papers would be tabled, because I was not sure that it was proper to do so before I had prepared a recommendation to the Governor in Council in this matter. However, I see no objection to doing so now, and I think my hon. friend and the House are entitled to have these documents tabled, which I now hand to the clerk. With regard to the second part of my hon. friend's question, the matter is under consideration and no decision has been reached.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DISCLOSURE OF CERTAIN INFORMATION REGARDING OPERATION

Mr. A. de WITT FOSTER (Hants-Kings): May I direct the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) to Hansard of May 18, in which I asked a question regarding the purchase of an electirc line running from about Moreau street to Bout de l'Ile, from the Montreal Tramways Company or one of its affiliated companies. The minister pointed out that it was not in the public interest to give the price paid, but in view of the fact that in answer to a question asked to-day regarding a similar purchase, although not of a railway, the price is given, may I ask the Minister of Railways if it will be now in order to have the price given as a supplementary answer to that formerly given?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I will be very glad to get the information for my hon. friend. I may say by way of explanation that questions which have to be transmitted to the Canadian National must, of course, be perused by myself after they are returned from Montreal. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) raised a question at the same time with regard to capital expenditures which is, I believe, a proper point, but in connection with that particular question I must confess that it came in at the last moment and I did not go into it as thoroughly as I might have done. The question to which my hon. friend refers now was answered in part, and I will undertake to see that a supplementary answer is tabled giving my hon. friend the information he wishes.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT, 1917, AMENDMENT

The House in committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Income War Tax Act, 1917, and to provide:—

1. That the amount of income exempted from the tax be increased to three thousand dollars in the case of a married person or householder, or any other person supporting certain relatives as at present set forth in the act and to fifteen hundred dollars in the case of other persons.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): I wish to make an appeal to the Minister of Finance in connection with the exemptions for dependent children. I have a letter here from a constituent in Mount Royal in the course of which he says:

I have a daughter who is over twenty years of age, who, unfortunately, cannot earn her own living on account of having the use of only the left hand from birth. I have to look after her, and I am not exempt for the $500 on her account.

It does seem to me that in a case of that kind where a child is incapacitated from birth from earning a living, the age for exemption should not be limited to eighteen years, but should be indefinite. It may be that in cases of that kind, if an appeal is made to the Minister of Finance, the exemption will apply only in the case of parents whose income is not in excess of, say, six or eight thousand dollars. But there is a germ of a fair case, it seems to me, in the circumstances I have referred to, and I would ask the minister if he would be good enough to give it his consideration.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): As my colleague the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Boivin) has to do with the administration of the act and as he has given much time to the preparation of the measure now before the House, and understands the new regulations very much better than I do, I am going to ask him to answer any questions that are submitted to him by hon. gentlemen.

Mr. BOIVIN: In answer to my hon. friend from Mount Royal, I might say that the question which he has just submitted was very seriously considered, but it has been found practically impossible to give any additional exemptions to a married person on account of dependent children over the age of eighteen years. If an exemption were made for a case like that mentioned by my hon. friend, it would give rise to such a number of false claims which it would be impossible for the Commissioner of Taxation and the inspectors of taxation to investigate and approve that it was felt that in spite of the fact that in occasional cases there must be severe hardship, it would be better to adhere strictly to the rule making the age limit eighteen years. I would point out, however, that in the case of unmarried persons who have dependents who are relatives, to a certain degree, and in the case of widows and widowers having dependent children over eighteen years of age, the fact that they are obliged to support these dependents is taken into consideration in the act and they are placed in the same class as married persons, that is to say, they have an exemption of $3,000 instead of $1,500. It has been found impossible, however, to draw the line and define in an absolute way any exemption which could be granted to married persons having dependent children over eighteen years of age.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How does the age limit in this case compare with the age in the case of fixing allowances for widows of soldiers? The amount of pension payable in that case depends to a certain extent upon the number of children under a certain age. Is the age limit in that case eighteen years, the same as in this?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am not familiar with the terms of the Pensions Act. I remember very well when the act was discussed in the House, but I cannot recall the exact age that it provides.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Eighteen years.

Mr. BOIVIN: Of course, in so far as pensions received under the Pensions Act are concerned, they are exempted entirely from taxation under this act.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May I draw the minister's attention to the fact that the age is not limited to eighteen if the child is attending school continually.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is referring, of course, to the Pensions Act. That request was very strongly urged upon the government by the hon. member for Labelle, who pointed out that the age limit of children should be increased owing to the fact that a large number of parents kept their children in schools and colleges long after they had passed the age of eighteen, and that that was the very time in life when they were the greatest expense to their parents. There is a lot to be said in favour of that argument.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May I just draw the Minister's attention to the fact that in some of the provinces the parents are forced to keep the child in school up to a certain age, but not after eighteen?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, there may be some provinces where a system of compulsory education exists, but in no case does the age exceed eighteen years.

Mr. EULER: Has the minister considered the advisability of including amongst the exemptions one that is not there now? I refer to the case of children who are beyond the adult age, have become permanent invalids, and are a charge upon their parents, perhaps a heavier charge than those who are not of adult age. It seems to me there should be an exemption in such cases.

Mr. BOIVIN: The same answer would apply to my hon. friend's question as to the question asked by my hon. friend from Mount Royal. There are very many meritorious cases where such an exemption should be granted, but it is so terribly difficult to control these cases and prevent fraud that the officers of the department claim it is absolutely impossible to provide for an exemption.

Mr. HANSON: Would the minister make a succinct statement in regard to the respective classes dealt with? Then we should be in a position to deal with the matter intelligently.

Mr. CHURCH: I think the time is opportune to urge upon the Minister of Finance that the exemption of $3,000 be raised to $5,000. In the city from which I come there are many working people whose earnings amount to $3,000 and they have to pay a double headed tax. They have to pay a tax on May 1, in full to the municipality and a tax to the federal authorities on the same date. So the first instalment of the municipal tax falls due on May 1, and the federal tax is payable about the same time. Possibly the payment of the federal tax might be deferred until a later period in the year as the double header tax is a hardship. Then as to the forms. They are so worded that it takes a Philadelphia lawyer to construe them properly and fill them out correctly. In my opinion the taxation forms could be greatly simplified like municipal taxation forms. There is another point to which I wish to draw attention. This tax was originally imposed as a temporary war measure. In the United States the exemption has been raised, I think, up to about $7,500. In Australia it has also been raised. Here it still remains at $3,000. The ability of the people to pay income tax on that amount has been greatly lessened by the decline in the value of the dollar. The Minister of Finance, a year ago said he would have a conference with the provincial and municipal authorities on the subject of taxation, seek to avoid double header methods and secure co-ordination. May I remind him that the municipalities, unlike the federal government, do not have an unlimited source of taxation. And yet there are enormous responsibilities placed upon them by the federal and provincial governments that do not properly come within their sphere.

In the province of Ontario, for example, the municipalities are required to maintain the registry offices, the gaols, the courthouses, and many other institutions, which should be obligations of the provincial government, more especially in view of the fact that the provinces receive a Dominion subsidy, under the British North America Act, for many of these purposes. In other provinces there are also burdens imposed of a similar nature. Had I been in a position to do so in 1917, I would have carried the question of the right to impose this income tax—which is distinctly a war measure—to the Privy Council. I had at the time the authority of five or six leading counsel in the Toronto district for the statement that this tax, which was levied as a war measure, was disinctly ultra vires of the federal parliament. It affects property and civil rights, a matter entirely within the purview of the provinces. It is too bad that the working classes of Canada should be subjected to this tax the legality of which is doubtful to say the least. This tax properly comes within the category of a "nuisance" tax. It bears with special severity upon those people who, although they earn $3,000, find it hard enough to live at present with everything at such a high cost. The worst feature of the matter is that many people in receipt of large incomes escape the payment of income tax altogether. They go over to England and are not subject to income there because they say their domicile is in Canada. In Canada they escape because they say they are domiciled in England, with the result that they escape in Canada and England as well. I know of three prominent Canadian citizens who are in receipt of an income of at least a million dollars and yet do not pay a cent of income tax in England or Canada. I should like to see this matter taken up on this side of the House. It should be dealt with by the "board of strategy. I do not know what has become of our board of strategy; I wish it would wake up and do something for the working classes. The Trades and Labour Council of Toronto have protested against this unjust taxation over and over again. I am sorry that more representatives of the working men in this House do not rise and protest against the double header tax. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and his colleague, the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) are supposed to represent the working classes here, and why they do not take a firm stand on this question I do not know. I do not see them here to help the workingman get his just due. What about the so-called independent hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa)? He is supposed to be an Independent; he has no board of strategy over him to tell him what to do. Where does he stand in regard to this matter?

I want to protest on behalf of the working classes of the city from which I come against this particular tax, the form of tax, the method of collecting it on the very same day as the municipal tax, and the method of sending a bailiff or a federal officer to summon members of the working classes to the police court for non-payment. Many workingmen were summoned before His Honour Judge Cohen in Toronto to compel them to pay $5.47 in taxes. These men are, many of them, returned soldiers with children, and they are out of work. This tax is collected on the 1925 income and many of these men who had work in 1925 have gone to the United States or are out of work in 1926 and have not the means of paying this tax. There are other men in Christie street hospital to-day who in 1925 had jobs and are now taxed though out of work.

The present Minister of Labour (Mr. Elliott) has left the chamber. The former Minister of Labour said that he was a friend of the working classes of Toronto. Where does the Labour Minister stand in this particular matter and where does the government stand? The government was supposed to go after the big interests; they said that we were the party of the big interests. I serve no big interests in this country. I have suffered in the battle against the big interests and I am prepared to suffer again. Yet these same big interests are escaping their share of the taxes to-day. The Mail and Empire and the Toronto Star talk about taxes and the working classes. There are no two greater enemies of the Conservative party and the working classes than the Michigan-controlled Toronto Star and the Montreal-owned Mail and Empire, the biggest load the Liberal-Conservative party are carrying to-day in Ontario.

I am here pleading for $5,000 exemption for the under-dog. There are 30,000 men out of work in our city and I appeal to the Minister of Customs and Excise, who is a young minister, and to the Minister of Finance, who is not unfriendly to the working classes—the under-dog who has to pay this double-header income tax—to raise this exemption to $5,000. They should also restore to the municipalities their former exclusive privilege of collecting income tax which, under the British North America Act, has been the field of the municipalities from confedration to 1917, when the Union government, which I voted for but never supported and never would support, brought it in only as a war measure. The minister should now restore this tax to the municipalities to whom it belongs, and not invade a field of taxation that does not belong to them. Little or no revenue will come out of the $5,000 men; why not increase the exemption to that extent?

Mr. BOIVIN: The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) asked me to point out the dependents provided for in the act giving the taxpayer the additional exemption or the same exemption as married persons. There is no change in that; it is the same as in the present act. The exemption of $3,000, which was formerly $2,000, is given in the case of a married person, in the case of any person who has depending upon him a parent or grandparent, a daughter, or a sister, a son or brother under twenty-one years of age, or a son or brother of any age incapable of self support on account of mental or physical infirmity. Those are the exemptions which enable a person who is not married or who is a widow or widower to get the same exemption as the married man.

Mr. EULER: Why does the case which I cited not come under the clause which the minister just quoted? It is apparently included there.

Mr. BOIVIN: I understood my hon. friend to make the request that responsibility for a child over eighteen years of age, but owing to physical infirmity dependent upon his parents, should entitle the parent to have the same exemption as if the child was under eighteen years of age.

Mr. EULER: The minister read something that seems to include it.

Mr. HANSON: That is the case to which the hon. member for Mount Royal referred and it is a typical case of which examples have come before many of us. That case appeals very strongly to me and it ought to appeal very strongly to the government. The difficulties to which the minister has referred in dealing with cases and eliminating frauds have perhaps been exaggerated in his mind. I can imagine that people might attempt to put up a fraudulent claim such as the minister suggested, but such cases ought to be capable of demonstration. In the case of a man with a daughter who is an invalid over eighteen years of age, a certificate of a physician of good standing should be prima facie evidence and the taxpayer ought to receive consideration. I have no doubt regulations could be framed which would meet the situation and do justice. I think at present injustice is done.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What was the purpose in the first place of fixing an age limit of eighteen? I presume it was assumed that when a child reached eighteen years it had reached an age when it could look after itself and that up to eighteen years it was dependent upon its parents. If that was the assumption and if that is the reason why the age was fixed at eighteen, then the child who is physically defective and who may be twenty-five or twenty-six or thirty years of age is still a child and still dependent notwithstanding the fact that it has passed the age of eighteen. If it is reasonable to give the parent exemption for a child up to the age of eighteen years on the assumption that it is not able to take care of itself up to that age, if we want to be logical we should extend that in the case of children who have physical defects or infirmities which prevent them from earning their own living and keep them as a continual charge upon their parents. The minister will be well advised to incorporate that in this bill. If there is any case where the parent needs help it is in that of children who are suffering from infirmities which make them a charge perhaps for life upon their parents.

In fixing the age limit we should endeavour to aim at uniformity. There is an age limit in connection with military pensions; a widow receives a certain amount and so much for each child up to a certain age, and when the child reaches that age the pension is correspondingly lessened. I presume the assumption is that up to that age the child is not able to look after itself and must depend upon the parents. It seems hardly reasonable that we should fix in the one case a different age limit from that in the other. Let us have something like uniformity in the matter. I understood the minister to say that when there were dependents the age limit for exemption was twenty-one years.

Mr. BOIVIN: That applied merely to the son or brother. It marks the difference between the son or brother and the daughter or sister—the daughter or sister at any age and the son or brother under twenty-one, unless he is an invalid unable to support himself.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not see why there should be any difference there. If the age limit for dependents is fixed at eighteen years in one case, why should it not be left at eighteen years all through so that it would be uniform? I do want to associate myself with hon. gentlemen who have appealed to the minister on behalf of those persons who, because of physical infirmities, remain children regardless of their age. Consideration should be given them.

Mr. EULER: As I heard the minister cite the section of the act it seemed to include all children, irrespective of age, if they were dependent on their parents. I am not clear on that point. There is a very grave injustice worked to a great many people. I know of many instances in which persons of over eighteen, indeed, persons of twenty and twenty-five, are entirely incapacitated and the father finds it a very real hardship to support such dependents without some allowance in respect of his income tax. Such a parent should receive the exemption, for in many cases it costs more to support these grown-ups than it does to keep a young child. While I appreciate the difficulty that may be encountered in framing the act in such a way as to obviate any possibility of fraud, I urge the minister at the same time to consider the justice of the case. Would the minister mind explaining in what respect the act does not cover such a case as I suggest?

Mr. BOIVIN: The section of the act to which I have been referring is not the one providing the exemption of $500 per child. It is that section which places the unmarried person in the same position as the married person by reason of the fact that, although, unmarried, he has dependents to care for. It increases the total exemption in that case from $1,500 to $3,000. The representations of my hon. friend from Frontenac appeal to the human instincts of every hon. member; certainly they appeal to the instincts of the Minister of Finance and of myself. The matter, however, presents serious difficulties from the standpoint of administration. To substantiate this statement I need only observe that when this act was introduced by the government supported by my hon. friend from Frontenac, this eighteen year age limit was incorporated in it without any provision for dependent "children" over that age. This was copied from United States and British legislation and, I am told, it was found by the officers of the department that in various countries where an attempt was made to provide especially for such cases as my hon. friend has in mind, it proved absolutely impossible to draw the line at such physical or mental infirmity as would render a person of greater age a charge upon his parents. In some cases a slight deafness is considered a physical infirmity; the blindness of one eye or the loss of one arm unfits a person in some circles for any work. Among the poorer classes, means are devised by which such persons are enabled to earn their own livelihood, and as a matter of fact they not infrequently do so quite efficiently. No doubt there are cases in which the exemption should be granted, but it is feared that there would be so much recrimination as between the really deserving case, where exemption would be perfectly justified, and the numerous cases in which the applicants might not be entitled to exemption, that the responsibility placed upon the minister would be entirely too great. My hon. friend from Frontenac, referring to the Pensions Act, points out that a certain age limit is fixed therein, the needs of the widow being considered less after the child has reached that age. I may be mistaken, but I understand that no provision is made even in the Pensions Act for children who have passed a certain age but who nevertheless are still dependent upon the widowed mother because of physical or mental infirmity.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I think you are right in that.

Mr. JACOBS: Has the minister considered the question of giving relief to the parents of children who are confined permanently in asylums for the insane, in which case there would be no cause for fear that fraud might be practised upon the government. I have in mind the specific case of a father whose wife and two children are permanently in the Protestant Hospital for the insane at Verdun. In a case of that kind no fraud could be perpetrated on the government as the statistics could be provided by the provincial government. In every case where a person over eighteen is confined in an insane asylum it seems to me that, on the presentation of a certificate from the institution to that effect, some relief ought to be afforded.

Mr. BOIVIN: There is considerable merit in the claim, but the hon. member will realize that in the case of children confined in an institution of that nature part of the fees are paid to the institution by the provincial government.

An hon. MEMBER: Not if the parents can afford to pay the fees.

Mr. JACOBS: I know of one individual who pays $60 a month for each of his relatives.

Mr. BENNETT: The parent pays in the west if he can afford it.

Mr. BOIVIN: I was under the impression that if the father was able to afford the fees he was obliged to pay them without any assistance from the provincial authorities, but I thought that there might have been provision for other cases. In such a case as my hon. friend suggests, fraud would appear to be impossible, but the matter will require consideration. It will be discussed with the experts of the department and inasmuch as compliance with the suggestion would mean a reduction rather than an increase in taxation, the amendment could be made in the bill without the necessity of introducing a new resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who are these illustrious experts?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am quite willing to tell my hon. friend. One of the experts is in the House at the present time. I refer to Mr. Breadner, who was appointed Commissioner of Taxation by the former government and who is a most excellent official. The other gentleman, who has been consulted concerning questions of this nature, is Mr. Russell. His opinion is sought in connection with all matters relating to tariff and taxation. The legal aspect of the bills has been submitted to the solicitors of the department of Customs working in the Income Tax branch under Mr. Breadner.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was only anxious to get the minister's opinion of Mr. Breadner on record.

Mr. JACOBS: You wanted it in writing.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not think that the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) is practical, that in the case of people confined in an insane asylum certificates could be produced for the purpose of giving concessions to their relatives. All insane cases do not go to asylums and the hon. member would experience some difficulty in putting his suggestion into practice. It might lead to further difficulty. It is clear to me that the suggestion cannot be carried out in that limited way. The insane are both in and outside asylums. It is perhaps hardly necessary to state that, but at the same time it is not possible to distinguish between disabilities, mental or otherwise, provided they are disabilities. I think the minister will finally come to the conclusion that the matter must remain as it is.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Mr. Chairman, during the period of the war we were dealing with separation allowances in the Militia department, we were meeting exactly the same difficulties that the minister has to meet at the present time. The law then was so drastic that there was no way of dealing with special cases. Finally we had to amend the law—by order in council it is true, but under the War Measures Act that had the force of an act of parliament—and we organized in the Separation Allowance branch of the Militia department a special board. If the cases were extraordinary, power was given the minister by order in council to deal with them. I cannot see why there should not be a similar provision in the present law. Otherwise you cannot deal with these exceptions legally. During the war we had hundreds of thousands of cases, and they were all adjusted satisfactorily by means of that special legislation. I would therefore suggest that similar provision should be made in the act to enable the minister to deal with such special cases instead of referring them to the House of Commons.

Mr. MANION: It seems to me that the suggestion of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Sir Eugene Fiset) would entail the appointment of another board, which would increase the expense of the collection of these taxes. But why could not such cases be dealt with in this way? The man or the woman responsible to make a sworn declaration as to the facts, and to be subject to severe penalties in case of fraud. It seems to me that would be a simple way of dealing with such cases without increasing the staff, for these are special cases and would not be numerous.

Mr. HAMILTON: Mr. Chairman, do I understand that a married man with no family is exempt from income tax up to $3,000?

Mr. BOIVIN: A married man with no family is exempt up to $3,000 if only one of the married couple makes an income tax return.

Mr. HAMILTON: If the combined incomes of the husband and wife do not exceed $3,000 they are exempt?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON: Do you think that is fair? Do you think that any man who is in receipt of an income of $3,000 should not help to pay some of the taxes due to the war?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Hamilton), but the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Church) who spoke a few moments ago insisted that the exemption be made $5,000 for an unmarried person without a family. My hon. friend will see it is very difficult to please every hon. member.

Mr. HAMILTON: I have only my wife to take care of, but I do not feel that I should be exempt from income tax on a $3,000 income. I was one of those who gave my family to the war, but in spite of that I do not want to be exempted from payment of income tax on anything like that amount. It is too high.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to discuss our Dominion income tax law without having a copy of the consolidated act before one, but in the latest edition of Plaxton and Varcoe, who I think are officials of the income tax department, I find that the allowance for dependent children was introduced first by an amending act in 1918, and was limited to children under 16 years, but was extended by an amendment in 1919 to cover children under 18 years. In the definitions to the act as at present consolidated I find that "dependent child" means:

> A child under 21 years of age and dependent on his parents for support, or over 21 years of age and dependent on his parents for support on account of physical or mental incapacity.

It does seem to me that this definition might be applied to cover the suggestions made by hon. members who have preceded me. While I am on my feet I should like to ask a question with respect to another matter. Under clause 1 of the resolution it is provided:

> That the amount of income exempted from the tax be increased to $3,000 in the case of a married person or householder.

Is it proposed in the act itself to define "householder"?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: So that will come up for further consideration under the bill to be presented?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, what proportion of those now paying income tax does the minister estimate will be exempt altogether as a result of this legislation?

Mr. BOIVIN: The officers of the department inform us that the percentage of persons now paying income tax, and who will not be called upon to pay under this legislation, is about 35 per cent. It is very difficult to estimate exactly owing to the fact, as pointed out by the right hon. leader of the opposition yesterday, that there may be a very few persons in the country not paying tax at the present time who will pay taxes under the amended act.

Mr. CLARK: That means that approximately 150,000 of our total population will be paying income tax next year. I should like to point out to the minister that our 9,000,000 people to-day are paying very heavy taxes upon the essentials that enter into their daily life. Yesterday the minister stated that as a result of sub paragraph 4 of section 19 BBB, there is nothing entering into a poor man's budget that pays any tax at all. I should like to ask him: Since when does the poor man require no clothing, no kitchen utensils, no furniture?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I submit that my hon. friend will be quite in order in discussing this matter later when the sales tax is before the House in the form of a bill, but if we are ever going to get through the session I would suggest that we keep to the question before the committee.

Mr. CLARK: The minister is justifying these reductions in taxation by stating that the sales tax has been removed from the necessities of the poor man.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are dealing with the income tax.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, let me speak to the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance. In dealing with the section of the Income War Tax Act now before the committee it is necessary to deal with taxation generally, because this reduction is being justified by the statement made by the Minister of Customs yesterday that all taxes have been removed from the budget of the poor man. I am now suggesting that there is no justification for the action of the government in relieving that portion of the people of Canada who can pay taxation, before the poor man and the public generally are relieved of the very onerous taxation imposed by this government. That taxation, I suggest, consists of practically everything entering into a poor man's budget; it consists of his clothing; of everything that goes to furnish his house, his kitchen utensils, his furniture and his rugs; everything except his food. Let me tell the minister that there never was a sales tax on food, with some very minor exceptions, consisting chiefly of cereals. I suggest very strongly, Mr. Chairman, that I am in order in discussing this matter and that the government has adopted the wrong principle. They are relieving from taxation a very few people, while still imposing upon the people generally very onerous war taxes which, in my opinion, should be removed before the government commence to relieve that small section of the people who can afford to pay.

Mr. BOIVIN: I have no doubt that my hon. friend is quite well satisfied, since in discussing the point of order he has made his argument. Without going into a discussion of the sales tax I only wish to correct his quotation from yesterday's Hansard. He said I remarked that everything required by a poor man is exempted from taxation. He should have read the full statement, and he would have found that I spoke as follows:

> Everything required by a poor man, everything going into a poor man's budget and almost everything really a necessity of life, does not pay any sales tax at all.

Mr. CLARK: That is worse than my statement of what the minister said, and it is not correct.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is not worse. My hon. friend stated that yesterday I had said in this House that everything required by a poor man was exempt from taxation. I admit that, but I modified the statement by adding that almost everything that was a necessity of life was exempted from sales tax, and I repeat that statement.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): What about boots and shoes?

Mr. HANSON: And cotton goods and clothing?

Mr. BOIVIN: The sales tax on boots and shoes has been cut by 50 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): It is still 2½ per cent.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, and that is why I took the trouble to say "almost everything" that was a necessity.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister enumerate the articles required by the poor man, other than food, upon which he does not pay sales tax?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask both the minister and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) to keep to the subject under discussion.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not want to discuss the matter further, since it was discussed in the House yesterday, but I think I am still in order when I say that whether or not the sales tax is reduced the poor man is getting the benefit of the reduction in income tax. The people who are exempt from taxation are those poor persons for whom an appeal was made for exemptions. The persons entirely exempted from taxation under this act are those people having incomes of $3,000 and less. They are certainly not the opulent class, and not the multimillionaires.

Mr. HANSON: They are not the poor people, either.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am willing to admit that they are not the poorest people; but they never paid any income tax.

Mr. CLARK: They are in the class paying taxes.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, and one of the most important taxes they pay is the customs duty, which my hon. friend has always advocated very strongly in this House.

Mr. CLARK: They pay it in order to retain their employment in Canada.

The CHAIRMAN: We are getting away from the clause.

Mr. BOIVIN: I certainly admire the way, Mr. Chairman, in which you are endeavouring to keep both the minister and those asking questions to the clause under discussion, and I will not refer again to the tariff or the sales tax. I will merely say that there is a real reduction in income tax in the present legislation. Everyone will admit that, and if there are any hon. members opposite who claim that the reduction is too great, or who are in favour of having the income tax returned to its former figure, I should be very glad to hear from them. We will take the matter under consideration then, and if we find that a majority of the House is in favour of returning to the old taxation, there will be no objection whatever on my part to doing so.

Mr. HANSON: I invite the minister to return to the old system of taxation so far as the tax on dividends is concerned. He has done a great injustice to a certain class in the community by this change.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We will come to that later on; it is another clause.

Mr. HANSON: The minister has issued an invitation containing a challenge.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry.

Mr. CLARK: In order that we do not miss the opportunity, I would like to ask the minister under which section of this resolution dividends received by the taxpayer are made taxable.

Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. BOIVIN: That will be under section 4.

Mr. CAHAN: Before this section passes I would like to call the attention of the minister to the fact that in chapter 25 of the act of 1918, clause (i) of subsection 2 of section 1 defines a dependent child, and that definition is still the law. Under it a dependent child is a child under twenty-one years of age dependent on his parent for support, or a child over twenty-one years of age dependent on his parent for support on account of physical or mental incapacity. Therefore under the law as it stands at present the income tax department are compelled to accept returns granting exemptions in respect of dependent children who are over twenty-one years of age, dependent upon their parent for support on account of physical or mental incapacity. I believe the minister referred to the law as it existed before the last amendment, and inasmuch as we have this definition on the statute book now I think, by way of suggestion, that the drafting of the bill should be made so as still to retain this definition of a dependent child, and if it is so drawn, it will obviate the objections which have been made by my hon. friend from Mount Royal and some other members of the House.

Mr. BOIVIN: In answer to my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George, I would like to point this out: While he is quite right in saying that the old bill carried the definition of the words "dependent child," and that dependent child meant a son under twenty-one years of age, or, if the child was physically or mentally incapacitated, a child of any age —that is not the exact wording of the law, but that is practically the effect of it—it applied only to the dependent child, who gave the unmarried person the same exemption as the married person. If my hon. friend will refer to the old act, he will find that the $500 exemption was not given to the father or mother of a dependent child.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. BOIVIN: The $500 exemption was given to the father or mother of any child under eighteen years of age.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so, but I am simply suggesting to the hon. minister that if he should decide to carry out the suggestions which have been made, then by drafting his act so as to give this exemption in respect of a dependent child as defined in the act, he would carry out the suggestions entirely, in conformity with the plea of certain hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House.

Mr. BOIVIN: I now understand exactly the idea expressed by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George. It would be a way of getting over the difficulty if it was decided to adopt the suggestion of hon. members, and that matter will be taken under consideration.

My hon. friend from Fort William suggested a moment ago that it might be possible to obviate most of the difficulty by exacting an affidavit in support of every claim for exemption for the payment of income tax owing to the fact that one was charged with dependent children or a dependent relative as defined by the act. The suggestion is a good one, but unfortunately our experience both in the Department of Customs and Excise and in the Income Tax branch, where numerous affidavits are received concerning different matters, is, I am sorry to say, that in a large number of cases the affidavits cannot be depended upon. When the affidavits are checked up and the information is secured, it is found that in many cases the affidavits are not true.

Mr. HANSON: A few prosecutions might help.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is true that these persons should be prosecuted, and they are prosecuted in a great many cases, but they are only prosecuted when the fraud is discovered and it is sometimes a very difficult matter to discover the fraud. For that reason while the suggestion is one well worthy of consideration, and will be taken into consideration before the bill is brought before the House for its second reading, I do not think it would be a complete cure of the difficulty we have before us.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says that there are prosecutions. I have not been noticing any in the last two years for making false affidavits. I will make it four years—has there been one case in that time?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes. The prosecution has not always been for perjury. I am not prepared to say that I can state any specific case where action was taken for perjury in connection with making a false affidavit, although there may have been some.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not one.

Mr. BOIVIN: What is generally done is this: The departments do not want to usurp the functions of the crown prosecutors of the different provinces. The administration of criminal justice is confided to the provinces, and prosecution and punishment for crime should be left to the provinces. I did not say prosecutions had been instituted by us. The object of this department has always been to secure the collection of revenue. I can, if I will, at the next sitting of the House state to my hon. friend cases where four or five companies in the city of Montreal have been prosecuted quite recently for making false affidavits and false returns in connection with the sales tax. The Commissioner of Taxation tells me that there are several instances in his branch where prosecutions have been entered, not for the purpose of punishing a man for making a false affidavit, but for the purpose of securing the penalties prescribed by our own laws, and for the purpose of securing the payment of moneys which they were trying to evade by making these false affidavits.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not rise for the purpose of saying that this ought to be done or ought not to be done, but simply to correct a statement that I knew was incorrect. The minister agrees that those prosecutions have not taken place, and that I was correct.

Mr. BOIVIN: I would not like to go that far, though I will agree that my statement may have been misunderstood by my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The suggestion was that false affidavits were being made and that something should be done. My hon. friend said that it was being done. As a matter of fact, no prosecutions whatever have been taken by his department for the making of false affidavits, so the effect is exactly the contrary of what was stated. However, I do not think that is a matter of very much importance, except that it is a matter of some importance to have some correctness of ministerial statements even to-day.

We have now the estimate from the minister to the extent that people have been exempted up to 35 or 40 per cent. Suppose we put it at 35 per cent. If that is correct, we would now be left with 146,585 taxpayers in the country. Is that about the minister's estimate?

Mr. BOIVIN: According to the returns of last year, I would say yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister go a little further now and tell us just what that means in loss of revenue under that item, that is, the item having regard to the extension of the exemption from $2,000 to $3,000.

Mr. BOIVIN: It would be impossible to give my hon. friend the exact reduction due to the extension of the exemption. I can give him, however, by classes the actual reduction which will be caused not only by the exemption, but by the exemption and at the same time by the reduction in rate. The reduction on incomes between $1,000 and $6,000 would amount to $5,113,852.19, according to last year's figures.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend show how he gets at that?

Mr. BOIVIN: The estimate is prepared by the officers of the department. The tax paid at the present rates on those incomes would be $6,318,319.99. The tax which would be paid on the same income at the rates proposed under the new legislation would be $1,204,467.80, making the reduction that I have just given. It must, of course, be remembered that the tax paid at the present rate applies to incomes over $1,000 on the part of unmarried persons and $2,000 on the part of married persons. Under the amended act the incomes between $1,000 and $1,500 would be exempted in one case, and the incomes between $2,000 and $3,000 would be exempted in the other.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says that on that basis the taxation would be thus and so. What is the basis of assessment on which he strikes that new taxation?

Mr. BOIVIN: The basis of assessment is the new rate as compared with the old rate on the same incomes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend said he could not tell me how much would be lost by reason of the increase of the exemption. He could give what the total would be, but as to the loss by reason of the exemption he could not tell. I understand that is correct.

Mr. BOIVIN: I informed my hon. friend that I could not tell him offhand because I did not have those figures before me. I think it would be quite possible to establish in the department from last year's returns exactly what the amount collected would be if the exemption remained at the former figure. That could have been calculated, but unfortunately the calculation was not made and the officers do not happen to have it here.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then we are on common ground; at the present moment that cannot be stated. Then my hon. friend said that under the old law we got $6,318,319. Applying the new rate to those figures he says the collections will amount to $1,300,000, if I remember correctly.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. BOIVIN: The amount is $1,204,467.80.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I want to get at is the figures my hon. friend used as the basis of his calculation which resulted in the $1,204,000, and we have not got that at all. You will find no basis at all when you get down to it, it is just a guess.

Mr. BOIVIN: I can tell my hon. friend this: The number of individual and corporate taxpayers paying income under $6,000 is 126,481.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is right.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Under the income tax proposition the minister brings down we learn that there are about 300,000 people that have paid income tax in this country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Two hundred and twenty-five thousand.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Two hundred and twenty-five thousand is the approximate number of those who paid taxes last year. Now the minister tells us that nearly one-half of that number, or over 125,000 have been relieved of income tax. Is that corect?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, we have relieved about 35 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I want to get the number that have been relieved of taxation by this measure.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am told that between seventy and seventy-five thousand have been relieved.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Thirty-five per cent will give you 78,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The Minister of Finance when he presented the income tax proposition said "We are reducing taxation all along the line."

Mr. BOIVIN: That is true.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): When the minister said that, what kind of "line" did he refer to? There are 9,000,000 people in this country and about 150,000 are going to be taxed. The balance will not pay any income tax at all. What did the minister mean when he said that he had "reduced taxation all along the line"? If 75,000 people out of a population of 9,000,000 have been relieved of income tax, that is not a case of being relieved "all along the line." The other minister who is not now taking charge of this measure at the present time shakes his head, but it is beyond doubt that he said he was reducing taxation, in so far as income is concerned, "all along the line." When the minister made this statement hon. gentlemen to my left pounded their desks like the mischief. Now those gentlemen believe in income tax, that is the way they want a revenue collected; and I must point out to my hon. friends that only 75,000 of those who were paying income tax last year are being relieved by this measure. And yet this government says "Look at what we are doing for the poor people of this country."

5 p.m.

Mr. BOIVIN: In answer to my hon. friend I merely want to say that when my colleague referred to relieving taxation all along the line—

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Which line?

Mr. BOIVIN: —he was referring to the line of citizens in Canada who paid income tax. He might have gone further. He could have said that he had reduced taxation for everyone because that is the case as the result of other changes under the budget. However, I will refer only to income tax. My hon. friend was kind enough to remain there and I want to follow his example.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is not quite correct, is it?

Mr. BOIVIN: It is correct except in one particular and just as soon as we reach that section, I will explain how it is that there are in Canada to-day a few persons—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A few?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, and I will prove that they are very few in numbers. There are in Canada to-day a few persons who will be called upon to pay more taxes under the new law than they were called upon to pay under the old law. I will admit at once that comparing the numbers of those who received exemption under the old law with the numbers of those who do not receive exemption now there are a large number of persons affected but there are very few persons who under the new law will pay more than they paid under the old.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Was the Minister of Finance justified then in making such a sweeping statement which was broadcast throughout the country?

Mr. BOIVIN: I think the Minister of Finance was perfectly justified in making that statement because there is no doubt there was a reduction all along the line except in those few particular cases where persons had been exempted by the former government from taxation upon part of the income received where they were not entitled to receive that exemption. Some may say that that question is a debatable one. Many of these arguments may be brought up; but I maintain in this House and I will maintain it on any platform in the country that a man who works eighteen hours a day in order to earn $10,000 should not pay one cent more in income tax than a man who does not do one tap of work and who receives $10,000 in dividends from the Canadian Pacific or the Bank of Montreal. If any hon. member on the other side desires to say that this principle is wrong and that we should not bring back to the same level of taxation, earned income and income derived from dividends, I am willing to debate the matter with him and leave the decision to the people of Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister is getting into the habit of throwing out challenges. He seems to like it and I hope he enjoys it. He is also getting into the habit of raising false issues. That is not the question which my hon. friend should debate; the question to debate is this, and no one knows better than the minister: What is the justification for placing a double rate of taxation on capital that is useful to this country? What is the justification for having only one set of taxes on money that is in bonds and that assumes no risk and taxing at a double rate money that is affording employment in this country and doing something to develop it? My hon. friend well knows that is the issue. Why is it that the mortgagee can sit comfortably paying only one rate of taxation on his money while the shareholder who is doing something to build up this country pays two rates on his money? Everybody knows it is the shareholder's money.

My hon. friend knows that no other question has been raised by this opposition, but again there is this false issue to be raised. On the statement of the Minister of Finance out of a total collection of $56,000,000, $31,000,000 is subject to a double rate in every case where a Canadian happens to own the stock. Yet some hon. gentlemen say that there has been no increase. The thing is unthinkable. Do not let my hon. friend suppose that the issue is as to whether the man who works or not is to pay. The issue is whether money that is useful to the country, that is used to develop and to give work in the country, ought to have a double rate of taxation as against one rate on money invested in bonds, mortgages and the like.

Section agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. BOYS: I do not know whether I rightly apprehend the effect of this clause or not. If I do it seems to me there is a somewhat serious discrepancy. I will try to make my point plain by taking the case of a husband with an income of $2,900. As I read the law he is exempted from taxation. His wife has an income of $1,400 and she is also exempt. The combined total of the two incomes is $4,300, all of which is exempt. If you take the case of a husband with an income of $1,600 and the wife also with an income of $1,600 they would get an exemption of $1,500 each or a total of $3,000, and the two together with a combined income of $3,200 would pay income tax upon $200 whereas in the other case the husband and wife with a combined income of $4,300 escape paying income tax altogether.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is perfectly right. The law will work out in that way, but I would like to ask him this question. Why should a man and wife each having an income of $1,600 not pay income tax to this country when the man who is married but who is not separate as to property, and who has the same income of $3,200 is obliged to pay taxation upon it.

Mr. BOYS: I am merely pointing out inconsistencies which, by the use of the English language, it is easy to rectify. The minister should have his law so that there will not be any such discrimination.

Mr. BOIVIN: If the hon. gentleman will give me a method of rectifying that inconsistency I will promise at once that I shall be only too glad to make the correction in the bill.

Mr. BOYS: I bow at once to the superior knowledge of the minister in this matter and I think I might even say the superior ability of the minister to draft legislation. It is only necessary to point out to him, a clear-headed man, the discrepancy and he, with his expert officials, can easily devise legislation to rectify it. I have not the slightest doubt I could in half an hour draft a clause which would correct what is certainly a discrimination. I really felt that I was reading the law improperly because I cannot see the slightest justification for it. In the one case a husband and wife with an income of $4,300 are exempt from taxation and in the other case a husband and wife with an income of $3,200 have $200 of that taxed.

Mr. BOIVIN: The absolutely just and equitable method of taxation in the case of married persons would be to combine the two incomes and treat them as one. If my hon. friend wants to advocate that system and if the members of the opposition will support it, I for one am willing to embody it in the act.

Mr. BOYS: The minister is altogether too ready to shift responsibility to the group who should be governing the country, while trying to escape it himself.

Mr. BROWN: I made this very proposition two years ago, but I failed to get a single supporter among hon. gentlemen to my right; nor did I get very much support from hon. gentlemen opposite. I could not secure recognition for the principle that for purposes of taxation the income of husband and wife should be considered jointly. I am glad the government has gone a certain distance in recognizing this principle, although it has not gone as far as I should like.

Mr. KAISER: Earlier in the session I heard the hon. member (Mr. Brown) put forward this idea and I must say that I have never heard a more ridiculous proposition on taxation submitted by anyone. It showed an absolute lack of knowledge of the circumstances of those who have incomes that are taxable. I do not think it is fair for the government to penalize people who are trying to do the right and decent thing. Let us consider one or two hypothetical cases. Here is a man with an income of $2,500; he marries, and if his wife has no income he has no tax to pay. Again, a woman has an income of $2,500 of her own, and she marries. If her husband has no income, then no tax is paid. In either of these two cases the state gets absolutely nothing in the way of taxation. Now a man with a small income marries a woman who happens to have a little money of her own and they are both penalized. My hon. friend would have the wife pay taxation on her income although, as happens in nine cases out of ten, that money is a patrimony. Surely such an income should go to her children rather than be taxed by the state. Any decent man will try to support his wife and family on the income which he himself can earn, and what the wife has inherited should not be regarded as a taxable source of revenue. It seems to me that this clause ought to be dropped altogether.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The effect of the section is to temper the wind to the shorn lamb, the shorn lamb being the government. Perhaps the proper simile would be the wolf, but I will let it go at that. The government are making the claim of having effected trenchant reductions in taxation, but the fact is that the whole idea of this legislation is to put the soft pedal on reductions: in the case of married people who are fortunate enough to have separate incomes the reductions will not be anything like what they appear to be. The bellicose Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) shakes his head. Well, suppose we get at the facts.

Mr. CAHILL: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says "hear, hear." We ought to get some facts from him but we never do. However, "hear, hear" is better than the wild vituperation, divorced from fact and sense, which we used to get long ago. Take the case of the husband and wife who have a joint income of $5,000. If the exemption had been left as it stood before they would be taxed each $70, whereas under the proposed change they will be taxed $90 each. Is that correct?

Mr. BOIVIN: I think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The whole idea is to get more money while apparent reductions are made. Can the minister give us the number of people who will be affected by the change? How much more money will be collected as a result of the new proposal?

Mr. BOIVIN: To prove that the main object was not to get a little more revenue I may assure my hon. friend that we never took the trouble to estimate the number of married persons who were enjoying an exemption of $2,000 each, that is to say, married persons who were making separate income tax returns. Let me tell the committee just what we had in view. There are a great many married persons in the country who have no right to make separate income tax returns because they were married under the law of community of property. We felt that it was absolutely unfair to those persons to compel them to make only one return and enjoy but one exemption of $3,000 while others, much better off, made two returns and were exempted to the extent of $6,000. We deemed it only fair that every married couple should receive the same exemption, and if hon. gentlemen are of the opinion that some married persons should be exempted $6,000 and others only $3,000 I am prepared to listen to what they have to say.

Mr. BOYS: That is absurd.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I said was —and I thought that the minister agreed with me—that the effect of this change was that whereas in respect of an income of a stated amount the tax payable by the husband and wife would be $70 each under the law as it stood before, it would now be $90 each. I understood him to say that this was right. That is all I have said. I pointed out that in view of this fact the reductions which the government claimed to be making would not be fully realized. These are the only two points that I have raised. Does the minister deny them?

Mr. BOIVIN: I resent my hon. friend's statement that this was an effort on the part of the government to reduce taxation on the one hand and on the other to endeavour to get a little more revenue by making an alteration in the act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are they getting it?

Mr. BOIVIN: I say the government did not have that intention and did not figure what the increase might be. In any event I would point out to my hon. friend that the decrease in the exemption is only from $2,000 to $1,500. He calculates it from $3,000 to $1,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, no.

Mr. BOIVIN: Under the law introduced by the government of which my hon. friend was a member the exemption enjoyed by the husband and wife was $2,000. It is true that in some cases they both got the exemption. To-day the exemption enjoyed by each is $1,500. So the decrease in the most extreme case is only $500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend did not get what I said, and I am quite sure he did not make the mistake advisedly. My hon. friend said I was right before. Here is Mr. Breadner and he can check me if I am wrong. I said nothing as to the amount of the change, I gave the concrete figures which were wanted by an hon. member opposite. The minister said that the exemption of the husband and wife had been decreased $500. I said that under the proposals of the present budget, had the change not been made—that is, this change in exemption for married people—the rate each would have paid was $70, and that under the change the rate they will each pay will be $90. It is very easy for me to be told whether this is wrong. I think I am right.

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friend takes into consideration the exemptions and the rates as provided by the present amendments, he is right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is all I am doing.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend should go just a bit further and figure out what the married man under the law of community of property with an income of $10,000 will be obliged to pay.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that in the province of Quebec, where there is community of property in every case in which a marriage contract is not made and registered before the ceremony, there has been a differential rate against those married people living under the community of property law, and, as pointed out by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) in the early stage of this discussion, that was a grievance that should be remedied. In remedying it the minister has really in effect imposed an additional tax upon married people who are not living under the community of property law.

Mr. BOIVIN: I desire to correct my hon. friend right there. I resent these statements continually made upon the other side of the House that we are increasing taxation. We are not, we are decreasing it. The example pointed out a moment ago by my hon. friend who is now leading the government—

Mr. MANION: Leading what should be the government, you mean.

Mr. BOIVIN: No. I do not mean that; I should have said: "who is leading the opposition"—

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I think I have the floor.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend. I do not think he wants to be unfair, for of all the hon. members I know, my hon. friend generally is the fairest, especially to members from the province of Quebec.

Mr. MANION: He has to be; he gets his votes down there.

Mr. BOIVIN: Well, he is much fairer to the people of Quebec than is my hon. friend from Fort William on certain occasions.

Mr. MANION: I absolutely deny that. My hon. friend never in his life has heard me say anything unfair about the people of the province of Quebec.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I feel that I have a right to interpose. I happen to represent a Quebec constituency, and therefore my attention is concerned with its affairs more directly perhaps than that of my hon. friend from Fort William. I am making no insinuations or suggestions. I am simply saying there is a grievance there that ought to be remedied, and in remedying it it would be wise to adopt a remedy which would not constitute another grievance on the part of those who are married, in the province of Quebec and elsewhere, separate as to property. Therefore I would suggest that there should be given an exemption to those living under the community of property law of, say, $4,000, leaving those who are married and separate as to property the right to claim exemptions as at present without reduction. You would thereby reach a fair basis and remedy what is a real grievance in Quebec.

Mr. BOIVIN: Mr. Chairman, I was diverted from the particular argument which I desired to interject. My hon. friend is apparently right, because we are, it is true, decreasing the exemption to the married person who is separate as to property, but we are not increasing the tax upon those persons. The reduction in taxation which accompanies this reduction in exemption makes the tax they pay to-day less than the tax they paid before.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is true.

Mr. BOIVIN: In the example given by my hon. friend who is now leading the opposition—I want to make no mistake this time—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Fifty-fifty; you are doing pretty well.

Mr. BOIVIN: —the amount was perfectly right in so far as the difference is concerned between the $90 the man pays with the exemption as it is now and the $70 he would pay if the exemption had remained as it was. But what he did not state, and what I desire to place on record now, is that under the old act with the exemption of $2,000, each one of those two married persons would have paid $126 instead of the $90 they will pay now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister give us his objections to adopting the suggestion that the incomes of husband and wife should be united for the purposes of taxation?

Mr. BOIVIN: The principal objection I think would be that a large number of persons who have retired from business, and who have always lived under the regime of separation as to property, which is recognized by every other country in the world, and who are residing in Canada at the present time and paying taxes, would undoubtedly remove to foreign countries in order to evade the enormous difference in taxation that they would be obliged to pay if their two incomes were combined for purposes of taxation. Where two persons have always had separate incomes, and where two persons would have that right in any other country, we feel that it would be wrong for us to combine the two incomes for purposes of taxation in this country. Not only would it be wrong in principle but it would tend to deprive Canada of a certain amount of revenue instead of increasing that revenue.

Mr. BROWN: If I remember rightly the statement was made two years ago that in England the incomes of husband and wife were considered as one for taxation purposes.

Mr. BOIVIN: I have not looked up the English law. I am not absolutely certain as to the practice in England, but the country with which our taxation must always be compared is certainly the United States, which is alongside of us.

Mr. BROWN: But in the one case it might be a question of fairness or justice or principle, and in the other—

Mr. BOIVIN: I said before that I did not see anything very wrong so far as the principle was concerned in making all married couples pay the same rate upon their joint income. I think that would be fair but it might not be to the best advantage of the country, and I also think our legislation must be based to a great extent upon similar legislation in the great republic to the south.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Will the minister use the same argument when we come to the dividend proposition?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then you will change the law.

Mr. BOIVIN: Not at all.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4:

Mr. CAHAN: I would like to speak to the first part of clause 4. It seems to me fair and just that if these new rates are to apply to incomes as of December 31, 1925, there should be a further provision that under this scale no one should be compelled to pay a higher tax for 1925 than he would have paid if this legislation had not been passed. Many individuals will pay a higher tax for 1925, under this scale than they would have paid under the law in force prior to April 15, 1926, when this resolution was brought before the House. Many men, dealing with their incomes for 1925, apportioned their incomes and made their expenditures in accordance with the law as it then stood, and I am not in favour of bringing in a new act which will impose upon any individual by ex post facto legislation a higher tax, in many cases twice as high, as he would have paid under the legislation in force up to December 31, 1925. If the government brought in these resolutions and made a uniform reduction in the tax applicable to all persons who pay taxes for 1925, thereby making a corresponding reduction in the tax payable by each individual, this proposal might meet with the approval of the House. But as the bill stands I think it unjust; it will be resented by many people, and it should not be passed in its present form.

Mr. CLARK: I heartily support the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and I suggest to the government that it is ultra vires of parliament to impose a tax on dividends received during 1925. Section 4 of the Income War Tax Act states as follows:

> There shall be assessed, levied and paid, upon the income during the preceding year of every person residing or ordinarily resident in Canada or carrying on any business in Canada, the following taxes:

That tax is upon income; it is a tax against the property of a person and not a tax in personal and a tax against property cannot be made retroactive. For instance, supposing the proposal was that we tax dividends received in 1890; there would be just as much justification for parliament passing an act of that kind as to tax the dividends received in 1925. These dividends were received last year and have been disposed of, and they therefore no longer exist, therefore there is no way by which a tax can be levied against property which is not in existence. If the tax were against a person it might be different, but since parliament is assessing the tax against property which is no longer in existence I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the proposal is ultra vires of parliament.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like to call the attention of the minister to the extent to which so-called Canadians go to the Old Country to escape paying taxes. I know one gentleman who lives in Toronto but who has now gone to the Old Country; I will give his name privately to the minister. He has an income of $1,000,000; he pays no taxes in Toronto, no income tax in Canada, and he escapes the British tax as well.

They are dodging the tax collector in Canada, and they dodge the tax collector in the Old Country. I would suggest an amendment to clause 4 to the effect that every Canadian be presumed to be a resident of Canada until he proves to the contrary. In other words, put the onus on the said Canadian. The workingman in this country has a tax collected on his real estate, and on his income, and he has to pay his taxes even if he is out of work. We have been told that the party on this side of the House is the creature of the big interests. Strange to say I heard the Prime Minister read a remark of that nature in his Massey Hall speech, and I understand that he made it at several other places during the last campaign. I do not think anybody who is in favour of the big interests would want to amend this clause so as to take care that wealthy Canadians who go over to the Old Country shall not escape both the Canadian and the British tax collector.

I see my young friend from St. Lawrence-St. George here to-day. I might refer to a remark he made the other day about the Hydro-Electric in relation to taxes applied to corporations or joint stock companies. He is very fond of pleading the case of the joint stock companies and the big interests, but what has he to say for the working classes in the city of Montreal who are paying these heavy income taxes? He said the other day in this House that he did not believe in the hydro-electric movement in Ontario getting off from the payment of taxes. Does he know they do pay huge taxes? The hon. member for Mount Royal and the hon. member for South York, two colleagues who sat together in the old Hamilton school, sit together also in this House of Commons, one a supporter of public ownership and the other a believer in private ownership, and I can say to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George that he did not know what he was talking about when he said that the Hydro-Electric in Ontario does not pay taxes. The Hydro-Electric pays municipal taxes of various kinds. They paid thousands of dollars in taxes to the city of Toronto and four to five millions in customs duties and taxes to the treasury of this country for the Chippawa development. The hydro-electric movement in Ontario is paying taxes just the same as power corporations under private ownership in the city of Montreal are paying taxes to-day. There are no dividends in the hydro; they operate at cost. We are supposed to be the Conservative party in this House, and I was sorry to hear a gentleman on this side, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, speak as he did of the hydro-electric movement in Ontario which he does not understand. He does not know what he is talking about when he says that the Ontario Hydro-Electric pays no taxes. He has never read the statutes or he would not have made the statement he did.

I think it is pretty nearly time, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs should devise some method of lightening the load on the working classes who are to-day paying these very heavy taxes. The government used to have an office in Toronto on Lombard street, in the old post office, where this tax was paid by the smaller man, often not by cheque but in cash. Unfortunately many of the working classes have no bank accounts to-day, under the economic laws of this government, and they cannot pay by cheque. Then the government removed the tax collecting branch to Wellington street, where new offices were fixed up, and where the working people would have to line up and pay in their five and ten dollars of taxes. After spending all that money down there, the government never even used the offices on Wellington street, but made a right-about turn, and quick march they went back to the Lombard street post office, after wasting all that money. The government is receiving $56,000,000 from this particular tax, and of that $24,000,000 or $25,000,000 comes from the province of Ontario, which is paying 47 per cent of all the taxes of this country.

My hon. friend from Lisgar talks about the income tax being continued. I should like to know how much income tax he pays, or the farmers of the country—little or nothing. I do not see my friends the Labour members from Winnipeg here when any practical questions for the benefit of the working classes are being discussed in this House, but they are always here when something of an academic nature comes up, as is also the so-called Independent member for Labelle. What are their views on this question of the heavy taxes that are paid to-day by the working classes? Let us be just, fair and equitable to all in our taxation laws, and let us be fair, just and equitable in the enforcement of this law. We allow the millionaires to go and live in the Old Country and escape Canadian and British taxes. They remind me of Sir Henry Thornton, and King Solomon in all his glory never could equal him. These millionaires go over to the Old Country and evade paying their just taxes in this country, and they also escape them in England. Under the Nickle resolution we cannot give them any titles in this country, so they go over to England to escape paying their taxes here, and as I say, they avoid them over there as well and get a title thrown in, while the working classes of Canada have to go on paying the taxes. But there is a day coming for the common people of this country, and the quicker our right honourable board of strategy wakes up over here and does something practical for the working classes, the better. Who are the board of strategy? I would like to know what taxes they are paying compared with the taxes that are being paid in the city from which I come. It is unfair. This field of income taxation was invaded by the Minister of Finance in 1917—

Mr. ROBB: The then Minister of Finance was a resident of Toronto.

Mr. CHURCH: So was the high commissioner. From confederation down to 1917 income taxation was the exclusive field of the municipalities, until the government of Canada invaded this field in that year and established as a war measure an income tax. This double-header tax is unfair to the working classes. I plead with the Minister of Finance to adopt some amendment to this clause that will prevent wealthy Canadians from going over to the Old Country and escaping the payment of tax while the rank and file have to pay a double-header tax.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like to make just one remark in reply to my hon. friend, if I may be allowed. If he were residing in the province of Quebec and were as anxious to promote the interests of the workingmen of Quebec as he is of the province of Ontario, he certainly would not support a measure or an act under which every industrial town and city in the province of Quebec, through every user of light, contributes hundreds of thousands of dollars of taxes to the federal treasury by way of income tax levied on these corporations—a tax from which every town and village almost in the province of Ontario is exempt, and from which every workingman or other man or woman who is a part of the population of that city or town in Ontario is exempt. There is an injustice there. It cannot remain forever. It is not an injustice for which this government is responsible. Other governments are responsible, but it is a grievance that rankles throughout the province of Quebec, and one that must be remedied on some occasion, at some time, and under some amendments to this law. My hon. friend says I am ignorant about conditions in Ontario. I confess it, in many respects. I do not profess to know the details of their municipal taxation, but this I do know, that the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario, which does the work in that province that is done by private utility companies in Quebec, does not pay one cent of federal income tax, and that our utility companies in Quebec do pay—to the extent in one case of $700,000 a year, and lesser amounts in the case of others. There is an injustice there, and on every occasion when income taxes are brought up, either by one government or by the other, I shall take the opportunity of presenting this grievance, because it is a real one.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before six o'clock is called I ask my hon. friend the minister to seriously consider what has been said in connection with dividends already distributed. I admit at once that so far as the individual is concerned it is no harder on him there than increased taxation is on any of his income, not a bit; it makes no difference one way or the other. But my hon. friend knows that we have companies—and I am not now referring to merely the personal company; to whatever my hon. friend does in that case I say God speed; I refer to legitimate holding companies—which have already distributed dividends on the basis of the former taxation. Now as to these dividends which have been distributed let me give this case for example: Company A distributes its dividends. They are not at all affected because so far as they are concerned there is a reduction from 10½ to 9 per cent—they are not hurt. But they pay this dividend to holding company B, and holding company B distributes the whole amount which it has received to its shareholders. That is a case which I really think ought to be covered. I think that what the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has said is absolutely right in that connection, and I would ask my hon. friend to think it over during the recess between six and eight o'clock.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am ready to answer my hon. friend on that point at once. There is a clause in the bill which is not provided for in the resolution; it is not necessary because it is a reduction and not an increase, as my hon. friend understands. Under that clause there will be no triple nor quadruple taxation on dividends. All dividends will pay that nine per cent and pay it only once; and all dividends transferred from the original company to the holding company, and from the holding company to perhaps a second holding company, and from that to the shareholder, will not be taxed again.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Only the shareholder in the original company.

Mr. BOIVIN: Only the one dividend. I want to thank my hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) for the able argument he has just made in favour of our contention that dividends should pay the same taxation as other revenue. He has just argued very strongly that the light, heat and power companies of the province of Quebec are obliged to charge higher rates than the hydro-electric commission of Ontario, and he says it is because the comsumers are obliged to pay taxation which they in turn pay over to the Dominion government. He substantiates the contention of the government that all incomes of equal amount should be equally taxed, and that the taxes paid by corporations are considered by most all of them as overhead expense which should be paid by the consumer and not by the shareholder.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CAHAN: I would like the indulgence of the committee for a moment while I make a few comments upon the remarks of the Minister of Customs and Excise in reference to my position. I conceive that there is a great difference between a public service utility company whose rates are subject to a public commission appointed for that purpose and an ordinary commercial company. Take for instance, a tramway company in Montreal. Its rates are governed by a public service commission and that commission in fixing rates must necessarily take into consideration the fact that a portion of the income of that company is diverted by means of the income tax into the federal treasury. Therefore the rates are fixed so as to allow of a certain dividend upon its shares or the capital stock invested, payment of interest upon its bonds, and also the approximate amount which is collected from the company under the income tax by the federal government. But that company in such a position necessarily takes from its patrons, or in a similar situation a lighting and power company would take from the users of its light and power, a higher rate in order to cover the income tax collected from it. That is the distinction between a public service utility company such as those we have in Quebec, and a public service utility commission such as the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission. Under the Ontario system the hydro-electric commission has not to provide in its rates for light and power that extra amount which is taken out of public utility companies in Quebec simply by reason of the fact that they are privately owned. A great injustice is done because every user of light and power in Quebec is necessarily charged a higher rate in order to enable public utility companies to make their contribution under the income tax to the federal treasury.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I saw in the Montreal papers the claim made that light and power was being sold there for less than it was in Ontario. How does the hon. gentleman explain that?

Mr. CAHAN: That may be so. In my experience a privately-owned public utility company is operated and managed on so conservative a basis as compared with those publicly-owned that in many cases it is able to give a lower rate for its service than publicly-owned utility companies can. But my point is, in reply to the Minister of Customs, that a public utility company is in an entirely different position from an ordinary commercial company. The Minister of Customs said that because I made my argument in respect of the public utility company I thereby admitted that the ordinary commercial company raised the extra amount from its clientele and that its shareholders had no interest in the extra amount so raised. The ordinary commercial company is in open competition with the world; it is framed on the basis of a partnership; it is a limited liability company. The privately-owned commercial company is simply a partnership of its individual shareholders who have, it is true, certain corporate rights and a certain limited liability, but its shareholders are entitled to the profits of the company in the proportion in which they own shares in it. The company is theirs; the profits are their property; they have no public service commission to whom they can go and ask that they be allowed a monopoly on the market and that as a monopoly they should impose higher prices for their commodities than ordinary market prices. Therefore they are in an entirely different position, and when you tax first by 9 per cent the profits of the company you are taking that 9 per cent, or practically the equivalent of 9 per cent, from the pockets of the individual shareholders. When upon the remainder of the profits you charge the individual shareholders an income tax you are thereby imposing a double taxation upon those shareholders.

In this country, and I think in almost every other country which imposes an income tax, it is clearly recognized that double taxation should be avoided. It should be avoided particularly in Canada where we need very large investments of money in corporate enterprises of that kind, privately-owned, in order to provide for the ordinary commercial and industrial activities of the country. When you impose double taxation of that kind in Canada as against Canadian companies you put a premium upon the investment of Canadian funds in foreign enterprises abroad and you also put an obstacle in the way of securing the investment of foreign capital in commercial and industrial enterprises in this country. I do not think I need labour the point; I am presenting it to the government simply as a material and relevant consideration that affects our whole commercial and industrial prosperity and that should therefore be carefully considered before such double taxation is imposed under these resolutions.

Mr. CHURCH: I claim the same right to debate this question as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), namely, the taxation on joint stock companies and the companies of which the hon. member speaks. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the Hydro-Electric pays taxes. There are no dividends to pay under the hydro-electric movement; the dividends go back to the consumer in cheaper rates.

The more the hon. member talks about the Hydro-Electric the less he knows and the less he knows the more he chatters and talks. The Hydro-Electric in Ontario is paying taxes mixed up in rates directly and indirectly. The hon. gentleman is talking about $700,000 collected from Quebec companies under clause 4 of this particular resolution. How much in dividends do these companies take out of the consumers there who get service at cost in Ontario? There are no dividends to pay in the hydro. It has saved the people of Toronto $32,000,000 in fifteen years, money which would have gone into dividends under private ownership which the hon. gentleman is so fond of sponsoring in this House. It is the people's own movement for cheap light and power for the people of the province at cost. The people of Ontario have taxed themselves to the extent of $262,000,000 to free the province of Ontario and give them control of their own water-powers which now belong to the people forever. It is their heritage—not that of a few. All the money spent is revenue producing; it pays interest and fixed charges, and the balance goes to reduce the cost of light. The rates for both domestic and commercial light have been cut in two and three. The hydro pays certain municipal taxes, gives a better service at cost, carries the boon of cheap light and power and improved transportation to the door of the toiler and farmer reciprocally. The hydro rates are the lowest in the world and less than those of Quebec. The publicly-owned companies pay taxes the same as the private ones. The water-powers of the province should be under the control of the province for posterity and not be handed over to a lot of self-made multimillionaires in the United States whose interests the hon. gentleman apparently seems to have sometimes at heart.

What the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has to say about the hydro-electric movement in Ontario reminds me of the time when, in the province of Nova Scotia under Mr. Fielding and other premiers, with the hon. gentleman sometimes in the House, the water-powers and other resources of the province were given away like so many presents handed out by Santa Claus at Christmas time: Fisheries, timber lands and various other concessions were lavishly given away in that province during the time the hon. gentleman was himself a member of the provincial legislature. I think he ought to be fair in discussing this question as it affects Ontario. The hon. member stands up in this House in defence of private interest, but he is not so ready to defend the principle of public ownership and the conservation of the public domain for the people. As a matter of fact it has been the invariable practice of gentlemen representing the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, whether Liberal or Conservative, to attack public ownership in every respect, and the hydro-electric movement of Ontario has not escaped. Let me inform the hon. gentleman that Ontario is paying a very considerable sum in taxes in one direction or another. As the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) knows, for he was an able power controller, the Hydro-Electric people of that province paid some four or five million dollars in customs duties on machinery imported from the United States for the Chippawa, while private ownership was spared in many respects.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George a month ago attacked the hydro movement in Ontario and said they paid no taxes, without having the slightest information on the subject. He has not studied the hydro-electric or the municipal acts at all, and yet he undertakes to say the hydro pays no taxes. I am afraid that there are very few supporters of the movement in this House on either side. The hon. member is apparently of opinion that whatever is wrong with the National Railways is to be attributed to public ownership whereas private ownership is to blame entirely; and he advances the same argument in connection with the hydro-electric enterprise. Fortunately the hydro enterprise is not political in character. There is no politics in that movement such as we find in connection with the National Railways. Public ownership is not responsible for anything wrong so far as the Grand Trunk Railway is concerned. The Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern and these other roads were built under private ownership and failed, so that it is altogether beside the point for anyone to criticize public ownership for the condition in which the National Railways may find themselves today on account of these roads. I know very well that a good many hon. gentlemen in this House would destroy the National Railways if they could. He talks of rates and makes comparisons.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member to adhere more closely to the subject matter.

Mr. CHURCH: I will. I have great respect for you, Mr. Chairman, and I bow to your ruling, but I do not see why the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George should be allowed to make similar comparisons in discussing this question, if I am not to be at liberty to draw any illustration from the Canadian National Railways as I am doing. The hydro-electric movement of Ontario has resulted in cheaper light and power to the people of that province. We find that in Hamilton the rates for commercial purposes are one-third of those charged in Rochester and Buffalo. Who gets the dividends? They go back into the pockets of the working classes in dividends in power at cost. When this movement was first inaugurated in the province, coal oil lamps were in use everywhere; to-day every workingman can afford electric lights. When my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George is attacking the hydro movement I might ask him this question: How much watered stock is there in this concern such as we know exists in the capital of private companies for whose welfare hon. gentlemen in this House show so much concern? I stand for public ownership and I am going to say right now that every time the hon. gentleman gets up and makes a speech attacking the hydro movement of Ontario I am going to make a speech too in its defence. I would observe by the way, that the Conservative party owes a great deal to the hydro movement in Ontario, for 85 per cent of the representation on this side of the House in the last parliament came from Ontario. The people of that province who are solidly behind the hydro and expect the members whom they return to parliament to protect its interests.

Mr. CAHAN: As a matter of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CHURCH: I am not through yet.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I rise as a matter of privilege simply to say that the hon. gentleman, as we all know—

Mr. CHURCH: That is not a matter of privilege.

Mr. CAHAN: —has somewhat defective hearing. Consequently he has not understood my remark; otherwise he has entirely misrepresented it, because I have made no attack whatever upon the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario, not the slightest. The people of Ontario are at perfect liberty to have any form of public ownership they please.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: Therefore I hope that tomorrow when the hon. gentleman is in a somewhat saner frame of mind he will read what I have said and will feel that he owes me a public apology for the criticisms he has directed against me. With regard to the province of Nova Scotia, the hon. gentleman's remarks indicate a very grave ignorance of conditions there. They have public ownership of waterpowers in that province to-day, and his remarks certainly have no relevancy whatever to conditions there.

Mr. CHURCH: That is not a point of order, it is a private ownership sermonette. The hon. member is breaking the rules of this House himself. I want to say to him that when there are no representatives present in this House from the province of Ontario he may be able to get away with it. I read his remarks in Hansard a month ago—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I am going to abide by the rules of the House and discuss the resolution. I am perfectly in order. The concluding paragraph of this resolution states:

> The rates set forth in this subsection shall not apply to corporations or joint stock companies.

Discussion in committee should be relevant to the subject matter engaging our attention, but the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George wanders far afield and breaks the rules almost every time he speaks on these matters. I wish to protest against it. I believe we should discuss these matters according to the rules of the House whether we are on the Conservative side or the other side of the House. I have sat in this House for five years as a humble representative from the province of Ontario, and I say the hydro-electric movement in my province has very few friends in this House. When the hon. gentleman is in a saner mind he himself can leave public ownership and the hydro alone.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I am in order as much as the hon. gentleman. They criticize the old province of Ontario which pays more taxes than any other member of confederation. Forty-six per cent is paid by Ontario directly and we want fair play. I am willing to discuss this question with the hon. gentleman inside the House or outside at any time. If he will come up to Ontario he will learn something about the province, especially if he comes to Toronto and the Niagara district. If he sees the work accomplished for the people of the province by the hydro he will learn to admire it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: Then he will have more respect for the founders of the hydro-electric movement, and its functions and results, and he will become aware of the taxes they are paying, and will realize that in that way they are helping to pay his taxes and the taxes of the people of Quebec and Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, in connection with this resolution I am going to offer a very brief criticism of what I deem to be the failure of the government to recognize what has always been regarded as a very sound principle in taxation, namely, that a given source of income should not be taxed a second time. I recognize that in collecting income tax there is naturally a desire to get the maximum. This is a very laudable desire on the part of the tax officials, but I still hold that if on the production of a certain amount of profit a company is taxed, it is unfair and unsound in principle to tax again that profit when it is paid out in the form of dividends. So I suggest to the minister the desirability of amending the resolution to eliminate this duplication of taxation.

I have in my hand a telegram dated April 23 last addressed to the Minister of Finance, and on behalf of those who sent it I want to say to the minister in charge of this resolution that the fact that it was not sent to him personally should not be taken amiss. It was addressed to the Minister of Finance, presumably under the impression that he would direct this legislation through the House. The telegram reads as folows:

> At a meeting of citizens' committee representative city council, board of trade, Canadian Manufacturers' Association, B.C. division, Retail Merchants of Canada B.C. branch and Associated Property Owners of Vancouver to-day, I was instructed to make strongest opposition to provision in your budget of fifteenth instant for taxation of dividends both in hands of earning companies and again in hands of shareholders as dividends. This provision sufficiently onerous in any part of Canada to deter investment in new enterprises and particularly in new provinces such as British Columbia where introduction of new capital of supreme importance. Committee feel that proposed basis of taxation would be very serious and am instructed to urge upon you necessity of reconsidering proposed action in establishing dual taxation of company earnings if development of this province just beginning to give promise of considerable importance is not to be seriously retarded.
> (Signed) A. E. CRADDOCK,
> Honorary Secretary.

I want to impress upon the minister the importance of the suggestion made in this telegram. It comes from a very representative group of citizens, and is not offered lightly or in a spirit of criticism, but with a desire to bring to his attention the possible serious effect of this taxation. They feel, and I feel, that if persisted in it will discourage the investment of capital in the development of our natural resources. I will localize this to a degree and speak for my own province. I suppose there is no province more dependent upon the investment of capital for the development of its natural resources, those of the mine, the forest and the sea principally, and in a lesser degree agriculture, and also in manufacturing, which is growing under the stimulus of the development of our resources. All of these activities are seriously affected, and we are therefore suggesting to the minister a reconsideration of this measure.

I have also before me a memorandum submitted to the Minister of Finance by Mr. Norman McLean, president of the Associated Property Owners of Vancouver. It deals with this same question, and I will read only a very brief section. It recommends that:

> 1. The provincial income tax where levied be allowed as an exemption.
> 2. Double taxation as will apply on dividends should be withheld, as all dividends are in the first instance subject to a tax paid by the company.

There is another point referred to there which only emphasizes my argument. We have a provincial income tax in British Columbia, as I understand they have in a number of other provinces, and that creates an additional difficulty; many concerns are now paying out a very considerable portion of their earnings in income tax. First there is the provincial income tax now reduced from 9 per cent to 8 per cent; then we have the federal company tax which is now 9 per cent, formerly ten and one-half per cent, and in addition we have the tax upon the private individual on the same earnings. I am very seriously impressed with what I think will be in many instances the fatal results of this duplication. I will admit that there may perhaps be ways of getting around the tax by the reorganization of some concerns which may manage to escape this taxation, but it is not desirable to have legislation which some may escape but which others must observe. I think the object of all taxation should be to make it as clear and as simple in its operation as possible; in this instance we have multiplied taxation. I do not know whether the minister has so fixed a mind and an opinion upon the subject that we cannot appeal to him; I hope that is not the case. I am sure there are many on the other side of the House who will quite agree with my view, imperfectly expressed as it is; I am giving it hurriedly and without much preparation. But the simple fact that we are taxing these incomes twice, first in the companies and then as they are distributed in the form of dividends or earnings, is in itself enough, I think, to warrant the government abandoning this particular portion of their budget proposals. I advance this suggestion in a spirit of good faith and with the desire of assisting in the study of this problem.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Before the minister replies I would like to say a word or two on this point. I had a talk with the Minister of Finance on the subject; I did not know the Minister of Customs would have the matter in charge or I would have spoken to him as well. I am not interested in this question from the viewpoint of any individual or any particular company, but I do strongly support what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has said. I think it is going to hurt Canada if this resolution goes through in its present shape. In the first place, as has already been pointed out, it seems to me altogether contrary to the spirit of our taxation that the same money should be taxed twice; that is something which will hardly bear inspection. But passing along from that, I beg the minister to reconsider this resolution because it seems to me that it will be a hindrance to Canadian industry and Canadian investments.

This afternoon the remark was made that the dividends of a certain well established company should pay as much taxation as earned incomes. I do not think that is the point at all just now. I think there should be some inducement to people to invest their money in Canadian enterprises, and I ask the minister if he does not think that is a good principle to support. It should be made a little more profitable to put money into a Canadian enterprise than to put it into bonds. I know of a company which was started not long ago by ten men; that company may be a failure and the investors may lose their money, but if the company is successful, this resolution will make those men pay nine per cent in the first place as a company, and then each individual will have to pay an additional tax as well. People are going to think twice before investing money under these conditions. They will say, "If this company is a failure I will lose my money; if it is a success the government is going to take the bulk of the money; I had better put it into government bonds rather than risk it in any Canadian enterprise." Therefore I submit that the resolution as it is now framed will deter men with money to invest from putting it into new Canadian enterprises, and surely if there is one thing we need in this country it is to develop our resources. It is true that we are getting in a lot of outside money from the United States; we welcome it, and welcome even more the money coming from the Old Country, but it is much better that our enterprises should be controlled by ourselves so far as possible. So I submit to the minister that he should make some concession in regard to this resolution which will offer a certain amount of inducement to people to invest money in Canadian enterprises and Canadian stocks rather than in Canadian bonds.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I wish to support what has been said by previous speakers with regard to the principle of double taxation. In so doing I would like to refer briefly to what the minister said this afternoon in drawing a comparison between an earned income and an income drawn from dividends on money invested in the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is very easy to draw a red herring across the trail by citing as an example a well known, well established public corporation, indicating that if a man has sufficient money in that enterprise to give him an income of $10,000 a year he should pay the same income tax as a man with an earned income. As a matter of fact he does pay the same; and at all events there are very few people in this country who have enough money invested in corporations such as the Canadian Pacific Railway to receive an income of $10,000 a year. They are not the people who are being hit by this legislation. But just at that point let me say that the Canadian Pacific Railway pays $2,000,000 in taxes direct to the federal government, and then the stockholders who put their money into the enterprise are taxed a second time. The great majority of the people who will be affected by this measure are those people in small industrial corporations of different kinds all over Canada. I know forty or fifty of them in my own riding, and the average aggregate income would not be over $10,000 or perhaps $15,000 in any of these corporations.

When the minister spoke about earned income, he referred to the man who worked eighteen hours a day in order to secure that income. After all it is the man who pust his time and money into Canadian enterprise who works eighteen hours a day, and why should that man, receiving an increment of $10,000, pay $1,190 in taxes while the man who comes into Canada selling on commission goods produced in a foreign country and making an income of $10,000 only has to pay $290? Is there anything fair in that? That is exactly what happens; the man who earns $10,000 by selling goods produced in a foreign country will pay only $290 in taxes. The man who spends his own time and his own money in the development of Canadian enterprise will pay $1,190; and so all along the line.

Another feature, and perhaps the most vicious feature in connection with this legislation, is the provision by which the increment that may be earned in a private corporation, notwithstanding the fact that it is not distributed or is not distributable—increment in the form of goods on the shelves of a merchant or material in the plant of a manufacturer to be fabricated at some future time—is going to be subject not only, in the first place, to the corporation tax of 9 per cent, but also to taxation upon dividends just the same as if it had been distributed, although in all human probability in the majority of these cases the man who has that increment is paying interest to the bank in order to be able to carry his business along. Go through the whole of these provisions, examine just how they affect Canadian enterprise from one end of the country to the other, and, I will repeat what I said on a former occasion, if you secured a group of experts to devise a plan for discouraging Canadian people from doing anything to develop their own country, they could not devise a more effective plan for that purpose than is set out in these resolutions. You are simply making it so that the Canadian who invests his money outside of this country, or who invests his money in non-productive bonds or debentures or in mortgages in this country, will pay one rate of taxation, while the man who puts his time and his money into the development of Canadian industry and gives employment to Canadians is penalized by being taxed twice and, in some cases, as the resolution now stands, three or four times.

There is another feature to which I should like to refer for a moment, as I do not wish to rise again, and that is the provision by which a loss made in one part of a man's business is not allowed to be set off against gain in another part. I have personal knowledge of a small group of Canadian workingmen who put their money into a business in an endeavour to establish and develop an industry, and who lost $100,000 in the first two years the business was operating. In the following five or six years the business had a small increment each year, but nothing was allowed on account of the loss they had made in the first place. They were paying interest to the bank on account of loans they had made in order to be able to carry the business along, and from that time until this, if they make one or two or ten thousand dollars a year and thus help to pay back what they had borrowed in order to carry them along, whatever they make is being taxed all the time. If a man has an interest in one corporation that loses money, and an interest in another corporation that makes an equal amount to that which has been lost, he is taxed twice over, and no allowance is made for what he loses.

All along the line, as you examine the principle upon which the income tax is levied against Canadian industry, you simply find this, that it is a plan carefully conceived, or apparently so, to discourage and make it impossible for men to invest their money and put their time into Canadian business and help develop Canadian industry. I appeal to the minister to consider the whole aspect of these provisions, not as they affect a few large individual corporations, but as they affect the great mass of the Canadian people who are endeavouring by their own energy and their own time and money to do something in their own way to help develop their own country. The large corporations can take care of themselves. As a matter of fact, the large corporations in the very great majority of cases are made up by the investment of a great number of small amounts of money, in the form of payment for stocks and bonds by a great number of investors, many of them working people, many of them widows and orphans, and why should they be penalized for putting their money at work in Canada any more than those who have invested outside of the country? The whole scheme seems to me to be designed to force people either to tie their money up where it is not working at all, or to invest it outside of their own country altogether. Let me join with those who have preceded me and ask the minister at least to hold this over until he has considered just exactly what it involves.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Reference has been made to the widows and orphans. It is because of the widows and orphans, and some of the workers who are perhaps a little better off than the widows and orphans, that I should like to say a word on this matter.

Unless we repudiate our debts entirely, it is necessary to raise the revenue somehow. As I tried to point out the other day, it is only, after all, a little less than fifteen per cent of our revenues that is being raised by income tax. The greater part of the revenues are raised through indirect taxation, which bears most heavily upon the ordinary people, including the widows and orphans. So we are dealing practically in this whole income tax matter with less than fifteen per cent of our revenues. Now when we come to that fifteen per cent, I take it that it is a sound principle of taxation generally accepted that we should tax the people who are best able to bear it, and those who have made profits surely are best able to bear the taxation. There is the other side of that, which has not been emphasized to-day, and that is that if you lessen the taxation on the ordinary people you increase their buying power, and when you increase their buying power you immediately increase the amount of goods that may be produced, and you increase the prosperity of the country generally. Between increasing the stored up capital in this country in order that you may produce more, or, on the other hand, increasing the buying power of the great masses of the people, we are safe, I think, in choosing the latter alternative and arranging our taxation so as to increase buying power and in that way produce prosperity.

Mr. HANSON: If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Woodsworth) is of the opinion that this section of the budget will help those for whom he pretends to speak, and will study very carefully the schedules in this resolution, especially those which apply to the very large incomes, then I suggest to him that he cast a false vote on this budget, because this budget, and especially these schedules applying to the very large incomes, have lightened the burden upon the taxpayer against whom the hon. member has steadfastly set his face ever since he came to this House.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I say in that regard—

Mr. HANSON: I would like to go on with my remarks, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member occupies about ten times as much of the time of the House as I do.

I would like to reaffirm in a very brief way the conviction that has been expressed by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me with respect to this particular resolution. I do not know that I can throw very much new light on this question, but I think I can view it from quite a different angle from that taken by some of the other gentlemen, and in order to do so I want to give a concrete illustration of certain Canadian companies which I know about, owned entirely by Canadian taxpayers. I am not going to mention any names, but it so happens that a company engaged in the development of the natural resources of my province, a company which is 100 per cent Canadian and in which Canadian citizens have risked their whole fortunes, purchased 100 per cent of the stock of another Canadian company. It so happened that this second company which was purchased had no less than three subsidiary companies. Now that is the condition that is confronting these people with respect to this particular tax. What is to be done? I have not heard that there is to be any rectification of what it is clear must be a very grave injustice. In the particular case I have under observation, and in which I have been called upon to advise, I have advised that unless there is a rectification of the injustice no less than 27 per cent of the dividends of the third subsidiary company will go into the public treasury. Now that is confiscation, and I object to the resolution on that ground. I simply recite this to accentuate the injustice of the present resolution. I am bound to say that I do agree in principle that there should be an advantage given to earned income over unearned, but I would not give it in this way, nor would I discriminate to such an extent as is done here. This very question was discussed, I think, last year or the year before. I took occasion then to urge very briefly upon the minister to make some such distinction. I must say that I had the surprise of my life when I read the budget speech this year, not being present when it was delivered, and learned that the minister had adopted the method which he did adopt. I hope that before the resolution is passed there will be a rectification of the extreme condition to which I have referred.

Just one other word and I am done. I object to the taxing this year of the 1925 dividends. I do not think it is fair to the Canadian stockholders who have invested their money in good faith in Canadian companies, who have purchased shares, held them, and applied their dividends on the faith of the law as it was at the end of the accounting period of 1925. It is retroactive legislation, and as such is objectionable per se. But the worst feature of it is that you are taxing a man and making him pay for something he has probably not got now. I ask the minister to consider that feature. I am not going to attempt to deal with the legality of the matter. No doubt the government have had some advice on that point, although I have very grave doubt whether it is actually legal to do what the government propose. But it is objectionable on its face because it is retroactive legislation, and it is something that a government should not resort to unless they are absolutely driven to it.

But over and above all these considerations there is the fact that by putting a double tax on Canadian dividends, and by shifting the burden as it has been shifted, you are going to drive capital out of this country or are going to keep it away. I know something about the financing of Canadian industrial concerns; I have had something to do with it. I know just how hard it is to get local capital to invest in Canadian industrial concerns. Not this year but years ago, and from that time on down to the present, it has been necessary to pay investors a higher rate of interest, to absolutely secure them and give them freedom from taxation, or money could not be got for utilization in the development of our natural resources. I have reference to the pulp and paper business, an industry that is expanding this country. But how is it doing it? It is doing it in nine cases out of ten on borrowed capital, either by way of preferred stocks, or by bonds or, if you can, by inducing people with money to buy common shares in Canadian industrial concerns. I venture the assertion that if this resolution goes through you will not get a dollar for the purchase of common shares in Canadian pulp and paper companies.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I just correct the impression that may have been left by the last speaker? In discussing the budget I deplored the fact that we were proposing to lessen the taxation on higher incomes. I have taken that stand right along, so that my position on the matter is quite clear.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I desire to add my voice briefly to those of hon. gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to this resolution. I am convinced that there is a plain business issue here that requires the judgment of business men and in that number, of course, I include the minister and the commissioner of taxation. I feel that this resolution if adopted and made the law of this country would result in irreparable damage. I am reminded of an incident which occurred during the first session I was present as a member of this House. The Hon. Mr. Fielding was Minister of Finance, and there was a question of imposing a duty of a dollar and a half per thousand on cigarettes. I told the minister that I held no brief for the cigarette manufacturers, but if that duty were put into force it would result in the smuggling of cigarettes and in a distinct loss to the revenue—that it would be a totally bad business proposition in fact. The minister was frank enough to say that if that result followed, the legislation would be repealed at the next session of parliament. We came back and after one year it developed, so I was informed, that the revenue of this country had lost about $2,000,000 and that bootlegging in cigarettes had been set up. If this resolution is made law, if control such as this is placed over Canadian funds, it will mean what? First of all it will mean the transfer of these funds to United States. I am told that already representations have been made to the government that money has gone out of this country because of this very resolution, and I ask the minister if he will be good enough to tell us, before we are through with this item, if any representations have been made on that score. Therefore, without taking up time unduly, I ask those who are disposed to sit down in the cool of the evening and investigate a business proposition, then arrive at a conclusion, whether this mode of taxation would be in the interest of Canada. I am satisfied that hon. members have already received circulars from brokers—I know that I have received three or four—pointing out this very fact, and saying that it will pay Canadians to invest their money in the United States because by so doing they will avoid this taxation. I am one hundred per cent Canadian. All of us want to do the best we can for this Dominion, and I ask the minister whether this method of taxation is going to help us in upbuilding Canada, or whether it is going to mean that for the sake of a little revenue we shall be denying business to this country and estranging funds that should go into Canadian investments.

Mr. MANION: I should like to say a few words on this resolution, although I do not know whether any further arguments can be added to those which have been already advanced. But there is one point that appears to me to have been pressed too severely, and that is the point made in connection with the term "unearned income." There is a little too much tendency on the part of many, it appears to me, to desire to tax very heavily what they call "unearned income," in other words income coming as dividends from some corporation in which investments are carried. May I point out that frequently the so-called unearned income is not unearned at all; it is earned over a period of many years by the thrift of the man who happens to have that income coming to him at that time? Let us take two examples to illustrate the point: There are two individuals who, we will say, twenty or thirty years ago were earning an income of $3,000 or $4,000 a year. One spent or wasted everything he made or, perhaps, did not waste it but spent it on good living. The other man wished to provide for his old age, or wished to make provision for his family. Accordingly he laid aside a little money every year and put it into some Canadian corporation. It is only a few years since the income tax was first imposed in this country, and it 9 p.m. was not until the present budget was brought down that the investments which this man had made in Canadian enterprises were taxed. Therefore his thrift would be rewarded by a return of 100 per cent. But to-day the proposition is that this man, who has been thrifty and saved for the old age of himself and his wife and the care and education of his children, shall not only be taxed on that thrift which has made him save his money but that his thrift shall be doubly and in some cases trebly taxed. A point that should be kept in mind is that those so-called unearned incomes, in perhaps 95 per cent of the cases in this and other countries—and probably more in Canada than in older countries—are really earned incomes, earned by the thrift and self-denial of many years gone by. That is another reason why this matter should be given consideration.

The argument which has been advanced in a very moderate tone by many hon. members to-day, most of them, I admit, upon this side of the House, has been advanced with the desire not of embarrassing the government but of pointing out to the minister the need of some further consideration of this item. It is an unfair tax not only because it is a tax and sometimes a double and even a triple tax upon thrift, but as has been so well pointed out, because it is in many cases a double tax on our country, a tax which does not apply to foreign countries where people invest their money. The Canadian investor and Canadian envestment in Canadian corporations are paying a heavier tax through this proposition than is paid by the corporation of a foreign company or the individual who invests his money in corporations of a foreign country.

There is another point that should appeal to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who states that he speaks for the labouring classes of the country. He should remember that if you injure the industries of Canada you take away from the working classes the opportunity of earning a living. The first persons who suffer if you injure a Canadian industry are the workingmen themselves. The man who owns an industry, even if it is put out of business, can often go south and while away his time in Florida, the West Indies, or somewhere else, but the workingman has to look for another job. If any of those industries are put out of business—and it has been very ably argued that many of them will be hurt and some perhaps will be put out of business by taxation such as this—the workingman will be the first to suffer by such action.

In closing I appeal sincerely to the minister either to make an amendment himself to-night, or to hold this item over until to-morrow, reconsider the question in consultation with his able assistant, Mr. Breadner, and see if he cannot bring in a proposition which will be satisfactory. I do not think the minister would accuse any hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon on this question—and it has been under discussion for a long time—of taking a captious or, if you will, a political attitude. They have argued it from the standpoint of fairness to the industries of Canada and those who have money invested in them. I would suggest that the minister should either hold it over until to-morrow and consider the matter or amend it himself to-night if he should desire to do so.

Mr. BURY: I do not intend to speak at any length because the arguments against this proposition have been very carefully and fully elaborated. I wish however to say a word for the widows and orphans. I wonder how many hon. members have considered the fact that perhaps in more cases than they can imagine the sole resources of many comparatively poor people who are intended to go tax free under the income tax law may be represented by investments in industrial enterprises in this country. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) has called attention to the fact that what has been so glibly called unearned income may in point of fact be really earned income. That is to say, it may represent the thrifty accumulations and careful earnings of a man, a comparatively poor man it may be, over a period of many years. This man dies, but before his death, for the purpose of supporting his widow and children, he has invested his money in industrial securities. You tax the revenue coming from those industrial securities and you are taxing the woman; you are taxing the person whom you intended to let go tax free.

Let us take the case of a widow whose income from investments made by her deceased husband in his lifetime amounts to $1,500 a year. She has to pay a tax of $135 simply because her husband during his lifetime made provision for her by investing money in Canadian industries. Let us take the case of an elderly couple who may have passed the age when they can earn a living. By thrift and industry they have made investments in Canadian enterprises bringing them in a revenue from dividends of $3,000 a year. You intend that that shall be tax free, but in point of fact by the simple reason that their investments are in Canadian industries they pay an income tax of $270 a year. I do not know whether members of the committee have considered that.

Mr. POWER: Will the hon. gentleman explain how he gets those figures?

Mr. BURY: Supposing the revenue of a widow is $1,500 a year—

Mr. POWER: In that case she pays no tax.

Mr. BURY: —derived from money made in a certain industrial enterprise. You go to the fountain head and impose a tax of 9 per cent on her $1,500 a year before she draws a cent. Supposing there is an elderly couple who have, as I said a moment ago, by long, careful industry and thrift set aside for their old age investments which will bring them a bare $3,000 a year. You intend that that income of $3,000 a year shall be tax free, but in point of fact by this proposition you take $270 out of their pockets.

Mr. POWER: Did the hon. member's party not take 10 per cent before.

Mr. BURY: That does not make it any better.

Mr. POWER: It makes it one per cent better.

Mr. BURY: I am pointing out that you are taking in the one case $135 from a widow whose income is only $1,500 a year and in the other you are taking $270 from an aged couple whose income is only $3,000 a year, and only because the man had the folly to put his money into a Canadian industry. If he had not been such an infernal fool as to put his money into a Canadian industry—

Mr. POWER: Would my hon. friend suggest that we exempt Canadian industries altogether from taxation?

Mr. BURY: What you are doing with one hand you are undoing with the other.

Mr. POWER: Would the hon. member suggest that we abolish the tax on industrial corporations?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A double tax.

Mr. POWER: At present my hon. friend is talking of incomes of $1,500 a year which are taxed only once.

Mr. BURY: I am pointing out that because a man was such an infernal fool that in the days of his thrift and earning capacity he put money into Canadian industry for the sake of supporting his widow when he dies, instead of putting it into bonds or some other securities outside of industry or into industrial enterprises in other countries, his widow has to pay a tax of $135 a year out of her wretched $1,500, while her neighbour who has her money invested in another country gets her $1,500 net without any income tax reduction whatsoever. That is the result of this proposition. Hon. gentlemen may think that is fair, sensible and good business for Canada. If so, I compliment them upon their mentality, but to me it seems to be a gross injustice that a widow on one side of the street shall have to pay $135 a year in income tax while a widow on the other side has to pay no income tax whatever simply because the first widow's good man—

Mr. GERVAIS: Why take the widow all the time?

Mr. BURY: I take the widow all the time because it seems to some hon. gentlemen opposite that we here know nothing about widows.

Mr. POWER: Tell us some of your experiences.

Mr. BURY: I am afraid any experience of mine would fade into absolute insignificance in comparison with the experiences of my hon. friend.

Mr. POWER: But I am not talking about them; I am more discreet.

Mr. CANTLEY: I want to emphasize some of the objections made by hon. gentlemen on this side. In my judgment, and I believe in the judgment of the committee generally, the taxation now proposed will serve to scare away capital from this country. It is difficult at any time to induce capitalists to come to Canada, and this will simply increase that difficulty. The taxation proposed will make it hard for anyone in Canada to obtain foreign capital for investments in this country. Now, if we are to make any progress at all industrially we must have foreign capital, and in large volume; I am not referring at the moment to the United States so much as to capital from the Old Country. I have been a borrower all my life, and I know what it is to try to induce British capitalists to invest money in enterprises in Canada. A few years ago when we were endeavouring in Nova Scotia, to extend the iron and steel industry there, in company with the present Chief Justice of the province of Nova Scotia, who at that time was president of the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, I spent some months in London in the effort to obtain upwards of ten million dollars of capital, and one of the first questions with which we were confronted had reference to the matter of taxation in this country. If the present proposed taxation is carried into effect, future borrowers will be obliged to reply, to such a question, to the effect that the earnings of industry will be called upon to contribute nine per cent in the form of direct taxation, while in addition thereto the individual dividends will also be taxable. What chance has anyone to secure foreign capital on such terms, when the same capital can be invested elsewhere without this handicap?

This is a practical question. Let me give a concrete illustration of the way in which this taxation will affect Nova Scotia in possibly a very few months. It is within the knowledge of every hon. member that the largest industry by far which we have in that province is at present in a critical condition, and if it is to be maintained it must have some twenty-five or thirty million dollars in the way of added capital. Where shall we secure that money? Is there any possible chance of our getting it in Great Britain under the conditions foreshadowed in these budget proposals? Is there any likelihood of our being able to get ten, fifteen or twenty million dollars of British capital when investors on the other side learn that, apart from the nine per cent collected in direct taxation, the dividends will also be taxable? The situation in Nova Scotia is serious, and while I do not intend to labour the point I am bound to say that it is one that appeals to me with great force in view of this taxation proposal. I do not know that anything I can say will have any weight with the government, but I do appeal to the minister to consider the facts as I have tried to put them before the House. I want to assure the government that in view of the gravity of the situation now existing in Nova Scotia the effect of this taxation, if it goes into operation as now proposed, cannot be otherwise than disastrous.

Mr. BIRD: We all admit that taxation is one of the most debatable subjects that can come before the House and I am ready to grant that the arguments that have been advanced by hon. gentlemen to the right have been sincerely offered. But these arguments have been made solely from one point of view. They constitute, in effect, ar attack on the standard of living now prevailing in Canada. Now we are suffering under the heavy burden of war taxation, and someone has to bear that burden. The question therefore is, who will bear it? Our friends to the right say that those Canadians who have a surplus of income should be relieved of taxation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BIRD: I have listened carefully to my hon. friend from East Algoma and to other hon. members during the past few days, and these gentlemen seem to think that some undue burden is being imposed on Canadian capital or on surplus income. If it is the object of hon. gentlemen to relieve surplus income, where will the burden be placed? There is only one thing to do, and that is to place it on the shoulders of the consumers. It follows, therefore, whether hon. gentlemen realize it or not, that they are really attacking the standards of living of the common people. And it is a very dangerous political proceeding to do anything of the sort. It has been contended that this tax is an attack on thrift. Of course it is not the rich whom hon. gentlemen seek to relieve, but the ordinary thrifty man who through a long life of toil has saved enough money to buy a few shares in some industrial concern. Well, what do hon. gentlemen want to do as an alternative? They want to make it impossible for all time for any workingman to save any money. If our friends to the right push the logic of their arguments to its extreme they will tax the consumers to such an extent that the poor man will find it hard to save any money at all. Then hon. gentlemen say that the tax will injure industry and, consequently, the workingman. That is an instance of the fallacy of arguing exclusively from one point of view. I agree entirely with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, that the soundest economic means whereby to benefit industry is to increase the purchasing power of the consumer; and it is tantamount to increasing his purchasing power to prevent any tendency towards decreasing it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Are we not all consumers? What does the hon. member mean by "consumer?"

Mr. BIRD: We are all consumers; but the capacity of some Canadians to consume is greater than that of others. Unfortunately our economic system is so ordered that the consuming power of a comparatively small number of our people is enormous in comparison with that of the great mass who live from hand to mouth all the time. Stimulate industry! The only way to have industry in a flourishing state is to stimulate the purchasing power of the people of this country. All economic thinkers, as well as practical politicians who have any interest in the people, agree that you can increase the purchasing power of the people, and thus stimulate industry, by reducing the burden of taxation. With other hon. members of this House I believe it is a regrettable thing that our country is so burdened with taxation. Surely it does the country harm. Surely the country would spring forward into renewed prosperity if some of this taxation were lifted. But when you propose to lift it, let the relief be as equitable as possible. I may have misunderstood the speeches of my hon. friends to the right, but it seems to me they want to lift the burden off the capitalists and put it on the consumers of this country.

We have heard the argument repeated over and over again, which I think on reflection would not be made on its behalf, that if you tax capital it will flee the country. Surely it is a stain upon the capitalists that in a time of stress, when the country is suffering from inflated taxation, the possessor of surplus wealth will migrate if any attempt is made to tax him. That is a new kind of patriotism, that you can pile all this war taxation on the workingman, the farmer, because he cannot get away, he is patriotic—he has to be because he is tied hand and foot to the soil; but you must not impose the burden on the man who possesses capital, who to-day is a patriotic citizen and boasts of his patriotism, for if you do, to-morrow he will flee and become a citizen of another country. That seems to be the logic of our friends' argument.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be a very worthy achievement on the part of the Minister of Finance to frame some method of dealing with these ultra-patriots. Surely it is within the scope of human wit to discipline those who in order to escape paying a fair share of the taxation of this country are ready at any moment to hurry off to some distant and greener pastures. It surely would be a worthy achievement on his part to so discipline these super-patriots that they would be glad to leave their capital and themselves at home in order to help the rest of the people to bear the burden of post war taxation.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) that if his income happens to be $4,000 a year, under the new law he will pay $20; but that if I happen to be a manufacturer and the sole shareholder in a company whose net profits amount to $4,000—the same as the income of my hon. friend—I will be forced to pay $360. But it does not stop there. When I get my dividends I must in addition pay just exactly the amount that my hon. friend has paid. In other words, I must pay $360 plus $20. Yet he rants and raves and suggests I ought to pay more.

Mr. BIRD: The hon. gentleman does not seem to realize that he would be over $1,000 better off than I would.

Mr. CLARK: I do not think my hon. friend has followed me. The incomes are the same, only my income, which happens to be $4,000—

Mr. BIRD: But the hon. gentleman would have an earned income as well.

Mr. CLARK: I do not hear my hon. friend. He says the cost of the war has to be met somehow. I would point out that in past years, under the Special War Revenue Act and the Income War Tax Act, we have been collecting war taxes. In 1922-23 we collected $181,000,000, next year $182,000,000 next year $147,000,000 and last year $154,000,000. During his budget pronouncement the Minister of Finance stated that the principal expenditures of 1925-26 due to the war exceeded the taxes collected under these special war acts. As a matter of fact the figures show quite the contrary. In making up his statement he has charged interest on the whole public debt incurred since 1914. I suggest that that is not fair, that the balance of the national debt so incurred is not due entirely to the war, that during the interval we have advanced $600,000,000 to the National Railways; furthermore, the public accounts show that the total cost of the war amounted to $1,600,000,000. Therefore the interest on the public debt due to the war is not in excess of $75,000,000, whereas the Minister of Finance represents it to be $122,000,000. Under this Income War Tax Act and the Special War Revenue Act we collected in 1922-23, $51,000,000 in excess of the amount required to meet war expenditures; the following year, 1923-24, $61,000,000, in 1924-25, $26,000,000, and in the last fiscal year we collected $33,000,000. I suggest that in so far as those collections have exceeded the amounts required to take care of the war expenditures they were illegally collected. I am not suggesting that the acts themselves are ultra vires of parliament, indeed the contrary has been held; but those acts having been passed for that specific purpose, I say the collections in excess are illegal.

This afternoon I pointed out to the minister that in so far as the taxation of dividends which were earned in 1925 was concerned it was ultra vires, but perhaps I wrongly used that term. This parliament, of course, can pass such legislation, but I submit that in so far as this act relates to taxation of dividends earned in 1925, it is equivalent to a tax on property that has ceased to exist; there is nothing to tax, and therefore no taxation can be collected. It is just the same as though the minister to-day were attempting to tax dividends received in 1890; that property has been disposed of or spent. Similarly, dividends which were received in 1925 have ceased to exist, the property is non-existent, and such tax cannot be collected. If the tax were for the next year it would attach to the dividends as and when they were received and would be quite legal, but I ask the minister to take that into consideration. I further ask him whether he has considered the legal effect of an act instituting a tax upon property which has ceased to exist.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I had not intended to say anything further, Mr. Chairman, and would not have done so but for the remarks of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) in which he referred specifically to myself and put words in my mouth which I did not utter. In endeavouring to make it appear on the record that those who are opposing the method of double taxation now proposed by the government are endeavouring to relieve Canadian industry or Canadian investors of income tax altogether, the hon. member for Nelson either wholly misunderstands the position we have taken, or misunderstands the proposal before the House, or is misrepresenting the position taken by myself and others who have spoken in this regard. So I would just like to ask the hon. member what justification can be advanced for taxing a man with an income of $5,000 a year $40, and taxing another man with the same income $490. That is an unfair method of taxation, and am I to be charged with endeavouring to evade taxation on behalf of those who have their money invested in industrial enterprises in this country because I oppose it? That is exactly what is proposed in this resolution. As I said before, a man may earn $5,000 a year by selling goods produced in a foreign country, and on that amount he will pay a tax of $40. But if a man has the enterprise and industry to earn $5,000 from his investment in some Canadian company he is taxed $490 a year, and that is what we are objecting to. Those who are investing money in this country and those endeavouring to build up Canadian industry have always been perfectly willing to pay their fair share of our taxes, but when it comes to this system of duplicate taxation many businesses will find it impossible to carry on, and I think we have a perfect right to object. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Nelson both made statements in regard to earned and unearned income, and the latter gentleman also said that the way to make industry prosperous was to make it possible for the Canadian people to buy more goods. If the plan of my hon. friends were put into effect, they desire to have those Canadians who can buy goods buy foreign goods, and they would make it utterly impossible for a Canadian to buy goods made in this country at all.

I would like to give one illustration before closing. If you look at this island in the Ottawa river you will see an industry established there. A young man came to this city seventy years ago and spent the whole of his lifetime and his yearly increment as he made it in establishing that industry. In the whole of his private life and in the way he lived he was a hermit in comparison with some of these men who are talking about the plutocratic business man. During those seventy years through that industry he gave employment, furnished homes and supplied the means of livelihood to tens of thousands of people. and that is exactly what the minister is endeavouring to prevent by the introduction of a system of this kind.

Mr. POWER: I presume the hon. gentleman is referring to the J. R. Booth industry.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Exactly.

Mr. POWER: Would taxation such as this have prevented J. R. Booth from becoming as great as he eventually did become?

Mr. NICHOLSON: He could not have started.

Mr. POWER: Will the hon. gentleman tell me why?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Because you begin by confiscating the increment which is made from year to year, which would make it impossible for him to get started.

Mr. POWER: Is it not a fact that J. R. Booth was not incorporated until the last five years of his life?

Mr. NICHOLSON: My hon. friend can speak for an hour if he wishes after I have finished. I simply say that by this method you are making it impossible for those men who are endeavouring to establish industries of a similar character to carry on, because you confiscate the increment. I will refer again to that provision by which the increment is taxed a second time, whether or not it is possible to distribute it. That is the most vicious principle in connection with the whole thing. When the hon. member for Nelson or anyone else undertakes to charge those who are objecting to this vicious principle of double taxation which is applied against Canadian industry but not against incomes derived from any other source whatever, with evading taxation, he is simply making a charge which has absolutely no foundation in fact. No hon. gentleman on this side of the House who has spoken on this provision has argued any such thing as my hon. friend would endeavour to indicate.

Mr. BOIVIN: Let me at once admit, in attempting to answer the criticism levelled at the measure now before the House, that the question at issue is very serious, and that it was not without a great deal of consideration that the government decided to depart from the principle adopted in our income tax law since it has been on our statutes. But let me further say that it is a great deal easier to criticise than to construct; it is a great deal easier for hon. members opposite—and I do not blame them for having done so, because it is their duty—to pick flaws in any piece of legislation introduced by the government than to correct those flaws and make the legislation proof against criticism.

Let me take up the different lines of criticism as they were made by the different speakers on the other side of the House, and let me deal first with my good friend from St. Lawrence-St. George, who brought up the point of taxation upon light, heat and power corporations, or in other words public utility corporations. He represented with a good deal of reason that the people of the province of Quebec should not be called upon to pay more for light, heat and power than should the people of Ontario, but that this was the case at present because the public utility corporations of the province of Quebec were obliged to pay income tax. This they passed on to their consumers and considered as an overhead expense, whereas the public utility corporations of Ontario, or in other words the hydro-electric commission, was not obliged to do so. The people of Ontario represent, quite rightly I think, that the hydro-electric commission does not attempt to make profits, and that therefore there are no profits to be taxed. There is only gross revenue, which may be compared with the gross revenue of the public utility corporations of Quebec. The suggestion was put forward that we might equalize matters by not imposing any tax on the net earnings of the public utility corporations in Quebec, but that we could impose a smaller tax on the gross earnings of both corporations. That would be a way out of the difficulty were it not for the fact that the British North America Act prohibits the taxing of government property and of government corporations. Section 125 of the British North America Act provides that no lands and no property belonging to Canada or to any province of Canada shall be liable to taxation. This aspect of the law has been discussed in the House many times, and that is the reason why income taxation has never been imposed upon the public utility corporations of Ontario.

I did not intend to blame the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George for having been in contradiction with himself when I spoke just before six o'clock. It was more in a spirit of gratitude that I rose to thank him for having pointed out that in the case of the public utility corporation the tax was really paid by the consumer, and that what existed in the case of the public utility corporation existed in the case of most of the larger corporations of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: The latter part is where we differ.

Mr. BOIVIN: We do not differ so much as my hon. friend thinks at the moment, because I was going to say that I am willing at once to concede that in so far as small corporations are concerned, in so far as partnerships formed into joint stock companies are concerned, there is a real hardship in double taxation. Where four or five young men invest their earnings for a certain number of years in one partnership and are confronted by this income tax law, which was placed upon our statute books by our predecessors in office—I am not blaming them for that; it was necessary and must be maintained—when they learn that for the purpose of settling estates and paying succession duty taxes without trouble and inconvenience it is easier for them to incorporate as a joint stock company, they proceed to take out a charter. It is the same capital, it is the same effort, it is the same people interested in the concern, and there is double taxation. The government proposes to remedy that by placing in the bill a clause —it is not necessary that this should have been mentioned in the resolution, because it is a diminution and not an increase in taxation—giving to these corporations the opportunity of making their own option of paying their taxation as joint stock companies or as individual partnerships, as they may desire.

Mr. CAHAN: That will really meet my objection to a very great extent.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am very glad to have that admission. I know that my hon. friend will contend this, that it is going to be very difficult to draw the line between the family corporation, between the partnership which has developed into a joint stock company, and the larger corporation. Let me say right now that in spite of all the criticism levelled against our bill, I am still of the firm opinion that most of these small corporations will take advantage of the law as it stands and continue to pay their taxes as corporations, and not as partnerships. I know that my hon. friends readily understand the difference.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

If they pay their taxes as corporations, they will pay 9 per cent on their entire earnings, it is true, but the individual partners will pay taxes only on what they withdraw from the company. The surplus that remains in the company is not taxed over and above the 9 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They would be keeping back the income if it was more than that.

Mr. BOIVIN: Nine per cent would be the only amount they would have to pay as corporations.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On a net income of $9,000 they would pay only 9 per cent, and that really means an income of $12,000 in the case of a married man.

Mr. BOIVIN: In the case of corporations where the profits are large they would prefer, I suppose, to leave them in the corporation. In all corporations, and I know it is the small corporation that hon. gentlemen opposite desire to protect, they would have to pay a tax on their profits at the same rate that they would pay if they were individual partners in a partnership.

Mr. MANION: But would not the corporation have to pay the same tax when it ultimately makes a distribution of its profits?

Mr. BOIVIN: If the corporation is sufficiently large to make it more advantageous for the corporation to pay 9 per cent on its total earnings and to leave in reserve the amounts that could be distributed amongs its shareholders, of course, when the dividends were ultimately distributed, it would be considered as a profit or income and become taxable.

Mr. MANION: That is the point I make.

Mr. BOIVIN: It must be remembered however, that a great many of these corporations invest their profits in brick and mortar.

Mr. MANION: It would really only be delaying the double taxation.

Mr. BOIVIN: It would be delaying the double taxation if the dividends were ever withdrawn from the company in the form of direct profits. But, I wanted to add, there is another corporation that we are trying to reach, and that is the personal corporation, or the corporation sole, which was formed in many cases for the express purpose of evading taxation.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Nobody on this side has objected to that.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am very glad that in all the remarks made by hon. members on the other side of the House no objection was taken to the efforts that are being made in this legislation to reach back and tax the man who should have paid taxes before but who has evaded taxation, not the man who has invested his money in industry, not the man who has attempted to develop Canada, not the man who has attempted to give employment to his fellow men or to keep the wheels of industry going, but the man who has incorporated himself as an investment corporation and who has evaded taxation by withdrawing from the corporation only what he required to meet his living expenses, paying 9 per cent on the balance, and leaving the entire amount of his surplus to accumulate from year to year in the corporation. I am glad that we are at one in this House in the effort the government is attempting to make to reach back and oblige these people to pay their fair share of taxation.

Mr. CAHAN: I think we are all in accord as to that, but I think my hon. friend would have to consult his legal advisers on that point, because under the form which the legislation takes here, any counsel for a fee of $100 to $500 could advise a wealthy man how he could escape the tax entirely.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend must not forget that he is looking merely at the resolution which, after it has been adopted by parliament, confers upon the government the power to introduce the bill based upon it. The bill, of course, will be much more precise than the resolution itself, and will, I think, meet any objections that could be raised by my hon. friend.

I do not think there is very much criticism as to the rates charged. The whole argument, I think, goes back to the double taxation. We have protected the small industrial investor by placing in the bill a clause to the effect that partners going into business or people entering what may be called a family industrial corporation shall have the option of paying either as a partnership or as a company, as they may desire.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is there any limit to the number of shareholders there may be in a company of that kind?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, there is no limit to the number, but they have to be either members of the same family or individual partners who are engaged in the same business and have become incorporated as a joint stock company.

Mr. CAHAN: I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that such a provision does not go quite far enough. He desires, as I do, to protect the industrial life of our towns and villages. One great difficulty in the province of Quebec is to maintain in the towns and villages small industries which give employment to people, who otherwise would find refuge in the great cities of the United States or possibly in Montreal or Quebec. Now, this resolution would apply to all these companies no matter whether they are of members of the same family or not. Half a dozen neighbours will get up a small company. They will contribute the necessary capital, enter into a partnership, and become incorporated as a limited company. They certainly should be exempt. The whole body of private companies, incorporated under the Companies Act, should be exempt in the same way. All private companies who are incorporated under the Companies Act as partners should be exempt, because it is absolutely impossible to maintain the small industries of our towns and villages if they are to be taxed twice, once as a company and secondly on the income which they receive in the way of dividends.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should like to support what my hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George has said in this respect. My sole idea in discussing this matter is to try to find some means whereby there will be an inducement to our own people to invest money in the industries of our own country rather than put it into bonds. And I am not comparing their position with the position of people who invest in foreign countries at all. At the present time I am considering the position of a man who has some money that he might invest in Canadian enterprises and thus give employment to our own people and help to develop our own resources, or that he might put into bonds without incurring any risk in regard to it. I have instanced a case that I happen to know of where ten men lately started a new business. I submit that if this legislation goes through as I understand it to be now, it will do a lot to prevent people of that kind from making investments of the character I have indicated. That should apply to the ten men to whom I have referred, although they are not related to each other at all. I am sure that if the minister considers the matter he will agree with me—and I am not speaking from a political point of view at all but from a business standpoint and in the interest of the good of our common country—that if ten men go into an investment of that kind where they may lose their money it is very unfair to tax them twice. It will do a lot to prevent men from putting their money into Canadian companies designed to develop our own industries and provide work for our own people.

Mr. BOIVIN: The argument used by my hon. friend of course is a strong argument—not only strong but sound—but it comes back to the point I urged in opening my remarks, that it was always easier to criticize than to build up and construct legislation. The resolution before the committee will, of course, form the basis of a bill. That bill will not be pressed for second reading to-night; it will be held over until next week, and if my hon. friend from Argenteuil, who spoke to the Minister of Finance concerning the matter but whom I did not have the pleasure of meeting, has any suggestion by which this difficulty can be overcome, I can assure him it will be taken into consideration and if possible the bill will be amended accordingly. There is no desire on the part of the government to impose double taxation which will stifle the small corporation.

Hon. members on the other side gave some typical examples of the hardships that might be caused to the widow who had a revenue of $1,500, or to the aged married couple who had an income of $3,000, and who would be obliged to pay taxation. Let me tell the hon. member who gave us those two examples that the taxation they paid is indirect taxation. It is not taxation upon their income, it is taxation paid by the company in which their money has been invisted before this revenue is derived from it, and this resolution effects an absolute reduction there of 1½ per cent. Previously that same widow, and that same married couple were obliged to lose 10½ per cent upon the earnings derived from the capital they had invested in the company instead of the 9 per cent paid by the company at the present time. And I do not think it is quite fair to say that when 9 per cent is collected on the earnings of the company it is equivalent to 9 per cent of the dividends received by the shareholders. It evidently is not, because under the old act when the normal tax was only 4 per cent, the normal tax alone was deducted from the taxation imposed upon dividends derived from companies. The only relief that was given under the old act was relief for the normal tax.

10 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That helped the small taxpayer.

Mr. BOIVIN: It helped the small taxpayer.

[Sir George Perley.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To the full extent.

Mr. BOIVIN: To the extent of the normal tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is all the small taxpayer is interested in.

Mr. BOIVIN: The tax of 4 per cent was of course what he was interested in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Four per cent or under.

Mr. BOIVIN: No one paid under 4 per cent under the old act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is quite true.

Mr. BOIVIN: The change is made to meet in part the request of a large number of people in this country who claim that earned income should not pay the same rate as unearned income. Now what is the difference between unearned income and earned income? My good friend the member for Fort William said a few moments ago that practically all income was earned income because it had been earned at some previous time.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I said largely in this country—95 per cent, probably.

Mr. BOIVIN: I agree almost entirely with everything my hon. friend has said, and if he would refer to the capital as being income previously earned, I would agree with him entirely.

Mr. MANION: That is what I meant, of course.

Mr. BOIVIN: But when he states that the income derived from that capital is the same as earned income, I am obliged to disagree with my hon. friend because there is a difference between the cases of the two men that he cited. One man has saved no money and therefore has no capital. The other man has the capital invested from which he derives his income.

Mr. MANION: That is because of one man's thrift and the other man's improvidence.

Mr. BOIVIN: Absolutely, but the capital is the result of the thrift, and we are taxing the capital. We are taxing the income derived from that capital.

Mr. MANION: That is very specious reasoning.

Mr. BOIVIN: It may be specious reasoning but it is nevertheless absolutely true that the accumulated capital is not taxed by this government. It was not taxed by the former government. Under the income tax act, capital has always been respected. What was taxed was the earning power of that capital or the income derived from it. In this particular case, the man who has the capital invested still has the same means of earning his livelihood as the man who has no capital. That is if both men are of the same age and living under like conditions.

Mr. McGIBBON: Are government annuities and life insurance annuities taxable under this resolution?

Mr. BOIVIN: Government annuities and annuities from life insurance companies are exempt under the old act, and there is no change in that provision.

Mr. CAHAN: I can understand the hon. gentleman making a distinction between earned and unearned income, using the terms "earned income" and "unearned income" in the sense in which he has used them. But why not distinguish as well between earned income, which I understand to be salary or money derived from service, professional or otherwise, and income derived from bonds, debentures or mortgages, which is unearned income? One cause of dissatisfaction is that the government singles out simply one item of unearned income, namely, dividends, and places them in a prejudicial or inferior position, while it does not make a clear distinction between earned income and unearned income in dealing with income derived from bonds, debentures, mortgages and money lent in all sorts of ways.

Mr. BOIVIN: I would like to be able to devise an equitable way of making a difference between revenue derived from bonds and mortgages and revenue derived from salaries, and if I could I would certainly recommend it to council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It has been tried in England.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, but there is a distinction only in regard to the first £2,500 of revenue.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Which helps the small man whom it is intended to help.

Mr. CAHAN: And in the United States as well.

Mr. BOIVIN: But being unable to do that, being unable satisfactorily to reach that solution and embody it in the legislation, we thought we would be going at least a step in the right direction if we placed earned and unearned income of all kinds on the same basis. I have tried to make provision for the small corporation, but I know my hon. friends are going to argue as they did before that in connection with the large corporation the income is being taxed twice. In framing an income tax act and in determining rates and exemptions it appears to me that ability to pay should be the first consideration. If we bear that in mind it is hard to justify taxing a person who has a certain amount of unearned income at a lower rate than that imposed upon an earned income of the same amount. Ability to pay of a person in receipt of $10,000 a year in the form of dividends is certainly just as great if not greater than that of a person receiving $10,000 a year as wages or salary. The fact that the corporation from which the dividends come has paid a tax does not in any way lessen the ability to pay of the person who receives the dividends. He has the $10,000 net, exactly as the other man has the $10,000 net. Furthermore I think everyone will admit that he has a capital fund already invested and available against his old age, while the man who earns his money may still have to save a considerable portion of it in order to provide against his old age.

If objection is taken to what has by some been called "double taxation" resulting from the proposed amendments, such objection must be based upon the view that the shareholder and the company, while distinct in law, are virtually one in fact. Accepting such a view for the moment, we must admit that taking the corporation and the shareholder together and regarding them as one, this bill provides a reduction of 1½ per cent in favour of the corporation, which reduction must be taken as accruing to the benefit of the shareholder. It is pointed out in passing, to those who may claim that the effect of the bill is that the government is dipping its hand twice into the same pocket, that the justification for the removal of the exemption is that ability of the shareholder to pay must be regarded in the light of the amount actually coming to him as net income.

It has been pointed out that we are going to hurt Canadian industry; that we are going to force capital to invest in the United States or in some other country. I ask hon. gentlemen: Why should a Canadian investor who can place his money in a Canadian corporation upon which the tax is only 9 per cent, go to the United States and place his money in a corporation there where he will be obliged to pay 13 per cent as a company tax upon his investment? It is said that by taxing dividends of corporations without making allowance for the normal tax we are discouraging investment in Canadian companies. It would be just as well for hon. gentlemen to contend that we would be discouraging investment in Canadian companies if we removed the income tax entirely because then everyone would be placed in exactly the same position—I claim that it is not necessary to be exceedingly patriotic—and we have patriotic Canadians who will invest their money at home—to see that there is a great advantage in investing money in Canada where it pays a tax of only 9 per cent as compared with investing it in the United States where it will have to pay a tax of 13 per cent.

Mr. RYCKMAN: When the 13 per cent is paid, that is the end of it. The government taxes the money twice and the two taxations may mean a great deal more than the 13 per cent.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is not correct, because he knows that is not the end of it. When the man receives his dividend from the United States, if he is honest he will report those dividends to the Canadian government and pay the tax upon them just as if he had paid only 9 per cent in this country. In addition to that, if his revenue is large, the United States have a provision that we do not have, and they will tax the dividends there before they are received in Canada by the Canadian who has invested his money there.

The change in the law has enabled us to reduce the company tax. We have reduced it from 10½ per cent to 9 per cent for the purpose of encouraging capital to come and invest in Canada. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) argued a little while ago that a great industrial corporation in Nova Scotia required money to develop it and to enable that corporation to carry on and give employment to Canadians and that it was difficult for him, to invite English capital to come and invest in that corporation because the revenue derived from it would be taxed 9 per cent. It is much less difficult than it would have been last year because if the law had not been amended the earnings of the company would have been taxed 10½ per cent. We have reduced the tax by 1½ per cent.

Mr. CAHAN: Would it not be far better to tax the income of the corporation 13 per cent as is done in the United States and to allow the dividend to be exempt from a certain part of the tax as previously? For instance, every United States citizen who invests in this country—and the United States people have invested in the capital stock of these companies to the extent of say $300,000,000—escapes Canadian taxation entirely under the system proposed by my hon. friend.

Mr. BOIVIN: Who escapes it?

Mr. CAHAN: The American. The company is here in Canada, enjoying the privileges afforded in this country, earning its profits in Canada, and if you make the corporation pay the tax, then the American shareholder has to pay his share of it. It would therefore be far better for the country to make the tax on the company's income 13 per cent, if you will, to be paid by foreigners who own shares in the capital stock of Canadian companies as well by Canadians who hold such shares.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend should at least agree with his associate from Pictou.

Mr. CAHAN: Not necessarily.

Mr. BOIVIN: Such agreement would be necessary for the sake of peace and harmony on the other side. My hon. friend from Pictou has just argued that we cannot get British capital to invest in Nova Scotia for a specific purpose owing to the fact that the tax is already too high at 9 per cent, and now the hon. member wants to make it 13 per cent.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not discussing the question with the hon. member for Pictou. I am discussing it as a fair proposition for the consideration of the minister, and I suggest that if his technical advisers will look into it they will find that, for the great majority of the Canadian people, to impose a tax of 13 per cent on the income of the company, with exemption in respect of dividends, as we have it at present, would be better than the proposition which is now submitted to us whereby the larger tax is placed upon Canadian dividends. And that applies to dividends running from $3,000 up. I have in my office a letter from a respected Methodist clergyman, now advanced in years, who out of the paltry income received by men of his calling has saved a certain amount. He is now retiring, and as it happens he has certain persons dependent upon him. All that he has saved in a lifetime he has invested, and as he points out his taxation is now increased three times.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am at a loss to know how to answer hon. gentlement opposite in view of the divergence in their opinions. One of the anomalies which the government attempted to correct in introducing the law now proposed was the enormous difference in income paid as between those who worked for salaries, those who derived their revenues from mortgages and bonds, and those whose incomes came from dividends obtained from joint stock companies and corporations. Let me tell the Canadian people—what the majority of them do not know—that under the old law, the man who received an income of $10,000 which he earned as the executive of a great corporation or as an employee of the government, devoting sixteen hours a day to his duties—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It could not be the government.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, there are very many efficient employees in the civil service. They work sixteen and eighteen hours a day and render valuable service to the country. Under the old law such a public servant who earned $10,000 per annum, was obliged to pay $619.50 in income tax, while some other man who had enough capital to be able to purchase stock in the Bank of Montreal, or in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or in any other Canadian company, and who derived an income of $10,000 yearly without doing a stroke of work, paid only $115.50. That was the former law. Was it a fair one?

Mr. CAHAN: That is not a fair statement of the old law.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is an absolutely fair statement.

Mr. CAHAN: No.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is an absolutely true statement and one which no hon. member can deny.

Mr. CAHAN: It is unfair and untrue and it is unworthy of the hon. member who makes it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am glad that my hon. friend can find some satisfaction in characterizing the statement as unworthy, and so getting some applause.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly it is unworthy.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is based upon figures that are absolutely true.

Mr. CAHAN: Not in their implication.

Mr. BOIVIN: The man who derived $10,000 in dividends from a Canadian corporation paid formerly only $115.50 in taxation, whereas the man who earned the same amount in salary paid $619.50.

Mr. CAHAN: I will explain why I say that the statement is unworthy of the minister, who is usually fair. He is not fair in this instance because he unconsciously conceals the fact that the man receiving that dividend which he has mentioned has already paid 9½ per cent on his share of the capital.

Mr. BOIVIN: Will the hon. gentleman tell me right now whether the Bank of Montreal and the Canadian Pacific Railway have not paid just as much in dividends since they have paid income tax as they did before?

Mr. CAHAN: If I were to characterize that statement by the common American expression, I should say that it was clear, sheer bluff, deceiving, though not intentionally—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not take that back.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman said that the minister was deceiving—

Mr. CAHAN: No; I said that the statement was deceptive in tendency although the minister did not intend to deceive.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member made the statement that the minister was trying to deceive the committee.

Mr. CAHAN: No, I did not.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask him to withdraw that statement.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not say that.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: I am rising to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no point of order. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George can take care of himself.

Mr. MANION: I was going to submit respectfully, Mr. Chairman, that you had misunderstood the hon. member. With all deference to the Chair, I heard the member for St. Lawrence-St. George say distinctly that the minister did not intend to deceive.

The CHAIRMAN: He said that afterwards.

Mr. MANION: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. There is no need of these interruptions at all. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is well able to take care of himself, and if there is any difference of opinion between the Chairman and him I shall be quite willing to adjust it.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, if I had said what you understood me to say I would certainly take it back and apologize.

The CHAIRMAN: Then I apologize to the hon. member for misunderstanding him.

Mr. CAHAN: I would be the last one in the world to make any such statement with regard to the hon. Minister of Customs, and he knows it well. I was simply endeavouring to say that although there was no intention on his part to deceive, the statement, I thought, had certain deceptive tendencies by reason of its implications. I think that is true. I say to him again that if the Bank of Montreal or the Canadian Pacific Railway were relieved of the 9½ per cent tax which they pay as companies, certainly their dividends to their shareholders would be correspondingly increased.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am very glad to hear the hon. member make that statement. It may go to hon. members and to the people for what it is worth. He says that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Bank of Montreal, if they were relieved of the 9½ per cent taxation, would immediately pass that taxation on to their shareholders in the form of dividends. My hon. friend knows too well that that would not be the case.

Mr. CAHAN: I believe it to be so.

Mr. BOIVIN: He knows the companies would give some benefit to those who are dealing with them, he knows they would give some benefit to their employees, he knows that everybody would benefit to a certain extent if the companies were not obliged to pay that taxation; but he knows that it would not go direct to the shareholders. I was trying to point out that the dividends paid by these corporations now and formerly are the same. It is quite true that the amount carried to reserve may be a little bit less, and that what they charge to the consuming public may be a little bit more, but everyone will admit that the shareholder does not lose any part of the capital that he invested in the company. It is not impaired in any way. He gets $10,000 upon that capital as revenue, and I say he should pay as much upon that revenue as the man who goes out and earns the same amount of $10,000.

Mr. CAHAN: It is a difference of opinion as to whether it is fair or unfair, but you cannot convince me that the payment by the company of 9½ per cent of its income to the federal treasury does not deprive its shareholders of the corresponding benefit; whether it goes into dividends directly declared or whether a part of it goes into reserve, it is for the benefit of the shareholders; and always, or almost always, unless there is something prejudicial to the standing of the company, the increased reserve shows in the market a corresponding increase in the value of the shares. Certainly the benefit goes directly or indirectly to the shareholders for every dollar of taxation of which the company is relieved.

Mr. BOIVIN: Why did my hon. friend argue immediately after eight o'clock that public utility corporations could not pay income tax to the government without passing it on to their consumers?

Mr. CAHAN: Because they are in an entirely different position.

Mr. BOIVIN: Will my hon. friend show me exactly where to draw the line between the company that passes on its income taxation to its consumers and the company that does not?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, I think I can fairly well define it, and I thought I had defined it early in the evening when I was so grossly misunderstood by one of the members for Toronto. I was not then dealing with public service corporations as such in Toronto or in Ontario—that province may do as it pleases—but with the public service corporation whose entire income is subject to the rulings of a public service commission, the public service commission allows such a company certain rates in order that it may pay its operating expenses and interest upon its bonds and debentures outstanding, plus a certain reasonable dividend to its shareholders. If that corporation is compelled to pay a tax on its income to the federal government in Canada, the public service commission in every case allows an extra charge per lamp or per horsepower, which is paid by the consumer. Therefore the two companies are on an entirely different basis. The income of the ordinary commercial company is due to its earning power and the activity of its management; but the income of the public service corporation which is under the control of a public service commission is due to the decision of that commission to take into consideration the entire outlay of the company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would point out that the hon. minister might have saved us a great deal of discussion if he had told us that he recognized, in part at least, the injustice which we have been complaining of.

Mr. BOIVIN: But I did as soon as I was given an opportunity to speak.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh no, my hon. friend is not quite disingenuous there. I think he is going to work up a Machiavellian reputation if he continues along those lines. He may think it is going to pay him to do so, but it is not always a good reputation.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is a very poor reputation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If he had told us at the commencement that he recognized double taxation to be wrong, and was going to try to get rid of it where he could, I think we might very well look after the consideration of that factor when the bill is before us. But I would point out to my hon. friend that he again is approaching Signor Machiavelli when he says that this amendment is drawn for the purpose of meeting what is said by some to be the necessity of making a difference between earned incomes and incomes from investment, because it is not so. My hon. friend will not find—if I am wrong I will be very much obliged if he will point it out to me—a single resolution doing it. My hon. friend is simply saying: Well, here is a man with his interest on his bond; he is not working for it, but he will be taxed no more than the man who is working for his income; and there is the other man with his mortgage interest, he is not to be taxed any more; but the other man who has a little factory down the street, which he has incorporated and is employing a hundred men, is going to pay more unless it can be shown by my bill that it is a family concern, and then we will allow him to elect to be taxed as a shareholder. There is no real honest attempt made here to get rid of what my hon. friend has said is the real reason for what is being done, namely, that the man who is working from day to day cannot always go on doing so; he has no capital behind him to fall back upon. If that had been the attempt, the government should have adopted the English experiment which was tried out and which is, I believe, still maintained in the lower registers. They do not think it is necessary when you get to the very large incomes, but they do think it the proper thing to do with the smaller incomes, and they do think there is no real reason why English money invested in industry should be penalized as against English money invested in bonds or in anything else. They look after the case; my hon. friend is not looking after it. He does so to a certain extent in connection with these investments but, I think, with rather unfortunate implications.

I hope my hon. friend is going to give just a little more thought to that point which has been impressed upon him more particularly by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley). After all, what we want here is investment in enterprise; I think my hon. friend will agree with that statement at once, and he will agree that enterprise is risky enough at all times. We all know that there is no good argument why in any particular period of Canadian industry enterprise has been most hazardous; it is still too hazardous, and we have lots of failures. It is easy to talk about the large, successful companies, with their big earnings, but that is not what we are interested in. My hon. friend is not doing much harm to these large public service corporations. The real danger is that the commencement of Canadian enterprise is going to have a further check placed upon it. I do not know whether my hon. friend has ever tried it, but it is very difficult to-day to get capital for any new enterprise. In this connection, I would like to point out that while my hon. friend has very cleverly held the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George to the text of his argument upon one particular point, my hon. friend has departed from his own text. In the first instance my hon. friend's idea was that it did not matter a bit to the shareholders what the company tax was. His income was the same; everything was the same and there was not the slightest difference.

Mr. BOIVIN: In connection with the large corporations I still maintain that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But what did my hon. friend say a short time ago? He made an eloquent argument to the effect that he had immeasurably helped the shareholders, new investors and so on, because the company tax—which, of course, did not hurt the shareholders at all—was nine per cent in Canada as against thirteen per cent in the United States. The truth is that the shareholder is interested in the tax; my hon. friend's second position was right but his first was wrong. The shareholders are interested, and I think it is a good thing to have the tax lower than the American tax, because we want capital here.

Then I want my hon. friend to give us some information, so that we may have it before us when the bill comes up. We have collected from these corporations $31,000,000; the whole of those dividends will not be subject to the double tax, but only that part which is distributed. I would like my hon. friend to tell me first what the dividends of Canadian companies are. I made a rough estimate myself; it could not perhaps be called an estimate but it is more or less of a guess, because I did not have the material before me. But I think it would be fair to say that the total would be about $250,000,000 a year.

Mr. BOIVIN: I should say it would be about $295,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am glad to know that my estimate was within the mark. Then I would like to know how much of these dividends was paid to Canadian citizens, because as I understand it the double tax only applies in the case of Canadian citizens. There is no attempt made to tax dividends paid to foreigners, so while we are considering this double tax it is necessary for us to know just what the calculation is as to how much is paid the Canadian shareholder. My calculation there was again a very rough and ready one; it was more a hope than anything else that notwithstanding what has been going on in this country for the last two years, Canadians still owned enough of their own to have perhaps half of their own dividends. Therefore I put that figure at $125,000,000. Perhaps my hon. friend would be kind enough to check that figure also.

Mr. BOIVIN: I will have that looked into; it is impossible to give the exact amount, of course, without going through the income tax returns of all Canadian citizens. But I want to point out to my hon. friend that his statement was correct in every respect but one. He said that the dividends paid to foreigners were not taxed and paid no income tax in this country; that is quite right. On the other hand he said that we are penalizing our own people in collecting taxes from the Canadian shareholder and not from the outsider. If he will add a proviso that all Canadians who recevie dividends from Canadian companies and whose total revenue is less than $3,000 a year—and their number is legion—pay no tax, I will admit that he is right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend think that the bulk of the dividends go to the lower registers?

Mr. BOIVIN: I would not say that, but I think a large proportion does.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I wonder if the minister would not leave this item over for further consideration. I submit that in his argument with regard to the dividends from companies such as the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Bank of Montreal there is a very distinct weakness. If all companies were as strong as the two he has mentioned our position would be a great deal better, but many of us have had the experience of losing money invested in different companies, and the risk of investment has to be taken into consideration. We must take the good with the bad, and the minister must not argue only from companies which have been successful. I am afraid that this resolution in its present form will drive Canadian capital into bonds and mortgages, and it will be difficult or impossible to keep up the supply of money to support new industries in this country.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is right, and the only serious objection to the present measure is that it may change the means of financing in Canada, and may cause companies to endeavour to obtain more money from bonds and less through the sale of preferred stock. I do not think that is a good thing, and if it could be avoided I would certainly do so. I do not want to resist the request that this particular clause be allowed to stand, but I would undertake that the bill will not be presented to parliament for its second reading until at least Tuesday of next week. We will give that time for consideration of the matter, and I hope hon. members on the other side of the House will let us pass the resolutions and get the bill printed and brought before parliament.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We should have a copy of the bill.

Mr. BOIVIN: We will endeavour to have it distributed to-morrow.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am content with that if the minister will really try to find a way out of this difficulty.

Mr. BOIVIN: I have already expressed a desire to meet my hon. friend from Argenteuil, but whether I have that privilege and pleasure or not, I shall take the matter up with the Minister of Finance, with whom he has already communicated, and with the officials of the department, and see if some way cannot be found to meet what I consider to be the one objection to the resolution as it stands.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7.

Mr. CAHAN: I conceive that this applies simply to a company which has investments in securities, but it might be an investment in a great number of things, and I think that the term "investments" should be defined in the bill so as to restrict it to securities.

Mr. BOIVIN: The word "investment" will be defined in the bill.

Mr. CAHAN: That is quite satisfactory.

Section agreed to.

On section 8.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think this should be explained pretty fully.

Mr. BOIVIN: The idea of this clause is this: It relates especially to real estate. There are a large number of persons throughout Canada who are in the habit of investing their surplus profits in real estate, which they buy in a certain section of a city for the purpose of reaping a handsome profit by selling it later on. My hon. friend knows that with the exception of the real estate agent, and for him, of course, it is his principal business, the profit made on the sale of real estate is not taxable under the act. We feel that if the profit to be made on real estate is not to be taxed, then the carrying charges on that real estate should not be deducted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Could not that be made a little clearer? I would not object to that provision in the slightest. As a matter of fact I thought that was the law now. I know I was foolish enough some fifteen years ago to buy a piece of property that I have been trying to sell and on which I have been paying taxes ever since, and I never made any claim for deduction.

Mr. BOIVIN: Under the existing practice the person who has purchased real estate which does not produce any revenue at all, for example, a vacant lot, or stocks even upon which no dividends are paid, has been permitted to deduct the carrying charges from his income derived from other sources. When the vacant lot or unproductive stock was sold at a profit, he was not taxed upon the profit he made, unless, of course, he was a real estate agent dealing in property.

Mr. CAHAN: What does the term "carrying charges" include?

Mr. BOIVIN: It includes the interest upon a mortgage to carry the property, taxes, and in the case of buildings, the insurance.

Mr. CAHAN: Might I suggest just a word there? If it includes interest, it seems to me unfair. Supposing I have a $5,000 Dominion government bond upon which I am receiving interest. It is not a tax free bond. Supposing I bought a piece of land on which I owed a $5,000 mortgage. I do not think you should compel me to dispose of the $5,000 Dominion government bond to pay off that mortgage, but I think the interest on the mortgage is a fair offset as against the interest on the bond which I receive.

Mr. MANION: Might I ask the minister this? I know that in the past taxes would be allowed on vacant property. Supposing at the present time, under this new act, a man has some rent coming in upon which he would have to pay income tax with the rest of his income, and suppose that in addition he has some vacant property in the same city. Would not the taxes on that vacant real estate be permitted as a deduction from the occupied real estate?

Mr. BOIVIN: If that real estate was purchased for the purpose of renting and was accidentally unrented, it would; but if the real estate is vacant real estate which was purchased and is being held for speculation only—

Mr. MANION: I am afraid the minister has not understood my question. Supposing a man owns a building from which he is getting rentals of $5,000 a year. That income goes in with the rest of his income and is taxed. Supposing that, in addition, in the same city he has a number of pieces of vacant property on which he is paying taxes of say $1,000 a year. In the past that $1,000, taxes on the vacant property, as well as the taxes on the rented property, would be offset as against the rent coming in from his property. Under this new provision would the taxes on vacant property be offset in the same way as in the past? If not, I think that would be absolutely unfair, and I will tell you why. All through the western country, right from the lakes to the coast, more than in the east, there are many people who before an income tax ever existed in this country went into real estate, and in many cases plunged over their heads. Many of them to-day have, we will say, five or six blocks of property; they are property poor. Some have let their land go, but we will say that a man has tried to hang on, and is hanging on to five pieces of property, one bringing him in an income, clear of taxes, we will say, of $1,000 a year. His taxes on the other vacant pieces of property are $1,000 a year. He has been carrying all these properties. Certainly he is not coming out even anyhow, because he is losing the interest on his investment, and the value of the property must have dropped if he bought it at the peak of the boom. It would appear to me that the taxes on the vacant property should be offset against the income from the property which is giving him some return.

Mr. BOYS: Have the carrying charges or expenses of unproductive property been allowed in the past as deductions? If so, I was going to ask if it is now too late for me to make a claim in that connection, because I am out considerable change if that is so. I can quite understand that perhaps it should not be so. So far as taxes are concerned, I would suggest to the minister that they should be deducted. If a person has land and is paying taxes upon it, it seems reasonable that he should be allowed to deduct same; otherwise you have another case of double taxation. I would like an answer to my first question, however, because I certainly have not been making these deductions, and if they are allowed I am out a very considerable sum of money in the last four or five years.

An hon. MEMBER: Me too.

Mr. BOYS: There are others, I have no doubt, and I wish them well.

Mr. BOIVIN: The practice up to the present time, so I am informed, has been to allow the carrying charges except in the case where they were charged against the revenue derived from the chief business, trade, profession or occupation of the taxpayer; in other words, the carrying charges on vacant property would not be deducted from the chief revenue of the taxpayer, that is, from the revenue derived from his chief line of business. But if he had what is called secondary revenue, those carrying charges would be deducted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That seems fair.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is felt that in the case of an investment in vacant lots for investment purposes, if no tax is to be paid upon the profit made when the property is sold no deduction should be made for carrying charges.

Mr. MANION: Or the loss.

Mr. BOIVIN: It cuts both ways.

Mr. BURY: Does the minister draw a distinction between a vacant lot and a block of buildings? Both may be bought for investment purposes and with the idea that in process of time the lots and the block will go up in value. How can the minister draw a distinction?

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. BOIVIN: As a rule the rentals derived from the buildings in the block form part of the revenue of the owner. He pays income tax upon the rentals so derived and therefore is entitled to deduct the taxation which he pays.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would not be an unproductive asset.

Mr. BOIVIN: No.

Mr. BOYS: Do the interest charges include interest upon the investment, or only where there is an outstanding mortgage?

Mr. BOIVIN: Only where there is an outstanding obligation.

Mr. BOYS: I would ask the minister to consider the question of the taxes the owner has to pay. Why make him pay this tax and also an income tax upon his rental?

Mr. BOIVIN: The reason is that in a great many cases the tax is not paid by the owner but by the tenant. If we carry out my hon. friend's suggestion we would be obliged to deduct from the tenant's income the amount that he pays as rental for the house in which he lives, and that would cause, perhaps, a great many difficulties in the way of administration. If you are going to exempt the householder and deduct the amount he is taxed for the property which he occupies, you certainly must deduct the amount paid by the tenant of a neighbouring property from which the property owner pays his taxes. It really would be a difficult matter to control.

Mr. BOYS: I really cannot see that the matter is involved at all. Surely no man is going to say he is paying taxes when he is not actually doing so. If I make a return and say that I paid $55 in taxes, I actually pay that money myself, it is not somebody else who pays.

Mr. BOIVIN: Does my hon. friend refer to unproductive property or to the property where the individual taxpayer would reside?

Mr. BOYS: I was referring to what the minister suggested; he himself raised the point.

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friend is referring only to the tax paid on unproductive property—

Mr. BOYS: That is what I am referring to.

Mr. BOIVIN: I claim these taxes should not be allowed. The longer the property is held, the more it increases in value.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. BOIVIN: I will not say always.

Mr. BOYS: I am glad that is your experience; it is not mine.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is very much the reverse with me.

Mr. BURY: If that is the principle upon which the minister bases his position the same is true whether the property is a vacant lot or block.

Mr. MANION: There are thousands of cases through the western country—I doubt whether any professional or business men who were there fifteen years ago and are still there to-day are not more or less in the position that I am pointing out—where those who had a little money invested it in real estate and lost almost all their capital investment. In many cases they still hold on to two pieces of property, perhaps drawing rent from one and paying taxes upon the other, but it is really all one investmenat in real estate. Surely the minister will consider such a case as that—and there are many—and allow the taxes paid on the vacant property to offset the rent the owner is drawing from the other property.

Mr. BOIVIN: Apart from the general reduction made under the law the idea of the government in carrying out the wishes expressed by the officials of the department was to tighten up the act and prevent abuse as much as possible. We felt that everyone who has a revenue upon which he should pay taxation should be obliged to pay. I think we all agree upon that point.

Mr. MANION: But if he is getting $1,000 from one piece of property and paying a tax of a like amount on the other piece he has no revenue.

Mr. BOIVIN: I was not referring to the special case mentioned by my hon. friend, but the general purpose of the resolutions we are now considering is to tighten up the legislation and oblige everybody to pay taxes who should pay them. It is true there are certain cases like the one pointed out by my hon. friend from Fort William where hardship may be caused. That matter is well worth considering and it will be considered before the bill is read a second time.

Mr. MANION: That is all I ask.

Mr. BOIVIN: We are endeavouring to prevent people from evading the payment of taxes. I do not refer to old time investments but to investments made to-day in growing communities, in sections where, for example, one knows there will be industrial development. We want to cover the case of those who may invest their money there for two or three years and claim deduction for the carrying charges.

Mr. HANSON: Would the minister point out some of these communities? I should like to know where they are.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, in the lake St. John district, in the province of Quebec, I understand there is a community to be opened where the population will be at least 30,000, and where over 6,000 people will be employed in electrical development.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Apparently so far as the main income of a taxpayer is concerned, no deductions of any kind can be made.

Mr. BOIVIN: Except the deduction of the necessary expenditure incurred in that particular business.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In connection with the main activity, or the main income of the taxpayer, there will be no deductions whatever. But he may have a floating speculative income outside of his main business. In that case why should not his obligations in respect of that come out of the income which is not his regular income?

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friend is willing, the bill to be introduced can be so amended that when the property is sold the entire profit shall be taxable. If a man has a revenue, apart from his main occupation, sufficiently large to enable him to speculate in real estate, surely he ought to pay taxation on that real estate without asking for a reduction.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like to bring this point to the attention of the minister: Supposing I myself have a piece of 11 p.m. unproductive property. There was a time when it was productive but values have declined. It is unproductive now and I am holding on to it. It is not an investment for the sake of escaping taxation. I have a mortgage on it, and I have been paying 6 per cent interest for years to the holder of the mortgage. On the other hand, outside of my business or profession altogether, I hold a mortgage of $6,000 upon another piece of unproductive property. I understand that prior to the present time if both those transactions were outside my ordinary profession or business I could set off the interest which I paid on the mortgage I owed against the interest which I received on the mortgage I held. I think that should be continued. Let me put it in another way. I own $10,000 worth of Dominion government bonds and I have a mortgage outstanding of $10,000 on a piece of property I own which is not bringing in any income. I can sell the bonds and wipe out the mortgage and then income and expenditure are wiped out at the same time. But if I hold the bonds which are outside of my business I should be entitled to offset the income which I receive on the $10,000 six per cent bonds against the interest I am paying on the mortgage outstanding on my property. That has been the custom of the department and I do not think it should be changed.

Mr. BOIVIN: I admit it seems quite reasonable to allow any man to offset interest which he pays on a mortgage against interest which he receives on a mortgage.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Surely the same thing should apply to taxes paid on vacant land.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am inclined to also agree with my hon. friend from Rimouski, but I say this: when land is purchased for the purpose of speculation the tax must be paid and should only be deducted if that land is held by a real estate speculator or by some person who is liable to pay income taxation on the profit realized from the sale of that land.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am talking about the individual who owns a piece of land upon which he has been paying municipal taxation for a number of years and who is holding the land, I will not say for his benefit or profit, but because he cannot help it.

Mr. BOIVIN: I realize that many cases might be brought up in connection with this particular clause which could be termed as cases of hardship. I am informed that the clause had to be inserted in the resolution in order to prevent the many abuses which had grown up under the law whereby people were taking their capital and investing it in real estate, claiming exemption for taxes paid on that real estate, and then selling the real estate and pocketing the profits.

Mr. BOYS: They take their chance. Sometimes they win and sometimes they lose.

Mr. HANSON: This goes a great deal further than that. This is any non-productive property such as non-dividend paying stock. Sometimes a man has some loose change and he buys a few shares of stock on margin. It may be a non-dividend paying stock. Heretofore he has been allowed to charge up interest he has to pay the bank or the broker for carrying that stock. After this he will not be able to do so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not from regular income.

Mr. BOIVIN: He has not been allowed in the past to deduct that interest from his regular income.

Mr. HANSON: No, but he has been able to do it out of other extraneous income.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: This will wipe that out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What about the last question? Could this not be confined to the real evil the minister is aiming at, namely, new investments in real estate for the purpose of withdrawing money from taxation? I am quite content to say "carried" if it is so confined and I think everybody will be content.

Mr. BOIVIN: I can assure my hon. friend that the matter will be taken up, and if it is possible to draft a clause which will do away with the difficulty and the abuse without imposing any hardship, it will certainly be done.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And confined to the real estate trouble.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 9.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We should have a little explanation about this.

Mr. BOIVIN: In the case of a corporation whose stock is substantially held by one man or by a family or by a small group of persons, it is a common practice, although I think it is contrary to the Companies Act, for the shareholders to take out what money they require for their personal wants—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend limits it to private companies that is all right, but this is not so limited.

Mr. BOIVIN: That is the intention and it will be so limited in the bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 10.

Mr. CAHAN: I think there is something wrong about this section. Let us take the case of stock which is purchased at a premium on the market. It is the stock of a Canadian company; it has undistributed assets over and above the capital, and I buy it in the public market at, say 150. Section 10 provides:

That where a corporation having undistributed income on hand reduces its capital stock, then to the extent that such corporation has on hand undistributed income the amount received by the shareholder by virtue of the reduction of the capital shall be deemed to be a dividend and to be income received by the shareholder.

Therefore, if I buy stock at a premium and subsequently there is a reduction in the capital stock so that the premium which I have paid for in full comes back to me, I have to pay income tax upon it as if it were annual income received. If I may be allowed to refer to section 11—because they might well be discussed together—it reads:

That where a corporation having undistributed income on hand redeems its shares at a premium the premium shall be deemed to be a dividend and to be income received by the shareholder.

I have bought the shares in the market at 150. I have not gone beyond 150 because the shares are redeemable by the company at 150. After I have paid the full price of 150 in the market for the stock the company redeems the shares at 150 and the $50 which I receive is taxed as being ordinary income.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Your own money back?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes. I think that should be considered or it will absolutely prevent the buying of stock selling at a premium which is redeemable by the company.

Mr. HANSON: The objection taken by the hon. member is absolutely sound, but his illustration is perhaps a little extreme. It might be illustrated by taking the case of seven per cent redeemable preferred shares in an industrial company. Those shares are practically bonds, the only difference being that they do not have a mortgage as security. They are really a second charge on the assets of the company. The practice now is almost invariably to permit a company to redeem those shares on the promise of a premium of seven or eight per cent, whatever the interest rate may be. They are a form of second mortgage bonds and it is always the intention of an industrial company that issues that class of security to redeem those shares out of undivided profits. It is another form of borrowing. They have to make this provision in the by-laws creating those shares in order to make them marketable, saleable, to get a decent capital sum to invest in the company when they issue the shares. In addition they have to pay the carrying charges while the shares are outstanding. I buy a seven per cent redeemable preferred share at a premium. The company redeems the stock at a premium after a period of years, and yet I have to pay not only on the income I have received in the interim but, as well, on the premium I received from the company when it redeemed the stock. That is not fair.

Mr. BOIVIN: It was not intended that this clause should apply to stock which was made redeemable and preferred at the time of its issue.

Mr. HANSON: Then I suggest that the point should be made clear.

Mr. BOIVIN: We want to obviate the practice, followed by certain corporations, of escaping the payment of taxation by allowing their profits to remain as reserve for a year or two and then distributing those profits in other ways than in the form of dividends to shareholders, as for instance, by the purchase of stock at a premium, or by redeeming capital stock for more than its value at the time it was sold.

Mr. HANSON: I can understand that there might be a very grave abuse in connection with private companies, and if that is what the minister has in mind I suggest that the language of the resolution is not sufficiently clear to cover the case I tried to outline to him. I would ask him to give consideration to that phase of the question, because if he does not, and if this resolution is crystallized into legislation, he will be doing a real injustice.

Mr. BOIVIN: The commissioner of taxation has made a note of my hon. friend's remarks and he will endeavour to make the clause sufficiently clear to cover the point raised.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps it would save time if the minister would tell us just what evil is aimed at. Sometimes, in the effort to avoid a slight difficulty here and some little trouble there, we pass legislation which in the long run turns out to be more mischievous than the evil we sought to get rid of. I can quite understand that there might be a perfectly fair and proper return of capital which ought not to be taxed, even though there might be a surplus on hand. Take the case of a company which has a dual activity. Let us say that such a company has half a million invested in one enterprise and half a million in another. It is all the same stock in the same company. There is also a reserve of $200,000. Owing to trade developments the company decides to retire from one of these activities, and is fortunate enough to realize on its assets which it had devoted to that branch of the business. It gets that half million. Under this proposed legislation the whole of that sum will be taxed as profits.

Mr. BOIVIN: Only the surplus.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not so stated. It may be that the surplus is left in; they want the whole of that $200,000 of reserve to stand behind the remaining business which they are carrying on. But the $500,000 which they have withdrawn is taxable under this legislation.

Mr. BOIVIN: Why should they not leave the capital in and withdraw the surplus rather than leave the surplus in and withdraw the capital?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the minister quite followed me. I cited the case of a company engaged in two activities, one of which was not remunerative. They wanted to withdraw from it and were fortunate enough to realize their assets without loss, although they thought it advisable to hang on to the whole of the reserve. Under this legislation the entire $500,000 of capital which they have withdrawn is taxable as profit. Let us take another case. Suppose you have a company with a capital of $500,000 and a reserve of $100,000, the company thinks it can get along with a capitalization of $400,000 and accordingly it contracts its activities. That $100,000 which it returns is all taxable as profits. The next year the same thing happens, and again, and again. At the end of that time they have $100,000 of a reserve with only $100,000 of stock, while $400,000 has been taxable as profits. Surely that cannot be the intention of the resolution; yet that is what it contemplates as at present drafted.

Mr. BOIVIN: That was not the intention.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The resolution has that effect and it is clearly ridiculous.

Mr. BOYS: Surely where the distribution reduces the assets it should not be taxed.

Mr. BOIVIN: No.

Mr. BOYS: But that is what happens in the case suggested by my hon. friend.

Mr. BOIVIN: In the case suggested by the hon. member (Sir Henry Drayton) the capital is withdrawn, but the surplus remains and is not taxable. Is that fair?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is taxable as soon as it is withdrawn.

Mr. BOIVIN: But it will always remain as capital and will not be withdrawn. If it were not for the Income War Tax Act the surplus would have been taken out and distributed and the capital would have been retained; to evade the act the company draws out the capital and leaves the surplus in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not of necessity.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is desirable to guard against such a practice.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand that my hon. friend has a real grievance which he wants to put an end to, and we could better grapple with it if we knew just what it was. I suggest, therefore, that it will be far better to have the section clearly worded rather than to pass an omnibus provision of this kind which will not work out fairly under such circumstances as I suggest. If the provision were to apply only to profits I would not offer so much objection to the clause.

Mr. BOIVIN: We shall have to reconsider it before the bill is adopted.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall sections 10 and 11 carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, subject to that understanding.

Sections 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Has this also to do with private corporations?

Mr. BOIVIN: In its present form it would apply to every corporation.

Mr. HANSON: Will the minister give us some explanation as to why this legislation is demanded? I am interested in it.

Mr. BOIVIN: There is a very easy method by which shareholders of closely held corporations can avoid payment of the old supertaxes and of the proposed income tax. Suppose that one company has a capital of $100,000 and undistributed profits amounting to $75,000 and the sole shareholder desires to get that $75,000 into his pocket free of supertax or any other taxation. He promotes another company, which we will call company B, and he sells his stock in the original company, which we will call company A, to company B for $175,000 for $75,000 cash and the stock of company B. As soon as the stock of company A stands in the name of company B, the first company declares a dividend of $75,000, and the second company gets it and hands it over to the shareholder in liquidation of its liability to him. He then puts that $75,000 in his pocket and all the stock of company B, through which he still controls company A just as he did before. There are many other ways in which this device can be used. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to tax dividends in the hands of a shareholder, even although they are received by his dummy company and come to him as capital in a technical sense. Paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of this proposed amendment deal with three different cases in which the device referred to may be used. Paragraph (a) deals with a straight case of an agreement between the shareholder and the dummy company, where the dummy company on receipt of the dividend hands it over directly to the shareholder in settlement of its liability. Paragraph (b) deals with the case where the dummy company, in order to be in a position to say that it does not apply the dividend directly in payment of the purchase price of the shares, has altered the form of its original liability for the purchase price to some new form of liability. Paragraph (c) deals with the case where the dummy company, in order to be able to say that it has not applied the dividend in payment of the shares, has at the time of the purchase of the shares borrowed money from the bank or from some other source and uses the dividend when received to extinguish that liability.

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I do not understand at the moment what the hon. minister said any better than he himself does. I would suggest that having his statement on Hansard would enable us to study it, and in the meantime the clause might very well stand. It is a bit involved, as the minister will no doubt admit.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, it is involved.

Mr. HANSON: Is this practice which the minister seeks to discourage of recent growth? I understand that such companies have existed since 1917 with the full knowledge—I was almost going to say the approval—of the department. I think I am correct in saying that this condition has been well known to the commissioner and his staff for many years, almost since the inception of the act itself, but they have never raised any objection until now. What is the particular abuse at this moment that necessitates this legislation?

Mr. BOIVIN: I think my hon. friend will admit it is an evil which it is worth while attempting to cure.

Mr. HANSON: You have one income tax on the profits of the company now.

Mr. BOIVIN: If we were sure of getting the proper income tax it would not be so bad, but while it is true that a few of these personal corporations were established several years ago, I can assure my hon. friend there is no greater pastime for many able lawyers in Canada than to devise ways and means for their clients to evade payment of income tax.

Mr. HANSON: Will not that always be so?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, and for that reason as cracks are found in the walls of the structure, they must be continually repaired. That is why not only this year but in years to come, no matter what government may be in power, there will have to be amendments to the Income Tax Act to close the fissures that are being opened every year by the lawyers who devise new methods by which their clients may evade taxation.

Mr. JACOBS: Why does the hon. minister refer to their work as a "pastime"? Does he suggest that it is a recreation on the part of the lawyers?

Mr. BOIVIN: It is a recreation for which the lawyer, however, never refuses to charge a fee.

Mr. HANSON: The minister has stated that income of this character has been excaping taxation altogether. From what limited knowledge I have of this business, I submit to him that that is not quite correct, and that invariably one tax has been paid. The objection of course has been to pyramiding that taxation. Am I not right that invariably one tax of 10 per cent has been paid on income?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is right.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is right to this extent, the company tax of 10 per cent, plus 5 per cent super tax or ten and one half per cent in all, has been collected from the company upon the profits declared by the company.

Mr. HANSON: Earned by the company.

Mr. BOIVIN: I mean declared by the company in its income tax return. That is the only tax which so far has been paid. In this particular instance we are dealing with shareholders whose revenue is very great. In the past they have been entitled to exemption only from payment of the normal tax, but they have been escaping payment of the surtax, that they should have paid to the Dominion government.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed in this connection to ask a question about section 4, which I overlooked at the time it was under discussion? It will save my bringing it up when the bill is before the House. Has the minister considered the fact that men with very large incomes are going to pay a great deal less under this legislation than they did before, even if the money is all in Canadian stocks? I have some figures from the department which perhaps I might read to him. In the case of a married man without children, if his income is $50,000, all from Canadian stocks, under the old system he paid $5,785.50; under the new he pays $8,380. True, he pays quite a little more. But if his income is $250,000—I am free to admit there are not many Canadians in receipt of such a large income—he ought to be able to pay a very substantial tax. His income is all from Canadian stocks. Under the old system he paid $112,885.50; under this resolution, which the government has brought in for the purpose of helping poor people, he pays only $86,340. In other words the very rich man with an income of $250,000 pays $26,500 less than he paid under the old law. I would ask if the minister is aware of that fact and if he considers it a reasonable arrangement.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, we are aware that in every case the taxation has been reduced.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have just cited a case where the man with $50,000 income pays more.

Mr. BOIVIN: I mean in every case where the revenue exceeds $50,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think it is nearly $80,000.

Mr. BOIVIN: For the purposes of agreement and argument we will say $80,000. In all cases where the revenue exceeds $80,000 there is a reduction. It was necessary to establish a sliding scale in order to reach a fair basis of payment for the small income, the moderate income, the larger income and the very large income, and we thought the limit of that scale should be 50 per cent. Under the old law, as my hon. friend knows, some people were called upon to pay as much as 66 per cent and more of their revenue to the government. We felt that any man who invests his money in Canada and pays at least half of what he makes to the Dominion government is contributing fairly generously his share of taxation, and we thought it should no longer be necessary to take away from any man more than half of his income. At present we do not happen to have in Canada anyone with an income of $1,000,000, and the income would have to reach that amount before the taxation would be the full 50 per cent.

Section agreed to.

On section 13.

Mr. BOIVIN: This amendment ensures that the shareholders of corporations will pay income tax upon the profits of the corporation as and when they get control of such profits. Under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act shareholders of a corporation, in contrast with members of a partnership, are not taxed upon the profits of the business at the time the profits are earned. Taxation is deferred until the profits become the property of the shareholders or until something is done that renders the profits not available for distribution to the shareholders. The policy under our Canadian act is to defer taxation of corporation profits so long as they remain available for dsitribution, which is to say so long as there is prospect of a tax being imposed upon the shareholder at some future time. As soon as the profits are capitalized they cease to be available for distribution, and it seems only right and proper that the profits should be taxed when placed beyond the possibility of distribution.

Mr. HANSON: But in that case you have already collected 10½ per cent from the corporation, and you are simply imposing a second tax on the same profits.

Mr. BOIVIN: We are simply endeavouring there to obtain the surtax and supertax which the shareholder would have paid had he received the dividend in another form. We do not desire to tax the dividend again; we are quite willing to give the exemption from the normal tax to which the shareholder is entitled, but we do claim that when the profits are taken out in enormous slices the shareholders should be called upon to pay at least the surtax and supertax which they would have paid had they withdrawn their dividends in the ordinary way.

Mr. HANSON: That is all very well, but you take your supertax in the form of an increased normal tax at the beginning. That is why the tax is increased to 10 per cent instead of 4 per cent, and that is why you had no supertax on the profits of a corporation. Now you want to take the supertax in the 10 per cent and another supertax on the distribution of the profits as well. That is simply double taxation.

Mr. BOIVIN: This question of double taxation, as my hon. friend knows, was thoroughly discussed in connection with clause 4 and we came very close to an agreement then. There are certain classes of corporations which we hope to be able to deal with in a manner satisfactory to everyone. In small corporations this clause would never apply, because the corporation has always the right of exercising its option to be treated as a partnership and not as a corporation.

Mr. GEARY: This is retroactive?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, retroactive as to profits earned.

Mr. GEARY: Is that usual?

Mr. BOIVIN: That is one of the reasons why I referred in my remarks a moment ago to the surtax and supertax; this is a retroactive clause.

Section agreed to.

On section 14.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In connection with this resolution there was one thing which a great many hon. gentlemen opposite were in favour of when I was Minister of Finance, that is, the question of members of parliament having their election expenses deducted from their returns. I wonder what the present ideas of hon. gentlemen opposite are. I know they were almost unanimously in favour of it at that time, and I think my friend the minister favoured it also. What does he think now?

Mr. BOIVIN: We thought it would be better to follow the line of conduct laid down by our predecessors.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If you would only stick to that more often you would do better.

Mr. BOIVIN: I think our predecessors made a mistake, however, when they did not allow members of parliament to deduct from their indemnity a reasonable amount to pay for living expenses while in Ottawa. I would say that the same rule would apply to electoral expenses—

Mr. POWER: That is a capital investment.

Mr. BOIVIN: —although I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) that that is a capital investment. If each member paid the same amount to be elected, or if each member only paid the amount absolutely necessary for him to be elected, or if we could average that amount, it might be possible and advisable to make some allowance when it comes to the payment of income tax. I will repeat that I think it would be absolutely fair to allow members of parliament to deduct from their indemnity a just and reasonable amount for board and living expenses while they are in the capital attending to their parliamentary duties. It is an expense which they are absolutely obliged to make, but my good friends opposite were generous enough to make a gift of this to the Canadian people. They wanted to be magnanimous, and we want to follow their example and be just as generous as they are.

Section agreed to.

On section 15.

Mr. BOIVIN: This is a clause concerning which there has been some discussion; some claim it is not necessary at all while others say it clarifies the act. It merely adds that the provisions of paragraph (d) concerning taxes and supertaxes will not apply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I just want to ask the minister one further question. What has been done in connection with that debatable question where you have a man employed at a stated salary whose tax is paid by his employer? There has been more or less soreness over that. I understand the department in the past have come to the conclusion that that money belonged to the employee and should be added to his gross income for the purposes of taxation. On the other hand it is urged very strongly that where any employer voluntarily pays to the Receiver General the whole or any part of the income tax on the salary or wages of the employee, that amount shall not be treated as part of the income of the employee for the purpose of income tax.

Mr. BOIVIN: My impression is that it would be absolutely unfair to consider that the tax paid for an employee should not form part of his income. Two corporations side by side, paying absolutely the same salary to their employees, make out their returns to the Dominion government showing, for instance, that they each have a superintendent drawing $4,000 or $5,000 a year. One company would pay the tax while the other would not, so one man would have his $4,000 net while the other would be obliged to pay his $20 to the government. That would be unfair and unjust, because in reality one man would have $4,000 a year while the net salary of the other would only be $3,980.

Mr. GEARY: Will the language be sufficiently clear to show that this will be made retroactive?

Mr. BOIVIN: It is the intention to make clause 13 retroactive the same as it is the intention of the government, if the law can be so worded, and I think it can, to make the provision retroactive by which it is attempted to tax dividends that have escaped taxation in the hands of personal corporations. I am not referring to industrial corporations; I mean the corporation sole that was formed for the express purpose of evading taxation.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): How far would you go back?

Mr. BOIVIN: I would go back to the inception of the Income War Tax Act. I would tax all those dividends. There is no desire on the part of the government to take these accumulative profits and consider them to be profits of this year. That would be absolutely unfair and unjust. The tax upon them would be almost 50 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would be more—

Mr. BOIVIN: Applying the present law the tax upon them would be almost 50 per cent, whereas if they had been distributed normally year by year the tax might have been very much less. There is no intention of being too severe, but it would be possible to allow those who have accumulated these profits during the last five years—the first companies were formed five years ago—a term of five years within which to distribute those profits. They could be distributed as they like in that period of five years, but if they were not distributed at the end of five years, then they could be taxed as the profits of that year.

Mr. GEARY: My point was simply as to the language being express enough.

Mr. BOIVIN: It will be made express enough in the bill.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I rise merely to ask a question. I know the Income Tax branch has two, if not more, very shrewd and competent solicitors, but in view of the question that has been raised previously, has the minister the opinion of the Justice department that these retroactive provisions are not ultra vires? Just in that connection let me point out this the point was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard—if you could tax income past and gone for the year 1925, you could pass a law to tax it for the year 1825. I am merely asking whether an opinion has been obtained.

Mr. BOIVIN: The opinion of the solicitors in our own department and the opinion of the Department of Justice was obtained in the matter. I am not sure whether the final opinion from the Department of Justice, has been received, but at least one memorandum from that department has reached us. I want to say to my hon. friend that he is not quite fair. I know that he does not want to be unfair to the government or to the legislation, but I think he is unfair when he says that we are indiscriminately reaching back and taxing income, and that because we do it for the past five years we might as well do it for the last hundred years. That is not the intention of the government. The proper thing for the government to do is to reach back and tax that income which would have paid taxes to the Dominion government but did not do so. The object of the amendment is to try to reach that income, to bring the tax into the public treasury, and ward against such evasions of payment in the future. When I say evasions of payment, I want to be fair to those persons who formed these corporations sole. I do not want to say they are tax dodgers; I do not want to apply any damaging epithet to them.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): You referred to them as fake companies the other day.

Mr. BOIVIN: Oh no, I did not. The other day I referred to fake companies in connection with the customs tariff—to those companies which were importing automobiles and getting excessive discounts for importing them. I never referred to these corporations as fake companies. They were formed legally under the Companies Act, and it was up to the government so to frame its legislation as to be able to collect the tax. They were within the law, and when a man is within the law he cannot be blamed. On the other hand, a man can remain within the law and evade the tax that a former government intended to impose upon him. We want to reach back and collect those taxes; that is all.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I cannot let go unchallenged the minister's statement that I was not fair. I was asking purely an academic question as to the legality of this legislation—nothing else. It did not enter my mind to criticize the action of the government if they were warranted in law in taking the action which they propose to take. I certainly had no idea other than merely to obtain an answer to the question whether an opinion had been obtained, because frankly I do not think this is within the competency of this parliament to enact.

Mr. BOIVIN: We are so advised. If I misunderstood my hon. friend or one of his references, and said anything which I should not have said, I hasten to apologize.

Mr. HANSON: With reference to the observations made by the minister as to the purposes for which these holding companies were formed, I think it is only fair to him to say that in the smaller provinces these companies were not formed with the express purpose of evading the supertax, but having regard to the lack of reciprocity between the provinces with respect to succession duties, most if not all of them were primarily formed for the purpose of evading the payment of double succession duties to the various provinces on securities such as the stock of companies having their head office in a province other than that in which the company was domiciled.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 116, to amend The Income War Tax Act, 1917.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

Friday, May 28, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure) presented the second report of the joint committee of both houses on the Printing of Parliament.

NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo) presented the third report of the select standing committee on Railways and Shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government as follows:

The attention of your committee having been drawn to the omission from the interim supply voted by parliament during the present session, of any part of items 372 and 373, of the estimates 1926-27 respecting loans to the Canadian National Railway and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited;

Your committee therefore recommends that parliament grant as interim supply the sum of $10,000,000 of the said item 372 and the sum of $200,000 of the said item 373.

TRIBUTE TO CANADIAN ARTIST

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay on the table of the House a full description of the motif and artistic design of the seal, the inkstand and the calendar made by Mr. Paul Beau, ironmaster.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT ORDERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That on and after Monday, the 31st of May, instant, and every Monday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I understand the whips have had a conference over this motion and that they recommend one more private members' day. I am quite agreeable to the motion so amended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it is the wish of the House to have an extra day I would amend the motion by striking out the words "on and" so that it will read 'after Monday the 31st of May."

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. COOTE: It was impossible to hear what the Prime Minister said. I want to be sure that we have next Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The object of the amendment is to give that day.

Motion as amended agreed to.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT 1917

AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 147, to amend the Income War Tax Act, 1917 (payment by Canadian residing abroad).

He said: The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to prevent evasion of payment of income taxes by Canadians temporarily residing abroad. Under the present law some wealthy Canadians now in London, England, are able to evade both Canadian and British income taxes. The bill provides that income tax is to be collected from Canadians so temporarily living abroad who ordinarily reside in Canada and receive income from purely Canadian investments. The burden of proof of residence is placed on them. It is not intended to increase taxation, which can only be done by a minister of the crown. I refer the House to Bourinot, fourth edition, pages 430 to 434. It is simply intended to provide for the collection of the income taxes already imposed upon residents of Canada by existing legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have my doubts as to the legality of this bill. It seems to me that its purpose would bring it within the authority of the government, the question being one of finance. However, I will examine the authorities.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONTREAL STREET RAILWAY PURCHASE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I desire to submit supplementary information, in connection with a question asked by the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Foster) on May 17 relating to Montreal Tramway property purchased by the Canadian National Railways, as follows:

The amount paid for this tramway property is $1,250,000.

AGREEMENTS WITH CITY OF VANCOUVER

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): There is a matter of very considerable importance to the city of Vancouver, having relation to certain outstanding contractual agreements between the Canadian National Railways and that city, in regard to which I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) if he will be good enough to reply. There is reported in this morning's press an interview with Mayor L. D. Taylor to the effect that certain contractual arrangements have been entered into between the National Railways and the city of Vancouver by which an hotel will be provided in Vancouver for the service of the railways. In addition to this the question of certain drainage and sanitary arrangements, which are under contract with the railways is discussed. I would ask the Minister of Railways to intimate to the House, first, whether or not a decision has been arrived at between the city and the railways and, secondly, whether such a decision has secured the final approval of the government.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I saw the newspaper despatch in question which intimated, I believe, that arrangements had been completed for the Canadian National Railways to erect a hotel in Vancouver. So far as the report is concerned I can say that it is premature, to say the least. The position, briefly, is that certain contractual relations exist between the Canadian Northern Railway—my hon. friend said the Canadian National, but it should be the Canadian Northern—

Mr. STEVENS: That is correct.

Mr. DUNNING: —and the city of Vancouver. To a degree, I suppose, we may say the Canadian National inherited the obligations of the Canadian Northern. These obligations with respect to the city of Vancouver are certainly formidable—I think my hon. friend knows that—

Mr. STEVENS: Quite.

Mr. DUNNING: —and negotiations have been in progress for some little time between the railway company, the government and the city regarding those obligations, but no definite settlement has been reached. The intimation that a decision has been reached to build a hotel at Vancouver is quite premature.

WESTON-WOODBRIDGE SERVICE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. H. LENNOX (North York): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) if he is aware that the Canadian National Railway has discontinued its service between Weston and Woodbridge, and yesterday directed that the road be dismantled. I should also like to ask him upon what authority the Canadian National Railway has discontinued operation, my impression of the Railway Act being that this can only be done by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the railway board.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the matter to which my hon. friend refers. I shall be glad to make inquiries regarding it and to communicate the information required at a later date.

BIOLOGICAL BOARD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, as it is a matter of very general importance, I should like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) who is the present chairman of the biological board. On receiving an answer I desire to ask him a further question.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I have not the name of the gentleman in my mind at the present time.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has the chairman of the biological board resigned?

Mr. CARDIN: I am not informed of his resignation.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May I also ask the minister in this connection if, before the estimates are discussed, he will lay on the table the correspondence in relation to the chairman's resignation?

Mr. CARDIN: Certainly, with pleasure.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARY REVISION

POSTAL SERVICE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the representative in this House of the hon. Postmaster General whether or not the government has completed the salary revision of the postal service; and if not, when we may expect it will finally be revised?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (for the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the salaries of the postal service are only part of the salaries of the civil service and are included in the report which has been made by the Civil Service Commission, and on which a sub-committee of the Privy Council has worked. I was away at the time through illness, but I understand that at the request of representatives of the Civil Service Association that report was sent back to the Civil Service Commission for further consideration. There the matter stands at the present time.

UNITED STOCK GROWERS LIMITED

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) whether or not an investigation has been conducted into the operations of the United Stock Growers Limited at Calgary, and if a report thereon has been received. If so, will such report be available for the members of this House?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, an investigation has been held into the operations of the live stock pool at Calgary at the request of the pool itself and also, I think, at the request of the live stock exchange. The investigation was conducted by Mr. McCallum, chief of the stock yards service, and Mr. Mackenzie, representative of our department at Calgary. The report just came to hand this morning, and I have not yet had an opportunity of reading it. Inasmuch as the investigation was conducted under the provisions of the Live Stock Products Act, the report naturally becomes a matter of considerable public concern, and if any hon. gentlemen ask for that report a decision will then have to be arrived at regarding the advisability of tabling it.

IMPORTATION OF BREEDING SHEEP DUTY FREE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in view of the recent disposal of the budget resolutions, I should like to inquire of the government as to the correctness of a report which appears in the press to-day from British Columbia to the effect that thousands of sheep are to be imported into Canada during the next twelve months without payment of duty. If this report is correct why has the matter not been brought before parliament?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it has been the practice both of the Customs department and my own, under certain conditions, to permit the free entry of breeding sheep into Canada.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I might point out that the report states the Ottawa authorities plan to allow breeding sheep to be imported without payment of duty during the next twelve months, which would indicate that it is a recent move.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, Mr. Speaker, the act provides for that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): For pure bred sheep.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

PRIVILEGE—HON. MR. DUNNING

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I desire to call attention to the following statement in an editorial on Canadian National Railways appearing in this morning's Ottawa Journal:

> It is nonsense, for example, and not quite honest, for Mr. Dunning to point out as an illustration of the system's success that only ten millions of the fifty millions that parliament voted for the road last year was actually used, when almost in the next breath it had to be shown that the reason for this was simply that the railway raised some 45 millions on bond issues guaranteed by the government—and for which the country is responsible.

The reference quoted contains a rather serious misapprehension of the facts, which I feel sure is quite unintentional on the part of the Journal, and which the Journal will be foremost in desiring to set right.

The 50 millions of which only 10 were actually required of the government, were voted for the fiscal year 1925-26. The 35 millions, raised by guarantee of bonds, was part of the vote of the previous fiscal year 1924-25 and, while falling within the scope of the calendar year covered by Sir Henry Thornton's report, formed no part of my presentation of the railway estimates which were, of course, for the fiscal year 1926-27 as contrasted with the fiscal years 1925-26. The error arises, of course, from the fact that the accounts of the railways are on the basis of the calendar year while those of the government are on the basis of the federal fiscal year. This I was careful to explain when dealing with these figures. There were no bond issues, guaranteed or otherwise, during the fiscal year 1925-26.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

The House resumed from April 16 consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, respecting Old Age Pensions.—Hon. Mr. King (Kootenay).—Mr. Duff in the chair.

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): When we were last in committee this bill was thoroughly discussed and most of the sections were passed. Sections 2, 3, 4, 7 and 9 were held over for amendments which seemed proper. I have prepared the amendments, first of which is that to section 2.

On section 2—Definitions.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. King (Kootenay) moves that subsection (d) of section 2 be amended by adding after the word "territory" the following:

> In respect to which "Commissioner" shall be read for "Lieutenant Governor in Council".

Mr. LADNER: I would like to bring up a matter in connection with subsection (b) of section 2, concerning certain petitions and circulars which have been received from different soldier organizations requesting some arrangement which would provide old age pensions for ex-soldiers who were prematurely aged through service in the war. There are a great many cases known to the department where an applicant for pension under the Pension Act was not able to establish what is known as attributability; that is, he could not relate the disability under which he suffered actually to war service, but nevertheless a portion of the medical opinion established fairly well that his health had been undermined and that his condition actually arose from his service overseas.

I want to make this statement as brief as possible, but there is a question of policy facing the government. Is it the intention of the government to respond favourably to the request for legislation which will provide for pensions to those returned men who have become prematurely aged by reason of their war service? Do they propose to take a step of this kind; could they take such a step in this act, or will they make provision in the regular Pension Act under which military pensions are paid? Is that matter under consideration; will the petitioners, the ex-soldier bodies and a great many of the public, receive the favourable attention of the government, and will any amendments to the Pension Act be brought down?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): When we were in committee before I think the suggestions of my hon. friend were thoroughly discussed, and at that time the government intimated that they did not consider it advisable to interfere with the present act as drafted. It is true that certain soldier organizations have made such representations, but if it is considered desirable to deal with that class would it not be better to deal with them through the Pension Act?

Mr. LADNER: That is all very well if the Pension Act is coming before the House, but otherwise the opportunity of dealing with the matter will be lost, because the session will be over. Perhaps the minister can inform me whether or not it is the intention of the government to bring down any amendments to the Pension Act, so that a matter of this kind may be considered.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are now dealing with the Old Age Pension bill, and I am not in a position to advise my hon. friend as to the Pension Act. I would repeat, however, that it is not considered advisable to incorporate a clause of that kind in this bill. I am sure the hon. gentleman is anxious to see this bill go through, and I think he will see the inadvisability of incorporating such an amendment at this time.

Mr. LADNER: I appreciate the contention of the minister, but I, together with a great many of the public, am very much interested in whether or not the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Elliott) intends to introduce amendments to the Pension Act this session. If so, is it the intention to consider this question?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 carry?

Mr. LADNER: This is a matter of some importance, and I would like an answer.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I might say, Mr. Chairman, that so far as amendments to the Pension Act are concerned, no decision has been arrived at by the government to make changes of any importance this session.

Mr. LADNER: I infer, then, that some changes will be made, and that the matter will be before the House.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is barely possible, but there will be no changes of importance.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to ask the minister if, in the interim since this bill was before the House last, there has been any attempt made by the government to interview any of the provincial premiers with respect to co-operation in this measure.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. HANSON: I am satisfied that this bill is simply a washout unless the provinces are interested. I would like to point out to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay), who is sponsoring this bill, that I think there will be a meeting of the provincial premiers in Toronto within a week or so, and if this bill is to amount to anything there ought to be a determined effort on the part of the Dominion authorities to get the co-operation of the provinces. Otherwise, I venture the prophecy that this legislation will simply fall to the ground.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think that was thoroughly discussed when we were in committee before. Parliament has a bill before it to provide for old age pensions in conjunction with the provinces, but the provinces do not need to avail themselves of the bill unless they see fit, it is optional with them. There would be nothing to be gained at this time by chasing around trying to interview provincial premiers. The bill, once it is on the statute book, will be available for the provinces if they wish to take advantage of it.

Mr. HANSON: The minister's answer simply confirms the suspicion that most of us had when this legislation was introduced, that the government is afraid the provinces might take them up and that this might really amount to something

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We hope they will.

Mr. HANSON: Otherwise, I venture the assertion that this bill means nothing and never will mean anything.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): It was impossible to hear the amendment as it was read by the minister, or as you read it, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the House has any idea of what the proposed amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is to add after the word "territory" in paragraph (d) of clause 2 the words: "in respect to which 'commissioner' shall be read for 'Lieutenant-Governor in Council.'"

Mr. BURY: Are the Northwest Territories being left out?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, another section provides for them.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would ask the minister again, providing this bill falls through as a result of the provinces not participating in the scheme, will this government assume the full responsibility? I think we ought to have a direct answer to that question.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would say no, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then the bill, on the very face of it, is an absolute absurdity. It will never amount to anything.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is my hon. friend's opinion. I have not that opinion. I am satisfied that many of the provinces will avail themselves of this legislation.

Mr. McGIBBON: Time will tell.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Time will tell.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Has any plan been formulated as to the operation of this act in the Yukon? Has the minister had any communication with the gold commissioner of that territory, who is in charge of the administration there, how it is going to be worked out?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Yukon territory will be in the same position as the other provinces, except that the commissioner will take the place of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. If he sees fit, he can make his representations to the Governor in Council, and his representations will be considered.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): There is no such official in the Yukon and has not been since 1918. The position of commissioner was abolished by the government.

Mr. KING Kootenay): That is not our information. He may not go by that title in the Yukon, but under the act he is known as the commissioner.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I am sure that I am correct. I quite agree with other hon. members that this act will be abortive. Whether it is the gold commissioner or anybody else, I am sure that this act in its present terms will never come into operation in the Yukon, and it is just a waste of time considering it.

Mr. TOLMIE: I am strongly in favour of the principle of this bill, but I think that some meeting or conference should have been held with the provinces first. Have any of the provinces indicated their willingness to come in under this legislation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Since this legislation was introduced?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There has been no correspondence, I think, with any of the provinces since this legislation was introduced.

Mr. TOLMIE: Or before?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was correspondence during the time the committee of 1924 was sitting.

Mr. TOLMIE: Which of the provinces indicated that they were willing to co-operate in this scheme?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was no communication directly from the provinces.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is it not a fact that the member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) put on Hansard the opinions of the different provinces, and that not a single one of them was favourable to accepting this bill?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was no bill at that time.

Mr. McGIBBON: There was a proposed bill, which is the same thing. The minister is merely quibbling over words.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is entirely wrong. There was an inquiry made of the provinces as to whether they were interested in old age pensions. There was no bill at that time, but there is a bill before the House to-day, and if it becomes law there will be the opportunity for the provinces to come in or stay out, as they see fit.

Mr. MANION: Practically every one of the provinces spoke against the idea.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. MANION: None of them promised to co-operate with the government in the scheme. I remember well reading the opinions of the different provinces and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and I had some argument about it, but I do not remember any one of the provinces agreeing to come in under this scheme.

Mr. BROWN: Was there not at that time a question as to jurisdiction in the matter?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: It is unnecessary to go into the principle of this bill. It is entirely out of order at this stage, but I suppose, Mr. Chairman, as one member has been allowed to digress, he ought to be answered. I will do so very briefly by reading again for the second, if not the third, time the resolution passed by the British Columbia legislature last year, on the 24th day of November. After a suitable preamble, it says:

> Therefore be it resolved that the necessary steps be taken to formulate some plan in connection with the Dominion government to provide for old age pensions, and that the other provinces of the Dominion be requested to take similar action.

Then it goes on to say that copies shall be sent not only to the Secretary of State for Canada, but to the provincial secretaries of the various provinces, the clear idea being to try and bring pressure or influence to bear on them to co-operate to that extent. As the hon. member for Lisgar has said, the opinions which the hon. member for Fort William read a few weeks ago were founded upon a misapprehension of the law as it has since been found to exist. The provinces were then under the impression that the Dominion government was trying to foist on to them some of our responsibilities. It has since been ascertained by a decision, not questioned, of the Justice department that the whole responsibility for legislation of this kind, or rather for the expenditure of the money, rests on the provinces. Now that the provinces are finding that instead of them being handed a gold brick they are being offered assistance to 50 per cent of their expenditure in connection with old age pensions, they are much more likely to accept it, and that is seen by the resolution I have just read, which is very different in character from the one they passed twelve months before. Therefore it is reasonable to suppose that British Columbia will certainly be in the forefront in accepting this legislation, and will use its influence, and its example may be followed by the other provinces.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Did the British Columbia legislature follow up that resolution with the formulation of any plan and its submission either to this government or to the provinces?

Mr. NEILL: That, I presume, comes within the province of the British Columbia government. The resolution was only passed at the last session, and presumably the provincial government are taking steps, as instructed by the legislature, looking towards co-operation with the Dominion.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friend in reading the resolution read words which indicated that the government of British Columbia proposed to formulate plans in connection with old age pensions, and submit those plans for approval to the other provinces and to this government. I am asking him if after the passing of that resolution, which may be taken as an expression of opinion of the British Columbia legislature, the British Columbia government followed up that proposition and formulated and submitted any plans either to this government or to the provinces? Did they follow up the resolution or not, or was it merely a resolution passed and then dropped, and nothing more ever heard of it?

Mr. NEILL: It was passed only a few months ago. I am not in the confidence of the government of British Columbia, but presumably, after the habit of most governments, they are proceeding to carry out the mandate very emphatically imposed upon them by the legislature and that unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN: I must call the attention of the committee to the fact that the discussion is getting away from the clause altogether I have allowed considerable latitude and I must ask the committee to confine their remarks to the clause under discussion.

Mr. McGIBBON: I want to enter my protest against legislation of this kind. It is going to raise the hopes of tens of thousands of people in this country only to cause them utter disappointment in the future. I want this government to take the responsibility for the present legislation if the promises which it holds out fail. I am sure we are all indebted to the lay member who has just spoken for reading us a lecture on law. Of course, we appreciate the authority from which that lecture comes.

Mr. NEILL: I am not a "late" member.

Mr. McGIBBON: I may tell my hon. friend that there are lawyers in this House. including the leader of this party, who see clearly what the effect of this legislation will be. What I want the government to do is to promise the people of Canada who are going to be disappointed by this bill that if the provinces do not take this matter up they will do so themselves.

Mr. NEILL: I would just like to point out to my hon. friend that I am not a "late" member.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The hon. gentleman referred to you as a lay member—l-a-y.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 7—when payments to provinces to be made.

Mr. BURY: What about sections 5 and 6?

The CHAIRMAN: They have been passed.

Mr. BURY: When were they passed?

The CHAIRMAN: About a month ago.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have an amendment to propose to this section. I move:

To strike out the words "Treasury Board" in the third line and substitute the words "Minister of Finance", and to strike out all the words after the word "appropriated" in the fifth line.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the reason for that amendment?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): When we were last in committee a question was raised in regard to the phrase "Treasury Board" and it was considered better to substitute "Minister of Finance." That has been done. As to the other change the balance of the section as it now stands reads:

—not otherwise appropriated, and the Governor in Council may borrow from time to time such sums as may be required for the purpose of making such payments.

I understand this wording is unnecessary and it is being struck out.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps you are going to make the payments out of profits.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, surely.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think that completes the amendments contemplated.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): moved the second reading of Bill No. 91, to amend the Immigration Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There was a mistake made in the printing of this amendment. I do not know who is responsible, probably I am. There were two amendments prepared and the wrong amendment got into the hands of the law clerk and was printed in the first edition of the bill that was distributed. However, the bill was reprinted and it is the reprinted copy that we are now dealing with.

Mr. BOYS: Where do we get copies of the reprinted bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Copies have been distributed and must be on the files of hon. members.

Mr. MANION: How do the changes read?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The amendment in the reprinted bill is a short one. I will read it so that hon. members may be quite clear about it. Under the old provision certain persons were deemed to belong to undesirable classes and liable to deportation. The amendment that we are proposing is as follows:

1. Section forty-one of the Immigration Act, chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1910, as enacted by chapter twenty-six of the statutes of 1919, is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

41. Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen has been convicted of any criminal offence as defined in Part II of the Criminal Code, it shall be the duty of any officer becoming cognizant thereof and of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein any such person may be, to forthwith send a written complaint to the minister giving full particulars.

That is the substitution.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. MANION: Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. I have not had time to study the provisions of the first bill that was put on the file but there does not seem to be any resemblance between the reprinted bill and the one originally introduced.

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, because the amendment that was printed by mistake did not cover what we were aiming to cure in the act, namely, the right of the minister to deport without trial. If my hon. friend will look up section 41 of the act he will find very wide powers given there to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization with respect to deportation. Those powers were given during the period of the war. The amendment is simply to give to the inindividual the right to a trial before deportation can take place.

Mr. MANION: When was the bill read a first time?

An hon. MEMBER: April 26.

Mr. MANION: Which amendment was read a first time?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The one in the first copy. I have not it before me.

Mr. MANION: That is the reason I want to know. It is not for any particular purpose. I do not wish to hold it up, but if it was the other bill that was read the first time, then this one will not be in order until it is read the first time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I took the precaution to make inquiries to see whether or not I would be able to avoid the introduction of the amendment, and I was informed by the law clerk of the House that this bill was quite in order.

Mr. MANION: I have not studied out the cause of it, but the new bill was just put on the file to-day. Would the minister permit it to stand over? It will only take a half a minute. Somebody might wish to study the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would like to put it through now and the hon. member could bring the question up on the third reading.

Mr. MANION: But if we pass it now we approve of the principle. The bill contains only one clause. I have no interest in it, but some hon. member might wish to study it especially when it was the other bill that was read the first time.

Mr. McGIBBON: Who is asking for the amendment?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think this is the fourth time we have amended it. I think my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition amended this section 41. On three different occasions we have sent this amendment to the Senate and it was killed.

It was a war measure, enacted during the war period, giving the Minister of Immigration, too much power, in my opinion.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister is not answering my question.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The government is taking the responsibility. I am taking the responsibility.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has a request come from any part of the Dominion?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, from various parts of Canada. I have not the requests before me, but I well remember that when I introduced the amendment, perhaps not worded as it is at present but in somewhat similar language, requests had come in from a number of bodies in the country asking for the repeal of section 41 in its entirety.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has the minister not confidence in himself?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh absolutely.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What is the definition of a criminal offence as contained in part II of the Criminal Code referred to in this bill? The reason I ask is that this reprinted bill seems very different in character and in scope from bill 91. That bill provides:

> Whenever any alien advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain or Canada, or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or the overthrow by force or violence of constituted law and authority, or assassination, or shall by word or act create or attempt to create riot or public disorder in Canada, or shall by common repute belong to or be suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from, or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada by force or threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail;

And so on. I should think that such a person is just as dangerous an individual or class of individual as a person convicted under the Criminal Code, and why the restriction? It appears to me it is a restrictive section, and why?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): For the very simple reason that it places the constitutional authority to act entirely in the hands of the minister. The old section 41 gave very wide powers to the minister to seize and deport individuals for a number of causes, and during the war it was necessary.

Mr. BURY: Is the new section 41 merely a more succinct and briefer way of comprehending all the offences included in the old section 41, or are any of the offences under the old section 41 omitted from the new section, and if so which?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I say very frankly that I think, and have always thought, that the officials of the Department of Immigration should not be police officers. However the act has so fixed it. Section 41, which we are discussing to-day, simply brings to the attention of the Department of Immigration the conviction of any individual who is liable to deportation and whom the officers of the crown will have the authority to deport. It puts the matter in the hands of the police, rather than in the hands of the officials of the Immigration department. There it is however at present and this amendment is simply for the purpose of bringing these convictions to our notice. Now we propose to cancel section 41; it will go out of existence. Under the old section 41, without conviction at all, the minister could take action and deport. The minister will no longer be able to deport persons without trial—that is what it means—but the minister will still be the police officer for deportation purposes.

Mr. BURY: The answer of the minister has not dealt with the question I raised. There are two elements in the problem. One is the offences in respect to which the machinery provided by the section is to operate; the other is the particular machinery which is to operate. The minister's reply has dealt entirely with the machinery. I am not concerned with the machinery now, but I am asking the question, whatever the machinery, whether the old or the new, what offences does it deal with? Does it deal with offences under old section 41 or only with some of them? In respect of the offences, and not the machinery, is there any difference between the old section and the one that is intended to take its place?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No there would not be. It deals with the same offences with this single exception, that the Minister of Immigration could not lay violent hands on an individual until he was tried.

Mr. BURY: All the present offences are there with the addition of this provision?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes they are still offences.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The minister has shown a disposition to answer the questions which have been put to him very fairly, but I think his answers indicate a lack of knowledge of the provisions of this bill and the changes in section 41, which leads me to believe that the minister would be well advised if he accepted the suggestion made by the hon. member for Fort William. This is an important matter. 4 p.m. The very fact that it has been dealt with on five or six occasions in this chamber shows that it is advisable to spend a little more time on it, so that we con compare the section now submitted with the old section. I think it should be laid over.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I move that the committee rise report progress and ask leave to sit again. If any hon. members who are not here to-day are interested in this perhaps hon. members would direct their attention to the bill as reprinted.

Mr. BOYS: I would like the minister to consider a slight amendment to this section. The closing part of the section contains very much the same language as the closing part of old section 41, and that language is quite applicable to the old section, because that does not contemplate a conviction at all. It merely states that persons who do certain things shall be reported to the minister. In section 41 you are dealing with a conviction and not a complaint, and no fewer than three officers will be required to send in full particulars—first, the officer cognizant of the offence who, I suppose, would be the police constable; secondly, the official of the municipality who would be the justice of the peace or the magistrate trying the case; and, thirdly, the clerk of the municipality. It seems to me ridiculous that three different officers should be called upon to send in full particulars, and I would suggest that the minister amend the bill to make it the duty of one person, the magistrate or any other judicial officer to submit a copy of the conviction.

Mr. MANION: I do not as a rule insist very strongly on an absolute adherence to technicalities, but I do think that in the interests of a proper observance of the rules of the House the procedure which is being followed in this instance should not go unchallenged. With all deference to the law officers, I cannot see how a bill consisting solely of one clause can be completely redrafted after it has been once introduced and then taken up in committee without reintroduction. Surely the introduction of the original bill cannot be considered as having introduced a bill which is virtually different. Personally I would offer no objection to the bill in its present form being formally introduced now, and I do not think that the House would object.

[Mr. J. W. Edwards.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I understood that the present procedure would be in order but I shall inquire further into the point and ask the indulgence of the House to allow me to introduce the bill and go right on with the consideration of it.

Mr. MANION: That is all right.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am afraid I did not get the amendment proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Boys).

Mr. BOYS: The minister in this section is providing that three officers shall submit certain particulars. I think it would be well to make it incumbent upon one person, say the magistrate, to send to the minister a copy of the conviction which is registered.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall consider the suggestion.

Progress reported.

LONG TERM FARM LOANS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That there shall be a board known as the Canadian Farm Loan Board which shall be a body politic and corporate consisting of four members, one of whom shall be the Minister of Finance and the other three shall be appointed by the Governor in Council and of the latter one shall be designated by the Canadian Farm Loan Commissioners.

That the board shall issue farm loan bonds to make long term loans to farmers, and the government of Canada shall provide initial capital for the board to an amount not exceeding five million dollars and subscribe an amount of 5 per cent of the capital stock as loans are made by the board.

The government of each province in which loans are made shall be required to subscribe to the capital stock of the board as loans are made in such province an amount equal to 5 per cent of the said loans and each borrower an amount of 5 per cent of his loan payable at the time the loan is made. The loans shall be made on the security of first mortgage on farm lands; the interest rate shall be such a rate in excess of the interest payable on the farm loan bonds as is sufficient to provide for the expenses of operation; the farm loan bonds shall be legal investments and may be purchased by the Minister of Finance provided that the amount of such bonds held by him shall not at any time exceed $15,000,000; and the amount of any payment by the government of Canada on account of capital of the board or as payment for farm loan bonds purchased shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund on the authority of the Governor in Council.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. ROBB: Hon. members will be in a better position to discuss the merits of the proposal once the bill is introduced, and I would ask the committee to allow the resolution to go through. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "by" in the fourth line and making the word "commissioners" in the fifth line, singular, so that it will read "one shall be designated the Canadian Farm Loan Commissioner."

Mr. BURY: Why not strike out the word "designated"?

Mr. ROBB: I think the word is all right. It has been suggested by the Department of Justice. I move further that in line sixteen after the words "provide for the expenses of operation" there be added the words "and for the necessary reserves for losses."

Mr. MANION: Is this the rural credits scheme?

Mr. ROBB: It is popularly discussed under that name but the rural credits scheme as understood in western Canada contemplated short term loans. This is better known as the long term farm loan.

Mr. MANION: I am not objecting to the phraseology. I simply want to know whether this is to take the place of what has commonly been called rural credits.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Amendments agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr BOYS: Will the minister kindly explain just what is meant by the last paragraph of this resolution? It provides that the province shall subscribe 5 per cent of the loan and that the borrower shall provide 5 per cent. What about the other 90 per cent?

Mr. ROBB: They will market their own bonds.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman will be able to put his question on the bill. We are out of committee stage.

Mr. BOYS: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 148, for the purpose of establishing in Canada a system of Long Term Mortgage Credit for Farmers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. minister might explain now the point raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Boys).

Mr. ROBB: I will get all the information for my hon. friend and send him a memorandum.

Mr. BOYS: Probably I can satisfy myself by reading the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT, 1919 AMENDMENT

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO ELIMINATION OF LEVEL CROSSINGS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend section 262 of the Railway Act, 1919, and to provide that the total amount of money to be apportioned and payable from any annual appropriation shall not, in the case of any one rail level crossing, exceed forty per cent of the cost of the actual construction work, and shall not, in any such case, exceed the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): This money comes out of a special fund, does it not?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the amount available each year, or is there any limitation?

Mr. DUNNING: The Railway Act provides for a grant of $200,000 per year for ten consecutive years, from April 1, 1919, to be applied as set out in the act. It might possibly be well to explain at this stage that the government has received many representations to the effect that on account of the relative smallness of the Dominion's contribution from this fund the use for which it was designed has been very little availed of during recent years. The Good Roads Association of Canada has been particularly urgent in its representations. The subject was referred to the Board of Railways Commissioners for a report, and after examining it the board thoroughly recommends the provision contained in the resolution. Briefly, it is to the effect that the Dominion's contribution shall be increased from 25 per cent to 40 per cent, with a maximum of $25,000 for a level crossing instead of $15,000 as heretofore.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Would the minister tell us how much has been expended for the last four or five years?

Mr. DUNNING: I can go back to 1909 and give my hon. friend particulars of each year's operations:

1909-10	$ 70
1910-11	609
1911-12	7,644
1912-13	20,807
1913-14	39,968
1914-15	92,099
1915-16	47,079
1916-17	46,630
1917-18	13,740
1918-19	8,715
1919-20	12,359
1920-21	56,772
1921-22	13,292
1922-23	46,885
1923-24	44,439
1924-25	39,436
1925-26	66,224
1926-27 (to May 12/26)	16,361

That is the whole history of the payments year by year.

Mr. GEARY: What is the present appropriation?

Mr. DUNNING: The appropriation under the act is the same annually, $200,000.

Mr. GEARY: Then is it quite plain from the amendment that this will apply to individual crossings, and not to works which contain more than one crossing? It has sometimes been said with regard to section 262 of the Railway Act that the contribution should be limited to a work, and not to any individual crossing in a work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think, Mr. Chairman, the minister would be well advised to make that point clear. Very often in cities it is not a question of one crossing but of a big scheme which gets rid perhaps of a dozen crossings. My recollection is that there was difficulty in dealing with it at certain times.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend mean there would be a combination of several crossings in one?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In one scheme. Take, for example, Edmonton, where my hon. friend is familiar with the layout. When we started to straighten out things we found a whole lot of crossings had to be considered at the same time, and the point was taken—I forget whether by the Department of Finance or of Railways—that you could only give aid for one particular crossing, although a whole lot of different crossings might be involved in the one work. I think the minister might well look into that. The resolution contains the phrase, "in the case of any one rail level crossing." The proper thing to do is to get rid of the level crossing altogether and put a bridge, tunnel or something else in place of it. The original idea was to aid the elimination of grades, and to make safe highway and railway crossings. I do not think the word "level" comes in there very happily, but the minister can take that up with his legal advisers.

Mr. FORKE: I quite agree that the right thing would be either a subway or a bridge, but I am afraid that is impossible in every case. In the meantime we should make the crossings as safe as possible. I did not understand the purpose of this resolution because, as I have said before, we at the other end of the House sometimes do not know what is going on until the next day. I am afraid to come over on this side too often—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You probably belong there.

Mr. FORKE: —because my hon. friends opposite get a good deal of amusement when I sit over here, and I do not like to give them any more amusement than I can.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not come on this side?

Mr. FORKE: That would be all right too. I would like to emphasize the necessity of making level crossings safe in every possible way. I will admit that they are out of date, but under the circumstances it is impossible to have bridges and subways, so the only thing to do is make the level crossings as safe as possible.

Mr. BOYS: I presume the minister has the Railway Act before him; I do not recall the provisions of section 262, and if it is not too long perhaps he might read it.

Mr. DUNNING: I am just trying to clear up the point as to the number of crossings; if hon. members will permit I will try to deal with each question as it comes up.

Mr. COOTE: I wish hon. members would speak a little louder; we cannot hear what they say.

Mr. DUNNING: I will try to remember. The definition of a crossing is dealt with in the act of 1909, subsection 5 of section 7, as follows:

"Crossing", for the purposes of this section, means any steam railway crossing of a highway, or highway crossing of a steam railway, at rail level, and every manner of construction of the railway or of the highway by the elevation or the depression of the one above or below the other, or by the diversion of the one or the other, and any other work ordered by the board to be provided as one work of protection, safety and convenience for the public in respect of one or more railways not exceeding four tracks in all crossing or so crossed.

Mr. GEARY: I know the definition, and the point has been raised that when you are combining several grade crossings in one work ordered by one order of the Board of Railway Commissioners you may only ask for a contribution from the annual appropriation for the whole work and not for each crossing, although the work may contain ten crossings. For instance, the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) mentioned the city of Edmonton, where there was a separation of grades throughout part of the city. That took care of several crossings, and each of these crossings should receive its contribution if, in the view of the board, it is a proper case. The board should not be limited to $25,000 in respect of a whole work, but only in respect of each separation of grades, that is each highway crossing.

Mr. DUNNING: I will be glad to give consideration to that point, although part of it would appear to be covered by the provision that no such money shall in any one year be applied to more than six crossings on any one railway in any one municipality, or more than once in any one year to any one crossing.

Mr. GEARY: That is true, but the definition confuses a work with a crossing. If the minister would be good enough to consider that matter with his legal advisers the point might be cleared up.

Mr. DUNNING: I will be glad to consider it.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would like to ask the minister a question. I entirely agree with the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), that these crossings should be made as safe as possible. Let us suppose a municipality makes a request to the Board of Railway Commissioners for the elimination of a level crossing. Does the Board of Railway Commissioners apportion the cost of such work as between the municipality and the railway on the one hand, and in relation to the 40 per cent paid by the government, on the other?

Mr. DUNNING: Not to exceed 40 per cent.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Then is the apportionment of the other 60 per cent entirely within the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners as between the municipality and the railway company?

Mr. DUNNING: That is the position.

Mr. BOYS: And the 40 per cent is also dealt with by the board.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but the board's authority to order payment from the consoldiated fund is limited to 40 per cent.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Then the board, in its judgment, might give 30 per cent or 20 per cent, but not over 40 per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: That is right. Sometimes the province comes into the matter also, as hon. members who are familiar with the operations of the act know. Now someone has asked me to read section 262:

(1) The sums appropriated and set apart to aid actual construction work for the protection, safety and convenience of the public in respect of highway crossings of railways at rail level in existence on the first day of April, one thousand nine hundred and nine, shall be placed to the credit of a special account to be known as "The Railway Grade Crossing Fund", and shall be applied by the board subject to the limitations hereinafter set out, solely towards the cost (not including that of maintenance and operation), of actual construction work for the purpose aforesaid.

Then comes subsection (2) which we are now amending, which deals with the proportions, and then subsection (3) goes on:

In case any province contributes towards the said fund, the board may apportion, direct and order payment out of the amount so contributed by such province, subject to any conditions and restrictions made and imposed by such province in respect of its contribution.

Apparently none of the provinces have made use of that privilege, because so far as I know they have not contributed anything towards this fund. Then subsection (4) is as follows:

In this section,—

"crossing", means any steam railway crossing of a highway, or highway crossing of a steam railway, at rail level, and every manner of construction of the railway or of the highway by the elevation or the depression of the one above or below the other, or by the diversion of the one or the other, and any other work ordered by the board to be provided as one work of protection, safety and convenience for the public in respect of one or more railways not exceeding four tracks in all crossing or so crossed;

"municipality", means an incorporated city, town, village, county, township, parish, or rural municipality.

That is the whole section.

Mr. GEARY: That is the capital cost of construction of the work. The hon.

member for Brandon is more interested, I think, in the safeguarding of grade crossings by the installation of a gate or a wigwag or a signal which requires maintenance from year to year, rather than by a bridge or subway. The amount attributable to construction is very slight, and the real cost is in the annual maintenance either by mechanical means or by watchmen. Sometimes three or four watchmen are required to take care of a day and night crossing. That bears rather heavily on the municipality, I happen to know, and probably my hon. friend has cases in mind in his district where the municipalities are paying heavily for that sort of protection going on from year to year. Perhaps the minister would consider authorizing the railway board to contribute some part of the annual protection cost.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I cannot undertake to do that. After all, we are increasing the proportion to be borne by the Dominion from 25 to 40 per cent and are increasing the maximum from $15,000 to $25,000. That is a big jump, and undoubtedly it will encourage the building of more works to eliminate level crossings than has been the case for a number of years past. I think we had better be content to move slowly and see what the effect is going to be after this present enlargement of the Dominion's contribution, before we undertake anything in the way of looking after maintenance. I am afraid that it would run into a very great deal of money if any provision were to be made for that. I think the hon. member for West York has probably more information on this matter than any other member of the House, and I would appreciate his view on the suggestion of providing at this time something additional for maintenance cost, as well as for the original cost of construction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no doubt about it that the real cost in connection with protection of level crossings is the maintenance. If you are going to put in gates—I do not know what the cost is now, but once you could put in pretty good gates for $2,500 or $3,000. If you have a more complicated layout, it may cost double that amount, or a little more when you have something else tied up with it, but the gates as gates are not very expensive to install originally. Nevertheless, even in the old days, putting in gates had the effect of creating a capital carrying charge of $50,000. What I mean by that is that it took at least the interest on $50,000 to look after the maintenance of those gates, watchmen, the supply of oil, and the like. It would cost even more now I should think—I have not looked at the figures for a long time—and that is quite a burden on the municipalities.

But in justice to the minister I have to admit that the underlying idea of the act was the elimination of crossings more than anything else. At the same time there is this practical thing we have to remember. The step that is now being taken is wise. We never gave enough to crossing elimination before; we were simply playing with it, but even with what we are now doing we are not going to have very many more crossing eliminations. Grade eliminations to-day run to a great deal of money. Subways and bridges are very, very expensive. Most of them cost a great deal more than $15,000, which is the maximum contribution to-day, I understand.

Mr. DUNNING: It will be $25,000 under this amendment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That helps quite materially, but what I think the minister might well do is to have just a little addition made to his resolution, which would not throw much burden at all on the government, but which would help the municipalities very materially in the construction of new gates. I think the most we could contribute from the grade crossing fund towards the cost for a gate protection—of course, this is a recollection of a great many years standing—was $200. For the ordinary level crossing protection, where there is no grade separation and the like, I think in such cases we might have a maximum not exceeding say $1,000 or $1,500 per crossing.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not get my hon. friend's point.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In cases where the whole cost mostly is maintenance rather than construction, I am suggesting that the maximum contribution which might be made from the grade crossing fund be say $1,000 or $1,500, or something like that. That would really help in the case of level crossings where the necessary money, owing to the position of the municipality and the railway, cannot be obtained for the purpose of putting in a subway or a bridge. Increasing the maximum would make it just that much more easy and render it more probable that we would have proper protection, watchmen and the like, without involving us in an annual contribution which might run into a great deal of money.

Mr. DUNNING: The object I had in mind, Mr. Chairman, in bringing this forward at all was to forward the original objective of the legislation, which is the elimination of the level crossing, by increasing the amount which could be attributed by the Dominion to $25,000 per crossing. I regard it as much more advantageous to the people that the crossing should be eliminated than that we should encourage the installation of gates to a greater extent than now exists. I shall be glad to give consideration to the last suggestion made by the hon. member for West York, although it occurs to me off-hand that, with the many thousands of level crossings in Canada, such an increase might result in our general fund being depleted in providing for maintenance along the line suggested.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not maintenance.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, a contribution towards installation. In that connection may I say that the board can now order up to 40 per cent of the installation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But not if the installation exceeds $2,000.

Mr. DUNNING: The contribution then would be about $900.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But we know that both the municipality and the railway will have to go on paying two or three or four thousand dollars a year for all time.

Mr. DUNNING: The real objection I have to that is that it is rather an abandonment of the objective of the law. It is substituting the encouragement of level crossings guarded by gates for what the legislation was obviously intended in the first place to bring about, and that was, through assistance, the complete elimination of level crossings. However, I shall be glad to have the matter further looked into from the point of view my hon. friend has taken.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We might as well be absolutely frank with ourselves. We shall never entirely eliminate level crossings. It cannot be done. Why, if we were to eliminate all level crossings it would double the cost of your railway capital in some cases. So the thing to do is to make up our minds what is the practical way of making these crossings just as safe to the public as we can.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am exceedingly glad that the minister has brought this matter before the House, and I am only sorry that he did not go a little further. I should like to ask for information. In two cases in Nova Scotia recently, one in the county of Cumberland and one in the county of Halifax, road diversions were made by the highways board, and in each case, certainly in one, the diversion eliminated three railway crossings. Now, under the bill as brought down, will the amount contributed be limited to $25,000, or to $75,000 on account of the three railway crossings eliminated? These three railway crossings are being eliminated by an entire reconstruction of the road at a cost very much greater than $75,000. Will the minister be good enough to give me an interpretation of the act as relating to a case of that kind?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I must not attempt to interpret any act, but my understanding of the administration is that under the act the Board of Railway Commissioners can give consideration to any kind of work which has for its objective the elimination of level crossings.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not sure the minister has understood my question. I will read from the resolution as it is here:

> The total amount of money to be apportioned and payable from any annual appropriation shall not, in the case of any one rail level crossing, exceed 40 per cent of the cost of the actual construction work, and shall not, in any such case, exceed the sum of $25,000.

Now three level crossings were eliminated by the diversion. Would the contribution be limited to $25,000 or to $75,000? One of these diversions cost the highways board of the province of Nova Scotia something in the vicinity of $150,000. The other one costs less, but both of them cut out three level crossings on which accidents had occurred resulting in great damage to the rolling stock of the railway. I would be very glad if the minister could raise the amount both in the case of the 40 per cent and as to the sum total of $25,000. An enormous number of people are being killed every year and that number is unfortunately increasing. Therefore, any money which can be expended in preventing accidents of this kind is surely justified. The highways were created before the railways came into existence, and bearing that fact in mind the railways should assume at least one-half the cost of making diversions which will not only give more protection to the public, but will also protect railway property.

Mr. MILLAR: I should like to bring to the attention of the committee a matter that has been on my mind for some little time. I believe that if a slight and very inexpensive addition were made to the signs placed at railway crossings a good many accidents might be prevented. The necessity of this was brought very forcibly to my attention last summer, when a very sad accident occurred near the town where I reside. Perhaps if I described this accident hon. members could better get my point of view. A family of five, on their way to the exhibition at Regina came up to a railway crossing where there was a double track, a fact of which they were not aware. A long freight was proceeding westerly, and they waited for it to pass. Immediately that freight passed the automobile driver pulled up onto the track. But a short freight was proceeding eastward at the same time, the sight of which was hidden from the driver's view by the long freight. Apparently the engineer of the short freight blew the whistle as required by law, but the engines being close together the driver of the motor thought it was the engine of the train he was watching. The result was that he got on the track. The east bound freight was only about forty yards away and travelling at a fast rate. It struck the car and two of the occupants were so badly injured that they died within an hour or two. Two others were seriously injured, and a fifth person escaped with a few scratches. I asked the driver afterwards, when he was in the hospital recovering, this question: Had there been some additional sign denoting that the track was a double one would not some of the occupants of the car have noticed it with the result that the accident would not have taken place? The injured man told me that he felt certain such would have been the case. It seems to me that if some additional device carrying the word "double," in a different colour, or perhaps in red letters, were placed above the present sign "railway crossing" so that it would read "double railway crossing," a good many accidents would be prevented. It would cost very little because it would only need to be placed where there was a double track crossing. Recently I was informed that a similar accident took place in western Ontario, but I failed to notice it in the paper and could not find out exactly where it happened. There is nothing to indicate at these crossings that there is a double track, or that there are three tracks, and many people who are accustomed to driving across single track are apt to forget the danger. I should like to point out that in the particular instance I spoke of the west bound freight was right in front of the people sitting in the car and thus prevented them from seeing the second track on the other side. That is all I wish to say in connection with this matter, but I hope the minister will seriously consider the representations made.

[Mr. Millar.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I just remark that accidents of this kind seem to me to indicate very clearly the necessity not of more signs, but of having crossings which make such accidents impossible. I do not think that level crossings can be justified simply because of their cheapness or a sufficiency of signs. I should like to look at this matter not merely from the standpoint of people who are travelling in motor cars, but also from the point of view of the railway employees. I know that representations have been made again and again to the government by railway employees as to the dangers which exist at level crossings. These employees are under a very great strain constantly in trying to be on the lookout for possible traffic when they should be attending to their engines or to other duties. It seems to me that these representations, made by men who are daily brought into contact with the possibility of accidents, ought to be listened to, and the comparatively small expenditure involved ought not to stand in the way of taking adequate measures for the protection of human life.

Mr. BOYS: Who is administering the act?

Mr. DUNNING: The Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

Mr. BOYS: I know, but when disbursements are made by the Department of Railways directly?

Mr. DUNNING: The amount voted each year is paid into the consolidated fund, and payments are made out of this fund on the order of the railway commission and through the Department of Finance.

Mr. BOYS: Dealing with the point raised by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley), I would ask the minister for his understanding of the phraseology appearing in the third line:

—money to be apportioned and payable from any annual appropriation shall not, in the case of any one rail level crossing, exceed 40 per cent—

What is meant by "one rail level crossing"? Does "one rail" mean one track and if there are four tracks will they be treated as one? I presume the bill has already been drafted, and it might be important to know whether the wording in the bill will be identical with the wording in the resolution. If so, what I have to say would certainly be more important. If the wording is going to be different, it may be that the resolution can stand until we get the bill itself. In the meantime I think it would enlighten the committee to have the minister say what is meant by one rail level crossings.

Mr. DUNNING: I have a draft copy of the bill here and the provision proposed to be substituted for subsection 2 of the present act reads as follows:

The total amount of money to be apportioned, and directed and ordered by the board to be payable from any such annual appropriation shall not, in the case of any one crossing,—

Mr. BOYS: That is better.

Mr. DUNNING:

—exceed forty per cent of the cost of the actual construction work in providing such protection, safety and convenience, and shall not, in any such case, exceed the sum of $25,000, and no such money shall in any one year be applied to more than six crossings on any one railway in any one municipality, or more than once in any one year to any one crossing.

That is the actual section as drafted.

Mr. BOYS: That does, for the moment, raise the point as to what is a crossing. I have in my mind one in my own part of the country where, as a matter of fact, I think there are four tracks. I am not quite sure from that reading just how this will work out. I should think that each track would be a crossing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DUNNING: The definition of a crossing as now contained in subsection 4 will of course apply. That reads as follows:

"crossing" means any steam railway crossing of a highway, or highway crossing of a steam railway, at rail level, and every manner of construction of the railway or of the highway by the elevation or the depression of the one above or below the other, or by the diversion of the one or the other.

That answers my hon. friend. The section continues:

And any other work ordered by the board to be provided as one work of protection, safety and convenience for the public in respect of one or more railways not exceeding four tracks in all crossing or so crossed.

I have read that section three times to the lawyers in this House and they have not got it yet.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 149, to amend the Railway Act 1919.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CHICOUTIMI HARBOUR COMMISSION

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to incorporate the Chicoutimi Harbour Commissioners, and to make provision for the improvement, management and regulation of the harbour of Chicoutimi, in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. MANION: Before the resolution is carried, I am interested to know something about it in a general way. We have harbour commissions at Quebec, Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, and I should like to know why one is required at Chicoutimi?

Mr. CARDIN: It is proposed to incorporate the Chicoutimi Harbour Commissioners, more particularly in view of the development which is taking place in lake St. John and vicinity. The Chicoutimi harbour is somewhat important at the present time. Chicoutimi has a population of nearly 10,000, and in view of the development taking place in that district, it has been found necessary to place the harbour of Chicoutimi under the jurisdiction of a harbour commission.

Mr. MANION: How much money has been spent on the harbour there?

Mr. CARDIN: I could not say. It has been under the Department of Public Works.

Mr. MANION: I do not want to appear in the position of opposing the measure, but I want information. The minister says it is necessary, and it struck me as strange. There are a great many harbours on the Great Lakes where the government has spent millions of dollars and where there are no harbour commissions. The development at Chicoutimi is pulp and paper is it not?

Mr. CARDIN: No, aluminum.

Mr. MANION: I cannot imagine that one industry at Chicoutimi would make the harbour compare with the harbours on the Great Lakes where they are handling coal. I have no objection personally however. What is the intention of the government in regard to the harbour commission? Is there any hope of it being self-supporting?

Mr. CARDIN: We hope it will be.

Mr. MANION: From dues collected in the harbour?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MANION: Is there anything in the bill which will be based on the resolution providing for expenses?

Mr. CARDIN: The expenses will be met by the harbour commission.

Mr. MANION: But the commission will have no money until it is collected by them. Will there be any advances by the government?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We must not assume too quickly that the minister is 100 per cent right. He is not asking for any advance this session, but next session or the following session he will be asking for it. It will be just the same as Three Rivers. Does my hon. friend remember the nice discussion we had when Three Rivers wanted to get a commission, and our genial friend, who is now in another chamber, was very much in favour of it? I think he found that it was a regular nuisance. We know there is the matter of necessity. Somebody wants a job in connection with the harbour commission. It is a great necessity sometimes to supply the job.

Mr. CARDIN: Is the hon. member speaking from experience?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh yes, but I was always able to withstand the pressure. We never incorporated one harbour commission while I was in office. My hon. friend is not quite so successful in that respect as I fortunately was. The minister is quite right in asking me about that matter. Of course we experienced the same thing. People want patronage here and jobs there all over the country, and every now and again the government falls for it. I think hon. members will agree with me that we have larger harbours without commissions and harbours where the government has spent considerable sums of money. What really is the idea of having this commission? Must we give it to Chicoutimi because Three Rivers got it three years ago? Is that the real idea?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the real necessity?

Mr. CARDIN: We believed that the affairs of the port could be administered to better advantage by a commission in close contact with the harbour at Chicoutimi and familiar with the conditions there. We 5 p.m. thought that preferable to sending someone from the department down there to look after the affairs of this port. I am quite sure the harbour is going to take care of itself, in view of the development, as Three Rivers has done. We have not advanced any money to Three Rivers up to the present time, and I am informed they have a surplus. We expect great developments will take place around lake St. John, and if later on they come to parliament asking for any assistance they will probably be in a position to show that they are capable of paying interest on the money we may advance to them. It may be that the government has made large expenditures in places where there have been no harbour commissioners, but I think hon. gentlemen will agree that the request in this case is legitimate.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. MANION: Unquestionably it is legitimate so long as it does not involve the people of Canada in any expense. I would point out to the minister however that large sums have been spent in harbours, much more important than that of Chicoutimi, without any reference at all to harbour commissions. Take for instance one of the most important harbours in the whole Dominion, a harbour through which probably more freight is shipped than through Montreal, even. I refer to the head of the lakes, were 80 or 90 per cent of the grain of western Canada is handled, not to mention coal going west and all package freight westbound which does not go via the Panama canal. That harbour is immense and some $14,000,000 has been spent on it; yet there has never been a harbour commission there. It is obvious therefore that very much can be done without the assistance of a commission. Howver, if it pleases the people of Chicoutimi to have a harbour commission, I have no objection, although it would be rather a different matter if we were asked later on to pay the expenses of that commission. The construction of public works is of course another question.

Mr. BOYS: What is the present revenue of Chicoutimi?

Mr. CARDIN: I have not the figures under my hand, but I shall give them when the bill is before the committee.

Mr. BOYS: Unless the revenue were substantial I should not think this would be a paying proposition, and if it is to be made at all appreciable there will be imposed on those using the wharves an additional burden.

Mr. TOLMIE: What sized ships use the harbour now?

Mr. CARDIN: All ocean liners can get into the port, and they go there for pulp, coal, aluminum and other things necessary for development purposes.

Mr. TOLMIE: Can the harbour accommodate a vessel of eight or ten thousand tons?

Mr. CARDIN: I think so.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the population of Chicoutimi?

Mr. CARDIN: Ten thousand.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the depth of water at the docks?

Mr. CARDIN: Thirty feet, at least.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister tell us on what principle, in his opinion, harbour commissioners should be appointed? When should we have harbour commissioners, and when not? Can he tell us whether it is a question of asking for them and, if so, how many times the request must be made and reinforced? Or whether it is a question of a number of gentlemen having to insist upon it and, if so, how many gentlemen? Or whether it is a matter of tonnage and so forth? In other words, on what basis does the minister recommend the appointment of harbour commissions?

Mr. CARDIN: I recommend the establishment of the commission because I am disposed to accept the representations of the people residing in the district. I may assure my hon. friend that although I am interested in the port of Sorel, where I live, we have no harbour commission, nor do I propose asking for the incorporation of one.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why not?

Mr. CARDIN: I do not think it is necessary at the present time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Again, why not?

Mr. CARDIN: I am satisfied with what we have. In the case of Chicoutimi, however, the request has been very pressing and I do not see any objection.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How does the tonnage at Chicoutimi compare with the tonnage at Sorel?

Mr. CARDIN: It is probably about the same in each case, but unfortunately there are not as many boats going to Sorel as there are to Chicoutimi.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, then, if the tonnage is approximately the same we are to infer—what I thought was really the fundamental reason—that someone has been pressing for this commission. I have no doubt of course that my hon. friend feels safe at Sorel, and it is therefore not necessary for him to bother his head about harbour commissions or harbour commissioners. Indeed, that would be another reason why he would not want to ask for a commission for Sorel. Apparently however he is more interested in the fate of the chief whip (Mr. Casgrain), and so there are to be harbour commissioners at Chicoutimi.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is not in my district.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is in the vicinity.

Mr CASGRAIN: I have the honour to represent the constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay and not Chicoutimi.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member's district is on the Saguenay.

Mr. BROWN: Guess again.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) know where Saguenay is? It is the constituency adjoining that of the chief whip, who is naturally concerned in his neighbour's welfare. He has that neighbourly feeling which the hon. member for Lisgar shows for so many people who think in the same way as he does. As I say, my hon. friend (Mr. Cardin) is safe in Sorel, and so he does not ask for a commission there; but as the people of Chicoutimi are urging this upon the government they are going to get a commission.

Mr. BURY: Is there any body that exercises any control over harbour commissioners in respect of harbour rates, and so on, just as the Board of Railway Commissioners does over the railways in respect of railway rates?

Mr. CARDIN: The Department of Marine has fixed certain minimum rates which may be increased by the harbour commission, but all such increased rates must be submitted to the department and confirmed by the Governor in Council.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cardin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 150, respecting the Chicoutimi Harbour Commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 97, to amend the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 1—Schedule amended.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps at this point the minister can conveniently explain the bill.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, the bill is for the purpose of making some changes in the boundaries of the various forest reserves in the four western provinces where we are withdrawing agricultural land that was originally included in the reserves, and in other cases land that is not fit for agricultural purposes we are adding to the reserves. The withdrawals from the forest reserves in Saskatchewan amount to 167.27 square miles, and the additions to 15.40 square miles. The largest withdrawals are from the forest reserves of Saskatchewan because in the north, by mistake, we incorporated within the Porcupine and Pasquia reserves a considerable area of land that turns out to be good agricultural land. As soon as it is withdrawn it will be thrown open for homesteading. Very careful inspection has been made of these lands, and we think it would be beneficial both from the agricultural standpoint and from the standpoint of forestry to make these changes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This bill is doing two things, if I understand the minister aright, additions and withdrawals.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it all done under the same section?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Under the same bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I see only one section.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It defines all lands added and all lands withdrawn.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can my hon. friend tell us what is added and what is withdrawn? What does paragraph 1 do?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The main withdrawals in Saskatchewan are from the Porcupine forest reserve No. 2, and the Pasquia forest reserve, and total 158 square miles. This strip is located partly in the Porcupine and partly in the Pasquia forest reserves. These withdrawals are considered advisable owing to the fact that areas with soil suitable for agricultural development, but covered with a dense stand of merchantable timber, were included in the reserves in order that proper fire protection might be afforded. Now that a large percentage of the timber has been removed, and the soil is of good quality, it is deemed advisable to make these areas available for settlement. Then the additions—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not see in the bill which is a withdrawal and which is an addition. That is what is puzzling me.

Mr. BURY: For the purpose of easy reference later, it seems to me it would have been advisable to have kept the withdrawals and the additions in separate sections. In the withdrawal of this land and opening it for homesteading is there any danger of encouraging the movement of homesteading away from railways, and thus intensifying the old evil?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is no such danger so far as the Porcupine reserve No. 2 is concerned, from which we are eliminating an extensive area. I think I have a report of the acreage of the sections which will be withdrawn.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In paragraph 1 are we subtracting or adding?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I must frankly confess that I cannot tell my hon. friend. I have particulars in my notes of the subtractions. Clearly there is an oversight in the drafting of the bill; it should have been definitely stated whether a withdrawal or an addition was being made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is proposed to withdraw from the Porcupine reserve certain areas, particulars of which I can furnish the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Which paragraph covers it?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Undoubtedly it is paragraph 1.

Mr. BOYS: I do not think there is any doubt, Mr. Chairman, that you are adding, because I observe the closing part refers to an area of "187.75 square miles," which is to be struck out and "189.80 square miles" substituted. This would indicate the territory has been increased.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. I frankly confess it is not very illuminating to a layman.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is worse to a lawyer, for he is not a good guesser; he must follow the wording.

Mr. BURY: Would it not be possible to have a map of the original reserves with the added and subtracted sections marked?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have them very clearly set out in my notes. I can give the sections withdrawn for homesteading from the Porcupine reserve. The additions to that reserve are small. We propose to add the northwest quarter of section 13 and the northwest quarter of section 25, comprising .5 square miles. The withdrawals are considerable in number, because this is the one reserve where we appear to have included a considerable amount of agricultural land.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Have you an index to your notes so you can tell us which section deals with White Mouth river, for example?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): White Mouth river is in Manitoba.

Mr. BURY: We should have more accurate knowledge of what is proposed to be done in this bill, or we might just as well give the government carte blanche to do what they like. The explanatory note here might very well have embodied what is proposed section by section. For instance, paragraph 1 of the explanatory note might have given us a brief statement of what section 1 of the bill does; it adds so many sections and takes away so many sections; the note might continue in the same way through the bill, but as it is now it is virtually valueless.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The difficulty is that the bill has been drawn as an amendment to the forest reserves act. I have the proposals here in quite concrete form, taking Manitoba first. The present area of the Sandilands reserve is 187.75 square miles; we are making there an addition of 1.55 square miles, which makes a total of 189.30 square miles.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is an addition?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. In Turtle Mountain it remains the same; in Riding Mountain—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are rid of paragraph 1; my hon. friend says we are to make an addition there. Then paragraph 2 reads:

> Paragraph three of the said schedule is amended by inserting the figure "9" preceded and followed by a comma after the figure "2" in the twentieth line of the said paragraph.

What is the effect of that change?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask if the settlers along the Sandilands reserve know anything about these changes?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is no change in the Sandilands reserve except the addition of 1.55 square miles; there is no change in Turtle Mountain—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I misunderstood it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In Duck Mountain we are eliminating 19.80 square miles, so the total area is now 1,426 square miles instead of 1,446. In Porcupine No. 1 there is no change. That covers Manitoba. The biggest change is in Saskatchewan.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have sent for the act, to see if we can make anything out of the amendment with the act before us.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Will the minister give us the changes in Saskatchewan?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. In Porcupine No. 2 we are eliminating 79.25 square miles and adding .50 square miles, which makes the total 2,791 square miles. The Duck Mountain reserve remains the same; the Elbow reserve is the same and Beaver Hill the same.

Mr. BURY: Would the minister just give us the sections instead of the names, because we have nothing to show what section relates to Duck Mountain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In Saskatchewan it is proposed to add the northwest quarter of section 13 and the northwest quarter of section 25, township 36, range 32, west of the first meridian. It is proposed to withdraw the following: the southwest quarter of section 4, township 36, range 31, west of the first meridian; sections 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17 and 18 and the south half and northwest quarter of section 15, in township 44, range 3; that portion of township 44, range 4, lying north of the Red Deer river; that portion of township 43, range 7, which is included in the reserve; all of township 44, range 7 except legal subdivision 7 of section 18; sections 6, 7 and the west half of section 18, township 44, range 11; all being west of the second meridian and comprising 79.25 square miles. From the Pasquia forest reserve it is proposed to withdraw township 45, range 3, sections 19, 20, 29, 30, 31, and 32; township 45, range 4, all that portion of the township which is included in the reserve; township 45, range 7, sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 and those portions of sections 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12 and of the south half and northeast quarter of section 7 lying south of the southern boundary of the Canadian National railway right of way; township 45, range 9, sections 13 to 36 inclusive; township 45, range 10, sections 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 20, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 34, 35 and 36, the south half of section 17, the south half of section 19, the south half and northeast quarter of section 21 and the east half of section 28.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think I can give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bury) the information he desires. The first paragraph relates to the Sandilands forest reserve. Paragraph 2 of our present act relates to paragraph 3 of the original act, having to do with the Spruce Woods forest reserve; then paragraph 3 of our bill refers to paragraph 4 of the schedule, which is the Riding Mountain forest reserve. If the minister will just mark these in his bill he will be able to give us more information. Then paragraph 4 of our bill refers to the Duck Mountain forest reserve. Paragraph 5 refers to Porcupine Forest Reserve No. 2.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is the big withdrawal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Paragraph 6 refers to Moose Mountain forest reserve; paragraph 7 deals with Pasquia forest reserve; paragraph 8 with Keppel forest reserve; paragraph 9 with Fort a la Corne forest reserve; paragraph 10, with Nisbet forest reserve; paragraph 11, with Pines forest reserve; paragraph 12, with Cypress Hills forest reserve No. 2; paragraph 13, with Manitou forest reserve; paragraph 14, with the Rocky Mountains forest reserve; paragraph 15, with the Larch Hills forest reserve; paragraph 16, with the Fly Hill forest reserve; paragraph 17, with the Monte Hills forest reserve; paragraph 18, with the Niskonlith forest reserve; paragraph 19, with the Hat Creek forest reserve; paragraph 20, with the Shuswap forest reserve.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the minister tell us where the Fly Hill forest reserve is?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is proposed to withdraw legal subdivisions 9 and 10 of section 7, township 21, range 11, west of the sixth meridian.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister any idea where that is?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It must be near the Niskonlith forest reserve.

Mr. FRASER: Is the minister adding areas to these reserves?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, only the small withdrawals I mentioned.

Mr. FRASER: And no additions?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the Shuswap to be a new one altogether?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a new one entirely.

[Mr. C A. Stewart.]

Mr. FRASER: Do these changes in any way affect the rights of the trapper to catch fur in the reserves?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. FRASER: In no way at all?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, the same laws prevail within the reserve as outside. The provincial law prevails with respect to hunting and trapping.

Mr. FRASER: It is different from the park reserves.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Quite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who are the officers who have recommended all these alterations?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, the Forestry officials take the responsibility, but the investigations are made by the officers of the department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which ones?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The officers in the various provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The officers of the provinces?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, the officers of the federal government, the forestry officials.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which officials though?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The officials under the control of Messrs. Finlayson and Cameron. I cannot tell my hon. friend who the local officials are throughout the provinces who actually do the reconnaissance work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Messrs. Finlayson and Cameron have not examined the ground themselves.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. BURY: Is it the intention to open up the agricultural land at once or merely to hold it in reserve?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As soon as the bill is passed and the lands are withdrawn they will be listed for settlement.

Mr. BURY: How close are they to a railway and to other settlers?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot give my hon. friend that information. A demand has been made to have them opened, and in response to that request an inspection was made last summer. The decision to withdraw the land was arrived at after inspection. As a matter of fact there are no closed areas, whether they be near or distant from railways, anywhere for homesteading. Therefore,

I did not think it was material to bring any data as to distance, and in the present case I have not got the exact distance of the land from a railway. This will simply be an addition to other lands that are in the vicinity. We do know that some of these withdrawals are quite close to the railway.

Mr. BURY: My only point is this: We recognize now that it was a mistaken policy to throw distant sections open to homesteading and have people go away up into the Peace river, to settle hundreds of miles from a railway, and almost starve until they could get railway accommodation. There is now no holding up of lands open for homesteading, I recognize that, but what I have in mind is this: If the old policy was a faulty one, are you not—in so far as these lands which are far from railways and far from settlement are concerned—increasing the evil? It is true you cannot hold up land that is open for homesteading, but if you keep these lands still in the forest reserve you yet accomplish the same result as holding them up from settlement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If I may say so I think my hon. friend is unduly alarmed. There is no demand for withdrawal of lands from forest reserves until settlement surrounds them as a rule. It is not the desire to select pieces of land in forest reserves for homesteading when there is open land about them. But when settlement has taken place around the reserves we get requests to open up these areas.

Mr. BURY: That is the way in which the homestead areas like those of the Peace river and the Grand Prairie have increased in settlement. An old settlement was there and because of the presence of a little settlement the population grew, and at first there were no homestead restrictions. Now, you may have a slight settlement round these particular areas in the forest reserve, you may have enough settlement to induce more settlement; but if they are far from railways, and cannot come within decent railway distance for some considerable time, is it wise to encourage further settlement in those particular areas? That is all I am asking.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Porcupine No. 2, from which the largest number of withdrawals was made, is practically surrounded by settlement, and the demand has come to thicken up the settlement there rather than to have it take place farther away In that particular case I know there will be no request for railway communication, and it will not be an isolated settlement.

Mr. FRASER: I understand the extension of the Shuswap reserve is for forestry purposes, not for agricultural purposes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is for the preservation of these lands for forestry purposes purely and simply. But what we have been discussing is the withdrawal of land from the forest reserves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister intend to have any more forestry weeks?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I noticed that the last week was no sooner over than a forest fire started.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The good Lord makes the weather, not the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has been the extent of the destruction?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have not received any report. I understand that in Manitoba there have been some very bad fires, I think probably the worst, but I have no report as to the extent of the destruction.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time? Now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, Mr. Speaker, not the third reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the House.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

HOUSE PROTECTIVE SERVICE

REPORT OF BOARD OF INTERNAL ECONOMY—MR. SPEAKER

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the House proceeds with the next order of business I desire by unanimous leave to read the report which I have prepared in consequence of a meeting of the Board of Internal Economy this morning:

With regard to the complaints arising out of the action of the Sergeant-at-Arms in taking means to prevent theft in the members' rooms, the matter was brought before the Board of Internal Economy this morning.

After hearing Colonel Bowie's explanation and considering his memorandum, the board was of opinion that he acted in good faith, his sole object being to protect the property of members. Since the opening of the session, different objects, and sometimes money, have disappeared from desks in the members' rooms. It is a well known fact that there are several keys for each room, some of which are for the char service and secretaries, messengers and pages. A patrol has always been carried out for fire protection and other services such as heating, light, et cetera. The emergency order given by the Sergeant-at-Arms on May 1st was not, as has been stated, for the purpose of raiding liquor in the rooms. The law allows anyone to have liquor in his possession, provided it is obtained legally or purchased from an authorized vendor.

It was because of several complaints that the above order was given. Unfortunately it was not written and the officer to whom it was intrusted, instead of carrying it out himself, with proper caution, passed it on to a subordinate who, in turn, gave it to another constable. The men who made the search found, in unlocked desks, several objects besides liquor, which they labelled and took over to the constables' quarters.

In view of the wrong impression caused by this urgent measure of protection, I have given instruction, after consulting my colleagues of the Board of Economy that, in future, none but the usual patrol will take place and members will have to accept the responsibility for the safeguarding of their personal effects in their desks and filing cabinets.

A fictitious and libellous list has been circulated purporting to give the names of the members in whose rooms the effects were found. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police has been requested to inquire as to how it originated.

Action will be taken as soon as the report is received.

Undue importance was given to this incident which, after all, was nothing but a measure of protection unfortunately magnified and aggravated by the circumstance that it seemed connected with the infraction of the temperance act.

Regarding the claim of extra territoriality raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) as applied to parliament buildings, it is a very big question which requires careful study and consideration. I may, however, state in a general way that the immunities, rights and privileges of parliament are of immemorial standing and, according to Anson, page 153, it has always been admitted by the courts that the House has the exclusive right "to regulate its own internal concerns."

I think this will put an end to an incident that, as I say, has been unduly magnified.

SUPPLY

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Miscellaneous—amount required for remission of excise tax paid on automobiles remaining in the hands of dealers and unsold, at the time when such tax was repealed by order in council, December 18, 1920, P.C. 1/3163, $1,690,000.

Hon. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs and Excise): Mr. Chairman, this item was inserted for the purpose of remitting to the automobile dealers of Canada the luxury tax which they had paid to the Dominion government in 1920, when the tax was removed by order in council without any effective provision having been made to recoup the dealers for the amount which they had paid to the Dominion government, but which they had not yet collected through the sale of their cars. I think the matter is well understood by the House, a very elaborate statement, I am informed, having been prepared by the Retail Automobile Dealers' Association of Canada and mailed to every hon member. I understand there is unanimity concerning this refund. I am quite willing to answer any questions as to the number of cars or the amount of the claims. It might perhaps be well to place upon Hansard a short history of the reason for the refund.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): At the commencement the minister might say why the government delayed so long in making this refund.

Mr. BOIVIN: For the same reason that my hon. friends who sit on the other side of the House delayed making the refund from the date the order in council was passed in December, 1920, until they went out of power in 1921, a year later.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): We had but one year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was that reason?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am informed that it was an effort to arrange a settlement between the automobile dealers and the automobile manufacturers under a certain verbal agreement which had been entered into between their respective representatives at the time the luxury tax was removed. That agreement was never carried out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: By whom?

Mr. BOIVIN: By the manufacturers. In justice to my right hon. friend and to the members of his cabinet I have just stated that they attempted to settle the matter by getting the manufacturers to indemnify the dealers when the tax was repealed The present government endeavoured to adjust the matter in the same way without drawing upon the federal treasury.

There are two questions involved. The first is, Shall the refund be made? I think everyone is agreed that this should be done. The refund will be made by the government to those parties who paid the tax, but it will be safeguarded in such a manner that that portion of the refund which has not been made up by the manufacturer to the retailer will eventually reach the retailer who paid the tax.

The other question relates to interest. The sum included in the estimate is sufficiently large to repay the entire amount of the taxes paid on all automobiles in the dealers' hands which were unsold on December 20, 1920, amounting to $1,250,000. It is estimated that the interest upon that represents approximately the balance of $440,000.

The refund, of course, is more or less of a compassionate allowance, because it is admitted by all that the government which imposed the taxation had a right to remove it, but the removal of the luxury tax, which was asked for by the automobile manufacturers of Canada, certainly caused a real hardship to the dealers. The total number of dealers affected and who submitted claims for a refund is 1,504. The lowest loss sustained by any dealer was $69.30, excluding interest to date. The highest loss of any dealer was $19,012.98; the average loss per dealer was approximately $833.33, and the total number of cars included in the claims was 7,503. The Canada Motor Car Company of Toronto has gone into liquidation and its business is being wound up. The liquidator of the concern has submitted a claim on behalf of the company and the creditors will, of course, get the benefit of the refund when it is made.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the refund in that case?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am afraid I cannot give that information to my hon. friend. I do not think I have the names of the individual dealers. It is not the practice of the department to give the amount due any particular person or partnership, and while I could give the amounts by provinces, the number of dealers, and the amount of the claims in each particular province, I am afraid I cannot give any individual names and amounts. I would have no objection to doing so in this particular case, but I do not happen to have the information.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Will the minister say how he proposes to deal with the case where the automobile manufacturer made certain refunds to the dealer?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes. That matter has been arranged through the good offices of Mr. James R. Dixon of Ottawa; two different powers of attorney have been drawn up whereby he has been authorized to represent both the manufacturers and the dealers. The manufacturer makes proof of the amount of money remitted to each individual dealer and the dealer makes proof of the amount of money paid and of the number of cars on hand in each particular case. The amount of money paid by any manufacturer to any dealer who had cars on hand will be paid to the manufacturer, and the balance will be paid to the dealers.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Is it necessary to pay interest on these claims?

Mr. BOIVIN: No. I made the amount in the estimates large enough to pay the interest, but as I said before this is more or less in the form of a compassionate allowance; it is an amount paid to men who have suffered, but who I could say have suffered "legally." They could not complain of the law; they could not take an action against the government; it is a claim in equity and a claim in justice, but it is not a claim in law. My understanding is that in all countries where allowances of this kind are paid the interest is not included. On the other hand there has been great delay and it may work a serious hardship to these men if interest is not paid. I made the amount sufficiently large to cover interest. I would welcome to-night the opinions of hon. members on both sides of the House as to whether or not interest should be paid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I remember this circumstance quite well, Mr. Chairman; it is a circumstance such as may arise at any time in the event of the removal of an excise tax. The only dangerous feature of this case is the precedent which will be set. I realize there is very great merit in the claim; of course it is not a legal claim and could never be established in law, but that the men lost the money I think there is no doubt. An excise tax is removed which they have paid prior to sale, as indeed must always be the case; then on the removal of that tax they are unable to collect it because of the competition of goods not subject to the excise; they cannot possibly collect it, and the money is simply lost. I know the government could not be compelled to pay interest; this is what one might call a grant in misericordia, but if there is a claim for the principal the claim for the interest would be just as strong, and I do not see why it should be denied.

The removal of the excise giving rise to this condition was made, I thought, a little later than the minister said, but of course I cannot recall the exact month. The claim was made some time later, and was very carefully considered at the time. The government of the day were confronted with the difficuty I have just stated; they were quite aware that in the future remissions of excise would inevitably be made and consequently feared to recognize claims of that kind because the precedent might lead us into paths very far-reaching indeed. As a matter of fact it might possibly reach into a sphere other than the removal of excise and the consequences that flow therefrom; however, I do not need to traverse that at the moment. So we started to work to find some method of getting the loss adjusted without calling upon the treasury of the country, and succeeded in having an arrangement arrived at. I am sorry the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) is not here, because he was chiefly instrumental in making the arrangement between the manufacturers on the one hand and the dealers on the other. For some reason which I do not even yet understand that arrangement was not carried through. The minister says the manufacturers failed to carry out their part of the agreement, and I accept his statement.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. BOIVIN: Could I interject just a word? It has been reported to me by the officials of the department that, as my hon. friend has stated, at the request of the hon. member for West York, who was then Minister of Finance, the representatives of dealers and of manufacturers came together at Ottawa and arrived at an understanding by which the manufacturers would recoup to the dealers on future sales 50 per cent of the excise lost on cars which were then on hand, and add the other 50 per cent to the cost of the new cars. A great many of the dealers were overloaded with cars and were unable to dispose of the quantity required to recoup themselves during that season, and I think the manufacturers contended that the agreement did not apply to subsequent years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I recall it quite well now; that is the explanation. For that reason it fell through, and the falling through was not complete at the time we left office, so the matter did not come before us for reconsideration and adjustment. I am sorry there has been so much delay in coming to a solution and I am sorry that some solution was not advanced which would relieve the treasury. However, I suppose there is none possible now with the exception of this, and for my part I support the vote.

Mr. HANSON: I am in accord with the grant, but I would like to know what portion of this money is to be paid in commissions, and if it is to be paid by the department. If this is to be a real compassionate allowance I think the dealers are entitled to get the money themselves without any rake-off.

Mr. BOIVIN: I will tell my hon. friend that the government has no knowledge of a rakeoff. I do know that Mr. Dixon of Ottawa has done a great deal of work in bringing the claims together, in getting all the dealers and manufacturers to sign the required powers of attorney and so on, but what his commission may be I have no knowledge. But I can assure my hon. friend that individual cheques will be made payable to the order of each individual dealer, and they themselves will arrange to pay their attorney. The government has no undertaking whatever to pay any commission in connection with the matter.

Mr. HANSON: That is very satisfactory. I am glad to hear the minister make that statement.

Mr. McGIBBON: What proportion of these claims was adjusted by the manufacturers?

Mr. BOIVIN: Eighty-five thousand dollars is to be returned direct to the manufacturers who have paid claims to the dealers, and the balance is to be paid to the dealers themselves.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is $85,000 of this $1,690,000?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say that $85,000 is to go to the manufacturers to recoup them for—

Mr. BOIVIN: To recoup them for the amount they refunded to the dealers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: After the old agreement it seems to be pretty generous.

Mr. BOIVIN: We felt that it would be a great hardship if we refunded the amount to the dealers and thereby gave a blanket discharge to the manufacturers who undertook to make this refund and did not live up to their obligations. We felt that the manufacturer who had really lived up to his obligation, and who had paid his proportionate share to the dealer, should be treated the same as the dealers themselves; in other words, that if we were going to remit this tax it would be unfair to reimburse some and withhold it from others; that the complete tax should be remitted, and that the manufacturer who had lived up to his agreement should not be penalized for having done so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who are the manufacturers who lived up to their agreement?

Mr. BOIVIN: I cannot give the exact amount in each case, but the following Canadian motor manufacturers made reimbursement at least to a certain extent where the dealers were able to purchase new cars:

The Canadian Briscoe Motor Company.
The Chevrolet Motor Company.
The McLaughlin Motor Company.
The Willys-Overland Company.
The Olds Motor Company of Canada.
The Maxwell Motor Company.
The Chalmers Motor Company.
The Ford Motor Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What others are left out?

Mr. BOIVIN: The Studebaker Company did not reimburse its dealers for any portion of the tax paid on the cars, and there were also subsidiary companies of American concerns who import cars into Canada and sell them here through dealers and distributors who made no refund.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It looks as though the Canadian manufacturers had acted quite fairly and rightly, and that the importers of American cars had not.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes. There was evidently an attempt on the part of these Canadian manufacturers to live up to their agreement, and I think they would have done so if the sales of cars had been sufficient. But as the dealers had on hand all the cars that they had been unable to sell, and could not take as many new cars from the Canadian manufacturers, the manufacturers only lived up to their agreements in respect to the number of new cars taken by the dealers, and that number was not large.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The American exporters to Canada made no attempt to co-operate at all?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, apparently no attempt whatever.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a great lesson to be learned there.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Some of the firms the minister mentioned have passed entirely out of business.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, I understand they have, but I understand that their interests have been taken over by other concerns that their claims are legally filed, and that all these firms are legally represented before the department.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am not opposing this in the least, but I would like to point this out to the minister: Every individual purchaser who bought his car one day or a week or a few weeks before the reduction had to pay that tax, and I think it would be quite sufficiently generous on the part of this government to reimburse the dealers for the capital only, and let them go without their interest. I do not think it is fair to pay the dealer the very last dollar and let the purchaser who bought his car just a few days before suffer the complete loss. I do not think that is fair to the ultimate purchaser of the car.

Item agreed to.

To provide for expenses of maintenance of revenue cruisers and for preventive service, $376,510.

Mr. BOIVIN: In connection with vote No. 349, on pages 61 and 62 of the Estimates, we had reached this item and I had discussed it for about a day and a half on the 16th and the 18th of March. The department has so far been unable, indeed has not even attempted to do anything, in the way of improvement or reorganization of the preventive service. I do not propose to make any change whatever in the way of reorganization or dismissals until the report of the committee at present investigating the Department of Customs is received by the House. If there is any objection on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to allowing us to carry this item, with the distinct understanding that the whole matter will be discussed again when the committee's report comes into the House, I shall not press the preventive service items, but will pass on at once to the item concerning the cost of collection of the income tax.

Mr. MANION: As one member of this House, I would like to say that I think the preventive service items should be left over.

The CHAIRMAN: The first three items in vote No. 349 have already been carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did they carry?

Mr. BOIVIN: On the 16th of March. I do not think my right hon. friend was paying attention to what I said a moment ago. I said that while it is true we had discussed this for a day and a half, no changes had been made in the preventive service, no dismissals had been made, and there was no intention at the present time to make any changes or dismissals. We are merely carrying on as best we can awaiting the report of the committee. The whole matter will be discussed when the report of the committee is before the House, and as we have already devoted almost two full days to the discussion of the estimates of this department I thought possibly hon. members opposite would allow us to carry this item with the understanding that we would merely carry on, and that the whole matter would be again discussed when the committee's report comes into the House. If my hon. friend prefers to have these three items concerning the preventive service stand until after the committee's report comes in, there is really no harm done.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Stand.

Mr. BOIVIN: Then I would move, Mr. Chairman, that further consideration of this item for $376,510 be now postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Item stands.

Mr. BOIVIN: I would ask the Chairman to call the two next items in order that I may make the same motion with respect to them and proceed in the regular way.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask if this is preparatory to closure?

Mr. BOIVIN: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no need for having the motion made to postpone except for that purpose. Simply pass on to something else.

Mr. BOIVIN: Then we will take the last item on the page:

To provide for the administration of the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and the Income War Tax Act, 1917, and amendments thereof, and authority for this purpose to create positions and make appointments, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, and the said positions and the staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the Operation of the said act; and salary of $10,000 for the Commissioner of Taxation—$2,000,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I should like to ask the minister if the employees of this branch of his department have been classified?

Mr. BOIVIN: The employees of the Income Tax branch, the same employees that we found in office when we assumed control, have been classified, but not by the Civil Service Commission. They were classified by a committee of the officers of the Income Tax branch. The classification has been arrived at, and regular salaries have been fixed for the different grades and the different classes of employees. These salaries are slightly higher than the salaries paid to employees in the other branches of the Department of Customs and Excise owing to the fact that so far they do not enjoy the benefits of superannuation as the regular civil servants do.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): When was the classification made?

Mr. BOIVIN: It was made in December, 1925.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I see that the salary of the Commissioner of Taxation is $10,000. Has that been the salary for some time, or has there been a raise recently?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, that has been the salary for some years and remains at the same figure. The number of employees in the branch at the time of the last calculation, when the estimates were submitted to parliament, was 1,057, and the salaries paid were $1,539,702.04. The balance of this item is made up of the other charges in connection with the collection of the income tax. I desire to point out to my hon. friends that this is the only item in the estimates that has anything to do with income tax collection. Everything is included. The details are as follows:

Printing and stationery	$25,699 36
Hotel and travelling expenses of inspectors and others	31,651 84
Telephone and telegraph expenses	7,182 73
Office expenses	10,296 95
Automobile hire	3,028 41
Freight and express	4,176 49
Postage	63,419 50
Advertising	39 68
Sundries	1,034 10
Excise stamps	59 50
Law costs	6,484 63

These expenses are not, of course, only for the office at Ottawa, as everyone will understand. They cover the entire 1,057 employees of the branch in all the cities of Canada where there is an inspector of taxation.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is postage placed on the returns sent from the various offices to the government?

Mr. BOIVIN: Most of these income tax returns are forwarded, of course, to the department by registered mail. All assessments have to be returned by registered mail, and it has been held that registered mail must bear the ordinary postage as well as the cost of registration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister might have done something in connection with the matter of excise stamps when he was making the other rearrangements.

9 p.m. It is one of the hardest things in the world, it goes harder against the grain than anything else, when making out a cheque for income tax to put stamps on also for the government.

Mr. BOIVIN: I gave considerable thought to that matter. The idea was expressed by members of the government that it would be well to exempt all cheques to the Receiver General of Canada from excise taxes, but I found that this would entail all kinds of unfairness in the collection of revenue. Because if income tax cheques were exempted it would be necessary to exempt customs cheques and all other cheques bringing revenue to the Dominion treasury. A great many of these cheques are paid through brokers to collectors of customs who have the right to keep accounts in trust in order that they may make speedy refunds. It was felt that if all tax payments could not be exempt from excise duty it would be unwise to exempt any at all.

Mr. HANSON: In view of the fact that the war profits act must have run its course by this time, why does the number of employees still continue to remain so high? Has there been a reduction in the number of employees and if so, over what period of years? If there has been a reduction of employees, why does the appropriation remain the same? I would have thought from the history of the offices in the province of New Brunswick where the number of employees has been very substantially reduced, that the cost of collecting this tax would have been proportionately diminished also.

Mr. BOIVIN: The cost of collecting the business profits and income taxes has been considerably reduced in recent years. The peak year in the cost of collection was the fiscal year 1921-22 when the cost was $2,214,638.28.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much did you collect that year?

Mr. BOIVIN: The amount collected in that year was $101,500,021.38, of which $22,815,666.58 were collected under the Business Profits War Tax Act. The cost of collection that year happened to be 2.18 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is the lowest, I think, of any of them.

Mr. BOIVIN: In 1919-20 it was a little lower; it was 1.78. In 1922-23 it came up to 2.80. In 1923-24 it was 3.28 and in 1924-25, it was 2.87. The actual cost, however, has diminished. In 1921-22 the sum of $2,214,638.28 was paid, but in the following year it was reduced to $2,040,461.08. For the fiscal year 1923-24 the cost of collection was reduced to $1,935,274.96. Last year it was further reduced to $1,693,025.23. There is a gradual reduction, which means that there is a gradual falling off in the number of employees required, and we hope that under the amended income tax, in connection with which the returns will be less intricate, a further saving will be made.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How many employees are there in this work, and by whom are they appointed?

Mr. BOIVIN: There are in this work in Ottawa 186 employees, and in the entire Dominion 1,057.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How were they appointed?

Mr. BOIVIN: It would be hard to tell how they were appointed, because they were practically all appointed by my hon. friend's friends when they were in power.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very good appointments.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am told, and I have no reason to doubt the statement, that they were appointed by the inspectors of taxation, under the authority of the then Minister of Finance. None of them has ever been dismissed for any political reason, and they are still in office. Those who have been required to replace them were appointed in the same way, by the inspectors of taxation upon the authority of the Minister of Finance, until last year when the branch was transferred to the Department of Customs, and since that time on the recommendation of the Minister of Customs.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The appointments were made on the request of the Minister of Finance at the time, or about the time, the Victory loans were started. He felt that the responsibility for the success of that loan depended upon his department, and that, on account of the weight of the responsibility, he should supervise the appointments, in order to be certain that everything was efficient. That may have held good then, but is it the intention for all time to continue this method and not to allow the Civil Service Commission to have anything to say in regard to this particular branch?

Mr. BOIVIN: In connection with this particular branch we found that the method has worked out so very satisfactorily in the matter of expense and collection of revenue that we thought it would be better not to interfere, but that we should leave matters as they were. It has been pointed out that a large majority of these employees have to come in contact with the tax paying public of Canada, and that the inspectors of taxation in the respective cities where these offices are established, are better judges of the men who will be able more efficiently to perform the work, meet the taxpayer, and, let me say, collect the money without trouble, without inconvenience and without recrimination on the part of the taxpayer, than if they were appointed by a Civil Service Commission sitting at Ottawa.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friend agrees with that?

Mr. BOIVIN: I certainly do.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): So do I. Therefore I do not see any reason why the same rule should not be applied in reference to other appointments, instead of having them made by the Civil Service Commission. This work was very satisfactorily performed indeed when the Civil Service Commission had nothing to do with it. The minister says it is a fine system and they are getting along well, and I contend they would get along well in many other branches if the same system were adopted.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It seems clear that both the old parties are unanimously agreed when it comes to a question of returning to patronage.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Which old parties?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The one my hon. friend belongs to and the party to which the minister belongs.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does the hon. member not call the group to which he belongs a party?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am opposed, as I always have been, to the exclusion of the Income Tax branch from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. I think the sooner we apply the merit system to all our public services the sooner we will have a satisfied civil service. Turn to England, the country to which hon. gentlemen look for a good deal of their precedents—

Mr. HANSON: What about Ireland?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): —and you will find that in that country no member of parliament, no minister, ever attempts to interfere with the appointment of civil servants. It simply is not done. That is the ideal state, and that is the condition to which I hope at some time in the future the people of Canada will arrive.

Mr. McGIBBON: Was it on my hon. friend's recommendation that those who will take the western census were appointed?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes. At the very time the minister suggested the appointment, I asked why they were not under the Civil Service Commission, and he told me they were temporary appointments made once every five years. I said, "I do not care whether they are or not, all appointments of this kind should be under the Civil Service Commission".

Mr. HANSON: But you made the appointment?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, it was much better for one who is a non-partisan to make the appointment.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): He made the appointment and went round with these same fellows at election time and reminded them of it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I have made no criticism of this matter, but my only reason for asking a few questions at the beginning was that lately I think the appointments have been political, whereas previously they were not. I should like to ask the minister if there have been any opinions expressed by the employees of this department as to whether they would prefer to come under the Civil Service Commission or stay outside?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, there have been expressions of opinion. Some of the employees of the Income Tax branch, those who are sure of their positions and practically certain that they will remain in office as long as the collection of the tax continues have expressed a wish to be brought under the Civil Service Commission, not for the purpose of having their salaries arranged by the Civil Service Commission, but for the purpose of enjoying superannuation. It has been pointed out to them however—not to them in a body but to certain individuals—that if they desire to come under the Civil Service Commission, and if the government ever takes that step, and it is possible to do it without making new appointments under the act as it stands at the present time, they are liable to suffer considerable reduction in salary, because the salaries are higher than in other departments where the benefits of superannuation are enjoyed.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Does the minister not find some difficulty where these employees are in the same offices with the Customs department officials, when you have in the same building practically three sets of employees getting different rates of pay?

Mr. BOIVIN: I thank my hon. friend for asking the question. There is no connection whatever between the other branches of the Department of Customs and Excise and the Income Tax branch. The Income Tax branch is continued as a separate branch, as it has been since its inception.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): My hon. friend has not grasped my question. I understand they are independent of each other, but they are in the same building, one working in the Income Tax branch, and the other in the Customs branch..

An hon. MEMBER: Not in Ottawa.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am not talking of Ottawa. There are other places besides Ottawa. When some people get here they think there is only one city in the country. In my own city they are in the same building, and I ask the minister if, where they are in the same building under different heads, there is not some complaint where the grades of pay are different.

Mr. BOIVIN: There was for some time some complaint before the classification. There were employees who, while they were doing the same work, were not receiving quite the same pay. That discrimination has been removed. I have received no complaint in regard to the point raised by my hon. friend. The officers of this branch realize the advantages they have over their confreres in the other department of the service, and so far there has been perfect harmony.

Mr. BOYS: How many employees covered by these items are excluded from the operation of the act?

Mr. BOIVIN: They are all excluded—1,057.

Mr. BOYS: Does that refer to the $100,000 item and the $2,000,000?

Mr. BOIVIN: What does my hon. friend mean by the $100,000 item?

Mr. BOYS: On page 62 the minister will see an item of $2,000,000 and immediately preceding it one of $100,000, and apparently the staffs under those items are to be wholly excluded from the act. I wanted to know whether the employees are affected by both votes.

Mr. BOIVIN: We have been discussing the employees in the Income Tax branch, who number 1,057. They are all affected by the $2,000,000 vote. The $100,000 is for secret preventive service and by mutual agreement, that has been allowed to stand.

Mr. BOYS: I am not quarrelling with that. I simply want to know the number of employees affected.

Mr. BOIVIN: By the previous vote?

Mr. BOYS: Yes.

Mr. BOIVIN: I can give the hon. gentleman the information, but it has nothing to do with this vote.

Mr. BOYS: Never mind, then. As regards the exclusion of civil servants from the operation of the Civil Service Act, we should have one thing or the other: either bring all civil servants within the scope of the act or do away with the act. I am told that there are over 18,000 civil servants who are not under the act. I am not sure of the exact percentage but I believe there are about one-third of the total number of employees who are not subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Act. I do submit that, having gone that length in the removal of civil servants from the operation of the act, we should either abolish the whole thing and get back to patronage or reform the service and put all employees on the same footing with respect to the regulations. The present system is unsatisfactory; it is neither one thing nor the other.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I feel I must say something in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) whose aptitude for coming to conclusions is exceedingly swift, indeed precipitate, if not sure. The hon. gentleman undoubtedly can reach conclusions, but he has not so great an ability to steer a direct logical course towards his goal. One hon. member on this side of the House spoke in favour of a return to the old system and a minister of the crown gave encouragement to the idea: whereupon the hon. member for Bow River concludes we in this party have transfigured ourselves just as hon. gentlemen opposite have done.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I always exempt my right hon. friend from that charge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member while exempting me may exempt the party as well.

Mr. BOIVIN: I hope my right hon. friend does not meean to convey the impression that I have expressed the idea that there should be a return to patronage.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said that the minister lent encouragement to the view advanced by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington.

Mr. BOIVIN: The hon. member asked me whether I was in favour of that system so far as the branch under discussion was concerned, and I said I was.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is considerable encouragement.

Mr. BOIVIN: The leader of the opposition countenanced the system while he was in power.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I shall come to that in a moment. The general opinion was voiced by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington and it certainly met with no rebuke or modification at the hands of the minister. The minister has given encouragement not only to the continuance of the employees of the Income Tax branch outside the scope of the act, but to the bedevilment of the whole civil service and of the Civil Service Act ever since his party came into power. The whole history of this government in relation to the Civil Service Act has been one of stealthy invasion from the first clause to the last and from the first month of power to the last day. I know that as respects the employees of the Income Tax branch they were, when taken on during the regime of the late government, maintained without the operation of the act, just as were the employees of the Civil Re-establishment department. These departments were established at a time when it was believed that their duration would be quite brief, and that consequently it would not be just to the service in general to bring them within the act and make them permanent civil servants, thereby giving them a claim upon permanent occupation within the civil service of Canada. If hon. gentlemen will project their minds back to the rather hectic days when the income tax was first introduced and, as well, to the time when the Civil Re-establishment department was put on its feet, they will recall that it was the general feeling then that these were merely emergency services which it was necessary to undertake for the time being. For that reason and for no other were these employees kept without the pale of the Civil Service Act. It was not intended that they should have any claim for permanent appointment within the service. But so far as the Income Tax branch is concerned, we know quite well by this time that we shall have an income tax in Canada for years to come. This government will have gone; its memory will have become nothing but an unpleasant historic recollection, and we shall still have the income tax in this country. So that whatever reason did exist before for maintaining these employees outside the scope of the act, that reason is now removed. The government have not been satisfied to maintain the income tax employees as patronage or temporary servants outside the pale of the act, but step by step, sometimes by stealth, sometimes openly, they have yanked one branch after another from the purview of the act, occasionally by order in council removing a thousand at a stretch and, indeed, as many as 12,000. The result is that to-day one-third of the whole service is outside the act. I want to pay hon. gentlemen to my left this compliment: there would not be one line of the act in force to-day if it were not for the influence of the Progressive party. With one or two exceptions they have been opposed to these encroachments upon the act and certainly they never doubted that we would stand by the act.

Mr. BOIVIN: What party was in power when the Spinney bill was introduced?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We were in power when that bill was introduced, and by the terms of the Spinney bill we abide. But the Spinney bill provided only for such cases, of a character defined by the act, as were recommended by the Civil Service Commission. But hon. gentlemen opposite, who fought that bill tooth and nail when in opposition, when they got into power not only adopted it but extended it beyond its legal effect. That is what they did. If it were not for gentlemen of the Progressive party they would have set a match to the act, but they feared that they might lose the support of those hon. gentlemen—I am not so sure that they would have lost it—and so they were kept in restraint. The gun was held at the head of the government. I do not think it would have gone off so long as the trigger was under the finger of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). The hon. member would not shoot a rat if it had a Liberal tag around its neck. Anyway there were certain of them who they thought would stand by the merit system in the civil service, and that is the only reason in the world why there is a line of the act left to-day.

Now, how long is the government going to take to collect these business profits taxes? The act imposing them has been repealed six or seven years. I would not suggest that any person employed in the collection of business profits taxes should be put under the Civil Service Act. Surely we will get to the end of it some day, but any little job at all seems to be a life job when it gets into the hands of this administration. They are collecting these business profits taxes yet, and I expect they will be collecting them until they pass from this earthly scene.

And there is something else they are after. I notice in the estimates an item for the adjustment of war debts. This in our day was called demobilization. "Demobilization" was defined by the law as the "adjustment of war debts." But we were tilted at away back in 1919 and were asked to explain to parliament why it was we had not all these war debts adjusted, and we were told the reason was that we wanted to keep up the war spirit in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite are still adjusting those war debts. They have been adjusting them now for four and a half years. They have in the estimates an item of $275,000 for the purpose. When in the name of common sense do they expect ever to get rid of those war debts? Will they be keeping them going until the next election? Is it a handy thing to adjust these debts just before an election?

But on the subject of income tax I warn the government that this country is not going to tolerate the conduct of any administration that reverses the will of the people as expressed in the Civil Service Act. Hon. members say the employees are satisfied because they get a little more. In that very fact lies one of the main reasons of the act. Unless you have one common body having under its purview all the multiplied branches of the civil service, and able to make a study and estimate the relative difficulty of the variety of duties in the various departments of government, and the relative talent required for their discharge, you are never going to have anything that approaches equity in the distribution of the salary list; you will have all kinds of anomalies and inequalities. Anomaly exists to-day, inequality exists to-day in relation to the service outside. This will become more and more rampant as the government pursues its headlong course of abolishing letter by letter, line by line and page by page the Civil Service Act. I should like the hon. minister to get the opinion of the civil servants of this city and the country generally on the course the government has pursued in relation to the act. I warn the administration that so far as my influence goes I will resist to the uttermost any further invasion of its provisions whatsoever. And I hope I can depend upon hon. gentlemen to my left—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope there are independent spirits enough among them, and I hope there are those who have learned enough of the character and conduct of this administration, that in this, if in nothing else, they will give me their best support.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of seconding a good many of the remarks made by the right hon. leader of the opposition. I am unalterably opposed to the patronage system, and I believe in the merit system. But I want to say to him that some of his remarks are not worthy of the leader of a great party in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: Hon. members may laugh. They may wonder sometimes why the right hon. gentleman does not make a little more headway in the country. Let me tell them it is because he descends to the use of such language as he uttered a few minutes ago. I have been five years in this House now, and I defy any hon. member to point to one act of mine that is in any respect dishonour-able. The right hon. gentleman can stand up there as the leader of a party and make accusations that seem to amuse his followers, but I have a political character that I think will last just as long as that of the right hon. leader of the opposition. I have stood up in this House time and again and proclaimed my independence. And I have never sacrificed my independence. I challenge hon. gentlemen to my right to tell me wherein I have said or done anything dishonourable or unworthy of a member of this House of Commons. I suppose had I turned around and supported hon. members to my right they would say I was the finest gentleman in the country. If they have any political acumen at all they would recognize that the course they have been following is certain to keep them for a long time in opposition. Let me repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I am heartily in accord with many of the remarks made by the right hon. leader of the opposition and by the member of my own party who spoke earlier in the discussion. I am unalterably opposed to the patronage system and want to have nothing whatever to do with it. Whenever the opportunity comes I shall be ready to stand behind my opinions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, I am rather surprised at the heat of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). I did not attack his honour in any way, unless he considers it such to be declared a faithful, ironclad Liberal. It was his incurable Liberal propensity to which I referred. No one who has sat in this House for the last five sessions has any doubt about that—not even the hon. member for Brandon himself. Nor did I suggest he was not a fine gentleman. He says he would be so considered if he had voted for us; but I assure him that I would never need to wait for a day in the distant future, probably in the next world, when he votes for the Conservative party, to declare him to be a fine gentleman.

Mr. FORKE: While the right hon. gentleman leads the opposition.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two in regard to the Civil Service Commission. When the creation of such a commission first came before parliament I took a stand, not against it—I have not taken that stand at any time—but I contended that it was being loaded with a lot of work which could be better performed by the individual members of parliament. And I say that yet. I took the stand then, I take it to-day, that the appointment, for instance, of a country postmaster might well be left in the hands of the member of parliament, no matter whether he sat on the government side or on this side of the House—that to leave such appointments with the Civil Service Commission was loading the commissioners with work that they were not as well qualified to perform as the members of this House, who are held responsible by their constituents for the capacity of the country postmaster who is appointed by the Civil Service Commission upon the advice of one or two persons living in the community where the postmaster resided. I have never taken a stand against the creation of the Civil Service Commission or against their doing efficient work as a Civil Service Commission. but I believe their work would be more efficient if a great deal of this more unimportant work were taken off their shoulders and performed by the members, who would be held responsible by their constituents for the appointments made. But my main objection to the Civil Service Commission, Mr. Chairman, is that during the last three or four years the commission have made appointments so far as Conservative members of parliament were concerned, whereas a certain amount of patronage has been enjoyed by those who are on the other side of the House. This is not working out fairly, and as proof of that we have some 18,000 persons in the civil service to-day who were not appointed by the Civil Service Commission. I venture to say there are members sitting on the other side of this House whose recommendations were responsible for the appointment of several thousand of these people. That is where I say it is wrong; if you are going to have these appointments made by the Civil Service Commission let the commission rule all along the line; do not let the commission appoint a part of the service and allow others to be appointed under recommendations of certain favoured members who happen to support the government. That is the logical position to take, I believe. At present the situation is absolutely unreasonable, illogical, unjust and unfair, because unquestionably people are appointed to the civil service on the recommendation of some person or persons, but not on the recommendation of anyone on this side of the House. This has been going on during the past four or five years, Mr. Chairman, and it would be interesting if the Minister of Customs or some other minister or all the ministers would furnish this House with a list of appointments made to the civil service during the last four or five years other that those made by the Civil Service Commission. I would like to see that list, and I would like to see on whose recommendation the appointments were made.

I placed a question on the order paper a few days ago to which I hope to receive an answer soon. A former member of this House, Mr. E. J. Sexsmith, who was elected as a Progressive and who, like the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) supported the Liberal government most faithfully, was rewarded for his services as a party man by a government appointment not long ago. I would like to know if that was done through the Civil Service Commission and whether he passed a competitive examination and was appointed on his merits. It is very fine in theory to talk about promotion by merit; with that I fully agree, but who is to judge as to the merits of the individual? If the Civil Service is going to judge, and if those in the civil service are to be promoted according to merit let that be done all around, but I am absolutely opposed to this farce where a part of the service is appointed through the Civil Service Commission while hundreds and thousands of others are appointed on the recommendation of some minister or member who happens to have a pull.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the hon. gentleman able to tell us to what position Mr. Sexsmith was appointed and whether he was thirty-five years of age at the time of his appointment?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I have only a newspaper report that he was appointed inspector of Indian reserves, or something like that. I do not know his age, but he is old enough to have more sense than he has so far exhibited, though he has shown some signs of the safety first spirit. He was defeated in the last election, but now we find the Liberal government appointing him, a Progressive, to office. I do not know whether the hon. member for Brandon, the Minister without portfolio in this government, had sufficient pull to get Mr. Sexsmith appointed, but perhaps we will find out when my question is answered. I venture to say, however, that the Civil Service Commission had nothing to do with it, and I would like to know who was responsible.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member has referred to Mr. Sexsmith and to the hon. member for Brandon, both of whom supported the Liberal government. I would like to ask the hon. member if he is aware of the fact that during the last four years the Conservatives voted with the government more often than did the Progressives.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I have not before me a record of the votes; it would be very hard to keep tab on my hon. friend and his friends as to how they vote. They know where we stand in regard to the government but according to their professions we do not know where hon. gentlemen to my left stand. When it comes to actual practice, however, we know that no matter what their label they are just as Gritty as any man who was ever in politics.

Mr. CLARK: I would like to point out to the minister that in certain provinces they have provincial income tax acts which are very similar to the federal act, and there is a great deal of duplication in staffs. I believe that if an effort were made the income taxes in the various provinces which have acts of their own could be collected by the same staff collecting the federal tax. I would like to ask the minister if that has been investigated and whether any steps have been taken to co-ordinate the collection of income tax in the various provinces.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes. Representations have been made to the government by the provincial treasurer of British Columbia that there might be co-operation in the work of collecting the taxes. It was never proposed to have the double tax collected in the same office, but representations have been made that some expense might be saved in the investigation of claims and in the auditing of books so far as the respective income taxes are concerned. The matter is now receiving consideration.

Mr. CLARK: Why could not the collections be made by the same staff?

Mr. BOIVIN: I did not say that it was impossible; I merely pointed out to my hon. friend that it had not been suggested. It is well worth consideration.

Mr. CLARK: I will suggest it now, if the minister wants a suggestion.

Mr. BOIVIN: I accept the suggestion with pleasure; it will certainly receive the consideration it deserves with the other matter under consideration.

Mr. HANSON: Could we have some information as to the number of claims still to be adjusted under the business profits tax? I think we should have some information in that regard. How long is it expected to be before these will be wound up?

Mr. BOIVIN: There were adjusted about 140,000 claims under the Business Profits War Tax Act. There are 848 claims still outstanding, most of which have been adjusted but which, owing to the liquidation of the companies or for other reasons, have not been finally disposed of. In other words, only 848 remain out of 140,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs and Excise—salaries, $609,940; contingencies, $40,000.

Mr. BOIVIN: The details of this item will be found on page 73. This is the usual vote for salaries and contingencies in the inside service. There is an increase of $9,390 in salaries, but on the other hand there is a decrease of $8,000 in contingencies. The civil government salaries for the year 1925-26 were $598,550, and contingencies, $48,000, making a total of $646,550. The civil government salaries for the present fiscal year are $607,940, and civil government contingencies, $40,000, making a total of $647,940, or a net increase of $1,390. The estimates for 1926-27 provide for 333 clerks, as compared with 329 clerks last year, an increase of only 4 clerks in the department. Statutory increases for 104 clerks, as provided for by the Civil Service Act, upon the recommendation of the deputy head of the department amount to $7,395. Four additional clerks who have been appointed to the accounts branch due to the fact that cheques for the outside service are now issued twice each month instead of once monthly as heretofore, cost $4,800. There is a saving due to promotions and appointments to fill vacancies where the new employees are getting the minimum salaries, instead of the maximum enjoyed by their predecessors, of $2,805.

The estimate for civil government contingencies is $8,000 less than last year. It is considered that the $40,000 will be sufficient to meet the expenditure for the ensuing year, as this is practically the amount which was expended for contingencies last year.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the $1,200 allowance to private secretaries for?

Mr. BOIVIN: There is only an allowance of $600. That is an allowance made to my private secretary.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is that for?

Mr. BOIVIN: That is an allowance given to the minister's private secretary in every department. As I understand it, it has existed for a great many years. It is an extra allowance which is paid to the private secretary for the vast amount of time which he puts in during the sessions of parliament and on other occasions when his services are required. The difference between the private secretary and other employees of the department is that the private secretary is always at the beck and call of the minister, while the other employees, of course, have their regular hours. For that reason, he is given the extra $600.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend gave some figures as to the reduction in salaries due to the new appointees being appointed at a lower remuneration, a reduction of some $2,800. My hon. friend, I am sure, would like to make his picture complete. In order that these new appointments can be made, a certain amount of cost has to be incurred in the way of pensions, superannuation, and the like. What was the amount of pensions and superannuation paid out in order to secure this saving of $2,800?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am sorry I do not happen to have those figures with me at the present time. I did give them to my hon. friend, and he will find them in Hansard of March 16th. I gave him those figures when we were discussing the salaries before, and told him at the time that they covered both the inside and the outside service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was just wondering what the comparison was. We here have the net figure of $2,800 given by my hon. friend, due to reductions in salaries by reason of new appointments. In order to make the picture complete, we ought to have also the exact amount paid out in pensions, superannuation or retiring allowances, or whatever it was, that gave rise to these vacancies.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am afraid that I am not able to give that information to my hon. friend just now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend see any chance of effecting any economies whatever in the service?

Mr. BOIVIN: Of course the service of the Department of Customs is growing all the time. The preventive service will necessarily cost more money in years to come, and I think that the report of the committee which is now investigating the Department of Customs may very likely recommend an increase. That increase, however, will not affect this inside service vote. While it may not be possible to make any decrease, I do think that it will be possible for several years to come to keep the expenditure of the Department of Customs, in so far as the civil government vote is concerned at about the same figure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend will find that there has been a considerable increase in the expenditure of his department since 1921. Of course, my hon. friend at that time was occupying a highly judicial position and did not himself take a very active part in what was said having regard to the estimates at the lower figure, as it then was. After having the opportunity which my hon. friend has had of looking into the question, what does he say? Was there any merit in the charges of extravagance in connection with the administration of the department made by the Liberal opposition in 1921? If so, what were those extravagances, and which of them have been removed?

Mr. BOIVIN: There is always some merit in the charges made by the Liberals even when in opposition. I hope my hon. friend does not want me to admit that my party made charges without having some justification. I think that any opposition can find fault with any government and make charges concerning the expenditure of money, which, if properly followed up, may result in a reduction of expenditure. I do not pretend that the service was overmanned at that time by any means. I take pleasure in pointing out to my hon. friend that there has been less increase in the inside service of the Department of Customs than there has been in many of the other departments of government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend say there has not been an increase since 1921?

Mr. BOIVIN: There has been a gradual increase. There is an increase this year of $1,390.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There has been a pretty large increase year by year. I put this to my hon. friend: The charges of extravagance, overmanning, and the like, were made and reiterated and kept up hour after hour when the Liberals were in opposition. Now he has had an opportunity of looking into these charges, and he comes down with an estimate which is higher, considerably higher, than the estimate which was then under consideration. What does my hon. friend say? He is doing one of two things; he is either submitting a vote which is not called for, or else the previous criticism was entirely wrong; it is either one or the other.

Mr. BOIVIN: The Minister of Customs is really surprised to think that he has not been congratulated to-night by my hon. friend for not increasing the vote more than $1,390. I really expected congratulations.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if my hon. friend is really serious? I wonder if he is going to say that his expenditure is moving downwards here? I will go back further for him because I find that my hon. friend slips a good deal in the matter of facts.

Mr. BOIVIN: Possibly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very much.

Mr. BOIVIN: He has not been in the government very long yet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, but my hon. friend has been studying these things from the side lines—

Mr. BOIVIN: Quite possibly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —and he knows, or ought to know, how matters stand. These are my hon. friend's estimates. Will he say now that the salaries in 1923-24, for example, were not $577,000 while they are this year $607,000, and will he not also admit that over and above those salaries during that period of time thousands of dollars have been paid in superannuation allowances and in pensions which are still charged upon the country?

Mr. BOIVIN: I suppose the same state of affairs exists in the Department of Customs and Excise as in every other department in so far as superannuation allowances and pensions are concerned. They cannot be controlled by the minister, they are provided, as I understand, by a separate statute.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend say they cannot be controlled by the minister?

Mr. BOIVIN: Superannuation allowances?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend say there is no necessity for an order in council to be passed?

Mr. BOIVIN: An order in council is passed to authorize the payment of money which is provided by law—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the case of retirements?

Mr. BOIVIN: The retirements also are provided for by law—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, once they are carried out.

Mr. BOIVIN: —over which the minister certainly could not exercise any control, and I am sure my hon. friend is too fair, even if he does not want to congratulate me on the slow increase in expenditure, to blame me for something over which I have no control.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder what rate my hon. friend would think would be quick?

Mr. BOIVIN: Would be what?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What rate would be rapid?

Mr. BOIVIN: Oh, I would say fifteen, twenty, or thirty thousand dollars a year, as these expenditures used to increase when my hon. friend was in power.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is making a statement there which he will find is incorrect, because I will just give him what the increases were then. It is so easy to say something that is not true. It is so easy to say something with an absolute disregard as to whether it is true or not. We will examine the figures and see what this twenty or thirty thousand dollar increase was. We will take Civil Government for the Department of Customs and Inland Revenue for the year 1919-20. The vote that year was $463,387. The vote for the next year was $470,875. Does the minister now see what his illustrations really amount to, how much truth there really is in them?

10 p.m. There are the facts, and there are the figures. I ask my hon. friend what he would think was a rapid increase in a department which the Liberal party claims was so tremendously overmanned and so extravagantly run. Here we have in 1920-21 a total of $470,875.

Mr. HANSON: Let the minister put that in his pipe and smoke it.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend says the vote for 1920-21 was $470,875?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. BOIVIN: In the year previous it was $463,387?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. BOIVIN: An increase of about $7,488.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As against an increase of twenty or thirty thousand mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. BOIVIN: I had in mind certain years, I was not referring to the year 1920-21. Furthermore, I was not referring precisely to that one department. I was referring to increases in different departments.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, no.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. BOIVIN: I will say this to my hon. friend. I thank him for the figures, I did not have them before me. He says there was an increase for the years he mentioned of $7,488. Well if $7,488 is not more than $1,390 I will have to withdraw what I have said.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has again completely dodged the issue. I never for one minute raised any comparison of the increase this year as against any other year. But my hon. friend did. He said that there was a difference of twenty thousand or thirty thousand a year in previous years as compared with this year. And he was speaking of this department. If he was not I do not know what sense there could be to the rest of his remarks because it had reference to his excellent work in this department. My hon. friend knows that perfectly well. That is what I was referring to.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Look pleasant.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do you know, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Don't get mad.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think there is anything more prone to move a member of the King government to ridicule and laughter than a consideration of dollars and cents as they affect the ratepayers of this country. I do not know what the Minister of the Interior finds so humorous. Perhaps he would like to tell us.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend will permit me, I think he looks very much better when he is smiling than when he is serious.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Minister of Agriculture will be getting nervous. His position as clown of the government is being endangered. He has got a serious opponent now as prime joker. I would suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior though, with just as much seriousness as the occasion perhaps demands, that it would be a great deal better for the country, and certainly for him, if he would give some of the time he is now spending in laughing in trying to find out what his bills mean before he brings them down in the House, when the opposition have to look after them for him. My hon. friend should know something about his work.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am sure I am very grateful to the hon. gentleman for all the help he has given me. However, I merely remark that I fail to see the reason for the vigor he puts into his statements on some occasions. Of course we are all pleased to get direction from him on any occasion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: One of the things I am not going to attempt to do is to try to explain things to the minister, it would be beyond me. In the meantime, I might suggest that he should have just enough regard to the ordinary amenities of parliament in so far as a private member is concerned, let alone a minister.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I trust I have been decent with every private member in the House. I hope I have and if I have not been I am ready to apologize. But I am certainly not going to apologize to the ex-Minister of Finance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, what item are we on?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the point is very well taken. I certainly do not ask any apology from the Minister of the Interior. Sometimes an apology is a matter of indifference; it depends somewhat upon the source from which it comes. I am going to ask my hon. friend again if he can point out the items of extravagance in overmanning the staff in the year 1921, and where the reductions have been made.

Mr. BOIVIN: I did not complain of extravagance or overmanning of staff. What I said was that in previous years the cost of administering the departments of customs had increased more rapidly than it did last year. That may not be all due to the merits of the present government. I am willing to claim credit only in part. It is due to the fact that we are able to carry on the business of the country with the same number of employees that we had last year, and that a few of the employees, as I pointed out a moment ago, have been given promotion and are now occupying their new positions at the new minimum salary, instead of the maximum salary paid to their predecessors. My hon. friend pointed out that it was necessary to pay certain allowances as superannuation or pension in connection with the employees who have retired. I admit that. That happens every year. It happens, not only in the Department of Customs but in every other department. In so far as the increase is concerned, I jokingly remarked that the increase referred to by my hon. friend of $7,488 was more than the increase of $1,390 last year. I am willing to admit that the small increase this year is accounted for by the fact that we have succeeded in reducing our vote for contingencies to the extent of $8,000. Otherwise our increase in salaries would be almost $2,000 more than in the year referred to by my hon. friend. But I think my hon. friend will admit that this gradual increase is provided for by the Civil Service Act, and that there is no extravagance on the part of the government. I am sure, if any charges of extravagance were made in days gone by, when I happened to occupy the semi-judicial position referred to by my hon. friend, that he will not hold me responsible, and that he does not want us to fight all over again the Battle of the Boyne.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not holding the hon. minister responsible. I am asking a plain question which he has not answered. The charges were made, as the minister knows, of overmanning and extravagance.

Mr. BOIVIN: Not to-night.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I am speaking of what was said about the estimates of 1921, and asking a very simple question, and he, as head of the department, should know whether those charges were justified or not. His own estimates obviously show that they were not. The estimates are a great deal more than they then were, but he is not frank enough to give me an answer.

Mr. BOIVIN: I certainly do not know what the charges were. I do not remember them. I have not the Hansard before me, and I am certainly not going to admit a crime until I know what I am accused of. If my hon. friend wants me to give a certificate that in that particular year there was no grave reason for a charge of mismanagement and of padding the salary list in this particular department, I am willing to say that the increase that year proportionately was no more than the increase this year.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The minister referred to the very economical administration of the Liberal party and to the very slight increases during certain years. I wish to call his attention to the fact that in 1921-22 the amount of this vote was $548,000; in 1922-23 it was $559,000, and in the year 1923-24 it rose to $577,000. In the year 1924 the increase was almost $20,000; so that that comes within the category of the kind of year that was really extravagant. The number of employees remained about the same, but there has been a gradual and constant increase of expenditure in the department.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend knows that during the precise year he mentions there was a general increase of salaries, and it was made on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, over which we had no control. The increase was proportionate in all the other departments of the government. Surely my hon. friend is not holding me or the government responsible for that.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): No, but when you rise and make a carte blanche statement that the administration of this particular department under the Liberal regime has been so economical, I only point out the actual figures as they exist.

Mr. BOIVIN: I think my hon. friend is entirely right in his figures, and I think I am entirely right in my statements; I am sure we can both agree.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Agriculture—for experiments in dehydration of fruits and vegetables, $10,000.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I should like to inquire from the Minister of Agriculture how it happens that on a Friday night, after ten o'clock, when a number of members want to go away, he always brings in his estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I do not know whether I can answer my hon. friend's question or not, except that somebody has to carry on in the House on Friday night. This is only the second time that I have been at the bat this session, if I remember well, and I do not think the last occasion was on Friday night.

With regard to the vote under consideration, this experimental work was undertaken some years ago by the department for the purpose of demonstrating what could be done in the way of dehydrating some of our fruits, particularly apples, apricots and plums, instead of adopting the ordinary evaporating system. During these two or three years we have, I think, demonstrated to the satisfaction, not of the fruit men because most of them were aware of it before, but of the consumer, the very much higher quality of dehydrated fruit, as compared with evaporated fruit. The systems are entirely different; so much so that the dehydrated fruit retains the flavour of the green fruit as compared with the almost entire lack of flavour in regular evaporated fruit. We have come to the time when we think we can accomplish it.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would the minister explain the difference between the processes?

[Mr. Chaplin.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The ordinary evaporating is done through heated air. It has the effect of hardening the tissue and breaking down the cellular construction of the fruit. On the other hand, the dehydrating is carried on through a more humid atmosphere, retaining the cellular construction of the fruit. We have now reached the point where we can contract somewhat in experimental work, having demonstrated beyond any question that an important industry may be developed. Our experiments have been followed up by the establishment of two plants, one in the Okanagan valley and one in the Annapolis valley, both of which are giving entire satisfaction. But the fruit men having had pretty hard sledding ever since the war, capital has not been so plentiful; otherwise I am sure many plants would now be in operation. Certainly a great quantity of fruit which is not quite up to grade one, but which at the same time is capable of preservation, could be dehydrated. In this way a large proportion of our excess fruit could be disposed of. It is not at all true that you can take culls and produce a sound dehydrated article; the better the raw material the better will the finished product be.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Where are these experiments carried on? Are they confined to our own buildings?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is one plant at the experimental farm in Ottawa, one at Grimsby in the Niagara district, and one at Penticton. We intend to continue the one at Penticton, but the committee on dehydration in charge of the work at the experimental farm has not completed its plans with reference to the work at Grimsby. The Grimsby plant may be taken over by a cold storage establishment which has been in operation there for some ten or twelve years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who are the committee?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The committee consists of Mr. E. S. Archibald, director of the experimental farm; Mr. G. E. McIntosh, head of the Fruit branch; Dr. Frank Shutt, of the experimental farm; Professor W. T. Macoun, and Mr. C. S. McGillivray.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: These are all employees of the government?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. They have made a special study of this work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no salary attached to this?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How is the money spent?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the case of Penticton we have rented a cheap building, and the fruit after being dehydrated is put on exhibition. We also sell some of the product. As a matter of fact, samples of the dehydrated fruit are displayed at various exhibitions throughout the country.

Mr. McGIBBON: What does it cost to dehydrate fruit?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The plant being small, the cost will of course be out of proportion to the production. About $12 per ton is paid for fuel. The initial expenses take up the bulk of the money.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): How many experimental plants are likely to be operated during the present year; and how many privately owned plants have been established since this experimental work was undertaken?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Two or three plants will be operated this year.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): By the government?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. There are two commercial plants, one at Kelowna operated by a Mr. Bulman and another in the Annapolis valley near Wolfville.

Mr. BROWN: Is it the intention of the government to carry on experiments after private plants are established?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No; that is why we are reducing the vote. We do not intend to continue experimental work once the public is thoroughly satisfied that fruits can be dehydrated more economically than they can be evaporated.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): How can you tell whether or not the experiment is economical, if you do not know what it costs? Can the minister tell us what it costs to produce a given quantity of dried apples?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You cannot tell, from experiments conducted in a small plant, what production would cost on a large scale. We are simply demonstrating what can be done in the way of converting surplus fruit into an edible product to take the place of millions of pounds of dehydrated fruit imported from the United States, and which we might very well produce in this country.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister realizes, no doubt, that the feasibility of production commercially depends upon the cost.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We do not run a commercial plant. But from the experiments we have carried on and the data we have secured we have come to the conclusion that this process is cheaper than the ordinary system of evaporation.

Mr. McGIBBON: When you are conducting experiments surely the cost of production is an essential consideration.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You cannot tell what it would cost to operate a commercial plant if you judge by the results of experiments on such a small scale as this.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is the estimated cost of production?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can only say that it is estimated to be a little cheaper than the process of evaporation, while it is believed that the quality of the product is better.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What vegetables and fruits have so far been successfully dehydrated?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Apples, apricots, peaches, plums, pears and small fruits and vegetables, including potatoes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the total spent to date?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And we have learned how to dehydrate five or six varieties of fruit?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. It is believed that once we can convince the investing public that a sound business can be built up, we can produce millions of pounds of dehydrated fruit which we are now importing.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think the department would be better occupied trying to dehydrate some of our commercial corporations.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Taking the water out of them?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is not in my line.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The minister says that some $30,000 has already been expended and he is asking us to vote another $10,000, making $40,000 in all; and the purpose of this expenditure is to encourage fruit growers so that we may be able to convince investors that a profitable business may be developed in Canada in this direction. I think he said that millions of pounds of fruit which we are now importing could be dehydrated in this country. The minister advances that as a reason in support of this vote. I say at once I am in hearty accord with him so far as that is concerned. But it does seem to me to be very strange that a different attitude is taken by this government in regard to other similar matters. The minister says: Assist me to expend another $10,000 to encourage the dehydration of fruit so we can produce an article here that is now being imported. And yet the same minister, a member of the same government, was a party to the Australian and New Zealand arrangement by which fruit pulp is allowed to come into this country free of duty. In one breath the minister encourages the fruit industry, and in the other he is doing all he possibly can to knock that industry on the head. He is reasonable in asking for something to encourage home industry. But I know this attitude will not last very long with him. It seems to me that on his part it is only a fleeting evidence of good, sound common sense, but it makes me wonder how he could find it possible to support the other measure which certainly does not, and will not, encourage the producers of fruit in this country, but, on the contrary, will drive them out of business. I could not resist, Mr. Chairman, the temptation to point out what in my judgment is a glaring inconsistency in the attitude of the government on this item and on the Australian treaty.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Do I understand the minister has expended $30,000 in experimenting along these lines and that up to the present there is only one small plant?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are two; one in the Okanagan and one in the Annapolis valley.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): How large are those plants?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Okanagan plant, which is operated by Mr. Bulman, has dehydrated thirty-five or thirty-six carloads of fruit, mostly apples. All fruit men know that every medium possible should be used to take care of the peak load rather than allow any of the fruit to go to waste, especially during the harvest time when the crop is rushed on the market. We have also established pre-cooling for the same fruit growers. They dry some of their fruit, they pre-cool some of it, and they dehydrate some of it to prevent waste. It is a good plan to take care of the fruit by all legitimate means available. I quite expected the criticism made by the hon. member for Frontenac. He would be less than human if he had not taken advantage of the opportunity to criticize what he considers to be an inconsistency on our part with regard to hurting the fruit industry by the Australian treaty, as he alleges, and coming to its rescue by this vote. Suppose, for the sake of argument, our fruit growers have cause to be alarmed by the effects of the Australian treaty, is that not all the more reason why something should be done to offset those effects?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A sort of "off again, on again."

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am assuming that his argument is sound.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the minister says he expected this criticism from me, I am very glad to take it as evidence that he has got a conscience which does work sometimes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I hope so.

Mr. TOLMIE: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the minister on his change of attitude as evinced towards the Australian treaty,—so far as the dairy end of it is concerned,—and as now indicated in this matter of dehydrated fruits. It is of great importance to carry on such experiments as will enable our growers after a while to prepare their surplus for the market under certain conditions, and this provides one of the methods for doing so. At what price can you buy this fruit for dehydration in comparison with its ordinary market value?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have no figures with regard to small fruits, but they could pay a dollar a hundred weight for apples.

Mr. TOLMIE: How many pounds of dry friut would you get per hundred pounds of green fruit by this method as compared with the old sun-drying method?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Dehydrated fruit will carry more moisture and still be in condition to warehouse. Consequently you will make more dehydrated fruit out of 100 pounds of raw fruit than you will by the sun drying method.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the comparison as to palatability say in the form of an apple pie?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The dehydrated fruit is very much superior; to a large extent it retains the flavour of the green fruit.

Mr. TOLMIE: And is a decidedly better product?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Assuredly; there is no comparison.

Mr. TOLMIE: In California they have what is known as sun-made fruit, that is, fruit dried in trays in the open. Have you any figures as to the comparative cost of that method and dehydration?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Sun-drying is an obsolete method and cannot be recommended at all to-day, any more than you could recommend the system of stringing together apples and hanging them up near the stove pipe as we used to do a good many years ago, thus making a convenient roost for the flies. The principle is the same—evaporation. There is no comparison whatever between the quality of dehydrated and evaporated fruit.

Mr. BROWN: With regard to quality, I have tasted some of this dehydrated fruit at home and it is almost impossible to tell it from the green fruit, the quality is so fine.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And what is the gain in percentage of weight?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think we have that data. Does my hon. friend mean when it is brought back?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister explained that there were two advantages to this system, firstly the flavour and secondly that more moisture is retained and therefore the weight is greater. What is the gain in weight?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: About 10 per cent, I understand. I believe also that it has a greater absorptive capacity.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It goes better with cream?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We might let item 45 stand and go on with item 46.

Mr. TOLMIE: With respect to items 45 and 46, these are very important, usually entailing a discussion lasting some time. Our benches are rather bare now; it is getting late; this is Friday night; we have had a very hard week and I would suggest that having passed one item safely and pleasantly it would be a favour to this House to defer the remainder until next week.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I quite appreciate the suggestion of my hon. friend, but the Prime Minister requested me to keep going to a reasonable hour; he knows my disposition to yield to the representations of my hon. friend when he puts them in that enticing way. I would be glad to skip these large items and start at the bottom.

Mr. TOLMIE: Then let us go on to item 48.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Very well; that has to do with entomology, commonly called the study of bugs. This may give some amusement to hon. members opposite.

Agriculture—entomology, $20,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: Would the minister tell us something of the effect of the operations of the department on the cattle ranges of British Columbia in dealing with the grasshopper plague?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am informed that should come under the next vote, but we can dispose of it now. That invasion of grasshoppers came from the south, through the southwest corner of Manitoba and into the southeast corner of Saskatchewan about five or six years ago. It has worked westward until now it is almost to the Pacific. The federal government, in co-operation with the various provincial governments, and they in turn with the municipalities, all working in harmony and unison, have suppressed this pest by the distribution of poison bait. I have forgotten the formula, but it is something which seems to work very effectively in dealing with the plague. The advice and leadership in general control of grasshoppers in British Columbia have been undertaken during 1925 in connection with the Department of Agriculture and the range commission of British Columbia. This co-operation, extension and control work will be continued in that province to the limit of the resources available in 1926. This is the same policy pursued by my hon. friend when he had charge of the work, at which time I imagine the plague was probably in the western part of Alberta.

Mr. TOLMIE: What variety of grass hopper is it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is one that seems to get away with a lot of grub. I understand it is sometimes spoken of as an army grasshopper; it goes in great waves; it is very industrious until it is ready to leave and then it moves off quickly, generally leaving destruction in its wake. I believe there is more than one variety. I had reports from my officers when we had the invasion in Saskatchewan, but I do not recall the scientific names of these destructive insects.

Mr. TOLMIE: Have any complaints been received as to the poisoning of stock from the use of this treatment?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There have been rumours, but nothing authentic. If animals took a full meal of it they would be poisoned, but not by just picking it up in the pasture.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the poisonous material used in the destruction of grasshoppers?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Arsenic.

Mr. TOLMIE: In what way are animals poisoned? The minister says they cannot pick up enough from the grass to notice the effect, so in what way do they secure enough of this poison to injure them?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When it is distributed evenly in the usual way an animal cannot possibly pick up enough to produce any bad effects, but if the material drifts with the wind or accumulates in any other way, animals having access to it may be poisoned. The ordinary distribution methods, under normal conditions, have quite demonstrated that it can have no poisonous effect because the animals cannot get enough of it.

Mr. TOLMIE: Have complaints been received of animals being poisoned by chewing sacks which held the poison?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There was one such case.

Mr. MILLAR: I know of one case in my district where that occurred.

Mr. TOLMIE: I understood there were complaints made in Alberta and other provinces because of animals having access to the empty sacks.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There was one such case in Alberta.

Mr. GARDINER: Does the department contribute to the cost of destroying these pests?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No; the cost of the poison is paid on a fifty-fifty basis by the provincial government and the municipality. We supply the staff and assist in an advisory way.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Monday, May 31, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure) moved that the second report of the joint committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY AND EARLY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House will have noticed that I have on the order paper a motion, to come up to-morrow, that when the House adjourns on Wednesday the second of June, 1926, it stand adjourned until Friday the fourth of June, 1926. That is to permit of an adjournment over the King's birthday. I believe that the members generally are anxious that we should lose as little time as possible in bringing the work of the session to an end.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask therefore, with the leave of the House to propose the following two motions. If there is any exception taken to their being proceeded with at this stage, I will let them stand until to-morrow. The first motion will be, seeing that we adjourn for Thursday: that the House sit on Wednesday night of this week and all subsequent Wednesdays. The other motion is that on and after Monday next to the end of the session the House sit at two o'clock in the afternoon instead of at three o'clock.

I will read the first motion:

That on Wednesday, second of June, 1926, and subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session, the sittings of the House shall in every respect be under the same rules as provided for other days.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask that the motion stand until to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And also the following, I presume:

That on and after Monday, the seventh of June, 1926, until the end of the present session the House shall meet at two o'clock in the afternoon of each sitting day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will also ask that that motion stand until to-morrow.

CANADIAN RED CROSS SOCIETY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 151, to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act.

He said: This bill is introduced, Mr. Speaker, at the request of The Canadian Red Cross Society, which operates under chapter 68 of the statutes of 1909, and the amending act, chapter 13 of the statutes of 1922. The society does not possess legal authority to dispose of any property which it holds, and particularly is not competent to give another party legal title thereto. It is given authority to purchase and hold certain property for the purposes of the society. During the war a number of properties which the society obtained throughout the country increased, and now they are being exchanged or disposed of in the interests of the society. It is proposed under this bill to give the society the power to deal with those properties.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it not really private legislation?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Yes, but the Red Cross Society asked the government to introduce it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 152, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1923.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill covers an amendment to section 5 of the act to require that where a retail druggist sells narcotics to a physician, veterinary surgeon, dentist or druggist he must have an order in writing. The object is to check up a little more closely the sale of narcotics by druggists.

The other clauses, with the exception of the last, are to make the act conform to certain divisions made last session when subsection (d) was divided into (d) and (f). In referring to that subsection later in the act subsection (f) was omitted. That is purely formal.

The last clause consists of adding the word "prescribe" to bring prescribing within the meaning of the act, some question having arisen as to this.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 153 to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: The first amendment proposes to repeal sections 97A and 97B of the Criminal Code as enacted in 1919 concerning unlawful association. There is also an amendment—which has passed this House many times and been thrown out by the Senate—respecting offences against girls. We propose to delete the words "of previous chaste character", and in this form we think the amendment will meet with a better fate. Another amendment is to restore to the crown the right of appeal which involves questions of law alone. This existed prior to criminal appeals being established three years ago, which gave to the convicted person the right of appeal under such circumstances, but took it away from the crown which had had it previously. That bill originated in the Senate. The last amendment is the bill which was introduced by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) regarding scrip issued to half breeds. The House adopted his bill last year and the year before but it was rejected by the Senate. The hon. member has introduced it this year, and in order to give the bill a chance to come before the House I have taken the responsibility for it and inserted it in my own bill.

Mr. CLARK: With regard to the right of appeal may I draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) the provisions of section 1014 of the Criminal Code:

> On the hearing of any such appeal against conviction the court of appeal shall allow the appeal if it is of opinion—(a) that the verdict of the jury should be set aside on the ground that it is unreasonable or cannot be supported having regard to the evidence.

Under that section there is the right to allow an appeal on a question of fact if the verdict of the jury is found to be against the weight of evidence. But the great majority of criminal trials are speedy trials before a judge alone, and under that subsection there is no right to disturb the decision of a judge on a question of fact. Under subsection (c) there is the right, however, to allow an appeal on the ground that there has been a miscarriage of justice. This section was copied from the act in England, where all trials are by jury, I understand, and in England it has been the custom to confine the application of subsection (c) to jury misconduct or some error in trial procedure. I understand the judges of appeal have found it very embarrassing to interfere with the decisions of trial judges on questions of fact where the trial has been held without a jury. This has been brought to my attention by a justice of the appellate division of Ontario, and he strongly suggests that the amendment be made to section 1014. If I may refer the minister to the proposed amendment, section (a) would read as follows:

That the verdict of the jury or the judgment of the trial court. . . .

The words "or the judgment of the trial court" are added.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will read my hon. friend's remarks in Hansard to-morrow and give careful attention to his suggestion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister explain more fully what the two clauses are which are being repealed? He stated that they were clauses against unlawful associations, and I cannot recall just now what their provisions were.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I suppose this would come more properly when the second reading of the bill is moved. As my hon. friend well remembers, these two sections were inserted in 1919, some time after the labour disturbances in western Canada. They give the right on the warrant of a justice of the peace to search the papers of a citizen who is supposed to be a member of an association which would come under that section, and anyone attending meetings of such an association would be guilty of the crime of sedition. These were new clauses inserted in the code at the time of the unrest in this country, and that was the reason given for their adoption. All the labour unions of Canada have protested against these sections, believing that they might be construed as dangerous to themselves. However, I will give a fuller explanation when the second reading is moved.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR MAKING APPLICATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I would like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) if he can give me an answer to my question appearing on page 3352 of Hansard for May 14, having reference to the continuation of the privilege under the Civil Service Superannuation Act to certain members of the civil service who do not come under the provisions of the act. On that occasion the minister said:

> I will submit my hon. friend's question to the actuaries and I shall be in a better position to answer him in a few days.

Is the minister prepared to now answer the question?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Yes. I carried the memorandum in my portfolio for several days, but my hon. friend was so busy in the committee that I did not have an opportunity to give it to him. I will bring it to-morrow, however, and if my hon. friend is in his seat I will send it to him, or I can give it to him personally if he so desires.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER AS TO LEGISLATION PENDING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) asked me towards the end of last week if I would give the House a statement as to the legislation to be proceeded with this session, and as to whether it was all on the order paper. I can, of course, say nothing as to what legislation may be necessary, arising out of the reports of committees, but with that exception I think all the legislation which the government have any intention of introducing appears on the order paper now. There is one possible exception, an amendment to the Montreal Harbour Commission Act and an amendment in the nature of concurring legislation respecting the control of water in the railway belt of British Columbia. The government of British Columbia have passed an act dealing with this matter, and we are asked to concur in their legislation. With those two exceptions I think the House has now before it all the legislation which the government intends to introduce at this session. But I would ask my right hon. friend not to hold me too literally to what I am saying. I am not aware of anything else contemplated, but it is just possible that some slight amendment to some act or some unforeseen measure may come up before the end of the session which the government might wish to ask parliament to pass. I am giving to the House now the position as I see it.

My right hon. friend also asked whether there was any legislation on the order paper which the government did not contemplate proceding with. There is. So far as the legislation referring to the transfer of natural resources to Alberta is concerned, it is not contemplated to proceed with that legislation at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would ask if the Prime Minister has no statement to make to the House in reference to this abandoned legislation, and the reason for not proceeding with it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In answer to my right hon. friend's query, it would be better, I think, that any statement on that subject should be made by my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and I would ask him to make a statement to the House on that matter to-morrow.

APPOINTMENT OF POST OFFICE INSPECTOR—MARITIME PROVINCES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would like to ask the Minister of Justice, in his capacity as the representative in this House of the Postmaster General, if a report appearing in a despatch under date of Moncton, N.B., May 29th, respecting the appointment of an additional and fourth district post office inspector in the Maritime provinces is correct. I would like to point out to him that we already have three post office inspectors in the Maritime provinces, where I think perhaps two or even one would do. There is no necessity whatever for a fourth. This statement, I think, has all the earmarks of having been given out as an inspired utterance.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE: I will make the necessary inquiry, and give the information to my hon. friend.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. M. BOUTILLIER (Vegreville): I would ask the representative of the Postmaster General in this House whether the scale or plan upon which the salaries of town, village and rural postmasters are to be based after the 1st of July has been completed, and if so, when the information will be available to the members of the House.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE: I remember having answered some time ago a similar question. The salaries of the postmasters for the coming year will be based, of course, on the revenue of their post offices during the present year, and will not be affected by any change to be made on July 1st. During the period from July 1st on the department will consider whether it is opportune to change the method of paying salaries to the postmasters.

RETURN TO GOLD STANDARD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) state whether on July 1st next Canada will revert fully to the gold standard, or is there to be introduced any legislation modifying the present Finance Act?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I have no intention of introducing any legislation, and automatically Canada will go on a gold basis on the 1st of July.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

SCREENINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (South Winnipeg): I would draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to the fact that on May 17th the following order of the House was passed:

> For a copy of all orders' in council, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the purchase of screenings during the years 1917 to 1921, inclusive, along with a statement showing the firms from which the said screenings were purchased, the amount from each firm, the price paid, to whom sold, the amount to each firm and the price in each case.

I would ask when we may expect this return.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Getting this information is rather a long process. I was speaking to my deputy about it a week ago, and he said it would be ready in the next two weeks, which would be a week from now. I will make further inquiries and try to expedite the return.

NOVA SCOTIA COAL

REPORTED STATEMENT OF MR. FORKE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): I would like to ask the Minister of Mines a question based on an article which appears in this morning's issue of the Ottawa Journal, contributed by the Canadian Press. It refers to an interview with the leader of the group to my left, and among other things quotes the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) as follows:

> Western farmers, Mr. Forke said, were quite favourably inclined toward the tariff reduction on automobiles, but the problem of protection was a difficult one.
> "We are supposed to be low tariff men," said Mr. Forke, "but in practice it is difficult to carry out theories. Take the coal and steel industries in Nova Scotia, for instance. The simple fact is that the mines there are not economically sound. Coal is produced at an excessive cost, and when it is produced it is poor in quality."

I shall not continue further, but I would ask the Minister of Mines if his attention has been called to this matter, and if he will take any steps to induce his colleague the commander of the left wing of this government to make the amende honourable in connection with a statement of this kind, which, as a matter of fact, is an absolute misstatement of fact and contains three libels in regard to the premier industry of the province of Nova Scotia.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Of course, I do not read the Journal; I read the Citizen. I did not see the article in question—

Mr. GOTT: The Citizen had it too.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I missed it then. All I have to say is that I can be responsible only for my own statements. I suppose that what my hon. friend is taking exception to is the statement with reference to the quality of Nova Scotia coal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there no such thing as cabinet responsibility extending to the hon. member for Brandon?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I nearly got into trouble the other day by butting into a discussion in the House, and I would commend to my right hon. friend the wisdom of refraining from such a course.

THE CANADIAN DEXTER P. COOPER COMPANY

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury) moved the third reading of Bill No. 93, to incorporate The Canadian Dexter P. Cooper Company.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my attention has only now been called to this bill. I suppose it has been carefully considered by the private bills committee, but I notice that under the bill the company asks the right to sell power not only in Canada but in the United States. I would like to know from the promoter of the bill, who is a good lawyer, what will happen under the terms of the act of 1907 if the government determines not to allow the export of power, if, for instance, the province of New Brunswick determine they cannot export power.

Mr. HANSON: The direct answer to that in this connection would be that under this bill the power itself will not be generated in Canada, but the storage, nine-tenths of the storage, I should say, will be in Canada, and a new section was inserted in the bill in the Private Bills committee whereby all these matters will have to receive the imprimatur not only of the International Joint Commission but also of the Governor in Council of Canada. The provisions of the Export of Electricity Act have been made to apply to this bill, in the same way as the provisions of the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

I might say for the information of the House and of the minister that the bill was considered at three or four long sessions of the Private Bills committee and we gave that aspect, as well as other aspects of this bill, our very best consideration, and finally we adopted as a new section 16 provisions which will in my opinion at all events absolutely safeguard Canadian interests. If they are not safeguarded I wish the House would safeguard them; but so far as I am aware they are already definitely safeguarded. The matter is left in the hands of the Minister of Public Works with respect to navigation; in the hands of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with respect to fisheries; in the hands of the Minister of the Interior with respect to power; in the hands of the International Joint Commission with respect to the division of power; and finally the approval of the Governor in Council must be secured before anything is done. Therefore I think we have done all we can to protect Canadian rights.

Mr. MARCIL: The bill has not been reprinted. Will the hon. gentleman read the clause in question?

Mr. HANSON: I understand the bill has been reprinted. The section in question is a new section—section 16.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. member be good enough to read it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You will find it in your copy of the reprinted bill.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): The bill has been reprinted, I have a copy of the reprinted bill here. The measure was fully considered in committee, amendments to it were adopted, and its passage was unanimously approved by the committee. Furthermore, as my hon. friend from York-Sunbury said a minute ago, every possible interest has been looked after and safeguarded. No less than three departments of this government are to be consulted, and the International Joint Commission as well. Finally, after all these proceedings have been gone through, the Governor in Council has to give his approval.

Mr. J. G. ROBICHAUD (Gloucester): Have arrangements been made for the Canadian fishermen interested to be heard by the Departments of Public Works and Marine and Fisheries before a decision is given with respect to this matter? If the fishermen are not so represented I am afraid the privileges which they have enjoyed for several generations past will be jeopardized. I believe the House should be very careful before giving this bill its final reading. Certainly provision should be made so that the fishermen concerned may be well represented before the different departments that have to do with this matter.

Mr. CANNON: The suggestion of my hon. friend is an appropriate one. I have no doubt at all that should any difficulty arise when the question comes up before the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, he will see to it that the fishing interests in New Brunswick are fully represented and heard, and that no decision will be rendered before the case has been explained to him. I am confident that no decision will be rendered by the various departments concerned until after the interests affected have been fully and completely heard.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Following up what the Minister of Finance has said, may I put this question: Supposing this company had incurred enormous expense in developing this tidal power, would they not insist then on being given an opportunity to export that power, and is the country protected in that respect?

Mr. CANNON: They cannot export power unless they are authorized to do so.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Yes, but they may spend millions and then make a demand to be allowed to export power.

Mr. CANNON: That is their own lookout. I have no doubt the company would not expend a very large amount unless they had the assurance that they would be in a position to exercise the powers conferred by this bill. However, as I have already said the company cannot do anything contrary to Canadian interests without first putting their case fully before this government, and also before the International Joint Commission, I do not think any hon. member need be apprehensive that Canadian interests will not be fully protected.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): There is one point to which I should like to draw the attention of the House. Undoubtedly, it seems to me, the fishing and navigation rights, and the rights of riparian owners, are safeguarded in the bill. But there are certain new rights with regard to the development of water-powers by means of tidal waters that do not appear to me to be quite so fully guarded. With respect to these new rights, there has not as yet been any judicial expression.

In connection with water-powers developed on Dominion lands, it has been usual to have a clause inserted by which, after the expiration of a certain period, the Dominion government may expropriate the works and regard them as for the general welfare of Canada, provision being made, of course, for the reimbursement of the owners for the outlay they have made. It seems to me that there ought to be a clause along this line inserted in the present bill. We do not know as yet whether there is much prospect of this particular undertaking being a success. We have had no evidence of that from any engineer other than the promoters; but if the scheme of developing electricity from tidal waters should prove feasible it may mean a great deal to the future of Canada. Now, I have no desire to enter into a controversy as to whether these waters come directly under provincial or under Dominion jurisdiction, the lawyer members of the committee were inclined to think they came under provincial jurisdiction; but I would submit, as a layman, that already the Dominion has certain rights in these waters. The navigation rights of the Dominion are admitted, the fishing rights of the Dominion are admitted, and why should not the Dominion also claim rights with regard to the generation of power. A new right is being created as to which there has been no definite allocation, and I should like to see inserted a clause to the following effect:

> The property in and the right to the use of all tidal water powers situated within the Dominion of Canada are hereby declared to be vested in and shall remain in the crown; and every undertaking hereunder is hereby declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Unless there is some real objection to this being inserted, I should like to have it adopted as an amendment to the bill—if we have the right to do that in this House. It seems to me that something of the kind is necessary at this stage to safeguard the rights of the people of Canada.

Mr. HANSON: I rise to a point of order. The amendment is out of order, no notice having been given of it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The point of order is well taken. The amendment should be referred back to the committee and then notice of it given. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, No.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Those in favour of the third reading of this bill will please say "aye."

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): In order that the amendment which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has submitted may be duly considered I would move the the bill be referred back to committee for the purpose of amending it in the manner referred to.

Mr. HANSON: I doubt very much if the hon. member for Bow River knows what the amendment really is. I could not grasp its purpose while the mover was reading it, but I have an idea that the hon. gentleman was advancing a principle that the committee has already passed upon, namely, that the government should have the right to take over this proposition at any time. I do not see that any good purpose can be served by the amendment.

Hon. Mr. STEWART: Is my hon. friend right about that? Is the principle not rather that the control of the power right should be in the hands of the federal authorities rather than in those of the province? If I am wrong I should like to be corrected?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is in the hands of the provincial authorities now, is it not?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps if the hon. gentleman did not hear me, although I thought I was speaking loud enough to be heard, I may repeat the wording of the resolution. I said that I was not trying to raise the issue as between the province and the Dominion, but I thought that we as representing the people of the Dominion have a right to safeguard the public interest. This follows pretty much the wording of the act with regard to water-powers developed on Dominion lands:

> The property in and the right to the use of all tidal water-powers situated within the Dominion of Canada are hereby declared to be vested in and shall remain in the crown; and every undertaking hereunder is hereby declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: To what clause is that amendment moved?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Clause 8.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is necessary to give notice before moving this amendment. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) has moved an amendment which will, I think, satisfy the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to committee.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I am surprised that the Minister of Finance has not protected the rights of Canada in this matter. Here is a proposal for a big exploitation of something and they are to sell power to the government. The export of power is a great question in this country and we are hearing more of it every day. I challenge the government on this question, to take action. They will have an opportunity of bringing down their policy by the remission of the bill to committee for further consideration. If the government will not say anything, possibly it may be taken for granted that they approve of the principle involved in the bill.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Interior): While the question which has been raised as to the ownership or control of water-powers within the provinces has not been definitely settled, nevertheless it has been within the realm of discussion for some considerable time. The same question would arise in regard to the water powers on the St. Lawrence river. The question raised now is as to who should control the water powers. We have raised no question with the provinces in regard to such control. There are times when this matter is called in question, but it would raise a difficult issue to bring up here the question of ownership of whatever Canadian waterpower rights there are adjacent to the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. CANNON: This amendment was never proposed before the committee. I see no objection to the bill being referred back to the committee and in the meantime we can study the amendment and asecrtain exactly what it means. I would not be prepared to express an opinion on the effect of the amendment until I had had time to study it.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): If I caught the amendment aright, I do not think it is worth the time of the House to make a reference back to committee to have the matter considered. There was quite a lot of discussion and I may not have got the purport of it, but if I heard it rightly the purpose of the amendment was to enable the crown in the right of Canada to expropriate at any future time it might be so advised. In the first place, in so far as Canadian property is concerned, that right is inherent. It can be exercised at any time, and the case is not strengthened in any appreciable degree by such a clause in the enabling charter of the company. The right to expropriate is one which is inherent in this parliament in relation to any company coming under federal jurisdiction. I have just read over the bill for the first time, but it is not hard to understand, and I think I have a grasp of it. It enables the company to do certain things, notably to develop waterpower, and I believe the locus of the development is to be somewhere in an inlet of the bay of Fundy, the idea being to utilize the tides for the purpose of developing waterpowers. Now certain work will be Canadian and certain work will be American, and included in the later category is the power site itself. It is next to inconceivable that Canada as a Dominion would want to expropriate half of the work, and especially the half that does not work. It is the other half that does the work. Consequently if there ever was a bill in which it would not be necessary to insert this safeguarding clause it would be this one, but I never saw much value in inserting that clause anywhere. In fact where I saw it put in I thought it was simply an endeavour to sugar-coat it for parliament, because that right of expropriation can always be exercised at the will of parliament. All that is necessary is to pay adequate compensation under the law of the land. I do not see any value in having it referred back to the committee to consider an amendment of that character. I can think of one or two amendments I would like to insert in the bill myself, but they are not of such a character as to justify delaying the passing of the measure. They will probably be brought up in the Senate. It seems to me there should be something holding the company to some certain area. It is rather a company at large, under the terms of the bill, but this does not go to the heart and substance of the matter, and I have no doubt will very quickly be taken care of by the upper chamber when the bill gets there. I see no object at all in delaying the measure by referring it back to committee with instructions to insert a clause to provide against something which in any event would scarcely be dreamt of in a case of this kind. Even if it were inserted, it would be mere surplusage, because that right is inherent in all cases.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why is it that in the Dominion Waterpowers Act we find inserted clause 4 which reads:

> The property in and the right to the use of all Dominion water-powers are hereby declared to be vested in and shall remain in the crown, saving, however, any rights of property in or to the use of such powers which have heretofore been granted by the crown; and every undertaking hereunder is hereby declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I gave a hint of the reason which I think often prompts the insertion of a clause of that kind. It makes it look a little more palatable, but I will remind the hon. member that under our Soldier Settlement Act we take power, which we can do in relation to any property, to expropriate the individual farm of a farmer, if we want it for soldier settlement. When we give the farmer his patent we do not make a reservation that we may some day expropriate it. If we had done so we would not have enlarged our right of expropriation one iota. There was no need of it in the act to which my hon. friend refers, and no need of it here.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. HANSON: Having regard to the state of the law as it now exists, I would ask the hon. member not to press the amendment or to further impede the passing of the bill. I think the House can take it for granted, on the word of the Solicitor General, that every provision for safeguarding the public interest, so far as it occurred to the hon. members attending the committee, was put in this bill, and this company is tied hand and foot to the approval of the three departments concerned, the approval of the Governor in Council and of the International Joint Commission. If anybody else can suggest any further safeguards in the public interest, I would be glad to have them inserted in the bill, if they are reasonable at all, but not the amendment which the hon. member suggests, because I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Mr. Garland (Bow River) moves that bill No. 93 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to committee of the Whole with instructions to amend said bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that I feel very secure in rising but I do not think that amendment is in order either. It says "instructions to amend" with no indication of the line of amendment; and as the hon. member made his motion, "with instructions to amend in the manner referred to" it is certainly not in order. We cannot conduct our business in such a slip-shod manner as that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I may be able to save the House considerable time by saying a word. I was not sufficiently able to grasp the amendment as put to the House by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. My intention was quite clear. After, however, the explanation which has been given by the leader of the opposition and other hon. members I have no wish to proceed with the amendment and with the consent of the House I would withdraw it.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Clause 12 has reference to the case of a possible dispute as to the price to be paid for the use of power and it states that such dispute shall be settled by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. If any dispute should arise in connection with the purchase of power produced by this company, should the matter not be referred to some more local authority than the Board of Railway Commissioners?

Mr. HANSON: If I am in order I would like to answer that. The same point was debated in the Private Bills committee and the suggestion, I think, was advanced by myself that perhaps it ought to be under the board of public utilities for the province concerned; but inasmuch as this is a federal organization I understand it has been the general practice to refer matters of this kind to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada which is a body analogous to the public utilities commission of a province for just such purposes as this. It seems to have been passed unanimously by the committee with that statement and I would ask that the clause pass as it is because I still have confidence in the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

4 p.m.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman can speak only once on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. HEAPS: I was going to ask a question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I will allow one question.

Mr. HEAPS: Even if we assume that the Board of Railway Commissioners is a good authority to determine prices and profits, does the question of provincial jurisdiction not enter into the matter?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

VANCOUVER ELEVATORS

Mr. COOTE:

1. What was the total amount of grain handled by the Vancouver Harbour Commission's elevators during each of the last five years?
2. What were the total receipts from the operation of these elevators during the said years?
3. What was the total number of persons employed in the operation of the elevators during the said years?
4. What was the total amount of wages paid to said employees during these years?
5. What was the total amount and value of overages of all grain during said years?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1.

Crop year	Elevator No. 1	Elevator No. 2
1923-24 grain and screenings shipped	53,096,150	—
1924-25	18,907,378	4,606,038
1925-26 (to Apr. 30, 1926)	11,973,813	7,606,144

2. Total receipts of elevators (exclusive of value of overage):—

Crop year	Elevator No. 1	Elevator No. 2

PHILADELPHIA SESQUI-CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Is the government aware that a great international exposition is to be held at Philadelphia, known as the Sesqui-Centennial exposition?
2. Is it the intention of the government to make an exhibit at such exposition?
3. Has the government made any study of the advertising value of this exposition to Canadian business?
4. Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to advertise the tourist advantage of Canada at the said exposition?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. With respect to immigration, yes.
4. It is the intention of the Canadian National Railways to make a liberal distribution of our general literature setting forth the advantages of Canada from a tourist standpoint. This distribution will be made by a permanent office and staff located at Philadelphia. It is not the intention of the Canadian National Railways to have an exhibit at the exposition. It is also our understanding that neither the Canadian Pacific nor the Dominion government will have an exhibit.

FRENCH LANGUAGE—POSTAGE AND EXCISE STAMPS

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Can the government give assurance that, when any further issue of postage or excise stamps is made, they will carry out the provisions of our constitution by issuing them in the both languages?

2. If the stamps are to be issued in one language only, would it not be the proper course to have an English and French issue alternate, so as to satisfy the wishes of an important part of our population?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government will carefully consider the representations made by the hon. member in his question.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION—MR. CHARLES REID

Mr. COOTE:

1. Is Charles Reid in the employ of the Vancouver Harbour Commission?

2. If so, when was he appointed and what is his salary?

3. What duties does he perform?

4. Is this a new position?

5. If not, who formerly did this work and what was his salary?

6. Has Mr. Reid any other employment?

7. If so, what is the nature of said employment?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.

2. Appointed January 1, 1923, as comptroller and purchasing agent, salary $4,000 per annum.

3. From January 1, 1923, to October 15, 1924, performed the duties of comptroller and purchasing agent. From October 15, 1924, to date, as purchasing agent exclusively owing to enlarged scope of commissioners' activities.

4. Mr .Reid is the first incumbent.

5. Answered by No. 4.

6. No.

7. Answered by No. 6.

WHEAT GRADING

Mr. COOTE:

1. How much wheat inspected as "No Grade 2 Northern Tough" has been received into public terminal elevators at the port of Vancouver from September 1, 1925, to April 30, 1926?

2. How much of the said wheat has been dried?

3. After drying has any of this wheat been graded, "2 Northern"? If so, what was the amount?

4. After drying has any of this wheat been graded, "Dried 2 Northern"? If so, what amount?

5. After drying has any of this wheat been graded, "3 Northern"? If so, what amount?

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. In so far as the elevators of the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners are concerned, 1,134,759 bushels.

2. 1,133,617-20 bushels.

3. 640,147-40 bushels.

4. 458,770-20 bushels.

5. Nil.

OCEAN RATES—COMMITTEE EXPENSES

Mr. DOUCET:

What were the amounts, disbursed for the special committee on Ocean Rates 1925, (a) for witnesses, (b) for counsels, (c) for printing, and (d) other expenses?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

House of Commons:

A. Full amount paid to Mr. Symington in fees: No payments whatever have been made to Mr. Symington up to the present date; B. Amount in fees still due to Mr. Symington: Mr. Symington's remuneration was fixed at $200 per day. No account has yet been received from Mr. Symington but he was employed approximately 50 days at this rate which would bring the total due him to approximately, $10,000; C. Total amount paid and incurred for expenses to Mr. Symington: We have no other claim for expenses to Mr. Symington. Mr. MacDonald of Winnipeg was engaged as Mr. Symington's assistant. His account for fees and expenses, etc., amounts to approximately $2,800; D. Amount paid to each witness for fees and expenses: These accounts have been paid by the Ocean Freight Rates committee of the House totalling $639.50:

J. W. Alexander	$ 27 35
S. B. Brown	37 00
W. R. Caldwell	32 45
J. M. Carruthers	127 35

POWER PRIVILEGES IN NATIONAL PARKS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Has the government made any decision in connection with the application for power privileges at Spray lakes in the national park, Alberta?

2. Has the government in contemplation any legislation which will place the status of national parks upon a definite basis?

3. If so, is the intention in such legislation to grant industrial privileges within national parks areas only by an act of parliament?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. No.

2. None this session.

3. Matter under consideration pending such legislation.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—STATIONS CLOSED

Mr. EDWARDS (South Waterloo):

1. Is it the policy of the Canadian National Railways to close small stations?

2. If so, how many stations have been closed in each province?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING:

1. Yes, when the earnings are not sufficient to justify the expense.

2. From January 1, 1923, to December 31, 1925: British Columbia, 1; Alberta, 3; Saskatchewan, 1; Ontario, 17; Quebec, 8; New Brunswick, 2 Nova Scotia, nil.

GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS AT OTTAWA

Mr. DOUCET:

1. How many buildings are rented by the Dominion government in the city of Ottawa?

2. What rents are paid for said buildings?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Forty-eight.

2. $649,908 56.

McMURRAY DISTRICT OIL SANDS

Mr. O'NEILL:

1. How many leases are outstanding in the McMurray district for oil sands, what is the acreage and to whom are the leases given?

2. Are the leases in arrears, and, if so, to what extent?

3. Does the government regard the question of the extraction of the oil from the oil sands as settled from a commercial standpoint, and what information has the government on this subject?

4. Is the government making any tests for the commercial extraction of oil from the oil sands, and, if so, what?

5. Has the government given any bonus or assistance to finance the industry?

6. Is the government aware that it is claimed "that oil extracted from the oil sands can be cracked, by modern refining processes, and that 40 per cent of gasoline can be extracted from a barrel of oil which has been so taken?

7. If the government has not that information what information has it along the lines mentioned in the preceding question?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Tar sand lease No. 17. Recorded owner, Alberta Tar Sand Products, Limited. Area, 215 acres. Tar sand lease No. 20. Recorded owners, Thomas Draper and McMurray Asphaltum and Oil, Limited. Area, 1,603 acres.

2. The leases are not in arrears. The only remaining tar-sand location held under lease lies about five miles north of McKay and thirty-five miles distant from McMurray. It is assumed, therefore, that this location would not be considered as being in the McMurray district. The information respecting this lease is: Lease No. 15; recorded owner, The Consolidated Asphalt Corporation of Canada, Limited. Area, 1,825.2 acres. The rental of this lease is in arrears to the extent of $2,687.35.

3. The Department of Mines does not regard the question of the extraction of oil from the bituminous sands as settled from a commercial standpoint.

The files of the Department of Mines contain references to many proposed processes for the separation of oil from the sands and also copies of many process patents which have been issued in Canada; the United States and elsewhere. (A report on the bituminous sands of northern Alberta is now in press which contains some information with respect both to proposed processes and patents).

4. No tests for commercial extraction of oil from the bituminous sands are being made by Department of Mines.

5. No bonus or assistance in financing an oil extraction industry has been given or offered by the Department of Mines.

6. The Department of Mines is aware of the claim quoted.

7. The reference libraries of the department are provided with nearly all the published information with respect to processes for cracking and refining oils. (A list of references would require several weeks' time for preparation and would be very bulky.

The department is aware of the claims made for various processes and is fairly well informed from the technical literature and through its investigations respecting the progress that has been made in the experimental development of processes for the extraction of oils from the bituminous sands and the treatment of the oils extracted.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Mr. NEILL:

1. Have repeated representations been made to the government to the effect that a complete revision of the Canada Shipping Act is required?

2. Is it the intention of the government to introduce such legislation at this session?

3. Before such legislation is introduced, will the substance of it be submitted to the shipping interests and to the Masters' and Mates' Associations, so that they may have an opportunity of expressing their views?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.

2. It has not been found feasible to have the legislation ready for submission to parliament during the present session. It is confidently expected that a complete revision of the act will be undertaken during the next session of parliament.

3. Yes.

EMPIRE DAY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Why did not the government, on Empire Day, send a message of cordial goodwill and hearty appreciation and affection to the Mother Country?

2. Will any recognition of this event be yet taken by the government?

3. Why was the usual Empire Day message not forwarded as formerly?

4. Did the officials of the Department of External Affairs ask leave to do so, and what became of their request?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. It has not been the practice for the government of Canada under any administration to send an official message to Great Britain on Empire Day, nor for the government of Great Britain or any of the other dominions to send a similar message to Canada. The Prime Minister of Canada, however, has each year since his accession to office had pleasure in sending a message of goodwill to the Mother Country on Empire Day, on behalf of the government and people of Canada, through the London Times, and occasionally through other journals. This message was forwarded this year as usual.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Answered by No. 1.

GOVERNMENT TERMINAL ELEVATORS

Mr. GARDINER:

What was the total income and expenses for each of the government terminal elevators for the last crop year?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

	Income	Expenses, exclusive of interest and insurance
Port Arthur ..	$418,393 00	$142,833 72
Moose Jaw ..	14,907 29	42,652 16

IMMIGRANTS FROM HEBRIDES

Mr. GARDINER:

1. How many immigrants arrived in Canada during the last fiscal year from the Hebrides under the supervision of Father MacDonnell?

2. What salary was paid to Father MacDonnell?

3. What amount was paid to him for personal expenses?

4. What amount was paid for expenses other than personal?

5. How many, if any, have been deported or have returned to the Hebrides?

6. What were the reasons given for their deportation or return?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Sixty-nine, comprising twelve families—thirty-two adults and thirty-seven children.

2. $1,741.94.

3. $2,177.76.

4. None.

5. One family, comprising one adult and five children, was deported.

6. Public charge.

MURRAY CANAL BRIDGEKEEPER

Mr. MAYBEE:

1. Who laid the complaint responsible for the dismissal of Mr. John Hanna, bridgekeeper, Murray canal?

2. Was an investigation held in this matter, by whom, what charges were submitted, and by whom?

3. Is it not the policy of the government to hold investigations in such matters before taking action or making dismissals?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING:

1. Charles Hanna, Esq., M.P.

2. No.

3. For many years, the written declaration of a member of parliament to the effect that, to his knowledge, a government employee has been guilty of political partisanship, with a request for his dismissal, has been deemed sufficient grounds for dismissal without investigation.

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale):

What is the estimated loss to Canada in rural mail delivery?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: It is not possible to accurately estimate the profit or loss to Canada on rural mail delivery. Rural mail delivery is a factor in the settlement of agricultural lands and is an attractive aid to immigration. Rural mail delivery indirectly produces a large part of the revenue of large city offices such as Toronto, Winnipeg, Regina. In addition, it provides service which would otherwise have to be provided through the medium of post offices and the ordinary mail service system. The cost is $2,750,000; but there are no means of computing requirements and estimating the cost of a substitute service.

GRAIN EXPORTS

Mr. DOUCET:

How many bushels of Canadian grain have been shipped through the port of Portland, Maine, during the years 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924 and 1925, respectively?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

Calendar Years	Bushels
1918	20,755,240
1919	15,873,522
1920	9,967,333
1921	12,184,027
1922	19,718,465

MR. E. J. SEXSMITH

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac Addington):

1. Has E. J. Sexsmith, ex-M.P., for Lennox and Addington, been recently appointed to a government position?

2. If so, what is the nature of the position, when was the appointment made and what is the salary?

3. Did the Civil Service Commission advertise for the above position?

4. If so, when and what are the names of those who applied?

5. Was E. J. Sexsmith appointed on his merits after competitive examination?

6. If not, on whose recommendation was he appointed?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. Yes.

2. Field supervisor of Indian soldier settlers; appointed May 14, 1926; salary $1,800 per annum.

3, 4, 5 and 6. Appointments of this nature are not under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission; this appointment was made under the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act of 1919 as administered by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

CARDSTON BLOOD INDIAN RESERVE

Mr. FRED DAVIS (East Calgary) moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the department and any persons whomsoever, with regard to the suspension of Indian Agent Faunt of the Blood Indian reserve at Cardston. Also a copy of the report sent to the department by Inspector Christensen of Regina in this connection.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Although this notice of motion has been standing for some days I have just learned that the Indian agent in question has not been suspended, and in fairness to him I think this motion should be changed. Our investigation is now complete and if that change is made I can supply the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might read "suspension or otherwise."

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think the word "suspension" should appear at all. Let the motion stand and I will have it amended to-morrow.

Motion stands.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PROPOSED SUBWAY UNDER LACHINE CANAL

Mr. GUERIN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams between the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or any officer of those departments and public bodies or private individuals of Montreal or other parts of Canada in connection with the construction of a subway under Lachine canal in St. Ann's division, city of Montreal.

SADDLE LAKE INDIAN RESERVE

Mr. BURY:

For a copy of all orders in council, regulations, directions, correspondence and all other documents passed between the government or any minister or department of the government and the Saddle Lake Indian Band, or the Soldier Settlement Board, or the Indian agent of the said reserve or any person or persons, or between the said Soldier Settlement Board or the said Indian agent and any person or persons relating to or in connection with the surrender or sale of any portion of the Saddle Lake reserve during the years 1925 and 1926, including the conditions of such sale and all reports made thereon and including also the names, addresses and occupations of,

(a) The applicants for purchase;

(b) The applicants who balloted for the right to purchase;

(c) The successful purchasers or allottees with the number of acres purchased by or alloted to each;

(d) The names and addresses of such of the said successful purchasers or allottees as were at the date of the said sale bona fide farmers, and the acreage then being actually farmed by each;

(e) The names and addresses of such of said last-mentioned persons as carried on any other profession or business in addition to farming, and the description of such additional occupation.

BURGLARY ST. JOHN GOVERNMENT OFFICE

Mr. MacLAREN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports, memoranda, orders in council and other documents, relating to the burglary which took place in the Canadian government office, King street, St. John, New Brunswick, in the year 1917.

BOUNDARY WATERS TREATY

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM THE NIAGARA RIVER AND REMEDIAL WORKS

Hon. EDMUND BRISTOL (Toronto East Centre) moved:

Whereas, Article V of the Treaty between the United States of America and the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British dominions beyond the seas, proclaimed May 13, 1910 and relating to boundary waters between the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada, reads as follows:—

"The high contracting parties agree that it is expedient to limit the diversion of waters from the Niagara river so that the level of Lake Erie and the flow of the stream shall not be appreciably affected. It is the desire of both parties to accomplish this object with the least possible injury to investments which have already been made in the construction of power plants on the United States side of the river under grants of authority from the state of New York, and on the Canadian side of the river under licenses authorized by the Dominion of Canada and the province of Ontario.

So long as this treaty shall remain in force, no diversion of the waters of the Niagara river above the falls from the natural course and stream thereof shall be permitted except for the purposes and to the extent hereinafter provided.

The United States may authorize and permit the diversion within the state of New York of the waters of said river above the falls of Niagara, for power purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of twenty thousand cubic feet of water per second.

The United Kingdom, by the Dominion of Canada, or the province of Ontario, may authorize and permit the diversion within the province of Ontario of the waters of said river above the falls of Niagara, for power purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of thirty-six thousand cubic feet of water per second.

The prohibitions of this article shall not apply to the diversion of water for sanitary or domestic purposes, or for the service of canals for the purposes of navigation."

Whereas, official engineering reports of both governments show that about ninety-five per centum of the flow of the Niagara river passes over the Horseshoe falls, largely on the Canadian side of the International boundary line; that the erosion caused thereby is rapidly changing the contour of the Horseshoe falls and is threatening the ultimate destruction of its scenic beauty unless the flow over the falls is lessened and remedial works are constructed to spread the flow of the waters at the crest of the Horseshoe falls;

Whereas, the limited amount of the waters of Niagara river permitted by Article V of the Boundary Waters treaty to be diverted in both the United States of America and in the Dominion of Canada from Niagara river from above the falls of Niagara for power purposes, have already been wholly diverted and utilized in the generation of hydro-electric power, the demand for which is increasing in the province of Ontario more rapidly than the same can be generated and supplied to its customers by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, rendering necessary the early resort to steam generated electric power, unless Article V is promptly amended to provide for a greater diversion of the waters of Niagara river from above the falls of Niagara;

Whereas, the utilization of the waters of the Niagara river provide the most expeditious, efficient and economical source of electric energy in the Dominion of Canada, whereby to supply its municipalities, citizens and industries with cheap electricity which is one of the most important factors in the public, private, social, economic and industrial development of this Dominion;

Whereas, the diversion of the waters of the Niagara river from above the falls can safely be increased to a total of eighty thousand cubic feet per second without the installation of remedial works, and such increased diversion will tend to lessen the erosion and to prevent the anticipated "Suicide of Niagara", and so to preserve the scenic beauty of the cataracts and rapids, a still greater diversion with more favourable results being permissible provided the interested governments shall determine on the remedial works to spread the flow of the waters above the crest of the falls;

Whereas, the government of the United States of America has intimated its willingness to conduct negotiations with the United Kingdom through this Dominion of Canada further to protect and preserve the natural and scenic beauty of the falls and rapids of the Niagara, which can only be accomplished by amendment of Article V of the Boundary Waters treaty; and

Whereas this government recognizes and acknowledges the urgency of co-operative action with the government of the United States of America to the end that the splendor of the cataracts of Niagara may be protected and preserved and the imperative electric power needs of the Dominion may be supplied.

Now, be it resolved: that the parliament of Canada should instruct and authorize the Honourable, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to communicate to the proper officials of the government of the United States of America the willingness of this Dominion to discuss the advisability of amending article V of the Boundary Waters treaty, proclaimed May 13, 1910, with reference to an increase in the amount of water permitted to be diverted on each side of the international boundary from the Niagara river above the falls for power purposes and in reference to the joint construction of remedial works for the protection and preservation of the scenic beauty and splendour of the cataracts and rapids of Niagara.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion went on the order paper on January 8, of this year, and I discovered at that time that the government were giving the subject matter consideration; therefore the motion has stood over till the present time. Now, with the approval of the Premier of Ontario I want to introduce it for the consideration of the House, as I think it is, without exception, one of the most important matters affecting the people of Canada and particularly the people of Ontario. The privy council have recently decided in a case affecting the province of Quebec and important matters bearing upon provincial rights, that it is clear that the province of Ontario and the state of New York jointly own the waters at Niagara falls. It is not, of course, a navigation question, it is purely a power question, with which is mixed up the scenic beauty of the falls, under a former treaty with the United States.

Now the water-powers of this country are day by day becoming of more vital importance than they were in the early stages of our history because of our knowledge of what can be done with electric energy. The great province of Quebec has probably the largest power interests in the world. On the St. Lawrence river, within fifty miles of Montreal, they have within their jurisdiction about 2,700,000 horse-power, and this and other water-power developments within that province are of great provincial and national importance. Sometimes I am sorry that the Dominion does not own those vast resources, which would go far to pay off the national debt.

As soon as you get beyond the boundaries of Quebec you have on the one side the province of Ontario and on the other the state of New York. It has I believe been decided legally that one-half of the water-power on the St. Lawrence belongs to the state of New York and the other half to the province of Ontario. At Niagara falls the same situation exists. The vital importance of this matter and its relation to section 5 of the treaty is self evident. Section 5 is not affected by any other section of the treaty, nor is it affected by any dispute which has arisen or might arise under the treaty generally. Section 5 merely deals with the property of citizens of the state of New York and of Ontario. Any amendment of that section under the laws of this country is under the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada, and of Great Britain as representing Canada in dealing with the government at Washington with respect to treaty matters. But I know the government of Canade are fair to the province of Ontario; that they are prepared to protect the interests of the province and are acting in concert therewith.

Now whatever disputes may arise under the act, if there are any, I want to call attention to the fact that section 5 is not one with which we should concern ourselves at the moment. The state of New York for over three years has been trying to get the government of the United States to take action. In order to show the position of that state, I should like to read a few extracts from a speech made by the Hon. S. Wallace Dempsey, Chairman of Rivers and Harbours committee, before the mayors of the cities of the state of New York at Buffalo, June 14, 1923. I think these extracts will be considered of great national importance because in my humble judgment they express a fair and proper view of this question and also of the friendly relationships that must and should exist between Canada, Great Britain and the United States. Mr. Dempsey said:

> The development of such water as can be diverted from the falls, at Niagara, without impairment of its natural grandeur, is one of the most important of the water-power development problems confronting the country. The question is not alone one of conserving the limited coal supply of the country, but it involves as well the transportation question, which is pressing for solution and becomes acute whenever we have prosperous times, with good crops and factories running full time.
> However, as has been said, the development of our water-power is one of the most important factors in the solution of the very serious transportation problem which now faces us and is bound, with the prosperity and growth of the country, to become more acute before it is solved.
> Two hundred and twenty-six thousand cubic feet per second come down the Niagara to the falls. Canada and the United States have agreed, by treaty, to divert 56,000 cubic feet per second for power purposes—36,000 on the Canadian side, and 20,000 in this State. The cataract is divided into two falls—the American, between the American shore and Goat Island, and the Horseshoe or Canadian falls, between the island and the Canadian shore. The visitors who view this world's wonder find that the American fall is 1,000 feet wide and has an ample flow of water over its entire width. He learns, on the other hand, that the Canadian or Horseshoe falls is about 3,000 feet wide and sees that a great portion of that width has a very shallow supply of water, being for broad widths, nearly bare; that the fall is horseshoe in shape, with almost the whole of the vast volume of water flowing over it at the centre of the horseshoe, and that this concentration of water, with its force and power, is rapidly wearing away and impairing the beauty of the falls. Yet the American falls carries only 10,000 cubic feet per second, while the Canadian falls has the enormous volume of 160,000 cubic feet per second. If the flow of water was spread on the Canadian falls, as it is on the American falls, over the entire width, to cover its 3,000 feet stretch, the Canadian falls would need only three times as much as the American falls, or 30,000 cubic feet per second, to give it ample water and conserve the entire beauty and grandeur of the falls, and corrective works can be placed on the river, at a reasonable cost, which will spread the flow of the water over the Canadian falls and make a flow over the entire 3,000 feet just as the 1,000 feet of the American falls is covered. Allowing 30,000 feet per second for the Canadian falls and 10,000 additional to insure against any possibility of miscalculation, we could have, after deducting this 40,000 cubic feet, the 10,000 cubic feet which fall over the American falls and the 56,000 cubic feet now diverted for power purposes, 120,000 c.s.f. remaining, which can be diverted without any injury whatever to the falls.

This calculation was made three years ago, but the calculations recently made by American and Canadian engineers with a view of finding out what really can be done show 3,600,000 horse power available to the two countries.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Under whose instruction was this report prepared?

Mr. BRISTOL: I understand it was prepared for the governments of the province of Ontario, the Dominion of Canada and the United States. I have not seen these reports personally but I am taking these statements, and those going into the matter will have to verify them. I am not an engineer, but the average given me by engineers is ten tons of coal to an electrical horse power, which means that instead of a saving of 24,000,000 tons of coal there would be a saving of 36,000,000 tons. I am told that coal is worth about $10 per ton, which means that about $360,000,000 is going to waste yearly. Taking it from another point of view, the 3,600,000 horse power belongs equally to the United States and Canada, and we are losing half that amount of money yearly or about $500,000 per day. Mr. Dempsey goes on to say:

> This water-power is an all year round power, the most dependable and the best water-power in the world. It can be developed and furnished at the lowest cost per horse-power. And, from this 120,000 cubic feet, we can develop practically four million additional horse-power, the equivalent of twenty-four million tons of coal—1/125 of all the coal mined in the United States.
> It has been shown that this power can be developed without lessening, but, on the contrary, heightening the grandeur and beauty of the falls. This power can be furnished the consumer at a much less rate than he can generate from coal. The average cost of power generated from coal is, at the present price of coal, $60 per horse-power, and water-power can be furnished from Niagara to the people of our state at half that price. The demand for power is growing rapidly and steadily, and it must be supplied either from coal or from water-jower. Should we not then bend every energy to see that a new treaty is enacted without delay, so that our people may be furnished with this cheap power; that the railroads may be relieved by this one development of carrying 1/125 of their present total tonnage; and the farmer and manufacturer be given the benefit of this carrying capacity to market the products which he has produced; that the demand upon our coal mines may be lessened to this very great extent and the likelihood of a coal shortage or famine be greatly lessened, and that we may, by reducing to this appreciable extent, the demand for coal increase, in some measure, the chances of reduction in the price of coal?

[Mr. Bristol.]

While this next extract is perhaps not relevant, I think it is a proper thing to read now. In his remarks Mr. Dempsey says:

> The question of the diversion of water for power, at Niagara, is only one of the many great questions now pending and which will constantly arise between the two countries. If the two countries are to prosper, if they are to have their legitimate growth and development, they must settle the questions that arise between them in an amicable, equitable, give and take way, each remembering that an unconscionable or unfair advantage obtained at one time is sure to be in the mind of her neighbour and may be retaliated many fold when a new question between them must be settled. . . . .
> The negotiations for a permanent treaty should be undertaken immediately. All that is necessary is the bringing to the attention of the Departments of Foreign Affairs of the two countries the situation as it exists and how easy and immediate the remedy can be. In doing this, the action of just such bodies as that which is in session here will be invaluable. To lessen our transportation problem, to help make our coal problem less acute, to lessen the cost of manufacturing—in consequence, the cost of the manufactured product to the consumer and the cost of living—and to make the state of New York and the province of Ontario even more desirable places in which to live than they are to-day. I urge that this association bring this matter of the increased diversion to the attention of the State department of the United States, leaving it to act as, with the relations and conditions between the two countries, shall be best and most likely to bring a quick and favourable termination of the negotiations.

I have a number of quotations which I do not intend to read, but I think this opinion, given by a distinguished minister of the United States government, might fairly be taken to explain the reasons why prompt action should be taken. I would like to give an extract now from an article written by Mr. Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce of the United States, on Government and Power Development, appearing in the English Review at page 786 et seq:

> The real purpose of all this development will be not to make self-satisfying statistics or to provide means for insurance of new stocks and bonds. Its real purpose will be this: That through more power we shall make a still greater saving in labour, shall increase the product of labour, and shall lessen the burden upon labour. Thus we shall gain in higher standards of living, and in wider enjoyment and comfort to every fireside—a goal which should be the sole end and purpose of the economic effort of every nation.
> The new vista in progress which has been opened to us is due to the perfection in transmission of electric energy up to 200 or even 300 miles and to higher mechanical efficiency of our generators, with capacities reaching up to 70,000 horse power in a single machine. With these twin developments comes the opportunity to generate power in much larger and more economically located stations and to harness and bring to the centres of population water powers which were too remote for use even ten years ago. . . .
> When the energy can be supplied in the form of electricity and delivered over a wire, and when the supply is equally available in country and city, there will no longer be occasion for the crowding we now deplore. . . .

The indirect results, both human and material, are more important than the preceding statements would imply; for no account has been taken of the vast losses to industry and to commerce by the actual interruption and threatened interruption of fuel supplies to our several hundred thousand independent steam units, no account of the relief to shippers from already overburdened transportation and terminal facilities, no account of the increased production of factories from cheaper power, no account of the reduction in physical labour, and the increase in comfort.

To secure the rapid adoption of these demonstratedly possible results is of profound public importance.

The last extract I will read is a short statement from the report of the New York State Power Commission to the legislature of the state of New York, which body approved of the report, made in 1924:

A revision of the treaty on boundary waters for the purpose of securing an increase in the amount of water that may be diverted from the Niagara river for power purposes, is urged by the commission, inasmuch as it is provided in any plan for increasing the amount of diversion to safeguard the scenic beauty of the falls.

The full amount of water permitted to be diverted from the Niagara river on the American side has been utilized since July, 1922. At the present time, a large addition to the steam plant of the Buffalo General Electric Company is being made for supplying the increased demand for current in western New York. Current generated at the falls is sold at prices below the prices for current produced by steam.

The development of energy from an increased diversion will make available down the years a large amount of power which may be furnished at a cheaper rate than steam produced power.

In 1910, when this treaty was made, there was very little known about power production. The Niagara Falls Power Company, which was in existence then, had 100,000 horse power, and only used 100 feet of fall. To-day the Hydro-Electric Power Company have a fall of 315 feet, and whereas the old company develops only 10 horse power to the foot, the Hydro-Electric Company develops 35 horse power to the foot fall, so it can readily be seen what a vast change has taken place. The United States has passed legislation that no longer could a company proceed to get power for any length of time if they only took the 100 foot drop. They have to get all the power out of the water available at the falls, and the only company to do that to-day is the Hydro-Electric Power Company. They have not enough power. It is quite current in our papers that Canada has 36,000 second-feet, and the United States only 20,000 second-feet. When that treaty was made, the United States had two power companies in Canada shipping power into the United States, and that power came out of that 36,000 second-feet belonging to Canada. So that ever since the treaty was made the United States has been getting more power from Niagara Falls than Canada. That, of course, was a matter of arrangement. We used only about 3,000 horse power when the treaty was passed.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): That is not the case now.

Mr. BRISTOL: I hope the hon. gentleman will speak after me, because he is familiar with this question, but with all respect to my hon. friend, on information from the head of the Hydro-Electric Company, the United States are still getting more power from the falls to-day than is Canada. I think the proportion is about 29,000 for Canada and 31,000 for the United States. That was my information a few days ago.

So far as this Niagara Falls question is concerned, it is not a new one. Sir Adam Beck, when he built that famous hydro plant of his—and it is the best in the world—bought enough land on one side of where the water comes from, that is from Chippawa down to Queenston, to build another plant just as big, and that right of way has been in existence now for four years. I am told that he was trying during his lifetime to get some agreement made through the government of Canada with the United States so that he could get more power at the falls, but whatever the reason of the refusal may have been, it looks now as if the two countries were getting together on this matter, which is of the greatest importance both to the state of New York and the province of Ontario.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What about the Chicago diversion?

Mr. BRISTOL: What about it?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Are we getting together on that?

Mr. BRISTOL: The state of New York, and twenty-one states altogether, are behind the American government in the legal battle with Chicago. There are ten states down south that are fighting with Chicago. The case is now before the Supreme Court of the United States, and it is for that court to decide, but why the province of Ontario and the state of New York should not have their own power properly developed is something I cannot understand; I cannot see the logic of it. The state of New York is fighting our battle. They need power just the same as we do, and the state of New York will be entitled to one-half of whatever we get. I think the province of Ontario should get what belongs to it, and the state of New York should get what belongs to it.

I have perhaps spoken too long on this matter. I have a feeling that if the engineering statements are correct—and I believe that the best engineers we can secure and the best engineers the United States can secure are right—it is obviously a national crime to both countries for the present state of affairs to continue. The people of this generation in the state of New York and in the province of Ontario, and perhaps elsewhere in Canada and the United States, should have the use of this 3,600,000 horse power a year, or, if you like to put it that way, of this 36,000,000 tons of coal. This power can be produced probably cheaper than any other power that now remains in the world, except, perhaps, the power on the St. Lawrence. Taking the cost of the coal at $10 a ton, it means that we are throwing away $360,000,000 a year through not using this power, or about $1,000,000 a day. That does seem foolish, or crazy, if you want to put it that way, because this is power to which every man and woman in Ontario and Quebec and every man and woman in the state of New York are entitled to have the benefit of. This power belongs to the state of New York and to the province of Ontario, and its development will cheapen production in the state of New York and in this province for every man and every woman in that territory. In the words of Mr. Hoover, it would be a national crime if we did not as soon as possible see what changes can be made. The engineers have admitted that the scenic beauty of the falls can be preserved for all time. It will not longer be committing suicide, as Mr. Hoover describes it, to use this power. The front portion of the Horseshoe falls will have to be raised up with asphalt and other material, so that you will have the same level on our side of the falls as on the American side. To retain the scenic beauty of the falls—and it is disappearing at the rate of eight feet a year—you have to raise the level of the water of the Horseshoe falls and if you do not use that water so raised for power purposes you would flood the state of New York and the province of Ontario.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Five feet a year.

Mr. BRISTOL: I saw it put at eight feet. I sincerely hope that the province of Ontario and the state of New York will get that power for the benefit of their people at an early date.

[Mr. Bristol.]

Mr. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): This question, Mr. Speaker, is one that is interesting, I take it, to the whole country. It certainly is of interest to us who live close to the falls. The first thing it strikes me that we have got to do is to preserve the scenic beauty of the falls. What effect will it have upon the falls to make the diversion of water to the extent that the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Bristol) has mentioned? That is not exactly known, but I can say to the House this much: The Parks commission, who have in their keeping the water of Niagara Falls, have been in close touch with this matter for thirty-five years, and I can say this also to the House, that the amount of breaking back of the falls amounts to five feet every year. That takes place at the peak of the Horseshoe falls, and it can be prevented. Not only that, but the scenic beauty of the falls can be preserved and a lot of water diverted to commercial purposes provided we go about the matter in the right way.

Now as to the method to be adopted for the preservation of the falls and the utilization of the water at the same time, I can say this much further: Anybody who has been there will know that the volume of water is in the centre of the Horseshoe falls. All that needs to be done to spread the flow of water over the whole area of the brink of the falls is to provide remedial works of a very inexpensive nature that will stop, or tend to stop to a great extent, the erosion at the centre of the Horseshoe falls. I do not know whose duty it is to carry out that work, but it is a very important matter. If it be true that you can prevent further erosion and at the same time preserve the scenic beauty and then utilize the remainder of the water for commercial purposes, see what an immense asset you have. For the information of the House I can say that the 10,000 cubic second feet that is being diverted by Chicago would be equal if utilized at Chippawa to 330,000 horse power. That is what Chicago is stealing from us to-day. I ask hon. gentlemen to pause and consider what that means. Now if an additional 10,000 cubic second feet will provide 330,000 or 350,000 horse power at Chippawa on a fall of 315 feet, then twelve times that amount will yield three and a half million horse power such as my hon. friend (Mr. Bristol) has spoken of. One of the members from Toronto asked how the calculation was made. The calculation is correct; the engineers of the Park commission have compiled the data.

To illustrate further what the Chicago diversion means, all you have got to do is to visualize a stream of water three times the width of this chamber with a depth of ten feet. That will enable you to realize what Chicago is stealing from this country. In the face of that is it any wonder that lake Erie, lake Huron, and the other lakes, are being emptied of water? Something must be done in this matter without further delay. I have been a member of this House for a number of years and whether we are getting anywhere on this question I cannot say; but I realize that nothing effective is coming from any protest we are making: Chicago keeps on taking the water, and the level of the lakes continues to fall. We have noticed that the water of lake Erie, for example, is going down at the rate of six inches a year. I happen to belong to a shooting club that had shooting and fishing rights at Port Rowan on lake Erie, and during the last three years the water on the marshes there has receded 32 inches. Just imagine a situation of that kind. I only mention it to illustrate what happened on these lakes. It will not be long before this government will have to spend thousands upon thousands of dollars in order to keep the inland harbours of this country open.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): We are spending large sums now.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Yes, and if this situation continues we shall have to spend a great deal more. It seems to me that a concerted effort should be made by the Dominion and the provinces, especially the province of Ontario, to bring about remedial measures. The federal government and the provincial authorities should co-operate in an endeavour to prevent a further continuance of what is happening on these lakes.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I have no complaint to make about any of the statements made by the hon. member for Toronto East Centre (Mr. Bristol) or the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin). The matter of developing increased power at Niagara is receiving our very active consideration. I was delegated by this government to go to Washington a short time ago and discuss the matter with the Secretary of State, and may I say that all our negotiations with respect to this and other international matters are carried on directly with the Washington authorities. While there I discovered that there is a wish there to discuss the whole problem.

The hon. member for Lincoln has spoken of the lowering of the lake levels. The hon. member for Toronto East Centre has discussed not only the lowering of the lakes but also the Chicago diversion. While the latter question incidentally plays some part in the matter it ought not to be a factor in delaying the completion of an understanding about the power development at Niagara. That is a point I wish to make, and it is one I urged very strongly at Washington. I pointed out that this question was vital to the province of Ontario for the reason that the Chippawa power plant is advantageously located for the distribution of power throughout central and southwestern Ontario, and the development of increased power there would be beneficial to the power users of the province. Furthermore a great deal of money has been spent in developing the Chippawa plant, and they are getting the highest efficiency out of the use of the water there, perhaps higher than anywhere else in the world. For that reason we want the full concurrence and assistance of the Ontario government in whatever steps we take. I may say that we have kept them very thoroughly informed as to every move we are making in connection with this matter.

On going to Washington I found that the American authorities were particularly concerned about the preservation of the scenic beauty of the falls, taking the ground that that must be the first consideration—with which we agreed—and that before there was talk of diversion that problem must be taken up and satisfactorily settled. Needless to say, that will be solved by the better distribution of the flow of water across the face of the falls, which will prevent what the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) has just pointed out, the rapid rate of erosion, without endangering the scenic beauty, and will permit a further utilization of the flow of water in addition to that already in use. But that is a question that will be settled by the investigation which is about to take place.

May I say for the information of the House that we have named Mr. Biggar, the Chief Electoral Officer, to go to Washington, meet representatives of the government there and discuss in detail the investigation that must take place—first as to the preservation of the scenic properties of the falls, and secondly as to what further amounts of water can be diverted.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will Ontario be represented through the Dominion government?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What we want to hear now is what Ontario's attitude is in this matter. Is the hon. member for Toronto East Centre speaking for Ontario or not?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The province of Ontario is quite in agreement with us in the matter, and all we are waiting for at the moment is an answer from the American government as to whom they propose to name to meet our representatives. Then we shall get busy at once on this very important question.

I think it is unnecessary for me at this stage to enter upon any discussion of the question of the Chicago diversion or the lowering of the lake levels. That is a matter which perhaps can be discussed at a later date. I think on a former occasion I stated that when the report of the joint engineering board came in we might very properly discuss the problem of the lowering of the lake levels. I quite agree with the hon. member for Lincoln that the diversion at Chicago plays an important part in the reduction of our lake levels, but I wish to say, in fairness to all parties concerned, that there is a very considerable lowering of the levels in lake Superior not affected by the diversion in Chicago at all. So that irrespective of the diversion at Chicago we are coming to a period of drought that is having an effect on the lake levels.

Mr. MANION: Lake Superior has come up considerably in the last year.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The record over a considerable period of years shows that at times the levels are lower owing to climatic conditions. But it is the intention of the two governments to make a thorough study of all matters pertaining to the lake levels, and to make recommendations that may be effective in preventing the lakes from again going to the extremely low level they may touch this year.

Mr. MANION: Is it not all the worse if, having regard to their present low level, they take advantage of that diversion to lower them still more?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I do not want to raise a question as to the qualifications of the gentlemen who have been named by the minister—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Only one name.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): —but I should like to ask the minister if there should not be somebody with him to advise him? Is the minister going to make an arrangement of that kind?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Biggar is only the legal adviser.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who are the others?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Johnston, our water-power engineer, who succeeded the late Mr. Stewart, and Mr. Camsell, our geologist. They will be the two men who will appear for Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose that this matter will not be tied up with the development of the St. Lawrence and thus delay it?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the government should make it perfectly clear that we will not be tied up by associating the troubles of the lower St. Lawrence with the necessities of Niagara, and that the personnel will not be too much mixed up.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is what I was trying to convey to the House, namely, that what I endeavoured to secure at Washington was action on the Niagara situation, quite apart from the St. Lawrence or the lake levels or Chicago, having in mind the interests of Ontario. That is what we are doing at the moment. We are not asking the United States government to consider any other question—simply the preservation of the scenic properties of the falls, and further diversion for power purposes.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): What board is Mr. Johnston on?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Johnston succeeded the late Mr. Stewart on the Niagara power board, which has been in existence for a couple of years. Representatives of both governments have been on it.

Mr. BRISTOL: They go there and report to you and do not conclude any matters at all?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. BRISTOL: It is only fair perhaps to consider that the state of New York, whose case I was presenting with that of the province of Ontario, is suffering just as much as we are.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): For whom is the hon. member for Toronto East Centre speaking?

Mr. BRISTOL: I told my hon. friend that I was speaking with the authority of the Premier of Ontario and nobody else.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I would like to have some assurance of that.

Mr. BRISTOL: You can get it from the Premier of Ontario.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I think the question is brought forward by some of the super-power interests which are becoming permanent interests. While the hon. member says we are going to make cheap power for poor people, is he not making cheap power for profiteers?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend wants to make a speech, I would remind him that I have not concluded.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Go ahead.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Having in mind that we are doing practically everything that my hon. friend desires us to do, and that we are particularly engaged at the moment on this very question, I would appreciate it if my hon. friend would withdraw his resolution.

Mr. BRISTOL: I am perfectly willing to withdraw it.

Mr. GEARY: When the minister says he is engaged on the same matter as is the subject of this resolution, does he mean there are instructions going forward from our government to the Imperial government to rearrange section 5 of the treaty?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, I thought I made that clear. We are dealing directly with the United States government, but with respect to the treaty we must first arrive at a basis upon which an amendment to the treaty may be made.

Mr. GEARY: The whole matter is fraught with great difficulty. There are combinations affecting it on every side. There are threats that we may in some way suffer through some approval of the Chicago diversion, or that our large enterprises on the St. Lawrence may be delayed in some way. I expect these are matters that are present to the mind of those who are negotiating, but until we get further information I fail to see that it would be wise for this House to tie itself to any course of action.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In view of the remarks made by my hon. friend, it might be of interest to the House to know that recently when we had a visit from His Excellency the British Ambassador at Washington to our capital the government took advantage of the presence of His Excellency to discuss with him very fully the whole question of the diversion of power at Chicago and other matters relating to water levels on the Great Lakes, and also the question of the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls, and to ask His Excellency whether in his opinion everything was being done that it was possible to have done at Washington from the point of view of both the interests of Canada and any interests of the British Empire in a large way that might be involved. The opinion given by Sir Esme Howard was that everything that could possibly be done was being done in the right way, both as respects the representations by Canada to the United States, and as to the British government being kept fully informed of all negotiations. I mention that because two or three times there has been a question in this House which rather implied that, in the view of some hon. members, negotiations should be conducted through the foreign office in Great Britain. The British Ambassador was quite emphatic in his view that the procedure had been regular in every particular both as regards our relations with the United States and any relations the foreign office might wish to have considered in the matter. As regards some of the matters we are discussing here to-day, the British Ambassador felt that being the subject of negotiation it was just as well that too much be not said publicly at the present time. Hon. members have, I believe, had that aspect of the situation in view this afternoon.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): If Canada is to make a declaration in regard to this matter it should be made by the government of the Dominion, associated with Ontario if the province cares to join. But I do not want any declaration made in the way it has been made here, without the responsibility of the government going with it. A private member makes a proposal, and I again ask who are the super-power people who are ready to menace our supply hereafter? I do not know who they are, but it has not been stated here to-day for whom the hon. member for Toronto East Centre (Mr. Bristol) speaks.

Mr. BRISTOL: Yes, I told the hon. member.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): He does not make out a clear case.

Mr. BRISTOL: Why do you not telephone the Premier of Ontario, instead of talking nonsense? I did it under the instruction of the Premier of the province of Ontario.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The document has not been produced.

Mr. BRISTOL: I do not have to produce it. The Premier telephoned the leader of the House to the same effect and later told me to go on with the motion.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): That is what I want to get at.

Mr. BRISTOL: When did the hon. member become leader?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I do not pretend to be, but I am a citizen of Toronto, of Canada.

Mr. BRISTOL: What harm is this doing to Canada?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): My position is this: I am perfectly satisfied with the statement made by the government to-day that they are taking up the matter; that it will be worked out, and that the rights of Ontario and Canada will be protected. The two nations are vitally interested in the levels of our lakes and the flow of water in our rivers. This is our greatest asset and I do not like to see a motion come up in a round-about way like this. I should prefer that a debate take place in the Ontario legislature in regard to it and to hear from the new chairman of the Hydro-Electric Commission and all these other commissions. The government should see that no declaration is made by this House, but for the time being the matter should be left in the hands of the two governments so that they may work out a progressive and national policy which will preserve these waters, the beauties of the Niagara falls, and if possible deepen our harbours and increase the depth of the upper lakes.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is withdrawn I should like to direct the minister's attention to some criticism that I have passed in earlier discussions in this connection. My criticism has always been that there has been a lack of co-operation of Canadian interests in this whole matter; that for a long time both the federal government and the provincial government took no action whatever as to the scenic effect of the Niagara falls, as to the condition along our shores and so on. But one body which took some interest during the past number of years was the shipping interests although the minister some time ago did not seem to think their interests were common with those of the federal government. I strongly opposed that because this is a very important matter to Canada and every force should be impelled along one channel. This government should be united with the shipping interests of Canada and it should not be possible to say in this House that a committee had met in Detroit and another committee had gone to Washington whose objects and works the government knew nothing about. Consequently, if this government cannot do anything else they can unite every interest, shipping, provincial and federal, and get busy on this question because it is a very important one.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, am I to understand from the Prime Minister that such negotiations as go on at the present time will not result in any definite action until this House has some opportunity of discussing the matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rather hope that some definite action will come before there is occasion to discuss it further. There is a reference to a joint committee dealing with the question of the scenic beauty of the falls and it is to be hoped that they will arrive at conclusions fairly summarily. I think I can assure my hon. friend that no treaty will be consummated between this country and the United States without the House having an opportunity of approving it in the first instance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It could not be consummated otherwise.

Mr. GEARY: I was going to point out in connection with that that the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission had within the last two weeks entered into a contract with power interests on the Gatineau river for the purchase of power at a rather high price, owing to a threatened shortage in its supplies which are mainly derived from the Niagara Falls. The longer we are delayed in going ahead with the St. Lawrence development the more pressing is the need for Ontario to get a power supply. The logical places for the power to come from are the Niagara and St. Lawrence rivers. I understand we are not to have a report as to the St. Lawrence development until some time during the present month, and I had hoped that this report would be ready before the House prorogues. I trust the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Interior will keep this matter very well to the fore because we are suffering in Ontario from a lack of electric power. Our people have become users of electrical power in a big way and they should not be handicapped or delayed any further than is absolutely necessary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, there is not or, if there is, there ought not to be very much difference of opinion as to the present situation. It is a situation which ought to be considered entirely apart from the Chicago trouble because if it is going to take as long to settle it as it has taken to get anything done in connection with the Chicago trouble, Ontario will have to look elsewhere for electric power. But apart from that altogether it is something which ought not to be tied up with the Chicago trouble unless we come to the conclusion that the abstraction of water from lake Michigan by Chicago is such a marked departure from ordinary treaty rights that it is dangerous to have any further treaty obligations with that country. We should hesitate a long time before we come to any such opinion. Of course I have not heard our rights under the treaty in regard to the Chicago matter challenged upon any ground in law. It may be that there are difficulties that the government have told us nothing about.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is quite correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then we are in this unhappy position, that a great country has found itself unable to live up to its treaty obligations owning to the attitude taken by certain of its people. While that is a most regrettable situation, it is no reason why we should not attempt to accommodate the not only apparent but real interests of both these great countries where we can and that is at Niagara. The Niagara point of power development is the one that should first be exhausted; it lends itself more easily and readily to a power development than do any of the other sites. I think the minister will agree with me in connection with that. The drop is immediate; the characteristics of the waters and of the lakes are extremely well known, and if, as apparently the engineers think, it be the fact that the falls on the one hand can remain and at the same time bring to Canada the electrical energy which it sadly requires at the present time particularly in Ontario, we ought beyond all question to go ahead with the development. My suggestion to the government—and I think I carry with me the judgment of the responsible minister—is that this question of greater power development at Niagara should be considered entirely apart from the lower St. Lawrence, Chicago or anything else. The one thing we ought to do is to attempt to get immediate action.

5 p.m.

I am going to make another suggestion. If we want to get immediate action our representatives should be people who know the subject and who do not have to be instructed in it. The minister is acting in connection and in co-operation with the province of Ontario which of course is entirely committed to this project. The power commission has bought a lot of land there which will be absolutely valueless unless it can be used for further development, but so sure were they that the sensible thing would be done that they went on and purchased riparian rights and the like, and as soon as an arrangement is made between the Dominion and the United States they are ready to proceed with the work. My suggestion there would be that instead of referring this question to gentlemen who, I think I am within the mark in saying, have been working some two or three years in connection with the lower St. Lawrence and from whom as yet we have got no action, the government should call to its aid—it need not accept their advice, but, it can get from them the facts—those who have, not for months but for years, been studying this question. You have engineers at the falls who have been studying the flow for years, who have been collecting data and keeping themselves in touch with what can be done. The Ontario officials are there. Why cannot they be used?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are being used.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I did not get the names aright. I heard the names of Mr. Biggar, Mr. Camsell—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Johnston is the engineer who succeeded Mr. Challies, who in turn succeeded Mr. Stewart.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But I am speaking not of the gentlemen who have been engaged on the lower St. Lawrence for years. They have been specializing on that part of the waterway.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There are none of them on it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am speaking of the local provincial engineers who have been at work on this thing for years.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You mean the Ontario government engineers?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are in collaboration with Mr. Johnston—Mr. Acres and other local Hydro men.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): They are Hydro men.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought the park commissioner's engineers were looking after the scenic side of the case.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Our dealings have been with the Hydro Commission and with the Ontario government directly.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The park commissioners have charge of all power matters on the Niagara river.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The engineers of the park commissioners, I entirely agree—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say for the information of my hon. friend that we are working in perfect co-operation with all those interests, and we are not making any move without their knowledge, so that our whole case may be harmonized in every way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But I should like to see some action, and I should like to see somebody on this committee that is really vitally interested in seeing that something is done.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does not my hon. friend think that the Hydro are intensely interested?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not understand that their engineers are on the committee.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, but they are acting with the members of the board.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Without any authority.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We cannot have an international board of a dozen members. But I want to assure my hon. friend that no move is being made without the full knowledge of the Ontario government and the Hydro Commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand that from my hon. friend. I have just been handed the debate in 1925 in connection with the St. Lawrence question, and I find the gentlemen whose names I understood my hon. friend is referring to—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I only referred to them for the purpose of making it very clear that they were not in any way employed on this particular problem.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought my hon. friend gave me three names of those who are employed on the problem—Colonel Biggar, Mr. Johnston—and I forget the third one.

[Mr. Chaplin.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Camsell.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us see if they are not on the other committee.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I thought my hon. friend had reference to Mr. McLachlan, and other engineers. If he means they have some connection with the other board in a technical way, I answer yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not in a technical way; apparently they were an interdepartmental committee.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a lot said about co-ordination. It does not seem to have got anywhere. I suppose it has reached the length of framing instructions. Perhaps something has been done of which we know nothing. The impression in the country, I may tell my hon. friend, is that everything done in connection with the lower St. Lawrence is a pure stall, that committee after committee were appointed, not for the purpose of action but to show that the government were giving something to somebody to do which was not going to be done. I notice these names are on that committee; take, for example, Colonel Biggar and Mr. Challies, alternate Mr. Johnston. My suggestion to my hon. friend is that we should try and get some action here. I do not know whom the government have engaged, but I do not know why they should not, for example, accept somebody from the park commissioners or from the Hydro, and put it up to them to get action and report. As it is to-day, it is said, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to listen to criticism that is warranted, but in this case I think what my hon. friend says is unwarranted. The late Mr. Stewart, the hydrographer in the Marine and Fisheries department, perhaps the best informed man in Canada in his day on international waterway questions, was a member of this international board in connection with the Niagara river, and he was succeeded by Mr. Challies, who in turn, was succeeded by Mr. Johnston. Mr. Johnston's connection with the St. Lawrence committee is only as an adviser. He had nothing to do with the St. Lawrence, but he sat in on the definition of the questions to be referred to the joint engineering board. But this is why I take exception to my hon. friend's remarks. There has been a special study going on by the engineering board at Niagara for a number of years with respect to the preservation of the scenic features and of getting more power. I do not want to make a second speech, but may I say that we have been pressing this question, and I do not want my hon. friend to confuse it with the lower St. Lawrence, with the Chicago and with the Great Lakes. We have, in full concurrence with the Ontario government and the Hydro Commission, been pressing this question on the attention of the American authorities, and that is why I do not want to be dragged into a discussion of other questions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I had not quite finished. The minister's second or third speech, I do not know exactly which, came in before I could finish. I certainly want the minister to have every possible opportunity of talking as often as he likes upon the subject because I want to know what the government's attitude really is. My hon. friend is wrong in his last remarks. I completely dissociated Chicago and the lower St. Lawrence in dealing with this question. I may not have made that sufficiently clear to him, but I thought I had. The more completely to cut one from the other, I was also suggesting that the men who have to do with these other questions perhaps had better not have anything to do with this one, so that we would have a clean issue here. Now my hon. friend says he wants action. So do we all. He is quite right in saying, I suppose, that simply because the government cannot do anything with their committees on the lower St. Lawrence is no reason why they cannot do something here.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do object to my hon. friend putting words in my mouth; I never made any such statement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I never suggested he said that. I am merely taking the natural deduction from his remarks, and my hon. friend knows it. If he does not know it the people know it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I do object to the hon. gentleman making any such suggestion or deduction, because it was not intended.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know why my hon. friend is on his feet now; I do not think this would be a point of order or a question of privilege. I was simply referring to some general public beliefs as to the condition of business on the lower St. Lawrence. But I am going to take my hon. friend at his own valuation. He says that the first thing to be considered is the question of the scenic properities of the falls, and I suggest that he will find a body of men on the Canadian parks side and another body of men on the American parks side who have been considering this very question of scienic beauty for many years. I suggest that the quickest way of getting action—and I am again taking him at his own valuation when he says he wants action—would be to get in touch with these people who know.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely my hon. friend would not expect me to go past the government of the province of Ontario, and I am certain that the government of the United States would not go beyond that of the state of New York.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is wrong as usual. I did not ask him to go past the government of Ontario; I asked him to go to the appointees of that government who have had to deal with this question for some years.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely my hon. friend knows that the provincial government will consult with their own officials.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not talking about matters of consultation; I am talking about matters of action. The government may do as they wish with my suggestion, but I would suggest that we will get action more quickly if the men who have had to do with these very matters are in a position to make recommendations themselves.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the hon. member have leave to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before this is withdrawn, if my hon. friend will let me regard his remarks as a question, I will give a partial answer and in that way avoid speaking twice.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But you are speaking twice. I do not mind, however.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it desirable to have of record the different bodies investigating this matter. I happen to have a statement in my hand which, if given earlier, would have perhaps prevented the misunderstanding. The statement is to the following effect:

In August, 1923, a joint Niagara control board was established for the purpose of measuring and supervising the diversion of water from the Niagara river. As the result of new installations on both sides of the Niagara river, the hydro-electric companies possessed a capacity, measured in second feet, considerably in excess of the diversion permitted by the treaty of 1910, and it was therefore considered desirable to check the diversion by methods of measurement uniform in both countries.

Major P. S. Reinecke was appointed to represent the United States, and W. J. Stewart, and after his death J. T. Johnston, to represent Canada on the Board.

The report of the board, officially published on September 19, 1925, after referring to the methods of measuring diversion at hourly intervals, and the system of weekly inspections, and noting that on both sides the older and less efficient plants were being partially closed, stated that on neither side of the boundary had the diversion at any time exceeded in the aggregate the daily diversion allowed by the treaty. The board is continuing its records and inspection.

In the meantime a Canadian Niagara research committee, in which the Department of the Interior is co-operating with the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, has been preparing data. The United States War Department has been collecting data and publishing some reports for a much longer period.

In November, a despatch was received from Washington enclosing a suggestion from the Secretary of State that joint inquiry should be made into the serious erosion of the escarpment of Niagara falls, with a view to preserving the scenic value of the falls from further injury. It was added that such discussions and recommendations should be confined to scenic questions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the date of the last appointment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Last November, I think.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And who were the personnel then?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Johnston, who has been on this Niagara control board from its inception, and who is perhaps more familiar with the conditions than is anyone else, and associated with him now is Mr. Camsell, Deputy Minister of Mines.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On the November investigation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. In fact that matter has proceeded to the point where we are now awaiting some further communication from the United States government before what we hope will be the final adjustment is arrived at.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought the trouble was that the United States had not appointed anyone as yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are now awaiting a communication advising us of their personnel.

Motion withdrawn.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

CATTLE INDUSTRY

MOTION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a special committee should be appointed to examine into the whole situation of the cattle industry with power to recommend any measures that in their opinion might conduce to the benefit and further development of the industry.

He said: The cattle industry, Mr. Speaker, is one of our principal industries, first in its relation to the greatest of all industries, that of agriculture; in regard to the capital invested; the value of its production, and as to the number of persons employed. I notice that in the Year Book for 1924 in the list of principal industries of Canada that of slaughtering and meat packing is second in 1921 and third in 1922 so far as value of production is concerned. This industry, of course, is almost totally dependent upon the cattle produced in Canada. I notice also that in regard to the amount of capital invested the cattle industry stands third or fourth in the list. I might just give a few figures regarding the capital invested in certain leading industries, in order to give a comparison. These figures are to the nearest million:

Pulp and paper	$381,000,000
Lath and shingle mills	162,000,000
Automobiles	47,000,000
Boots, shoes and leather goods	29,000,000
Foundries and machine shop products	55,000,000
Leather tanneries	32,000,000
Agricultural implements	92,000,000
Woollen goods	20,000,000

I have mentioned these other industries, in order that hon. gentlemen might be impressed with the importance of the cattle industry. I find that the capital invested in that industry is given in this book over a term of years, and as I read the figures I hope hon. members will note the decline in the amount.

1919	$381,000,000
1920	228,000,000
1921	183,000,000
1922	156,000,000
1923	143,000,000

This amount of capital does not, of course, include anything for lands or buildings used by those engaged in this industry. If this were included it would be found that the capital invested in the cattle industry is exceeded by that invested in only one or two other industries of Canada.

It is because of the decline in the value of the cattle in Canada shown by these figures which I have quoted to the House that I am asking to-day for the appointment of a committee of this House to examine into the condition of the cattle industry.

Might I also point out the gross annual revenue, as given by the Canada Year Book, of all farm animals during these same years:

	Value
1918	$194,000,000
1919	186,000,000
1920	143,000,000
1921	98,000,000
1922	77,000,000
1923	82,000,000

Hon. members will again note the decline in the annual revenue from all farm animals. In 1920, 70 per cent of the value of all animals marketed in Canada was represented by cattle, so the decline is principally due to the decline in the price of cattle.

The Live Stock Market Review for 1924 gives the estimated per head value of cattle sold on all stock yards in Canada from 1920 to 1924. The per head value for all Canada in 1924 was $43.50; and in 1920, $73.15. Hon. members will note the decline from $73.15 to $43.50. For the same years the per head value of cattle sold on the Calgary stock yard declined from $72.95 in 1920 to $39 in the year 1924.

I have figures here from the Canada Year Book showing the value of all cattle exported from Canada from 1920 to 1924. I will not give the totals, but simply the average value, as I think that will serve the purpose I have in view:

	Average value per head of cattle exported
1920	$100
1921	90
1922	50
1923	40
1924	62

Hon. gentlemen in listening to these figures will realize, I hope, the hard years through which the men engaged in the cattle industry have come. I have here a statement showing the exports of live stock from Canada for a period of ten years, but I shall quote only two or three years to show how it has affected our total export:

	No. of head exported	Value
1919	467,000	$49,000,000
1920	240,000	22,000,000
1921	174,000	9,000,000
1922	212,000	7,000,000
1923	160,000	10,000,000
1924	183,000	12,000,000

That is a tremendous drop, just a little bit over half of what it was in 1920.

I have some further figures here giving the average value of cattle, headed "Other Than Milch Cattle" on Canadian farms for a period of years from 1915 to 1924. I will simply quote the price per head in each year to show hon. members how the price of cattle had declined:

	Average Value of Cattle Exported
1915	$45
1916	54
1917	57
1918	61
1919	58
1920	47
1921	28
1922	26
1923	26
1924	27

The average value of cattle exported to the United States during these years is as follows:

1915	$ 61
1916	64
1917	91
1918	101
1919	104
1920	93
1921	33
1922	28
1923	37
1924	39

I have here a page taken from the annual catalogue of the Alberta Cattle Breeders' Association showing the prices which were paid for bulls at the annual spring bull sale at Calgary. I shall give only two or three years to illustrate how the value of these purebred animals has fallen. In the year 1913, which is always taken as a basis for comparison, the price received was $202; in 1925, the price was $128. But the real acid test for the cattleman, Mr. Speaker, is the price which his steers bring on the stock yards of this country when they are ready to market. I have here the prices paid at Calgary in November of each year since the year 1913. I have chosen Calgary because I am more familiar with conditions existing in my own province. I would ask hon. members to note how uniform the prices were from 1912 to 1916. The prices given will be per 100 pounds for live steers in the month of November of each year:

	Price per 100 pounds
1912	$ 6 12
1913	6 65
1914	6 15
1915	5 90
1916	6 65
1917	8 75
1918	10 75
1919	10 00
1920	7 54
1921	3 88
1922	3 78
1923	4 17
1924	4 29
1925	5 11

The Bureau of Statistics price index, using 100 as a basis for 1913, was last month $1.60. This shows the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar to be about 64 cents to-day compared with it was in 1913. This would to-day give his steer ready to market a purchasing power of only 50 per cent of the purchasing power of his steer in 1913. I do not think I can give to this House any better indication of the position the cattle man is in to-day. The cattle industry is of great importance all over Canada, but it is of particular importance in the province from which I come, the province of Alberta, and it is of very great importance to my own constituency. It was in this constituency that the ranching industry was first started in western Canada along the foothills of the Rockies. It was in this area that the Prince of Wales bought a ranch for himself when he visited Canada. I think there is no finer cattle country in Canada than exists in that particular part of Alberta. In 1924 there were shipped from points in this constituency about 16,400 cattle. I find that in that year cattle were marketed on stockyards by provinces as follows:

Alberta	271,190
Saskatchewan	207,099
Manitoba	85,457
Ontario	382,649
Quebec	28,625

Unfortunately I have not the statistics for the other provinces. May I point out here that the total number of beef cattle in Alberta, which is, I think, probably the premier cattle province of the Dominion, has decreased from 1,430,364 in 1921 to 1,066,007 in 1925, or a drop of about 400,000 head. These figures, I think, are very significant as to the condition the cattle industry is in to-day. I may also point out that the number of cattle on the farms of Canada has decreased in the last five years by over one million head according to the figures given by the Bureau of Statistics. In view of these figures, and the facts which I have brought to the attention of the House, it is certainly incumbent upon us to use every possible endeavour to help this industry.

May I point out here that a great deal of money is being expended, and great efforts are being put forth, by the federal Department of Agriculture, the departments of agriculture of the provinces, and by both our railways, to increase the growth of forage crops in western Canada. I have here a little item, taken from one of the western papers, telling of a special train which is being run by the Canadian Pacific railway through the western provinces in an endeavour to encourage the growth of forage crops by the farmers in that part of the Dominion, particularly fodder corn and sweet clover. Now I do not know of any way in which fodder corn and sweet clover can be utilized except by feeding cattle. At the present time I think most men will admit the raising of cattle is not a profitable undertaking.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COOTE: Then what is the use of these farmers being induced to grow sweet clover or fodder corn, or some other kind of fodder crop, unless a profitable market can be found for the cattle which are to be raised on that feed. In many parts of western Canada we are now troubled with what is called soil drifting. This land has been farmed for several years for the raising of grain crops almost exclusively. To prevent this soil drifting we are advised to grow fodder crops so as to get the grass roots back in the soil. I think that is very necessary. At the same time we must have some profitable way of using the crops which are so grown.

I do not wish to take up much of the time of the House in connection with this subject, but I think I have presented enough facts to convince hon. members that something should be done to help this industry if a way can be found to do so. I think the best way to discuss this matter is in a small committee; it is very difficult to do it in a House composed of 240 members. I am now only going to suggest very briefly how the industry may possibly be helped, and I hope that a committee of the House will be appointed which will deal with the matter. We are faced with an exportable surplus of cattle of, I think, between two hundred thousand and three hundred thousand head. I did have the figures here but for the moment I have mislaid them. Can we increase the consumption in Canada so that this total surplus may be eaten here? I think it cannot be done at the present moment at any rate; we must export quite a percentage of our cattle crop. The two principal export markets which we have to-day are Great Britain and United States. I find that we are practically shut out of the United States by a tariff of 1½ cents per pound on cattle weighing less than 1,050 pounds, and by a tariff of 2 cents a pound on cattle over that weight. Then we have a freight rate from Calgary to Chicago of about $13 per head. The tariff of 2 cents a pound on a 1,200 pound steer amounts to $24. That is we have to pay $37 to get a steer from Calgary into Chicago. Then with respect to our other market, Great Britain, we find that the total freight rate from Calgary to Britain, according to information which is given in a government bulletin here, is $50.79 per head. It seems to me that in the case of both these markets there is a very fertile field for investigation by a committee to determine whether some relief might be secured for the cattle industry. For instance, I find that the feed for a steer from Montreal to England costs $4.50 per head. It is quite possible that might be reduced. The ocean freight is $20 per head. It is possible that some arrangement might be made whereby that might be reduced. I also notice in the booklet already referred to that the department itself is suggesting the possibility of co-operative shipments to the Old Country. I should like the committee to carefully investigate that matter and see whether, through some assistance rendered by the federal government, it might be possible to ship cattle co-operatively to Britain. I was told recently by a friend of mine that a neighbour of his had sold some cattle last fall before making a trip to England. He sold one steer in particular for $25. He afterwards engaged on a cattle boat going to England and assisted in feeding the cattle on board. While on the way across he found that this animal which he had sold was one of the stock on the boat. He took the trouble to see some of the steers sold in the Old Country, and although he failed to see his own particular steer sold he observed animals which were very similar in weight and conformation sold for $125 per head. Now the freight over is about $50, and he had secured for the steer $25, a total of $75. But the steer apparently brought in Great Britain approximately $125. If the man who raised the steer in Alberta could have secured that other $50, or even one half of it, it might have encouraged him to stay in the business. It is possible that the committee which I am asking may suggest means by which a part of this spread may be retained for the producer.

I do not want to say very much about the United States tariff against our cattle, but I notice that the Financial Post of a recent date had a front page article regarding the benefit of the United States market to Canadian beef cattle. According to the press there is a wish at the present time on the part of a large number of farmers in the corn belt of the United States that the American tariff against Canadian cattle should be lowered or removed. I think that this matter too might be carefully considered by a committee to see whether anything should be done by Canada to co-operate with these United States farmers in an endeavour to secure a reduction of the tariff. I may point out that the great loss which our cattle men suffer—and which I am sure hon. members will realize by the figures I gave at the opening of my remarks—was largely occasioned by the fact that the United States in 1921 placed an emergency tariff of 30 per cent against our cattle. The following year that duty was changed to the rates I quoted a moment ago, namely 1½ cents a pound on cattle weighing less than 1,050 lbs, and two cents a pound in the case of cattle over that weight.

It should be pointed out that for a period of six or seven years while the United States had cattle on the free list Canada maintained a duty of 25 per cent against cattle coming from the United States into Canada. Mr. Tom King, of Washington, D.C., addressing the Western Canada Live Stock Union in December last, said that in his opinion, if they wished to secure free entry for their cattle into the United States it would be necessary that Canada should grant to the United States the same concessions in regard to the tariff on cattle as we hoped to get from the United States. We must have reciprocity in the matter. I am not going to suggest to this House what should be done. I will simply bring the matter to the attention of the House, and if the committee is appointed I think this point should be carefully discussed by that committee.

Before closing I desire to give to the House the opinion of the Western Canada Live Stock Union and the request they are making to the members of parliament. Possibly all hon. members have received this request and I will simply read the last three or four sentences:

> That Canada could, if the matter were to receive the attention it should, negotiate for the modification or removal of this tariff.
> That is it improbable that this tariff ever would have been put in force with respect to Canadian cattle if there had been a Canadian representative at Washington.
>
> We therefore earnestly ask for your active assistance in securing a modification or the elimination of this tariff, thus removing this handicap from the cattle industry of Canada.
> We would also ask for your interest in securing the appointment of a Canadian representative at Washington, and we believe that when appointed, such representative should be familiar and in sympathy with the live stock industry. Such a representative could be of inestimable service to Canada.

It seems to me that the plight the industry is in, the hard years it has gone through, make it unnecessary for me to speak at any greater length in support of the request that a committee should be appointed to inquire into the industry and report to parliament any measures that in their opinion might conduce to the benefit of the industry. I ask hon. members of this House to give their support to this resolution.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): I can scarcely let this resolution, with which I have so much sympathy, pass this House without saying a few words. Permit me to congratulate the hon. member (Mr. Coote) on his effort in placing before the House the position and needs of the live stock industry, the most important and basic industry in western Canada. It is important because you must have live stock on the farm to produce fertility and to keep the soil and the crops from deterioration. The live stock industry plays an essential part in this feature. The hon. member who introduced the resolution has covered the points pretty well. There are many things of importance pertaining to the live stock industry which come vividly before us. I have appealed to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and I have appealed to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) to try to get him to reduce the rate on live stock to Great Britain, but up to the present I have failed. Many promises have been made but there has been no action. They say it is impossible to convert the government merchant marine vessels into cattle boats, on account of their construction. However, I have my doubts about that statement. I have shipped on the Canadian government boat Victor and several other boats, and found them splendid cattle boats. If the Jensen boats could be converted into cattle carriers, I do not see why the Canadian Government Merchant Marine vessels could not be made available for the carriage of cattle, and thus relieve this industry. A statement was made before the Railway committee on Friday that the Jensen line was in the hands of a receiver. That is not the case. Mr. Teakle, the manager of the merchant marine I understand made that statement. The boats of the Jensen line were changed in Germany, and in connection with the changing of the boats some dispute arose. The price for the changing of them was to be based on the Clyde estimate, and not on the price fixed in Germany. I understand from the owners or the men who had to do with the Jensen line that the money is waiting in Toronto to pay for the remodelling of the ships. I have asked the government for a $15 rate on cattle and I am about through with it. I do not think I will bother the Minister of Railways or the Minister of Agriculture any more. I am not speaking for my own purposes at all, but I am making a plea for the industry. Here we are with a market in Great Britain clamouring for our live stock. There are men the Old Country prepared to buy thousands of cattle. But we have had nothing but promises from the minister. Every time the Minister of Agriculture goes west, he says, "We will give you redress," but so far he has taken no action. I have finished with my appeals to the minister. I cannot make any impression on him and I have done my duty to my constituents.

Here we are in Canada with a dwindling industry. We are shipping 100,000 cattle as the hon. member for Macleod has said. Ireland is shipping a million and the Argentine shipped 1,285,000 cattle as dressed beef. They are shipping those into Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: Do you want to do it that way?

Mr. MULLINS: I am going to talk kindly to the minister because I want to make a few converts. Ireland ships a million cattle, Ireland contains 32,605 square miles, Manitoba 255,832 square miles and Canada 3,745,674 square miles. Canada ships a paltry 100,000 cattle when we should be shipping a million. There are lots of cattle in the country. Canada has wonderful possibilities, particularly in the agricultural line. The Minister of Railways knows something about what this industry used to be in the early days, but it has been dwindling every year, because no encouragement is given to it. When you commence to talk to anyone about the cattle industry, he will say, "Get out of the way, I do not want to be bothered with you." But the day will come when people will be bothered with us. Our shipments of cattle are dropping every year and soon they will be at a very low figure.

As to the question whether Canada should go into the live cattle industry or the dead meat industry, I say the only hope for Canada is in the live stock and shipping industry. It is absolutely impossible to ship dead beef, and I make that statement after fifty years experience. I tried the experiment of shipping dead meat and suffered losses. The dealers in Ireland want us to get out of the business and to make way for them. In effect they say, "Don't come over to the Old Country with your Canadian steers which are of such a superior quality." I have stood in the Glasgow market and have sold a hundred cattle while the Irishman has been left standing at the rail with the same number. That is due to the stamina, the admirable quality of the Canadian steer as a feeder. I saw Canadian steers eating 112 pounds of turnips a day in Scotland. Anyone who knows anything about the live stock industry knows that a country that goes in for raising live stock is a wealthy country. If you come with me to Illinois or Iowa I will show you a rich country. Scotland, the north of England, or any other country that is in the live stock industry is prosperous and doing well.

As regards shipping dead meat the Argentine Republic ship great quantities of dead meat into the Smithfield market where it is sold for 4 to 4½ pence per pound. I have a quotation which came to-day of Canadian cattle selling at 11 pence per pound. What do hon. members want? Do they want to ship dead beef at 4½ to 5 pence per pound or do they want to ship live cattle and get into the 11 penny market. The minister through his department tried an experiment in regard to dead meat and I think the loss was $50 per head. They tried live cattle and succeeded. Why is it not possible? The Englishman is a connoisseur on meat; he knows the quality. Scotch home-fed cattle are selling at the highest pinnacle in the Old Country; then come the English home-fed cattle; then come your dressed cattle from the other side of the water and last of all comes the Argentine chilled and frozen meat selling for 4½ pence while the better cattle get the higher prices.

I would not advise anyone to ship yearling steers because nowhere in Canada have we as much roughage feed available as we have in western Canada and in western Ontario we have similar facilities. We should bring our yearlings up to two years or three years until they weigh about 1,200 pounds and when they have reached 1,200 pounds that is the time to send them to the market.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned at six o'clock I was dealing with the live stock industry and trying to steer a few of our members in the right course by pointing out to them the absolute impossibility of shipping dead beef in competition with our live cattle. I desire to be brief, but this is a subject of such great importance to the cattle industry of the Dominion that I want to bring it before the House in a very definite form for the last time, as I have spoken of it so often that I feel sometimes I may have been thought out of place in referring to the subject.

Canada has taken a foremost place in England with her live cattle. She cannot retain that place by shipping the beef dead; it is an absolute impossibility. At the greatest cattle fair in England, the Norwich fair, a Canadian steer took the first prize. But there are those in the British Isles who seem to want to get Canada out of the live cattle industry into the chilled meat business; in fact, they are so strongly opposed to the importation of our live cattle that an Irish paper, the Mid-Ulster mail, of September 29, 1923, contained the following article:

Those Canadian "Stores"

At long last the Canadian stock exporters seem to be realizing that in attempting to send store cattle into Great Britain in open competition with Irish stores they are "on a bad egg," and that the removal of the embargo on the importation of Canadian cattle was not, for the Dominion stock-breeder, synonymous with an introduction to El Dorado.

It is now announced in the press that Colonel Mullins, of Winnipeg, who is largely interested in the export of cattle from western Canada to England, has accepted an invitation to attend an agricultural conference in London at the end of December to explain how the present high freights have put business out of the question. Exactly, but let us not forget that high freight rates are not entirely to blame for the lack of business in Canadian store cattle. From first to last this embargo business has been a "stunt"—in Canada worked by the politicians, and in England by some sections of the press. Cattlemen in the Dominion who understood their business never wanted the embargo raised, for the very good and sufficient reason that Canada can put meat on the British market for 3d a pound less as chilled beef than when the animals are imported alive into this country.

Several shipments of Canadian cattle have been landed in Britain this year, but in the majority of cases the animals have not been "stores." They are practically fat cattle, and some of them had even been specially fed in Canada so that when they arrived they would create a good impression among British cattle buyers. When consignments of real Canadian "stores" arrived the animals were in many cases practically unsaleable, being considered too old and too rough to repay the cost of finishing in the fields of the Mother Country.

It is evident that Ireland desires to divert Canada into the chilled beef line of business. Now I do not want to see this country make that mistake and so let the Irish cattle breeders have a monopoly of the store cattle market in Great Britain. The prices in England to-day are very high, 11d. per pound, while chilled beef is selling at from 4½d to 5d. Lord Bledisloe has become a convert to the purchase of Canadian cattle. At one time he was our absolute enemy, but he has purchased 100 Canadian steers and placed them on his grass. England wants as many cattle as we can send; we have an unlimited market in Great Britain. I have before me a copy of the Dundee Courier, in which appears the following headline:

Canadian cattle trade outlook. Supplies increase, but more stores wanted.

The reason the cattle sent to England were so heavy was that they had to be heavy to beat the freight rates; you could not ship light cattle at the excessive freight rate of $20. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) knows what I am saying is correct. He was probably wrongly quoted when he spoke in Winnipeg about a steer weighing 800 to 900 pounds; probably he meant 1,100 pounds. That is the animal they want in England for finishing purposes, and that is what we must send them.

When the embargo was removed the job was only half finished; it was not removed in its entirety. Canada has just as much right to the British market as has Ireland. Ireland is now a dominion on the same status as Canada, but Ireland sends her dairy cows into Great Britain while our cows are shut out. Ireland values the cow more than we in Canada value it. I have here a quotation from an Irish paper in Belfast, as follows:

Dinners at which lions, ponies and other animals have been the centre of attraction have proved so successful in London that a banquet is shortly to be given in Belfast with the champion milk-giving cow and her daughter as guests of honour.

At the banquet the cows will stand in a roped enclosure around which the diners will be arranged. From each cow in this living buffet a glass of milk will be given to every person present.

Now, Sir, I would like to see the cow held as valuable in Canada as in Ireland. While I was in Scotland last year I saw a little Kerry cow selling for £30, but when I came home I saw our own magnificent cows selling at from $35 to $40, when they could bring as many pounds sterling in England. I want to see that restriction taken off our Canadian cow, and the market thrown open to us as to Ireland. I want hon. members to understand this, because I have been asked about it quite frequently. We can get in to that market with our male cattle, but our cows are not allowed in.

I have here a letter from William Henderson, one of the biggest feeders and buyers of Canadian store cattle in the Old Country. He says:

We must have in your cows and heifers, and we have on hand the organization of strong push at present. For what was done to get the embargo removed, and for what is being done to get in your females you owe the city of Glasgow the greatest debt. They have never "grown weary" in the fight.

Now I must tell you that very strong feeling is arising at the fact of so many "finished" cattle arriving from Canada and so few of what you and I know as good stores. Stores are making much better prices per hundred weight than fat cattle, and Canada will make a great mistake if she does not keep the store cattle trade well supplied. That does not mean very lean animals, though many farmers can do with such, but animals requiring two to three months to finish. Your fat animals are not in the best shape for slaughter on arrival and the meat is not nearly so good as when the cattle get two or three or four months on our "neeps". Meaning turnips in the interests of Canada you should not overlook these facts.

I appeal to the Minister of Agriculture to take up with Great Britain the question of the admission of the Canadian cow. While in England last winter I had an interview with Sir Auckland Geddes on this question; I told him our Canadian cow would give him quality if not quantity. He was very favourable to the proposition, and Lord Bledisloe was also impressed. I think with very little exertion we can get our cows into the British market.

I am heartily in sympathy with this resolution, and I think we should have a committee to look into this question. Many things have crept into the cattle trade of late years which I would like to take up, but I do not feel equal to the task because of my health. But these things have held back that basic industry not only of western Canada but of the entire country, the cattle trade. In the first place let me sound a warning to the railroads that they will have very little wheat to haul in a few years unless more thought is given to the cattle industry; the land must be kept fertile. Reduce the freight rate from Winnipeg to Montreal from 85 cents to 60½ cents, and you will give encouragement to the man on the land which will result in more wheat and more grain to haul.

The ocean rate question should be considered along with the matter of terminals and sheds. The government own the sheds at St. John; there should be no charge of admission there, yet we have to bear this burden. There they charge even for electric lights so the cattle may see to walk down the sheds; that is all added to the bill of the shipper, with other charges almost too numerous to mention. The Canadian Pacific Railway had a contract with the city of Winnipeg to maintain a yard there for all time, but the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific built stock yards outside of Winnipeg, in St. Boniface, and as a consequence shippers must pay heavy stockyard charges and these things are allowed to go on. That is one way to check the industry; the charges now are piled up so high that the shipper receives very little return.

I have spoken longer than I intended, but this is the last time that I intend to speak on this question, unless something very intricate comes up. There are other matters that will engage my attention. In conclusion, I appeal to the Minister of Agriculture to use every endeavour with the transportation companies, by water and by rail, to have the rates on cattle lowered. It matters not whether the heads of these transportation companies are trying to make a showing. It has all to come out of the people of Canada anyway, and what we are particularly concerned with is that some assistance be given to the live stock industry in getting its products to the markets of the world.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, in addressing the House on this resolution, namely:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a special committee should be appointed to examine into the whole situation of the cattle industry with power to recommend any measures that in their opinion might conduce to the benefit and further development of the industry.

let me say, that the words of Horace Greeley are as true to-day as they were the day they were uttered, when he said: "At the head of all science and art, at the head of all progress and civilization stands, not militarism, the science that kills, not commerce, the art that enriches, but agriculture, the mother of all industry and the maintainer of human life." This is an expression which we in Canada might well take to heart, and we might well consider it at this present time when we are discussing the possibilities of this country, because we know that when agriculture in Canada is prosperous it follows that every other industry will naturally be prosperous. That fact has been brought home to us very plainly during the last twelve months, as the result of the splendid harvest and the splendid success which has attended our agricultural operations throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion.

We have heard a great deal said on the floor of parliament this session, and a good deal from our hon. friends opposite, respecting the keeping of the boy on the farm. It has been amusing all through life to me to listen to these fellows, some of whom have been born on the farm, and who are now engaged in other walks of life, turning and telling us that we should do everything possible to keep the boy on the farm. It reminds me, Sir, of the following lines which I noticed recently in a New York journal:

> "Stick to the farm," said the president
> To the wide-eyed country boy,
> Then he hied him away to his White House home
> With an air of rustic joy.
>
> "Stick to the farm," said the railroad king
> To the lad who looks afar,
> Then he hies him back on the double quick
> In his rustic private car.
>
> "Stick to the farm," said the clergyman
> To the lad on the worm fence perched,
> Then he lays his ear to the ground
> To hear a call to the city church.
>
> "Stick to the farm," said the doctor wise
> To those who would break the rut,
> Then he hies him away where appendix grows
> In bountiful crops to cut.

If you can show to the farmer's boy that there is a sufficient margin of profit in the old farm, you will not need to give him advice to stay on the farm. He will see it just as quickly as anybody else, and he will not be looking over the weekly newspaper to see where Doctor So-and-So gets possibly two or three hundred dollars for the performance of some operation, and Lawyer So-and-So four or five hundred dollars for the pleading of a case, or somebody else gets five or ten thousand dollars for the promotion of some scheme or another. That is the way the thing is going to too great a degree.

We have heard them talk about protection to keep the boy on the farm. We know in this country that in the main there is no such thing as protecting the farmer. You may ask what this has to do with the live stock industry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMILLAN: It is the same response we have heard from my friends opposite during almost every discussion this session. We hear it to-night from the men who know absolutely nothing about conditions on the farm. They are the first to say, "Hear, hear." They wonder what this has to do with conditions on the farm, when every person who knows anything about agriculture knows that the live stock industry is the very right arm of a permanently successful agriculture. I am not one of those who would say to our western farmers, or to the young man who comes out from the Old Country and goes to our western prairies: You must at once engage in live stock lines. Not at all. These men have to do as circumstances will permit them. nevertheless, if we are going to make agriculture as successful as it ought to be, if we are going to do as nature expects we ought to do, keep up the fertility of the soil, make it better than it is to-day, the only means we have of accomplishing that, is to endeavour, so far as circumstances will enable us to destroy all our coarse grain and our fodder crops upon the land, and feed the soil with the certain expectation that in the end it will continue to repay us as well as nourish the people. That is the reason why I would like the members of this House, and more particularly those who wondered what I have said had to do with the live stock industry, to realize that the first consideration of a permanently successful agriculture is that we should not only maintain the land in its present condition of fertility, but, if possible, endeavour to improve that condition.

When I addressed this House on the last occasion, one of my friends on the opposite side asked me what was the effect of protection upon the farmers of England, and what were they doing at the present time. I can assure you, as I said then, just in a sentence, that the best farmers of England and Scotland to-day are the men who are able to show to us in this country and to the agriculturists throughout the world how farming ought to be conducted in order that it may become permanently successful, and in order that it will be able to give to the human race the greatest returns that it is possible for that industry to give.

Coming back more particularly to the production and marketing of live stock, I may say that that is a line in which I have been engaged all my life. For twenty years I was continually engaged in the live stock export trade, and we found it fairly successful in those days. At that time our freight rates across the ocean amounted on the average to from $7 to $8 per head. From the beginning to the end of the season we used to regard that as an average rate. Consider the handicap under which we are placed to-day? When we get our live stock to the point of shipment it costs us, not $7 per head but $20 per head, although this is a wonderful reduction from the rate which prevailed five years ago. The last time I had occasion to ship to the British markets was in 1921, when it cost me $45 per head in freight for my animals between Montreal and Glasgow.

Since the embargo was removed in 1923 it is wonderful how our live stock trade with the British market has increased. As hon. gentlemen know we shipped in 1923, the year in which the live stock embargo was removed, something like 25,758 animals, valued at $2,809,796. The following year the shipments had increased to 59,486 animals, valued at $6,287,815. In the year ending March, 1925, 86,245 cattle were shipped, at a value of $9,125,667; and for the twelve months ended March 31, 1926, we shipped 117,819 animals valued at $12,432,954. So you can realize the manner in which this live stock trade has grown during these last four years. I may say that the prospects for the export cattle trade at present are not so good. They are less favourable to-day than they have been at any time during the last four years. Allow me to read an article which explains, to a certain degree, why this is the case. The article in question is taken from the Grain Growers' Guide of May 15 last, and reads as follows:

Canada's overseas cattle trade is assuming proportions which now fully justify the hopes held out by those who so stubbornly fought to gain entrance to the British live cattle market. Hon. Mr. Robb's budget speech reminds us that this trade may this year reach the $12,000,000 mark.

As I have shown you, the export trade has already grown beyond the twelve million mark.

Undoubtedly the outlet which the British live cattle market affords has been one of the chief factors in the return of prosperity to the Canadian cattle raiser. The British consumer likewise finds satisfaction in the lowest scale of beef prices which he has enjoyed since the early days of the war. That it has not hurt the British producer may be seen by the recent statement of Lord Bledisloe, Minister of Agriculture in the Baldwin government. The noble lord was one of the bitterest opponents of the admission of Canadian store cattle when that question was before the public. He is now a complete convert, so much so that last month he purchased 200 head of Ontario feeders for his own farm.

The following paragraph is the matter to which I more particularly wish to direct your attention.

The only fly in the ointment is the war being conducted between the two companies which control the Argentine meat trade, and the practice, which has grown out of it, of killing Argentine live cattle in Belgium for sale in London the following day, as fresh-killed meat. Until the last few months these companies had an agreement as to the quota of cattle which each would export. Since the suspension of it, both companies have extended their quota and have slashed prices so that at present fresh-killed Argentine meat can be bought wholesale in London for 3d. and 5½d. for fore and hindquarters, respectively, prices which Canadians cannot meet.

Exporters of Canadian cattle have, unfortunately, taken a bad trimming on account of this situation, and British farmers who bought Canadian stores before the abnormal dip in prices, are due for their loss also. Canadian producers may take what consolation they may from the fact that this commercial warfare cannot continue, and when those concerns terminate it, they will recoup themselves at the expense of consumers, at which time our export business will again be on a profitable gasis. The Canadian trade, however, views the practice of killing Argentine cattle in Belgium for re-export, with considerable concern. It is now more than an experiment and will continue after the rival companies come to an understanding. South Americans gained pre-eminence in the chilled meat business because of the quality of their beef and the cheapness with which it could be raised. The Zeebrugge Abattoir gives them an equal footing with Canadians in the marketing of freshly-killed beef. It brings a new and serious competitive factor into the business which cannot be disregarded.

When we consider these conditions and know—as those who have been engaged in the cattle export trade and those who have been engaged in breeding and feeding these animals know—that although there has not been too great a margin of profit in the past, yet we are to be subjected to this world competition, it is a question of the first importance, a question of the greatest moment, that if possible we should get better markets for our live stock than we are able to enjoy at the present time. Giving hon. gentlemen some personal experience, I may say that during the last four years I have never needed to take less than 8½ cents per pound live weight for my finished animals on my own farm; but to-day we can only get from 7½ to 8¼ on the Toronto market for them, and that is half a cent a pound less than we must take at home. Therefore you can realize what the situation is to-day, so far as the Ontario farmer is concerned, compared to what it was even twelve months ago.

While I consider that every effort should still be made by the Canadian government to get rates upon live stock, not only railway rates but also ocean rates, as low as it is possible to get them—there is no reason why the ocean rate should not be a great deal less than $20 per head—while these efforts should still continue, as I have said on each occasion when I have addressed the House during the present session, I still believe that every effort should be made by the government to try to come to terms with the people of the great republic to the south of us. What are the conditions with respect to that market? During the four years when we had the privilege of free access into the American market with our fat cattle from the province of Ontario I was able to get, every year right at my own market station, within 50 cents per hundred live weight of the highest ratings on the Chicago market. If you look up the prices in Chicago to-day, you will find that they are $10 per hundred weight, live weight. That would mean, with similar conditions, that I could get $9.50 per hundredweight on my own farm, whereas under present circumstances I will have to take at least $2 per hundredweight less. What would that mean? I am within the judgment of every man who understands the business in this country when I say that it is all the difference between success and failure, and if we are going to continue to keep up the standard of agriculture and maintain the condition of the soil we must continue this business. Anything else means failure, not only for the present, but absolute failure in so far as a permanently successful agriculture in this country is concerned.

When I express the opinion that it should be the aim of this government to use every reasonable effort to treat with the government of the United States, we are met by our friends across the chamber, who are so anxious to maintain our young men on the farm, who really think that everything should be done to try to keep them on the farm, who say to us, "Why, you must not treat with the people of the American republic, lest you bring into operation conditions which will injure industry in this country." What do they mean by industry? The greatest industry in this country is that of agriculture, and if Canada is to continue to be a nation worthy of itself it must always be our greatest industry. Yet Sir, it is no reflection upon the record of the present government when I say that for years all governments in this country to a certain extent have allowed privileges to continue which work against the real interests of agriculture, not only in the circumstances I have already been outlining, but also in the condition in which the farmer finds himself in respect to the articles he has to buy. He has to buy in every instance in the retail market and pay the highest prices for everything he requires. We have discussed protection on the floor of this parliament, and during that discussion I asked the question, which I put again to hon. members on the other side, can you show me one individual engaged in any other line of industry who does not wish and does not do everything possible to keep the prices of all the requirements in his business at the lowest possible level? Is it not the fact that in every line of industrial life they want to get all their requirements at the lowest price? I am in accord with them on that proposition and say amen to them every time they urge that that should be done. Why except agriculture and those who are engaged in the greatest industry in this country? Why except those who are engaged in the industry upon the success of which depends the progress and development of this country? It should be one of the first considerations of the government to give to the agriculturist everything he requires in the matter of raw material at the lowest possible cost.

I have often heard it said by hon. gentlemen: "Oh, I would not treat with the American people at all." What are the conditions? Here we are, two friendly nations, living alongside of each other, with two artificial tariff walls built up by each country against the other, and yet in the face of those walls, out of a total foreign trade of 2,255 million dollars we are doing over 1,095 million dollars' worth of business, almost one-half the entire trade of the country, with our American cousins across the border. Does that fact not prove how anxious these two people are to do business, the one with the other? Trade is not a national business. Trade is an individual matter, and if a Canadian buys anything across the line he does so for one reason only, and that is he thinks he can get better value for his money by purchasing there than he can get anywhere else in the world. If an American does any business in this country it is for the same reason. Therefore, I repeat, to such a degree do the people of the two countries realize that they can do better trading with each other than with any other countries that nearly one-half our entire foreign trade is carried on with the United States. Is that not at once an illustration of the power of natural trade laws, and an indication of the only rational trade policy? I do hope that as soon as possible we may be able to show the great benefits which will result to both these countries by the following of such a policy to a greater degree than we have been able to do up to the present time.

When we consider the terms of this resolution we find that it embodies another thing. If this is to become a great agricultural country and continue to grow and thrive as it ought to, we must not only encourage a system of keeping live stock but encourage the keeping of the very best class of animals which can be obtained. That is something which, if I wished, I could spend hours dilating upon, because as agriculturists the greatest drawback towards the success of the live stock industry in this country is that those who are engaged in the business do not understand the science of live stock breeding and feeding to the degree to which it ought to be understood. If we did understand and practice the proper system of live stock production we would not see so many of those half-starved animals going into every live stock market from week to week and month to month. To accomplish the best results, a start must be made during the breeding period. Whenever animals are dropped we should realize that the first function of food is to support the requirements of the animal system, and it is only from what the animal can properly digest and assimilate over and above that which is required to support the animal system that we can derive a profit. Therefore it should be the aim of every farmer, of every live stock raiser, so to look after those animals from the moment they are dropped as long as he keeps them in his possession, that when he disposes of them they will be in such a condition that he can get the highest price it is possible to obtain in the best market.

I am not going to continue this discussion at any greater length because there are members to my right and to my left who are able to give us a great deal of valuable information along this line.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. McMILLAN: Hon. friends opposite may say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. McMILLAN: If there are any questions which my hon. friends across the way desire to ask, I would be glad to try to answer them. The question might be put: What is the use of trying to get freer access to the markets of the United States when our United States cousins seem inclined to raise their tariff still higher? What are the conditions? I have the report of that great gathering held at Des Moines in the month of December last where a million farmers met to discuss their conditions, and for the benefit of every member I would like to place upon Hansard some of the particulars regarding that meeting. That conference was held prior to the sitting of the present congress and these farmers, about a million strong, were preparing their presentation for submission to congress. To-day congress has rejected the only proposition that has been placed before it that would go to help the United States farmer out of the undesirable position in which he finds himself as a result of a high protective tariff in that country. I happened to be on the other side while this conference was in session and this is the report from the St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Mr. GOTT: I thought the hon. member was speaking in the interest of the Canadian farmer.

Mr. McMILLAN: I am. If my hon. friend will follow me, the point I want to make is that the United States farmers realize that protection has been such an injury to them that they think it is time it should be removed, and when protection against the United States farmer is removed the Canadian farmer will be permitted to enter the United States market and get the benefit of the best live stock market in the world for his product. I wish my hon. friend who is situated a great deal nearer the border than I am would listen to what I am about to read:

Des Moines, December 22/26.—Representatives of a million western farmers issued their manifesto at the closing session to-day of the conference of the corn-belt committee and the executive committee of the American Council of Agriculture.

They repudiated the President's speech before the American Farm Bureau Federation convention at Chicago.

They declared in principle for the export co-operation idea—

That is the McNary-Haugen bill which has been defeated in congress.

—the legislation to take the "simplest form compatible with effectiveness" and to promote the co-operative movement. They saluted the Jardine co-operative bill with the statement that "it is not information we need but a fair price."

They assailed the Fordney-McCumber tariff.

They made an overature to the agriculture of the south for union with that of the west for a common effort for a common end.

They appointed a joint legislative committee of twelve with power to speak for the twenty-eight organizations represented at the meeting, to co-operate with the spokesmen of other bona fide producers' associations of the south.

They authorized the organization of an agricultural statistical department to be situated at Des Moines, comparable in efficiency to those maintained by railroads and other great interests.

"With all due respect to the President," the conference declared, "we desire to say that the farmers of this country know the source of their difficulties."

The reference was to the President's speech at Chicago in which he disparaged the movement to make the tariff effective on the major products of agriculture. The Chicago speech drew the fire of the conference in a lengthy declaration closing with the pronouncement that agriculture "once more demands equality."

They realize that agriculture in the United States cannot be protected, cannot be given the benefits which protection will accord to the other great industries in that republic.

The report continues:

"We protest against such a misrepresentation of the movement for equality in which the people of the great staple growing empire of America are enlisted with all their hearts," the declaration sets forth. "We protest against the abrupt dismissal of a petition in the formulation of which the best intelligence of agriculture has put so many years of devoted and sincere study."

The conference asks, if the tariff is of so great benefit to farming as the President said, "how can the fact be explained that although this tariff has been in operation for five years agriculture is at this hour staggering on the brink of complete collapse?"

It says to Congress that either agriculture must be brought within the system or it must expect to see agriculture declare a war on the protective system.

That was the viewpoint before congress assembled, before the McNary-Haugen bill was discussed on the floor of the United States congress. That bill has now been rejected. The farmers of the United States are placed where they were before, and as a result of their present situation do hon. members think they are going to continue to lie under the great detriment of a high protective system which, while accorded to the other great industries, does not benefit the United States farmer? Further, more than sixty-six per cent of the people of the United States of America reside in towns and cities and all these people, more particularly those who have not a large income, require the necessities of life as cheaply as possible. For the benefit of Canadian agriculture, if we could only get access to the American market we know there are in the cities of the eastern states more men able to command an annual income of $10,000 a year than are to be found in all the rest of the world. These individuals do not require to consider the cost of living; they are bound to have the best at any price. Canada, on account of her northern climate and her capabilities, on account of the brain and brawn of her people, is able to produce the best goods in the world, and if we could secure access to those markets our superior quality of product would displace a great deal of the inferior article produced by the United States farmer to the wonderful benefit of the Canadian farmer. For these reasons, which I have in a few minutes tried to enunciate, it is the duty of this House to see to it if possible that a committee is appointed to make an exhaustive investigation into the whole matter of the live stock industry of Canada with a view of finding some remedy, through the medium of cheaper transportation and better returns, which will enable us to produce more profitably in the future than we have done in the past.

9 p.m.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I have been impressed by this debate and still more by the debate which recently took place in Washington, where it was brought out that the American farmer did occupy an unfair position in the protective system of the United States—so unfair that even the president and the government had under consideration a policy of subvention or of loans to equalize the position of the agricultural interests with that enjoyed by the industrial organizations of the United States. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. McMillan) presented an argument which I admired, but I do not think it is feasible; the Americans will not let us into their markets.

But we can do something for the benefit of our farmers. Perhaps I have said it before, but it is well worth repetition. We can do something to bring about reduction of freight rates by consolidating our two great railway systems that now waste $400,000,000 a year, and thus make one first class system. In that way you will not only save a lot of money, but you will increase the efficiency of the consolidated system by not less than 40 per cent. But transportation to-day is a combination of rail and water, and in the consolidation I am proposing we would include the government merchant marine and the Canadian Pacific steamships. Then this parliament can deal with lower transportation charges. In this way we would cut out all the extravagant duplication which involves, as I have said before, an annual loss of at least $400,000,000—and this estimate is growing in my opinion the closer I look into the situation. To-day we are wasting money on a double system of head offices in Montreal, double system of express, a double system of telegraphs and a double system of trains, many of them not one-quarter filled. By this consolidation we can pay every commitment of the two roads. We can guarantee 6 per cent on the common stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if they share their "extraneous assets," with Canada—and they ought to—they will get 4 per cent more. As a result, we will have the finest transportation system in the world, a transportation system by both land and water, and we will not only improve the efficiency of the railways by 40 per cent, but we shall be able to reduce the freight charges by 33⅓ per cent. It is no use talking about our farmers getting into the American market; their competitors in the United States will never let them in. But if we quit this crying for new moons we shall get somewhere, and I am going to continue as long as I am here to preach the doctrine of railway consolidation, cutting out duplication and devoting our energies to the improvement of our land and water facilities and to the reduction of freight rates. There is a practical question for every farmer in this House and outside it to devote himself to, to do away with this wastefulness and give better service by combining—and this is the great problem of transportation now—water and land transportation into one great system.

We have had a lot of experience of the north Atlantic conference in connection with ocean rates, but we have never been able to take effective action for their reduction or control. Now, if we run our own ships and cut out the wastefulness to which I have referred we shall be able to bring effective pressure to bear on any shipping combine and to reduce freight rates, as I have said, by 33⅓ per cent. There is something to work for. I agree with the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) that the farmer has not quite a fair deal, whether in this country or in the United States, but I do not think we are likely to improve the position of our farmers unless we reduce freight rates substantially, and this can be done only by carrying out the consolidation of our two great transportation systems. Let us try to remedy the grievances of our farmers by cutting out this wastefulness and bringing about one great consolidated transportation system under a strong management, and so secure not only lower rates for our cattle and our grain, but also a better price for both.

Mr. A. de WITT FOSTER (Hants-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I think I may say at the outset that such remarks of the mover of the resolution (Mr. Coote) as I heard were indeed an enlightenment to this House. I appreciate his having brought this very important subject to our attention. There seems to be still a difference of opinion between certain members as to whether the cattle industry is more important than the grain industry, but I do not think we should cavil very much about that. The fact is that the cattle industry is not only important in its present stage, but important because of its potentialities. Therein, I think, lies the necessity of discussing this subject.

For a long period, as the House is aware, we had not access to the great British market which has recently become open to us. It seems to me that the problem is very largely one of ocean transportation, now that that market is available. It may be that an examination of freight rates would show that some alteration in the rate structure could be made which would benefit the industry, but that is a technical subject which should be considered and I presume is being considered not only by this House but by experts. We have had the question of freight rates referred in a special way to the Board of Railway Commissioners. But by and large the subject is one of ocean transportation, and my observation in this connection is that we in Canada have during past years, by the expenditure of a large amount of money, built the Canadian Government Merchant Marine as a nucleus not only for the carrying of our products to such markets as were available but for bringing to Canada such products as we desired to purchase abroad. With this merchant marine it is amazing to me that we could not have utilized it, by transformations where necessary, and put it to work in this very laudable and important service. It may be that for a time it would not pay, but I do not know that that should be considered a reason why an attempt should not be made. We have a population of 9,000,000 people, and if we are ever to make any very great progress it seems to me we must make some very material departures, in the way of experiment, from some of those customs which have prevailed in the past; otherwise we will not be able to develop our resources and create new wealth, as rapidly as our obligations warrant. This experiment of putting our merchant marine into this service would have been worth while and enlightening, and well worth the cost. We are exporting a very small number of cattle as compared with our competitors. I believe that Canadian cattle—and by Canadian cattle I mean those produced in the Maritime provinces as well as those from western Canada—should command in that British market a place which will enable them to compete with the cattle of other countries. I believe that on this point greater study is being made in Great Britain than ever before, and this is also true with regard to the importations of world wheat; I believe they are examining these questions in the light of experience gained in the past few years. As a result of that examination and study I believe it will be impressed upon the British people that they can create a trade with the Dominions overseas, large and small, which will be to the advantage of both parties. This will enable the surplus population of the United Kingdom to go to the overseas dominions and create for themselves independence on the farms and in other industries.

Just a word in relation to that question. An English immigrant to Australia is worth £60 a year to the Mother Country in trade after he is settled, whereas an Englishman going to the United States is worth only £12 a year. So from their standpoint I believe this trade could be made so attractive as to enable them not only to view it as a normal growth of effort on the part of the dominions but to give it stimulation by legislation as well. More important than legislation, perhaps, is the education of the English people themselves not only in the advantages of trade with the dominions but in the merits of those articles the dominions produce. As I said before, there is no doubt in my mind that in the provinces by the sea the cattle industry can be greatly developed. While it costs more to produce cattle in the Maritimes than it does in western Canada, yet by virtue of the longer freight haul and higher freight cost on western cattle, our nearness to the sea offsets that advantage and enables us to compete in the United Kingdom. It becomes a question, therefore, of providing transportation and avenues for the distribution of that product in Great Britain to enable this industry to develop.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if this is to be a House of direct action that action should surely apply to matters such as this under discussion as well as to the lowering of the tariff on articles where there has been no examination save that made by departmental experts. If the experts of the Department of Finance can so advise the government that they are able to attack a great industry, as has happened recently, surely the experts of the Department of Agriculture, presided over by an expert minister, should be able to tackle this problem and give us some direction or some direct action in providing means for the distribution of cattle.

While I am not opposed to the idea of a committee examining this matter, I am led to ask what a committee can possibly determine. We have a number of committees sitting now, and what can this committee determine that is not known at the moment, save perhaps the technical subject of rates? Surely it is not contended that a committee meeting here will induce the United States to lower the tariff on cattle so that we will be able to regain that market; I do not believe anyone would contend that the calling of witnesses and the examination of this subject by a committee will bring about any such results. The cattle industry in the United States four or five years ago was in a very bad position, much worse than we are experiencing in Canada to-day. What did the United States government do? Through Eugene Meyer of the War Finance board they provided millions of dollars to assist in the rehabilitation of the cattle industry. The same is true of the sheep industry. It was a departure from what had previously been done, which leads me back to my very first observation, that in order to tackle some of the problems now confronting us we must, without abandoning our ideas of protection for free trade or any other dogma, seek some new avenues through which to apply the system which already exists.

The hon. member who preceded me read quotations to show the condition of farmers in the United States. I know something about the situation in the midwestern states. I know a great many of the men who are connected with the American Farm Bureau Association. I know something of the difficulties the farmers have been in in that country. Some are in those difficulties yet, but in the by and large there is no one there who will tell you truly that conditions are not far better now than they were five or even four years ago.

What is proposed in the McNary-Haugen bill, to which allusion has been made? It is not proposed that the United States should do away with protection and become a free trade country; not at all. What is proposed is merely to provide a huge sum of money, $675,000,000, for the purpose of taking care of the exportable surplus produced in that country. There is no desire among those people in the central states to do away with protection; there is no movement of that kind there. Who is the one outstanding figure in this whole movement? Ex-Governor Frank O. Lowden, of the state of Illinois, and a more staunch protectionist you cannot find either in the United States or Canada or in any other part of the world. The men who are foremost in that movement of the American Farm Bureau Association believe that protection, properly applied, will protect the farmer in the United States just as it will in any other country, and I share that view. Some people have said that a man is a protectionist in his early youth, and again just before he dies, and that in between he is something else. That may be so, but the fact remains that agriculture in this country can, in my humble judgment, be protected, and that protection will give it added assistance and new life. If we have not been protecting it in the past, that is no reason why we ought not to protect it in the future. If we have not been doing the necessary things to create new wealth in the past, that is no reason why we ought not to do them in the future. Some of these things occur to this House from time to time. Others, I believe, could very well be studied by a group of experts in this country. I have not had a chance to examine into all of the studies that Doctor Tory, for instance, has made, but I say to this government and to the last government and to any other government, that if we would utilize one-hundredth part of the intelligence of our universities and of our business men, and of the genius of the people of this country, we would find solutions for a great many of the problems which are now left to drift from session to session.

Mr. WARD: Hon. gentlemen to our right frequently tell us that they are going to protect the farmer. I think it would only be fair to the House if they would explain just how they are going to protect the Canadian farmer as such.

Mr. FOSTER: I should not, and would not, attempt in a discussion of this resolution to tell my hon. friend how little any of us, myself included, know about the subject of protection. That is a very frank admission. I daresay it is likely that a great many of us go through life and discuss free trade and protection from an academic standpoint, and finally come to the conclusion how very little any of us or all us can claim that we know about the subject. I think that is very reasonably the viewpoint of many of the great men who have passed on all down through the ages. But let me point out to my hon. friend one thing that has engaged and is now engaging the attention of the British people overseas to such an extent that the British government have subsidized the study of the question by a sum of £675,000, and next year I understand the subsidy will be increased to £1,000,000. That question is this: How to protect wheat within the empire so as to give the people in the dominions a higher price for their wheat than they are getting at the present time, without making the British taxpayer pay any more for his wheat.

Mr. WARD: Does the hon. member advocate subsidizing the wheat growers of Canada?

Mr. FOSTER: I was coming to a statement which would, I think, take care of the query which has just been addressed to me. As to subsidies, being a protectionist, and subsidies being the highest form of protection, I am able to advocate a subsidy where it is necessary to produce new wealth from the resources of this country. I do not hesitate to say that. In the four years from 1919 to 1922 the United Kingdom imported some 670,000,000 bushels of wheat. Of that amount 60 per cent came from foreign countries and 40 per cent from the dominions, and on the average that 40 per cent which came from the dominions cost the British consumer 42 cents a bushel less than he paid for his world wheat, or the wheat he bought from foreign countries. I realize that that statement will likely be challenged, because men will say: When wheat is sold at the Liverpool price, how is it possible for that to be true? Well, the fact that it is true can be verified by referring to the imports of the United Kingdom for those years, which will be found in the library, if you take your pencil and divide the number of bushels into the cost to the British consumer, c.i.f., you will find that the statement I make, which bears the imprimatur of the British government, is absolutely true. So when the hon. Minister of Agriculture says he hesitates to ask the British people to reconsider their attitude on preference because this government does not feel like asking the British consumer to tax himself in favour of Canadian goods, I say to him that the British consumer of wheat in these four years—I have not been able to get the returns for later years—taxed himself on the average 42 cents a bushel more for foreign wheat than he did for empire grown wheat.

Mr. WARD: Would the hon. member advocate such a policy with regard to cattle?

Mr. FOSTER: We do not need that. The hon. gentleman and those surrounding him talk about the identity of our wheat being preserved in western Canada. I say to this House that the identity of Canadian wheat is lost when it crosses the border into the United States, and the British consumer knows nothing about the identity of this Canadian wheat when it is mixed with American grain.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Are you sure of that?

Mr. FOSTER: I am as sure of it as the English people are sure of it themselves, and they say so.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. FOSTER: The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) says, "No, no". Does he say that English people who pretend to know the trade have not told me that? I am sure he would not say that.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, his statement is entirely contrary to all the evidence taken by the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission from the British importers. There was very little complaint as to the integrity of the Canadian certificate giving the Canadian government guarantee as to the quality and identity of our wheat.

Mr. FOSTER: Shipped by Canadiain ports direct to Great Britain, or shipped through American ports and mixed with American wheat?

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will take the trouble to read the report of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission, he will find that all the evidence indicated that wheat of Canadian origin, whatever route it might have taken to get to the Old Country had, on the whole, lived up to the specifications of the Canadian law and the Canadian certificate.

Mr. FOSTER: That is true of wheat shipped from Canadian ports only, if it is true at all. I wish to point out that our trade returns show that 176,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat were shipped to the United Kingdom in the year 1923. The English returns for the same year show that only 47,000,000 bushels were imported from Canada. Now where did the rest go? It went somewhere else, to countries other than the United Kingdom. That 47,000,000 bushels that was imported by Great Britain from Canada may have lived up to the grades at which it left this country. I am not finding fault with that; perhaps that is what the minister refers to. But take the millions of bushels that go through Buffalo and other United States ports, and which are mixed with American grain and then shipped overseas. Surely the identity of that Canadian grain is lost; there is no question about that. So that after all my point is this: A system of education amongst the British people themselves should be undertaken, and in addition to that distribution centres, not controlled by foreign countries, should be established. Because practically every avenue for the distribution of Canadian wheat in Great Britain to-day is a distribution centre which handles wheat from the Argentine and from every other foreign country from which Great Britain makes importations. Consequently it is in a position to determine what quantities of foreign wheat shall be handled there, what quantities of Canadian wheat for example, and the price is set according to the world's parity, although it may differ in different months of the year. The subject is a complex one and I state at once that I do not know everything about the problems of wheat. That may be apparent from my remarks, but I also say this: I have given the subject some close study, and I daresay there are many other hon. gentlemen here who have not given it any study at all. I have been interested in the matter because I am trying to find in my own mind some basis upon which we in the east could stand and assist the people in the west. In other words, the application of protection to Canada and the empire as well. If, for instance, Great Britain bought one hundred million more bushels of Canadian wheat and paid 20 cents more a bushel for it, instead of 42 cents less as she did in 1919-1922, then the market there for world-grown wheat would be one hundred million bushels less. Is it not reasonable to suppose that under those circumstances the price of foreign wheat in Great Britain might fall 20 cents? If so the British consumer would be 20 cents in pocket for every bushel he consumed, and the Canadian selling his wheat there would also be 20 cents a bushel in pocket by virtue of the higher price. I give that to hon. gentlemen as a point to think about.

I believe that the new Self-Supporting League recently established in England, with the object of enlightening the people there as to the quality and value of the various products which are imported into the United Kingdom and sold there, will accomplish a great deal of good, and that the overseas dominions will reap some benefit in this direction. That the embargo on Canadian cattle was not removed for a considerable number of years was due largely, I think, to personal interest somewhere on the other side. If we can harness personal interest in the Mother Country with personal interest in the dominions overseas—with personal interest in Australia, South Africa and Canada—if we can get on common ground in the matter of marketing the products of the far flung portions of this empire, in the heart of the empire, and get a preference in exchange for a preference I think we shall make progress along the line of developing not only industrial life but farming life in the overseas dominions themselves as well as in the Mother Country.

I may tell hon. gentlemen who are interested that if they will get in touch with the secretary of the Self-Supporting League in London they will get from him information which bears the imprimatur of Stanley Baldwin, Prime Minister of Great Britain, along the various lines I have been speaking of. Furthermore, the British government are giving close attention and study to this subject to-day with the idea not only of doing something in the direction of developing trade between the various portions of the empire but also along the far greater line of providing opportunities in the dominions where people from Great Britain can go and establish homes animated by the hope of finding a market in the land they have left for the commodities they subsequently produce. My argument applies not only to wheat but to the apple industry and to many other industries in Canada, in the east as well as in the west.

[Mr. Foster.]

Mr. MILLAR: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the British people paid more for wheat because it was wheat from Canada?

Mr. FOSTER: No, the hon. gentleman misunderstood me, I stated the very reverse of that. I said that in the years 1919 to 1922 the British people, on the average, paid 42 cents more per bushel for foreign wheat than they did for wheat grown or purchased in Canada, Australia, and other parts of the empire. That was the statement I made.

Mr. VALLANCE: Did not government control in this country have something to do with that?

Mr. FOSTER: Not in those years, I think.

Mr. VALLANCE: There was government control in 1919.

Mr. FOSTER: That may have been the case in 1919, but not in other years subsequently. There are a great many factors which account for the existence of such a condition which I could not explain in a four hour speech; at least it would take the greatest part of that time to explain it even if I could offer a full explanation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER: Some hon. gentlemen opposite laugh. They do not know anything about the subject themselves, they have never studied it. They would probably say, with a smile and a smirk, that it was not true that the British government paid 42 cents more for foreign wheat. May I point out, however, that the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin has issued a statement, which is to be found at the very beginning of a certain book, in which these facts are set forth, not only with regard to wheat but as respects many other products, including live stock, chilled meat, apples and all the other commodities which have been imported into Great Britain during the years I spoke of.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a very important statement, that Canadian wheat sold on the average in Great Britain during a period of four years at 42 cents a bushel less than the price at which foreign wheat was sold in the same country during the same years.

Mr. FOSTER: Correct.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like my hon. friend to please quote his authority for the statement, because it is very interesting and very important to Canada, if true.

Mr. FOSTER: I did not intend to discuss this subject this evening and therefore did not bring the necessary documents with me, but if a page will go up to my room and bring down a statement of British imports to be found there I will quote the necessary authority to my hon. friend. Or, if he prefers it, I will send the documents over to him when I have finished my speech and he can figure the prices out for himself.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish you would.

Mr. FOSTER: I am not giving this information to the House as taken from Belcher's Almanac, or some authority of that kind. These are facts which will stagger the English people themselves. I have only been able to examine the period from 1919 to 1922. Whether the same condition has obtained since then is another matter. However, the fact remains that the statement I made is correct according to the imports of the United Kingdom for the years mentioned.

Mr. EVANS: Is my hon. friend's statement true of wheat delivered in the same month to Great Britain from different parts of the world, or does it refer to a time when it was not possible to effect delivery on Canadian wheat?

Mr. FOSTER: I appreciate my hon. friend's question and perhaps the factors he speaks of entered into the situation. However, the cost of which I have reference was the average cost for all months. Of course the competition from Argentine and other countries during the months when our wheat is being marketed enters into the matter.

Now I want to make another observation in connection with the very important resolution we are now considering. It is that this government, or any government in power in Canada, can afford to let a great many of our undertakings in the matter of public works, stand for the time, and concentrate their attention and the attention of parliament upon these very important industries, the cattle industry, the agricultural industry, and above all the manufacturing industry. I believe we have got to find new avenues and new methods for the financing of new enterprises in this country, because it certainly will be utterly impossible for anybody to go out among the investing public—certainly no group of men in this House can do it—and get new capital for new industries; they will not be able to sell new preferred stock, or bonds, or common stock in new enterprises, directly the people become seized of the fact that double taxation will have to be paid—that is if that taxation remains. In any case, if it does not remain, the difficulties in a new country are to get money for the development of our industries, save and except that money which comes in in large developments through such sources as the International Pulp and Paper Company, and similar corporations, who bring in forty or fifty millions for the development of a water power or some other national monopoly. That is an investment entire and apart from those I have in mind, because back of that they have large properties upon which they can issue further bonds and stock, et cetera. But I am speaking of new capital for new industry, and it seems to me that in this particular line this government and this parliament has to devise some new method of assistance, in order that we may have new industrial life in this country, new agricultural life and new cattle industry in portions where it does not now exist. I believe it is possible to have this renewed vigour in a nation devoting itself to that financing and that development through private sources, if you will, or by whatever method may be devised, and we wil find here plenty of attraction for immigrants all over the country, even from the United States. Once we have provided the places to work in, which are infinitely more important than the places to live in, we will have immigration. If we provide places to work, whether in the workshop or on the farm, immigration will take place and those who come will stay here. Under present conditions the immigrants come, remain only a short time and pass on, and the thirty or forty millions we have spent in the last few years, so far as the sum total of development in our country is concerned, might as well, in my humble judgment, not be spent.

I support the resolution, not because I believe the appointment of the committee will bring us nearer to a solution this session, but because I think we should have all the information we can obtain on the industry from whatever source it comes, so as to be able to make up our minds what we can do. While I do not believe we can do much this session, I support the resolution for the reason I have given.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria, B.C.): I wish to congratulate the mover of this resolution (Mr. Coote) for having presented it to the House. While we cannot perhaps gain much new information, I think we may get light on some phase of the subject that will assist us in securing a partial solution of the situation as we find it. There is nothing more important in my opinion in agriculture than the development of the live stock industry and of a mixed system of farming, in preference to a single crop system. I do not criticize or censure the man who settles on a new piece of land where Providence has supplied him with nitrogen, potash and phosphates, which he can help himself to in favourable years. I think he is quite right in getting himself established by securing as much natural wealth from the soil in the early years of his occupation as he can. These products assist him in becoming established. History will repeat itself on the new lands in Canada, as it has done in all parts of the continent of America; after a while that stored-up fertility of the soil will become exhausted and he will have to adopt a mixed system of farming, or live as some men do who grow wheat on poor soil in some other parts of the world.

I think it has been clearly shown that we can produce in Canada as high a quality of beef as can be grown anywhere. We have on more than one occasion shipped grass beef from Alberta to the Chicago market, where it has easily topped the market and obtained a higher price than the American beef sent from the various American states. We have also shipped some of our store cattle over to Great Britain, where they have been prepared and finished by the feeders on the other side, and in competition with the best British animals at some of their most important exhibitions have won the first prize. In British Columbia we produce a very high quality of beef on our ranges, and I wish to say that the taste of British Columbia bunch grass beef would attract a person under any conditions. We have in that province one of the largest cattle ranches in Canada. Among the various problems we have to meet in the cattle business are first, the production of good quality, secondly, the growing and finishing of those animals, and third, the spreading out of our marketing system over a greater period of the year. These are problems that can be controlled very largely by the farmer himself. In the first place, he requires to breed properly in order to produce the proper kind of beef; in the second place he must feed that beef liberally during the growing years, and then finish it off to a greater extent on our western plains and on our western farm lands than is being done at the present time. I quite understand that it requires a good deal of skill and perhaps some more expensive appliances in the feeding of cattle, although in the western country those animals feed out in the open, with the light brush found there as a protection, do much better than those tied up. In that great country where cheap food is easily secured the feeding of cattle should be profitable.

Another serious fault is rushing the cattle to market during the last three months of the year. I have seen train loads of cattle being sent out to the market at Winnipeg heading from the newer sections of the prairie provinces and these cattle looked as though they were bred for speed rather than for beef. It is no wonder they secured only a small price when they reached their destination.

With regard to freight rates, in a country with such large areas and huge distances the question of rates will always be an important matter in transporting the animals to market, and every effort should be made to lower the freight rates as far as possible. There are many problems in connection with the shipment of cattle across the Atlantic which have to be seriously considered, and the matter of fixing freight rates is not nearly so easy as one might be induced to think after hearing some of the remarks which have been made on this question. Return cargoes have to be looked for and many other things have to be taken into consideration before a solution of the problem can be found.

In regard to the shipment of chilled meat as compared with live beef to the British market, it has been solved long ago. Argentine can beat us in the matter of chilled beef. I was much surprised to find the uniform quality of the Argentine beef in the Smithfield market in London in 1921. The quarters were very similar, well-conditioned and even in quality, and much in demand by those who desired beef that had been chilled or frozen. However, the Britisher is perhaps the best judge of roast beef in the world—and he has not acquired his knowledge in a short time; he has acquired it after hundreds of years. At the time I was there fresh-killed beef was at least 50 per cent higher than the chilled article, so that it is reasonable to say that when the Britisher demands that quality of beef we must pay attention to that particular phase of our export market rather than attempt to make any experiment at the present time.

Again, Argentine is able to produce her beef at a very much lower cost. Therefore when it comes into competition with that beef on the other side our chances of success would not be good.

We have heard the United States referred to on two or three occasions to-night and I am quite sure that anyone familiar with the live stock business will admit at once that the United States, situated as closely as it is on the south, is the natural market for our beef. But the people of the United States have something to say about that and we are not going to be able to remove that tariff until they feel inclined to do so and that it is to their benefit to have the tariff removed. The range cattle men of the United States cover a large part of Texas, Arizona, New Mexico, Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, eastern Washington and Oregon, parts of California and Nevada. These men are producing meat under the same conditions as our men on the western prairies. They are looking for a market in the corn-belt. It is these men who together with many other farmers brought pressure to bear on the United States government in 1920 and brought in the emergency tariff at that time to be followed shortly afterwards by what is known as the Fordney tariff.

Therefore the United States farmers are not inclined to favour the removal of the tariff and I am rather surprised to hear that there have been some large meetings of farmers asking for this. I would imagine they would be largely influenced by the Democratic party. Only a week or two ago I quoted a number of articles from various live stock papers in the United States clearly showing that when the dairy industry was in jeopardy only a few months ago the United States did not hesitate to increase their tariff on butter by 50 per cent. In addition to that, resolutions I quoted showed that they desired an increased tariff on canned meats, hides and some of the other by-products of cattle.

With regard to the British market I think at the present time we might supply animals of better quality. As I said a short time ago better breeding of our live stock and better feeding of these animals during the growing period will, if carried on in this country, have good results in relation to our success in the British market. We are a little short of animals of as high a quality as might be desired and there is some inclination on the part of some shippers to fill out shipments of cattle with animals of an inferior quality. This is not going to help our market in Great Britain. We have established a high standard there and we should maintain it so as to keep Canadian cattle continuously in demand in that country.

Another very important market is the home market and we should produce beef of a better quality. I will never forget attending the annual meeting of the Aberdeen Angus Breeders' Association in the city of Brandon a few years ago when beef was served from prize steers. This was the finest beef I ever tasted in this or any other country and anyone getting a taste of such beef as that would want as much of the same quality as he could possibly get. One of the reasons why people do not consume more beef in this country is because they frequently get beef of a very poor quality. Just to-night I faced a piece of roast beef that I had to give up after arguing my way through half of it. It was so tough it would drive a hungry man away from a chuck wagon. It is by raising a high quality of beef and putting it on the market so that it will be more attractive to the consumer that we shall help to build up our home market.

Beef has to face the competition of discarded old dairy cows that have done years of service in the dairy business and that have earned their cost over and over again. When they reach an age when they are of no more profit in the dairy business they are sent to the packing house. If we produce more of a good quality of beef to come into competition with those animals, we can drive them into a can or a sausage casing, which is where they really belong.

We should make every effort to gain entry into Great Britain with our dairy cattle. We have been more progressive than any other country in the world in cleaning up our dairy herds and placing them on a good, sound healthy basis by the use of the tuberculin test. We have developed the producing quality of our dairy animals to a great extent so that they will be in demand in any country in the world. We have on more than one occasion held the dairy record for the production of milk and butter, and after looking over some of the dairy herds of Great Britain I am quite sure they could be much improved by the addition of some good Canadian cattle.

I heard the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) comparing farming conditions in Canada with those in Great Britain. The farmer in Great Britain is not a pioneer farmer; he is on a farm that has been cultivated for many ears. He is farming land that is under drained, that has probably permanent fences and permanent buildings, and in that way he does not have to invest much money on capital account. In my farming operations west of the mountains I have always found that when I get a little bit of money saved up I have somewhere to put it, such as in clearing land, putting up a fence or new buildings, or draining land. The British farmer has not these things to do and he is consequently able to put more money aside where a reasonable profit can be made.

I am rather surprised to hear the statement about the United States farmers not desiring a tariff, because as I said a moment ago the government did not hesitate to increase the tariff in the United States on dairy butter once the farmers made an appeal to have that done. With regard to the Haugen bill, which has been referred to on more than one occasion to-night, this had its object, if I understand it correctly, the assistance of the United States congress in finding a market for the surplus products of the farmers of that country. The great objection to this, I understand, is that if a price was set above the normal market prices of the world it would cause a tremendous increase in the production of these particular products with the result that it would be very difficult to find a market for the surplus, and the deficit would have to be carried by the United States government.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for South Huron, who I know is an expert in the breeding of beef cattle, a gentleman whom I met on Farmers' Institute platforms years ago west of the mountains, and who is well known to the beef producers of Canada. I heard him a few minutes ago speaking about the wonderful market in the United States. I quite agree with him. He also referred to that market of moneyed men in the larger and more populous centres, the men in those centres who would demand a nice thick, juicy steak from a choice steer and who are not afraid to pay for it. In some of the United States hotels it is not uncommon to pay as high as three dollars for such a steak. Let me ask my hon. friend how those conditions were created in that country. How did they get their wealth? Why are those people able to pay those high prices for the products of the farm? This has occurred in a country that has maintained for many years the highest protection in the world. They have conserved for their people the wealth of that country; they have conserved for themselves their own market, and just as soon as we get sense enough to plug up the leak in Canada, to keep our home market for ourselves and keep our young men at home, we shall enjoy our full measure of prosperity.

The hon. member sitting to my right (Mr. Maclean) also referred to a proposal of his to combine the two great railways of Canada. I have been informed by some of our largest shippers that if there is one thing in the world they do not want it is a combination of these two roads. They said that while freight rates were fixed on the same basis on these two roads, still there was a great deal of competition for the business, which was very beneficial to the live stock owners, and as a result they got their cars much quicker and in better condition and the animals were handled much more expeditiously to the market than under the old conditions when one railway controlled the whole situation.

I have very much pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in suporting the resolution.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I find myself largely in agreement with the very excellent remarks of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie). Indeed, I doubt very much if we could work up any controversy over a resolution with the spirit of which most of us seem to be in hearty accord. I think it is generally accepted that we can not have agriculture in a permanent and sound condition without some form of live stock. It will be recalled that after the war probably no line of agriculture was more severely hit by the terrible deflation of 1920 than live stock. Most of us expected there would be a tremendous slump in grain prices, and many farmers thought they would make provision for it by going more largely into live stock, only to be hit at least as quickly and sometimes more fatally than were the grain-growers. It was because of that deflation, and of the further fact that we were shut out of the American market by the tariff and had not yet acquired the British market by the removal of the embargo, that our live stock men found themselves wrestling with three difficulties—terrible deflation of price, exclusion from the American market, and the British market still closed to them. As a result the live stock industry, especially in the ranching country, was struck a staggering blow and for a while we were afraid it would disappear. Since then there been a marked improvement, especially during the last two or three years, not only in the quantity and quality of our live stock but also in prices and profits.

Just a word on the British market. While it is far away it has many advantages. There are three conditions we must comply with before we can get in there and stay: one is quantity, the next is quality, and the third is continuity of supply. There is a general opinion that if we have a run of cattle in the early spring and another in the fall, that will suit the British market. This is not correct according to my information. That market will take Canadian cattle every week and every month of the year, provided you have the right kind to offer. What we have shipped so far is only a bagatelle required with the aggregate requirements of that market.

Why is it we need more quantity now? It is true that the quantity that is being shipped to-day to Great Britain as compared with 1922, the year before the embargo was taken off, has increased 500 per cent, and during the same period our shipments to the United States have decreased 230 per cent leaving a slight net gain in the aggregate of our shipments. But why are there not more? I can remember when almost every farmer of western Ontario had a fine bunch of steers which he turned out for the admiration of the visitor. Down in the Maritimes, adjacent to the bay of Fundy, where the hay barns sometimes are full to overflowing, with the hay market gone and no stock to feed it to, why are they not shipping more beef stockers to the British market? I wonder if we have lost the desire for the constant work that usually goes with fattening live stock? Or is it because our youths for the most part have left the eastern farms and are doing this work out west? Whatever the reason may be, we have to start over again and build up this industry. Therefore, is it not natural that it should take time to build it up? For thirty long years this industry with the Old Country was destroyed, and now we have to build it up almost from the bottom. During the three short years we have been able to increase our shipments, as I say, by 500 per cent, though we have to admit during the same time a decrease in our business with the United States of 230 per cent.

The fact that we are deprived largely of the American market has driven us to the overseas market and has had the effect of improving the quality of our stock; because nothing but quality can afford to pay the freight rates for that tremendous distance. To that extent, perhaps, we have benefited. That is to say, the more remote your market, the higher the quality of the goods must be to stand the freight carrying charges. The poorer the quality of your live cattle, the nearer at home you must market them because they will not carry themselves to the distant market. Consequently we have an incidental advantage in the improvement of our stock. I do not take much consolation from that fact, for I should like to have both the American and the British market, but having been deprived of the former, it was nothing but a godsend that shortly after we secured practically free access to the latter. Continuity means that we must be in the business in earnest, shipping every month of the year, so that those who have gratified their appetite for our cattle can look forward to getting a constant supply.

My good friend from Marquette (Mr. Mullins), whom we always like to hear on the cattle industry, is no milk and water admirer, he is a real live stock man. He may not feed very many live stock, but he understands the game and he is in it heart and money and everything else I expect. But sometimes he makes remarks that may leave the impression that if I chose to do so I could dig up some real cheap freight rates, and could even command the waves. Well, my hon. friend will remember we made a rather futile attempt to do something in the direction of lower ocean rates a year ago. Maybe if it had been made at some other time than what was supposed to be just before a general election, the effort would have been received with some degree of unanimity on all sides. Nevertheless it was a gesture in the direction that my hon. friend desires, and it is to be hoped that in the not too distant future another effort will be made. At all events I think it is required. But under the present method of shipping our co-operative marketing facilities have not reached the stage where they can ensure that boats at Montreal, Quebec or St. John will be filled shortly after arrival in port. That is the trouble. By actual working out we find that at least in the first two years after the embargo was taken off, 30 per cent of the space for cattle was not utilized. How can we get cheap freight rates when at times only 70 per cent of the space is filled on the return trip? It is a matter of evolution, but our boats at the various ports must be met systematically with our shipments of cattle and practically every space be filled so that those may earn the fullest possible revenue.

I am not as free to speak as the hon. member for Marquette, but I do not find myself entirely in sympathy with his desire for a cheaper freight rate. I can assure him that there is no great shortage of space at present. His information is that spaces are short and that some of our space brokers in Montreal could place lots of cattle if they had the boats. That is not our information; they have succeeded in concealing that condition from the Live Stock branch. If there is any shortage of spaces I can assure my hon. friend that I would be very glad to know of it, but that is not my information.

Mr. MULLINS: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the Welshman, the largest carrier out of Montreal, is laid up, and that the Ionian has been taken off the run, leaving a shortage of ocean space?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The actions of these big shipping companies are very mysterious, and I will not pretend to account for them. But at all events there is a tremendous market in England, able to consume anything we are likely to produce during our lifetime. We are now only shipping a bagatelle, but we are trying to encourage the production of cattle in Canada. Cheap rates are being given eastern buyers in order that they may go west to buy cattle, shows are being promoted in the west, and the result is that the feeding of cattle in winter has been stimulated since the British market was opened.

I might just add a word or two to what was said by the hon. member for Victoria regarding the remaining restrictions against Canadian cattle. I do not want to criticize too much; I think we have made good progress, but there are still restrictions against our cows which might be investigated by this committee, and a case might be prepared for the Imperial conference which is to take place some time in October. Representations might be made to the home government to put Canada on a parity with Ireland with respect not only to stockers but other cattle as well. A committee of the English House, after debating this question last year, strongly recommended that no discrimination should be made against one overseas dominion as compared with another in the matter of the shipment of live cattle. That referred to Canada, of course, and our representative was largely instrumental in having that resolution passed.

So much for the British market. I would now like to say a word about the American market. I do not wish to revive the old question of reciprocity with the United States; I do not think it is a live question except to certain individuals. Some day it may come to life again, but just now there seems to be only a hope on the part of Canada that something may be done. This hope is not shared by the hon. member for Victoria; he does not think there is much sign on the horizon that the United States will reduce the duty against our cattle. Nevertheless, in 1923 Right Hon. Mr. Fielding brought down an amendment to the Customs Act, which I would like to read:

If the president of the United States, under authority of the United States Tariff Act of 1922, determines to reduce the duties imposed by such act on the following articles, that is to say:

Cattle; wheat, wheat flour; oats; barley; potatoes; onions; turnips; hay; fish as enumerated in paragraphs 717, 718, 719 and 720 of the said tariff of 1922, the Governor in Council may by order in council make such reductions of duties on such articles imported into Canada from the United States as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for such reductions on Canadian products imported into the United States.

It was then thought that this would constitute a friendly gesture towards the United States in the way of reciprocal relations on these specified products. Speaking from memory I think nothing materialized from that amendment. As the hon. member for Macleod pointed out, Mr. Tom King, speaking last winter at a meeting in Saskatoon, drew attention to the fact that we in Canada could not expect to have any particular move made by the government of the United States towards a reduction of duty while we maintained a tariff of 25 per cent against American live stock. For a time our live stock went freely into the United States, before the Fordney tariff was established while we maintained a 25 per cent duty against importations from that country, and Mr. King pointed out that the first step we should take in Canada was to make it plain what we meant by the term "as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for such reductions on Canadian products imported into the United States." In this connection the following order in council was passed by the present government on May 18, 1926:

At the Government House at Ottawa,
Tuesday, the 18th day of May, 1926.
Present:

The Deputy of His Excellency
The Governor General in Council:

Whereas section 80 of the Customs Tariff Act, 1907, as amended by chapter 42 of the statutes of 1923 reads as follows:

"8C. If the president of the United States, under authority of the United States Tariff Act of 1922, determines to reduce the duties imposed by such act on the following articles, that is to say:

Cattle; wheat; wheat flour; oats; barley; potatoes; onions; turnips; hay; fish as enumerated in paragraphs 717, 718, 719 and 720 of the said tariff of 1922, the Governor in Council may by order in council make such reductions of duties on such articles imported into Canada from the United States as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for such reductions on Canadian products imported into the United States."

And whereas the time would seem to be opportune in so far as cattle are concerned for the taking of such action on the part of Canada as is possible, looking toward the freer exchange of agricultural products between the United States and this Dominion:

Therefore the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture, is pleased to authorize and doth hereby authorize and instruct the Minister of Finance to take such action as may be necessary towards the reduction of duties on cattle entering Canada from the United States in the event of the United States reducing the duties on Canadian cattle entering their country, the reduction in Canadian duties on cattle to be in the same proportion to the present duty as the reduction in the United States duty is to the present United States duty.

That is to say, every advance made by the United States government in the way of a reduction in duty on Canadian cattle will be met by a corresponding reduction in the Canadian duty against American cattle. So it will be seen that according to this order in council we have a brick for brick policy; that is to say, every brick the Americans take off the tariff wall against us will be met with the removal of a corresponding brick from our tariff wall against American cattle. There is this outstanding difference between our policy and that of our hon. friends opposite. They usually speak of their policy as brick for brick in a wall that is being built up. Our policy is a brick for brick downwards. I shall not dilate on that except to say that we just as well as our friends opposite, have a brick for brick policy, but ours is brick for brick downwards.

Mr. HANSON: That is the policy of destruction.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think my hon. friend will take much exception to this. Exceptions prove the rule, you know. On occasions like this we do not want anything but a real good discusion of this very important question. I do not know that the American people are ready yet, but we will be ready on this side, ready to come downward the moment there is any such indication on the other side.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Why does not the minister use the tariff against them on the things they want to sell to us? Then he would be in a position to get them to come to some understanding.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What, for instance?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Many things.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On wheat? The wheat growers would not stand for that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): My hon. friend understands that they are not selling wheat to us.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But we are to them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): We are buying about $120,000,000 a year more goods from them than we are selling to them.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It has been suggested by some that we might put an export duty on wheat and hold that over them as a lever in order to get concessions for our cattle. I do not preach the doctrine that the end justifies the means, although I would like to see access for our cattle to the American market.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I thought the minister had in mind a brick for brick policy.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, brick for brick downwards.

Mr. HANSON: In this very connection, does the minister know of any responsible member of the Republican party who has at any time within the last five years expressed adherence to the principles he is now trying to enunciate?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I do not think they have.

Mr. HANSON: Not one.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But just as soon as their urban population get into the same frame of mind as they were in in 1910, and cry out for cheaper meat, they are going to get access to meat from Canada and elsewhere. The time was ripe for action then. That time has not recurred; it may recur sooner than we expect, and we propose to be ready, aye ready, for that occasion.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Whom did Mr. Tom King represent when he was making those statements in the Canadian west?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He is a Canadian correspondent at Washington and seems to be giving the news for all parties. We see his articles in our press, and he is usually looked upon as a reliable dispenser of news on agricultural matters.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Was he not representing somebody from the United States when he made those statements in the west?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He might have been, but I have found him a very level-headed gentleman.

I would judge from the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) that he had in mind the desirability of securing the American market for our beef animals, our stockers, and such like. I presume he will agree as to the advisability of extending the scope of this inquiry to dairy cattle and breeding cattle.

He does not differentiate between them, but simply speaks of the cattle industry. With that in mind, may I say a word with regard to our dairy cattle industry in this country?

We are making good progress, I think, with regard to dairying, especially of recent years, particularly with regard to the export of butter and still more with regard to the quality and quantity of our exports of cheese. Cheese is the standby of the average Ontario farmer. It is to him what wheat is to the western farmer. It is the chief source of revenue of many of the farms here in Ontario. When you look up the statistics and find that the average production of milk per cow in Canada is less than 4,000 pounds per annum, I do not see how some of these cattle are worth carrying over. The production of some runs to twice that amount, and consequently some must run to only half that amount, and with the drag on the industry of a large number of dairy cattle not paying their board, it seems to me that if it was only for that one thing the committee might do a lot of educational work by pointing out, if it be for the one-hundreth time, the advisability of culling out these animals from our dairy herds. It is distressing. They take up just as much room in the stable, eat practically the same amount of feed as the good producers, and the result from these culls is negligible, and the little bit they do give they are very often unwilling to give, and you have to run around all over the shop after them. I can think of no greater drag on the dairy industry. My hon. friends opposite may blame that on the Australian treaty. I do not think so, even accepting their viewpoint of the treaty. Examine the dairy herds within a certain radius of this city. Go out in the middle of summer and see the calves out in the open, with not a twig to shade them from the burning sun, wagging their little tails off shaking off the flies, wearing themselves out in their infancy—that is the way they are preparing themselves to become dairy cows. It will not do. We have a lot to learn yet.

It is amazing to me that with this disability, and with the further disability of the small cheese factories with their small output per factory, and the consequent higher cost, that we stand top of the ladder to-day in the British market in regard to the quality and quantity of our cheese. We would be several notches higher still, and the farmer would have more profit in his pocket at the end of the year, if we removed these disabilities. A lot of the men with good herds are doing well, but, on the other hand, the man who has only this kind of herd, whose cows milk for only six or seven months of the year, who tries to economize on feed in the winter and turns his dairy cattle out in the spring so poor that it takes half the summer to get the old hair off, cannot succeed. I think, therefore, if the hon. member for Macleod will open the door wide enough and have the committee consider the improving of the individual dairy unit, which is the cow, it will be worth while. The improvement of the quality of our dairy products in western Canada has been very gratifying. We have come to it gradually. Someone has said that if you abuse this old earth of ours by bad farming, sooner or later that earth will discipline you, and by climatic or other conditions will compel you to adopt some system of farming that will enrich the fertility of the soil. We are learning that lesson.

I would not presume to speak authoritatively regarding agriculture in the Maritime provinces, but if there is one thing agriculture needs in the Maritime provinces more than another it is live stock, particularly around the bay of Fundy where they have such an abundance of feed and frequently nothing to feed it to. By way of encouraging them, at a number of our experimental farms down there last winter we put on a bunch of feeder steers to demonstrate what could be done in feeding steers and getting them ready to ship to the British market. The Maritimes are right at the front door of Canada, and shippers of cattle in the Maritimes are better off by $19 per head than the shipper of cattle at Regina or Saskatoon We in the west have to pay $19 more freight in shipping our cattle to the British market. They have nothing but ocean transportation, while we have the long land haul with its consequent increase in cost. It is true that there are other conditions as to which we enjoy an advantage, but I am satisfied the Maritime provinces are starting out on an era of improved agriculture. I had an opportunity of discussing the matter with some of the public men down there, some of the ministers of agriculture, and they impressed me very much with having the right slant on some of the things that are wrong in the Maritime provinces. You can get wheat gliding through their ports on a scale of ten and twenty million bushels if you like; but what you want is something that will develop new wealth and production, and, instead of importing farm products as they are in many cases, exporting them to the markets of the world.

I would suggest to the hon. member for Macleod that he take advantage of an existing committee instead of asking for the appointment of a special committee when we feel that we have just about had a surfeit of special committees this session. We are all looking to the time when this session will close. Prorogation we hope is not too far off in the distance, and instead of organizing a special committee at this time, which would make it more difficult than ever to carry on morning sessions in the course of a week or two, why not take advantage of the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization, or some committee that is already constituted? If such committee is too large the question might be referred to a subcommittee. I would have much preferred had this resolution come up for discussion earlier in the session, because there was a long period—three or four months, three months anyway—when the Agricultural committee had nothing to do but kick their heels waiting for something to turn up. That would have been an excellent opportunity, when we were wasting our time in other respects, to have referred the whole question to them. However, that opportunity is past, and it is no use in expressing regret over the fact. But I would suggest that even now the subject would receive more attention from the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization than a special committee would be able to give it at this period of the session.

However, whether or not my hon. friend accepts that suggestion I am going to support his resolution. There is no reason why, either at this session or at another session, we should not have a useful discussion on how to improve the live stock industry of Canada. Because it is not keeping pace, not even in the matter of production. There is a popular idea that the question of production does not enter into the problem at all. My experience is that if you have a good export steer it is half sold, there is no doubt about it. But it does not follow that because you get that far you should stop there. The great question of co-operative marketing is still in its infancy in Canada. But the evolution stage is proceeding rapidly from one stage of perfection to another, and when the process of co-operation is carried out to its fullest extent with the result of saving the greatest possible amount of time and money, then producers will realize better prices for their animals. It is sometimes asked: What can we do? Well, the situation here is the same as in the case of any other gospel, the gospel of salvation for example, or of better markets. You have got to keep talking about it and pointing out methods of improvement in order to get people to listen.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I have listened with much interest to the remarks made by different speakers on this resolution, and particularly to the remarks offered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) who would naturally be supposed to be in close touch with the whole question, and in view of the fact that he has been engaged in agriculture all his life would be regarded as having as intimate a knowledge of the whole subject as anyone in Canada. I regret, however, that the Minister has taken his seat without throwing very much light on this much vexed question. It is true he told us that agriculture is on the eve of a great development, that good times are in store for us, and that the government passed an order in council in 1926 offering certain concessions to the people across the line if they would only allow our cattle access to the markets of the United States; but no solution of the difficulty is suggested. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) I observe, has had this resolution on the order paper since January 29, upwards of four months, and as the minister says that in all probability the session will close in the course of a few weeks we may not have an opportunity to go into the matter in detail even though a special committee were appointed.

In closing the minister touched upon the subject of co-operative marketing, a matter which might well have occupied the attention of himself and his department. But so far as I can see the government have been absolutely asleep at the switch in regard to action on their part. It is true that in western Canada something along the line of co-operation has been done during the last year with regard to the marketing of wheat and grain grown in those provinces, and I am quite confident and quite hopeful that good will result from those efforts and that it will blaze the way for other branches of agriculture making progress along similar lines. But in the meantime what has the federal Department of Agriculture been doing in the matter. We are spending upwards of $6,000,000 per year on this department and the head of that department admits to-night that they are not doing anything in regard to co-operative marketing. It is true, he says, there are great possibilities along that line and that we are on the eve of a great era of development, but so far as his own department is concerned, I cannot see that it is doing very much in the way of encouraging development.

The minister says that the average milk production of the dairy cow is below what it should be, that the people are not providing proper shelter for young and growing stock, and so on. It is all very well for the minister to criticize those who are endeavouring to carry on in this country, but let me tell him that to my mind there is no one so much in need of censure for his lack of doing what he ought to do for the live stock industry as the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As to what?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): For not doing anything with the amount of money which is spent on the department over which the minister presides.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will my hon. friend enumerate some of the things I have not done that I should have done? I am asking the question seriously.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): You are doing a lot in the matter of grading, it is true. You are appointing graders and inspectors, not for beef cattle, it may be, but for hogs for the convenience of the packing companies. You have inspectors in all the packing plants to grade the intake and there is not a pound of bacon passing out of them that you have any check or control over as to grade. The government have been spending enormous sums of money in grading for the benefit of the packers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is nonsense absolutely.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The minister says it is nonsense but let me tell him that he cannot sit there and say things of that kind. Let him, first of all, look at the records in his own department and he will find that the lower grades have been in a tremendous majority while the selects form a very small percentage indeed and no attempt has been made to grade the output of the packing companies. And the same thing applies now with regard to wheat and eggs and many other things which the department is grading. What percentage of the eggs produced in this country are paid for on the basis of extras or extra specials? A trifling quantity. Yet the packer has taken advantage of what the government are doing and reaping the benefits from the grading along this line. The same thing happens in regard to the wheat. The wheat pool in the west I believe is endeavouring to secure the control of their wheat until it is placed on the market. They are endeavouring to obtain the advantages which heretofore went to those who were changing the grade of their grain after it had passed out of their control at the terminal elevators. This is what the Minister of Agriculture is doing all along the line with an army of inspectors and graders all through the country. The department is costing $6,000,000 a year and the government is looking after the interest of those dealing in the produce of the farm rather than the farmer. They say, "Oh if the farmer would only produce more?" What inducement is there to do so? The minister says that the winters are long and the cattle come out poor. There are thousands of farmers who are carrying on in the winter months producing the articles which are produced during the summer months, doing it well, it is true, under a handicap as to climate. What encouragement are they receiving from the government? All I have to do is to refer to the remarks of the Minister of Finance a year ago in this House. He said:

> Why is it of advantage for Canada ta make a trade agreement with Australia? Well, the seasons in the two countries are exactly opposite. It is now summer in Canada,—the growing period; it is winter is Australia. To-day our commission merchants have their agents throughout the country buying eggs, butter and cheese, to place in cold storage, on which they will have to pay storage charges, interest and insurance. Those carrying charges will be paid by the Canadian breaksfast table next winter. But we will be saved this burden if we can effect an economic arrangement with Australia whereby there will be a continual flow of these products from our sister commonwealth, while we are shipping our products to the United Kingdom.

During the months of the year when it is costly to produce in this country the minister will encourage imports from Australia and New Zealand to ship their products to Canada. Let me tell the minister that during the four months of the present year there have been upwards of 7,000,000 pounds of butter brought in as a result of the treaty made with Australia—subsequently extended to New Zealand—something that never happened in a like period before.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was more than that in 1915 and 1916.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I said in four months. There was never a time in the history of Canada when for a like period so much was imported.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The minister says he is going to cheapen the cost of the breakfast table. That is apparently the object in view and not the development of agriculture. I could not help but imagine how the Americans must have smiled when they read the order in council passed by the government. "If you will only allow our cattle to have access to your market, we will do the same for you." It is the American people the minister is looking after and not the Canadian people at all. Those who listened to the president of the United States a year ago last fall at the Chicago winter fair will realize that they have no intention of lowering the duty to compel the farmers of the United States to compete with imports of cattle or anything else from this country. That is not their object at all, when the president stated that if it was found that the American farmer was suffering from the competition of other countries the tariff would be increased to protect him. The American does not look upon this matter the way hon. gentlemen opposite looks upon it. In the United States they have appointed a tariff commission to look after their interests. I have here the ninth report of the tariff commission of the United States. How do they look at these matters? There they ascertain the cost of production, and the Minister of Agriculture, with his $6,000,000 annual expenditure, is not able to tell us the cost of production of a single thing grown on the farm.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can tell the hon. member the cost of every one.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I hope the minister will at last be able to give us this information rather than to indulge in the generalities he has indulged in to-night. What does the tariff commission of the United States say in regard to their objective? It says:

> The law seeks to provide a mathematical formula for the equalization of costs of production in accordance with the provision of section 315. If, for example, the existing duty on a particular commodity does not equalize, as between the foreign and domestic manufacturer, production costs ascertained as provided in the statute, it is the function of the tariff commission to make investigations to assist the president to find a rate which will tend to correct the inequality.

The object they have is to ascertain the cost of production in their own country and in other countries, and if something can be produced in a foreign country cheaper than in the United States, then they put up the tariff to protect their people. I know that the matter of tariff, or the safeguarding of industries, or protection, the elimination of competition or whatever you see fit to call it, is not a popular issue with many people. Personally I would prefer to see free trade indulged in by all the countries of the world. In that case I believe we could hold our own with the best of them, but unfortunately the attitude of other countries is to increase their tariff in order to protect their own people against the imports of other countries, and we have to deal with the conditions with which we are confronted rather than with some ideal which we may have in our mind and which we would like to see in effect.

The cattle industry of this country is undoubtedly the very foundation upon which successful agriculture must be built up, and if the cattle industry is not successful then the agricultural industry is not successful, and we may just as well brush to one side all these generalities which the Minister of Agriculture indulged in with regard to what ought to be done. One of the essentials is a better and cheaper arrangement for the transportation of live stock in this country, particularly beef and store cattle, on account of the different conditions to be found in different provinces. In some sections it is apparent that while they can raise young cattle they find some difficulty in finishing them on account of the lack of suitable accommodation as to shelter and feed. I do not believe the climatic conditions are so very difficult to overcome, but I do realize that with the costs of tronsportation for short hauls in the old provinces, which have been not only doubled but nearly trebled in the last twenty years, great difficulties are encountered. We have not as good a rate for shipment of live stock as is enjoyed by the shippers of many other commodities. This is a matter that ought to be pressed as forcibly as possible upon the Board of Railway Commissioners, in order that better rates may be given for the transportation of cattle than now obtain. The United States market is undoubtedly a good one. When we realize that despite their high tariff against our cattle, immense numbers are still being shipped across the line, we fully appreciate what we lost when they raised the tariff against importations from Canada. That, however, is their business and it is something that we cannot force them to give way on.

Nevertheless we are in a most favourable position by reason of the fact that in all this northern country, northern Ontario, northern Quebec, British Columbia, while the Americans to-day practically control the greatest proportion of our pulp lands and many of our water-powers, and they are taking our raw material in immense quantities across the line to manufacture them over there. It is our duty to look after our people and their interests and if we do that in a scientific way we can very quickly obtain these concessions from the United States instead of going begging to them, as the minister apparently has been doing and saying: Oh, if you will only remove the tariff off our cattle we will remove our tariff on yours, or something that it is immaterial to you whether we remove it or not. You will never obtain anything by methods of that kind.

This is one of the most important questions that can come before parliament. It is something that has been before parliament ever since we met this session. But instead of the government doing something along the line advocated by the hon. member for Macleod, there has been a constant knocking, knocking of agriculture from the beginning to the present by encouraging the importation of agricultural products from countries where they can be produced more cheaply than in Canada. The minister steps down now and says that the blame is on all those farmers who produce this inferior stock and tells them to produce better stock. Only two years ago he was predicting that the day would come when stores would be opened in the large cities of this country retailing the agricultural products of Australia and New Zealand. Since that time he has removed what little protection we had against importations which were then coming in from those countries. Only three or four weeks before the last general election an order in council was put through on the quiet, without publicity, and the same concessions which had been granted to Australia were extended to New Zealand. I placed a motion on the order paper asking for the correspondence which had taken place. Was there any correspondence on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture with the government of New Zealand in regard to why those concessions should be granted? There was not a scratch of the pen to show that any correspondence had taken place between the two governments or any members of the government. The government granted those concessions to New Zealand without obtaining anything in return from the sister dominion, although it maintains a high protective tariff against us.

Why was this done? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) stated this year: Oh, we were afraid they were going to raise the tariff on newsprint and paper; that is the reason why we granted the concessions to New Zealand and sacrificed the interest of agriculture. These concessions were not asked for by New Zealand, but the government granted them under pressure from somebody, not those engaged in agriculture, and I defy the Minister of Agriculture to show where, since he has been minister, he has shown that he has had the interests of agriculture at heart and that he has not given way to those engaged in some other occupation to gratify their desires.

[Mr. D. Sutherland.]

Oh, but he will say, we got the British embargo removed from Canadian cattle. It is true that the embargo was removed while this government was in office, but the hon. gentleman sitting in front of me, the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) was the man who started that matter and who secured from the British government a promise that the embargo would be removed. This was under pressure, because the British people believe in carrying out their promises, and they adopted this policy not on account of any disease amongst our cattle but as a means of protecting their farmers, because they have a protective policy just as much as any other country in the world. That was the reason why they put that embargo into effect and when they were charged with breach of faith with those to whom they had made the promise they realized that it was up to them to remove the embargo. The embargo, I will admit, was removed while the minister was in office, and he wants to carry off all the glory for having had it removed.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have always given my predecessors every credit.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The minister took good care to-night to claim all the credit he could for it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I did not hear him give his predecessors much credit for what was done along that line. I have a list of the imports of agricultural products and it is really startling to learn that a country with such immense agricultural possibilities as we have should be importing such large quantities of agricultural products. This goes to show the effect of a policy such as we have in this country where the government are not protecting the people but are allowing surplus products from other countries to come in at certain times when the cost of production is high so as to destroy the market absolutely. The result is that the farmers become discouraged and say: Well, if that is the kind of treatment we are to receive we will go out of business. People can go out of business more easily than they can stay in an unprofitable business, and that is the reason why they are going across the line just as fast to-day as they ever were.

I was born in this country; I have been engaged in agriculture all my life, and I have been hopeful that the great possibilities of agriculture in Canada would eventually be realized and that we would obtain the full advantage to which we are naturally entitled. But I must confess that as the days and the years pass I have reached the conclusion that if the present policy is to be continued and applied to agriculture, all I can say is: God help those who are engaged in agriculture in Canada.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Macleod exercises the privilege of replying he closes the debate. If any other hon. member desires to speak he should do so now.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to make only one or two remarks before closing the debate. The first is in regard to a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) that it is unfortunate that this motion did not come up earlier in the session. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, I would have been glad to have it come up much earlier in the session, but unfortunately the government took most of the private members' days since the beginning of the session and if my memory serves me aright we have so far only had four Mondays as private members' days. I hope that in later sessions of this parliament the government will not need to take private members' days; that they will find some method of improving the rules of the House so that we shall not have debates on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne lasting six weeeks and budget debates lasting five weeks. If this parliament is to function as a legislative body it is necessary that some change in the rules should be made. I do not want to get away from the question under discussion to debate the rules of the House, but during the last three months I have sat here very impatiently wondering if we would ever get down to business.

11 p.m.

I am going to accept the suggestion of the Minister of Agriculture, and if the House will permit I will ask the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Jelliff) to move an amendment asking that this matter be referred to the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization. Before I sit down I would like to say just one word in regard to the question raised by the Minister of Agriculture who cannot understand why the farmers of Canada do not produce more cattle for the British market. As I pointed out to him this afternoon in my remarks, the steer that the farmer does produce now for export brings him only 50 per cent of the purchasing power of 1913, and he was not making any inordinate profit then. That is the reason why we are asking for this committee to-day. I hope my good friend from Lethbridge will now move an amendment asking that this matter be referred to the standing committee on Agriculture.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I might point out to the hon. member that by unanimous consent it would not be necessary for the hon. member for Lethbridge to move an amendment. The motion could be carried, with the understanding that it be referred to the standing committee on Agriculture.

Mr. COOTE: With the unanimous consent of the House I will be very glad to make that motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

SAFEGUARDING OF INDUSTRIES

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City) moved:

That in the opinion of this House our industries here have to have safeguarding with respect to competition from other parts of the world, competition from the country to the south, competition from conditions as they are in Europe.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I shall shorten my remarks as much as possible on this very important subject and confine myself to the discussion of three main features: first, the relation of the members of this House to the resolution; second, the relation of Canada to other countries in regard to this resolution; third, the relation of this resolution to one of the great problems of this country. In addition I shall deal with two or three special features.

If I had been at a loss for a reason for introducing this resolution, I would have found a very good one in the speech by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan). The tenor of his speech was—if you could only gain an entrance into the markets of the country to the south, what a fine thing it would be for us. In a way it was a wail, the expression of a lost hope, of an anticipation that he did not see possible of realization. I would recall to his memory the words of his former leader, who some years ago laid down the policy of himself and his party that they would no longer "make pilgrimages to Washington." We are also reminded of the futility of such pilgrimages by the remarks expressed to-day in this House about looking to Washington for the solution of another question of great importance to this country. Pilgrimages to Washington have been failures in the past, and I would remind my hon.

friend from Huron that they will lead to failure in the future.

Members in all quarters of this House have talked of protection, calling it by such terms as encouragement of industry, safeguarding of industry, and so on. This resolution now desires the opinion of the House on the question of safeguarding Canadian industry from all forms of competition. The appointment of a tariff board does not eliminate the necessity for such a resolution. Its discussion will give everybody in this House an opportunity of expressing opinions such as they have voiced on many occasions in the past. The position set forth in the resolution is one taken and maintained by this party throughout all the years of its history since Sir John A. Macdonald introduced the National Policy. The resolution should also secure the support of many of our friends on the opposite side, if they could but give expression to their real feelings. They should have no hesitation in supporting the policy I have outlined because their leader has on more than one occasion expressed himself fully in accord with it. In fact when I have quoted several remarks by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) it will be found that this resolution is in language he has used on several occasions. At Erindale in September of last year the Mail and Empire reports him as follows:

> He stood for a tariff to give us what we need in the way of revenue and at the same time to safeguard industrial development.

At Fort William in October he made use of these words:

> We do not want to work injury to any industry. We want to help as far as possible all industries.

During the campaign he had occasion to come to Kingston and give a lengthy address in an attempt to win over the city. The position taken by the right hon. gentleman on that occasion, as reported by the British Whig, was as follows:

> We have decided to form a board to consider all tariff schedules, and to call for advice to the board representatives of manufacturing, of commerce, of agriculture, of labour, and also of the women so that the homes would be dealt with fairly. The government will take final action because the power of taxation cannot be given to a non-responsible body. The desire was to help every industry—

These are his own words:

> The desire was to help every industry, and the one aim was to establish them. His government was not in favour of free trade, it never was, never would be. There must be protection against competition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Those are his words?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Those are the words of the Prime Minister quoted from the party's own paper, the British Whig of Kingston. I have also a quotation from the same speech as reported by the London Advertiser. No one on the other side can offer any objection to a quotation from that paper. Its language is contained in the resolution, and is the language used by the right hon. Prime Minister in the city of Kingston that same evening. This is what he then said:

> We realize that our industries here have to have safeguarding with respect to competition from other parts of the world, competition from the country to the south, competition from conditions as they are in Europe.

So there is no member on the other side but can find good reason for supporting this resolution when it is couched in the words of their own leader. The Mail and Empire contained this report:

> The city of Kingston need have no fear from a Liberal administration as to the well-being of its industries. The industries would be taken care of.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Whose words were those?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The same speech made by the Prime Minister in Kingston. Taking their cue from the Prime Minister, all hon. members opposite should be in favour of this resolution.

The next point is the relation of this country to other countries in regard to this resolution. I am not going to dwell very long upon this, because it has been repeatedly mentioned in the House during other debates. There are one or two new features, however, to which I would like to draw the attention of the House. As has already been said, every country with any degree of prosperity has adopted some method of safeguarding industries, but our friends across the border have some new ideas in addition to the strong stand they have taken. At present they have a board of survey making an examination of the articles manufactured in Canada, to see if they can stimulate the manufacture of the same articles in the United States and so obviate the necessity of importing them from Canada. They have also certain treasury agents in France whose actions are being complained of by French manufacturers. These agents are investigating the cost of manufacturing goods, so that the goods will be brought into the United States at a proper valuation and not at some fictitious figure given by the manufacturer. These two features show the attitude of the United States in preventing interference with their industries.

I have a long article here dealing with the work of David Syme in Australia. I am not going to read it at this late hour, but I would like to draw attention to the conclusion of the article. David Syme founded the colony of Victoria under a policy of free trade. The gold mines had brought a large population to Victoria, but the mines failed, and the population of about one million were left in idleness and almost destitute. David Syme immediately initiated a policy of protection, and succeeded in having the raw products of Victoria manufactured in that country. It is very interesting to study the results; he found that a nation of specialists, whether of farmers or importers or manufacturers, did not supply the requisite and fundamentally necessary condition of permanency which can only be supplied by a society of varied enterprises and multifarious employments. So he inaugurated a policy by which the raw products of Victoria should be manufactured in the colony, rather than brought in from the outside.

Let us consider what was accomplished. Side by side with the colony of Victoria was founded the colony of New South Wales. That colony also had a policy of free trade and a policy of bonused immigration, which Victoria did not adopt. In comparing the two colonies, in 1922-23 the manufacturing industries of New South Wales numbered 6,072, while those of Victoria numbered 7,096. In 1919 New South Wales had employed 144,454 persons, while Victoria only employed 136,522 people. But in 1923, four years after this new policy was inaugurated, New South Wales had employed 152,266 while Victoria had reached the same number. But when it came to the density of population, notwithstanding the fact that New South Wales had brought thousands of immigrants into the country by means of bonuses, the density of population there was 7.14, while in Victoria it was 18.49. These figures will immediately prove that the policy of initiating and safeguarding industries has brought excellent results in Victoria.

Another point I wanted to bring to the attention of the House is that this resolution has a very intimate relation to one of the greatest problems facing us to-day, that of immigration. During the debates which have taken place in this House this session I think every person has come to the conclusion that we require population, and that population will solve all our difficulties. Increased population will lessen our taxes and relieve the railway situation, and I want to demonstrate how this resolution affects that great problem. This government, along with other governments, has been on the wrong track altogether in their attempts to make Canada prosperous. We are at present directing all our efforts in immigration to bringing into this country farmers and farm labourers. Never in the history of the world has a policy of this kind, the restriction of immigration efforts to the bringing in of agriculturists, produced any great increase in population. If I can prove that point I think I can bring every member of this House to look favourably upon this resolution. The only occasions when population rapidly increased were when some impetus was given to industrial development, and I believe that if we study the history of the world we will find that that has been the case in every country where such a rapid increase has come about.

It has been said that population is the wealth of a country; without population there can be no wealth. Colorado was a desert in 1858, but in 1890 the property of Colorado was valued at $239,000,000. So it was with the Cobalt district and so with the Yukon and many other places; without population there can be no wealth. On the other hand, as another illustration let me refer to the valley of the Amazon. Here is perhaps the richest country in the world, with great natural resources, but with a very sparse population. On the other hand, in the island of Barbados, you find great wealth and a large population. Population is the secret of wealth. The instances I have given prove that population is necessary for the production of wealth in any country. On the other hand, no state can support a lot of unproductive consumers. The prosperous state is that where there is population and the wealth, the country where you have population, and work for the people. There are a lot of countries where there is density of population but not wealth. Take China, for instance, and some parts of India. The secret is this: Population and work must go hand in hand.

While we all recognize that agriculture is our basic industry, it cannot give us that increase of population of which Canada stands very much in need at the present time. All increase of population has been due, as I said before, to an impetus in industrial development. Let me take a few countries for the sake of illustration. In the fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the population of England and Wales was almost stationary. There were forty-two towns with a population of 168,000 and thirty-eight counties with a population of 1,200,000, making with Durham, Chester and Wales a total population of about 2,250,000. London had a population of only 35,000; York, 11,000; Bristol 9,500. There were no other places with a population of over 5,000, but in 1690 a hearth tax that was taken showed that the population had doubled, just by natural and other causes. Now agriculture, which was the chief industry, had made no advance. Whatever growth there had been was due to the introduction of weavers and textile workers, and their industries, from the continent.

Now jump from that period of three or four centuries without any growth in population to the period from 1831 to 1896. The population of England and other countries showed a great increase in that period. The population of England increased from 24,000,000 in 1831 to 39,500,000 in 1896; Germany, from 29,000,000 to 52,000,000; Russia, from 58,000,000 to 105,000,000; the United States from 9,000,000 to 70,000,000, or an increase of 626 per cent. What were the reasons for that great growth?—and here we get the proof that development along agricultural lines alone will not give us the population we require. There were different causes for that rapid growth in population in all these countries during the period from 1831 to 1896? The tremendous jump in the Russian population was largely due to the granting of the freedom of the serfs. These serfs, who had been retained on the farms, when set free entered the towns. There was a real townward tendency at that time, and the population of the cities went up. With the better conditions of the serfs, the growth of population was very rapid.

But that did not account for the rapid increase in population in the other countries. In these other countries it was due to certain other factors, one of which was the introduction of steam. The use of steam led to a great growth in railways, steamships, trade and commerce, manufactures, and in the use of manufactured agricultural implements. There followed a great industrial development, and there was in consequence a rapid growth in population. At the end of that period we find that the number of towns with a population of 50,000 were as follows:

In 1831 there were 85 towns and cities in Europe with a population of 50,000; in the United States, 4; in the colonies, none. In 1891 there were 255 towns in Europe with a population of 50,000; 56 in the United States; 9 in the colonies. In this period of sixty years, the cities throughout practically the whole world showed an increase of population of 470 per cent, while the population outside the cities rose only 70 per cent; agriculture rose 110 per cent; and manufacturing 800 per cent.

My object in quoting these figures is to prove that the impetus given to industrial development is the only means for giving that increase of population which is desired in this country, and the rapid increase in population which I have mentioned in these various countries was due to the causes I have given —the discovery of steam principally, and other powers. In 1831 there were hand powers, 23,400; horse powers, 93,900; steam powers, 6,000. In 1896 those figures had increased to hand powers, 38,000; horse powers, 179,000; and steam powers, 222,000, showing a terrific growth in the development of horse and steam power, due to the discovery and the use of steam. Manufacturing was advancing in every way, and commerce was building up large coast cities.

Just a word in regard to France. The growth in France did not come up to the measure of England and the other countries for the reason—and this will strengthen my argument— that in those days France was obtaining her manufactured products from other countries. She was getting woollens from Spain, linens from Holland, and silks from Italy. But about the year 1800 France began to wake up to her situation at that time, and saw that she was being a hewer of wood and a drawer of water for other countries, and so she set about developing her manufactures, and the result was that her population increased rapidly. There are many figures that would prove it, but I think the figures I have already given will prove that the attitude we are taking as a country to-day in lending all our efforts to the development of the industry of agriculture alone, great as that industry is, will not give us the population we require unless we attend also to the development of our other industries. Watchfulness, wakefulness, a careful attitude towards industry—this is what has made the difference in all countries. Take Scotland and Ireland, which are equal in population. The former country is estimated to be 60 per cent richer on account of the greater development of industrial work. Spain without any industry is thinly populated; Italy is thickly populated, but both countries are poor. Belgium has the maximum density of population and Sweden has the smallest density of any country in the world, yet both these countries are rich. What is the secret? The secret is population and work. You have population in Italy without industrial development. In Spain you have want of work and want of population. In Sweden you have a minimum population but a very active industrial life and consequently a rich country. Belgium is thickly populated and there the industrial and the agricultural life is very active. The density of population is the maximum of the entire world and, what is more important, the emigration from that nation is the smallest of any country.

By our careless and indifferent attitude towards our industries we have been left in the position we are in to-day. Without going back for any extended period let us take the population Canada has lost in the years 1924 and 1925. In 1924 the loss of population was 148,000 and in 1925 it was 111,000. Not only have we lost this amount of population but we have lost a revenue of $18 per head which that population represented. We have actually thrown $4,680,000 into the coffers of the United States in addition to permitting an exodus of 260,000 people to take place to that country. And that exodus is still continuing. The statement that Canadians are now returning from the United States does not impress me. They are going from Canada at a faster rate than they are returning. The port of Kingston is passing out an average of 25 a week. The staff of the American consulate in Toronto has again been increased in order to cope with the exodus from Canada. Therefore we are not in a very prosperous condition. It is evident when thousands are still leaving the country that we have not adopted a policy that will give us population.

Now, what relation has population to this question? If we adopted an actual, active policy of safeguarding Canadian industries what would it mean in regard to the population of this country? I will explain the method I adopted in order to answer that question. We are importing into this country millions of dollars of manufactured goods. I have taken the figures representing those imports and I have gone to the industries in Canada which manufacture the same class of articles, and have inquired whether these goods could be produced in Canada. In every case, in connection with the figures which I am about to give, the answer returned has been "we can". Translate that importation of manufactured goods into labour in this country and see what it will mean to Canada in the way of population. Last year we imported in round numbers cotton goods to the value of $34,000,000. I went to Dominion Textiles and said to them: "You manufacture these goods. How many people could you employ in Canada every day in the year, all year round, if you manufactured these imported articles?" They answered. "Seven thousand." So that if these goods brought in last year were manufactured in Canada we would be able to give employment to 7,000 more people in this country.

Now, as to printed material. The importations last year amounted to $12,000,000. I went to some of our people who are engaged in printing and said to them: "If these purchases were made in Canada what would it mean in the way of labour?" Their answer was that it would give employment to 4,000 people. We imported engines to the value of $11,600,000. If these were manufactured in Canada they would give employment to 4,200 people. Of machinery there is $30,200,000 worth imported. If manufactured in Canada they would give employment to 10,000 people. Wearing apparel to the amount of $6,350,000 was imported. The manufacture in Canada would employ 3,000 people. Of cloth, yarn, blankets, rugs, and felts, we imported $35,000,000. The manufacture of these articles in Canada would give work to 18,500 people. We imported vehicles to the amount of $36,400,000. If made in Canada they would give employment to 8,000 people. We brought in leather goods to the value of $7,324,000. If they were made in this country, 2,500 people would be employed. The importation of farm implements represented $11,200,000. Their manufacture in this country would keep 3,000 people busy. Our importations of paper amounted to $9,100,000. If the manufacturing were carried on in this Dominion it would mean employment for 1,800 persons. Taking the foregoing ten branches of industry the manufacture of goods to the amount given would mean employment for 73,700 people in Canada, or taking four as the average number to a family, an addition to our population of approximatly 280,000 persons. We have spent $3,000,000 a year on immigration. If you safeguard our industries you can add 280,000 people to our population and save that expenditure of $3,000,000 yearly. Apply the same argument to other lines of industry such as electrical apparatus, gas apparatus, explosives, furniture, matches, fibre ware, mouldings, and amusement and sporting goods. If you put into operation a thorough and active policy with respect to them you will have no fear as to the future of this country and its growth of population.

There are one or two other points to which I wish to draw attention. We are actually lying down on the job of developing two of the greatest industries that any country could have, with almost illimitable possibilities. I refer to the working of our ores, and along with that the development of a chemical industry. We need to-day encouragement enough to produce still another Consolidated Smelters, to be located in eastern Canada. Study for a moment what that great industry means to British Columbia. By a policy of working our own ores a return has been brought to that province from two or three mines amounting in the case of silver to $3,105,000, in the case of lead to $20,066,630, in the case of copper, to $4,763,707, and in the case of zinc, to $36,012,600. The development of these ores from two or three mines only in that province has produced a wealth such as I have described. In fact, it takes your breath away when you think of what this country could do if the government would come to life, wake up to the immense possibilities of this country and put in operation a policy that would develop them. Along with that goes the development of the chemist. You cannot work on ores without connecting them up with the chemical industry, and no other industry in the world will store up as much wealth if it is properly protected and its development is placed in the hands of experts. We have everything in this country that would produce as valuable a chemical industry as that which flourishes in the United States or anywhere else.

In addition to these rich ores that we have —and I have only given the House an example of what two or three mines in British Columbia will do—a great development is going on now up in the Rouyn area, in the new field where zinc, copper and lead ores, which we have not touched in the east before, are being discovered. Hon. members will realize that if this government would only become alive to the interests of the country, or get off the job and let the Progressives take charge, they might develop one industry at least and increase the wealth of this country. But I am surprised that even the Progressives have not pointed out the fact that we have non-metallic products in this country. Some person came down from the west and tried to interest the government in Epsom salts. Perhaps they thought it would be a good thing to give them, but they are not even interested in that. Along with that salt you have the importation of household salt, with immense fields in this country, of phosphates and sulphate of soda. You have also the graphite industry. The pencils that are used in the House of Commons are United States pencils, made with United States graphite, whereas there is a very large supply of graphite in Canada. The field for graphite in this country, however, is lying idle for want of interest, and productive development is not taking place.

It has been pointed out that this government does not keep alive to the development of the country. I might draw attention to the fact that in the county of Frontenac there is the only field of feldspar on the American continent. Canada has now undertaken the grinding of that feldspar. There is a factory in the city of Kingston and one in Toronto, yet this government it sitting idly by and seeing the feldspar taken out of this country, sent over to the United States, ground in the factories there, and brought back to Canada as ground feldspar. With those two industries trying to compete in a situation such as that, it is deplorable that the government, with their experts in the Department of Mines, should take no action. Just imagine; we have a Department of Mines, which has repeatedly, by reports from experts, brought before the government the importance of the development of these ores and non-metallic substances, but no action is taken. The feldspar still goes out of the country. In 1924 we brought into Canada 1,661 tons of our ground feldspar while at the same time we had two mills of our own. In 1925 we brought back 1,712 tons of this ground feldspar.

I have coupled up with the subject of industry, perhaps, matters that have not been taken up before, because I tried to cover a new field, and to emphasize the fact that the safeguarding of our industries, agricultural and manufacturing, the development of our ores and of the chemical industry, would produce in this country a population such as we desire and such as we are not obtaining, in spite of the fact that we are spending $3,000,000 a year upon immigration.

In conclusion, I point out that the safeguarding of our industries will produce a settled permanent population. Just imagine the economic loss to this country and to the world at large when the policy introduced by this government closes up mills in Canada and sends the population of workmen away! What does it mean? It means that these people must get employment in some other country, and the unfortunate part of it is that if they do not go out of the country they must begin to fit themselves for some other employment and so interfere with those already engaged in that employment. It is an economic loss any way you look at it, owing to the carelessness and the indifference of the government in regard to the industrial development of the country, whether it be agriculture or otherwise. If industry is looked after, watchfully handled and taken care of in the manner adopted by other countries, it will give us a permanent population.

I have endeavoured to-night in dealing with this question to keep to the four points I set out to discuss; first the relation of the members of this House, including the Prime Minister, to the safeguarding of industries; second, the relation of Canada, in comparison with the other countries of the world, to the safeguarding of industry; third, the relation of this resolution to the great policy of population, which will be the panacea for all our troubles, and fourth, the special features to which I have referred. We have listened this afternoon and this evening to discussions on wheat in relation to cattle and during that discussion topics of all sorts have been brought up. But I am desirous to-night that we shall confine ourselves to this one thing, the safeguarding of industries, and I think I have proven to the House that if we would take care of the industries we have and endeavour to establish others along lines connected with our natural resources, we would in a short time save the expenditure of this $3,000,000 on immigration and have a stable, settled, happy and prosperous Canada.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can I not prevail upon the hon. member for Cartier, who I know is deeply interested in this question and who will not need to be reminded that these are the words of his leader, to avoid so early an adjournment to-night and to have a division on this motion?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Early at twelve o'clock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen opposite are always in a hurry to get home when there is a motion that means something.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This has been discussed practically all session.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What motion is carried?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That the debate be adjourned. I put the motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I protest against its being declared "carried." I rose to ask if the hon. member would not withdraw his motion. None of us on this side of the House heard the motion put.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Jacobs) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Speaker, I usually pair with the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Boys). I voted because I considered the resolution was not a government measure. However, in order to rectify any misunderstanding, seeing that most of the members on our side observed their pairs, I allowed the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Edwards) to vote, although he was paired with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler).

Mr. MANION: I was paired with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. GEARY: I was paired with the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. WRIGHT: I was paired with the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. POWER: I was paired with the member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. LAPIERRE: I was paired with the member for East Essex (Mr. Morand). Had I voted I would have voted in favour of the motion.

Mr. KAY: I was paired with the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. ROBB: I was paired with the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). Had I voted I would surely have voted for the motion. It is time to go home.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I was paired with the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Culligan). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Bell). Had I voted I would have voted in favour of the motion.

Mr. CANNON: I was paired with the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). Had I voted I would have voted in favour of the motion.

Mr. DUSSAULT: I was paired with the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotman). Had I voted I would have voted in favour of the motion.

Mr. ROBITAILLE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for London (Mr. White). Had I voted I would have voted in favour of the motion.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I was paired with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. HATFIELD: I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

(There being no official list, all the pairs announced are not recorded.)

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I was not paired with anyone. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, before the adjournment I was going to ask, in view of the anxiety of the government to shunt this motion, will the leader of the government undertake that we get an opportunity to continue and have a division on this question before the end of this session?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, as far as I can remember we have already had four debates on protection—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let us have a division.

Mr. LAPOINTE: —and I may say to my right hon. friend that I have no doubt he will have another opportunity before the session closes to talk about the safeguarding of industry by way of protection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will undertake, so far as this side of the House is concerned, that there will be no speeches if the minister will see that we get an opportunity to divide the House on the question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That will be a new method for my right hon. friend, and it would be a pity not to give it to him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will you accept the suggestion? What will be to-morrow's business?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The first item will be the third reading of the bill to amend The Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act; then rural credits, item 38; Bill No. 149 to amend the Railway Act, item 39; Bill No. 150 respecting the Chicoutimi Harbour Commissioners, item 40; Bill No. 91 to amend the Immigration Act, item 31; then the West Indies trade treaty, item 34; and possibly the budget legislation. If there is some other work to do we will go into supply on Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Better divide on this resolution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We may, yes.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. Tuesday.

Tuesday, June 1, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

PEACE RIVER ELECTION

REPORT OF THE CLERK OF PETITIONS

On motions being called, the following report was presented:

The Clerk of Petitions has the honour to report that he has examined the following petition, viz.:

Of James Arthur Collins of Chisholm, province of Alberta, lumberman; praying that the House of Commons will investigate the conduct of the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada, the returning officer for the electoral district of Peace River, the deputy returning officer, and such other officer or officers as may be necessary, in connection with the establishing of a polling place at Brule Mines, poll No. 4 aforesaid and the taking of, the counting and recounting the votes cast at such poll in the said district of Peace River, and that such Chief Electoral Officer, returning officer, deputy returning officer or other officer or officers be directed to take such action as may be requisite and necessary to secure the return to the House of Commons of the candidate who secured the greatest number of votes in the said electoral district of Peace River on the 29th of October, 1925, and finds that:

The prayer of this petition consists of two parts viz,—(1) That the House investigate the conduct of certain officials in connection with the election of a member to represent the constituency of Peace River in the House of Commons of Canada, held on the 29th October, 1925.

(2) That the House direct the proper officers to take such action as may be necessary and requisite to secure the return to the House of Commons of the candidate who secured the greatest number of votes cast by the electors of the said electoral district of Peace River on the 29th October, aforesaid.

The form of this petition and its contents so far as the first part of the prayer is concerned are within the requirements of the 75th rule, and refer only to such matters as are within the right and competency of the House to deal with, should the House desire to do so; should, however, the course suggested in the second part of the prayer be taken by the House it would apparently have the effect of authorizing other persons to exercise a power which the House has already delegated by statute to the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts.

Apparently the first part of the prayer of this petition is only of a preliminary nature leading up to the main request as contained in the second part, consequently the prayer, considered as a whole, brings this petition within the ruling of Mr. Speaker Lemieux given on the 6th May last, in a somewhat similar case, which ruling was subsequently sustained by the House on appeal, viz, that a petition which prays for any action to be taken by the House that might involve in any respect an intereference with the provisions of the Controverted Elections Act, chapter 7, R.S.C., 1906, cannot be received.

Under these circumstances I have therefore the honour to report that this petition should not be received.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 154 to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The object of this bill is simply to bring in line the provisions of the regulations which existed before the introduction of the bill in 1924. There was considerable doubt as to whether the act of 1924 had provided that all the agreements under the regulations with individuals who had staked claims should be carried out, and this is for the purpose of clarifying that matter. So far as the provisions of the bill are concerned, it is made retroactive to the date mentioned in the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADJOURNMENT—KING'S BIRTHDAY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, in accordance with the notice given:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday, the 2nd of June, 1926, it stand adjourned until Friday, the 4th of June, 1926.

Motion agreed to.

MEETING OF HOUSE AT TWO O'CLOCK —EARLY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to move, in accordance with the notice given:

That on and after Monday, the 7th of June, 1926, until the end of the present session, the House shall meet at two o'clock in the afternoon of each sitting day.

Motion agreed to.

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, the 2nd of June, 1926, and subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session, the sittings of the House shall in every respect be under the same rules as provided for other days.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I desire to protest against this motion. I know of no other body of men in this country who have to work both night and day. We have been here for nearly five months; we have spent six weeks in I think useless debate on the Address, about five weeks more on the budget debate, to which only a few members listened and those who did listen did so simply that the House might have a quorum. Now at this late hour in the session, when we are doing business, we have just accepted a motion from the Prime Minister to sit an extra hour each day—I heartily approve of that—but I certainly think a protest should be made against this resolution to take the one night which we have in the week. I believe this House could do its business far better if we did without night sittings altogether. I see no reason why a body of sensible and reasonable men could not devise rules under which we would not need to sit both night and day.

I have read lately with much interest a speech which was delivered in this House in the year 1907. I would like to present to the House, and I will guarantee not to take more than a few minutes, a few of the statements made on that occasion by Mr. Wright, the then member for South Renfrew, because they deal with this particular question and they seem to me to be very pertinent.

Mr. Wright on that occasion called attention to the long hours that had to be put in and the arduous work that a private member had to do if he took his duties seriously, as I think every member of parliament should. I know personally of one member of this House, who was at work yesterday morning at twenty minutes to nine. That member was still here last night at midnight, and was then asked to vote on a motion to adjourn the debate. Any member who voted against that motion was liable to the censure of a large number of the members of this House. That member had to be here again this morning to attend to his correspondence, then he had to attend a certain committee at 10.30, stay there until one o'clock, then rush out and get his lunch, and get back to this chamber at three o'clock this afternoon, and possibly he will be required to stay here until midnight again to-night. I ask the House and the government if that is a sensible way to carry on the business of this country. If these remarks apply to the private member, they apply with even greater force to the Prime Minister and to the members of the government. What chance have these men to get a decent night's sleep under such conditions? What chance has the leader of the opposition? The leader of the opposition, as we all know, to our regret, has been confined to his home through illness recently, and I have no doubt that it was largely brought on by the arduous duties he is called upon to perform and the long hours he is compelled to spend in this House.

I would also draw the attention of members of the House to the fact that we have here in this chamber a large number of pages, most of whom I understand are orphans, or boys without fathers. They come here because it is necessary for them to earn a living. In most of the provinces in Canada we have an act to prevent children being employed after certain hours at night in factories, but in this "factory of words and phrases," as Mr. Wright describes it, these poor boys are compelled sometimes to stay all night—on Wednesday night as well as other nights if this motion carries.

I have no hope, Mr. Speaker, of preventing this resolution carrying and of preventing this House from being compelled to sit on Wednesday night, but I think a protest should be made on every possible occasion against the procedure which compels members to stay here both night and day.

What I propose is this: Let us meet, say, at one o'clock in the afternoon and sit till six. If we did that, with proper rules, we should get through the business of this House in four months. As Mr. Wright pointed out in his speech in 1907, almost every parliament in the world, with the exception of those of Great Britain and Canada, carries on its business without night sessions at all. I think it is high time that private members on all sides of this House should exercise a little bit of their power and demand of all parties in the House that some reform of the rules shall be made so that we shall not be compelled to sit here four, and now five, nights in the week to most unearthly hours. Mr. Wright said on that occasion that we were citizens of a Christian country and were supposed to do our work in daylight and sleep at night. I think I cannot do better than simply impress that idea upon the House before I sit down. I think that all parties are equally guilty of allowing the business of this House to drift until we get into this position, where it seems necesary to sit every night in the week, and before the end of the session, no doubt, we shall sometimes have to sit all night.

An hon. MEMBER: Move an amendment.

Mr. COOTE: I do not think I should move an amendment. The leader of the opposition said a week ago that he was quite willing to sit on Wednesday night, and I think possibly the House wishes to sit on Wednesday night so as to get through, but I do want to emphasize this: If we had adopted suitable amendments to the rules early this session, or at the last session, we would not now be required to sit five nights a week.

Motion agreed to.

PEACE RIVER ELECTION

REPORT OF THE CLERK OF PETITIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to your attention the report read, on Motions, by the clerk, which is said to come from the Clerk or the Examiner of Petitions, in which I submit the examiner has taken very much upon himself—more than has been assigned to him by this House—and has sought not only to perform his own duties, but those of Your Honour and of the House as well. How he came to do this, I am at a loss to understand, but I submit that it is not for the Examiner of Petitions to report on anything save the form of a petition. If the examiner has the right to go into the substance and purpose, and to say to parliament whether or not it shall receive a petition, we have come to a very fine pass in responsible and democratic government. I submit to you that the form alone comes within his disposition; that if it is within his functions to dictate to this House now that we must not even receive the petition of Collins, then it must have been his opinion on the first presentation of the petition that we should not receive it and apparently his opinion at that time differed from that of Your Honour. However, I am not concerned with what his opinion is. It is for this House to decide whether the petition should be received or not, at the instance of His Honour the Speaker of this House; it is not for any examiner or clerk of petitions or any other subordinate of parliament. I therefore will ask you now, or if this occasion is not fitting, on a suitable occasion, to rule that this report from the examiner is entirely beyond his power and to instruct him to report within his powers and duties.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that this discussion by my right hon. friend to-day is not in order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When would it be in order?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps to-morrow, but not to-day. Rule 75 says that after a petition has been presented and is referred to the examiner:

> On the next day following the presentation of a petition the Clerk of the House shall lay upon the table the report of the Clerk of Petitions upon the petitions presented and such report shall be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of that day. Every petition so reported upon, not containing matter in breach of the privileges of this House and which, according to the rules or practice of this House, can be received, shall then be deemed to be permitted to be read and received.

Obviously the members of the House cannot to-day know what the report of the examiner is without reading that report from the Votes and Proceedings, although we have heard a little of what the Clerk Assistant has read.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I suggest that this matter should at least stand?

Mr. MEIGHEN: All I have to say in reply is that I was able myself to understand the English of the clerk as he read the report, and I would hesitate to ascribe to other hon. members less intelligence than I possess. The rule simply says that the report shall go in the Votes and Proceedings; that goes without saying. But on the reading of a report, if in that report there is an excess of jurisdiction by an officer of the House surely that is the time for the Speaker to rule that the report shall be referred back to him and that he be told to do in respect to that report nothing but his duty.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I wish also to call your attention to rule 75, paragraph 9, which says that no debate shall be permitted on the report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not debating the report.

Mr. CANNON: What are we debating?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am debating the point of order.

Mr. CANNON: It is not debatable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Points of order are debatable. My hon. friend the Solicitor General is just a little weak on the application of the rule. It is merely a point of order that I bring to your attention. Mr. Speaker, I put myself in your judgment, Sir, as to whether or not the time is appropriate and say again, as I said in the first place, that if this is not the appropriate time the matter shall be brought up the first time it is.

Mr. SPEAKER: As regards the action of the Examiner of Petitions I may say this to the right hon. leader of the opposition: I do not know what to infer from the statement he made that he does not know how the Examiner of Petitions came to make this report. I have just read the report, but may I say I have not inspired it and I would not think of inspiring a report from one of the officers of the House. In the next place I think—as was stated by the Minister of Justice—that the question might come up when that report is published in the Votes and Proceedings. Very clearly, according to rule 75, that is the proper procedure.

As regards the subject matter of the petition, if it is the desire of the House that I should give a ruling, I am willing to give it now. Nobody can doubt for one moment as to what that ruling would be. I have read the prayer of the petitioner. It is with a slight difference the same prayer as was contained in the petition presented on May 4. Being the same prayer—that is to say the petitioner claiming the seat for himself through action other than the action of the courts of the land—the prayer and the petition are absolutely irregular and cannot be entertained. I base my ruling on Bourinot, pages 133, 134 and 135. May I be allowed to read that citation again: Perhaps I may read the prayer of the petition now. The prayer of the petition presented on May 27 reads as follows:

> Wherefore your petitioner prays that the House of Commons of Canada will investigate the conduct of the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada, the returning officer for the electoral district of Peace River, Edward Henry Sheppard, aforesaid, the deputy returning officer, Peter A. Robb, aforesaid, and such other officer or officers as may be necessary in connection with the establishment of a polling place at Brule Mines poll No. 4 aforesaid and the taking of, the counting and recounting the votes cast at such poll in the electoral district of Peace River aforesaid, and that such Chief Electoral Officer, returning officer, deputy returning officer or other officer or officers be directed to take such action as may be requisite and necessary to secure the return to the House of Commons of the candidate who secured the greatest number of votes cast by the electors of the electoral district of Peace River on the 29th of October, 1925, aforesaid, and for such other and further relief as may seem meet in the premises.
> And your petitioner as in duty bound will ever pray.
> JAMES ARTHUR COLLINS.

Mr. Collins, the petitioner, therefore claims the seat by this prayer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, with all deference, I do think this matter is of such great consequence that it should not be disposed of, especially by ruling, without argument. We propose to show, and I think we can convince you, that the petition is not the same petition at all—that it differs in the very respect in which Your Honour said it should differ in order to be received; and secondly, and more important—vastly more important than all—that if this petition is not received the courts are utterly incompetent—have been declared by this House to be incompetent—to treat the subject matter of the petition. Not only can it not be referred to the courts, but the courts are disarmed and disempowered from trying it. The courts cannot hear the appeal of this man who was elected but whose seat is now being usurped by another party.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was proceeding to rule because I inferred from the remarks of the right hon. gentleman a moment ago that he expected a ruling from the Chair.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I only expect a ruling on the competency of the clerk to make such a report as this to the House. That was the only thing I called in question.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a very technical question. First, the Examiner of Petitions reports on the petition, then his report is tabled and it should be published in the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well.

Mr. SPEAKER: When it appears in the Votes and Proceedings then my attention should be called to it. If it is not the desire of the House to have my ruling on the petition I shall wait until another opportunity.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION—

STATUS OF GRAIN COMMISSION STAFF

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and in this case I presume it is a matter for the consideration of both ministers, a letter which has been received by a number of members of the House, including the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers), the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Davis), the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), the hon. member for Port Arthur-Thunder Bay (Mr. Langworthy), and myself, from the Secretary of the Dominion Weighing Department Association, or some of the employees of the Board of Grain Commissioners at Fort William. I will read three paragraphs from it which will present the case to the minister, as I think it is important enough to deserve consideration. The member for Vancouver Centre laid a similar case before the minister a short time ago. The letter says:

> It would appear that all employees under the Board of Grain Commissioners who have been accepted, and are now contributing under the Superannuation Act, would not receive any benefit in case they were retired from the service, or quit the service for any reason, neither would their dependents receive any benefit in case of the death of the contributor.

Further down he says:

> We do not understand why the employees under the Board of Grain Commissioners should be barred from the act, and we think it very unsatisfactory, that the government should continue to deduct contributions from the monthly cheques of those employees who were accepted before the ruling by the Department of Justice came into effect, when, as it would appear, they will receive no benefit.

Then the closing paragraph of the letter reads:

We would ask you to endeavour, either to have all employees under the Board of Grain Commissioners made acceptable under the act, or a rebate made to those employees who have been contributing unless these employees will benefit under the act as understood by them at the time of making application to be elected under the act.

I draw this matter to the attention of the minister with the hope that he will look into it, because on the surface it certainly appears to be a case worthy of investigation, and I think it should be treated with greater care than it is being treated at the moment.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I will have the matter looked into at once. My recollection is that the matter is already under way. I recall having had something of that nature before me last week, and my hon. friend from Fort William may be interested to know that recently I approved of some increases of wages to certain people, as recommended by the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. MANION: I am very glad to hear it.

APPOINTMENT OF E. J. SEXSMITH

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Exercising my privilege as a member of this House, I asked a question of the Minister of the Interior in regard to the appointment of one E. J. Sexsmith. The question reads:

Was E. J. Sexsmith appointed on his merits after competitive examination?

If not, on whose recommendation was he appointed?

The reply given does not answer those two questions. Will the minister supplement the answer to be placed on Hansard by telling me whether or not E. J. Sexsmith was appointed on his merits after competitive examination, and if the answer to that is no, then on whose recommendation was he appointed?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Did my hon. friend say that his questions on the order paper are not answered?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): They are not answered.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will look it up and furnish the answer to-morrow.

POSTMISTRESS AT KEY JUNCTION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): I wish to ask the minister representing the Postmaster General regarding a return ordered some months ago, I think with reference to the office of postmistress at Key Junction, which is now long overdue.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am sorry that my hon. friend has not received the papers yet. I will see that he gets them.

DIVISION LIST AND PAIRS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I desire to call attention to an error in Hansard in the recording of the vote taken last night. I voted in favour of the adjournment of the debate but my vote is not recorded.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then we will have one more.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How do you know—it does not appear in Hansard.

Mr. E. W. TOBIN (Richmond-Wolfe): I was paired with the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence), and the pair is not mentioned in Hansard. Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to this question I will read to the House the following letter which I received from the Editor of Debates:

June 1, 1926.

The Honourable The Speaker,
House of Commons.

Sir—I respectfully direct your attention to page 3916 of Hansard, recording the declaration of pairs following the division on the motion of Mr. Jacobs for the adjournment of the debate on the motion of Mr. Ross (Kingston City). You will observe that a note is inserted stating that the list of declarations is incomplete. The explanation is that no official pair list was available and the declarations came in such rapid succession—in some cases practically simultaneously—and from so many different quarters of the House, that it was not possible for the reporter on the floor to immediately identify all members rising. The adjournment of the House following, there was no opportunity to check up the list and it was therefore deemed proper to omit names as to which there was doubt, on the assumption that the member whose name did not appear would avail himself of a later opportunity to have his declaration properly recorded.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,

GEORGE SIMPSON,
Editor of Debates.

Mr. DUFF (Deputy Speaker): Mr. Speaker, if I am allowed I would take this opportunity of directing your attention and that of hon. members of the House to the circumstances under which the vote was recorded last night. While the division was proceeding conversation was general in the chamber, and there was an absence of the decorum which should be observed on such an occasion, with the result that those responsible for the record of proceedings found difficulty in performing their tasks. We all realize how assiduous the Clerk, the Clerk Assistant and the official reporters are in carrying out their arduous duties, and I am sure we will admit that they are deserving of the consideration of the House. In view of what occurred last night, I would suggest that in future when a vote is being taken hon. members refrain from conversation and from other manifestations which do not contribute to orderly procedure in the House.

NATURAL RESOURCES

BILL AUTHORIZING TRANSFER TO ALBERTA

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated yesterday, in answer to a question by the right hon. leader of the opposition, that I would make a statement to-day concerning legislation with regard to the natural resources of Alberta, and I will now do so:

By the agreement entered into on the 9th day of January, 1926, between the government of the Dominion and the government of Alberta, all crown lands within the province are to be transferred to the province, subject to any trust existing in respect thereof.

In 1872, after the acquisition by the Dominion government of the Northwest Territories, the first statute concerning Dominion public lands was enacted. It is chapter 23 of 35 Victoria. Section 22 of this act created an education endowment, sections 11 and 29 in every surveyed township to be set apart for purposes of education, in the territory.

In 1879, statute 42 Victoria, chapter 31, placed under the Minister of the Interior the administration of the school lands and the school fund derived from the sale of such lands, the interest thereon to be paid annually to the government of the province or territory within which such lands are situated, for school purposes. Those statutes have been consolidated from time to time, namely: in 1908, 1914, 1916, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1923, 1924. The administration of those school lands and the school fund by the Dominion government has always been considered as a trust and, to use the language of Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1883, page 874 of the Debates: "The Dominion government is merely the trustee for these lands and cannot divert them in any way whatever from the purpose of school endowment".

It thus appeared to the government that it was advisable to make it clear that the transfer of the school lands and the school lands fund should be made subject to that trust, and that they should continue to be administered by the province in accordance with the existing laws under the constitution of Alberta.

I am responsible for the drafting of the clause which is in the resolution on the order paper, the object of which was to continue the existing order of things.

Colonel Biggar, who is counsel for the government of Canada, and who had been entrusted with the legal work concerning the agreement with Alberta, went to Edmonton to submit this new clause, and said clause was accepted by the government of Alberta and by the law officers of the province.

The clause, as drafted, was inserted in the bill introduced by the Alberta government in the legislature of that province on February 24, and the bill received its second reading, on March 5 passed through the committee stage, and stood for third reading.

Simultaneously, the clause was inserted in the legislation introduced by the Dominion government and is part of the resolution on the order paper concerning said legislation.

Two other amendments concerning the parks, forest reserves and the rights and properties of the Hudson's Bay Company were also suggested by us, accepted by Alberta, and inserted in the concurrent legislation at the same time.

On April 7th the Premier of Alberta sent a telegram that owing to an editorial in a certain newspaper he would probably have to recommit the bill and amend it.

The criticism of the newspaper in question was to the effect that the clause as drafted would result in the Imperial parliament giving ratification to the school clause of the Alberta Act of 1905, which according to the writer of the editorial, was unconstitutional.

Our answer was that any attempt to change the clause under such circumstances, would be resented, and could not be accepted.

The telegram of Mr. Brownlee, on April 7, was the first intimation to me that there could be any doubt as to the validity or the constitutionality of section 17 of the Alberta Act. The clause which I suggested never was drafted for the purpose of giving to section 17 the ratification which an imperial act would involve. Indeed it is my opinion—as it was the opinion of those who placed that section in the constitution of Alberta—that the act of 1905 has the effect of an imperial enactment for all purposes and that its validity is beyond question.

Section 17 of the Alberta Act is the result of a compromise and was placed in the constitution to prevent litigation and for the purpose of continuing in Alberta the system existing in 1905. This compromise was accepted to settle and put an end to a difficult problem.

On May 25, a telegram was received by the Prime Minister from Premier Brownlee, informing him that the provincial legislature had passed the Natural Resources Bill with an amendment to clause 2 (a), substituting for the last words of said clause the following:

For the support of schools organized and carried on therein in accordance with the law of the province.

The amendment made by the legislature of Alberta without our consent suggests that the laws of the province might differ from or be in conflict with section 17 of the Constitutional Act of Alberta. Otherwise the amendment would be useless and futile. Furthermore, the record, as well as the statements made, show that the change is made owing to the expression of a doubt in some quarters as to the validity of the Alberta Act. This is unacceptable to us.

The Alberta Act has stood as the constitution of the province for twenty-one years. It has come directly and indirectly before all the courts of the land without its constitutionality being challenged or doubted, except in one instance before the courts of Alberta, where its validity was upheld. We cannot directly or indirectly, even in a tacit manner, acknowledge that its validity might be subject to question.

However the Prime Minister has stated to Mr. Brownlee that if the government of Alberta is willing to question the validity of the act, we will gladly facilitate and expedite proceedings, so that a reference to the courts may take place immediately.

In justice to Mr. Brownlee, I must say that he does not personally question the validity of the Alberta Act. His suggestion seems rather to be that as there are some people who have doubts about it, we should refrain from any reference to it in our legislation.

Our present position in the matter is fairly expressed in a telegram sent to the Premier of Alberta on May 27 by the Prime Minister. This telegram, after reciting the history of the negotiations, continues as follows:

As pointed out in interview at Ottawa, in view of implied doubts as to the validity of Constitution Act any amendment to the Natural Resources Bill as originally agreed upon if introduced at this stage of the proceedings and having reference directly or indirectly to school lands would be certain to raise controversy over school question. In these circumstances we do not feel that we would be justified in submitting to our parliament the amendment made by the Alberta legislature on Saturday last, and quoted in your wire. This amendment as adopted by your house if it has any meaning suggests that the laws of the province might differ from or be in conflict with the Alberta Act. Surely the laws of the province must be within the four corners of the constitution which is the source of her legislative powers. Clearly the whole matter hinges on the validity of Alberta Act which you stated some people were questioning. We agree with you that every available means should be taken to avoid a possible controversy on the school question. We believe further that question should be cleared away and settled for all time. We have offered to facilitate proceedings for a reference to the courts of the Alberta Act. We reiterate this offer and in order to prevent delay, as well as to avoid any question being raised as to party who should be expected to initiate proceedings our government will take immediate steps for a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. We will submit the act and support and uphold its validity, and give an opportunity to those who question it to present their views. When question definitely settled, all difficulties as to the drafting of proposed legislation will disappear and negotiations with respect to transfer of resources may then be resumed in a manner which will remove altogether the possibility of the introduction of any school question.

This was signed by the Prime Minister. I may say that the Department of Justice has in hand the proceedings necessary for the submission of this question to the Supreme Court of Canada. I believe this solution is fair to all parties, and I earnestly hope that this delicate question will in this way be settled definitely and removed forever from the field of controversy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister place on the table the correspondence between this government and the government of Alberta?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will see that this correspondence is tabled to-morrow.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): Why was this question not included in the agreement which was signed on the 9th of January?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps for the same reason as the two other clauses with regard to the Hudson's Bay Company and the parks or forest reserves have not been included. Those things always happen in important questions of this kind. We thought it should be made clear that the trust with regard to school lands would be made part of the arrangement.

Mr. LUCAS: I would like to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless by unanimous consent I cannot allow a debate to proceed on this question. This is a statement made by the minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: Am I to understand that the House is willing to hear the hon. member?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. LUCAS: I would like to point out that there is no agitation in Alberta for any change in the school laws as we have enjoyed them for the last twenty years. If this question is raised the responsibility will certainly be upon this government.

CENSUS—NATIONALITY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): Is it the intention of the government to instruct the enumerators having charge of the census being or about to be taken to accept the term "Canadian" as a sufficient and proper description of those Canadian citizens who were born in this country?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): As I understand the matter, the questions that are generally asked in the ten-year census are not asked in the present census, that is the census that is taken every five years; but the matter is under consideration for the next decennial census. This census is merely to determine the population of the prairie provinces for the purpose of the subsidy which is paid under the act.

APPOINTMENT OF POST OFFICE INSPECTOR—MARITIME PROVINCES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) asked a question yesterday with reference to the appointment of a post office inspector in the Maritime provinces. On behalf of the Postmaster General I desire to make this statement:

There are two postal districts in the Maritime provinces—one with headquarters at St. John and one at Halifax, also a post office inspector stationed at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island.

To provide for inspection work in those portions of the province of New Brunswick with French speaking population, it was found necessary to have a bilingual inspector. It was considered that the bilingual inspector should be able to do all the bilingual work in the three Maritime provinces. He is, therefore, being stationed at Moncton in order to be more readily available for the three provinces although he is attached to the staff of the St. John postal district.

LONG TERM FARM LOANS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 148, for the purpose of establishing in Canada a system of Long Term Mortgage Credit for Farmers.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Short title agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Paragraph (d) defines a farmer to be any person whose business is 'solely" that of farming and who owns and occupies a farm, or who proposes to acquire a farm for immediate occupation and cultivation. A similar definition in the Bankruptcy Act was interpreted by Mr. Justice Tweedy in such a way as to exclude persons engaged in custom threshing. Mr. Justice Tweedy held that the word "solely" restricted the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act to those who were engaged strictly in farming, and he gave it as his opinion that men engaged in threshing along with farming were precluded from that act. If the word "solely" is retained in this bill the same difficulty will arise here, and the bill will be interpreted as excluding those farmers who also do custom threshing.

4 p.m.

Mr. ROBB: This qualifying word is intended to make it clear that anyone living in the village and occupied industrially is not to be considered a farmer within the meaning of the act merely because he happens to do some farming. It is not the intention to preclude any farmer from exercising his ordinary duties as a citizen. For instance, a member of parliament whose business, apart from his parliamentary duties, is farming is not excluded. The word has been inserted for the protection of the farmers themselves.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would not raise the point were it not for the interpretation which Mr. Justice Tweedy placed on a similar definition in the Bankruptcy Act, whereby he excluded from the benefits of that legislation such farmers as I have described. I have no desire to widen the scope of the bill to embrace business men in towns, living away from their farms, and I may point out to the minister that such persons come under another section. I would move—

Mr. ROBB: I will move the amendment later.

Mr. SHORT: The word "farmer" here means only the farmer of the soil. Why not make provision for the farmer of the sea, the fisherman? Why should he not be entitled to the provisions of this act?

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend can explain to me how I can get a mortgage on the fish in the sea I will consider his suggestion.

Mr. SHORT: You can get a mortgage on the fisherman's equipment as well as on the farmer's.

Mr. HANSON: I support the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Short). The fishermen at least on the Atlantic coast, engage in an occupation which at times is quite precarious, and they are entitled to some encouragement at the hands of this parliament while we are considering the needs of the farmers of the west. I seriously suggest that if the minister has not already done so he should include fishermen in the benefits of the act. There is no difficulty about security. The equipment of the fishermen is as saleable in their districts as is the security of the farmer in Alberta, especially in the drought season. If anything, the advantage in this respect is with the fisherman. If there is to be any easy money for a particular class, then let us have no discrimination in favour of the western farmer. I am willing that he should receive fair treatment, but I do not want to see him get any special privileges. And that is all this legislation amounts to. I am not by any means opposed to rural credits, but if the government desire to put easy and cheap money in the way of the farmers of the west, I demand at least equal treatment on behalf of the fishermen of the Maritime provinces.

Mr. SPENCER: This is the first time the suggestion has been made that this legislation is for the benefit of the west alone; I thought it was intended to benefit all Canada.

Mr. HANSON: Everyone knows that for the past five years hon. members to my left have been demanding legislation of this character for the particular benefit of their own constituents. There has never been a demand from the farmers of the Maritime provinces for legislation of this kind.

Mr. BROWN: Then they are not properly represented.

Mr. HANSON: They were not properly represented in the last parliament but they are well represented in this House. Speaking for the Maritime provinces, our farmers do not and will not demand this kind of help if you will give us a proper fiscal policy.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like the minister to explain the definitions under clause 2, because I am very doubtful whether parliament has power to pass this bill. Why should there be rural credits and not city credits; why single out the farmers for long term loans? Why should this particular class be favoured as against all others? Agriculture to-day is the most highly protected industry in the world, and this is class legislation of the worst kind; one class is favoured because they have an influence in this House which other classes do not have.

Mr. COOTE: I rise to a point of order. I contend that the hon. gentleman is not speaking to the section of this bill under discussion.

Mr. CHURCH: In the first place, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. COOTE: I ask for a ruling on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHURCH: I say this is class legislation of the worst kind.

Mr. ROBB: I rise more particularly to move the amendment which I have just handed you, Mr. Chairman, that the word "solely" be deleted. The discussion we have had so far only emphasizes the difficulties of legislating for a large country of varied interests such as Canada. This is the first time it has been brought to my attention that the fishermen require legislation of this kind. This government has not been unmindful of the fishermen; in the budget of 1924 we made considerable concessions to those engaged in this industry, making it easier for them to get their equipment and so earn a living.

Mr. SHORT: May I ask a question?

Mr. ROBB: When I get through I will answer my hon. friend. This measure is designed to help not only the farmers of the prairie provinces but those of the entire Dominion. The necessity for such a measure to provide cheaper money for the man on the farm has been demonstrated to us time after time. The man on the land produces traffic for the railways and his success determines the general prosperity of the country. This government has even been accused of being a bit tardy in introducing this legislation. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) had a similar resolution on the order paper the day parliament opened, and I give him credit for being in favour of this move. Most of the provinces have systems of rural credits of one kind or another; they have already recognized the necessity for such a measure as we are bringing in now. The hon. members for Ontario may object to this, because in Ontario they have a very excellent system of rural credits which, I am told, is on a good paying basis.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why duplicate it?

Mr. ROBB: We are not duplicating it; it is not necessary for Ontario to come under this scheme if they do not want to, but because Ontario is well provided for is no reason why the other provinces should not be helped. It is not obligatory upon any province to come under this scheme if they do not wish to. Now coming back to the fishermen, I will be very pleased to listen to my hon. friends who represent these people if they can establish the necessity for a system of credits other than those now provided by the rural credit systems of the provinces. We will consider that question at another session, but this act has to do with long term mortgage credits for farmers. I move the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Robb moves that subsection (d) of section 2 be amended by deleting the word "solely" in the first line.

Mr. SHORT: I have no objection whatever to this bill, but why confine it to soil farmers? The fisherman farms the sea just as much as the soil farmer farms the land, and he has just as hard a time to make a living as the farmer on the land. Consequently he is entitled to just as much consideration. Before the fisherman can start out to make a living he has to spend from $500 to $1,000 on equipment; many men are not in a position to make such an expenditure, and they must be assisted. If the land farmer is to be helped with easy money I claim that the fishermen of the Martime provinces and the Pacific coast should be helped as well. I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) would be well advised to take this into consideration before the measure passes.

Mr. PRICE: I think it would be well for the minister to consider our fishermen. As has been pointed out, they are put to a considerable expense in connection with their equipment, nets, motor boats and so on, and at this particular time the fishermen along the Northumberland straits are having a very difficult time to raise sufficient money to equip themselves properly. Within the last two or three years, because of poor facilities, they have had some considerable difficulty in protecting their boats from storms along the cap Bald coast. This is particularly true in connection with the French Acadian people. They have had a hard time; their expenses have been high; they have sustained considerable losses, and if something is to be done to assist them it should be done at this time. The western farmers have been given every assistance; they have had opportunities not afforded to other classes. The farmers and fishermen in the Maritime provinces are paying rates to-day 100 per cent higher than those paid by the farmers in the west for the same haul.

Mr. ROBB: I rise to a point of order. Mr. Chairman. I submit that if we are to have a new budget debate, if we are going to debate freight rates at this time, we will be here all summer. If my hon. friend will confine himself to the question at issue we will get along more quickly, and he can discuss freight rates at another time.

Mr. PRICE: I am merely pointing out that the fishermen are entitled to just as much consideration as are the farmers in western Canada, and it is on their behalf that I am speaking, in order that they may be given opportunities to share in the same benefits which this government is bestowing on the farmers of the west. I think the fishermen deserve every consideration. They go through more hardships than the farmer; they work harder and take more chances, and their occupation is more hazardous. I think if some of the members of this House who have not seen the fishing industry being carried on would take a trip down to the Maritime provinces and see what these men have to go through, the chances they have to take and the storms they have to fight in their boats, they would agree with me that these men are deserving of more consideration than they have received in the past. Personally I am opposed to anything being done under this bill unless the fishermen along the Atlantic coast are also taken into consideration.

Mr. DUNNING: I feel reasonably sure that there is not a single member of this committee who would not agree that the fisherman is equally entitled to consideration from this House with the farmer or anyone else, but may I point out with regard to the measure now before us, that it deals with a particular type of credit as relating even to the farming industry, that particular type of credit being long term mortgage credit based upon the security of land. It does not deal with short term credit based on the security of chattels either on the farm or anywhere else. I listened to my hon. friends from the Maritime provinces, and if I understand the requirements of the fishing industry correctly from what they tell me, it is rather short term credit on chattel security that is required for that industry. Manifestly it is not possible for the fisherman to give a mortgage on the sea, and it would not be any good if he did so. He has certain equipment that he uses in his business—

Mr. HANSON: What about his fishing stand? That is real property.

Mr. DUNNING: Does he have real property? I would like to get to know.

Mr. PRICE: He has his home as well.

Mr. DUNNING: I listened to what my hon. friends had to say, and they spoke of fishing gear and the expense the fisherman was put to in order to equip himself to carry on his business. Everything that was mentioned by my hon. friends was in the nature of a chattel, and I therefore came to the conclusion, perhaps erroneously, but at least based upon the information supplied by my hon. friends, that the type of security available in connection with that industry is analogous to what the farmer has to give with respect to his short term credit requirements, and therefore does not and cannot very well come within the scope of this bill. Personally I would like to learn more about the fishing industry, and if there is any way to assist any one of our primary industries by way of facilitating credit, not at the expense of the country, but with the backing of the country, I can assure my hon. friends from the Maritime provinces that it will have my support.

Mr. FORKE: I was on my feet when the minister rose, to express exactly the same opinions he has expressed. I want to say on behalf of the farmers in the west that we have every sympathy with the fishermen and their troubles. In my young days I lived close by the sea, and know something of the hardships of the fishermen. I remember one storm in which 138 fishermen found a watery grave in one afternoon. So no one needs to tell me about the hardships of the fishermen on the sea. But I want to point out that this bill is not applicable to the circumstances in which the fishermen find themselves. We in this part of the House have been working for four years to get such a bill as we have now before us, and this is the first time we have heard anything in connection with helping the fishermen in this way. If our friends from the Maritime provinces will come back next session with some workable bill to provide not easy money, but cheap money—there is a difference—to help the fishermen in their calling, or any other primary industry in this Dominion, I am sure they will find us heartily with them.

Mr. SHORT: We are very glad to get the information from the deputy Prime Minister that the fishermen of the Maritime provinces will receive consideration at the next session.

Mr. MARCIL: There are a large number of farmers in Gaspe and Bonaventure who are at the same time fishermen; they carry on both callings. When fishing is not over plentiful, they resort more extensively to farming, and I would like to have that class included, if possible, under this bill. A man who can give security on land, whether he is a fisherman or not, should not be debarred from the benefits of this legislation.

Mr. HANSON: I endorse the suggestion of the hon. member for Bonaventure. It is true that a large number of the fishermen in the Maritime provinces also carry on farming and they nearly all own real property of some sort.

Mr. DUNNING: Then they are already under this bill.

Mr. HANSON: I am not so sure that they are. I would point out for the benefit of the hon. member for Brandon, if he has not heard a specific demand made on behalf of the fishermen, that this is the first concrete proposal of this kind that has been made in five years. This is the first occasion on which a concrete demand of this kind could be made on behalf of the fishermen, and that is why it is being made. So far as his invitation to wait for another year is concerned, I think we ought to decline that invitation with thanks. Now is the accepted time. If we are going to do anything for the fishermen in the Maritime provinces, we want to do it now. Therefore I invite the minister to amend the bill in that regard, so that it will take in any fisherman who is able to give security other than chattel security, and he might also take into consideration, if he will, the question of chattel security. I quite appreciate the difficulty of including short term credits in a bill of this character, as it is not designed for that, and therefore I shall not press that point; but I do press upon the minister the desirability of assisting these fishermen and bringing them within the terms of this act.

Mr. ROBB: I gather from the observations of my friend from York-Sunbury and my hon. friend from Bonaventure that the amendment I have just introduced brings in most of the fishermen of the Maritime provinces. The word "solely" is stricken out, so that the farmer who has land would come in under this act anyway. I think my hon. friend should leave it to a pretty generous interpretation by the board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would a fisherman's occupation be farming? That is what the definition says.

Mr. ROBB: If, as the hon. member for Bonaventure and the hon. member for York-Sunbury have said, these men are farmers as well as fishermen, they certainly would not be deprived of their privileges as farmers simply because they were incidentally engaged in fishing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister knows quite well that the men referred to by the hon. members are fishermen. The farm they have is incidental to their calling of fishing, and while it might perhaps be security for something, farming is not their main occupation, and they would never come in under this act.

Mr. ROBB: If my right hon. friend, who is a pretty good economist, has any amendment to suggest—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not suggested anything of the sort, but I do not want the minister to cast aside an amendment on a mere sophism which has nothing in it.

Mr. HANSON: If the minister will refer to paragraph (b) of section 4, he will see that it gives the board power:

> To make long term loans to farmers on the security of first mortgages on farm lands.

Suppose the fisherman has his little homestead of a few acres. It has a commercial value in the community, and it may be good security for a loan, but I doubt whether under this section the board would have power to make him a loan. More than that, as pointed out by the leader of the opposition, his main business must be farming. That man will not benefit by this act.

Mr. ROBB: I read carefully the resolution put on the order paper by the hon. member for Vancouver, and I listened to the speech delivered by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and I concluded that when this bill was introduced it would meet at least with their approval, as it contained what they had outlined as necessary for farming. I ask the hon. member for York-Sunbury if he has read this bill all through. He is a good lawyer, a good financier; does he think we can go out and sell bonds on security such as he has just mentioned?

Mr. HANSON: I think probably you will sell bonds on much poorer security than you will in the case of some of the farm loans that will be made under this legislation, especially in the province of New Brunswick to-day. Does the minister know how difficult it is under the conditions existing down there for farmers to obtain loans now in the open market—

Mr. ROBB: This will make it easier for them.

Mr. HANSON:—due to the fiscal policy of this government driving industry out of our towns and cities?

Mr. ROBB: That is another question.

Mr. HANSON: It may be, but that condition is due to the policy of this government. I am not in a position to submit an amendment. However, I should be glad to consult with the minister on the point. I am really serious about the matter. I think something can be done, and if ever anything is to be done now is the accepted time.

Mr. MacLAREN: I notice a very general impression in the House—at any rate the view seems to be held by many of the members—that no reference has been made previously to the desirability of extending to the fisherman treatment similar to that granted to the farmer. That is not quite correct. At least once before, and I think probably on two occasions, I have heard the suggestion made that fishermen should be included in this bill.

Mr. HANSON: So have I.

Mr. MacLAREN: Therefore it is not the first time the point has been raised. On the contrary, I think the records will show that on several occasions in the past the claims of the fishermen have been put forward. Now, most fishermen possess more than mere chattels. Most of them own their houses, and many of them a few acres of land. I think the minister will need to consider very carefully the definition of what constitutes a farmer. I fear many difficulties will arise and there will be doubt in some cases as to whether the applicant can be considered a farmer or not. Take the case of a fisherman who earns his living substantially by fishing, who also has an acre or two on which he and his family carry on kitchen gardening, would he be regarded as a farmer under the proposed legislation? The minister says "no". Then there will need to be a little better definition in order to determine what will constitute a farmer in the case of a man who is also engaged in fishing.

Mr. FOSTER: Do I understand there will be no doubt in the minister's mind that farmers who are also fruit growers will come within the purview of this definition?

Mr. ROBB: Surely.

Mr. FOSTER: That being so, I desire to concur in what has been said by the speakers who have just preceded me with regard to the farmer. In this connection may I thank the minister for his promise to take the matter into consideration next year, also the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) for his promise to give consideration to the case of the fishermen of the Maritime provinces. What I object to, and what our people also object to, is that when it comes to doing something for the Maritime provinces we are told "We will be glad to do it to-morrow or next year." But when it is a case of doing something for other parts of the country we are told "We insist on its being done now." I think that attitude will meet with very considerable criticism, particularly on the part of the people of the Maritime provinces.

I noticed another statement which struck me as rather peculiar. It was that no mention of the rights of the fishermen had been made in this House in the last four years. I thought that was an amazing statement in view of the fact that we had a solid delegation in this House representing the province of Nova Scotia at least. We sometimes hear the statement that the fishermen are prosperous and that the industry has been greatly extended as a result of wider markets. Let me point out that in 1919 the province of Nova Scotia produced $15,171,929 worth of fish. In 1922, the first year that this government had an opportunity to develop wider markets, the production dropped to $10,209,258. In 1923 there was a further drop of $1,800,000 down to $8,448,385. In 1924 the drop still continued to $8,277,000, and in 1925 the production was still going down. And yet we heard statements in this House during the budget debate that the fishing industry of Nova Scotia had been flourishing under the policy of the government for the last four years. But we have the concrete fact before us that in five years the fishing industry has declined to the extent of $7,000,000. Nevertheless when there is an opportunity to do something to increase the fish production of Nova Scotia, as well as that of the other Maritime provinces, we are told by the leader of the Progressive party: "Oh, come back next year and we will give you something." The minister also says, "Make your suggestions and demands during the next year and we will consider them. This legislation is for the farmer alone, and only those farmers in the provinces where they desire to avail themselves of it." I submit that when we are considering this legislation, even if it takes another twenty-four hours to frame an effective amendment, we should take such action as will ensure that the various other industries in the country shall also benefit by the impetus we desire to give the farming industry.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I quite realize that under the proposed legislation it is impracticable to grant relief to all the fishermen, as has been stated by some hon. gentlemen opposite. However, I take the position very strongly that if there is any industry that should receive consideration from the government it is the fishing industry, not only of the Maritime provinces but of Canada as a whole. I think that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have endeavoured to present the views of the fishermen as strongly as they possibly could. Not only have propositions been brought before the select standing committee on Marine and Fisheries, but we have been asking for concrete action by this House so as to give some assistance to the fishing industry in the Maritime provinces. The question has been raised as to who will receive benefit under this system of loans and what really constitutes a farmer—whether a fisherman farmer or a farmer fisherman can be properly included in that category. I judge that the individual who has sufficient land free from encumbrance to give the requisite security can receive benefits under this act?

Mr. HANSON: Why does the hon. member say that? I fear he has not read the bill.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I do not see anything in the bill that will deprive any man who has sufficient land free from encumbrance to give the needed security from receiving the benefits contemplated. It cannot be argued that because a man engages in fishing as well as farming he shall be excluded from the proposed benefits. It will be just as reasonable to argue that a farmer in the Northwest Territories should not be granted assistance under this legislation because he worked at lumbering, or some other calling, for a few months in the year. I think any man in any part of the Dominion with sufficient real estate in his own name will receive the benefits under the act. If not, I am not correctly informed on this matter. However I wish to place myself on record as making a demand on behalf of the fishing industry of the Maritime provinces. We were asking for concessions in the putting up of a certain preparation made from the lobster, which is being wasted at present, but which would have meant an immense revenue to the lobster packers and fishermen of the Maritime provinces. We could not get that small concession, because other larger interests and the larger packers wished to control the situation, and, as in all such cases, the small man had to go without his concession. I wish to support anything that will tend to benefit the fishing industry, and I am sure that the Marine and Fisheries estimates will afford opporunity for further discussion of this matter. I think we should concentrate our efforts on those estimates and endeavour to obtain some assistance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not rising to say anything against loans to fishermen, but I would not like any hon. member to go home with the false hope in his mind that there is going to be any loan to fishermen under this act. It is especially forbidden by the act. It does not matter how much land he owns; he might own the whole of Prince Edward Island, but if his occupation is that of fisherman he cannot get anything.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): A man may have two occupations—farmer and fisherman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A man has an occupation which is his chief occupation always, and you could not select anyone in the whole of the island whose occupation you could not tell. A man is one or the other. It may be he has a few onions or patches of corn, but he is a fisherman. He cannot get anything under this measure. Whether he should or not is not the question we are discussing. He could not get anything, and we might as well cease trying to delude the fishermen, or those who do not read, into thinking that they could get anything. For my part I am in favour of the rural credits measure. I stated so when the matter was discussed on a previous occasion, and I hope this measure will be along lines to meet my desire in respect to such a measure. I do not know that you could, in the first instance, include other industries in it, but you could accompany this measure by another along similar lines, or different lines, to achieve the same end for that other class of people. But the rural credit measure is simply a measure to provide for rural credits, and I think it is time we set our minds to work to frame a measure satisfactory to the rural sections of the country. We are not at the stage where the vital provisions should be discussed, but we are at the definitions;. I listened to the point raised by my hon. friend from Bow River, which I think the minister conceded, but I really do not think it is of so much consequence as another point, although I fancy it is right. Under this definition, in order to get a loan, a man must be residing on and occupying the land. If the minister will read his definition carefully he will see the point I am trying to make. Paragraph (d) of clause 2 reads:

"Farmer" means any person whose business is that of farming.

The word "solely" is now struck out. The paragragh continues:

And who owns and occupies a farm, or who proposes to acquire a farm for immediate occupation and cultivation by him.

The question I put to the minister is this: does he have to occupy that farm the year round, save of course a trip to California, or to parliament, or anything of that sort, where he does not take up another residence? What I have in mind is a large class of farmers who occupy their farms only for the summer, and reside in a village or town almost half the year. Under this clause as it now reads that man could not obtain a loan.

Mr. JACOBS: He really would need the loan more than the man who remained on his farm all the time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, especially if he went to California. This would not be the farm he occupies the year round, as his only place of abode. There are very many farmers who do not, in the sense of this definition, occupy a farm at all. They do not live on it. I know some of the best farmers in Manitoba who live in the town or village the year round, but who thoroughly cultivate their farms. They are excluded by this definition from getting a loan. If the minister intends that that should be the position, that is another question, but I do not think that he does. The next point is that it should not be enough that a man owns and occupies a farm. I might occupy a farm near a little town and do nothing with it. The man should own and cultivate the farm. The word "cultivate" should be substituted for the word "occupy." If a man owns and cultivates a farm, I would not care where he lived. It should be sufficient that he is cultivating the farm.

Mr. ROBB: If my right hon. friend will proceed he would notice that in the very clause he is quoting cultivation is provided for.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, that is only in the case of the man who has no farm at all, but is going to get one. Where the draughtsman made the slip was this: he provided in the case of a man who did not have a farm, and was going to get one, that he should get the loan because he was going to get the farm and cultivate it. If he already owned it he would not need to cultivate it. All he needed to do was to occupy it.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the act would cover that point.

Mr. COOTE: Does not the word "occupy" as it is used here really mean "cultivate"? A man may have a business located on a business street, and may occupy a house in a different part of the town. It could be said that he occupied the store he owned. It seems to me that is the interpretation that should be given to the clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The point I referred to a moment ago about the word "occupy" is perhaps covered, but the other point is not. If we insist on a man owning and cultivating land I do not see any sense of insisting on his living on it the whole or part of the year. He may live on the next farm. He may own a farm across the road and want a loan on it, and might cultivate it, but could not get the loan.

Mr. COOTE: Under the interpretation the right hon. gentleman places on the word "occupy" it is impossible for a man, although he was actually farming his land, but living in town, to get a loan.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I insist on his cultivating it. The point I am making is that a man should not be compelled to occupy a farm on which he wants to get a loan.

Mr. BROWN: Is not the clause capable of a wider definition?

Mr. MEIGHEN:; I do not know of any other. Certainly if I live in town, have a farm six miles out, and cultivate the farm I should be entitled to the loan.

Mr. DUNNING: The point is of very great importance, but for a reason the opposite to that under discussion, that reason being that it is not the intention of the act to provide loans for men who are incidentally farmers, that is men who are engaged in some other line of business. For instance, my right hon. friend is a farmer and I am a farmer, but not in the sense under which we wish to have credit extended under this law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Speak for yourself.

Mr. DUNNING: I am speaking for myself. I was very nearly putting my right hon. friend in the same category because I think he said on one occasion he did own a farm.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I mean is: Do not exclude me from the benefits of this measure too soon.

Mr. DUNNING: I am excluding both my self and my right hon. friend. I still own my original farm; but from the point of view of public policy I do not think it is desirable that this law should be so wide that its facilities might be extended to a man such as myself who, although still farming a farm in the sense of being in control of its operations, meeting the bills and so forth, is not in the class of an actual resident, occupier farmer. There is another class of cases, the class who are engaged in some business in the near-by village. There is hardly a business man in a western village who is not also a farmer. I think all will agree that it is not desirable that we should extend the privileges of this legislation to that class of farmer who is farming as a side issue to some other business which is of much more importance in his scheme of things.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has missed my point.

Mr. DUNNING: I know that is not my right hon. friend's point; but if the legislation is widened sufficiently to include the class of farmer to whom my right hon. friend refers, I am very much afraid that it will let in this other class. My right hon. friend has referred to the man who lives in a village, who, unless quite incidentally, has no other occupation than farming, and who farms a farm three or four miles out of that village. As he has stated, there is a large and growing class of that type of farmer; but just how to cover the point and admit that class of farmer without also admitting the very much wider class of business men who farm incidentally is a difficulty which I have not been able to overcome.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all covered by the definition of the farmer. Farming must be his business. Farming is certainly not the business of the minister and it is not mine. Once you have said that you have excluded all in the class to which the minister refers.

Mr. DUNNING: No. My right hon. friend will permit me, he will know as I know of men who farm in a very large way and who also have some other business. It would be very difficult to determine which of those two was the main business. I have in mind men who farm as much as two or three thousand acres and who also live and are engaged in business in a town. In all probability the turn-over of the farm might very well be larger than the turn-over of the business in the town. The difficulty of determining which was the main business of the man concerned would be very great and I speak from some experience in that regard. If we widen the definition this will be a matter of great difficulty. As regards practical administration, regulations of the board can, I believe, deal with the type of case to which my right hon. friend refers if we give them just that much latitude. I say what I am saying merely as an argument against widening that latitude too much and the tendency is rather to widen it too much.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the commission finds that the main business of any man is farming that man should come in just the same as anybody else. The object of this legislation is or should be to constitute a low interest, underlying financial security on loans. It will do just as much good to the community to grant a loan on land farmed by a man living in Portage la Prairie although the land is three miles out as to grant it to a man actually living on his farm. The object of it indeed is to encourage the cultivation of land and the production of goods therefrom by constituting a cheap underlying security and it should extend to all whose main business is farming. It does so extend under the definition, but you have a most unreasonable exclusion when you say that a man must be all the time living on his land. As the years go on you are going to exclude more and more until you have half the population of western Canada excluded from the legislation. There is no line of demarcation; there is no reason, no sense in it. The minister should either have it in that way or give the benefit to nobody.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would find myself largely in accord with the leader of the opposition if we could safeguard the loans made under this bill with regard to cases of this kind. You have in town a real estate agent or an implement agent who is also a farmer. He applies for a loan under this bill; he secures the loan on the basis of the security of his farm; but without the consent or knowledge of the board he invests part of that loan in his real estate business or implement agency. Before the board discovers what has happened to the loan and is in a position to collect on the good security the man has failed. The board comes along and all it can do it to pick up the fragments. It has the man's security which may still be good; but wo do not want the scheme burdened with a great deal of real estate dealer's or implement agent's land which is being farmed by proxy. If that could be covered I would agree with the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government must follow the loan past the hands of the borrower; they must see that the money is properly applied. Surely they will not hand it over to the borrower and just let him do what he likes with it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I hope not.

Mr. ROBB: Having read carefully the reports made by Doctor Tory who was appointed to investigate this question, and having listened to the arguments of those who advance such a measure as this, my understanding is that we should provide not so much for a cheap method of financing loans as for a cheap method of helping the man who is really farming, the man who is on the land, to farm. That is where I differ somewhat from my right hon. friend. I would not want to widen this too much; I would like the measure to go through so that it would be regarded as a sound financial means of enabling the real farmer who is farming to get money at a reasonable price. The closer we can keep to that, the better value we put on those bonds when we come to sell them on the market.

After all, the man who invests money looks carefully into the matter to see whether it is a real farmer who is working the land or some chap who is carying the land along in the hope that some day it will increase in value and he will sell it. Having made this statement, I may say that my friend and colleague the Minister of Railways, who has had a very wide experience in regard to rural credits and whose rural credit system has been in point of success second to none in Canada, will take charge of this measure, and I hope it will go through in such a way as to keep in mind bonds that will be gilt-edged when they come to sell them. That is the way to get cheap money. I am glad to know my right hon. friend is coming back to the speech he made earlier in the session. I gather now he is thoroughly in sympathy with the proposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He never was away from that speech; but if the Minister of Railways has made such a great success of the rural credit system in Saskatchewan and there is a very fine system in Ontario the thought occurs to me that perhaps we ought to let well enough alone.

Mr. ROBB: There are other provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not like to say that Quebec was not just as capable of working out as good a system as Ontario, or Manitoba not as capable of working out as good a system as Saskatchewan. If this system in Saskatchewan is flowering and fruiting in such magnificence it is too bad to interfere with it. Why enter into competition and have two systems starving instead of one flourishing? I know that will appeal to the fine sense of logic of the hon. member for Cartier.

Mr. JACOBS: Why to me particularly?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because of his particularly fine sense of logic.

Mr. JACOBS: I thank the right hon. gentleman very much.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister says: We just want to help the real farmer. I do not know about other districts, but I know that about the best real farmers in the district in which I have lived most of my life live right in the town. I have land sold to men who are living on it and I would lose a good deal of money to get them off the land and have one or two of those men who live in town and farm outside take the land instead because they are the real farmers. Take Regina. How many real farmers live there? Hundreds of them, I have no doubt—farmers who are just as good as any man who stands up against the winds of winter and endures the dust of summer. The distinction cannot be drawn. If a man owns the land and farming is his business he should be included with the others. A definition embracing such farmers is defensible; it is a rock on which you can stand. But this is not defensible, and what is more the government will not be able to stand by it. They will yield all right, and it will not be very long before they do.

Mr. JELLIFF: I am in accord with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has said. The word "occupy" should be changed to "cultivate." In parts of the country from which I come there reside in the towns people who own land and do their own farming. These people in many cases live anywhere from one to five miles from their farms and they have been looking forward to the benefits of this legislation. Indeed, they are among those who need the legislation. I hope the minister will amend the definition.

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is obliged to leave; it is not a matter of choice; and in view of the importance of getting the legislation through he has requested me to take hold of it for the time being, as well as possible. Perhaps it was unfortunate that he should have lauded me as an expert in this matter, for I do not claim to be one. I do however know something of the difficulties of administering such a scheme, and while I recognize the great difficulty presented by the point raised by the leader of the opposition, I submit that there is a far greater difficulty inherent in the point I have brought forward myself with regard to the business man securing a loan on the farm. There are not many small business men in villages who cannot demonstrate, if called upon to do so, that their farming business during the past year has been more important to them than any other activity, whether it be machinery or any other business. With regard to the point mentioned by the hon. member (Mr. Jelliff) he will find fully met in paragraph (f), the difficulty which he fears.

There are in relation to legislation of this kind many things which must be worked out in the course of administration. It is impossible to set forth in a section of the bill a definition so comprehensive as to cover all the various conditions to be encountered from the Atlantic to the Pacific in all the different types of agriculture which obtain in this country. But one important consideration, as the leader of the opposition himself has pointed out, is to get a sound underlying security. That being the case, should we not start too tight in our provisions rather than too loose? Experience indicates that we shall in any event run into other difficulties. After all, the definition of "farmer" has reference to the borrower, over whom you have virtually no control when once he has obtained the money. You have of course certain drastic powers under the mortgage, but as a matter of practice you could not take advantage of them. I do not think it will be argued that there is any desire to establish an agricultural credit system which would lend itself easily to the securing of loans by any man, who, immediately or soon after the receipt of the money, ceases to be a resident farmer and becomes a renter. Manifestly, renting does tend to depreciate the value of the security originally given. There are of course exceptions, but that has been the experience of lending generally.

My view of this legislation as regards these particular features is, on the whole, that we should have it sufficiently restrictive to make our underlying security attractive to those who may desire to purchase bonds. That is why I urge that the provisions should be tight rather than loose to begin with. It is much easier to loosen them later on if that is found necessary. Let us however begin on a sound basis, leaving any expansion to future consideration as necessity arises.

Mr. SMITH: I want to bring back the discussion, which has gone far afield, to the question raised by Maritime members in relation to some provisions for fishermen. Members from the Maritime provinces during this session have stressed the necessity for relief for our coal miners, and have failed to get any response. They have asked for some consideration for the steel workers in that part of the country, and have got nothing. They have requested some general relief for the people of the Maritime provinces and they have been given a royal commission. We can with justice appeal to the minister for some relief for our fishing industry, the importance of which may be gauged at once at a glance at the map, which will show the length of our coast line. The figures quoted by the hon. member (Mr. Foster) will give some idea of the magnitude of this industry. I have not studied this bill carefully, but there appears to be some difference of opinion as to whether it does or does not include fishermen who own real property. I do think the minister should amend the bill to include these people, and enable them to obtain what the hon. member for Brandon describes as cheaper money. The hon. member for Hants-Kings also pointed out the necessity for immediate relief to the fishermen; it is no use postponing it for another year. Surely after hearing what Maritime members have had to say about conditions down there it should be unnecessary for any one to labour that point. We need relief at once, and I would appeal to the minister on purely non-partisan grounds to give to the fishing industry of the Maritime provinces the consideration to which it is entitled. For that reason the scope of the bill should be widened to include fishermen.

Mr. BURY: The term "occupation" does not suggest any difficulties to me; I do not think it necessarily includes residence. Apparently, however, the bill is intended to benefit stock raisers, and if that is so the word "cultivation" hardly covers the case. I understand also that it is intended that the benefits of these provisions shall apply to fruit growers, in which case I doubt very much whether the word "tillage" will serve the purpose. The minister will have to use much wider terms than "cultivation" and "tillage" if he is to bring in stock raisers and fruit growers. I would suggest some other phrase such as "farming operations thereon" or words to that effect.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think we can devise a long term farm scheme which will fit the ranching industry. It is not practicable in nine cases out of ten for the rancher to give security on the land, very much of which is leased. It is not contemplated that the bill shall apply to ranchers as such. It is meant to apply to those engaged in mixed farming and who can give some basic security on the strength of their land for the loans they receive. I do not think there is any doubt as to the provisions being sufficiently wide to deal with all classes of cultivation including fruit farming and other things of that kind, but I must admit that I do not think the bill would include a rancher, who was not cultivating the land but ranching in the old sense of the term.

Mr. MARCIL: Speaking of the class I referred to at the beginning of this debate, the farmer who is occupied part of the time in fishing or lumbering but who can give security under this act would not be debarred from this measure, as I understand it. In our district men farm, do lumbering in the winter time and fishing and other things, but if they can give security on farm land they would come within the scope of the act. I would like to understand that thoroughly. I know there is some reference made in section 7, subsection 3, to the effect that:

> Loans under this act shall be made only to farmers actually engaged in or shortly to become engaged in the cultivation of the farm mortgaged—

All our people in the Gaspesian peninsula are farmers, fishermen and lumbermen combined.

Mr. DUNNING: How much land do such men cultivate?

Mr. MARCIL: They own farms of thirty, forty and fifty acres.

Mr. DUNNING: In my opinion they are not debarred from this act.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would it not be advisable to include fishermen as well? Farmer means any person whose business is solely that of farming, and the definition goes on to say:

—and who owns and occupies a farm,—

It would only be necessary to include the word "fishing" as well, and this matter would be cleared up beyond any doubt. I am afraid that if this is not done the fishermen will be out, and it will not be possible to loan money to a man whose business is fishing. If the government wish to be fair they should include fishermen as well as farmers.

Mr. BOYS: What does the minister say is the meaning of the word "occupies"? Does that mean personal, actual occupation?

Mr. DUNNING: That is the point we have been discussing for some time.

Mr. BOYS: I would like to find out, because if that is what it means I think it is in conflict with the provisions of section 7, subsection 3, which is as follows:

Loans under this act shall be made only to farmers actually engaged in or shortly to become engaged in the cultivation of the farm mortgaged...

That would clearly embrace a man who might be living in a city with a manager running his farm; he would be engaged in farming and would come within the provisions of this act, as I think he should. I am in favour of this act so far as it is going to give relief to bona fide farmers, but I am absolutely opposed to it if the intention is to go further, unless you are going to broaden it to include fishermen. It seems to me that should be done in a separate bill, if it is to be done at all, and if you are going to assist the fishermen of the Maritimes I would put in a word in favour of the fishermen on the Great Lakes. They are as much entitled to relief as anyone else, and there are a great many of them. But it is my opinion that we should not deal with both classes in the one bill. If the word "occupies" is intended to have the wider meaning contemplated by subsection 3 of section 7 I would suggest to the minister that more appropriate language would be:

—who owns and is in possession of—

Legally, as everyone knows, you may be in possession of a farm without living on it, and if this language is used there can be no doubt. If on the other hand it is intended to confine it to those who are in actual physical occupation, you are certainly in conflict with the provisions of section 7.

Mr. DUNNING: The intention of the government is undoubtedly to have it apply to resident farmers and that, I am informed by the Department of Justice, is a correct statement of the meaning of the language used in both the defining clause and that under discussion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): If that is the desire of the minister would it not be better to let the word "solely" remain?

Mr. DUNNING: We have the difficulty raised by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), that some judge in the west has held that a man engaged in threshing is not solely a farmer. Those of us who are farmers know that threshing is an essential part of the business of farming, and that it is done on the farm as a part of the farm operations. Custom threshing would rule a farmer out. The object of striking out the word "solely" was to meet such a case, because it would be manifestly absurd to rule out all those men who do a little threshing for their neighbours as well as their own.

Mr. MURPHY: The minister has stated that it is the intention of the government that loans shall only be made to bona fide farmers actually resident on the land. Many men reside on a certain quarter section who own other lands as well. Would such a man be eligible for loans on such other lands, as well as on the land where he actually resides?

Mr. DUNNING: I am advised that the act provides for such contingencies. There is no particular piece of fence specified; if the farmer owns other land across the road there is no reason why that should not be included with the land on which he resides.

Mr. BOYS: That might be so if it were not for section 7. But with that section I do not see how the minister can make that contention at all. If a man owns four farms the minister has informed the committee that under the definition of occupation he must be in actual personal occupation, and that is only possible on the land on which he resides. Suppose he has land in a different township altogether; if he is actually a farmer and is farming that land, why should he not be able to get a loan on both farms? It seems to me the distinction should be between those actually and honestly engaged in farming, and those carrying on something else as a side line. If they are able to run two or three businesses they should be able to finance their farms. But I cannot see why a man should not be able to get loans on two or three farms, no matter whether they are in different townships; he can only live on one of them. I think the minister must either alter the definition of the word "occupies" or he must make an amendment to the act.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Why not take out the word "occupies" altogether, and leave the definition as in subsection 3 of section 7?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The minister claimed that the word "solely" was taken out to enable the man engaged in threshing part of the time to come under the act. Surely threshing would be considered part of the work of farming, and the man doing this work would not be barred in that case. I think if the word "solely" is retained and the words "and occupies" are removed, it would meet all the requirements.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: My idea of this legislation, and of the reason why it has been advocated for some years, is that it will keep the people on the land, and encourage others to begin farming. This will facilitate the financing of these ventures at a cheaper rate.

Mr. CAHAN: How does this bill do that?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is my view of the purpose of the legislation.

Mr. CAHAN: According to the way I read the bill a man may be resident on the land at the time he applies for and receives the loan, but there is no provision that, having received the loan, he should not take up his residence elsewhere.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Suppose I give the hon. member a mortgage for five or ten thousand dollars on my farm. You lend me the money on the security of the land, and you have no right to tell me what I shall do with my money. That is my point. It has been argued that men living in towns or villages who are engaged in farming as a side line should come under this bill. I claim that a real rural credits measure that has anything else in view but to help keep farmers on the land, and to encourage others to go on the land, is wrong. I make this statement from practical experience and of my own knowledge, that no man is going to make a success of farming unless he resides on the farm. I am living in possibly as old established a district as there is in western Canada, along the Red river, where there is the finest fertile soil. Farmers come in there from the United States who have bought farms and whole townships, and they would never have made a success of farming if they had not had unlimited means. What we want to do by this measure is to encourage our people to stay on the land, and provide them with facilities for getting cheap money in order that they will remain on the land. But if you are going to take in all these other people you are going beyond the scope of what should be accomplished by this measure. You are going to allow a lot of land miners to come under the legislation, and I do not think that class are in need of help.

Mr. COOTE: I think it is the desire of this committee to make this subsection quite clear. As it now reads, it may mean any person whose business is that of farming, and who owns or occupies a farm. The discussion, so far as I can gather, is largely centering around the meaning of the word "occupies," and it does seem to me there is some force in the contention of some hon. members who have argued that the word means resides. The section as it reads now should certainly be changed somewhat. There are in some parts of western Canada very good settlers who reside in small communities and work the land for several miles around from that one centre. In fact there are some people who are advocating this very type of settlement. I personally know of these settlements. The men are splendid farmers. I do not think there is a probability of our getting a better type of farmer, or of finding any finer land on which to make a loan, but it might be questioned whether these men are actually residing on their farms.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Could not that be covered by regulations?

Mr. COOTE: If "occupies" is not read as meaning "resides," I do not think "occupies" should be so interpreted. The point should be cleared up so that there will be no doubt about it.

Mr. DUNNING: The word "occupies" was put there rather than "resides" in order not to be too cramping in the definition. We have had the case mentioned of a man who might be residing on one side of the road and running a farm on the other. With respect to these people, and also those who are living in the centre of their farming land and farming the land around, bona fide farmers, authority is given in the bill to make such regulations as will cover the vast variety of exceptions which exist but which nevertheless must come within the definition of "owns and occupies." There will be a vast variety of exceptions even in a province like Saskatchewan where conditions are almost similar from one end of the province to the other. Broadly the intention is to make this act applicable to the resident farmer, and that end can be better achieved perhaps by not using too great strictness in legal definition. Manifestly some latitude must be allowed to the board to deal by regulation with bona fide cases such as have been mentioned, provided the original intent is carried out, which is that the benefits of this legislation are intended for the bona fide farmer living on the land, and not those we were discussing a little while ago, whose main business is not farming but who are living in some village or town and engaged in some other business—and nearly all of our western business men have farms in addition to their regular business. We intend to shut them out. All I can say to the committee is that that is the intention of the government, and it will be necessary, unless you cramp it very tightly, for the board set up under the authority of this legislation to make regulations in order to effectuate that intention.

Mr. BOYS: If the regulations made are in conflict with the statute, the minister agrees that the statute will govern. Now we have this point right before us. Suppose a man owns three farms, is farming one himself, and rents out the other two. He wants a loan in connection with one of the rented farms, just as much as he might want it in connection with the farm he is living on and working. But if the minister's interpretation of the word "occupies" is correct, he could not get a dollar by way of loan on the other two farms he is renting out. Now why shouldn't he?

Mr. DUNNING: We are really not going into the business of financing farm land which is rented out. We think it would be a very bad thing in principle for the state to give aid in connection with that kind of operation. This legislation is intended for the benefit of the agriculturist who is farming his land, not the man who is renting the land, whether he happens to live on another farm or in town.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would this be too loose—"whose main occupation is that of farming"?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want to cut out the fisherman-farmer.

Mr. BURY: I cannot see any difficulty about the use of the word "occupation". I do not see how you could argue that it implies residence. So far as the case mentioned by my hon. friend from North Simcoe is concerned, if a man rents a farm to another, the landlord is not in occupation of the tenant's holding. The moment he rents out the land for even a year he has ceased to be in occupation himself, and the occupation is the occupation of his tenant. It would be a mistake so to frame the bill as to insist that a farmer must reside on his land in order to get a loan, because if you do that you will necessarily confine the loan to the land on which he is residing. Some farmers may have moved into a village or town for the sake of the educational facilities, or perhaps for the sake of health. They may not be able to reside on their farm at the particular time when they want a loan upon it, but nevertheless they may be working it.

Mr. CAHAN: As I read this bill, a man may reside on a farm and obtain a mortgage loan on another farm. It need not be the farm he occupies or resides upon.

Mr. BOYS: The minister says no.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with the bill as I read it, and I would like any section to the contrary pointed out.

Mr. BURY: The act should not be so framed as to confine the loan to the land on which the farmer is residing, nor do I think it should be so framed as to deprive the farmer, who for some reason has to live in a village and not on the farm itself, but who is perhaps doing nothing but farming, of the benefits of this legislation. Another thing to which I should like to call the attention of the minister is this: He has told us that it is not intended to extend the benefits of this bill to ranching. If so he will have to alter his definition because the definition expressly says that farming includes stock raising.

Mr. DUNNING: The later definition provides for that.

Mr. BURY: There is the trouble. As it stands your bill will be inconsistent. You have a section there which is intended to define the meaning of your terms. That should be the regulating section as to what the meaning of a term is. Then by some other section, which is inconsistent, you make it possible by implication or inference to alter the plain, clear meaning of the defining section. If you are going to extend the benefit of the bill to fruit farmers I doubt if the term "tillage" technically includes fruit farming.

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): Is there anything in the bill to prevent a man from securing a loan and afterwards renting his farm?

Mr. DUNNING: No. I may say that there is a provision as to the sale of the security in section 7.

Mr. CANNON: I have here a copy of Webster's dictionary in which "occupant" is defined as follows:

One who occupies, or takes possession; one who has the actual use or possession, or is in possession, of a thing; one in occupation.

I think there can be no doubt that "occupant of land" means who ever has the actual use of it.

Mr. DUNNING: Possession.

Mr. CANNON: And possession, naturally. He can be a resident and he may also not be a resident. The tenant of a farm is the occupant of it.

Mr. GEARY: Does my hon. friend occupy his seat when he is not sitting in it?

Mr. CANNON: That depends. We have legal fictions that bring about the most extraordinary results.

Mr. COOTE: May I ask whether the act will be administered according to the lawyers who may wish to question it?

Mr. McMILLAN: You could not get them to agree anyway.

Mr. BOYS: Let me address a final word to the minister. We understand now from him that "occupied" means physical and personal occupation. If that is so does the minister think that in section 7, subsection 3, that thought is carried out? The subsection in question reads as follows:

Loans under this act shall be made only to farmers actually engaged in or shortly to become engaged in the cultivation of the farm mortgaged—

Mr. DUNNING: That is the intention.

Mr. BOYS: It seems to me the sections are clearly in conflict.

Mr. DUNNING: If you read that subsection in the light of the definition of "farmer" I think it is perfectly clear.

Mr. ROGERS: I was going to say something about the experience we have had in Manitoba. If you widen this bill so as to provide that in order to effect a loan a man need not be a resident you open a very wide gate. The province of Manitoba has a rural credit system and has lost about $750,000 in connection with it. I venture to say that 90 per cent of that loss resulted from making the provisions unduly wide. Certain individuals living in towns commenced to speculate in farming with the result that there was a heavy loss in the operation of the system. I think that the loss of three-quarters of a million dollars in Manitoba was almost entirely due to that condition of affairs. Therefore it would be well to safeguard the present bill and confine the right granted here to farmers who live upon the land. If the provision does not work out satisfactorily it can be amended next year.

Mr. CAHAN: Paragraph (d), which we are discussing, defines a farmer as any person whose business is that of farming and who owns or occupies a farm. I submit that paragraph (d) does not cover a case in which the commission will advance a loan and take a mortgage.

Mr. DUNNING: Paragraph (f) covers that.

Mr. CAHAN: No it does not. What I suggest is that it is covered by subsection 3 of section 7, which reads:

Loans under this act shall be made only to farmers actually engaged in or shortly to become engaged in the cultivation of the farm mortgaged—

Now, loans under this bill are to be made only to farmers, and under paragraph (d) of section 2 "farmer" means one who owns and occupies a farm. Then under subsection 3 of section 7 it is provided that farmers must be "actually engaged in or shortly to become engaged in the cultivation of the farm mortgaged." The farm mortgaged need not be the same farm the occupation of which makes the person seeking the loan a farmer. As long as he is a farmer and owns and occupies one farm he may, I suggest, under this bill secure a mortgage upon an entirely different farm which he does not occupy.

Mr. BURY: So long as he performs the conditions with respect to it.

Mr. BOYS: So long as he is engaged in farming.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, but he owns one farm and occupies another and is engaged in cultivating it. A loan can be made on the farm which he owns and occupies, but a loan may also be made upon any other farm in the cultivation of which he is about to become engaged.

Mr. CANNON: He would not have any right to mortgage his farm unless he owned it.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly, but he need not occupy it. That is my point.

Mr. CANNON: He cannot reside on two farms.

On section 4—Power of board.

Mr. GARDINER: I would suggest that this section be amended. It gives power to the board to hold for five years property it has taken by reason of foreclosure. Personally I think that five years is too long a term.

Mr. DUNNING: That suggestion has been considered. I move to strike out the word "five" in the fifth line and substitute therefor the word "three."

On section 5—Capital requirements, initial capital.

Mr. ROGERS: What is the necessity for taking in the western provinces? We have had the rural credit scheme in the three western provinces and have not succeeded very well with it. I think we should keep clear of those provinces. If we are going into a rural credit proposition, why not let the Dominion take it up? The provinces have their own rural credit system; why duplicate it?

Mr. DUNNING: It is to avoid the very duplication my hon. friend refers to that this scheme is proposed. No province will come into it if it prefers to continue the provincial scheme it now has. But if it desires, because of the greater pooling of security involved in the Dominion scheme, to come in, there is no reason why it should not cease the operation of lending under the provincial scheme, and turn that organization into co-operation with the Dominion, under this scheme. The great objective is the pooling of security over a wide area, such as has been done in the United States and other countries, in order to provide efficient security for an issue of bonds which will be well understood by the public and popular with them as a sound investment. Co-operation with the provinces is also necessary in order to attain the necessary flexibility. We in the west have been complaining for many years that the financial relationship between those lending money and the farmers of the west has been greatly hampered by the fact that the lending bodies are in the east and do not understand thoroughly the conditions under which the borrower himself is working. By having the provincial co-operation provided for in this bill, it is hoped to bring about that local knowledge, sympathy and understanding which have been lacking in the operation of highly centralized institutions engaged in business of this character in the past. Most of our financial institutions would themselves admit, I think, that they are constantly striving to overcome the problem created by their very centralized nature. They require to be centralized in order to gain strength, but in the operation of their business they must constantly find fresh means of coming into closer contact with the individuals with whom they are doing business from one end of Canada to the other. By co-operation with the provinces it is possible to get the detailed information and the knowledge that brings; and to get at the same time the strength which comes from centralization and the pooling of the mortgage credit of the farmers from one end of Canada to the other.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. minister tell us frankly what has been the experience of the provincial boards in Alberta and Saskatchewan? We in the east are led to believe, from the reports circulated by the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta, that there have been very great losses in the administration of similar schemes by those governments. We who live in the east know that one of the largest banking institutions in this whole country went to the wall not because of one large account in the east but because of millions of dollars which it had loaned out in the west which could not be recovered. Before we can be in a position to understand whether this is really a reliable scheme which will pay its way, and whether trusts funds may be safely invested in the bonds to be issued, we should be informed as to the schemes which have been in operation in the two western provinces, as to their success or otherwise, and as to what particular provisions are inserted in the bill now before the House to provide those safeguards for investments that were not provided in the schemes adopted by Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend's premise is not correct in the first place. He refers to a scheme in Alberta. There is no such scheme in Alberta. That is number one.

Mr. BURY: But there were measures for rural relief which lost money.

Mr. DUNNING: We do not want to mix up two entirely separate things, two things which are separated by every financial institution having to do with such matters, that is, the long term mortgage credit system on the one hand and the short term or banking business on the other. Rural credit is an inclusive term which might be said to include both, but the term rural credit has later come to mean the short term credit system rather than the long term farm loan mortgage system. In Saskatchewan and Manitoba there have been in operation long term governmental farm mortgage systems. Perhaps I am not quite correct in describing the Manitoba scheme as governmental in its operation. It is an association in which the government has considerable interest. Many people have the idea expressed by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George in that they confuse the operations of the rural short term credit system in Manitoba with the operations of the long term farm mortgage credit system in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. That confusion has arisen in Saskatchewan itself. Saskatchewan never had a governmental short term rural scheme; they have not regarded it as a field in which it would be wise to operate.

Mr. CAHAN: Then as to Alberta?

Mr. DUNNING: I believe Alberta has a short term credit scheme, but the hon. members from that province can speak as to that.

Mr. SPENCER: There has been no disaster in Saskatchewan.

Mr. DUNNING: No. The disaster took place mainly—and I am subject to correction by hon. members from Manitoba—with respect to the short term rural credit scheme in Manitoba. While I say that by way of clearing away the underbrush and getting down to what we are discussing, namely a long term credit system, I do not want the committee to believe that the experience in Manitoba and Saskatchewan has been entirely a bed of roses in connection with the long term mortgage credits. There have been difficulties. With regard to the scheme I am most familiar with, the farm loan board of the province of Saskatchewan, we must remember that it commenced operation in 1917 or 1918. It has passed through the most difficult years from the point of view of mortgage security that western Canada has ever passed through. While there have been difficulties I may say to my hon. friend that on the first of January of this year the Saskatchewan Farm Loan Board had paid to the Saskatchewan government every cent of interest due on advances by the government to the board. That does not mean that all of the farmers paid all of the interest due by them to the board; but in the aggregate they paid sufficient of it to enable the board to repay all the interest which the board owed the government, and in addition the board was enabled at the same time to reduce the amount lent by the government for administration purposes by about $75,000 There have been further collections since then.

For the information of my hon. friend I might state that the Saskatchewan system was based on a rate of interest to the farmer of 6½ per cent and the loans were for thirty years. That meant in effect that the farmer paid 7.65 per cent including amortization, or to put it more simply, $76.50 per $1,000 per annum repaid the loan, principal and interest, in thirty years and that $76.50 per annum which included principal and interest was, of course, as the hon. member knows, a smaller amount than the farmer would ordinarily pay for interest alone to the ordinary mortgage institution. That is the measure of benefit to the individual farmer in that case.

As to the amount invested, in Saskatchewan about $10,000,000 has been lent by the board and in Manitoba I believe almost a similar amount has been lent by the Manitoba Farm Loans Association. I believe the Manitoba experience has not been unlike that of Saskatchewan. I admit that such a scheme requires the most careful administration. The man in charge should if possible be Scotch and he should have a very strong back-bone.

Mr. CAHAN: He might be a French-Canadian and have the same characteristic.

Mr. DUNNING: There are a good many French-Canadians with Scotch names who might qualify, but he should have those characteristics I speak of just as the manager of any lending institution must have a pretty stiff back in order to make a success of his business. There is a tendency in some quarters to regard schemes of this kind as philanthropic. We must not regard this as a philanthropic institution; this is a scheme to enable farmers to pool their mortgage credits in order to get the advantage which comes from combining their credits and resources. It has succeeded elsewhere; I believe I am correct in saying that the experience of the United States scheme, which is similar in many of its aspects to the scheme which we are now considering, may be said to be of great advantage to United States agriculture during a very difficult period. They have had their difficulties in operation and we shall certainly have ours. The administration of this will not be easy; but I believe and the government believes it will accomplish valuable results in reducing the cost of long-term mortgage credits to agriculture generally from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not asking for information for the purpose of opposing this bill. The words of the hon. gentleman will go to the east and be read by many who are interested in the financial scheme incorporated in this bill. I understand from my hon. friend that prior to the present time the interest has been paid upon loans made by the Saskatchewan government to the board.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: But I understand that all that has been paid by the farmers for the amortization of their loans has been utilized by the board for the purpose of paying interest up to date.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry if I gave that impression. Every dollar that is paid by a farmer on principal is a payment on principal from the board to the government and can then be relent by the government to the board for the purpose of making other loans. All interest payments made by the borrower to the board are the only sums available to the board wherewith to pay interest due by the board to the government.

Mr. CAHAN: How long has the Saskatchewan scheme been in operation?

Mr. DUNNING: Since 1917 or 1918; I forget the year.

Mr. CAHAN: Eight or nine years. During that time, to what extent has the government been compelled to make foreclosure and to take over land under mortgages

Mr. DUNNING: That is in the report; I could not answer my hon. friend offhand. Of course the government does not take over land; the board does. The board acts in the matter in the same manner as a mortgage company.

Mr. CAHAN: The board is the government for all practical purposes.

Mr. DUNNING: Not for business purposes, because the government's relationship to the board is that of lending to the board money which must be met in exactly the same way as if the board was a mortgage company. Of course in a large business amounting to $10,000,000 the board have some foreclosures and they have as a result a property account. They set up a reserve in respect of losses on property account exactly as a mortgage company would do. I have not the report of the board before me. They have taken possession of quite a number of parcels of land but usually only in cases of abandonment. Those eight or nine years of experience of the Manitoba and Saskatchewan schemes are by common consent the worst eight or nine years of mortgage experience in western Canada. We have tasted what we may hope is the worst that we shall have to experience along that line.

Mr. CAHAN: This information must be available in some department and I would like the minister to give the committee information which will be very valuable not only to this committee but to the country. The country is taking a deep interest in this bill. Of course in my experience I cannot distinguish as the hon. member does between a board appointed by and responsible to a government and the government itself. I regard it simply as an agent of the government for carrying out a particular undertaking. Further, while I am not presaging any evil I do not think there is any doubt that with respect to the grain districts in the next ten years we are likely to meet with difficulties quite as great as those created by the deflation of the last ten years. We must keep that in view in order to put this scheme on a sound basis, because we must have it on a sound basis as the government is placing it in the power of every trustee throughout the length and breadth of Canada to invest trust funds in securities which the government is hereby creating.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course this is only a matter of opinion, but I can say this based upon my hard experience of the last eight, nine or ten years, that this scheme if properly administered would stand the test of a similar ten years. That is, the foundation of this scheme renders it capable of meeting such conditions as those referred to by my hon. friend. I shall be glad to have with me after eight o'clock material indicating the experience of the Manitoba and Saskatchewan schemes with regard to foreclosures.

Mr. CAHAN: The information should be placed on the record so that the House and the country may be fully informed in regard to it, because while I know the minister is a practical man I would rather draw my conclusions from my experience.

Mr. COOTE: While the minister is getting that information as to losses sustained by these two provincial schemes, he might ascertain what losses have been sustained by private mortgage and loan companies in western Canada. It would be interesting to compare the respective losses of the provincial and private systems of lending money on long term mortgages.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to get that information.

Mr. ROGERS: Has this bill been submitted to the financial firms?

Mr. DUNNING: Since it has been brought down they have all seen it.

Mr. ROGERS: Have they approved of it?

Mr. DUNNING: I did not ask them.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering clause 5 of Bill 148.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to ask why it is deemed necessary to start this board off with exemption from interest for three years. In three years the interest on $5,000,000 at 5 per cent will amount to something like $750,000, and if this board is to stand on its own feet surely it does not need that exemption.

Mr. DUNNING: The minister, I know, gave quite a little consideration to the necessity for providing marginal security for bonds in the capitalization of the institution. For the information of the House I have here noted that under the United States scheme the federal government supplied each bank with $750,000 of initial capital; the borrowers subscribed to the extent of 5 per cent on their loans and became liable, if necessary, for assessment for another 5 per cent. But it must be remembered that in the United States the bonds are exempt from taxation of all kinds, a principle which we are not following in this bill. It is not intended that the whole of the $5,000,000 will be subscribed by the Minister of Finance immediately, but only as required.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And possibly not at all.

Mr. DUNNING: Possibly not at all, but that is not probable. As the provinces come into the scheme it is anticipated that the capital authorized to be subscribed by the Dominion will be paid over by the minister as required.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But is it not true that the scheme may be carried out without requiring the whole $5,000,000?

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. DUNNING: Of course we may never pay the full $5,000,000. The issuance of bonds may be sufficiently successful to meet the requirements of the Farm Loan board without drawing upon any substantial portion of that amount.

Mr. ROGERS: I would regard the exemption from interest for three years as a very unsound principle to start with. As I understand it this rural credit scheme is being adopted for the purpose of providing cheap money to those who require loans on farms. If you start on an unsound basis, different from that of any other business concern of the country, then you lend your position to creating trouble all the way through. If you are going to exempt this amount from interest for three years you can do anything else you like that will be regarded and will be in fact unsound. I think it is a great mistake.

Mr. NEILL: The wording of this section hardly justifies the hopeful anticipations of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) because it does not suggest that only any sum less than the $5,000,000 needed to float this venture, will be exempt from interest. It says:

> The amounts provided from time to time under this subsection shall be free from interest charges for a period of three years.

Supposing they start with $2,000,000, and when another province comes in they want another $1,000,000; the whole $5,000,000 will ultimately be taken out. I appreciate the minister's point that it is desirable to start on a sound financial basis, but it is too much to give them $750,000. The board will start with this present and after a while they will say, "We are doing nicely; we are paying our interest to the government." Yes; for the first three years it will not be difficult to do that, because there will be no interest to pay. That may even cover the next three or four years, because they will have a start in that way. They may be even tempted to reduce the rate of interest on the mortgages, because they will do so well, but they must remember that they will not have $750,000 handed to them every three years, and they may be led to take an optimistic view of the situation and get in what the minister seeks to avoid, an unsound position.

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Finance did give consideration to approaching this matter from the standpoint of a definite grant for organization purposes rather than the method provided in this bill, and it was felt that the organization expense could be better dealt with in this manner, because under this scheme no more would be taken than is necessary. The freedom from interest would be the full extent to which the board would be assisted directly by the government, and by approaching it on this basis the assistance is altogether and at all times proportionate to the development of the business. That was the view of the minister in deciding to adopt this method rather than the United States method by which $750,000 was given to each bank.

Mr. CAHAN: With respect to this first provision of what is called the initial capital not exceeding $5,000,000, the amounts provided from time to time shall be free from interest charges for a period of three years. No money will he required unless a loan is made; if loans to the extent of $1,000,000 are made in the first year there is no other source from which moneys may be obtained than from this initial advance, the 5 per cent additional amount advanced by the government plus the 5 per cent of each individual loan which is taken off the amount loaned to the individual. So it is impossible that there ever may be $5,000,000 of loans outstanding, except that money to the extent of 90 per cent shall be advanced from the federal treasury. I think that is quite clear. Then, as the loans are made, interest will accrue on these mortgages sufficient to cover the interest paid to the federal treasury plus the expenses of the administration of the board. Therefore there is no satisfactory reason that I can see why interest should not accrue to the federal treasury practically from the time that advances are made by the federal treasury. In respect of the 5 per cent of advances from the federal treasury, no interest is payable on that; in respect of the 5 per cent advance by the province, no interest is payable on that; in respect of the 5 per cent taken from the individual loan of the person borrowing, no interest is payable on that. Those contributions of 5 per cent each only receive interest by way of dividends arising out of the profitable administration of the fund by the board. So that with respect to the 85 per cent of other money advanced from the Dominion treasury, I can see no reason why the interest should not accrue from the time the advances are made, because the advances will not necessarily be made until corresponding loans are made to the individual borrowers.

Furthermore, why should you give freedom of interest for three years in order to cover the organization expenses? Give your money as cheaply as you will, if that is the desire, but certainly it should not be so cheap as not to cover interest plus administration expenses, and, although you might stretch the initial organization expenses over a period of years, over five or ten years if you like, nevertheless those organization expenses should be repaid to the federal treasury through the board. Therefore I suggest that this is an improper way of covering organization expenses, by giving freedom of interest for three years on amounts up to but not exceeding $5,000,000. It is a direct bonus which will never be repaid, and you are placing this board in competition with all the loan companies of the country. Why should you, in competition with the loan companies of the country, advance up to $750,000 of the organization expenses, which will never be repaid to the treasury, while every other competing company has to pay its own organization expenses and amortize its expenses over a term of years?

Mr. BURY: If the minister is not going to answer the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I would like to call his attention to certain elements in this section 5, and ask for an explanation. At the top of page 3 we are told that repayment of the amounts provided by the government shall be made from time to time out of the earnings of the board. Are we to understand that that means the interest paid on the loans, or are we to understand that it means as well the repayments made on account of capital? If the latter, then you cannot call those earnings. The only possible moneys coming into the board to which the term earnings could by any conceivable stretch of language apply would not be repayments of their own moneys, but the interest paid in addition to the capital moneys they have advanced, over and above all expenses. I call attention to that because if you will look at paragraph (a) of subsection 2 you will see that the Dominion government is to subscribe 5 per cent of the capital amount of the loan. Then it goes on to say:

—so that the total amount subscribed under this paragraph shall equal at any time as nearly as may be, 5 per cent of the total loans theretofore made and not fully repaid.

I take it that that is intended to mean 5 per cent of the unpaid balance of the loans that have not yet been fully paid off. It does not say that, but I assume that is what it means. That being so, the amount represented by the 5 per cent which belongs to the government is continually decreasing as the capital is being paid off, and I take it, therefore, that the term "earnings" must for that reason refer to more than interest, that it must also include payments on account of capital. That is the thing that struck me as inconsistent and very difficult to explain, but if the minister means by earnings repayments on account of capital, it is capable of explanation.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a provision for the redemption of initial capital. Manifestly, repayments of principal cannot be taken for the redemption of initial capital because they will be required to redeem the other capital provided for loans.

Perhaps I might here say with reference to the other point raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, that we have always to keep in mind the fact that we are endeavouring here to create a security which will warrant public confidence as an investment. This security consists, first, of the farm mortgages pooled; second, of an investment by the provinces, the Dominion, and the borrowers, of 15 per cent of the total of the bonds—a marginal security to that extent, and in addition the interest-free provision for three years on the first $5,000,000 of initial capital. This is a further reason for following this method rather than putting in a sum by way of direct grant to enable this institution to organize. It must have money wherewith to organize, and we must create a kind of security which will be readily marketable at the best rate of interest in order that this scheme may function.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like the minister to explain which has the preference under this scheme—the government for the repayment of its $5,000,000, or the bondholders? If the government has preference then I can appreciate the point as to interest. If the bondholders, on the other hand, have the preference, the point is not well taken.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will carefully read clause 5, I think that point will clear itself. At the top of page 3 it is provided that:

> Repayment of the amounts so provided—

That is, the initial capital provided by the government.

> —shall be made from time to time out of the earnings of the board; provided, however, that before any such proposed repayment is made the reserve fund of the board provided for by section 9 of this act, shall be at least equal to the total repayments including the repayment then proposed to be made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does my hon. friend say that means? Suppose he puts it in his own colloquial western language, what does it mean?

[Mr. Bury.]

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot improve on the language as it is written.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then my hon. friend does not understand it. I have asked a plain, straight question, and I want to know what the answer is. Which is the premier security? This is something which is vital to the foundation of the whole thing. Which is the premier security, the claim of the government, or the claim of the bondholders?

Mr. DUNNING: The bondholders, undoubtedly. My hon. friend knows that as well as I do.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now we have the answer. If the bondholder has the prior claim, it is then a matter of total indifference to the bondholder whether interest is charged for these three years or not, because he is prior not only to the government in connection with interest but also in connection with capital. That being so the answer given by the minister is no answer at all. Surely the minister sees that if the bond owners come to the government not only for interest but also for capital, their security is not a bit improved because they are given three years' interest. Their security is absolute as against interest for all time, and against the capital as well.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest that that point, Sir Henry, is well taken.

Mr. DUNNING: What are you going to do about it?

Mr. CAHAN: That is what I am asking you. As the representative of the government I ask: What are you going to do about it? I am trying to discuss the matter in a serious way, because it is not quite satisfactory to force this through by a majority.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry if my hon. friend misunderstood me. I did not mean to imply what he suggests. What I meant was this: What suggestion would he offer to take the place of this provision and to deal with the problem of starting the institution off?

Mr. CAHAN: So far as the "starting" is concerned I suggest that the government is able now to estimate, within a few thousand dollars at least, the cost of starting this board. That expense should be treated as an initial expense to be repaid by the board ultimately out of earnings. This initial expenditure may be repaid over a term of years if you like, but it is part of the actual cost of these loans made to the individual farmers and should be taken care of by a specific appropriation, not by non-payment of interest for the term of three years. Further—and I may as well discuss the point now, because it comes up under this provision—the bonds outstanding are the primary security. They are secured, as I understand, in the first place by the capital provided, to the extent of $5,000,000, by the government, plus five per cent of the loans outstanding provided by the province, plus five per cent of the loans outstanding provided by the individual borrowers.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Plus something else.

Mr. CAHAN: What else?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The security of the land itself.

Mr. CAHAN: The security of the land itself is very little.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: I will deal with that in a moment. I am considering the matter in the light of the experience of loan companies and others in the northwest, particularly in view of certain provisions which prevail there with respect to prior liens for mortgages. Now the government should have security with respect to the advances which it makes —first, the $5,000,000; secondly, the five per cent of all loans actually made. With respect to that the government has only the security of the amount of the mortgages outstanding. Under the provisions of this bill the government has no prior charge in respect of its mortgage. We all know by report—I do not profess to be an expert upon the municipal or provincial legislation of either Saskatchewan or Alberta—that in those provinces respectively there are prior liens which come before any mortgage, whether it is a mortgage to this board, to a loan company, or to an individual. I have seen it stated that cases have arisen—and I have prepared a number which I believe to be actual cases —in respect of loans in Alberta. Take the first case. It was originally a loan of $700 to a farmer. The farmer was unable to pay the interest, and principal of the loan plus interest amounted to $808. When it came to foreclosing it was found that on that farm there were $1,330 of prior charges in the way of municipal taxes, provincial taxes, mechanics' liens, and so on, and when the property came to be sold the company that had made the loan had to pay those prior charges before being able to recover one cent of its original principal of $700, or one cent of its accrued interest of $108.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, I think it would facilitate discussion if he would hold that material until we are discussing the clause relevant to it, which is No. 7. That clause bears directly on what my hon. friend is now discussing.

Mr. CAHAN: Then I will reserve my remarks. But it illustrates the point I wish to make that under this legislation bonds come first. The bonds have behind them the original advance up to $5,000,000 from the Dominion treasury, plus five per cent of all loans outstanding subscribed by the government by way of stock, plus five per cent of the loans outstanding provided by the province, plus five per cent withheld from the original mortgagee. So to that extent they are better secured than the government in respect of advances. Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh when I suggest that the government has practically no security but that which the original mortgage gives.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not laugh.

Mr. CAHAN: I thought the hon. gentleman was rather amused at my suggestion.

Mr. DUNNING: I was rather amused at something else at the time my hon. friend was making the suggestion, but I certainly was not amused at that.

Mr. CAHAN: Then we understand each other.

Mr. DUNNING: No, I do not think so.

Mr. CAHAN: I was going on to show that the farmer's security in a case where foreclosure came under the laws of Alberta was of very little value, in view of the presence of these prior liens and charges which exist under the law of that province. I will not go further at the present time than merely to state that some provision should be made to give real security to this government with respect to these prior liens and charges which are a first charge and which eat up, in many cases, the entire principal of the first loan. I will discuss the other point when we come to the proper section.

Mr. NEILL: There seem to be two lines of argument with respect to this matter. As to the one I entirely agree with the minister that it is highly desirable there should be the very strongest conviction in the minds of purchasers that these bonds are good. Otherwise, of course, the whole principle of the bill will be nullified because in that case people will only pay such prices as will make the money too dear. I claim that it would be much better that these bonds should be guaranteed outright by the government of Canada. That is a thing which would be understood by the humblest or least intelligent of our citizens. They would know then what they were doing. But when you tell them they are going to be guaranteed by the board, which gets its money without interest charges for a period of three years, it does not add to the security except in a very temporary way, because at the end of the three years the full liability will have to be taken up again, and it will not afford a permanent security such as a government guarantee would give. The other point of view that the minister advances it that it is necessary to provide for organization expenses, to give the board a start. The minister himself suggested a better way, namely by paying a fixed sum to begin with. I believe that the method in the bill will be almost an evil, because for the first three years of their existence the board will be wallowing in money. They will have the interest coming in and nothing going out, and it will be calculated to mislead them and to give them what is known in more common circles as a swelled head. They will begin to think they have more money than they really have, and may indulge in a course of dealing not altogether warranted.

I do not generally carry five million dollars about my person, but if anyone would give me a present of three-quarters of a million, I would undertake to finance this scheme at an agreed on rate of interest. Certainly any loan company would do so, and of course we recognize all the responsibility and inevitable trouble that arise when a government embarks on any scheme to lend money. The suggestion is made, what is the remedy? I would suggest an obvious remedy, either to give a direct vote for organization expenses and have no interest exemption, or cut down the interest exemption from three years to two years. Just look at the proportion of the thing. Here we have an expenditure of $5,000,000, and it is suggested that it will take three-quarters of a million for organization expenses. That does not seem a reasonable proportion for such a scheme. That would be equivalent to spending $750 in organizing an investment of a similar character of $5,000. I would suggest that it would suffice if we cut it down to an exemption of half a million. That would take care of the organization expenses on a most ample scale and would do away with some of the other objections which have been raised.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I agree in principle with a great deal of what my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni has said. There are really no organization expenses in the ordinary sense of the term at all. Organization generally has to do with the expense of selling stock and the like, and the expense of carrying your monetary overhead before you get under way. In this case you have no trouble about selling the stock or lending your money, and no loss in connection with the monetary overhead, because the money will be used when it is necessary. But that is not the real reason. The minister gave the real reason when he said, "We want the value of these bonds to be certain. We want people to know they are buying a good thing". I am paraphrasing what he said. And he said further, "We are giving three years' exemption from interest". But that whole object and argument goes when the minister tells me frankly something which he never could have considered when he inserted that provision, namely, that as he understands it now the bondholders are to come before the whole of the five million.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course they are.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that they are ahead of the interest for all time. Therefore there is no possible object, according to his explanation, in giving an exemption. There is nothing like putting the matter plainly. Why not insert a clause in this bill saying that the status of the bondholders is ahead of the government and takes priority of the government not only for three years, but in respect to the whole of the capital and interest as well? In that case we would have a security unquestionably good so far as the bondholder is concerned. The cost is met, I think, without any very, very great expense to the treasury.

Mr. CAHAN: Why should we not go further than that and make a plain guarantee of the bond? You might as well agree first as last that no government now existing, and no government which may exist in the future, dare allow those bonds to go by default, no matter what the loss may be. The parliament of this country constitutes the board. The government undertake to make advances, and further than that, they provide, as part of this legislation, that these bonds shall be proper investments for trust funds in every part of the Dominion. A government which undertakes to form that board under legislation passed by this House authorizing the investment of trust funds in that board, dare not afterwards allow the bonds to be repudiated. Under present conditions the bonds bear interest at 5 per cent. Under guarantee of this government those bonds bearing interest at 4½ per cent should sell at par. If your object is to give cheap money to western farmers—and I think there is a little too much said about cheap money to benefit the farmers—why not guarantee the bonds at 4½ per cent, or whatever may be the rate, so as to ensure that the bonds will be sold under the rate of interest guaranteed with respect to them in order that you may give a cheaper service to the western farmers? No government now in existence and no future government in Canada, so long as this board exists, no matter what failures they may have in the west, would dare allow these bonds to go by default in the hands of trustees, representing as they do investment of trust funds from one end of the country to the other. I think it is a camouflage throughout.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the minister expect the farmer to pay in the way of interest? I have read over the clauses of the bill and I would like to get the minister's idea. I may be a borrower.

Mr. DUNNING: You are going to another section of the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, this appertains to the whole bill.

Mr. DUNNING: Subsection 5 of section 7 of this bill reads:

> The interest rate on loans under this act shall be such a rate in excess of the interest rate yielded at the time of issue by the last series of farm loan bonds issued by the board as shall be sufficient, in the judgment of the board to provide for the expenses of operation and for the necessary reserves for losses, or if no such bonds have been issued, such a rate as in the judgment of the board will be yielded by the farm loan bonds when issued, increased by provision for expenses and reserves as aforesaid.

There will be discussion on that subsection which touches the point my right hon. friend refers to. I understand he wants my opinion as to the rate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: That is very difficult to answer, and I say so frankly. It will depend upon how secure investors feel with regard to this bond which we are now discussing. Referring to the experience of the governmental schemes at present in operation, I stated this afternoon that under the Saskatchewan scheme 6½ per cent was charged to the borrower in the form of interest. Under the Manitoba scheme I believe the rate was 6½ per cent in the form of interest, and one per cent or a little more for amortization. I think under this scheme they should be able to lend money at that rate. That is an opinion based upon existing conditions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It should be better than that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister was more or less frank in giving an estimate, but to say that it was difficult to do so is an evidence of cautiousness rather than of frankness.

Mr. DUNNING: I prefer to be cautious.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I notice that the contemplated rate of the bond will be five per cent. The minister may as well give up any hope of a lower rate if the bond is issued under the terms of this bill, because from what I know of the money market that would be a pretty low rate. The farmer has to pay enough over and above that to cover the expenses of the board. I do not think that will be very much, although I have not yet been informed as to who are to be the members of the board. I might make a pretty fair guess.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is under one misconception. There is nothing in the bill fixing the rate of interest on the bonds at 5 per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know there is not, but the minister knows that a bond issue of this character would not sell to-day at par at a rate under five per cent. He will do very well if he gets the bonds sold on a five per cent basis. I do not think he will get that, but I do not pretend to be sufficiently expert in financial matters to give an opinion worth very much. The farmer has to pay enough above that to keep the board going. What that will cost will depend somewhat on the personnel and the character of the business management. In the second place the farmer has to pay enough above that again to take care of losses of his fellow farmers, and if they are proportionate to losses occurring in Manitoba at present, what that will add to the rate over the five per cent the minister would be very cautious if he said he did not know. If they run as the losses in Manitoba are running to-day the additional rate would not be covered by three per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Three per cent in what form?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Over and above the five per cent. The rate of loss in Manitoba is very heavy, although of course there is a great question as to when you are going to count your loss. If you have the farm you may put it on your books at what it costs to cover the amount of the loan plus interest and costs.

Mr. FORKE: Does the right hon. member refer to the farm loan plan?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I am not referring to rural credits at all; I am referring to the farm loan plan, because I made careful inquiries in connection with it. There are losses enough to-day, although they may not appear on the books, that if the farmers were to be called upon to add to their rate of interest to make up those losses they would want to get out of that loan into another. Assuming, however, that this will be as good as that paragon of excellence, the minister's own plan in Saskatchewan—

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —a considerable amount will have to be added to the five per cent to take care of losses. In addition to that a reserve fund must be created equal to 25 per cent of the outstanding loans, and after that 25 per cent is reached, 10 per cent of all earnings are to go into that fund. The farmer has to pay enough over and above the 5 per cent to cover the cost of running the scheme and his share of the losses, and to take care of the reserve fund. I do not know what rate we have reached now, but I will guarantee to any contemplating borrower that we are certainly at 6½ per cent. But that is not going to be enough. This stock issue is going to carry a dividend. The borrower gets a share of stock, five per cent of what he borrows; the government gets a share, five per cent also. The government subscribes to five per cent of the whole outstanding amount lent; the provinces also subscribe to five per cent of the whole outstanding amount lent, and all this is going to bear a dividend. Indeed it is going to bear so much dividend that the government contemplate under the last subclause of section 9 that the accumulated dividends on the farmer's stock will in time discharge the whole loan.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Read the last subclause. I like to indulge in these visions myself. The minister puts this in the bill to provide that after the accumulated dividends on the shares of stock that the farmer has, pay off the whole loan, the farmer has to give up the stock. The farmer will be quite ready to do that.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend knows that is not a fair interpretation of subclause 4 of clause 9.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what it says. Perhaps the minister will give another interpretation when he gets to it.

Mr. DUNNING: It would facilitate matters if we could discuss each clause by itself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The whole bill is tied up together; you cannot completely separate the clauses for the purpose of discussing a bill of this sort. The minister says that the farmer's rate has to cover, first, the 5 per cent estimated interest which the bond will bear; second, the cost of management; third, the losses; fourth, the reserve fund and, fifth, some profit on the stock. Is that not right?

Mr. DUNNING: I would prefer to state it in my own words.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why would the minister prefer any other words than those?

Mr. DUNNING: Because they are not fair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what is wrong with them. I have not reached the end yet, because the minister contemplates that he is going to get that $5,000,000 back. That has to come after the five charges that I have already recited. What is going to be the rate of interest that will take care of all those responsibilities?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend asked for my opinion. I wonder if he would be equally frank and, having recited all that tremendous load, tell us what rate of interest should in his opinion be charged.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be so high that I would not like to be the author of the charge.

Mr. LUCAS: What are the minister's objections, if any, to the government's guaranteeing these contingent liabilities?

Mr. DUNNING: This business of adopting another minister's bill and endeavouring to give all the explanations which he would give who has been studying it so long is not easy. But everybody has been treating me so fairly in the matter that I will endeavour to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Camrose as to why it would not be better to have the government guarantee the bonds. In the first place this is a scheme whereby the provinces desiring to co-operate are asked to assume a measure of responsibility, and if there were a Dominion government guarantee there would not and could not be any provincial responsibility. Another point is that even we in Canada can learn something from the experiences of other countries which have been experimenting in this regard, and from them we learn that it is possible by government assistance in the initial stages to set up a form of security and a system of long term farm loans which will function without being a contingent liability so far as the government is concerned in connection with bonds with no written government guarantee. The United States farm loan scheme has often been referred to; it was referred to by my right hon. friend in a very capable speech on this subject not so long ago, and it was also referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). What are the conditions in that country with regard to security? The federal government put up $750,000 of stock in each federal land bank and the federal government gets no interest on that $750,000. It remains for all time a stock held without interest in that federal farm loan bank under the United States system.

Mr. LUCAS: By that method they have given a very low rate of interest to the farmers.

Mr. DUNNING: No; the reason the low rate of interest is given to the farmers is that they have made their bonds exempt from taxation, and when a low interest return on bonds is effected it can be passed along to the farmer. Speaking as a farmer, however, I do not believe that the agricultural community generally desire to have cheap credit based on tax-exempt securities; nor do I think that this would be sound. The reason for the cheapness of money under the American farm loan system is the fact that the bonds are exempt from taxation.

With respect to the edifice which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has erected, of charges that have to be met out of interest, it is of course apparent to everyone that all the charges incident to the conduct of a loan mortgage business must be met by that business.

Mr. CAHAN: Except one—taxation of income.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, there is that one; and there would be some advantage in that regard. The experience of existing organizations gives us some guide in this matter, and while I do not want to harp on the Saskatchewan scheme it is only natural that I should refer to it rather frequently inasmuch as I am the father of it. Now, no one can have any final information regarding losses on foreclosures in a mortgage institution which is continuously operating, for the reason that there is always a land account which is being gradually liquidated. The proportion of losses in connection with liquidations is being ascertained from time to time and it is possible to assess the final loss in that direction only by taking cognizaance of the sales against the land account. Let me briefly state the experience of Saskatchewan in the matter of interest. The province has charged the board the cost of the money including everything, and, to arrive at something steady over a period of years, the rate of 5½ per cent as between the treasury and the board was set as the initial charge. As to the adequacy of this scheme over a period of eight years, I may say that there has been a variation of only a few thousand dollars as between the cost to the treasury of the money, including all costs, and the aggregate of 5⅓ per cent charged the board. So that the original estimate is approximately correct.

The board charges 6½ per cent, and the records show that at that rate it is possible to make an earning. Of course it is only a book earning because in the agri-

9 p.m. cultural loan business you have always got your money out in the form of assets. That brings me naturally to the point raised by my right hon. friend, which is of the greatest importance in connection with this class of business—losses due to foreclosures which are afterwards disposed of at less than the amount the institution has invested. That, of course, is the problem. I submit that it is not fair to imply, as my right hon. friend did, that all lands taken over under foreclosure represent losses. They do not in practice. In the experience of loan companies there is only an inconsiderable loss, while in the case of the farm loan boards losses are rarely sustained. And these losses do not represent the total amount advanced in the first place. Moreover, loan companies have been known to sell farms, after carrying them for a few years, at more than there was against them at the time of foreclosure. Western Canada is improving very materially just now in this regard, an agricultural mortgage man having told me within the last few weeks that they were able satisfactorily to reduce their outstanding land accounts. The fact is that they are now able to make sales at better prices than formerly, and are thus reducing their land outstandings.

These things are of course all matters of effective administration. Any scheme depends for its success on the character of its management. You may have on paper what appears to be a beautiful scheme, and one that will work like a charm, but which in the hands of an incapable man will go to pieces. On the other hand, you may have a scheme which, while it does not look particularly strong on paper, can in the hands of the right man and under a sound administration be made to work satisfactorily. We have before us now the experience of the United States in connection with their federal farm loan scheme; we have the experience of the European countries which, of course, is not quite so applicable to our conditions; we have the experience of the Manitoba farm loan association, which is the closest approach in Canada to this particular proposal; and we have the experience of the Saskatchewan board. I believe that Ontario also has had some experience in this matter. The Superintendent of Insurance, who has given a good deal of study to the subject, has the available experience of the loan companies in Canada in relation to this particular class of work, and with all this experience to guide us I personally believe that the scheme here proposed will function successfully, under proper management and under reasonably normal conditions, at the 6½ per cent rate. I know that this rate will not suit my hon. friends to my right. They want, no doubt, a lower interest. Well, they may get it, but judging from the experience I have had I am rather doubtful of their being able to get a rate below 6½ per cent. If a lower rate can be obtained, and if the scheme can work satisfactorily on that basis, I shall welcome it. But it seems to me that it would be worse for the farming industry to obtain money too cheap if this will mean that the scheme will run behind. It would be better to pay a fair rate of interest to enable the scheme to function as the law intends it to, continuing to spread its advantages throughout the agricultural areas of Canada for a period of years, rather than, for the sake of a lower interest, to have its success impaired.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Paragraph (b) of subsection 2 of section 5 provides that each province in which loans are made shall be required to subscribe for the capital stock from time to time, as loans are made under the act. I take it that the minister realizes that this parliament has no power to compel any province to become a party to this scheme. This being the case, the section to which I refer will render the whole scheme inoperative, for I do not believe that it will be possible to get any provincial government in Canada to participate in an undertaking of this kind administered wholly by the federal government. If the minister will read certain provisions in the bill he will find that the administration rests exclusively in the hands of the federal government.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend will wait till we come to those clauses before he discusses them.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There are certain provisions whereby the provinces will apparently have some say in the administration, but it will be found in the final analysis that the thing will be managed by the federal government. In Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and, to some extent, in Alberta—I do not know about the eastern provinces—provincial loan schemes are already in existence. We know that this is the case in Ontario, and according to what we have heard to-day Saskatchewan has a perfect scheme.

Mr. DUNNING: No one claims that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In Manitoba there is a dual scheme providing for both long and short terms and in Alberta there is a short term scheme. We are now providing that this scheme shall become operative only when the provincial governments come in, but I do not think that the provinces will join under such conditions. I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan). If the government intend to make this scheme operative they should set out in the act, what they are going to do in reality; that is, guarantee the bonds. They will get cheaper money without a doubt, and as my hon. friend pointed out they are virtually guaranteeing these bonds; they dare not do otherwise. Why not start out right and eliminate these provisions, which can do nothing else than weaken the effect of the act?

Mr. HANSON: Has the minister any assurance that any of the provincial governments will come under this scheme? in the province of New Brunswick, for instance, we have a farm settlement board which lends money to accredited farmers on approved security, holding title to the land until the loan is fully paid. I doubt very much whether New Brunswick will have anything to do with this scheme. Have the provinces been aproached in any way?

Mr. DUNNING: If the minister were here he could probably tell of his conversations with various provincial treasurers regarding this matter; I could not say with certainty that any provinces will come under it. I can say, however, that there is an advantage in the scheme even to those provinces which now have similar schemes of their own. The great difficulty with provincial farm loan schemes is generally that the credit of the province, engaged as it is with a great many other undertakings, particularly when these undertakings have to do with public utilities under government ownership and things of that sort, cannot be extended very far in this direction. When a province puts $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 into this form of activity along with all its other activities, naturally there is a disposition to go very slowly, and properly so. But by the pooling of mortgage credit under this scheme it is possible to widen the area. I would say to my hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) that a highly centralized scheme such as he suggests, without the benefits of provincial associations such as this bill provides, would not, I fear, work in Canada; it would not be sufficiently flexible to provide adequately for the widely varying conditions in this country. Now I am wandering off myself into another matter. I will deal with that when the proper section comes along, and if my hon. friend will watch for section 8, which has to do with the provincial relationship, it will be more in order to discuss the matter then.

Mr. BOYS: Does the minister think there is any chance of the province of Ontario coming into this scheme? I say without hesitation that there is no such chance, because at present Ontario, through the Agricultural Development Board, is lending money to the farmers upon first mortgages to 50 per cent of the value, at the rate of 5 per cent. If they have to pay 6½ per cent under this scheme there is not the slightest chance of Ontario compelling farmers to pay that rate when the province is now lending money at 5 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is giving some information now. He has made a statement which in his own mind, I am sure, offsets the pyramid his leader set up a moment ago. How is it possible for this provincial board in Ontario to meet that terrific array of charges set up by the leader of the opposition, and at the same time lend money at 5 per cent? How is it done?

Mr. BOYS: In the first place the government get their money at about 4 per cent or less, and operate at a cost of 1 per cent.

Mr. HANSON: They have a government savings bank.

Mr. DUNNING: Then they lend money received by the provincial savings bank on long term first mortgages?

Mr. BOYS: I am not saying where they get their money; they may get it from the sale of bonds—

Mr. DUNNING: They do not get 4 per cent money from the sale of bonds.

Mr. BOYS: I do not think Ontario pays more than 4 or 4¼ per cent. That may not be the exact figure, but it is not very much more. I know I am correct in the rate of interest; it was reduced a year ago from 6 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The provincial government must be contributing something towards the cost of administration and the losses, to be able to lend money at that rate. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) could, I feel sure, give us some information about it, but the scheme certainly cannot be self-sustaining at that rate of interest; it is quite impossible.

Mr. BOYS: I do not want the minister to think I am criticizing the plan; I have already expressed myself as favourable to it, but I am pointing out that there is not the slightest chance of Ontario taking advantage of this scheme in view of what they are doing at present.

Mr. HANSON: And the same would be true in the Maritime provinces. In New Brunswick the government assumes the entire cost of management, but I am glad to say they do not do a large business. They keep it down as much as they can, but the funds are available upon proper application, and money can be obtained for 5 per cent. So I am sure there is no demand in New Brunswick for this class of legislation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Are the provisions of the New Brunswick act wide enough to include fishermen?

Mr. HANSON: No, I do not think they are.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do not want to prolong the discussion, but surely it cannot be suggested that the only means by which you can get local administration or an administrative body in touch with the local situation in order to administer this act is to have the provinces come under this scheme. The central board or the federal government can provide a provincial organization just as effective as can be obtained under this measure. Under this bill I submit that there is not the slightest chance of getting the various provincial governments, with their different political complexions to come in under the scheme. We might as well face the issue squarely; these governments will not pool their interests and make themselves responsible for the lending of money which, in the final analysis, comes directly under a federal administrative body. That is the point, and if the scheme is to be made effective we might as well strip it altogether of these encumbrances and establish a federal loan scheme for which parliament and the federal government are responsible, free altogether from provincial entanglements. If this proposal is to be made effective that is the only way it can be done. I am absolutely certain, and I believe the minister will agree with me, that if we wait until we get a plan by which the provinces will co-operate with the federal government in a scheme of this character, we will wait until doomsday.

Mr. CAHAN: I think the hon. member for East Algoma quite misunderstands the minister. If I followed his argument and made a proper deduction from it, he said that in Saskatchewan they have a really well administered board and loan fund of a similar character to that proposed in this bill. But unfortunately Saskatchewan, the minister suggests, has undertaken such large provincial obligations—

Mr. DUNNING: No, I did not say that, and I did not imply it.

Mr. CAHAN: I think it is a fair inference that the obligations were so great that you could not expect the government to extend that scheme.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. CAHAN: I am very sorry if I took the wrong inference. I take the hon. gentleman's word implicitly, but that impression was left in my mind.

Mr. DUNNING: I said all the provinces of Canada; I was drawing no invidious comparisons. I may say; however, that in financial stature the province of Saskatchewan compares favourably with any other province.

Mr. CAHAN: We may as well get rid of the camouflage; nowhere east of lake Superior is there any demand for this scheme, and no eastern province has the slightest desire or intention of entering into it. We are dealing with a scheme for the benefit of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta; there is no use camouflaging it under any other words or descriptions. Now, will Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, each with what is claimed to be a well administered scheme, each having reached the extent of their credit in regard to making farm loans of this nature—will they be enabled to unload their schemes upon the federal government by associating with the federal government in the operation of this fund now contemplated?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. DUNNING: Definitely, no.

Mr. CAHAN: Will Mr. A, a farmer in a district of Saskatchewan who has a loan from the Saskatchewan board, be authorized to pay off that loan and take another similar loan under this scheme as provided in this bill?

Mr. DUNNING: If he could get away with it there is nothing in the bill to prevent him, so far as I know.

Mr. CAHAN: The banks, I believe, are quite favourable to this rural credits bill, and I am always suspicious when I find financial bodies so favourable. To what extent will they be able to unload the liabilities due to them by the farmers of the west by having those who are liable to them for advances come in under this scheme, and out of the proceeds of loans made to them by this board proceed to liquidate their liabilities to the banks? Is there some limit? If not, then just so soon as Manitoba or Alberta or Saskatchewan finds that its credit is limited, finds that it wishes additional credit in the markets of the world, just so soon, by putting moral or legal pressure upon its clientele, will it force them to liquidate their loans to the provincial government by accepting new loans under the federal government scheme. That is the position. In view of the fact that these long term loan boards in the three provinces of the central west are doing so well, would it not be far better for the Dominion as a whole that this government should make appropriations where necessary to assist the provincial boards in carrying out the work they now have in hand? If the hon. gentleman suggests that the credit of these bonds is to be greater because they are stretched over farm lands in all the provinces, the idea is bound to be an abortive one. There will be no loans east of lake Superior under this scheme, and if the Dominion government by its guarantee of these bonds, and by the provisions in the bill which admit of this board taking over the liabilities of the provincial boards—

Mr. DUNNING: It does not provide that.

Mr. CAHAN: But there is no obstacle. It entirely rests with the nominees of the government appointed to this board to say to what extent they shall take over the liabilities of these provincial boards.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to mislead the committee. I would like to know where in this bill he finds anything which will permit this federal loan board or any advisory board in the province to lend any sum under this scheme for any other purpose than a farm loan.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly, for a farm loan. I am dealing with farm loans and nothing else.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. gentleman is dealing with farm credit associations in the provinces.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with farm loans and with existing loans on farm property in the provinces I have mentioned, in the central west. I say there is nothing in this bill which prevents the boards formed under it from taking over those liabilities, and nothing which prevents the provincial authorities, by moral suasion or otherwise, from forcing those who have loans from the provincial boards to liquidate their loans to them by taking out new loans under the Dominion board. Therefore I think that so far as the Dominion is concerned it would be better either to guarantee the loans outright or make them direct from the treasury of the country at the lowest rate of interest consistent with the standard rate which the government pays upon the loans which the government places upon the markets of the world. If you are going to make these loans, make them direct; let the government use their own officers to do it, and let them restrict the advances to loans in those provinces in such a way as to prevent the banks which have liens on farm lands and liabilities owing by farmers of the west from having these liabilities unloaded upon the Dominion government board—

Mr. GARDINER: Will the hon. gentleman tell this House where banks can take a lien on farm lands?

Mr. CAHAN: The farmers of the three provinces of the central west at the present day owe millions of dollars to the banks, and there is nothing in this bill to prevent a farmer securing a loan from the Dominion board and using the proceeds to pay off his liabilities to the bank.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. gentleman stated that the banks had liens on farm lands. Will he say how a bank can take a lien on farm lands?

Mr. CAHAN: It does that the moment it obtains a judgment against the property and registers that judgment, and there are judgments rendered in the west to my knowledge running into hundreds of thousands of dollars. I have no doubt they run into a very much larger sum than that.

Mr. STEVENS: I regret I did not have the privilege of being in the House all the afternoon and listening to the discussion. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that we are on clause 5, and I shall try to confine my remarks to that clause, although I notice that a good deal of the discussion has been on clause 7. I shall have a few words to say on that when we come to it. In clause 5 we are dealing with the question of capital stock and the manner of financing. I wish to say most emphatically, and I do it with considerable deference to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, because I know his knowledge of these matters is very great, that from my study of this question, which has extended over a number of years recently and has been of a more or less intimate character, having been on different committees during the last five years, my firm conviction is that it would be far better for Canada, if it is to have a rural credit scheme, that it should be based on the principle set forth in this bill, than that it should be of the character of direct Dominion government administration, with loans direct from the Dominion treasury itself.

Mr. CAHAN: Is not this Dominion government administration?

Mr. STEVENS: In a sense, yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it not in every sense?

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid my hon. friend mistakes the spirit of my observations. I am not offering these remarks in a controversial spirit at all. I think there is a great distinction between the raising of capital by non-guaranteed bonds, bonds not guaranteed by the government at all—raising capital for instance, upon an issue of bonds by what might be termed land banks—and the lending of money direct by the Dominion government, or the lending of money based upon bonds guaranteed by the Dominion government and administered by officers of the crown.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman evidently did not hear the prior discussion. Does he think that any Dominion government, this or any succeeding government, could afford to allow one single bond to be defaulted in view of the fact that by this legislation we have created a fund assisted by advances from the government and made the bonds themselves investments for trust funds from one end of this country to the other?

Mr. STEVENS: I appreciate the question fully; it has been most intimately discussed by different committees in several preceding years. Should such a contingency arise in the future I do not think the Dominion government would allow bonds of these banks to go into default. I think parliament would be compelled to do something as a matter of national honour. But I want to point out to my hon. friend that the experience of the countries that have taken up this form of financing, the issuing of land bank bonds, has been that the bonds themselves have become the soundest class of security, a class of security equal to that of the national bonds. I believe this but I make one qualification, namely, proper administration.

Mr. DUNNING: Absolutely.

Mr. STEVENS: I believe that these bonds, if properly administered, will prove to be equal to Canadian or provincial bonds in the market; I have not any doubt of it.

Now then we come to this question, "properly administered." There may be some ground for criticism of the plan—I am not criticizing it; perhaps it is as good as we can get—but I will say that I believe the plan suggested in this bill, so far as proper and economical administration is concerned, is better than any scheme I know of that could be erected within a government department, as government departments from our knowledge have been administered in the past. In making that statement I am not reflecting on the governmental system, but this is what we find in experience—we must admit it, I think—that when a department of government undertakes the administration of a business matter, a matter that is commercial —shall I say?—in its character, there is a tendency to allow the political element to obtrude itself unduly and to influence it.

Mr. CAHAN: Shall we escape it in this case?

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps not altogether, but I say it will be less in this case. I will put it that way and I think I am moderate in doing so. There is less likelihood of political interference under this method than under departmental administration. Or let me put it in another way: Under departmental administration you are almost certain to have political interference, but under this method I believe you will largely escape it. We are passing through an experience just now. That experience is the administration of a national railway. It is a tremendously big thing but I will say this of the National railways and I only inject this, Mr. Chairman, by way of illustration.

Mr. CAHAN: I suppose my hon. friend does not want to provoke discussion?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not want to provoke discussion, but I say this: because of their magnitude, it will take a number of years to demonstrate fully what will happen in respect to the National railways, but I do think there has been a great deal accomplished in the way of eliminating political interference in the administration of a public utility under the method which was formulated by this parliament for the operation of the National railways. I do not say we have escaped it altogether, but I think we have made a big stride—shall I say?—towards the elimination of the political element in railway administration. That is the reason I am very strongly of the opinion that this method suggested by the government is perhaps the best method we can get.

Now let me say one word, perhaps not so directly on the clause and yet in support of this argument, and it is this: I believe we have need of this legislation. I think we must get that thought into our mind. I am not so sceptical as some who have spoken as to Ontario and Quebec, and the larger provinces of the east, not participating. I will venture this prediction—it may be rather a reckless thing to do but I will venture it in any case—that when this scheme is inaugurated, is operating, and is proving itself successful, we will say in the western provinces, the people in other provinces will be anxious to take advantage of it.

I am not going to transgress to the extent of discussing clause 7, but I should like to say a word on that clause when we come to it.

Mr. DUNNING: All right.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to emphasize my conviction that there is a great need for a land bank scheme, using that term to express perhaps what would take a lot of words to express. There is a need of it.

Mr. CAHAN: There is a great difference between this scheme and the land bank system.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not think so. I think there is a very striking similarity.

Mr. DUNNING: Very striking.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not say for a moment that this is identical with every land bank scheme I have seen, but I do see a striking similarity, and I think it justifies using that description of it. I again state that I would be inclined to support this scheme much more readily than a scheme of direct governmental loans. Had the minister introduced such a scheme he would have found rather a harsh critic in myself.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to say one or two words about this scheme, particularly in answer to some of the statements made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. He seems to think—

Mr. DUNNING: Stick to clause 5 from now on.

Mr. COOTE: I have no remarks to make upon clause 5. If we are restricted to clause 5 I will certainly sit down.

Mr. DUNNING: I think we ought to pass clause 5.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us see if we understand clause 5. After all it is a good thing to get an understanding of just exactly what we mean. We are now approaching the question of floating a concern, getting its capital and getting it running. We put up $5,000,000. I have been glancing over the bill since I had a chat with my hon. friend the minister. What is intended under the bill is that that $5,000,000 shall, in the first instance, form a fund from which loans can be made.

Mr. DUNNING: An initial reservoir.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that you have not only 100 per cent of your bonds as security but a reserve of $5,000,000. Now let us go a step further. Not only have you got your mortgages and your reserves but you also have your stock subscriptions. Supposing we start out that way, how are we going to get this money? I should think there must be two and a half million dollars' worth of loans drawn from the government $5,000,000 before one would think of starting a bond issue.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister says "no" but I would have thought so.

Mr. DUNNING: In Saskatchewan continuous sale has been very successful indeed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But you would not want to start your continuous sale before you knew you could sell your bonds, or before you had sold a fair amount.

Mr. DUNNING: About a million.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us put it at two and a half millions.

Mr. DUNNING: By way of illustration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In that case the borrowers would have two and a half million dollars' worth of loans and security to the amount of $5,000,000 from the Dominion government, in addition to the amount of stock subscribed. Am I right in that

Mr. DUNNING: Not quite.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Wherein am I wrong?

Mr. DUNNING: They would not have $5,000,000 of security advanced by the Dominion government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is perfectly true. But the $5,000,000 is the maximum amount which could be drawn upon and which could be the ultimate security. They would know it was.

Mr. DUNNING: We are understanding each other much better now.

Section agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Conditions for loans.

Mr. STEVENS: Referring to some observations made a moment ago, I noticed in paragraph (d) of subsection 2 a clause which I think is quite properly there, but I should like to suggest to the minister that he might safeguard it a little. The paragraph reads:

To discharge liabilities already accumulated.

That means that the proceeds of the loan may be used for the discharge of liabilities which the borrower has already accumulated. It was suggested a moment ago that this might be abused by concerns or provincial governments inducing persons who are indebted to them to secure a loan under this scheme, and thus reimburse them. I think the paragraph is sound, in so far as it is directed to this purpose—for instance, take a farmer in the west who has incurred a debt for machinery or stock, or to the bank, upon which indebtedness he is paying 8, 9 and in some cases as high as 10 per cent. One of the things that prompted me to support strongly a rural credit scheme was the fact that a large number of farmers are paying such rates of interest, and that of all classes of business, agriculture is one class which cannot subsist and pay such rates. In a speculative form of business, where a man is trading and has a rapid turnover, he can pay a high rate of interest. Certain classes of commercial business, even fairly stabilized, can pay perhaps 8 or 9 per cent at times—

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Not very often.

Mr. STEVENS: —for certain advantages in buying, but an agriculturist who pays a higher rate of interest than 6 per cent—I am speaking of interest, not amortizing—is fighting against an economic law which sooner or later will ruin him. As I understand this scheme, it is directed to supply interest, with an amortizing fund, over a period of about thirty years, I think at a rate of interest of 6½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Thirty-two years is the maximum.

Mr. STEVENS: At 6½ per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: We do not know exactly.

Mr. STEVENS: I would say that that is fair; that is a rate that will not only be possible but will be attractive.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not wish to be understood as saying that 6½ per cent includes amortization.

Mr. STEVENS: I say interest and amortization fund.

Mr. DUNNING: Six and a half for the two?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not speaking of what is in the law. The rate is not in the law, and cannot be. But I do not believe we can get along with very much less than 6½ per cent for interest alone at first. Under present financial conditions it cannot be done.

Mr. STEVENS: The objective should be a maximum of 6 per cent for interest alone.

Mr. DUNNING: I should be glad to see it.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps after the first year, when the scheme commences to operate, my hon. friend will find that money can be secured at a rate that will provide 6 per cent and provide for an amortizing fund above that. I was going to say 7 per cent as a maximum.

Mr. DUNNING: Including amortization?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I would suggest to the minister that if paragraph (d) could be limited to such classes of liability as I have referred to, thus excluding, shall I say, a government or a municipality that may have a moribound scheme at some time—and I have no doubt there are some in existence—and prevent them unloading their patrons on to this scheme, I think it ought to be done. For instance, if a provincial scheme were charging a man 8 per cent or some high rate, I should say he is entitled to come under this scheme whether he has a provincial loan or not. But if under a bona fide provincial scheme he has a loan at a rate approximately the same as would apply here, I do not think we should open the door to the provinces unloading such a loan upon us. The object of the scheme is to relieve the pressure of undue debt at high rates of interest on the farmer, not to translate him from one sphere to another, but to relieve the pressure. If a formula can be found that would accomplish that object, I submit to the minister that it should be done.

Mr. DUNNING: I will endeavour to deal with what my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George has said relating to the same matter. Let us assume for a moment something which I have no right to assume particularly—that is that Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which already have such schemes, desire to come in under this proposition—I think it is quite manifest that they will not continue making loans under their existing provincial schemes. The provincial scheme will naturally continue to function with respect to the collection and administration of the sums already loaned—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Unless you take them over.

Mr. DUNNING: —yes, unless we take them over, and we are not contemplating taking over holus bolus under this scheme all the ten millions involved in each of the schemes of the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. That is definitely not contemplated. Let us bear in mind that it is very probable that the existing local administration of the present provincial schemes would become the provincial administration under this scheme, if the provinces decided to come in under it, because they have there all the machinery and the type of men necessary to carry on the work. That is very probable, but it is a matter of arrangement and in no way tied up. As to whether individual farmers could unload from the provincial scheme to this one, why would an individual farmer want to do so? For one of two reasons, I apprehend: The first would be that the rate of interest under this scheme was lower than the rate he is now paying under the provincial scheme, But there is no great likelihood of this scheme producing a sufficiently lower rate of interest than 6½ per cent to constitute a very great temptation to him to switch over. Neither is there any incentive to the provincial government to attempt to get rid of a borrower who is what we would call a good borrower under the provincial scheme. Bad borrowers could not qualify under this scheme because the amount they would require to clear off their existing loans would be in many cases too great for them to come under the provisions of this legislation. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) hit the nail on the head. This scheme like every other great business will depend upon sound, honest administration for its success. It cannot be a success if the men who administer it approach it from the point of view of facilitating the taking over of every bad loan in the country whether from a provincial scheme or from a loan company. Loan companies of course look after their own business; if they have a borower in deep water whom they are not very sure of as regards the future, they naturally try to encourage him to get a loan from the provincial farm loan scheme in order to pay them off. I do not blame them for that because they are looking at the matter from the point of view of the interest of their shareholders. That has to be guarded against in connection with any such scheme, but to put any limitation around it is a matter of great difficulty, as the hon. member for Vancouver indicated.

Unless this scheme is to provide for the liquidation of liabilities which the farmer now has it will not be worth very much to agriculture in this country. That liability may be to an existing mortgage company; it may be to one of those banks of which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is so suspicious; it may be to another loan company or another provincial mortgage scheme. It may be and probably will be to implement dealers, storekeepers and all sorts of people. The great benefit of this scheme to the farmer will be to remove from his shoulders a nine per cent or ten per cent loan and replace it with a six and one-half per cent loan, or some such figure amortized over a considerable period. That has been the advantage of similar schemes in Canada and elsewhere. The limitation suggested by my hon. friend will have to be worked out in practice as a matter of administration. If we attempt in this House to set bounds to the scheme I am afraid we are going to cramp it and probably deprive many deserving people of its benefits.

Mr. COOTE: The Dominion of Canada has a direct responsibility in connection with this matter of long-term, farm loans. I look upon it as a Dominion responsibility and not a provincial responsibility in any sense. It is because the Dominion government has neglected its responsibility for so many years that the provinces were forced to take action. As regards the contention of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George or his fear that the Dominion government scheme is to be loaded up with all the bad loans of Alberta, let me set his mind at rest as regards that province because Alberta has no provincial farm loan scheme and has no farmers' bad loans to unload on this system.

Mr. DUNNING: The loan companies have.

Mr. CAHAN: There are loans on farms.

Mr. COOTE: The government of the province of Alberta has no loans on farms. I challenge the hon. member to show where they have a loan on farm land. The hon. member said that the land which would be covered by these mortgages would not be worth much as security. If that statement is correct it is time that this government took notice of the fact. If the farming industry is in such a poor state that those lands are no security for the mortgages on them I do not know why we are encouraging immigration to that country. The Dominion government can put farming in western Canada on an unprofitable basis at any time because they control the three vital matters of transportation, tariff and immigration, and the Dominion government should take this responsibility if any government is going to do so.

As regards the fear which the hon. gentleman has that the banks will want to unload a large number of bad loans on this system, I do not think that is possible. Practically all the farms in western Canada of men who are in debt are mortgaged to mortgage companies. If a bank has a mortgage it is a second one and they cannot sell a second mortgage to the board that we are going to set up under this bill.

We have heard a great deal about losses made by the banks and loan companies in western Canada. In my opinion most of these losses were made because these concerns were managed from an office two thousand miles away. That is why it is advisable that the provincial governments should assume some responsibility in helping the Dominion government to carry out this long-term, loan scheme.

Just a word in connection with the Ontario government scheme which lends money to farmers at 5½ per cent. The success of any rural credit scheme depends upon the rate of interest which must be charged to the borrower. The volume of business which will be secured by this board is going to be largely determined by the rate of interest which they charge, and the larger the volume of business which they handle the lower proportionately will be the charge for management. That is a very important point which must not be overlooked. But to return to Ontario, the reason that in that province they are able to lend this money at 5½ per cent is, so I have been told, because they are securing the money through savings banks where they get the money at four per cent.

I have a suggestion to make to the minister who is in charge of the bill. He agrees with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that it is desirable that the rate charged including one per cent for amortization should not exceed 7 per cent. The Dominion government has post office savings banks in which at the present time something over $30,000,000 is on deposit at 3 per cent. The government might very well loan a part of this money to the farm loan board at 4 per cent. I do not think there would be any difficulty in getting 6 per cent money in that way. By lending money to the farmers at 6 per cent plus one per cent for amortization you have a 7 per cent rate to the farmers. I do not see why this could not be done by this government. They are securing this amount of about $30,000,000 at 3 per cent. It would not be costing this country anything if they would use at least a portion of that money in financing the farm loan board.

Mr. CHURCH: Under the rules the proper place to discuss the principle of a bill is on the second reading, but about three-quarters of this bill has been passed in committee and the members have been discussing the principle all afternoon and evening because you cannot discuss various clauses without discussing the principle as the principle of the bill is wrapped up in every clause. The second reading of this bill was carried without debate and I was surprised that not one gentleman on the second reading said one word either for or against the principle of the bill.

If there ever was a sample of high finance in Canada you have it in clauses 5, 6 and 7 of the bill. It is all very well for the Minister of Railways to support this measure. What does he or hon. gentlemen from Saskatchewan and Alberta care about who pays for this legislation? Saskatchewan contributes only one-eighth of one per cent to the net revenues of the country. Who is asking for clauses 5, 6 and 7? The farmers of Ontario do not want them. Who is asking for this bill? The other day I asked an hon. gentleman from the west who used to be in this House: Who is asking for this legislation? He said he did not know; he was not asking for it. Not by the wildest stretch of the imagination can this act be considered a work or undertaking for the general advantage of Canada, and if the minister will consult the Justice department I venture to say that he will be informed that this House has no power to pass the bill in its present form. There are 2,900,000 people in Ontario who will have to contribute to this scheme although they will not share in its benefits. They are not asking for it; they do not want it. Nor are people in other parts of the country making any demand for this legislation. This is class legislation of the worst kind which gives to the farmers of one province a benefit at the expense of the rest of the people. Those who will have to foot the bill are the artisans and the toilers in the various centres of population. The farmers do not want any reduction in the income tax which these people have to pay, because they pay no income tax; but they want the rest of the country to provide taxes for legislation to meet their demands for agricultural credits. The people of central Canada pay over 80 per cent of the taxation which is collected in Canada, and although they are not asking for this legislation they are going to have to make the payments which will be involved in it. The fact of the matter is that this bill is in line with some of the class of legislation which was passed by Ontario in the days of the Drury government. It is framed on the same principle—the principle, as someone has put it, of robbing Peter to pay Paul.

I protest strongly against the passing of the bill, in its present form at any rate, and I make that protest as a representative of a province which contributes 45 per cent of the taxes of the country. We cannot lend a cent of money to our returned soldiers, some 140,000 of whom have had to leave the country for the United States to find a living, but we can provide money for rural credits. The Minister of Railways is a new member, and it is all very well for him to get up and support the bill for Saskatchewan only; but I venture to say that the people generally will not be in favour of it. It is very fortunate that we have a second chamber and I have no doubt the bill will be taken good care of when it gets there.

Mr. BOYS: I feel it my duty to make a slight correction. In referring to the board in Ontario I said that the rate of interest was 5 per cent. I heard an hon. member say that it was 5½ per cent, and on reflection I recall that this figure is correct.

Mr. DUNNING: I want to congratulate the hon. member (Mr. Church) on being on the same platform as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), but in getting there he has been guilty of a strange inconsistency. The hon. member being such an out and out advocate of government ownership of everything, I am very much surprised that he should stop short at government ownership of credit. One would expect the hon. gentleman to be consistent in this instance. Let me refer very briefly to his implication that, in assuming temporary responsibility for the direction of this measure in the unavoidable absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), I am acting in some strangely selfish way on behalf of the province of Saskatchewan and without a due sense of obligation to the rest of the country. I assure my hon. friend that neither the government nor the legislature of Saskatchewan has asked for this scheme at any time. The people of that province have a scheme with which they are fairly well satisfied except for the fact that it has not lent enough money in the aggregate to take care of all demands. This scheme is intended as a bona fide attempt to carry out the wish of parliament, as expressed on former occasions after investigation by duly constituted committees, that such a system should be undertaken in the interests of agriculture in Canada generally, and not in any special section of it. The legislation was conceived in that spirit and in that spirit it has the support of a number of hon. gentlemen on the other side who have been giving to the subject, in its relation to the nation at large, their best attention during the past few years. As to whether the provinces will take it up or not, it is a matter of co-operation and we find ourselves in the same position as we have done in connection with many other schemes which have depended for their success upon the provinces and the Dominion working together. When we have something concrete to submit to the provinces they can decide whether or not it will suit their conditions, and whether or not they should take advantage of it. It was so in the matter of technical education; it was so in the matter of agricultural education; it was so in relation to certain public health measures that called for co-operation; it was so with respect to highways. Many hon. gentlemen from various provinces, my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre among them, gentlemen who have served on committees which in the past have investigated the subject, and who see the problem as it is, have all given to the matter very careful study; and many provincial legislatures have also discussed it. The situation as it exists from coast to coast is therefore fully realized. We shall have provided in this bill, if it passes, machinery for co-operation should the provinces require to avail themselves of it, as I believe they will. The measure is not intended solely for the west; it may be taken advantage of by the other provinces as well. I do not know how Ontario will regard it until the scheme is in operation, but I can assure the committee that it is not a method devised for taxing the whole of the country for the benefit of a particular section. It is a comprehensive scheme based on sound principles and one which has been found to work successfully in other countries.

Mr. CAHAN: I would point out to the minister that in dealing with a measure of this kind the fewer personal observations he makes the better it will be for the harmony of the discussion. I am quite as capable as the minister of making unpleasant remarks.

Mr. DUNNING: I really was not conscious of having said anything unpleasant about my hon. friend.

Mr. CAHAN: If the minister wishes to invite unpleasant and tart comments, my Scotch-Irish temper is equal to meeting the demand. I have not so far said anything that could be regarded as opposition to the measure, for I have not approached it in that spirit. Certainly I have not intended that any remarks of mine should be considered as having been offered for any other purpose than to elicit the actual facts, so that we might know on what the bill was founded and what grounds there were for its passage. On reading my remarks to-morrow in Hansard the minister will find that I have been within the scope of reasonable criticism.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not dispute that for a moment, and I am sorry if my hon. friend should have taken any other impression. I had no intention of being disrespectful, and if I have unwittingly offended him I am only too glad to apologize here and now.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister and I quite understand each other. I do not accept what he says as an apology, because no apology is necessary.

Mr. DUNNING: Thank you.

Mr. CAHAN: This section contains the following words:

> Mortgages taken as security for farm loans and remedies thereunder shall be in all respects subject to the law of the province in which the farm land mortgaged is situated.

I am informed, although I have no personal knowledge, that in Alberta particularly there are a large number of prior liens constituted under the legislation of that province, by virtue of which very considerable charges have priority in case of the foreclosure of a mortgage loan, and this clause in my opinion places it entirely within the discretion of a provincial legislation as to the extent to which they may thus oust the lien or mortgage created under this act.

A few moments before the House adjourned at six o'clock I was intending to cite a number of cases which, I believe, all refer to the province of Alberta, dealing with the prior liens or charges created by provincial legislation, and to which I suggest the lien or charge of this first mortgage should not be entirely subjected if this board is to have a really first class security which will be of value in case of realization of the mortgage. The first case was where the loan was $700; the interest in arrears amounted to $108. Upon foreclosure it was found that under the legislation then existing there were prior charges of $1,330. In the next case the loan was $1,100; the arrears of interest had run up, because time had been given, to $494, and yet it was found that there were other liens and charges created by the legislation of the province to the extent of $2,106 which were a prior charge upon this land. The third case was a loan of $800; the interest in arrears amounted to $130, yet when it came to foreclosure it was found that there had been created under the legislation of the province other liens and charges to the extent of $1,203. The fourth case was a loan of $1,000; the interest was long overdue and at the time of foreclosure amounted to $894. In that case the prior liens and charges amounted to $1,462. In the fifth case the loan amounted to $1,000 and the arrears of interest to $235; there were prior charges under the legislation of the province of $1,483. So I could go on and take the twelve typical cases, a number of which I have already mentioned. To avoid the repetition of each case and to save time, in these twelve typical cases—

Mr. DUNNING: Typical of what, may I ask?

Mr. CAHAN: Typical of loans made in Alberta and of the operation of the prior lien laws of that province in case of the foreclosure of the mortgages securing the loans. In these twelve cases the aggregate principal amounted to $11,600 while the interest came to $5,000, in round figures, yet the prior liens created under the legislation of that province amounted to $17,416. The mortgagee in order to save his security, had to pay in these cases the charges for taxes and other prior liens to the extent of $17,416, in order to save his original principal of $11,600. I will take these prior liens and charges in the aggregate. The Dominion seed and relief lien amounted to $9,507; miscellaneous taxes of various priorities amounted to $3,165; co-operative society liens, $2,285; hail insurance taxes, which were a prior lien on the property, $627. Even hospital fees under some legislation of that province have a priority. If a farmer or any member of his family is taken ill and goes to the hospital, under certain conditions the fees payable to the hospital are a prior lien upon the land of the householder, even though a first mortgage is outstanding. In these cases I find hospital fees were prior liens to the extent of $231. Then there were mechanics' liens outstanding which attached after the first mortgage charge had been properly registered; these amounted to $1,600. So in these twelve cases the $11,600 of principal originally loaned became, when the mortgages were realized, subject to prior liens of $17,416. It seems to me that this matter requires some attention.

I find that the Alberta Co-operative Act of April 1921 gave rise to the following case. The original mortgage was $1,200; then a caveat was placed by the International Harvester Company, and on that caveat being placed a prior lien was given the International Harvester Company, taking priority over the mortgage then outstanding, to the amount of $5,795. Then came a Dominon seed and relief lien which, with interest to March 1920, amounted to $1,149. Then there was a mechanics' lien, in this particular case of the Beaver Lumber Company, amounting to $284. There was a prior lien or charge owing the municipality for grain amounting to $600, and there was another lien created under the Co-operative Credit Act amounting to $2,044. All these liens had to be paid off by the mortgagee before he could secure the original mortgage charge of $1,200. That, of course, is undoubtedly an extreme case, and I have cited it because it is extreme and shows the possibilities of the situation. Now, what is the result? A mortgage of $1,000 is made under the bill which we have now before the House. In Alberta, under the laws which obtain there—and I mention Alberta simply because I am dealing with an Alberta case—other priorities may subsequently attach, with the result that the real value of the land may be offset entirely by the subsequently created prior charges, leaving a very slight security indeed to the board which, under this legislation has made the original loan. Now that is a matter that must be considered. In these three western provinces, because despite the remarks of my hon. friend as to the possibilities of this legislation being applied east of lake Superior, I still have my doubts as to that—in these three provinces of the middle west at whose demand, I understand, this legislation has been brought down by the government, why should their municpal taxes even have a lien over what is really a government advance, an advance made on the credit of the Dominion? In case a householder or members of his family have to go to hospital, why should those hospital charges have a prior lien upon the farm which must be paid before the mortgagee can realize upon his mortgage security? I can understand that subsequent advances made by the municipality for seed grain have a prior charge on the crop realized from the growing of the grain, but I cannot see any reasonable ground why an advance for seed grain should be a prior charge upon the land and be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the property on the realization of the mortgage, in priority to the claim of the mortgagee, in this case the board. I think that requires consideration.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has read clause 12, I presume.

Mr. CAHAN: Clause 12, if the chairman will allow me to deal with it, says:

> In the event of legislation being passed by the legislature of any province operating under this act after loans have been made available in that province which, in the opinion of the board, would prejudicially affect the security of existing or future loans, the board. . . may cease to make further loans in that province.

I am not dealing so much with the future; I am dealing with existing prior charges which are not affected at all by section 12, as I understand it.

As I am dealing with section 7, I would like to call attention to paragraph (d). My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre mentioned the difficulties which farmers have in carrying on farming operations on borrowed money. As a matter of fact, farmers in no civilized country have yet, except in individual cases, been able to carry on farming under normal conditions on borrowed money and make it succeed. In this case the sole plea which is put forward that appeals to me is that the rate of interest is to be made so low as to enable the farmer under these exceptional circumstances to use borrowed money to his own individual profit. But for what purpose should he be allowed to borrow that money? We know as a matter of fact that the three provinces of the middle west, like many of our eastern provinces, are loaded up with liabilities created by the purchase of furniture, by the purchase of organs and even of pianos, by the purchase of automobiles and a hundred and one other things on the instalment plan, where the payments are extended not simply over twelve months, but as much as eighteen months. We know that that prevails in all of the provinces, perhaps not to a greater extent in the middle west, but to a very great extent there. Now I for one suggest that it is not proper to appeal to the Dominion government and to parliament to make loans of money to enable the farmers of any province to pay off debts which have been created by the purchase of luxuries of that kind on the instalment plan. I suggest that the liabilities which may be paid off under these farm loans should be liabilities which have been created in good faith in the cultivation and management and extension of the farm.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman where he secured his information with regard to the character of the farm homes of the three prairie provinces.

Mr. CAHAN: I have not made any reference to the farm homes of the three prairie provinces. I am not discussing the farm homes.

Mr. SPENCER: What about the instalment buying?

Mr. CAHAN: What I mean by instalment buying, if the hon. gentleman wishes to know, is this: I have received that information not only from the banking community but from some of the loan companies doing business in the west, and from some of the most representative men that those three provinces have produced. They have told me that to the same extent that exists in the eastern provinces the purchasing on the instalment plan has created a very considerable volume of unliquidated indebtedness in these three western provinces. You find the same thing in the eastern provinces as well. I am not making an exceptional statement.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The information of the hon. gentleman with respect to conditions among the farmers of western Canada is inaccurate.

Mr. CAHAN: I am willing to accept that from one who knows the conditions as well as my hon. friend, but I am using the information to illustrate this fact: Whether you call this an advance from the Dominion treasury, or whether you call it a guarantee by the Dominion government, it is one and the same thing. I regard these bonds as guaranteed by the Dominion government under conditions where a higher rate of interest has to be paid on the bonds than would have been paid if the bonds had been directly guaranteed by the government, although the liability of the government, I think, remains the same. Now for what purpose should we use the credit of this Dominion, which we are using, as the hon. minister himself admits? Should we use the credit of this Dominion for any other purpose than to aid the farmer in acquiring and cultivating and managing his farm?

Mr. JACOBS: When the farmer is loaded down with debt, does the hon. member think it really makes very much difference how it was contracted so long as the debt is pressing and has to be paid, failing which the farmer will be turned out.

Mr. CAHAN: It would be far better to let the debt be cleaned up and for the farmer to start afresh. The farmer should have some way of taking advantage of some sort of insolvency legislation to the same extent that eastern merchants have. Subsection 2 of section 7 provides:

> The proceeds of such loan shall be used for the following purposes and no other,—
> (a) To purchase farm land;

That is a very proper use of the proceeds.

> (b) To purchase fertilizers, seed, live stock, tools, machinery, and any implements and equipment necessary to the proper operation of the farm mortgaged;

A proper use of the proceeds.

> (c) To erect farm buildings or to clear, drain, fence or make any other permanent improvement tending to increase the productive value of the land;

A very proper use of the proceeds. But when we come to (d) we find the whole horizon opened up to us. In (a), (b) and (c) we have set forth in detail most commendable objects for which these proceeds may be used. As the whole country is interested in agricultural production, you might reasonably ask that its credit should be used to assist in providing these additional facilities for the acquisition and the cultivation of the land. But when you come to:

> (d) To discharge liabilities already accumulated;

I say it is asking just a little too much to ask that the Dominion treasury, or if you will the Dominion government, should guarantee and provide loans to liquidate already accumulated liabilities in the northwest.

Mr. BROWN: Will the hon. gentleman apply that to all liabilities that may be accumulated, or will he differentiate to any degree?

Mr. CAHAN: I would differentiate, possibly, in the case of liabilities which have been incurred clearly for the purposes of (a), (b), and (c), I would make a clear distinction there. But to discharge liabilities already accumulated of every sort, description and kind, seems to me to be going beyond any reasonable limit for the proper application of these funds. That is all I am pointing out.

Mr. MACDONALD (Glengarry): Loans would be limited to 50 per cent of the value of the lands and 20 per cent of the improvements.

Mr. CAHAN: I grant that, but even so the provision I have indicated is open to criticism.

Mr. GARDINER: I have listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He complained very severely that the credit of this Dominion is going to be used to assist the farmer. It is just as well to define what credit is or how credit is created. The only basis of real credit is the ability of the Canadian people to create and deliver goods and service.

Mr. CAHAN: You are opening up a large question.

Mr. GARDINER: The farmers of Canada produce a tremendous amount of credit because they produce and deliver goods and service. One of the real reasons why the farmers have come to this parliament and asked for some redress from the high interest rate they have to pay is because parliament in the past took the credit of the people of Canada and gave it to private interests to exploit. That is the real reason why we are asking for this legislation. I notice that the hon. member (Mr. Cahan) is leaving the chamber, because now we are dealing with the real question at issue from the bottom upward; we are not dealing with it in a superficial manner. The farmers expect and hope that the present bill will pass this House in order that they may experience some measure of relief from the high interest rates they have been paying in years gone by. It is because of the existence of such high rates and the fact that they are controlled by a financial group in this country that we farmers find ourselves in the position in which we are to-day. We had to submit to the deflation the financial interests of Canada placed upon our shoulders. We could not resist it because of the fact that parliament in the past gave over to financial interests in this country the total credit that the people of the Dominion produced.

The hon. member who has just left the chamber made the statement that no loans under this legislation will be made east of Fort William. I should like to say that I have received deputations from the newer districts of Quebec consisting of farmers who want to come under this particular scheme because they have no facilities for long term loans at lower rates in the particular districts from which they come. I am also quite satisfied the farmers in the Maritime provinces will take advantage of this legislation.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has directed considerable criticism against the prior claims that exist in the province of Alberta. He cited one case where the loans on the property given by the mortgage company amounted to $11,600, but when they foreclosed and came to take possession of the property they found the prior liens amounted to something like $17,000. The hon. gentleman blames provincial legislation for all these priorities. Now I want for a moment to occupy the time of the committee in analyzing these so-called priorities. The provincial government has been blamed for placing these priorities against these lands. But the first so-called priority of $9,507 was not placed against the lands by provincial legislation. They were Dominion seed grain liens and therefore the federal authorities were responsible for placing them. Consequently it is not fair to saddle the provincial government with the responsibility.

Mr. CAHAN: Could any legislation that we passed in respect of seed apply without the concurrence of the provincial legislature?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They are Dominion liens, not liens of the provinces.

Mr. GARDINER: Seed was given out by the Dominion government after the crop failures in 1914. Most of these liens were placed against crown lands. I have not known of a case where a Dominion seed grain lien was placed against any other land. The next item of $3,165 represents municipal and provincial taxes. I do not care where you go in this country—whether to city, town or village—but you will always find that taxes have priority before mortgages. It is only reasonable that should be so. Otherwise we could not continue municipal government in Canada for any great length of time. The hon. gentleman also referred to a sum of money of over $2,000 as being a co-operative rural credit society lien against the land. May I say that the rural credit society in the province of Alberta can only place its liens against the stock or against the growing crop. Those are the only directions in which the society has power to place these liens, and it is usual to place the lien against the growing crops. It is the only society in the province of Alberta at the present time, that I know of, that has the power, with the exception of the municipalities, of placing a lien against the growing crop. Even banks cannot do it under the existing legislation.

Now we come to the hail insurance amounting to $627 out of $17,000 that the hon. member complains about. I admit that this is a prior claim created by the municipality under the municipal hail insurance scheme. But let me say this to the hon. member: Mortgage companies in western Canada, at least in Alberta, do like to have people who are borrowers take out hail insurance against their crop. If that is not done through the municipal scheme, the mortgage companies will do it through private companies whether you agree to it or not and it is applicable to the growing crop. That in my judgment is very high handed, but they had to protect themselves, anl consequently when we find the small sum of $627 as hail insurance against those parcels of land it was in a large measure just as much a protection to the mortgage company as to the borrower.

Mr. CAHAN: I find that on April 14 last in Alberta, six million dollars of liens were outstanding upon farm lands for seed supplied by the provincial government under provincial legislation, and I may have made a mistake in my reference to a seed lien. That six million dollars is a lien by virtue of provincial legislation.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member made the statement very emphatically that these were Dominion government seed grain liens.

Mr. CAHAN: I probably did.

Mr. GARDINER: I have seen exactly the same return and it was exactly as he stated it. We come to the question of hospital fees in the item he read, $231. I suppose the hon. member would place the people living in the western provinces, sometimes twenty, thirty, forty or fifty miles from a railway, in such a position that if they had not the cash to pay hospital bills they had better stay at home and die. That seems to be his method of dealing with the question. Because of the conditions that have been in existence up to the present time, and ever since that western country has been opened up it has been necessary to provide for the health of the people. In some instances it is quite true the municipalities pay the hospital bill and they have to charge it up against the land owned by the person who incurred the bill; but the amount is strictly limited.

The next item my hon. friend deals with is mechanic's liens, $1,600. Now a mechanic's lien is placed against a piece of property. First you have to get your building material and hire labour to erect a building. These mechanic's liens may include the cost of labour and material. My hon. friend should realize that if there is a mechanic's lien against any piece of property there are improvements on that property that are well worth the money the lien represents; consequently the security of the mortgage company has been increased by the erection of the building on that particular property.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

I would suggest a possible amendment to subsection 5 of section 7, which deals with the amount payable over and above the interest rate to provide for the expenses of the board and the reserve fund. I suggest to the minister that, so far as the expense account is concerned this amount of interest should be strictly limited. One of the things, and probably the only thing, I am afraid of in regard to this legislation is that we may get an overhead too great for the structure at the present time. I suggest, therefore, that we amend subsection 5 to provide that the amount of the interest charge, over and above what they pay on the money borrowed for administrative purposes, shall not exceed one per cent. I think we should tie it down so that the overhead will be as low as possible, and instead of coupling together the provision for the overhead expenses and the reserve fund, I would separate the two and give the board the opportunity of including in the interest rates sufficient to provide a reserve fund against loss. By doing that we will put it on a sounder basis, and control the expenses at the head.

Mr. BURY: I rise to confirm to a certain extent what the hon. member for St-Lawrence-St. George has said. There is no doubt that the state of the law in Alberta has had a very prejudicial effect upon loaning, the effect being that the ordinary loaning companies at one time practically withdrew all their operations from the province, refusing to lend any more money. The result was that as those who were prepared to lend money were reduced in numbers, the rate tended to go up. In other words, the better your security the cheaper your money will be. One farmer came into my office to negotiate a loan and asked me the rate of interest. I said 10 per cent. He said that was impossible. I said, "I quite agree that any farmer who borrows money at 10 per cent is a foolish man." He left the office without taking the loan. You cannot expect cheap money in Alberta or any other province unless you are prepared to make your security good, and the legislature of Alberta has undoubtedly interfered with the security which the lenders of money ought to have as one of the first inducements to lending money at a low rate.

So far as the different incidents or charges which have been mentioned by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and the hon. member for Acadia are concerned, I submit that it is absolutely essential that any loan made under this scheme should be subject to the laws of the province. You cannot get away from that, because the provincial legislature has complete control of property rights. I do think, however, that the government should approach Alberta and other provinces, for the purpose of coming to an agreement with them, that the law of the province should be modified in respect of loans advanced under this scheme so that they shall not be subject to the same priorities, as are ordinary mortgages in the province at present. I do not see, for instance, how you could displace the priority of municipal taxes or school taxes. These must, from their very nature, be a first charge on the land of the farmer, or of anybody else, whether he be farmer or not, who gets the advantages of municipal services and school services. But I do think there is an essential difference between such a charge as, say, municipal or school taxes, and the charge for seed grain liens, or even for hail insurance, or almost any of the other charges which can be put upon a farmer's lands.

The hon. member for Acadia referred to hail insurance. While it is absolutely essential, of course, for the farmer to have hail insurance,—and if he does not so insure the mortgagee, whether an individual or a company, will certainly do it for the protection of his money—the fact remains that by virtue of the law of the province of Alberta having removed from the mortgage instrument the proper virtue of the personal covenant, the hail insurance is not what it ought to be. In other words, the mortgagee who has his security on the land is not able under the laws of Alberta to proceed on the personal covenant and to get any moneys from other resources which the farmer may have until he has exhausted his remedies against the lands themselves. Therefore it stands to reason that even if the farmer gets money from his hail insurance that will not answer the actual mortgage on the lands; it cannot be attached. The only reason why the mortgage companies, banks or others who may have mortgages on lands insist on hail insurance is that they want he farmer not to be down and out so that he will be in a position with the hail insurance moneys, if he chooses so to use them, to relieve his indebtedness to the mortgage company or the bank or to start farming again the following year. But hail security is no additional security.

I might go on with the other different charges—

An hon. MEMBER: Dispense.

Mr. BURY: —but I do not purpose to do so in view of the courtesy of hon. gentlemen opposite. If, however, this scheme is to go through the government will have to make special arrangements with the provincial legislatures to see to it that moneys advanced under it shall not be made subject to seed grain liens, or to hail insurance, or to any other form of advance, even to mechanics' liens. A mechanic's lien in Alberta takes prority over a mortgage only to the extent to which it betters the mortgagee's security. The mortgage comes prior to the mechanic's lien except to the extent to which the property has been increased in value, and therefore I do not know that there is any very great objection to the mechanic's lien. As regards the other charges I certainly urge the minister to take some action with the provincial governments to see that those charges do not go on in front of the loans under this scheme.
